Commissioner GARRETSON. On the question just asked you in regard to the Philadelphia incident, where out of 400 arrests there were only 3 convictions,

It was stated that that might be cited as an evidence that the lower courts in which jury trials were held were inimicable to employers. Would it be also evidence of the fact that such courts were inimicable to the employer, or would it be a fact that they had utterly unjustly arrested a large number of men where no legal cause therefor existed?

Dr. SEAGER. I should want to be quite open minded about it. I know nothing about the state of facts that Mr. Weinstock's question referred to. I would say, off hand, that your inference is quite as justifiable as the other.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In your investigation, has it not been brought to your attention that one of the great grievances of laboring men in industrial strife is that the weapon of improper or unjustified arrests is indiscriminately used for the purpose of prejudicing the interests of the men striking?

Dr. SEAGER. Yes, sir; I have that impression.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In regard to this equality before the law the fact of union men or nonunion men does not enter into the case at all; it is purely—I want to put the question in its purely economic phase—as between the poor man and rich man, can there then be a real equality between the men, either before the law or in the conduct of any matter of strife, between the man who has nothing but his labor and the man who has other unlimited resources or a resource that will extend over a very long period, for the very reason that the capital of the men who have the resources can subsist upon those resources where labor can not subsist upon itself?

Dr. SEAGER. I think that is true unless the wage earner is a member of an organization that can stand behind him.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am taking it in the individual sense.

Dr. SEAGER. Yes, sir; I would agree with that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The man that has the resources is always able to utilize not only the better in a legal contest, not only the higher class of professional talent, and thereby avail himself of all the possible delays of the law in the final adjudication of the case and starve the enemy out; is that not the logical conclusion?

Dr. SEAGER. I think that often describes the situation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In what you have said, Professor, about the attitude of the courts in labor cases, do you have chiefly in mind the cases involving compensation or liability cases and cases relating to sanitary laws and measures affecting women and children, or have you in mind cases involving boycotts and strikes and picketing?

Dr. SEAGER. I had both classes of legislation in mind. If I may be permitted to do so, I have had occasion to review cases on these subjects recently, and I would be glad to submit a reprint of those cases as part of my testimony before the commission. This indicates more in detail just what sort of decisions it seems to me show the bias I have referred to.

(The papers referred to, entitled "The Attitude of American Courts Toward Restrictive Labor Laws," by Henry R. Seager, published by Ginn & Co., Boston, in 1904, and "The Constitution and Social Progress in the State of New York," by Henry R. Seager, published in The Survey, dated April 10, 1915, were submitted in printed form.)

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon has a question to ask.

Commissioner LENNON. Professor, you were asked as to your belief that the right to discharge by the employer and the right of quitting by an employee rested on the same basis. Do they rest on the same basis from a sociological viewpoint?

Dr. SEAGER. As I understood the question it referred to the legal basis upon which they should rest under our legal system. It was that sense in which I meant that they should be, it seemed to me, on exactly the same basis. The law should deal in exactly the same way with the two sides. As to the sociological or economic aspect, I think usually the job is more important to the worker than the worker is to the employer.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to ask you this question: Do you think it would be possible, with a permanent industrial relations commission, to encourage workers to work out their own salvation?

Dr. SEAGER. I am very glad that question is asked, because it will permit me to express the view that a permanent industrial relations commission, if we are to have one, should be a commission of employers and employees, on which the general public should not be represented, and that the basis of selection should be some sort of plan by which the members would represent the two sides—represent the organizations that are developed on the two sides, so that both points of view would be constantly present, and those who have full knowledge of the difficulties of labor problems would be the ones called on to work toward a more harmonious solution.

Chairman WALSH. Have you found it very difficult to secure members who could be set out as representing the public, who were impartial in their views?

Dr. SEAGER. I think it is very difficult to secure such members.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How could you get an agreement under those circumstances, Professor, if both sides were partisan?

Dr. SEAGER. My thought is not that an agreement could be reached on all points, but that agreement could be secured on many points, and that all of the agreements reached would be effective because they would represent really a coming together of employer and employee. Whereas, usually, if representatives of the public are on such commissions, the two sides disagree and the representatives of the public declare the verdict, and it does not carry conviction to either side, which means virtually a failure of the whole system.

Chairman WALSH. The representatives usually do not work themselves, but live on an income from stocks, or something else, involved in industry?

Dr. SEAGER. Very apt to; have to live on something.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, you would have the two sides represented without an umpire?

Dr. SEAGER. I should. The function I have in mind for such a commission would be to work toward more harmonious relations and go just as far as it is possible for the two sides to come together.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would follow out the plan that has been in successful operation for many years in the London Chamber of Commerce, where the two sides to the controversy are represented by an equal number of representatives of each without an umpire?

Dr. SEAGER. Exactly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And in nearly every case they come to an understanding?

Dr. SEAGER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell has a question, Dr. Seager.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Doctor, as president of the Association for Labor Legislation, from what source does the active opposition to your legislation come; the legislation you seek in the various legislatures?

Dr. SEAGER. Usually from employers.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They oppose all forms of legislation initiated by you?

Dr. SEAGER. No; many employers favor legislation; but when there is opposition it usually comes from the employers, and it relates to specific proposals; that is, employers now nearly always agree that some legislation is necessary, but many employers, when you come to a specific proposal, will dissent from that proposal.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The tendency is usually toward reducing, for instance, the hours or the age limit, I mean, and where we would put it at 16 the employers would try to have it reduced to 14 or 13 or some other compromise on it?

Dr. SEAGER. Yes; that would be illustrative; though, as a matter of fact, we concern ourselves very little with child-labor legislation, because of the existence of another national organization that deals with that. The aspects we have been particularly occupied with have been compensation legislation, legislation with reference to one day of rest in seven, and so on; that is, legislation designed to protect the adult workers rather than children.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And with reference to occupational diseases?

Dr. SEAGER. With reference to occupational diseases.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you observe the recently successful effort in changing the compensation laws in the State of New York at the recent session of the legislature, Doctor?

Dr. SEAGER. Substituting an industrial commission for the compensation commission?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes.

Dr. SEAGER. Yes; I observed that very closely, and was very much interested in it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What were the influences behind that legislation?

Dr. SEAGER. The influences were very complex, and any statement I might make would be my personal opinion. There is no doubt but what the proposal started largely on political grounds; that is to say, the department of labor and the compensation commission had been organized under the auspices of a Democratic administration, and there had been a change in the politics of the State, and the Republicans came into control and a number of measures were proposed, and some were put through, designed to provide—designed among other things, to provide offices for a number of deserving Republicans. It was in that way, I think, that the proposal first came forward. But after it was made, the association for labor legislation, which I represent, which had long been committed to the plan of an industrial commission as the body to administer the labor laws and the compensation law—that is, the Wisconsin plan—opposed the bill as it was introduced, and at the same time agreed to support a bill if it should be changed along lines that would eliminate politics from it so far as possible and insure the sort of organization of the department of labor, and the compensation commission, that seemed to us desirable, and the law, as finally passed, was the bill which was drafted under the auspices practically of the Association for Labor Legislation, and a very different bill from that that was originally proposed.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But the effort was in the direction of making the compensation laws of New York less effective?

Dr. SEAGER. Not at all. I should say, on the contrary, to make them more effective. There was no change whatever made in the compensation law except to substitute for the compensation commission, as the body to administer the law, an industrial commission as the body to administer the law, and to charge this commission at the same time with administration of the labor law. The industrial commission consists of five members. It happened that the compensation commission consisted of four members, because one of the members had resigned, and only four were actually employed for the work of the commission. The four members of the compensation commission and the commissioner of labor constituted five persons, and the new commission consists of five persons, so the only result is the combination of the work of those two departments, both concerned in a very intimate way with the labor law, and it is likely to lead, in our opinion, to a much greater efficiency in the administration of the law by cutting out duplication as to inspection and so on and so on.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was not an effort made, and was it not successful, in allowing greater privileges in the optional—

Dr. SEAGER (interrupting). There were attempts made to amend the compensation law in a good many particulars, but that was entirely independent of the association bill, and all of them were opposed by the Association for Labor Legislation and all but one of them were defeated.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Who were they supported by?

Dr. SEAGER. Supported, I imagine, by employers, although some of them were rather obscure, and also by casualty companies.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Insurance companies?

Dr. SEAGER. Insurance companies; but practically all of those measures were defeated; only one of them passed, and that in a form that did not involve a very serious relaxation of the compensation law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Isn't it a fact that one of the evils that developed under the New York compensation law was that of compelling all settlements with injured workers to be done by and through the commission, resulting in the commission becoming, as it were, snowed under and delayed indefinitely the time when the injured worker could get compensation?

Dr. SEAGER. The law provided for that method of settlement, and as a matter of fact the commission was far behind in the settlement of claims.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And in order to remedy that the plan was finally adopted—that settlement—a plan that has been employed practically with entire satisfaction in other States—of permitting the employer to make settlement with the injured worker subject to the approval of the commission?

Dr. SEAGER. Yes; that change was made. I would not say that operated to the entire satisfaction of both parties. There was a good deal of dissatisfaction with that method on the part of the workers; but that was entirely independent of the Association's Industrial Commission bill, and personally I was opposed to that change in the New York law. My own opinion was that a different method of handling claims would have enabled the commission to catch up with its business, and that on the whole, in the long run, having claims settled by the commission would be more satisfactory to both sides, assuming an impartial commission.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The change you speak of, that was in the interest of the insurance companies?

Dr. SEAGER. Doubtless that bill was supported strongly by the insurance companies.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you suppose their interest was that because the commission was not giving prompt attention to claims of individuals, they wanted a change?

Dr. SEAGER. Doubtless that aspect concerned them financially; that is, it was a financial disadvantage to them to have the settlement of these claims delayed. But it was the general impression that the stronger reason was the opportunity that might develop for making more favorable settlements from their point of view.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Professor, very much, for your attendance and testimony.

Mr. Haywood, please.

TESTIMONY OF MR. WILLIAM D. HAYWOOD.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state your full name?

Mr. HAYWOOD. William D. Haywood.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside, Mr. Haywood?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Denver is my home.

Chairman WALSH. Denver, Colo.?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Where were you born?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Salt Lake City, Utah.

Chairman WALSH. And what is your age?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Born in 1869—February.

Chairman WALSH. At what age did you begin work?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Nine years old.

Chairman WALSH. And in what industry, or what occupation?

Mr. HAYWOOD. In the mining industry.

Chairman WALSH. Whereabouts?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Utah—Ophir Canyon.

Chairman WALSH. Would you be kind enough, Mr. Haywood, just to sketch your history as a worker and miner, up to the time you became a member of the association of the Western Federation of Miners?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, after the first short period, we moved from there back to Salt Lake City, where I worked at different kinds of work until I went to the State of Nevada, when I was 15 years old.

Chairman WALSH. Well, now, in a general way, what sort of work did you work at, between the ages of 9 and 15?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Why, I worked at driving delivery wagons, as a messenger boy, in a hotel as elevator boy and bell boy. It was when I was in the latter part of it, the fifteenth year, that I went to Nevada, and went to work in the mines permanently.

Chairman WALSH. At the age of 15?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly pitch your voice a little louder; the reporters seem to have difficulty in hearing you, and there are a number of spectators who would like to hear you. So you will please speak a little louder.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I went to work for the Ohio Mining Co. in Willow Creek, Nev., and worked there until I was 19; and then drifted around into the different mining camps of Utah, Colorado, Idaho, and back to Nevada again.

Chairman WALSH. Are you familiar with the formation of the Western Federation of Miners?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; being a miner, of course I kept acquainted with what the miners were doing and remember when that federation of miners was organized, and have since become acquainted with all of the circumstances that brought about the federation of miners.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please describe the conditions that led to the formation of the Western Federation of Miners?

Mr. HAYWOOD. It was organized as the result of a strike that occurred in the Coeur d'Alene.

Chairman WALSH. What form of organization did they have prior to that time, if any?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Local unions, and mostly branches or assemblies of the Knights of Labor.

The miners of the Coeur d'Alene had gone on strike against a reduction of wages, and the mine owners called in armed thugs, armed men from outside territory. There was a pitched battle between these guards and the miners, and in the course of the fight there was a mill blown up. This was charged to the miners, and the mine owners called on the governor for the militia. The militia was sent in there and martial law was declared, and nearly 1,000 men were arrested and placed in what they called the "bull pen." That was a hurriedly erected two-story structure built out of rough lumber, and these men were crowded in there with scarcely room to lie down—so many—with cracks in the floor above permitting the excrement from the men to drop on those below. The result of that incarceration, there were many of them who sickened and died from the diseases that they caught there. At one period of this strike an injunction was issued and 14 of the leaders were arrested and sent to Ada County; 2 of them, I think, were sent to Detroit to serve terms.

It was while these men were in Boise that they conceived the idea of federating all of the miners of the West into one general organization. After they were released, being in jail for six or seven months, they called a convention, that was held in Butte, in May, 1893, and it was there the Western Federation of Miners was started.

Chairman WALSH. Had you been connected in any official capacity with any organizations that preceded the Western Federation of Miners?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No; there was no organization where I was working at that time.

Chairman WALSH. Had you belonged to any labor organization up to that time?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No.

Chairman WALSH. Proceed, Mr. Haywood.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Following the organization, as it was started at Butte, came the first strike; that was in Cripple Creek in 1894. They went on strike to establish a wage of $3 a day and maximum hours of eight.

Chairman WALSH. What was the wage at that time, Mr. Haywood?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Three dollars, but there was an effort on the part of the mine owners to reduce it, as they had tried to do in the Coeur d'Alene. The strike was against a reduction of pay.

Chairman WALSH. The strike was against a reduction of pay?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; in the Coeur d'Alene, and it was practically so in Cripple Creek in 1894.

The mine owner had a sheriff in office. I do not think there is any use of mincing words. You know when the mine owners have the sheriff and you know when the miners have him. You know when the mine owners control the court and you know when the others control the court. Well, they had the sheriff and he organized some 1,600 deputies. These deputies were proceeding against the miners who were picketed on the crest of Bull Hill. It was then perhaps the only time in the history of labor troubles in the country when the militia was used in the interests of the men. Gov. Waite went to the Cripple Creek district in Denver and learned of conditions as they existed there and he called out the militia. He put them in between the deputy sheriffs and the miners, and told the deputies to disperse or he would declare a state of insurrection.

The strike was settled by the governor of the State being the arbiter of the men, and a banker of the name of David Moffatt, since deceased, as the arbiter of the mine owners. The $3 a day was granted and the eight-hour law was established. The eight-hour law had not passed the legislature of the State of Colorado at that time, and it only applied to those quartz camps where the union was strong enough to enforce it.

There was no further trouble in the Cripple Creek district for some 10 years, and the next big strike was in Leadville, in 1896. Again the miners went on strike there to prevent a reduction of wages from $3 to $2.50 a day, and, as had become customary, the mine owners asked for the soldiers. Gov. Waite had been defeated in the election previous, and there was a governor by the name of McIntosh. He sent the soldiers at once. There were hundreds of men arrested, bull pens established, old abandoned shaft houses used as prisons, and the men subjected to some cruelties. They lost the strike; the wages were reduced 50 cents a day.

In 1899—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Were there any fatalities in that Leadville strike?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And was there any loss of life?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; and there was some loss of life.

Chairman WALSH. Did imprisonment follow in any case?

Mr. HAYWOOD. There was no permanent imprisonment and no trials; with the end of the strike the strife was over.

In 1899 they had a strike in Lake City, and the militia was used again.

I heard some talk this morning of gunmen being employed by union men, but the mine owners always had gunmen in the strikes with the Western Federation of Miners in the West, in the militia, when they could not get any other men.

In 1899 there was a strike in Lake City, and the same year the second great strike in the Coeur d'Alene. In that strike wages had been established at $3.50 a day in nearly all of the mining camps, with, I think, the exception of Bunker Hill; and the mine owners had generally said to the miners that if the wages at Bunker Hill were not increased it would be necessary for them to reduce their wages to that standard. A strike against the Bunker Hill was declared and became general throughout the district. The soldiers were called for; again a mill had been blown up, and they charged the miners with the destruction of this mill, and it probably was the miners who destroyed it. The soldiers came, this time Federal troops. They were the black soldiers, the same who were afterwards dismissed from the Army down in Brownsville, Tex. And the treatment afforded to white men and white women by those black soldiers; I do not mention the fact that they were black because I like white soldiers any better, because I put them all on the same level, but they were colored soldiers in this instance.

Another bull pen was established. This time it was an old rambling one-story building, fenced in with barbed wire, where between 1,000 and 1,100 men were held for many months, between 6 and 7 months, and a good many of the men died.

Chairman WALSH. Were they held on specific charges of crime?

Mr. HAYWOOD. They were arrested without warrant and without charge.

Chairman WALSH. Were the courts not open or operating in the territory?

Mr. HAYWOOD. The courts were open and operating, but a semistate of martial law prevailed.

I recall one instance of a man who died in prison. His name was Mike Devine, he was a Catholic in religion. He had been sick for a long while, and was sick during the strike. Coming out of the hospital he was met on the street by one of the negro soldiers and pushed off of the sidewalk, and when Mike resented this treatment he was arrested and thrown into prison and he had a relapse, and he felt that he was going to die and he asked for a priest, and one Lieut. Lyons, who was there under Gen. Merriam, said to Devine, "You can make your confession in hell." And Mike died without the benefit of a confession.

The result of that strike was that wages were maintained at the same standard as had existed before the strike.

In the Western Federation of Miners there is little difference between the wage of the skilled and the unskilled. A man who handles a shovel gets a minimum wage of $3 a day, while a man who runs a machine drill gets $3.50 a day.

I have tried to mention the strikes that the organization has been mixed up in.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you go up into the strike at Lead, the strike at Lead?

Mr. HAYWOOD. There was a strike at Lead about this period—this was in 1899—but that did not become serious, and the strike, or rather it is a lockout that is on there now, began at a later date.

In 1901 there was a strike in Telluride, Colo. There the company brought in scabs, strike breakers, and there was a fight between the union men and the scabs, and the union men came out best. The strike was won without much court proceedings.

In 1902 and 1903 came the strike that is so well known as the Cripple Creek strike, and that strike was in the nature of a sympathetic strike. The men who were working in the mills in Colorado City, although entitled to the benefits of the 8-hour law, which had been passed in Colorado at that time, were working 12 hours a day, 11 hours a day shift and 13 hours night shift. This condition prevails in the smelting plants of Colorado at the present time, and in some of the milling plants. They went out on strike in September, I think, 1902.

Chairman WALSH. Was the attention of the authorities called to the condition—that is, that the law was being violated with reference to the hours of labor?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Oh, yes, indeed.

Chairman WALSH. Was the law inoperative, or why didn't they prosecute the officials?

Mr. HAYWOOD. The smelter officials, or mine owners, do you mean?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Did you ever hear of a mine owner or of a manufacturer being prosecuted for violation of a law? Well, they were not, anyway. The courts don't work that way.

In the following March the miners of Cripple Creek who were producing the ore that was reduced at Colorado City, went on strike.

Chairman WALSH. Was the law being observed as to them; were they working?

Mr. HAYWOOD. They were the ones who first established the law.

Chairman WALSH. They established the law during the following strike?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And they were having the benefits of the law?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; they never lost the effects of the first strike. They went on strike on the 17th of March, striking in sympathy and for the benefit of the men in Colorado City, and at that time strikes became very general through Colorado, there being some 10 or 15 camps, and included the smelters of Denver. The State was pretty well tied up, and most of the southern coal fields were on strike.

They were striking, as they struck 10 years before, for the enforcement of a State law. The laws at that time were inoperative at Cripple Creek. The militia ran the district. They threw the officers out of office. Sheriff Robinson, I remember, had a rope thrown at his feet and was told to resign or they would hang him; and other officers were treated in the same way, and some 400 men were deported from their homes. Seventy-six of them were placed aboard trains and escorted by soldiers over into the State of Kansas, where they were dumped out on the prairie and told that they must never come back. Habeas corpus was denied. I recall Judge Seed's court, where he had three men brought in that were being held by the militia. While his court was in session it was surrounded by soldiers who had their gatling guns and rifles trained on the door. He ordered those three prisoners released, and the soldiers went after them, and they were taken back to jail. That strike was not won. It was not altogether lost. There were some places where the eight-hour day was established and increases of wages were granted, but for the smelter men, as I said before, the 12 hours pretty generally prevailed among the laborers.

Commissioner LENNON. What hours prevail in Utah?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Eight hours.

Commissioner LENNON. In the smelters?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Not in all the smelters; no. There are part of them who work eight hours, but there is an eight-hour law nevertheless. That was the first one that was carried to the United States Supreme Court, and it was a similar law that was passed in the State of Colorado that was declared unconstitutional by the supreme court of that State. There is not much to be said about the courts in connection with that strike other than the writ of habeas corpus was denied; free speech was also denied; free assemblage also; bull pens were established; 1,600 men were arrested in Victor and put into the Armory Hall; 1,600 men in one room, and this in the heat of June. There were also women arrested, and during the strike the Western Federation of Miners established stores for supplies for relief of the strikers and did business with people who were not strikers. These stores, which proved to be splendid establishments, were broken into, looted, and safes broken open, scales and such things destroyed and carried off. They carried away fruit by the ton, and things that they could not carry away they destroyed; for instance, cutting open sacks of flour and sugar and dumping them on the floor and pouring kerosene oil over the quarters of beef, and such as that. This was done by members of the militia and of the Citizens' Alliance. Remember that you have a report here in Washington of that, written by Walter B. Palmer, that goes into the details of the labor disturbance in Colorado; also some Senate documents, statements by the Western Federation, and statements by the Mine Owners' Association.

It was during the period of those strikes that the Western Federation of Miners realized the necessity of labor getting together in one big union. We were on strike in Cripple Creek, the miners; the mill men were on strike in Colorado Springs. There were scabs in the mines and scabs in the mills, and there were union railroaders that were the connecting link between those two propositions. There seemed to be no hope for such a thing as that among any of the existing labor organizations, and in 1905 the officers of the Western Federation of Miners took part in a conference we called—the convention of the Industrial Workers of the World. That convention was held in Chicago in June, 1905, and the Western Federation of Miners, among other labor organizations, became a part of that movement. And there has been a continuation of the same troubles that the Western Federation of Miners was involved in ever since that period. The federation itself has since 1905 had several severe strikes. In Lead City a lockout, which practically disrupted the organization at that point. At Bingham Canyon, Utah, they were involved in a great strike, and you have all heard of it; the strike in the copper mines at Calumet, Mich., where there were many casualties. The men were starved; the children of the miners were burned to death on Christmas Eve. There was no fire; they were trampled to death. A false cry of fire had been given, and in their attempt to escape from the hall there were 95 women and children trampled to death. The Industrial Workers, when organized, became first involved in a strike of serious proportions at McKees Rocks, Pa. There was the first time that we went up against what were called the Cossacks, the black plague of that State. The Industrial Workers met them on a different basis to what other labor organizations had done, and told them “for every man you kill of us, we will kill one of you,” and with the death of one or two of the Cossacks their brutality became less.

I am trying to think of these incidents in sequence, as near as I can.

I think the next instance where the Industrial Workers had to contend with the law was perhaps the free-speech fight in Spokane, where the members of the organization insisted on speaking on the streets in front of the employment agency offices. They were telling what the employment sharks—what they were doing; how they would employ men; that these men would go up to take jobs that they had picked for them; that they would be discharged and other gangs sent out. The authorities of the city took up the side of the employment sharks, and between 500 and 600 men and women, members of the organization, were thrown into prison. Several of them were killed. They were put in the hot box and then removed and put in a cold cell. Several died from pneumonia. They got no relief from the court, but, as the members of the organization persisted in carrying on the fight, finally the city of Spokane compromised by saying that they would let them all out of jail provided that the organization would not prosecute certain cases that had been made against the officers. I think that it was the following year that the free-speech fight occurred in Fresno, Cal. There the authorities started to arrest men merely for speaking on the street corner, not causing a congestion of traffic. If I have it correctly, there was between 150 and 200 men thrown into prison there. They were crowded to more than the capacity of the prison. The hose of the fire department was turned on them. I am told that one night they were compelled to stand up to their knees in water, but they won that fight; and perhaps the only one that they have lost at all was the free-speech fight in San Diego, of which at least one of your commission is more or less acquainted. I think it was Mr. Harris Weinstock that made a report on that—a partial report of that San Diego free-speech fight.

The law afforded men no protection there. They were speaking, when arrested, on what is called D Street—D Street is a cross street running into one of the principal thoroughfares. It was not a street that was traveled, but the authorities had got tired of hearing the discussion that was carried on at this street corner every night. The first speaker arrested was a single taxer, and after him a Socialist. It was then that the Industrial Workers of the World became involved, and again I would say 135 men, some women, were badly abused and maltreated and thrown into the jails; they were beaten and whipped, and a man who was not a member of the organization had the letters “I. W. W.” burned into his body, into his flesh, with a lighted cigar.

To recite all of the atrocities that took place in San Diego and elsewhere would mean to take up too much time of the commission.

I think this will bring us down to the time of the Lawrence strike, in which the Industrial Workers took charge. There, of course, as everywhere, I might say, that I have seen courts in action, they took the side of the capitalists. There were between 800 and 900 people arrested—men and women, girls and boys; there were some convictions, but a small proportion for the large number that were arrested. In Massachusetts they have a system of State police, something similar to that of Pennsylvania, though they are not mounted.

When the strike was called the State police came, and the park police, the municipal police from other cities, and then they brought in the militia. Several of the strikers were killed, none of the employers were, but they arrested two of the leaders of the strike for the death of Anna ———; she was one of the girls that was on strike. They had those men in jail for nine months and would probably have convicted them if it had not been for the general strike on the part of the workers. After the strike had been settled and the demands were gained, they added to their former demands that Ettor, Caruso, and Giovannitti be released from prison; they were finally acquitted. During the Lawrence strike there were strikes at Clinton and many other places in the textile industry.

At Clinton the police were again used by the mill owners, and they shot into a crowd of striking girls, wounding many of them seriously. In Little Falls the same treatment was accorded the strikers by the police, which is also true during the great strike at Paterson. Nearly everyone is acquainted with the details of that strike and its outcome.

Since the Paterson strike there has been trouble in Wheatland, Cal., where members of the Industrial Workers of the World organized 2,500 hop pickers, asking for better conditions in the hop fields of the Durst Bros. ranches. As the outcome of that demand two young married men, Ford and Suhr, were arrested and charged with the killing of the district attorney. They were convicted, and have been sentenced to prison for life terms.

This, I think, briefly outlines the main strikes of the organization that I have been affiliated with and, I think, clearly portrays a condition that this commission should understand, and that is that there is a class struggle in society, with workers on one side of that struggle and the capitalists on the other; that the workers have nothing but their labor power and the capitalists have the control of and the influence of all branches of government—legislative, executive, and administrative; that they have on their side of the question all of the forces of law; they can hire detectives, they can have the police force for the asking or the militia or the Regular Army.

There are workers who have come to the conclusion that there is only one way to win this battle. We don't agree at all with the statement that you heard reiterated here day after day—that there is an identity of interests between capital and labor. We say to you frankly that there can be no identity of interests between labor, who produces all by their own labor power and their brains, and such men as John D. Rockefeller, Morgan, and their stockholders, who neither by brain or muscle or by any other effort contribute to the productivity of the industries that they own. We say that this struggle will go on in spite of anything that this commission can do or anything that you may recommend to Congress; that the struggle between the working class and the capitalistic class is an inevitable battle; that it is a fight for what the capitalistic class has control of—the means of life, the tools and machinery of production. These, we contend, should be in the hands of and controlled by the working class alone, independent of anything that capitalists and their shareholders and stockholders may say to the contrary.

Personally I don't think that this can be done by political action. First, for the very good reason that the wage earner or producing classes are in the minority; second, that they are not educated in the game of politics; that their life is altogether industrial. That while they are the only valuable unit of society, still their efforts must be confined to the jobs where they work. And I have had a dream that I have in the morning and at night and during the day, and that is that there will be a new society sometime in which there will be no battle between capitalist and wage earner, but that every man will have free access to land and its resources. In that day there will be no political government, there will be no States, and Congress will not be composed of lawyers and preachers as it is now, but it will be composed of experts of the different branches of industry, who will come together for the purpose of discussing the welfare of all the people and discussing the means by which the machinery can be made the slave of the people instead of a part of the people being made the slave of machinery or the owners of machinery. I believe that there will come a time when the workers will realize what the few of us are striving for and that is industrial freedom.

Chairman WALSH. In how many of these places that you have spoken of—— Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just let me carry out this point, if you please, Mr. Chairman. You say you don't believe it can be done by political action?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you in mind some other method by which it can?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir; I think it can be done by direct action. I mean by organization of the forces of labor. Take, for instance, the organization that you know, the United Mine Workers of America. They have about one-half of the miners of this country organized. At least a sufficient number to control them all. I think the United Mine Workers can say to the mine owners, "You must put these mines in order, in proper shape, or we won't work in them." They can compel the introduction of safety appliances, of ventilation systems, and save in that way thousands of lives every year. I don't think anybody will deny that they have that power to bring about that improvement. If they have the power to do that by direct action, they have the power to reduce their hours; they have the power to increase or at least to better the laboring conditions around the mines and have better houses. It seems to me there is no reason in the world why the miner should not enjoy, even in a mining camp, some of the advantages that the worker has in the city. And I think that free organization of miners, organized in one big union, having no contract with the boss, have no right to enter into a contract with the employer or any other combination of labor, to my mind. There can be each division of industry, each subdivision, be brought into a whole, and that will bring about the condition that I have described to you.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You mean by that, by these economic organizations they would create, or control questions of hours and things of that kind you spoke of, but as to the ownership, the right of ownership, what is the method that you have in mind of your organization in connection with the method of taking over?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Taking over through the organization. If you are strong enough to compel the things I say, you are strong enough to say, "Here, Mr. Stockholder, we won't work for you any longer. You have drawn dividends out of our hides long enough; we propose that you shall go to work now, and under the same opportunities that we have had."

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, you propose by your strength and numbers to declare ownership?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; exactly; through the efforts of the working class.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock has some questions he would like to ask you.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May I ask you, Mr. Haywood, your present occupation?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Secretary-treasurer of the Industrial Workers of the World.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The charge has been made that so-called labor agitators, as a rule, are either of foreign birth or foreign parentage. May I ask what was your parentage?

Mr. HAYWOOD. My father was an American, and his father was an American, and his father was an American.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So you date your American ancestry back several generations?

Mr. Haywood. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You made the statement a little while ago that the wage-earning producing class is in a minority?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May I ask what is the foundation for that statement?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, Government statistics.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What do the Government statistics show?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Isaac Hourwich is the compiler of those statistics. Why, it shows very few States where they have even a slight majority.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, are you sufficiently familiar with the Federal statistics to tell us about how many wage earners there are in the country?

Mr. HAYWOOD. There are about 10,000,000 industrial wage earners.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Including their dependents, assuming there are the usual number of 5 dependents to every worker, that would make about 50,000,000 of people?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No; I don't think so. This includes the man and his wife and some of his children.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No—in that 10,000,000?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, assuming or admitting that the wage-earning producing class are in the minority—however, it would have to be admitted, I take it, that they at least have the balance of power, and whichever side they would throw their influence with would win?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I think that is quite so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, they are relatively in the position that the Irish representatives in Parliament were in for many years; that is, they had the balance of the power, and while they had comparatively a small minority, yet whichever side they adhered to would win out.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Politically.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; giving them of course great strength and great influence. And I take it the same might be said of the wage-earning producing class in this country, that even though in the minority they at least have the balance of power. Are you at all familiar with the number of States where the initiative, referendum, and recall prevail?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No; I have no definite knowledge as to the number of States.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it you know, of course, that numerous States have adopted the initiative, referendum, and recall in recent years, and that the tendency now is in most of the States to follow the pace set by the advanced States?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I can not see any State, even Oregon, where any benefit has accrued to the wageworker.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think not?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No; I think not. For instance, the unemployment condition in Portland, Oreg., is perhaps worse than in any other city, and has been during this last winter.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Will you tell us what the membership of the I. W. W. is at this time?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I would judge that it is about 15,000.

Commissioner HAYWOOD. As you know, of course, this commission is seeking remedies for the industrial unrest; that is the function we are presumed to perform.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; I know.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And we are inviting suggestions and opinions from all whose opinions and knowledge would lead them to express opinions that ought to carry weight with them. I take it that if the commission were to ask you what in your opinion is the remedy for industrial unrest, Mr. Haywood, that in all probability you would answer and say, I. W. W.'ism?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; I think that I would.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then that clearly brings I. W. W.'ism within the province of the discussion of this commission, does it not?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Because, if it is I. W. W.'ism, that is what we ought to recommend to Congress?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No; Congress can not do anything with that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, we could say that encouragement of the organization of I. W. W. would tend to minimize industrial unrest?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I think that would militate against the I. W. W.'s if you did such a thing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If we recommended that?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Why should it militate against the I. W. W.'s?

Mr. HAYWOOD. It seems to me a recommendation like that, coming from you gentlemen, would militate against the organization and have a tendency to dilute it and dilute its revolutionary strength.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, at all events, if that should be our conclusion, if after an exhaustive investigation we should find ourselves in a frame of mind such as you are in, it would become our duty to announce it, no matter what the results?

Mr. HAYWOOD. You will not find yourself in that frame of mind. But if you were—

Commissioner LENNON (interrupting). You would take Mr. Weinstock into membership then?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. At all events, it becomes our province at this time, having invited you to give testimony here, and that carrying with it that your testimony is worth while, and you taking the ground that in your opinion

I. W. W.'ism is the proper remedy for the removal of unrest, it becomes our province properly to discuss I. W. W.'ism and see what it really stands for.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, I am going to read here some quotations from I. W. W. authenticated literature, Mr. Haywood.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Who is the author?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, I will give you the authors as I go along, and I will invite your comment on it when I have finished reading the quotations.

The I. W. W. literature placed in the hands of the commission teaches militant action whenever such action may be deemed necessary. In a pamphlet published by the I. W. W. bureau of New Castle, Pa., entitled, "The I. W. W.—Its History, Structure, and Methods," written by the I. W. W. national secretary-treasurer, Vincent St. John, the following statement appears:

"As a revolutionary organization the Industrial Workers of the World aims to use any and all tactics that will get the results sought with the least expenditure of time and energy. The tactics used are determined solely by the power of the organization to make good in their use. The question of 'right' and 'wrong' does not concern us."

In a pamphlet published by the Spokane local I. W. W., Spokane, Wash., entitled "Industrial Workers of the World, Songs to Fan the Flames of Discontent," there appears the following:

"To arms, to arms, ye brave!
The avenging sword unsheath!
March on, march on, all hearts resolved
On victory or death."

In a pamphlet written by Arnold Roller, apparently an I. W. W. leader, under the title, "The Social General Strike," there appears the following statement:

"In this manner the crisis of overproduction is the best guaranty for the success of a social general strike, because the products on hand permit the satisfaction of all needs before the complete reorganization, namely, by a general 'help yourself' on the part of the workers."

In another pamphlet entitled "Industrial Union Methods," by William E. Troutman, which appeared originally in the Industrial Workers' Bulletin, is found the following:

"The industrial unionists, however, hold that there can be no agreement with the employers of labor which the workers have to consider sacred and inviolable.

"Industrial unionists will therefore sign any pledge and renounce even their organization at times when they are not well prepared to give battle or when market conditions render it advisable to lay low; but they will do just the reverse of what they had agreed to under duress when occasion arises to gain advantages to the worker."

Under the head of "Sabotage" the same writer says:

"Inferior goods are turned out by silent understanding of all workers in one shop or plant; time is taken up with getting tools repaired and repair work attended to. These and similar methods are known under the compound name, 'sabotage.'"

In a pamphlet entitled, "The General Strike," by William D. Haywood, in which is published a speech delivered by him in New York, March 16, 1911, the following appears:

"I hope to see the day when the man who goes out of the factory will be the one who will be called a scab; when the good union man will stay in the factory, whether the capitalists like it or not; when we lock the bosses out and run the factories to suit ourselves. That is our program. We will do it."

In a pamphlet published by J. H. Kerr & Co., Cooperative, Chicago, entitled, "How Capitalism Has Hypnotized Society," by William Thurston Brown, an I. W. W. writer and lecturer, appears the following:

"Would it be wrong for the united working class of America to say to-day, to-morrow, any time: 'Not a wheel shall move on any railroad, not a bit of machinery shall be run in any mill, factory, or smelter, from the Atlantic to the Pacific; from the Lakes to the Gulf, unless it is understood distinctly by the people of America that these tools of industry belong of right to the workers of the nation? And, meanwhile, since hungry men and women and children must be fed, and since your charity organizations have recognized the fact, and your churches have preached it, we shall take the food necessary for our sustenance until it is understood that this system of robbery is to stop forever."

In a leaflet issued by the I. W. W. Publishing Bureau, New Castle, Pa., entitled "Appeal to Wage Workers, Men and Women," by E. S. Nelson, the following appears:

"In case of a capitalist injunction against strikers, violate it; disobey it; let the strikers and others go to jail, if necessary. That would cost so much that the injunction would be dispensed with. Final, universal strike, that is, to remain within the industrial institutions, lock the employers out for good as owners and parasites, and give them a chance to become toilers."

In a pamphlet entitled, "The Crack of Doom, or The Fall of Capitalism," by Laura Payne Emerson, a resident of San Diego, and a recognized representative and lecturer of the I. W. W., appears the following:

"Industrial unionism, the capitalist well knows, spells the abolition of the wage system. The I. W. W. recognizes no craft autonomy and no contract system. All workers in all departments of any industry are organized in one union. No worker or set of workers in any craft or branch of an industry can make a contract with an employer which he must consider sacred while later his fellow workers in the same industry are on a strike, thus enabling him to scab on his fellows while he carries a union card and cusses scabs. When the workers who make these great industries possible get ready for action they will no longer beg for some master to give them enough to live on, but take what belongs to them."

That is fairly representative, Mr. Haywood, of the attitude and propaganda of the I. W. W.—these extracts from these I. W. W. pamphlets and articles I have read?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; in so far as you have quoted from the I. W. W. pamphlet. You have a number of pamphlets that were not compiled by members of the I. W. W. The first that you quoted is the national song of France, the Marseillaise. What you read from the Brown pamphlet, advocating the taking of food, was said in this city by Abraham Lincoln during war time, when speculators, gamblers in foodstuffs ran the prices of provisions up 600 or 700 or 800 per cent, and the people came to Abraham Lincoln and asked him what to do, and he said: "Take your pickaxes and crowbars and go to the granaries and warehouses, and help yourselves," and I think that is good I. W. W. doctrine. I do not see much there I would take issue with.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think, generally speaking, that it represents the sentiment and attitude and the creed of the I. W. W.?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, summing up we find that the I. W. W.'ism teaches the following:

(a) That the workers are to use any and all tactics that will get the results sought with the least possible expenditure of time and energy.

(b) The question of right or wrong is not to be considered.

(c) The avenging sword is to be unsheathed, with all hearts resolved on victory or death.

(d) The workman is to help himself when the proper time comes.

(e) No agreement with an employer of labor is to be considered by the worker as sacred or inviolable.

(f) The worker is to produce inferior goods and kill time in getting tools repaired and in attending to repair work; all by a silent understanding.

(g) The worker is to look forward to the day when he will confiscate the factories and drive out the owners.

(h) The worker is to get ready to cause national industrial paralysis with a view of confiscating all industries, meanwhile taking forcible possession of all things that he may need.

(i) Strikers are to disobey and to treat with contempt all judicial injunction.

If that is the creed of the I. W. W., do you think the American people will ever stand for it?

Mr. HAYWOOD. There is one feature there that I do not like; I do not think you can present it as I. W. W.'ism; that is the manufacture of shoddy goods. That is the complaint we have against the capitalists at the present time. There are no goods that are perfect in capitalism. They can not make enough profit out of them. You realize that as a merchant; in the manufacture of woolen goods they have learned how to use old clothes in the making of shoddy; in the manufacture of silk goods they have learned that silk is a peculiar fiber that will absorb four or five times its weight in tin, iron, and zinc, and I do not believe that goods should be adulterated in that way. I do not believe in the manufacture of such stuff, and palming it off on the consumer as "as good as the best," or "as good as the purest." I do not believe in the poisoning of foods and the adulteration of drugs or any of the needs of the human family. I believe that there are plenty of all of the good things of life to reach all of the people.

Now, there are many things I would like to explain to you, that is as to the tactics and the results. Do you know the results we are hoping for? We hope to see the day when no child will labor. We hope to see the day when all men able will work, either with brain or with muscle; we want to see the day when women will take their place as industrial units; we want to see the day when every old man and every old woman will have the assurance of at least dying in peace. Now, you have not got anything like that to-day. You have not the assurance, rich man as you are, of not dying a pauper. I have an idea that we can have a better society than we have got; and I have another idea that we can not have a much worse one than it is at present. So you see that the program of the I. W. W. is not such a bad thing after all, because while we do not ask any advice and are not requesting any help from any other than the working people at the present time, still we believe through the working class that we will find a way of making workers of all of them and that will include myself, too.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I do not think there is any room for issue, Mr. Haywood, between you and the rest of us on the question of the adulteration of foods.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, you put in there that the I. W. W. wants to produce that kind of stuff.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Where?

Mr. HAYWOOD. In the conclusions you arrived at.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I was not giving my own views, Mr. Haywood. Please remember that I was quoting from some industrial I. W. W. workers.

Mr. HAYWOOD. From what you thought was.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; I will give you my authority all the way down the line.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I told you that Brown——

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). Is this what you take exception to: "The worker is to produce inferior goods and kill time in getting tools repaired, and in attending to repair work, all by a silent understanding;" that was this writer's explanation of what sabotage stood for?

Mr. HAYWOOD. That was Roller's?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Roller was not a member of the I. W. W.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He was telling how sabotage should be employed?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I have a better conception of sabotage.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is yours?

Mr. HAYWOOD. That the worker should refuse to be a party with the boss in robbing the public.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, that they should cease working?

Mr. HAYWOOD. That they should cease putting adulteration in such things. It is the worker, is it not, that does it? The capitalist never goes into the shop to put this adulteration into the food, and so forth.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let us eliminate the adulteration of food products and take the rest of the summary. Leave that out and let my question be, Do you think the American people will stand for that kind of a doctrine?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Read me that over again.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (reading). "(a) That the workers are to use any and all tactics that will get the results sought with the least possible expenditure of time and energy."

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; I believe in the worker using any kind of tactics that will get the results. I do not care what those tactics are when the working class has arrived at that stage of efficiency and organization, I do not care whether it means revolution. That is exactly the very——

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). "(b) The question of right or wrong is not to be considered."

Mr. HAYWOOD. What is right and wrong? What I think is right in my mind or what you think is right in your mind?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. "(c) The avenging sword is to be unsheathed, with all hearts resolved on victory or death."

Mr. HAYWOOD. What that means is a general strike.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. "(d) The workman is to help himself when the proper time comes."

Mr. HAYWOOD. When the proper time comes, when he needs it, let him go and get it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. "(c) No agreement with an employer of labor is to be considered by the worker as sacred or inviolable."

Mr. HAYWOOD. No agreement?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. HAYWOOD. He never wants to enter into an agreement. Let me explain something about an agreement. I heard you talk to Kobylak yesterday. What would a union man say if some member of that union entered into an agreement with the boss? He would say he was a bad man, wouldn't he? And that he ought to stand by the rest of the members of his union. Now, we say that union has only a little nucleus of industry; we say that union has no right to enter into an agreement because the rest of the men employed in that industry ought to be considered. We say that no industry has a right to enter into an agreement because they are a member of the working class; and finally we say that the working class has no right to enter into an agreement because it is the inherent mission of the working class to overthrow capitalism and establish itself in its place. You can let that about contract and agreement stand.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. "(f) The worker is to produce inferior goods and kill time"—we will cut out that which relates to the production of inferior goods and killing time; that is out of the subject.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. "(g) The worker is to look forward to the day when he will confiscate the factories and drive out the owners."

Mr. HAYWOOD. I would drive them in instead of out.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I think that was your own quotation.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I would make an arrangement to take every owner on the inside and give him a job alongside of me.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Have you changed your views any since you delivered this speech on March 16, 1911, in which, among other things, you said this:

"I hope to see the day when the man who goes out of the factory will be the one who will be called a scab, when the good union man will stay in the factory, whether the capitalists like it or not; when we lock the bosses out and run the factories to suit ourselves. That is our program. We will do it." Are your views the same to-day as when you said that?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I hope we can do that to-morrow.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The next is, "(h) The worker is to get ready to cause national industrial paralysis, with a view of confiscating all industries, meanwhile taking forcible possession of all things that he may need."

Mr. HAYWOOD. I do not understand the necessity for causing industrial paralysis; that is, when the workers are sufficiently organized they have got control of the machinery; you never saw a capitalist with his hand on the trouble; you never saw him on the stony end of a No. 2 shovel; you read of him on his way to Europe and going down with the Lusitania or the Titanic; they are not interested in work. It is the workers who have control now of all of the machinery if they would only make up their minds to hold that control and maintain it for themselves.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it, then, that you take no issue as a member of the I. W. W. with that statement here?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No; I will let that go.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And the last is, "(i) Strikers are to disobey and treat with contempt all judicial injunction."

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, I have been plastered up with injunctions until I do not need a suit of clothes, and I have treated them with contempt.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you advocate that?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I do not believe in that kind of law at all. I think that is a usurpation on the part of the courts of a function that was never vested in the courts by the Constitution.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Therefore, you would have no hesitancy in advising your fellow I. W. W.'ists to do as you have done.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I do not like to advise too much, but I would do it myself.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let me repeat my question once more: Do you think that the American people would stand for this program suggested?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I think the American working class will stand for it when they know it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think they would?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; I think so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then how comes it that after at least 10 years of agitation and earnest, hard work on the part of yourselves and fellow propagandists and organizers you can only show a membership of 15,000, against, perhaps, 2,000,000 or more of the American Federation?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, how many could the American Federation show when they were 10 years old?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I do not know; my friends over there [indicating] can answer that better than I can.

Mr. HAYWOOD. That is not the question. We have these 15,000 members in good standing. How many people believe as we believe?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Fortunately very few.

Mr. HAYWOOD. That is not true, but may be fortunate for you that you think so. But there are a vast number of people in all walks of life that believe that the present system of society must be changed, and that this is the means of changing it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, does not this preachment that I have just summarized practically mean this: That it is the organized and deliberate purpose of the I. W. W. to teach and preach and to burn into the hearts and minds of its followers that they are justified in lying; that they are justified in stealing and in tramping under foot their own agreements and in confiscating the property of others, in disobeying the mandates of the court, and in paralyzing the industries of the Nation; and is it not a fact that if all men and women in the Nation would accept such teaching that it would make society impossible; that it would make a Nation of thieves and liars and scoundrels?

Mr. HAYWOOD. That is the creed of the capitalist as it exists to-day, and as they practice it; they lie, they steal, they disobey the mandates of the court; there is nothing they do not do that you have ascribed to the I. W. W. there.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Very well; admitting that they do these things, does that make it right?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No; that does not make it right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, would it make it any more right for the workers to do it?

Mr. HAYWOOD. The workers do not do it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. This preaches it, does it not?

Mr. HAYWOOD. It does not. Does it say I should lie?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If I was to come in and take possession of your property and throw you out, would I be robbing you?

Mr. HAYWOOD. You have a mistaken idea that the property is yours. I would hold that the property does not belong to you; that what you as a capitalist class have piled up as property is merely unpaid labor, surplus value; you have no vested right in that property.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You mean, then, that the coat you have on your back does not belong to you, but belongs to all the people?

Mr. HAYWOOD. All right; that is not what I mean. I mean that there might be private property. I don't want your watch, I don't want your toothbrush, but the things that are publicly used; no such word as "private" should be vested in any individual in any of those things. For instance, do you believe that John D. Rockefeller has any right, either God-given right or man-made right, or any other right to the coal mines of the State of Colorado?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He has a perfect right to them under the laws of the country.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Then the laws of the country are absolutely wrong, establishing private property to them in anyone.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Very well; who are the lawmakers of the country?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, you know who they are.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I know this: I know that in the State wherein I live, with the initiative, referendum, and recall, the people are absolutely the lawmakers of the State.

Mr. HAYWOOD. All right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And they can be so in every State in the Union.

Mr. HAYWOOD. You know who the people are.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You and I and the rest of us?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; the rest of our kind; we are parasites. The real people who have to be considered are the workers, the productive workers, the ones who make society, who build the railroads, who till the soil, who run the mills. I have done no work for 10 or 15 years, and I am a parasite; I recognize that. That is what you are, and that is what the rest of them are that do not labor. You would not object to a society where you and I did actual labor, would you?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are we to understand, then, Mr. Haywood, that your interpretation or definition of a worker is a man who works purely with his hands?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I said brain and muscle.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But don't you exercise your brain in your avocation?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I try to, but I am not a productive worker. I am doing a thing that I ought not to be called on to do.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But if you say that a man who exercises his brain as well as his muscle is a producer, then you are certainly a producer?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, I produce some trouble and things like that, but I really have not produced anything now since I left the mine.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, if I. W. W'ism is the remedy for the industrial ills and you have succeeded in at least getting 15,000 people to think as you do, you have produced something from your point of view, have you not?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I would not say that is all my effort.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have aided in it; you have done your full share in it?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; and in so far as I contributed in doing that much even the workers would say that I have done a pretty good job.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would you deny the claim, for example, of a teacher of being a producer?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No; a teacher is a producer.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In your line of work, you are a teacher to those around you and teach those around you. You go out and teach the principles you represent, and you are therefore as much a producer as the teacher, and you have no right to call yourself a parasite.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, I will accept your correction.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, will you tell this commission, Mr. Haywood, as an authority on the subject, wherein, assuming that you and the Socialists and the American Federationists have the same objective in mind; that is, the betterment of the worker—will you point out to this commission as clearly and concisely as you can wherein your methods differ and are better than the method of the Socialists, and of the American Federationists?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, I do not like to set myself up as a critic.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. We have a right to your opinion, I think. You were invited here for that purpose and have certainly given the matter a great deal of thought and study and ought to be able to point out clearly to us the comparative advantages and disadvantages.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Without saying—without criticizing trade-unions, which I regard as having accomplished great good in their time, there are many things in the workings of trade-unions where they recognize the right of the bosses. The Industrial Workers of the World do not recognize that the bosses have any rights at all. We have founded the organization on the basis of the class struggle, and on that basis it must work out its ultimate.

The trade-union says, "Well, the boss has some rights here, and we are going to enter into a contract with him." How long is it going to take to solve this problem if you have continuity of contracts? That is the thing we say.

The trade-union is organized on the basis of the tools they work with. Now, the tools are changing, and it is driving trade-unions out of business. For instance, the glass blowers—glass was made by workmen who blew through a tube. A glass maker, a glass blower himself contrived a machine whereby this blowing is done automatically, and the glass blower, he is wheeling sand to that machine now.

We believe that everybody that works around that machine ought to be organized just as before; we believe that everybody that works around the glass factory ought to be organized, organized with regard to the welfare of each other. That is the reason I pointed out to you that in the Western Federation of Miners there was small differentiation in the wage scale. It is not true with the glass blower; he was paid from eight to ten dollars a day, while the boy off-bearer got a few dollars a week. Now, with us there was no boy went into the mine younger than 16 years of age, and when he went into the mine he got a man's wages, because we thought he was old enough to do a man's work. It was not a matter of skill; he did not have to serve any apprenticeship; we just took the position when the boy was old enough for the boss to exploit he was old enough to draw full pay.

Mr. HAYWOOD. After the Socialist Party——

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let us make this point, Mr. Haywood, before we take up the Socialist Party: I gather, then, from your statement that the two fundamental points in which I. W. W.'s differ from American Federationists is you are opposed to contracts with employers on the one hand, and you believe in one great union instead of craft unions. Does that make the difference?

Mr. HAYWOOD. That makes two differences.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, you believe that by the adoption of the methods adopted by the I. W. W. that the ends can be achieved better and more quickly than under the methods followed by the American Federationists?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Can you conceive of anything that labor can not do if they were organized in one big union? If labor was organized and self-disciplined it could stop every wheel in the United States to-night—every one—and sweep off your capitalists and State legislatures and politicians into the sea. Labor is what runs this country, and if they were organized, scientifically organized—if they were class conscious, if they recognized that the worker's interest was every worker's interest, there is nothing but what they can do.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Granting an organization so colossal in its character would have great power for good, would it not have great power for ill?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; it would have great power for ill—that is, it would be ill for the capitalists. Every one of them would have to go to work.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would it not also have great power in doing this—in establishing a new slavery? If the wage earner claims that under present system of things he is in slavery, would not the colossal power of your plan simply be slavery with new masters?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Such a labor organization would be a fine sort of slavery. I would like to work for my union in a shop that I owned best.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you were the "big Injun" chief?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No; to go right back in the mine that I came from. That is the place that I would like to go, right to-morrow, and receive for my labor, without any stockholder, without any Rockefeller taking off any part of it, the social value of what my labor contributed to society.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. To that degree, then, I take it, the I. W. W.'s are Socialistic?

Mr. HAYWOOD. All right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let me see if I understand the distinction correctly between socialism and I. W. W.'ism.

As I understand it, I. W. W.'ism is socialism, with this difference——

Mr. HAYWOOD (interrupting). With its working clothes on.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. As an I. W. W., are you a believer in free speech?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are you a believer in free press?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, if your idea prevails and you went to bed to-night under the capitalistic system and woke up to-morrow morning under your system, the machinery of productiveness and distribution would belong to all the people?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Under our system?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAYWOOD. It would be under the management of the working class.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. There would be collective ownership?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Of course you are not anarchistic, you believe in organization, you believe in government?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, the anarchists believe in individualism, and carries it to the limit, without government?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And if you believe in government, then you would have to have a ruler——

Mr. HAYWOOD. Would you?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would have to have superiors; otherwise, how could you have government?

Mr. HAYWOOD. It has been run at times without bosses.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Without any officials of any kind?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Without any officials; it was the glassworkers of Italy.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Taking society as we find it, as you know it and I know it, if you have organization you have to have officers?

Chairman WALSH. Let us have the glassworkers' illustration; I never heard of it.

Mr. HAYWOOD. The glassworkers of Italy went on strike, and while on strike they determined to run competitive factories, and they built factories of their own, owned by the members of the glass blowers' union. They went to work in those factories; each man knew his work—what there was to do. If you have any surplus and different interests to divide up, then there is some occasion for a boss; but if—suppose, now, that these men who are working in glass factories cooperate, as in this instance, and had some occasion for a boss, they would elect him, wouldn't they?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir; they would elect him, that is guaranteed, and would put certain responsibilities on him to carry out certain rules and regulations or laws that they might adopt.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I can not conceive of much rules and regulations that would need to be applied with a man of common sense. There would be sanitary regulations around the mine. They would not shoot during shift; they would keep the places well ventilated and clean and well timbered. What other regulations do you want?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If this group in this room organized, it can not reasonably be expected to carry out its object unless it elected representatives and officers to carry out its wishes.

Mr. HAYWOOD. But you take a motly group like this; no one can carry out its wishes, because they change every time they turn around. But you take the workers that work in one industry; their interests can be well carried out.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, would you confine this great army of workers, organized in one body, would you confine their functions and their efforts to industrial matters pure and simple, or would you at the same time have them also deal with the political conditions, with the government of our municipalities, of our Commonwealths, or our Republic?

Mr. HAYWOOD. There would be neither county or State or National lines.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. There would be no political subdivision?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Only what existed in the community.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is incomprehensible to me, Mr. Haywood; you will have to explain it a little more definitely.

Mr. HAYWOOD. What is the government of the city? The government of many cities has been changed to the commission form.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAYWOOD. The commissioner has the fire department, the public safety, and public improvement. Those are the different divisions. Why not have that same thing under industrial—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Have it nationally?

Mr. HAYWOOD. You have no community that is national in scope.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How, then, would you have it?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Have this group or this community wherever the industry was located. Do you suppose under normal conditions there would be communities like New York or Chicago with great skyscrapers sticking up in the air?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What would you say would be the size of the community?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Some 50,000 or 60,000, where the people in that industry would dwell. There would be no lawyers or preachers or stockholders like built New York.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What would you do with the city of New York?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Tear it down, or leave it as a monument to the foolishness of the present day.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How long do you think it will be, Mr. Haywood, knowing the conditions as you know them, before your ideals will be realized, before cities like New York and Chicago will be wiped out and replaced by urban communities?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, Mr. Weinstock, if some one had asked me a year ago how long it would be before a world-wide war would take place I would not have answered them; but you see the people of many nations now pitted against each other, committing murder by the wholesale, and I would say that this can come just as quick as the war. I don't know when, but I know that there are people that are interested in bringing about a change of society; whether it will be the change that I have suggested here, or whether that is the right change—and I feel that it is—still I feel that it could come just as quick as other grave things have come.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think it will be an overnight affair?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I think so; that is, as you mean overnight affairs, as war was an overnight affair.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I have been asked to submit this question to you if you care to answer it: What would you do with the lazy man and those that would decide which job each man should take, and what each particular man should do under your system?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I would give the lazy man the kind of work he would like to do. I don't believe any man is lazy.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You don't know me, then.

Mr. HAYWOOD. It is ingrown with you. You have not had a chance to do the thing you want to do; that is the reason you are lazy.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am thoroughly enjoying the work I am doing, Mr. Haywood. How would you decide on which job each man should have and what each man should do? Who would be the judge; who would be the determining factor?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I think that each man has a selection of his own, and would find his place in the group where the work was going on.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would permit a man to choose his own job regardless of his fitness?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I think he would be the most fit in doing what he would like to do.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I have known many merchants that thought they were great poets, and many poets that thought they were great lawyers, and many lawyers that thought they were great musicians, and they were not.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Not in your judgment perhaps, but probably they were according to their own.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Garretson has a question he wants to ask you before we adjourn.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Haywood, the thing that I want to know is this: One of the commissioners has presented to you a certain summing up, which seems to me, instead of being a concept of your purpose is rather an indictment of your method. Now, I want to see if I have gathered correctly from what I have studied in regard to the I. W. W., accepting you as one of its principal spokesmen and interpreters—whether or not I gather from that what you claim to be your purpose. I am going to read it in a concise form in my own language, and see whether it is fairly interpretive of not your method but your purpose. Is it your attitude that neither man nor woman should have the right to possess, either by gift, inheritance, or accumulation, in amount of surplus value (I am using the ordinary phrase "surplus value") that it would make them independent, first, of labor in some form? That takes in the two forms you mentioned, mental or muscular, or extends to the duties and responsibilities that they owe to society or are accountable to that society for or that would enable them to influence other legislative processes, judicial processes, or social or executive processes that would apply their form of influence. Is that fairly—I know it is rather long.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I would say that neither man nor woman should be possessed by inheritance, accumulation, or otherwise with anything that would give them that power.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Either of those powers?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Just one further point—

Mr. HAYWOOD (interrupting). For instance, I would say in foreign countries they have crowns and titles by divine right, but here they have everything without it. They have the sausage without the skin.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You hold by that every man has a divine right to that crown, worn conjunctly with every other man.

Mr. HAYWOOD. That would suit me first-rate.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You accept that as the definition of divine right?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir; but that is as far as I will go with you.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you hold further that if your beliefs were made effective that the man that now stands in your estimation as a ruthless financier, or an exploiter of labor, by being deprived of the right to pile up surplus value or transmit it, having the incentive removed, that his energies would be directed to the common as well as the individual good?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I think so. Now, the only standard of measurement that he has is gold and its accumulation. Under a different system of society he would work for approbation and the approval of his fellow man with all the happiness that would mate with a new society, and would be more of an incentive to him than all his gold.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Supposing, of course, that we could not grab the coin at the same time?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I won't press it further than that.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until to-morrow. Will you please resume the stand at 10 o'clock? Some of the other commissioners have some questions they wish to ask you.

(Thereupon, at 4.30 p. m., Wednesday, May 11, 1915, an adjournment was taken until Thursday, May 12, 1915, at 10 o'clock.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., Thursday, May 13, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh; Commissioners Harriman, Garretson, Lennon, Weinstock, and O'Connell.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Haywood, will you please resume the stand?

TESTIMONY OF MR. WILLIAM D. HAYWOOD—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Weinstock said he had not quite finished with you last night, and maybe some of the other commissioners would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. At the hour of adjournment, Mr. Haywood, we were discussing the status of society as it would be if your remedies for the wiping out of industrial strife prevailed. My point was to see whether the condition would be better or worse than now. You remember that I asked you whether or not you believed in free speech and whether you believed in free press, and you said you did. The question that suggests itself to my mind is as to whether, under the conditions which you picture, we could continue to have free press and free speech. To illustrate, let us imagine that we are organized industrially, as you would want it, in one great, big unit, and everything were in the hands of the workers, who are supreme. That, of course, would mean organization; organization would mean the selection of executive officers. That, in turn, would mean the placing upon these executive officers responsibilities. With responsibilities there necessarily must be power. Now, with these officers in the saddle and supreme, unless human nature changed very materially, there would be room for criticism perhaps on the side of the dissatisfied minority. This great group owning all of the machinery, as it would, for production and distribution, would own the press. So that in the first place there would be no opportunity for the dissatisfied minority or the critics to give publicity to their criticism and to their dissatisfaction. If they dared to raise a public criticism of those in power, in all likelihood they would be subject to the same criticism that I found in Guatemala when I visited there a few years ago. The condition I found there would probably exist under your Utopia. Guatemala, a few years ago, elected a president who has only dared to show his head out of his doors three times during that period. Seventeen attempts at assassination have taken place, and yet, despite that fact, he rules his people with a rod of iron. Any man that dares to criticise the president or his policy can do one of two things—either get out of the country or lose his head.

Now, with that concentrated power under your method, would it not after all mean that if there is such a thing as wage slavery to-day, as is maintained by those who think as you, then would it not result simply in a change of masters, and would the slavery not be of a far more severe character than the slavery, if there is slavery, under our existing system?

Mr. HAYWOOD. In the first place, you presuppose a condition that perhaps will not take place at all. That is, you state that there would be officers with power. I can not conceive of that kind of society. In the industries each branch of industry would be operated by a group of workers who best know that branch, and among that group of workers if foremen or overseers were necessary they would be selected from among the workers. There would be no dominating power there, would there? I can conceive no need of a dominating, national, world-wide power that would have control of the press. The press is not under a dominating control, and under present-day conditions the militant minority has no method of expression. This commission alone has afforded the minority an expression which in a measure finds its way into the press. No other means has been established, excepting for small weekly newspapers, or something of that kind, that are conducted by the minority. It seems to me that under a new society, and you will admit that human psychology will change if given an opportunity, the newspapers of the country would not be devoted to detailing murders and robberies and scandals and stocks and bonds; they would be really for the information of the people, and under normal society it seems to me there would be no radical minority striving for expression. There may be minorities who were striving for change, for the introduction of new ideas or new ideals, but I think that they would certainly be given publicity, because society as a whole would be interested in its own advancement. I think the conditions that you have described, instead of applying to the future society, very well represent the existing society. That is the condition that we have under capitalism to-day.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let me make sure, Mr. Haywood, that I clearly understand the objective of I. W. W.'ism. I have assumed—I will admit that I have assumed in my presentation to you that I. W. W.'ism was socialism with a plus; that is, that I. W. W.'ism in—

Mr. HAYWOOD (interrupting). I would very much prefer that you would eliminate the reference to socialism in referring to I. W. W.'ism, because from the examples we have, for instance, in Germany, socialism has, or at least the Social Democratic Party, has been very much discredited in the minds of the workers of other countries. They have gone in for war, and those of us who believe we are Socialists are opposed to war. So if you don't mind we will discuss industrialism on its own basis.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, in order that I at least may better understand the purpose, aims, and objects of industrialism, I must, in order to bring out the differences and to compare it with the socialistic doctrine—you may not believe in the socialistic doctrine any more, and I do not; but my purpose is, so that we do not have a misunderstanding of the meaning of words. Now, let me briefly state to you what I understand socialism stands for, and what I understand the I. W. W.'ism stands for. The Socialist, as I understand it, is striving for the cooperative commonwealth, striving to bring about a situation whereby all the machinery of production and distribution shall be owned by all the people, where there shall be but one employer, and that employer shall be all the people, and everything shall be conducted substantially as the Army and Navy are conducted under our form of Government. I understand that I. W. W.'ism believes in exactly the same objectives but differs in the methods—

Mr. HAYWOOD (interrupting). In the first place, I. W. W.'ism has no such thing as an army or a navy, and certainly not as the Army and Navy are conducted at the present time.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, I did not say that the Socialists believe in a continuation of the Army and Navy—

Mr. HAYWOOD (interrupting). Some of them do.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I said that they believed everything would be managed as we now manage the Army and Navy. All the people manage the Army and Navy—

Mr. HAYWOOD (interrupting). But you make a statement that is not true.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The soldier and sailor has but one employer, and that employer is all the people. Now the only distinction that I have been able to discover between the aims and objects of those representing the I. W. W. doctrine and those representing the so-called socialistic doctrines, is the methods of getting to the ends. The Socialists believe in getting it through education and political action, and you believe in doing it through direct action—

Mr. HAYWOOD (interrupting). And education.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (continuing). And the general strike.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Therefore the ends are the same, but to be reached through different pathways?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No; the ends are not the same. Now, Socialists, while they present an industrial democracy, they hope to follow the files of existing governments, having industries controlled by the Government, eventually, however, sloughing the State. They will tell you the State is of no further use; that when industries are controlled by the workers the State will no longer function.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, am I to understand this, Mr. Haywood? I want that made very clear to me, because if the objective is as I understand you have tried to indicate, then I have been laboring under a misapprehension. Am I to understand that it is not the objective of the I. W. W. to have the State-owned industries?

Mr. HAYWOOD. It certainly is not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see. Then there is a radical difference between the I. W. W.'s and the Socialists, Mr. Haywood?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The Socialist wants the State to own all the industries.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And the I. W. W., then, as you now explain it, proposes to have those industries not owned by the State but by the workers—

Mr. HAYWOOD (interrupting). By the workers.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (continuing). Independent of the State.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Independent of the State. There will be no such thing as the State or States. The industries will take the place of what are now existing States. Can you see any necessity for the States of Rhode Island and Connecticut, and two capitol in the smallest State in the Union?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Except that of home rule.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, you have home rule anyhow, when you place it in the people who are interested, and that is in the industries.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, will you briefly outline to us, Mr. Haywood, how would you govern and direct the affairs under your proposed system of 100,000,000 of people, as we are in this country to-day?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, how are the affairs of the hundred million people conducted at the present time? The workers have no interest, have no voice in anything except the shops. Many of the workers are children. They certainly have no interest and no voice in the franchise. They are employed in the shops, and of course my idea is that children who work should have a voice in the way they work—in the hours they work, in the wages that they should receive—that is, under the present conditions children should have that voice, children who labor. The same is true of women. The political state, the Government, says that women are not entitled to vote—that is, except in the 10 free States of the West; but they are industrial units; they are productive units; from millions of women. My idea is that they should have a voice in the control or disposition of their labor powers, and the only place where they can express themselves is in their labor union halls, and there they express themselves to the fullest as citizens of industry, if you will, as to the purposes of their work and the conditions under which they will labor. Now, you recognize that in conjunction with women and children.

The black men of the South are on the same footing. They are all citizens of this country, but they have no voice in its government. Millions of black men are disfranchised, who if organized would have a voice in saying how they should work and how the conditions of labor should be regulated. But unorganized they are as helpless and in the same condition of slavery as they were before the war. This is not only true of women and children and black men, but it extends to the foreigner who comes to this country and is certainly a useful member of society. Most of them at once go into industries, but for five years they are not citizens. They plod along at their work and have no voice in the control or the use of their labor power. And as you have learned through this commission there are corporations who direct the manner in which those foreigners shall vote. Certainly you have heard something of that in connection with the Rockefeller interests in the southern part of Colorado. You know that the elections there were never carried on straight, and these foreigners were directed as to how their ballot should be placed.

They are not the only ones who are disfranchised, but there is also the workingman who is born in this country, who is shifted about from place to place by industrial depressions; their homes are broken up and they are compelled to go from one city to another, and each State requires a certain period of residence before a man has the right to vote. Some States say he must be a resident 1 year, others say 2 years; he must live for a certain length of time in the county; he must live for 30 days or such a matter in the precinct before he has any voice in the conduct of government. Now, if a man was not a subject of a State or Nation, but a citizen of industry, moving from place to place, belonging to his union, wherever he went he would step in the union hall, show his card, register, and he at once has a voice in the conduct of the affairs pertaining to his welfare. That is the form of society I want to see, where the men who do the work, and who are the only people who are worth while—understand me, Mr. Weinstock, I think that the workingman, even doing the meanest kind of work, the workingman is a more important member of society than any judge on the Supreme Bench; than any other of the useless members of society. I am speaking for the working class, and I am a partisan to the workers.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, among your statements you said that under the present system labor has no representation. Did I get you correctly?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I mentioned the different divisions of labor that have no voice at the ballot box.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Take labor as a unit; take all the labor of the country as a unit, would you say it has no representation, no voice?

Mr. HAYWOOD. There may be places where labor may be sufficiently strong to elect a Representative. I realize that in Congress at the present time there are a number of card men, but I do not believe those men were elected by labor, and certainly from their voice in Congress I do not believe they are representing labor.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I suppose you, in common with the rest of us, appreciate the fact that whatever remedial legislation may have been enacted throughout the various States and in Congress, such as the child-labor laws, minimum wage for women and minors, the safety laws, the eight-hour day for women and children, and the Workmen's Compensation Act—as a rule, there may be exceptions here and there, but as a rule all of these remedial measures have been opposed by employers and have been advocated by the workers and their sympathizers. Now, if it is true that labor has not had a voice, except in isolated instances, as you point out, and then you doubt whether it is really labor's voice, how do you explain that in spite of the tremendous power of the employers throughout the nation these laws have been put on our statute books and are being enforced?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I said I believe that labor had but few representatives, and that is true. I know there are men who are elected to the different State legislatures that have been assisted by labor's vote, and they have introduced this reform and remedial legislation. But can you show me a place where any of this reform legislation is in effect, even so far as child labor goes and the eight-hour law for women, unless there is an economic organization sufficiently strong to enforce it upon the employer?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; in the State of California.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Is the eight-hour law for women observed in that State?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir; absolutely.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I understand it is not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then you are misinformed. I can state authoritatively, because I live in the State of California and am thoroughly familiar with the conditions there. There have been many actions brought against the violators of the law. They have been penalized, and there are some remote nooks and corners, in some of the backwoods towns, that can not be reached.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I understand that is so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But wherever it is possible for the labor department to reach it, it is reached, and the law is generally enforced.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Do you believe it is enforced by the law and the authorities under the law?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Or by the labor—the strong labor organizations of California?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I suppose it is being backed by the labor organizations.

Mr. HAYWOOD. California is the strongest union State in the Nation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If organized labor was not behind it, it might not be enforced as effectively as it is. Organized labor, naturally in sympathy with the law, leaves nothing undone to see that it is enforced.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I appreciate that, and that is the reason it is enforced.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, we are not a peculiar people. Humanity is no different in California than in any other part of the country, and whatever has been done there, and is being done there, can be duplicated all over the Union, and there is no reason why the same results can not be obtained in Maine as in California.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I heard a member of the child-labor commission report on the legislation in Maine. He said they had labor laws on their books in regard to the children employed in the fishing industry, packing sardines, and he said these laws were not lived up to, and it was only through the introduction of machinery that took the place of the children that they were able to enforce the law; that is, that they employed children in spite of the law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Coming back, Mr. Haywood, to my initial question, we have a hundred million people in this Nation. Now, let us assume that under your system the industries would be organized as you would have them organized, and would be by the industrial workers; you still have not explained how the affairs of the Nation would be conducted. We would have foreign relations that would have to be dealt with; we would have to be prepared to protect ourselves against invasion, and we would have to conduct the affairs, the various avenues of governmental service, our postal department, and our various other departments. How would you do that?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, you seem to take into consideration that there is only this Nation in the world. Now, I can not imagine, if the workers of the world were organized as I have outlined to you, how there would be any invasion; they would all be interested in the same thing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You will admit this, that you can not expect the whole world overnight to adopt I. W. W. principles; it would have to be a gradual growth.

Mr. HAYWOOD. It does not make any difference to me if it is not for a hundred years.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What would you do meanwhile?

Mr. HAYWOOD. The same thing we are doing now—plugging along and taking our part in this class struggle, fighting for better conditions, and hoping to get them to-morrow, but fighting for them, if we do not get them for a century. We are trying to educate such people as you, Mr. Weinstock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I admit that I need a heap of education.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Maybe I do, too, but I can talk, and my working people understand the things we are striving for. It is hard to explain it to a person who has always been under a different environment. I realize that it is hard for you to explain this, but you can talk to people who are in the shop, and they recognize that they ought to have a voice in the workings of that shop. Indeed, there are many newspapers now who are saying that it is wrong for capital alone to direct industry; it is wrong to have the ideas of Mr. Rockefeller, who says that common labor is animate machinery. Common labor is a human being, collective human beings, and they ought to be considered in the same light as other human beings.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Can you tell us, Mr. Haywood, especially for the information of the chairman and myself, as well as for the other commissioners, where Mr. Rockefeller said that common labor is animate machinery?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I don't remember where I did see that, but somewhere.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I was present for three days, or about three days, when Mr. Rockefeller was on the stand, and he was turned inside out, and almost every conceivable question that could be devised was put to him.

Mr. HAYWOOD. When he comes here next week, ask him if he didn't say that. I think you will find out that he did. I think that is his mind, and I think he has no other viewpoint.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I will make a note of that.

Chairman WALSH. A request has just come up from the sergeant at arms that some of the persons in the rear of the hall are very anxious to hear what you have to say in answer to these questions, but are unable to do so and will you please pitch your voice a little higher?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Pardon me.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all the questions I have now.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon has a few questions he wants to ask you.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Haywood, Mr. Weinstock asked you a question regarding the necessity of the exercise of power by officers as it might arise under your philosophy of administering the affairs of industry. Is there a greater degree of social and industrial unrest over the exercise of power by officers under existing governments that has never been given to them by the people?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I think that is one of the chief causes for industrial unrest, is the usurpation of power by people that now control industries, power that has never been given to them—power that they have taken.

Commissioner LENNON. In your recitation of events that took place under your observation, so far as strikes, and so forth, were concerned, as an example of this exercise of power, without having been given to them by the people you mentioned the deportation of men from Cripple Creek. Were they deported by any court of proper jurisdiction after a trial as to whether they were guilty of any crime or not or was it a usurpation of power by officials?

Mr. HAYWOOD. They had never been arrested, never been charged with any crime. They were taken from their homes by the militia at the order of one Adj. Gen. Bell. He issued an order to his understrappers, giving them a list of names, and instructed them to take these men on special train, assigning the train, outside of the State of Colorado, and to immediately report on their return to him.

Commissioner LENNON. In the case of the two Coeur d'Alene strikes or lock-outs, the one that was in Utah, at that canyon, I forget the name?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Bingham Canyon?

Commissioner LENNON. Bingham Canyon; did you see any of this undue exercise of power by officers who had no authority under the law to exercise such power?

Mr. HAYWOOD. During the two strikes in the Coeur d'Alene, I then was a member of the executive board of the Western Federation of Miners, and I went through the Coeur d'Alene district. I went from house to house at night, and, of course, could feel the spirit, or lack of spirit, among the workers, who were afraid to move about. I met at that time men who were under indictment. I saw the bull pen; I know that there were thousands of men, or a thousand men, at least, in this bull pen at that time, and I know that they were there without warrant and without charge; that they were never charged with any crime; that they were held for six or seven months, many of them.

Commissioner LENNON. In any case where this undue exercise of power did injury to these men, were they ever able to recover damages or satisfaction of any character for the injuries done to them?

Mr. HAYWOOD. You remember yesterday I mentioned about the soldiers looting the stores at Cripple Creek. At that time we filed with the State auditor of Colorado a claim, I couldn't say just how much, but something less than a hundred thousand dollars for damages that was done to the stores. A few years later the legislature by act granted $60,000 as a return for the damages done by the soldiers to the Western Federation of Miners.

Commissioner LENNON. Were those men who were individually deported, were they ever able to secure any indemnity for the wrongs that had been done them?

Mr. HAYWOOD. The nearest that was done to anything on their behalf, I had each man that I could reach afterwards file claims against the State for individual sums, some of them claiming $5,000, some $7,500, and other amounts. They were filed with the auditor of state and they stand in the auditor's office now and could be granted by the legislature, but up to the present time they have received no redress.

Commissioner LENNON. Taking the men that were imprisoned in the bull pens at the different places you recited and were never tried, they simply turned them out when they got through holding them? Were they ever able to secure any redress?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Never.

Commissioner LENNON. I want to ask you a question or two on another phase of what has come before the commission.

Several questions were asked you yesterday regarding the rights of property. Is it not true that all recognized titles of property are man made, and that if men had the right to create titles they have the right to repeal those titles and substitute some other system?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I absolutely agree with you. I think that the first warranty deed was a fake; that it was a put-up job, the same as many other jobs were put up in this city, and have been; that titles that are existing are wrong and against the best interest of the people, and that the people should revoke the existing titles to private property that is publicly used.

Commissioner LENNON. Government was supposed to be instituted among men for service, for the protection of their rights. I can not quote it, but for the protection of the people's rights, I can not quote literally from the Declaration of Independence, but I think the understanding of the people that founded this Government was that if the Government then founded ceased to serve the best interests of the people, that the people have the right to overthrow it by legislative methods if they can, by revolution if that becomes necessary. Is that your conception?

Mr. HAYWOOD. That is about what the Declaration of Independence says, and about what the Constitution conveys. I do believe that.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Mr. Haywood, I understand from what you have said to-day, and from what you have said before, that you do not believe in war. Now, if you don't believe in war, why do you believe in violence in labor disputes? One is war between nations, and the other is war between——

Mr. HAYWOOD (interrupting). You say I believe in violence?

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Yes, sir; one of your contemporaries, I think St. John, I asked him the direct question last spring if the I. W. W. believed in violence, and he said yes.

Mr. HAYWOOD. But you said I believed in violence?

Commissioner HARRIMAN. I thought you did.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Probably I do; but I don't want it to be taken for granted without giving me an opportunity to explain what violence means. I think you will agree that there is nothing more violent that you can do to the capitalist than to drain his pocketbook. In that sort of violence I believe, and we are trying to make it impossible for the growth of more capitalists, and to make useful citizens out of the existing capitalists. I give you an illustration of what I think violence is:

In Sioux City, Iowa, last month the authorities of that town came to the hall of the union and told a man, a member of the Industrial Workers of the World, that the chief wanted to see him. He said, knowing his rights as an American citizen, he said, "If the chief wants to see me, tell him where I am." He said, "No; you will have to go to the office." He said, "Have you a warrant?" "No." "Well, I will not go." The detective went downstairs and got a crowd of uniformed policemen and they came to the hall and took this man and all the other members that were in the hall and went to headquarters with them. The men were put in jail temporarily without a hearing. They were all thrown into jail, and the next morning refused a jury trial, refused a change of venue, and were sentenced to $100 fine or 30 days in jail. One of them remarked to the judge, "Why don't you make it a hundred?" And he said, "In your case, I will just double the sentence." Those men were put in jail, and word went out to the other locals throughout the country, and foot-loose members started for Sioux City. They came in groups of twos and threes, and tens and fifties, and fifties and hundreds, until the Sioux City jails, both the city and county, were crowded to capacity. The authorities thinking to make use of the labor power of these men purchased from Sioux Falls, in South Dakota, three carloads of granite, which they expected the members of the I. W. W. to break, making little ones out of big ones. This they refused to do. They went on a hunger strike. Some 75 of those men were 86 hours without eating. The authorities found that they could not do any thing with them, so they appointed a committee, or a commission, to go to see the men in jail, and asked them upon what terms things could be settled. The men said, "Unequivocal release from prison, the reestablishment of the right of free speech," and one of the boys said, "New clothes for the ones that the 'bulls' have destroyed," and upon those terms they were released. Those men were released from the prison in the face of the fact that they had been sentenced to jail by judges. That I regard as action more violent than the discharge of bombs in St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York, because they enforced the rights that this country gave to them; they compelled the authorities who are supposed to uphold those rights in seeing that they were granted. I believe in that kind of violence, and as I said yesterday when the workers are organized, it matters not to me what becomes necessary, if they are to get control of the means of life. The working class is the only class entitled to any consideration, and as Abraham Lincoln said, "To give to that class the full product of their toil is the righteous duty of any Government."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Where do you draw the line, Mr. Haywood, between the worker and the nonworker?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Oh, I think that it is easy to draw the line.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Please tell us what your line is. Are you a worker?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No. I told you yesterday that I thought you and I were parasites.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, you confine the term "worker," then, to the man who does manual labor?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Oh, no; I said brain and muscle. Now, understand, Mr. Weinstock, we are not excluding from the membership in the new society any man who has ability. We recognize the necessity of civil experts; we recognize the necessity for engineers and inventors and all useful citizens. What we can not appreciate is why the great minds or the minds of great men have been used to make lawyers or preachers.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, would you call an executive officer a useful citizen?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And despite the fact that he does not work with his hands?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Why, I say we want brain workers, men who will sit down and map out plans. He runs industries now. Well, we don't propose to change the industries, excepting so far as to eliminate waste which ownership brings. Why should the railroaders of this country continue running the road for the King of England? He is one of the largest owners in the Santa Fe. Why should the steel workers be running the steel plants for the potentates of foreign countries who are largely holders of stock in that industry? That is the thing we are after. We want the people of this country to own the steel industry in this country. We do not think a Morgan is necessary to the running of that steel industry. We don't think a John D. Rockefeller, notwithstanding what Mr. Baer said about divine providence, is necessary. We think that the mines can run without providence and without Baer and without Rockefeller and be run a great deal better, and there be no such terrible trouble as has existed there if the men were running them in the interest of the people. There would be no Ludlow affair.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson has a question he would like to ask you, please.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You stated yesterday in response to a question that it was not, from your own standpoint, desirable when this or that evil was palliated, because it did not work a benefit to the cause that you represented; that is, the propagation of that cause. In other words, the best harvest field that you find for organization is where injustice is the most prevalent. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, that is usually the best place to carry on a propaganda—is where injustice can be best seen, where it is felt.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Where it is the most apparent?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And rub the hardest on the galled jade?

Mr. HAYWOOD. That is true.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is that one reason that the method that the I. W. W. follows is against a legislative program, because you believe it would defer the day of universal acceptance of your doctrine?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Well, as I stated this morning, the majority of the workers have no legislative program; that is, they have no votes. They can not elect their representatives. You will readily admit that is true of children and true of most of the women and true of most of the black men and true of all of the foreigners and certainly affects a part of the American citizens. Then what appeal is there? Where do they find any expression in legislative action?

Commissioner GARRETSON. The question would be whether an educative program directed along those lines would be as effective as an educative program conducted on the other lines for the abolition of the legislative process. What I am curious about—possibly others of the commission are—is this: What will be the form—the medium, rather—of expression of these various bodies grouped on the industrial basis instead of grouped on what might be described now as the governmental basis? That is, the existence of States being abolished and the citizens of the country being grouped industrially. What is the medium of expression between those different groups as to their needs under your plan?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Let me take the different phases that an individual represents in society.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes.

Mr. HAYWOOD. We will take the home, for instance, in an industrial community. The father, mother, and children are the family of that home. When they leave that roof they go out to the different branches of industry in that town. They then are no longer a family; they are a part of the group in the industry in which they are employed, and should of necessity be a voice in that group. They should have a voice as to the conditions under which that branch is conducted—conducted now for profit, conducted then for use—and we will naturally suppose that everyone will be interested in doing the work in the best possible way with the best possible output. Leaving their industry, leaving their several groups, coming back to their homes, they will again become a family. But one family can not do the things essential for the happiness, for their happiness, and for their comfort. They would need to cooperate with other families of the community for the establishment of transportation, lighting systems, water-works—

Commissioner GARRETSON. You are talking now of local transportation?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; local.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes; go on.

Mr. HAYWOOD (continuing). Parks and amusements, education, schools. Why, I think that every child is entitled to the finest education that the Government could give—that is, that kind of a government—not the kind of education that we have now. That would be the relations of the individual to the industry and to the community. Now, as to national and international travel, let the railroaders belong to one organization, and you will agree that the railroaders can run the railroads better than coal miners can run them, or better than shareholders or stockholders can do it. Let them conduct the railroads and live in the community on the same basis as other industrial workers.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, now, you have placed the community life on exactly the old basis of the archaic condition of patriarchal control of the family, haven't you? You draw from your experience; I draw from mine. If the railroad is taken over as an industry in its present form—take a road that has been rather prominently in the eye here for a few days, the Pennsylvania Railroad—suppose that to be taken over by the employees of the railroad and operated by them. After the expressions that you have given as to those in power, I am at a loss to understand how a community on the Pennsylvania Railroad at Pittsburgh or Chicago is to arrive at a common understanding, first, of their necessities, and, second, of the method by which those necessities will be met in the actual operation without people in absolute control and direction and the power necessary to make their instructions mandatory for the train movement.

Mr. HAYWOOD. You would be there to run the railroads.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Or under the sod.

Mr. HAYWOOD. What?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Some other man will; some man will be there.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir. It seems to me you can run them better—and we will take an arbitration board, for instance, the arbitration board sitting in Chicago. They have been looking out for the welfare of 65,000 individuals. Some of those people knew nothing about railroading, absolutely nothing. Well, they are not the people to look after the railroad interests. Take your own executive board; who can run the railroads any better than they?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, now, how can they make their instructions effective unless they are made responsible for it and given the concomitant power?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Why, certainly, give them the power necessary to run the railroads.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, then, you are a believer in a system of control and direction which is owned by the men themselves and backed up by the sentiment and action of the men themselves?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Absolutely.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yesterday possibly either I misunderstood or you phrased it unhappily in stating from your standpoint that there was no necessity for the exercise of executive power. Well, applied to transportation it would become an impossibility, because unless there was a head of that industrial group—

Mr. HAYWOOD. Exactly. Well, in speaking of industries yesterday, when I made that remark, it was with reference to political executive conditions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, it was undoubtedly applicable to industry in general. Well, you know the transportation interest is one that can not be disposed of by intercommunication—that is, the personal contact—because it is so widely separated. The man in Pittsburgh and the man in New York and the man in Boston have no means of operating except by intercommunication through a controlling power. That controlling power has got to gather, first, knowledge as to the necessity, and he has got to receive it in the community. For instance, there has got to be means of intercommunication through a medium regularly recognized to determine the needs of that community which have to be filled from the community that is distant. Is that not true?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I recognize that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That community has to have an estimate of what clothing it needs?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It has first got to be indicated to the mills to create the material therefor?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And known to the shop that turns that into clothing in its various forms. There has got to be a universal estimate of the food supply necessary, because without an intelligent production a market as it is known now ceases to exist for those things and ceases to be the dominative factor in determining production, because the profits of production, in the sense profit is now known, will cease to exist. Am I correct?

Mr. HAYWOOD. You are correct.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And executive power must do it?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; and those executives you describe would be the representatives—

Commissioner GARRETSON. In other words, you would substitute the old folk-mote of the Saxon village?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No; place the power in the hands of industry.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Would you put it further and follow the Saxon precedent higher up, the witenagemote?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I don't know anything about that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, those are represented by our State legislatures and by our National Congress, as the case may be.

Mr. HAYWOOD. All right; anything that will take the place of the existing legislature, or let the legislature run—anything that will place the industries in the hands of the people and the direction in the hands of the workers.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In other words, you are willing to accept as much of the existing machinery as appears to be necessary for the carrying out of your ideas and not hostile thereto?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I would accept so much of it, certainly. We are not going to tear down that we can not find something better to put in its place.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you a belief on this subject? Reference was made yesterday to the futility of the initiative and referendum. Do you believe that with experience in the use of the initiative and referendum and a consequent education that will come from it, or the acquirement of knowledge, rather, that will come from it, that it will become a more effective thing than it has so far demonstrated itself to be in actual use?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I think that industrial government will bring legislation—the groups in the industries and the initiative and referendum will not become a burdensome thing, but that these matters of detail can be discussed in these groups or communities.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You believe that with responsibility placed upon the individual unit of the community that his conception of his responsibilities will increase?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Certainly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. One practical question in regard to the Colorado situation. At the time of the Colorado strike were the metalliferous and bituminous miners all in one association?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; they were.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Both?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. At that time the Western Federation of Miners had in its membership both bituminous and metalliferous men?

Mr. HAYWOOD. The Western Federation of Miners organized the coal miners of Colorado first.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Before it did the metalliferous men?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; but at the time of the 1903 strike they had become a part of the United Mine Workers.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Which strike?

Mr. HAYWOOD. In 1903.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But the same agencies were arrayed against both crafts, both the metal and the coal?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Oh, yes; they had the Mine Owners' Association.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That embraced all of the mine owners?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you any definite knowledge or data as to when the miners separated into two separate associations, if they ever have separated?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I do not think they ever have separated.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Did you hear the statement that was made by Maj. Broughton before this commission to the effect—and Maj. Broughton, you remember, was in charge of the militia in the field?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And that he was also under retainer by the Coal Mining Association of Cripple Creek, and that he had no connection with any other mining class in Colorado during this period; did you hear that?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No, I did not hear that; but I think it is true beyond any question of doubt that they were all members of the Citizens' Alliance in 1903.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And that they were furnishing the medium of communication, even if there was different existing groups?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Absolutely.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I met the members of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in the senate chamber and the assembly hall before the mines and the mining committee, and they were contending then against an eight-hour law.

Chairman WALSH. I have three questions that I have been requested to ask you that have been sent up, and I wish you would answer them as briefly as you can. One is, Do you not consider the exploitation of children in industry under the present system a form of violence of a very insidious and brutal sort?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I most certainly do. It is only one of the terrible violences that are practiced by the capitalistic class.

Chairman WALSH. Then there is another question: Will I. W. W.ism do away with crime and criminals? If not, how will you organize your society to protect the well-behaved many against the vicious few?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Industrialism will do away with crime and criminals, as 95 per cent of the crime to-day is crime against property. Abolishing the wage system—abolishing private property—will remove 95 per cent of the crime.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I have not here a formal request from some gentleman, through a letter. He says that during the week prominent lawyers and sociologists have been asked a categorical question under the first section of the questionnaire, namely, as to the prevalent attitude of courts in labor cases. I thought your whole testimony was directed to that end, but nevertheless, if you have anything further to say on that, I would be very glad to have you say it. What is your view of the prevalent attitude of courts in labor cases?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I think, Mr. Chairman, that inciting the strikes, showing that the militia have been used in nearly every one; that many, many thousands of men have been arrested without warrant; that thousands have come before the courts, and, although warrants have been issued, they were discharged. It seems to me that in answer to that question it is safe to say that the courts are used, as a general rule, in favor of the capitalistic class.

Chairman WALSH. Now, there is one other question: Were you present during the testimony of Judge Cullen, formerly judge of the New York court of appeals?

Mr. HAYWOOD. No.

Chairman WALSH. I understood you had a comment to make upon that from the field, as it were, as one who had been upon the ground. He discussed the matter from a legal standpoint.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I have the speech made by Judge Cullen, and there are abstracts from his speech which I seem, in a way, to agree with.

Chairman WALSH. What are they?

Mr. HAYWOOD. The militia and the use of the militia in the field.

Chairman WALSH. Did your observation in the field concur with the conclusions reached by Judge Cullen in his speech, which may be said to have been reiterated by him on the witness stand?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Why, yes. I saw the militia at work; I saw them as I told you, and the militia was ordered to bring in three prisoners, and the militia absolutely refused to obey the order, because the court was at that time favorable to the strikers.

Chairman WALSH. As a matter of industrial unrest, does that sort of handling of men cause or does it not cause the most bitter resentment?

Mr. HAYWOOD. The working class of this country have looked upon the courts with a great deal of awe and respect in the past; that is not true now. They look upon the courts as a tool of the employing class.

Chairman WALSH. Do the workers, as a body, have the frame of mind expressed by Judge Cullen (with reference to the judges as a class when this form of what you might call legal oppression is practiced upon them) in his speech as follows [reads]:

"The governor might imprison or execute the members of the legislature or even the learned judges of the supreme court themselves. Frankly, I do not regard such a danger as likely, for I have great confidence in the common sense of the American people, and I imagine that if such a course were attempted not even the devotion of those learned judges to the principles of law they had declared would induce them to voluntarily surrender life or liberty, and that in their resistance they would be supported by the mass of the people."

Is that the attitude of mind the workers have—that when their rights are invaded by the force of the military power they feel they ought to resist, and that the most of the American people would support them if they understood it?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. So, from your standpoint in the field, and Judge Cullen's standpoint from the court of appeals bench, there is no disagreement on that proposition?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Mr. Walsh, during the Cripple Creek strike of 1903, 1904, and 1905 the miners of that district would have killed every militiaman in the district if it were not for the fact that they believed the people of the United States did not understand it; if it were not for the fact that Roosevelt was in the presidential chair at that time, and there was a 10-company post of soldiers just outside of Denver. They knew their rights were being invaded, and they were willing to fight for their rights.

Chairman WALSH. Just as Judge Cullen says the people would fight if they attempted the same violence on the judges of the court?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes; the American people have always fought for their rights, and they are going to fight for them again.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell has some questions to ask.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That end of the table [indicating] have brought out the position of the independent workmen of the world so plainly that it is not necessary to discuss that further.

I want to get some information in regard to the citation of yesterday, in which you spoke of a man in the Wheatland hop fields that was branded with the letters I. W. W. with a hot cigar.

Mr. HAYWOOD. That was in San Diego.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Can you give the particulars of that, with the names, and so forth?

Chairman WALSH. We have that in our record.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Did you embody that in your report, Mr. Weinstock?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; that circumstance occurred after I made my investigation.

Chairman WALSH. There is an investigation and it is in our report, because I read it; the name of the man was B. L. Wrightman, and he was taken outside of the city, it is alleged, and his clothing stripped from him, and with a lighted cigar they attempted to burn the letters "I. W. W." on his person; that part of it is in the record.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that was after you made your investigation?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; after I made my investigation.

Mr. HAYWOOD. Was Nicolage (?) killed at that time?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I do not remember.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I will look it up.

Now, Mr. Haywood, I feel that you will agree with me that the ideas that you have just outlined to us are not going to become operative right away?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It is not going to take place within the next month or the next year or several years; in the meantime we must be doing something, and this commission was created by Congress for the purpose of ascertaining what the underlying causes of industrial unrest are, the principal causes, and to make some recommendations to Congress. That would imply that Congress would be interested in doing something if we made certain recommendations right away for the relief of the people, particularly the working people.

Now, if you were a member of this commission, Mr. Haywood, what would you be in favor of recommending to Congress to take up immediately to relieve the people? What would you advise this commission to recommend?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I think I would advise, to meet the needs of the people, employment, work, such as the Government could do—reclamation, reforestation stations—such work as would meet the needs of the unemployed; that is, just as remedial measures.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You consider, then, that unemployment, or temporarily so, is one of the underlying causes of industrial unrest?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Certainly, when a man is out of work, when he has no means of obtaining food for his family, that certainly is a cause of unrest. That is a cause of the present discontent largely.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And would also imply, as I take it from your answer to a question a while ago, that idle hands beget crime; if there is steady employment, crime decreases.

Mr. HAYWOOD. That is always true; crime always increases in the winter when unemployment is greatest and suffering most intense.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What would you do in the case of the itinerant worker, the casual employee who only has employment for a certain period of the year, for instance, picking fruit or cutting ice in the winter or doing logging in the summer, and all that?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Of course, I think that all of these people should be organized, and we are going on to that end. We establish what we call the organized workers, and we will meet the vast body of workers employed in the harvest fields.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would you have the Government arrange for the carrying of people from one industry to the other, where they were wanted, without cost to the workmen?

Mr. HAYWOOD. I think that workmen should be given free transportation; I don't mean in box cars, as has been suggested; I don't know by whom, that are fixed up, they ride that way now, but they should be given free transportation in proper conveyances in looking for work.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The job and the man ought to be brought together by the Government itself, without cost to the man or the job?

Mr. HAYWOOD. That may be a remedial remedy suggested by the commission.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is incidental to the unemployment, and what you believe to be the fundamental cause of industrial unrest. Have you in mind any other general question that might be effective in this direction, that this commission might suggest to Congress as a remedy? Of course, I don't mean that healthy unrest, we don't want that, but we want the unrest that creates the criminals and makes paupers and makes men helpless, that sort of unrest. Do you think of any other idea you might suggest to the commission? I am sure we would appreciate it, notwithstanding we probably feel that you are so imbued with your Utopian ideas, of things that they would not modernize down to the affairs of to-day, that are effective to-day and tomorrow?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Really, Mr. O'Connell, I don't think that I presented any Utopian ideas, I talked for the necessities of life, food, clothing, shelter, and amusement. We can talk of Utopia afterwards. The greatest need is employment.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You think unemployment, insufficient wage, long hours of labor, employment of children, employment of women beyond reasonable hours, and at low wages, the unfair application of laws by the courts, the unfair attitude of the courts as to the equity or opportunity of the poor man as against the rich man, to secure justice, all those things point toward unrest?

Mr. HAYWOOD. They certainly do; they are the things that make unrest.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They are the things that make for unrest?

Mr. HAYWOOD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And those are the things you think this commission ought to interest itself in at this time?

Mr. HAYWOOD. If there was any possibility of Congress remedying these evils, I think this commission has a duty to perform in recommending such changes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, Mr. Haywood, and you will be excused permanently. We thank you.

Mr. HAYWOOD. I have here the preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World that I wanted to make a part of the record, I would like to read it in.

Chairman WALSH. We will be very glad to have it put in the record.

Mr. HAYWOOD (reading). "Mr. Chairman, in view of the attempt on the part of Commissioner Weinstock yesterday to create an erroneous impression relative to the methods and aims of the I. W. W., and in view of the further fact that Commissioner Weinstock read into the record in the forms of questions propounded to me portions of a biased report on the I. W. W., prepared some years ago by himself in California, I desire at this time to read for the enlightenment of the commission the very brief preamble of the Industrial Workers of the World.

" I. W. W. PREAMBLE.

"The working class and the employing class have nothing in common.

"There can be no peace so long as hunger and want are found among millions of the working people, and the few who make up the employing class have all the good things of life.

"Between these two classes a struggle must go on until the workers of the world organize as a class, take possession of the earth, and abolish the wage system.

"We find that the centering of the management of industries into fewer and fewer hands makes the trades-unions unable to cope with the ever-growing power of the employing class.

"The trade-unions foster a state of affairs which allows one set of workers to be pitted against another set of workers in the same industry, thereby helping to defeat one another in wage wars."

"Moreover the trade-unions aid the employing class to mislead the workers into the belief that the working class have interests in common with their employers.

"These conditions can be changed and the interests of the working class upheld only by an organization formed in such a way that all its members in any one industry, or in all industries if necessary, cease work whenever a strike or lockout is on in any department thereof, thus making an injury to one an injury to all.

"Instead of the conservative motto, 'A fair day's wage for a fair day's work,' we must inscribe on our banner the revolutionary watchword, 'Abolition of the wage system.'

"It is the historic mission of the working class to do away with capitalism.

"The army of production must be organized, not only for the everyday struggle with the capitalists, but also to carry on production when capitalism shall have been overthrown.

"By organizing industrially we are forming the structure of a new society within the shell of the old."

Chairman WALSH. Dr. Goodnow, please take the stand.

TESTIMONY OF DR. FRANK JOHNSON GOODNOW.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, please.

Dr. GOODNOW. Frank Johnson Goodnow.

Chairman WALSH. And your residence.

Dr. GOODNOW. Baltimore.

Chairman WALSH. And your present position.

Dr. GOODNOW. President of Johns Hopkins University.

Chairman WALSH. I believe that there has been submitted to you a short outline?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes, sir; this morning, just as I came here.

Chairman WALSH. I would like to have you address yourself to that. Would you be kind enough to take them up as they were given to you categorically and give us the benefit of your experience and advice and opinion?

Dr. GOODNOW. The question is: "As the result of your experience and study, has your attention been directed in any large degree to the equipment of judges to consider the social and economic questions brought before them in what are commonly known as labor cases?" Now, my experience with regard to this matter is the experience of a teacher of law for a considerable period, and I would say that there is no particular attention given in the requirements for admission to the bar to securing any practical qualifications on the part of judges to consider these questions. That is, the ordinary admission requirements to the bar only demand, even at the utmost, a high-school education. No particular attention is paid to economic questions in the high schools or in the bar examination. There is thus no attention paid to such educational qualifications as might be of advantage in equipping judges to decide those questions. Whether a judge is or is not equipped from an educational point of view to determine these questions is very largely a question of accident. He may have studied economic conditions, or he may have studied the history of industry in connection with a college course, if he had that prior to his taking the course in the law school, or he may have as the result of private reading equipped himself for a decision of those cases.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any suggestion which you care to make to the commission with regard to the methods by which judges, and lawyers from which judges come, perhaps might be induced to give proper attention to such social and economic questions with regard to the machinery by which judges might be given proper knowledge of the economic and social facts involved in such cases?

Dr. GOODNOW. The only way that possibly might be secured would be by changing the examination or qualification for entrance to the legal profession.

Chairman WALSH. I might state that I had in mind when we were getting up these outlines, for instance, you find these large Government questions given into the hands of commissions; for instance, that these questions were being relegated to an administrative board to take into consideration the facts that might be elicited surrounding industries in order to determine whether or not there is unfair competition in industries, with a right in the first instance to so declare with the supervising power by the court; and in that way it occurred to me that perhaps some of these particular questions with which the judges were not equipped that some similar question might be worked out, as far as industry was concerned.

Dr. GOODNOW. Personally I don't see any way in which you can secure those qualifications, so far as they can be secured by educational requirements, without absolutely changing the entrance requirements to the bar. It is our system in this country, different from some other countries, to choose our judges entirely from the bar; and the judges are not educated for the position of judges as, for example, in Germany. They are simply chosen from the bar, and therefore you have to depend upon the character of the bar or the equipment of the bar for the kind of a man you get as judge.

Chairman WALSH. This question, as I have heard it all over the country, and of the bar playing such a conspicuous part in it, and so much criticism being made, I will say from both sides, what would your advice be as an educator as to the proper approach of the Government to meet the question?

Dr. GOODNOW. As I say, by absolutely changing the qualifications for entrance to the bar. That is, instead of providing, as is the case now, a mere high-school education, which does not include any study whatever into the history of industrial or economic conditions, and after the high-school education a purely technical education in the law, which does not include, as a general thing, any study of economics, I think if you will look over the questions for entrance to the bar you never would find a question of economics. It is questions of a purely technical legal knowledge of the lawyer. I don't see how under those conditions you can expect, except as the result of side reading or an accidental preparation, that a man may have—I don't see how you can expect to equip a man who has no practical knowledge of these economic conditions which, as you say, have become so important.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed, Doctor, in your reading the late developments on which suggestions have been made to the court by economists or students in this field, for instance, in the Oregon case?

Dr. GOODNOW. You mean suggestions that were made that came up through Mr. Brandeis?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Dr. GOODNOW. It was only because he had a much better training than the ordinary man that those questions were presented.

Chairman WALSH. Could any scheme be devised toward the proper education by which advice could be given to judges? Somewhat in the nature as it was given by Mr. Brandeis, for instance, that it could be submitted by experts when a question was up involving industry and the minimum wage and, for instance, such matters as affect the workers—physically affect them—that it could be submitted in some such way as was done by Mr. Brandeis?

Dr. GOODNOW. I think that would be perfectly possible under the scheme of expert witnesses.

Chairman WALSH. As a matter of the testimony in the lower court to be preserved in the record that was sent up?

Dr. GOODNOW. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think, Doctor, that it would be difficult or not to get that into a record now under the ordinary rules of evidence?

Dr. GOODNOW. I have never practiced law; I have only taught it.

Chairman WALSH. A great many complaints have been made to the commission that what are commonly known as personal rights, such as the right of trial by jury, free speech, and the right of writ of habeas corpus, which are incorporated in the Federal Constitution and in the constitutions of the States, are so frequently disregarded that they amount practically to nothing. What comment have you to make upon that?

Dr. GOODNOW. I have no personal knowledge of the violation of any such rights, but I am under the impression that it is popularly believed that these rights are greater than they actually are under the Constitution as interpreted by the courts. The question as framed here would seem to indicate, particularly the next question, that there is protection against State action of rights of this sort under the Federal Constitution which would affect the State authorities. Of course, the provisions with regard to private rights in the Constitution, except the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, only affect the operation of the Federal Government. The Supreme Court of the United States has further held that the fourteenth amendment is not a guaranty to individuals of the right to trial by jury, as far as the State is concerned. I think there is no guaranty in the Federal Constitution of any right to habeas corpus, so far as the State is concerned, so that for most of these rights such protection as exists must be found in the State constitutions. Furthermore, as I understand, the provision that is ordinarily contained in the State constitutions to the effect that the governor of the State may declare certain portions of the State in a state of insurrection is practically understood to be very largely within the discretion of the governor who happens to be in at that time, the right to declare what is a good deal in the nature of martial law, and then the courts can not interfere. A man ceases to have certain rights that he would where that state of insurrection was not declared. It seems to me there is a popular impression that there are greater rights than now exist under the law.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the argument of Judge Cullen, who testified here, and a portion of his argument was put in evidence in connection with the testimony of the last witness as to the meaning of the clause in the several State constitution to mean, I think, that the martial shall always be subordinate to the civil power, I believe, is indorsed in some of them, or the civil power shall always be superior to the military power?

Dr. GOODNOW. No, sir; I did not see that or read it.

Chairman WALSH. The question of military law, the declaration of military law has been a very acute one in many industrial controversies that you have probably noticed, in West Virginia, Michigan, Colorado, and other States, and many questions have arisen as to what is meant by the declaration of martial law. That is, when martial law takes place, and the meaning has been defined so there is what is called semimartial law, modified martial law, some holding that the very existence of the militia in the field is a declaration of martial law in itself. Have you given any consideration to that subject?

Dr. GOODNOW. I never studied it from a technical point of view. I have noticed some of the cases, and I imagine that before anything in the nature of that modified or semimartial law could exist it would be necessary that there be some proclamation of the governor made under a specific provision of the constitution, and inasmuch as the governor is a civil officer, why, the militia, as far as it goes, is subordinate to the civil executive of the State.

Chairman WALSH. Now, in the State of Colorado, Judge Cullen went so far as to state in his testimony the other day that the acts of the militia, so far as they attempt to exercise judicial power, were null and void. One specific instance was this, that a military officer was accused of killing an unarmed person, and a military court was constituted, martial law not having been formerly declared at any time by the governor of the State, in which it was sought, or pretended to have tried the man and to have acquitted him?

Dr. GOODNOW. As I understand the effect of the trial of a man in the military service by a court-martial is merely to relieve him from the penalty of the military law, and that the plea of acquittal before a court-martial is not a good plea of former acquittal, where a man is brought before an ordinary court. A soldier, as I understand the law, is in a double capacity. He owes subordination to his military superiors, and in regard to that the military courts have jurisdiction, but at the same time he is a citizen, and the mere fact that he becomes a soldier does not relieve him, so far as his civil duty to the State is concerned. In my acquittal by a court-martial they can not influence the decision in the civil court.

Chairman WALSH. Then the plea of former jeopardy would not be a good plea?

Dr. GOODNOW. Not as I understand it.

Chairman WALSH. Regardless as to the details of whether military law was declared or not?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That places the question on a much larger basis.

Dr. GOODNOW. I would like to qualify that a little. If you had an absolute martial law throughout the country, where the civil courts were not in existence at all, if it was in the field of military operation, then a military court would have complete jurisdiction, as I understand it, but that was not the case that you referred to.

Chairman WALSH. No; the civil courts were open in those States.

Dr. GOODNOW. And I don't think then under those conditions that the acquittal by the court-martial would have any effect when he came before an ordinary civil court.

Chairman WALSH. Have you devoted any particular attention to the relative desirability of State and Federal action in the regulation of industrial conditions and in connection with labor disputes?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, to a certain extent. Of course, the question comes up in the first place as to the desirability of any regulation, and of course as to that we may differ as to the particular kind of regulation. The further question comes up as to whether, where it is admitted some regulation is desirable, the State or the Federal Government should have jurisdiction. Now as I look at it, one of the greatest troubles with State regulation of labor, where the purpose of the regulation is to secure better conditions of labor, if the matter is left to State regulation you have the competition between States, which makes in the end a State regulation ineffective, because a manufacturer in one State can not compete, if he is under disadvantages with regard to the amount of wages he has to pay or safety appliances that he has to provide, or if the State adopts the theory of the minimum wage, he is at a disadvantage with the manufacturer in a State where none of these regulations have been adopted. Therefore where there is competition, as there is for the most part between manufacturers of different States, I would think it would be almost necessary, if the regulation is to be effective in both cases, that it should be done by the Federal Government. That is apart altogether from any consideration of the constitutional powers of the Federal Government, but looking at it as a question of desirability. Under those conditions it seems to me that the necessary regulation or condition of labor must be, in order to be effective, a regulation by the Federal Government.

Chairman WALSH. From your knowledge of past decisions of the Supreme Court, to what extent do you consider that they are likely to approve the extension of Federal action with regard to labor conditions—I mean philosophically?

Dr. GOODNOW. That is a pretty hard question to ask a man to guess how the Supreme Court is going to decide, and particularly from a general point of view. You would have to take up the matter in a great deal of detail and make up your mind as to how, in view of decisions along a certain line, the Supreme Court would decide as to the constitutionality of the particular kind of law. Now, we have not so very many decisions at the present time to guide us. We have the decision in regard to the pure-food law, which is upheld. Of course, as is well known to the commission, the question has been mooted as to whether the act of Congress should apply the same method to the matter of child labor. That is, whether it could deny to the products of industry that were made as the result of child labor the right of interstate commerce. Now, I think a man could make a very good argument in favor of that proposition, but it is anybody's guess as to how the Supreme Court would decide it. The Supreme Court, of course, varies in its membership, and its views at one time may be somewhat different from at another time, but, as I say, a good legal argument in my opinion could be made in favor of that, in view of the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Chairman WALSH. I thought perhaps the section was evaded, enough at least to draw what might be called philosophical abstracts as to what the court has already done along that line.

Dr. GOODNOW. If you can argue from the decision in regard to the pure-food law and the decision in regard to this proposed child-labor law, I think philosophically they are quite analagous, you could make a good legal argument in favor of it, and I think that it could be pushed further.

Chairman WALSH. Finally, of course, it is the judgment of a majority of the Supreme Court of the United States?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes, sir; finally.

Chairman WALSH. Calling your attention to this section of the Constitution, the question which provides that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, and pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and welfare of the United States; now, considering such a situation arose in which the military arm of the Federal Government is called upon to intervene—that is, the Chief Executive sends troops to a separate State, like in the State of Colorado—do you believe that machinery could be provided under that section by which action could be taken, for instance, if troops were sent in, whether under that section to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and welfare of the United States, that a body could be sent in in the nature of a mediation and conciliation board, or in an industrial dispute, are we committed to the proposition of sending armed forces along?

Dr. GOODNOW. I think there always have been two views in regard to the meaning of that particular clause. The way in which you have stated it I don't think is the view which has ordinarily been adopted. That is the clause as ordinarily interpreted to read that Congress shall have the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and welfare of the United States. It is not to collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises and pay the debts and to provide for their welfare. You would depart from the fundamental theory of the Constitution, namely, that the Federal Government is a government of enumerated powers. While there is no limit upon the power of the United States to collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises as long as they are used to provide for the welfare of the United States, Congress has not the power, apart from the enumerated powers of the Constitution, to provide for the welfare of the United States. That is the function of the State government. I would think that nothing could be derived from that clause of the Constitution of the character which you suggest.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have any other legal suggestions in mind by which something of that kind could perhaps be done; that is, if it is impossible in the National Government to send troops in merely to preserve order?

Dr. GOODNOW. The duty provided by the Constitution is that troops shall be sent in on the application of the governor of the State and the State authorities—that is, where a power such as the interstate commerce power of the United States Government is not interfered with.

Commissioner LENNON. Just a question or two. In speaking of the qualifications of judges, would it be helpful or otherwise if judges were required to spend 5 or 10 years in industrial and manual labor, as well as to pass their technical requirements? Would that be helpful to them?

Dr. GOODNOW. I would not think so.

Commissioner LENNON. You would not think so?

Dr. GOODNOW. I would not think so.

Commissioner LENNON. You think the experience would be of no value?

Dr. GOODNOW. I am afraid not.

Commissioner LENNON. There have been judges that have had that experience. I want to ask, sure you have studied it to some considerable extent, what view do you hold as to the right of the courts, either State or national, particularly national, to pass upon the constitutionality of acts or laws passed by Congress? Have they such power granted to them by legal enactment?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, I don't think in view of the way in which the Constitution has been interpreted that there could be any doubt at all now as to the constitutionality of the exercise of that power by the courts.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, if it can be shown that the power was originally usurped—suppose it had continued for a thousand years, would that overcome the fact that originally it had been usurped by the courts?

Dr. GOODNOW. I would say there was something in the nature of the statute of limitation under those conditions; that the acquiescence of the people for so long, for over a century, in that action on the part of the courts, would have killed any original usurpation, and I don't mean to say that I believe that there was any original usurpation.

Commissioner LENNON. No. Is it not a fact that this question has been raised in the last 10 years as it never was raised before?

Dr. GOODNOW. I think it is; yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If the military arm of the Government, Doctor, became oppressive in dealing with workers in labor troubles, what would or could the workers do to protect their rights under the law, in lieu of resorting to force or violence?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, I don't see what they can do except through the exercise of the power that every voter of the United States has, to endeavor to put out of office a government which in their belief has usurped power, as a general thing. I never made a particular study of the situation, but as a general thing I want to say in all these cases, where there has been this qualified military law declared, the declaration of qualified military law has always been preceded by violence, that was incident to the strike, whether it was due to the strikers or whether it was due to outside people, but there actually was violence, and in view of the existence of this violence, which threatened the continuation of the peaceful relations which we must regard as the basis of our Government, the governor has exercised power which was constitutional and which has been granted to him in the Constitution to exercise under those conditions. That is the way I look at it, as a legal constitutional proposition. Now, it may be, of course, in special instances that the governor has not exercised his power wisely, but I can not see how you can have any other method of exercise of power in that respect than you can have in all of these cases in which there may be the unwise exercise of political power, and that is by resorting to the people.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Taking a concrete case, Doctor; taking the case, for example, of the Colorado situation, and analyzing it; let us see what your counsel in the matter would lead to. The governor ordered out the militia in connection with some coal strike that took place in Colorado. There was a conflict of testimony there as to the cause and effect. The National Guardsmen maintain that they fought in self-defense, that they were first attacked by the strikers. The strikers deny that, and claim that the initiative was taken on the part of the National Guardsmen, which led to riot. Let us assume for the purpose of our illustration, and for the purpose of our analysis, that the workers are correct in their statement, and that the militia did take the initiative, and did abuse their power, and did harass and fire upon innocent people. Your advice and counsel under those circumstances to the worker is: "Take the result. Yield for the time being. Do not attempt to take the short cut and get immediate redress, but recognize the existing authorities and abide by their demand. Let your remedy come by use of the ballot. See to it that the commander in chief that is responsible for this is either recalled under your recall law, or is condemned by public sentiment, and not reelected." Do I follow you?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes, sir; it seems to me that any other advice is going to lead to anarchy. It seems to me that the fundamental proposition you have to start with is that we must have peace; and we shall not recognize any such thing legally as right to restrain the constituted authorities. The right of revolution or violence or anything of that sort. We must as civilized men adopt that idea or else there is no peace for our Government.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, the short cut to the remedy must be condemned?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes, sir; as I look at it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that it is better for a group of men to suffer from real or fancied injuries temporarily than to have chaos prevail?

Dr. GOODNOW. Certainly. One of the many troubles seems to be the workers in the country never will gain anything by any such thing as organized violence. The people as a whole condemn it, and they can do very much better by presenting their case as forcibly as it can be to the courts, where that is possible, or to the public as a whole.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You feel that where the military arm would be oppressive and unjust and tyrannical, that while that might be in the nature of an extenuating circumstance on the part of the workers in responding, that nevertheless it should be condemned and punished for it on the theory that they have their redress through the ballot?

Dr. GOODNOW. When you come to the punishment, that is rather a different thing. There would be punishment in so far as they contributed to the bringing about of disorderly conditions, but in the punishment, why, of course, regard would be had for the extenuating circumstances which you mention.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would you, right there, as occurred, for instance, to a man in Colorado, the military being out, where the courts were in perfect operation, ready to perform the duties of the courts, and the military simply arrested people and held them in bondage; how was the individual man to get relief in that case?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, I was out of the country at the time these things occurred, and I don't know. I have no personal knowledge, or even—I was not able to read what did occur there, and so, in any answer I could give, I must base what I say upon the supposition that you have made.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The same as Mr. Weinstock supposed that the laboring men were perfectly right in resisting?

Dr. GOODNOW. But I understand the courts were in operation, and access to the courts was not denied them; and I would say they have no excuse for not applying to the court.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How could they get to the courts when they were locked up by the military?

Dr. GOODNOW. Why, anyone can apply for a writ of habeas corpus in favor of anybody under arrest. It is not necessary, I say, that the individual under arrest should apply for it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Purely an individual case; an individual with no one particularly interested in him—

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes; but if you have a labor organization, the heads of the labor organization are interested.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose we have no labor organizations?

Dr. GOODNOW. I think it would be very difficult to suppose a case where it would not be possible for that man to bring the matter up before a court.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You talk about them waiting and taking time and not taking the short cut, as Mr. Weinstock suggests, but obey orders, as was recited to us here, and remain in the bull pens, if that was the wish of the military, wait until legislation can be secured and proper remuneration for damage; but the man dies in the bull pen, what then? How are you going to bring back his life?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, of course, you can not bring back his life; but he is in the bull pen because application has not been made to the court for a writ of habeas corpus, assuming that he is being held there unjustly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How is the individual man who is simply working from day to day and has no money—lawyers usually don't work for nothing—how is he going to get the admission to the court?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, as I say, I can not conceive of the condition of circumstances where that would be possible. I don't mean to say that it may not have existed; but I don't know it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understood you to say that you were a teacher, not a practitioner of law?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I take it you have not worked in factories, workshops, and mines, and things of that kind?

Dr. GOODNOW. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You have not been right down in the midst of all those?

Dr. GOODNOW. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I take it also that you concede that you can not appreciate the feeling of the man down there in the midst of all this?

Dr. GOODNOW. No; probably not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You see it from the purely legal standpoint?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Absolutely?

Dr. GOODNOW. Absolutely; yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As the book reads?

Dr. GOODNOW. No; not exactly as the book reads, but as I see life about me.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You said a moment ago that you were not a practicing lawyer, but a teacher, implying that there was some difference between a man who taught law and a man who practiced law?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, no; I think you—possibly I did not make myself plain; but in answer to the chairman's question as to the admissibility of such kind of evidence, I said I did not consider myself qualified to express any opinion on that, because that is a matter within the domain of the practicing lawyer, Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you teach that to your students?

Dr. GOODNOW. No; I do not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Don't you teach them how to practice law?

Dr. GOODNOW. My work has to do mainly with constitutional law and has nothing to do with the law of evidence.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. When you finish with them they understand constitutional law, do they?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, I hope so—some of it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, if that be true, wouldn't they know all about the practice of law, under that particular part of the law that you teach them?

Dr. GOODNOW. No; they would not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Oh. Then they are not finished in that?

Dr. GOODNOW. No; I think it would be very seldom the case that they would be finished under one feature of law. Law is a pretty wide subject, and has to be taught by a good many teachers; and the rules of procedure, practice, and so on—

Commissioner O'CONNELL (interrupting). Is that the reason we have so many constructions of law, because it is taught by so many and they receive different conceptions of the law?

Dr. GOODNOW. That I can not say.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But I understand you do not, as a teacher of law—answering Mr. Weinstock's questions, conceding labor was right in all the things they were striving for—they should not attempt to take the short cut. They should simply obey?

Dr. GOODNOW. That is my idea.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And if the military comes out and says, "You stay in your house, and you must not come out of there," and they say you must do this and the other thing, and say, "We are the boss," they must do that?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, as I said, the coming out of the military has, so far as I know, in all these cases been preceded by violence.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, suppose now—it is a supposition, there may have been some violence, but it is a supposition there is going to be violence. There are thousands of men on strike in this little community. The local officials, as was indicated here by some witness, or before our commission at some place, that the sheriff felt he was not going to be in a position to control the situation. If the mayor and the city officials in the city where the affair took place did not feel that it was necessary to bring in some outside force, and yet upon the application of one man the force was brought in. He believed there was going to be, and the evidence showed some officials of the city had not been, any violence—none whatever prior to the time these State officials came into the field. It was supposed there was going to be violence because there were large numbers of people out of work or had stopped work. Now, it is not always that violence has occurred before forces were brought into the field. As a man of law, you will agree that when injunctions are asked for it is not always that things have occurred, but they say that they are going to occur—we believe they are going to occur.

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, of course, what you say amounts to this—you are criticising in a particular instance the action on the part of the governor in the exercise of a power which is recognized by the Constitution as his. Now, I don't mean by any means that such a power has not and may not be abused or be exercised indiscreetly. That is true of every power you have in the Government. It may be exercised indiscreetly, but I can not see how, if we are to have a state of civilization based upon peace, that is any excuse for the result to violence with a result of bringing about what is a state of war; that is, the whole theory of democratic government is that under those conditions if the officers of the Government have made an indiscreet exercise of their power, then the people will do what they can at the next election to put them out. That is the theory of the democratic government.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Has that been the history of our democratic government?

Dr. GOODNOW. I should say very largely it has been. I don't mean to say there have not been exceptions. There have been cases of violence, and they might be extenuated by particular conditions; but what I object to is the statement of a policy of violence. If you support a policy of violence as being the policy to adopt, you are simply breaking into our whole system of civilization. We can not, we simply can not exist, except upon the basis of peaceful relations.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I do not know of anyone who has declared a policy of violence.

Dr. GOODNOW. That is what you are asking, whether under these conditions they should resort to violence.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Oh, no.

Dr. GOODNOW. A short cut—it was put.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I don't know what Mr. Weinstock meant by "short cut." I was simply using his language. Sometimes the longest way around is the nearest way home.

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I don't know just what he employed short cut to mean, but I take it the short cut was not to commit violence; not to resist with force; not to say to the authorities in the field: "We won't obey your orders. We are entitled to free speech. We are entitled to free press, and all that sort of thing, and we won't obey you?"

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, it is a question of law you have got to determine in a particular case. After the declaration of a State that the State is in a state of insurrection, or that particular counties are in a state of insurrection, where that has been done by the governor, the rights of the individual are not as great as they were before; that is, as a matter of law.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But the individual per se, without associations or ramifications of any kind, in these great ramifications of this Government of ours, what chance has he before the law?

Dr. GOODNOW. I don't see but what he has got the whole—I don't mean to say there are not injustices in particular cases; but I should say, on the whole, the American citizen has, under our law at the present time, ample opportunity to enforce his rights, although there may be occasions where under local conditions there may be a good deal of passion and prejudice, and so on. Of course, his rights may be limited; but generally, by and large, we do, as American citizens, we have a right, and a very broad right, to free speech, and a right to liberty, and a very broad right to liberty, and we have, generally speaking, the remedies by which we can enforce those rights.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The poor man is arrested on the street corner, the policeman says, for violating the right of free speech, and he locks him up without ceremony. The next morning he is brought before the court, or probably the ordinary police magistrate, in the locality where he has been arrested. The lawyer appears and says, "I will defend you for $5 or $10," or, I suppose, there are those who will defend him for a dollar or two; but they want money, and he has not got it. What is his opportunity?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, I think you take it by and large that a man who can, under those conditions, represent his case himself and bring out the facts, I think you will find he will get his rights.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you think he would be secured his rights?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes. I do not mean to say there are no exceptions, for there is nothing perfect in this world.

Commissioner LENNON. What we are after, Professor, is this: We want to know what is the remedy where officials violate the law, that they shall be as quickly punished for violation of the law as the individual; that is what we want and that is what you want. We do not want any redress from violence because we are workingmen; we expect to be punished if we are guilty, but if a militiaman is guilty of violence we want him to be punished as quickly as the individual. How can we accomplish that?

Dr. GOODNOW. The only way I can see—you can not accomplish it at once; the Government is too complicated to make it possible for you to expect that. The only way you can accomplish it is by bringing your case before the public, and by finally exercising the political power you have by way of the vote.

Commissioner LENNON. That is a cause of unrest. I want to state a case that is a matter of record. Two men were brought into a court in Colorado on a writ of habeas corpus, and they were heard, and the court ordered them discharged. The militia surrounded the courthouse and refused to discharge them and took them back and held them. Now, the working people feel that they should have a redress against the militia, just as rapidly as it would be the other way.

Dr. GOODNOW. You never can have that; I do not see how you can have it while the Government goes on; that is my opinion.

Commissioner LENNON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock has another question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would not this be the answer to Mr. O'Connell's question? What redress has the worker or the individual who has been mistreated at the hands of the authorities? Would not this concrete case answer his question: In the city of San Francisco a man was arrested, a chauffeur, for either outraging or attempting to outrage a girl in a park. A large amount of bail was fixed by one of the police judges, and some shyster lawyer having influence with another police judge, succeeded in getting some other police judge to reduce the bail to a trifling amount, which was put up, and the offender escaped and was not reached. This not being even the first case of the kind that occurred, it aroused a good deal of indignation, and the people arose in their might and exercised the recall, and the judge was very badly defeated at the recall, and it ended really in his dying of a broken heart. Is that not a remedy rather than lynch law?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What became of the girl? Where did she get compensation for her trouble?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How could you compensate her?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is the question I want to know, that I want to have answered.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Can you make any law that will compensate a girl and bring back her virtue?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Not a law perhaps, but she could be taken care of and helped in that way.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is it not true that if groups of men having real or fancied grievances justified themselves in resisting authority, would it not mean practically a transplanting of the present Mexican conditions onto American soil?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes; it would result in the destruction of our civilization.

Commissioner LENNON. I want to say that we agree to that, but there is something else.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson has a question to ask.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is this new legal right which you have asserted is the property of every American citizen a theoretical or actual right under the processes that obtain?

Mr. GOODNOW. I should say by and large it is an actual right. Of course, there are certain conditions you always have where it is difficult, if not impossible, to enforce it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you ever heard or known of an instance where a layman, without legal aid, secured a writ of habeas corpus or have you ever heard remotely of such a case?

Dr. GOODNOW. No, I have not heard of any.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Take the men like they were in the Colorado district—the disturbed district—scores of men there with neither family nor any other ties, utterly incapable of getting money through any channel; if one of these men were under arrest, what remedy—is it remotely possible to have such action in his favor?

Dr. GOODNOW. You simply suppose he had no associates—no one outside?

Commissioner GARRETSON. He had no one; he was an alien.

Dr. GOODNOW. Under those conditions, of course, it would be——

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). A theoretical right, Doctor?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, as justice is applied—I saw the other day an incident which very nicely illustrates the assertion that has been made here by a large number of men who are themselves connected in one capacity or another with the administration of justice—looking from my office window to a corner in the city streets, where a policeman occupied the center of the intersection, a teamster cut the corner; the copper climbed up on the seat of his wagon and arrested him and drove him to the station house. Less than two hours after that the owner of an automobile cut the corner and was arrested, and the copper took his number and told him to report. Both were equally identified; do you call that justice?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, you have got to remember that the number on the automobile is a matter of register, and there is no method by means of which, in the case of a teamster, you could be sure of identification.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Every wagon in that city engaged in traffic has a number on it which is issued by the city, just as the automobile had a number on it issued by the State, and the copper knew both men individually, and that is no isolated case. One man had a social and political pull; the other had not.

Dr. GOODNOW. How are you going to help it?

Commissioner GARRETSON. You mean without depriving the other one of the pull?

Dr. GOODNOW. I do not know how you are going to prevent those things.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is that even-handed justice?

Dr. GOODNOW. No. You never had even-handed justice since the world began.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe that since the world began there has been a considerable number of individuals striving toward it, and who hold it as an ideal?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes; and we are making progress.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But we have not got to that stage yet?

Dr. GOODNOW. We have not got quite there yet.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What legal view do you hold of this condition; this is actual, as testified to before this commission? It was testified by the legal adviser of the adjutant general of a State that simply the presence of the militia in the field in itself creates modified martial law, without any proclamation by the properly constituted authorities.

Dr. GOODNOW. That depends on the law of the State; you have to look that up.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It was asserted by him that the decision of the supreme court of the State so held; you would hold in that case that it became good law?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, if the supreme court said so, yes; it is the law.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That dictum will make good law?

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, no; it won't; it all depends on what the constitution of the State says, or the laws of the State say; that is a question you can not answer in a general way.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You would not hold that a dictum of the courts would make the law, notwithstanding what the Constitution was?

Dr. GOODNOW. It would if it was in accord with the constitution of the State.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If it was not appealed to another tribunal?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, your opinion in regard to the adoption of revolutionary methods—that is, opposing force to the lawfully constituted authority—would that opinion depend in any degree, your opinion as to whether it was proper or improper, depend in any degree upon the universality of the injustice complained of?

Dr. GOODNOW. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Whether it was in one State or in 48 States?

Dr. GOODNOW. No; that is, I don't see—if you are going to justify violence as a policy, why, then our civilization is gone. I do not mean to say there may not be extenuating circumstances for the violence at a given time, and you can look back through history, and it is perfectly evident that violence has sometimes been of value under exceptional circumstances, but when you try to set up a general policy of violence you are upsetting civilization.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It depends purely on a question of justification?

Dr. GOODNOW. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has humanity advanced; has it ever made a great stride, spiritually or temporally, without a revolution?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes; most of it has been in the absence of revolution.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What was the birth of this Republic founded in?

Dr. GOODNOW. Revolution.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was it justified?

Dr. GOODNOW. We think so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. England does not.

Dr. GOODNOW. I do not know whether she does now or not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. They expressed quite forcibly their opinion on it at the time?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Bear in mind, I have not carried any guns myself. Has there been any instance—the opinion was expressed here to this body by men holding high legal positions that the power was not vested under the Constitution of the United States in the Supreme Court to pass upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress. Do you agree with or dissent from that view?

Dr. GOODNOW. I answered that question, I think, for Mr. O'Connell.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I overlooked it then.

Dr. GOODNOW. I am willing to answer it again; but what I said then was that, whether you considered that there had been originally a usurpation of constitutional power or not, the universal acquiescence in the exercise of that power by the American people for more than a hundred years has cured any usurpation that has existed; and in saying that I do not wish to be understood as admitting there was usurpation.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you any knowledge as to whether or not Congress did pass an act in 1865 or 1866 distinctly notifying the Supreme Court to keep its hands off of the act?

Dr. GOODNOW. I do not think that would be exactly a correct statement of the action of Congress.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is probably a crude way of stating it.

Dr. GOODNOW. The only case I can remember was where there was a case that was at that time on appeal before the Supreme Court with regard to the constitutionality of certain legislation that was incident to the reconstruction subsequent to the war.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The Blind case was on appeal.

Dr. GOODNOW. I do not remember the name of the case, but I could find it if you desire. And while that case was pending before the Supreme Court Congress passed a law limiting the appellate jurisdiction of the court, which is under the control of Congress, and the Supreme Court, as a result of the passage of that law, said that it had no jurisdiction and did not proceed with the decision of the case.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In other words, it recognized the will of Congress in that direction, regardless of how that will was expressed?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes; in that particular instance.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, then, could it reasonably be held that the American people had acquiesced in the usurpation for a hundred years?

Dr. GOODNOW. I think it could be. That did not involve exactly that question. It involved merely the question as to the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court, which, by the Constitution, is to be determined by Congress, and Congress simply limits the appellate jurisdiction of the court in that class of cases, and that being the case the Supreme Court refused to proceed further with that decision.

Commissioner GARRETSON. From that conclusion that the power is absolutely vested in Congress to declare that the Supreme Court does not possess the power of passing upon the constitutionality of acts of Congress?

Dr. GOODNOW. I do not think that any lawyer would regard that as within the power of Congress; I think they would consider that the power the court has is based on the Constitution, and until the Constitution is amended Congress would not have the right to deprive the Supreme Court of the right of considering that class of cases coming under their jurisdiction.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Your idea is that it can only be done by amendment of the Constitution?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I want to ask you a question, and I do not want to press for an answer if you do not feel free to answer it. There are countries where judicial schools are conducted—they may not be described in that way—where judges are educated

Dr. GOODNOW. In Germany the judges, as I understand, as a general thing are not chosen from the members of the bar.

Commissioner GARRETSON. They are subjected to a course of instruction, in a greater or less degree, to fit them for judicial positions?

Dr. GOODNOW. They have the same education which members of the bar have, but after having passed a certain examination they are associated with the courts in subordinate capacities, and as they show that they are capable then they are promoted until they become full members of the court, so that the members of the court, as I understand it, are not ordinarily chosen from members of the bar in active practice.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I judge that as a teacher of law, no matter what branch it may be, that you have followed with much interest the career of men in that position, and the question is this, if you feel free to answer it: Do you believe that the practice of civil or criminal law is a school that fits a man for the judgeship in the greatest degree?

Dr. GOODNOW. I think one of the troubles, as I have looked at it, in the selection of the judges from the members of the bar, is that you get men whose main work has been the attempt to protect private rights, and who do not have as fully before them, as they otherwise might, the public interest; that is, we will assume they are absolutely incorruptible and intend to do all that is right.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Certainly.

Dr. GOODNOW. But they are biased as a result of having been engaged in the defense of the private rights of their clients; their bias is rather in favor of private rights than in favor of the public interests, and it is only as judges have been a considerable period upon the bench as they get these questions involving the public interest before them, that they are emancipated from this one-sided, this one angle of vision. That is the way I look at it; just as a private opinion.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is what I am asking for, because it was reasonably supposed you had a very accurate knowledge of law and a mind developed along that certain line. Can any man follow a pursuit to a mature age without being influenced in a degree by that pursuit itself?

Dr. GOODNOW. I suppose that would be always inevitable.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. I have a couple of questions which I have been asked to put to you. This is one [reads]:

"If a defendant acquitted by a military court and again arrested in the criminal court on the same charge, failed to plead former jeopardy and only entered a plea of not guilty and offered the evidence of former acquittal as res adjudicata, what instruction would or should be given to the jury?"

An attorney has asked me to ask you that question.

Dr. GOODNOW. As I understand the proceedings in a court-martial, it would have no effect at all; it is another system of court.

Chairman WALSH. And if there is a military law and court, the practice of that court is determined by the code or rules of practice and the decisions respecting it?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And the question of former jeopardy has to be pleaded separately and heard separately?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And in most of the States that plea has to be decided before that trial takes place?

Dr. GOODNOW. I don't know about that.

Chairman WALSH. I don't either.

One other question, and this is an economic question [reads]:

"Can you conceive of a condition in which the economic or industrial organizations should become so dominating, industry become organized to such a high degree, that it would be desirable to have persons for judges who were not learned in the law?"

Dr. GOODNOW. That method is adopted, for instance, in France; that is, all these questions between employer and employee come up before a special tribunal, which consists of judges not chosen from among those learned in the law, but chosen from among employees and employers.

Chairman WALSH. Have you an opinion on the subject?

Dr. GOODNOW. I understand that works pretty well in France.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to ask this question, also [reads]:

"Do you not fear that to raise the educational requirements for the bar would, by placing the legal and judicial profession beyond the reach of any but the rich, make for a more decided bias in the administration of justice?"

Dr. GOODNOW. Well, of course, that is a question; it would undoubtedly make it more difficult for the poor classes of people.

Chairman WALSH. More expensive?

Dr. GOODNOW. Yes; it would make it more difficult for them to be admitted to the bar, but, of course, you have to offset against that the advantages which might be derived from their education, and at the present time I think we must admit, as I have said, there is no attempt made whatever in our qualifications for entrance to the bar to secure men who have any knowledge of economic questions.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you, Doctor, you will be excused permanently.

The commission will now stand adjourned until 2 o'clock this afternoon.

(Thereupon, an adjournment was taken at 12.30 o'clock May 13, 1915, until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Cyphers.

TESTIMONY OF MR. HARRY A. CYPHERS.

Chairman WALSH. I am sorry to have had to keep you this long, and another thing is we will have to be quite brief, because we have been pretty fully over those particular questions, but some other little information that we desired to secure from you, though the subject was pretty well covered the other day.

What is your name, please?

Mr. CYPHERS. Harry A. Cyphers.

Chairman WALSH. And where do you reside?

Mr. CYPHERS. South Bethlehem.

Chairman WALSH. And your profession?

Mr. CYPHERS. Lawyer.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you lived in South Bethlehem?

Mr. CYPHERS. Twenty-three years.

Chairman WALSH. Are you familiar with the conditions that prevail in South Bethlehem with particular reference to the steel industry, prior to February 4, 1910?

Mr. CYPHERS. Fairly so; as well as could be with the observation and association on the street.

Chairman WALSH. Briefly, what caused the strike?

Mr. CYPHERS. The real cause of the strike, I think, was the illtreatment or unjust adjustment of the differences that arose between the various employees and their underbosses.

Chairman WALSH. And the main grievances were what?

Mr. CYPHERS. The main grievances were the fact that they got no fair adjustment of any differences that arose. For instance, if a man would complain about some work that he had done, that he didn't get paid for, why it would be waived aside without consideration and brushed aside, and any complaint never reached any further than such dismissal.

Chairman WALSH. But there was a definite feeling of unrest among the men at the time?

Mr. CYPHERS. All over the whole city.

Chairman WALSH. How long were those men on strike prior to the arrival of the constabulary?

Mr. CYPHERS. From February 4 to the 25th of February.

Chairman WALSH. Under that condition what was the condition of South Bethlehem with reference to peace and order?

Mr. CYPHERS. About like an ordinary Sunday morning—quiet.

Chairman WALSH. Was it perfectly safe for citizens and officials of the steel company and others to move about the city of South Bethlehem?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes, sir; without question.

Chairman WALSH. When did the constabulary arrive?

Mr. CYPHERS. I think it was Friday morning the 25th.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe briefly what was the condition following their arrival.

Mr. CYPHERS. The first excitement arose as soon as it was learned the constabulary had come to town. Everybody wanted to see them, and necessarily the excitement began to increase until they came out onto the street and attempted to drive the spectators off the street, which created discord at once. There was some 25 of them, and they marched up through the middle of the street, and every man that said anything about them, why they made a dive for him. Of course, the people ran wherever they could, and some arrests were made, and they took them down to the old Bethlehem Steel Company's office in the building and locked them up over Sunday. No hearings—disregarded everybody that was in authority, police officers, mayor, and burgesses, and all were disregarded; and they simply went on and locked up people without any consideration, whether they had done anything, or what the cases were; nobody could reach them.

Chairman WALSH. Were you engaged as attorney to represent any persons placed under arrest?

Mr. CYPHERS. I was on a Saturday. I think, my recollection is.

Chairman WALSH. Upon what date was Mr. Zambo killed?

Mr. CYPHERS. On Saturday morning.

Chairman WALSH. What date?

Mr. CYPHERS. The 26th.

Chairman WALSH. The 26th of February?

Mr. CYPHERS. I think it was that; I am not sure whether it was the 25th or the 26th, but I think it was the 26th.

Chairman WALSH. Where were the hearings held for those arrested by the State police?

Mr. CYPHERS. The first lot, amounting to some 80-odd cases, were heard in Mr. Schwab's office, in the office of the Bethlehem Steel Co.'s building.

Chairman WALSH. Was Mr. Schwab present?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Anybody else?

Mr. CYPHERS. Four or five, or six or eight—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I mean, anyone else of the company there?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes; all the officials.

Chairman WALSH. Who was there representing the men on strike?

Mr. CYPHERS. I was.

Chairman WALSH. Anyone else?

Mr. CYPHERS. No.

Chairman WALSH. Were the trials public? Could anyone come in that desired?

Mr. CYPHERS. No; they didn't have room for them all. By the time they got the State constabulary in and the justice and the district attorney and the steel company officials, there wasn't much room left. We were crowded—

Chairman WALSH. Could the men on strike that wanted to get in get into the room?

Mr. CYPHERS. Nobody attempted to come in. They were held clear in the middle of the building, and the entrance to it was barred by the officials, and you had to go through the hall and—

Chairman WALSH. Is there a requirement in the State constitution of Pennsylvania that a man charged with crime shall have a speedy and public trial?

Mr. CYPHERS. I understand so.

Chairman WALSH. Have you the original notes taken by you at the time with reference to the charges and the amount of bail required?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes, sir; I have. I made a memorandum of each case at the time, and I looked the other day and found it. The charges were mostly throwing stones; the bail required in all of the cases was $1,000, except one or two. During the first two or three cases that were called and were testified to by the State constabulary—

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was that $1,000 in each individual case?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes, sir. For instance, the first person I have on my list was Serminski, charged with throwing stones and rioting. The bail required was $1,000.

Chairman WALSH. How many men were arrested on charges of that sort?

Mr. CYPHERS. My recollection is that there were some 26 or 28 in the office when I first went down to the steel company's office to see them.

Chairman WALSH. Could you please offer that into our record here, and we will copy it and return the original?

Mr. CYPHERS. You don't need to return them. I have no use for them. They are merely old files.

(See Cyphers Exhibit at end of this subject.)

Chairman WALSH. Did you offer your services to assist in prosecution of the men accused of killing Zambo?

Mr. CYPHERS. I did, and it was refused.

Chairman WALSH. Who had the prosecuting in all of these cases?

Mr. CYPHERS. The district attorney.

Chairman WALSH. Was there special counsel on either side?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes, sir; one of the principal attorneys representing some of the cases for the Commonwealth, and I raised the question at the time that if they were permitted private counsel for the Commonwealth in a case in which the strikers were arrested. I wanted to appear for the Commonwealth when it came to the trial of the State constabulary.

Chairman WALSH. What was the reply to that?

Mr. CYPHERS. The district attorney told me all right, and I raised the question before the court, and the court said there was no occasion to appear for the Commonwealth, and that I could appear for the defendants, and I did, and at the trial of them for two days, I came in the court on the morning of the third day, and I told the court I had changed my plea, or would change it, and submit a plea of non vult, if he would tell me they would be disposed of, and the court agreed to it.

Chairman WALSH. What were they sentenced to?

Mr. CYPHERS. From six to nine months.

Chairman WALSH. What was that plea?

Mr. CYPHERS. Non vult; in other words, don't care to contest the issue. The Zambo case was called for trial, or the trooper, rather, who did the shooting, and when it was called for trial at the next term of court I think I was told by the district attorney he had discussed the matter with the court and to see if he would consent to my appearing for the Commonwealth. They called some one else to testify and would not do it.

Chairman WALSH. Did you defend the strikers for unlawful arrest?

Mr. CYPHERS. I did.

Chairman WALSH. How many?

Mr. CYPHERS. Four.

Chairman WALSH. How were the suits disposed of?

Mr. CYPHERS. They were; in the last week one of the boys came to me one day and asked me whether it made any difference to me if he dropped it, and I said, "No"; and a day or two afterwards there came to my office by mail three letters, which I have in my hand, from the other three directing me to drop the case. They read, addressed to me, "Owing to the fact we do not think the cases now before the court against Wilson and Robinson are of any consequence, we withdraw from the case." The first one is signed Stephen Ganzer.

Chairman WALSH. Who was he?

Mr. CYPHERS. The plaintiff in the case, and the other was John Setzler and Joseph Belt.

Chairman WALSH. Did the plaintiffs remain in the city?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes, sir; they got their jobs back at the steel company; that was what ended the suits I learned afterwards.

Chairman WALSH. What were the amounts of the suits that were filed?

Mr. CYPHERS. Five thousand dollars, $10,000, and various amounts. The cases grew out of picketing, and they were discharged before the squire.

Chairman WALSH. Are there many injuries of employees, or were there prior to that time, and were there many injuries to employees in the Bethlehem Steel Co.?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes, sir; we see the ambulance go three or four or five times a day, and sometimes six or eight, to and from the hospital; it passes my office.

Chairman WALSH. As a usual thing are the persons injured recompensed for their injury?

Mr. CYPHERS. We never hear anything about it.

Chairman WALSH. Are there any suits filed against the Bethlehem Steel Co. for injuries?

Mr. CYPHERS. Not to any amount. In the 18 years I have practiced law I have had two. Both were settled before trial; one for a thousand dollars for a man that fell over a mold into a pit, and the other for $600, where a man shoved a train over him and bumped his head off. I don't recall which was for $600 and which for a thousand, but one was $600 and the other a thousand dollars.

Chairman WALSH. What is your idea; why are not more suits brought; you say the ambulance goes three or four times a day?

Mr. CYPHERS. The reason for it is very simple; the steel company is the only industry in the town, and whenever anyone is hurt the members of the family—the brother and sisters, aunts and uncles—work for the steel company, and if some of them wanted to bring suit the influence is enough to quash them. That is the way it is done; it is a mere question of influence.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understand you to say there was no rioting before the constabulary was brought in?

Mr. CYPHERS. There was no rioting. It was quiet, generally speaking, as it could be on a Sunday morning. Anyone could go where they wished. There had been a couple of parades, but no rioting, except I heard of a little incident taking place, a little difficulty down at the steel company's office about their pay, and I didn't see that at all. The police officers were in charge, and it might have been a little rough at the time, but it was nothing serious.

Chairman WALSH. On whose request were they brought there?

Mr. CYPHERS. The State constabulary? On the information that came to me it was through the sheriff. The sheriff testified in the suit before the court, when we tried those people that were arrested; he testified that he brought the State troops to town, and the only evidence of violence that he could testify to was that some boy had thrown a stone and broken a window right in the steel company's office, and they had taken the boy into the office, and they refused to prosecute him. That was his testimony before the court.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did the city officers—the mayor or chief of police—make any request?

Mr. CYPHERS. I think not. They refused to is my recollection of the fact.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They refused to indorse the request for the State constabulary?

Mr. CYPHERS. There was, I think, the sheriff and the burgess that were in conference with the steel company officials for some little time, about the time it happened. I was not present and don't know what it was; all I get is from the talk on the street.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were there any arrests made by the city police prior to the State constabulary coming there?

Mr. CYPHERS. Not that I know of.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Not out of the ordinary, that might occur at any time?

Mr. CYPHERS. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Immediately upon the arrival of the State constabulary there was some trouble?

Mr. CYPHERS. That was what started it up. Before they left the train at the station—they had not gone two blocks before they picked up a man that was half drunk; he was a painter, and had nothing to do with the steel works, and they took him to the market house and locked him up. The town then became very much excited, and everybody was in fever heat for a while until they got their bearings.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The State constabulary was housed in the buildings of the steel company?

Mr. CYPHERS. The horses were in the steel company's stable, and the men were in the basement of the general offices on Third Street.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you seen anything of the published statement, the financial statement of the Bethlehem Steel Co., showing that there had been compensation in any way for the keeping of the soldiers and policemen and horses?

Mr. CYPHERS. I have not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What was the general impression in Bethlehem—that the steel company furnished housing and food and places for their horses?

Mr. CYPHERS. That is the general idea, but we don't know for certain. They furnished everything; everything was free and plenty around there. In the sheriff's office—I was there several times—I was free to go anywhere in the office and about the works. I had on Sunday morning, when this excitement was on, I went down to the works, down to see the men in the building.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What was the impression of the better—not the impression of the men on strike, but the citizens generally, the business men, as to the conduct of the State constabulary while at Bethlehem?

Mr. CYPHERS. Well, answering that, the business men, it was drawn into an issue between the business interests on the one end and the employees on the other before it had gotten very far, and so the business interests had all lined up with the steel company's side of it as against the employees on the other. That was the turn that the situation took, so that before the State constabulary came the impression of all business interests was with the men, and after they came and the excitement grew more intense it went the other way; and to illustrate how well the people were reposed and how peaceful, when the man Zambo was buried—the day he was buried—one of the priests who had charge of taking care of the interests of the striking employees went down to the steel company's office and told them if they would keep the constabulary in the steel company's fence and not let them out on the street that he would take care of the crowd. There were 5,000 men marched to that funeral and not a word from anybody.

Chairman WALSH. Were they kept in the inclosure?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I think that was testified to by some one that an understanding was reached that they would not be out that day.

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You spoke about the courts being held in the office of the company in which these 26 or 28 men were tried. Who held that court?

Mr. CYPHERS. Enright, the justice of the peace. He had his office in the market house, and they asked him to come down to the steel company's office and hold the hearing there.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Who asked him to come down?

Mr. CYPHERS. The district attorney, or some one; I don't know how it was arranged. I was not consulted.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Why could he not have held court in his own office?

Mr. CYPHERS. The other justices refused to go; some were asked. He was an old man.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What impression did that state of affairs create in South Bethlehem when the court was moved into the company's office?

Mr. CYPHERS. It was all over before they found it out.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. After it was over and the matter was found out, what was the impression?

Mr. CYPHERS. The impression was that there had been simply a frame-up to send these men down.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did the business men who had gone over to the side of the company feel that was a just way to transact business?

Mr. CYPHERS. I do not think they expressed any opinion; they did not take any interest in it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Why didn't they?

Mr. CYPHERS. I never have heard thus far.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were they fearful of being forced out of business in South Bethlehem?

Mr. CYPHERS. No; I do not think that entered into the case; it was simply a choice of interests. Their interests laid more with the steel company than with the others. Most everyone in town depends on it for existence.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is your idea of the conduct of the State constabulary in Bethlehem?

Mr. CYPHERS. Theoretically they are all right, but practically they are dead wrong. The State constabulary would be all right if they would encamp somewhere in the town simply to preserve order and have nothing to do with the interests of the steel company and stay away from there.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If they were to occupy simply a neutral position?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did they occupy a neutral position?

Mr. CYPHERS. Theoretically, yes; but practically, no.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Under the law by which they are created they are supposed to occupy a neutral position?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes; but they do not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They could hardly be expected to under the circumstances?

Mr. CYPHERS. No; and then they were fed and their horses were fed and kept on the company's property, and they had drink and refreshments in the company's office, and, of course, you could not expect them to be neutral under those circumstances.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were they furnished drink inside?

Mr. CYPHERS. I never saw them drinking, but I saw the bottles around.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you ever see any of them under the influence of liquor?

Mr. CYPHERS. No; I can not say that I did. At the hearing before the squire they were standing around the doors, and if people would gather they would chase them off with clubs, without considering their interests, whether they were friends or relatives of the parties or just lookers-on. When I got into the matter and found the lay of the land I did not have much trouble straightening things out, because I could handle the men and the officers.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. One of the causes of the strike up there was that the men were working 12 hours or more per day 7 days a week?

Mr. CYPHERS. That was one of the elements that entered into it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. A man would ask to be off on Sunday, "I have worked six days or a year straight ahead without a day off," and they would say, "You can not lay off," and if he laid off he would probably be laid off for good?

Mr. CYPHERS. That is the way I gather it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As you gathered the conditions at the steel mill, it was a condition of the men being compelled to work 12 hours per day or more, and 7 days a week?

Mr. CYPHERS. Some of them. I think the statement contained in the report as to the condition there is fairly correct; but the element that really entered into it more was not so much the wage and hours of labor, but the course of treatment the men got when they asked for a concession.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As I get the causes of the trouble, there was at least that of long hours a day?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the men working Sundays, without one day of rest in the week?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the question of discrimination against them?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes; the discrimination in favor of men that came from the outside; itinerants from the outside would be put alongside of the skilled mechanics and given practically one-third more wages, and if those who lived in town complained, they would say, "You can quit if you don't like it." And, of course, those men had families and could not leave. They were tied up, and as a result the better mechanics would drift along. I have in mind a skilled mechanic working for $3 a day, 30 cents an hour—

Commissioner O'CONNELL (interrupting). I want to get this in sequence, if I can. There were the hours of labor?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And Sunday labor?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Persistent discrimination against the men for a number of reasons?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes; various reasons.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Lack of opportunity for the men to adjust their grievances with the officials of the company?

Mr. CYPHERS. That was a serious question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They could not get to the higher officials of the company?

Mr. CYPHERS. No; the higher officials of the company I have the utmost confidence in, and I think they would be fair in any case if it reached them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the pot sort of boiled over, as it were?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There was no organization among the men?

Mr. CYPHERS. No; two or three men would go around the shop and discuss the case of the men.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the pot boiled over, and there was a strike which grew day after day?

Mr. CYPHERS. The way I got the facts at the time it started out with one or two men having some little difference as to whether they should go to work or do some little job of some sort, and some of the men walked out.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. A few hundred one day and a few hundred another day until it was five or six thousand?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that boiling over of the pot, as I put it, was a very great surprise to those in charge. They thought nothing of the kind could occur, because they had succeeded in preventing organization?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes; they would not allow the employment of union men. I know of several instances where men, strangers in the town, were employed, and after they had worked two or three months they would attend a union meeting at Easton several miles away, and the next day they would be discharged.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And this boiling over of the pot and the men being out on the street, from all that I have heard, with the exception of the sheriff, who says there was some rioting, was peaceable and peace existed in the community?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes; we have a peaceable population.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And peace existed in the community where there was this large plant with several thousand people on strike, it was evident that testimony had to be obtained, or that the strike might result in some credit to the men, some victory might come to them, and that might force some change in Sunday labor, or hours of labor, or treatment of their grievances?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And then something seemed to be necessary to be done to bring some one in there to start something up?

Mr. CYPHERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the result was that the State constabulary was brought in, no one seemed to know why it was done so far.

Mr. CYPHERS. I do not think there was any reason.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And they were encamped in the office of the steel company, where they were fed and housed and their horses were fed and taken care of inside of the company's works, and that had a tendency to get inside of the minds of the men that these people were brought there for the purpose of breaking the strike?

Mr. CYPHERS. That was the impression.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that was the only impression that could be taken from it; they were not neutral?

Mr. CYPHERS. No; if those men that came had been encamped at the other end of town on the common instead of where they were, there would probably have been no question of good faith and no arrests, except for actual violation of the peace.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is it your impression that the State constabulary was brought in there for the purpose of starting trouble that might result in rioting and arrest, or were brought in there to intimidate and break the strike?

Mr. CYPHERS. My impression of the matter, from what I have gathered as to the course of conduct they pursued from the time they were brought into the town until the local authorities got their bearings, was to browbeat and abuse everybody until they found out there was some one in the town that had enough influence to preserve order, apparently treating the matter as if the people were a lot of cattle to be driven. I ran myself against Capt. Robinson, and I said, "Captain, now, if you stop this business of beating and abusing we can stop this trouble, and there is no question about it." And there was trouble after the first day, and the people understood the situation—after they had killed those men; and from the information I gathered it is my opinion that it was deliberately planned from headquarters.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The further arrests that were made by the State constabulary—where did they take their parties to that were arrested?

Mr. CYPHERS. In all cases they were confined in the first instance at the old Bethlehem Steel Co.'s office, down in the center of the works, and from there were taken to the squire for hearing. After the first day the hearing was held on Third Street, about a block from the office, in the town; and from there they were disposed of in one way or another or committed or——

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, when they were arrested would they take them right to the squire?

Mr. CYPHERS. No. I say they would confine them in the first instance—the arrests were almost always made——

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Without making a charge?

Mr. CYPHERS. Without making a charge. As soon as I was retained by them I insisted on a charge being made by somebody and sworn to in each case. Of course, they then had to confine themselves to something or hold them until they got ready. So, I say, after a day or two following that course they did file formal charges.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I gather from your testimony, then, that the cause of any trouble that did occur in South Bethlehem in the way of charged rioting or fighting or arrest or killing, all was the result of the State constabulary coming into South Bethlehem without cause?

Mr. CYPHERS. I have always believed that it was deliberately planned. That is my own opinion.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Thank you, Mr. Cyphers. You will be permanently excused.

Mrs. Jones, please.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. MARY JONES.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name?

Mother JONES. Mary Jones.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mother JONES. Well, I reside wherever there is a good fight against wrong—all over the country.

Chairman WALSH. Do you claim a residence in any particular State?

Mother JONES. No. Wherever the workers are fighting the robbers I go there.

Chairman WALSH. Now, it may seem unnecessary, but you are the lady that is known to the country as "Mother Jones," are you?

Mother JONES. I suppose so, Mr. Walsh.

Chairman WALSH. I will go right to the cause of the inquiry. You have listened to a great deal of it here, I notice. It is the administration or the lack of administration of law in industrial disputes. So I am going to ask you first, Mrs. Jones, were you in the Pittsburgh railroad strike of 1877?

Mother JONES. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. At what point in the country were you, Mrs. Jones?

Mother JONES. At Pittsburgh.

Chairman WALSH. I would like you to give your experience in that strike, so far as the administration of the law or the conduct of the officials was concerned.

Mother JONES. Well, the strike began in Martinsburg, Ohio. It started with the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad employees, and it reached down to Pittsburgh and east to Scranton. I was in New York. I came down. I was a member of the Knights of Labor at that time, and some of the boys met me and asked me to stay over with them, and I did. So the traffic was stopped and a lawless element that had got into Pittsburgh during the panic of 1873, they had gathered in from the eastern part of the country and, of course, began to revolt and started to rioting. The employees of the railroad and others went to the mayor of the city and asked him if he would not swear them in as deputies to preserve the property and have the law enforced. While this was going on the sheriff of the county telegraphed to the governor, and the governor sent the militia.

Now, at that time I believe the troops went to Pittsburgh, but the fight turned onto the Pennsylvania Railroad; it concentrated on the Pennsylvania Railroad mostly, and some of the militia was quartered in the roundhouse. The business men of Pittsburgh, who for years had complained of discrimination by the railroad company against the city, were free in their expression of enmity against the company. Some of them connected with this committed acts of violence and actually participated in the riots that followed. Cars were set on fire and run down the tracks to the roundhouse, which was destroyed, together with over 100 locomotives belonging to the Pennsylvania Railroad Co. The feeling at that time of many workers and sympathizers was one of distrust, and in many instances amounted to hatred, because the corporations of that day were open and successful in passing antilabor legislation, tramp laws, and other legislation, which caused the workers to feel that they were being discriminated against. The corporations succeeded in the passing of the law which required that in case of a strike the train crew should bring in a locomotive to the starting place before the strike would begin. It was because of that legislation that so many locomotives were housed at Pittsburgh and became the prey to the flames by an outraged populace and not by the workers and not by strikers. I know most of the strikers; all had done everything they could to keep order. Not but what they felt the sting of the lash, the injustice that was done, but nevertheless they wanted to keep order and be steady otherwise. But the business men were the men who perpetrated the wrongs, because they felt that the railroad company had discriminated against them so much. That is about as much as I remember of that. I haven't the notes. I have them laid away, Mr. Walsh, but I am over all the country, and I don't know where to lay hands on things.

Chairman WALSH. You made notes of all these strikes at the time?

Mother JONES. Mostly; I have made notes of them all.

Chairman WALSH. Were you in the anthracite strike in Pennsylvania in 1900?

Mother JONES. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would give us whatever comment you have on that as to violence and administration of the law and the action of the authorities in it.

Mother JONES. I had been down in Arnot, Pa. We had a strike there for six months, but there were no deputies and no gunmen and no militia brought in there, and there was no violence. That is the home of the Secretary of Labor.

During the whole six months, it was a nine months' strike, but it was six months after I went there; but the men were orderly and they themselves took care of the property. The superintendent and the officials of that company could come up 4 miles from Blossburg at any hour of the night they wanted to alone, and they were not afraid and had no reason to be. That strike was settled very peacefully. The Erie Co. conceded to the men most of what they asked for, and there was no violence during the whole nine months.

Then I went into Maryland. I was not in Maryland very long until I was sent for to come into the anthracite region.

Chairman WALSH. When was that, Mrs. Jones, in 1902?

Mother JONES. No; in 1900.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, yes.

Mother JONES. And in that—there were only 7,000 men organized out of 160,000, and I addressed the convention the day that I got in from Maryland and they called the strike right afterwards. Well, of course, we had to go over all the district—three districts—to rally them together. There was no violence up in either Scranton or around Hazelton, and very little of it down in a town named Shamokin—scarcely any violence there, but the militia was brought in. First the company would guard the mines so that the men could not get out, or that we could not get near them; and if we billed a meeting, why the company would always attend the meeting and the men could not; it was the force of the company entirely that attended the meeting, and I concluded that these men had suffered long enough.

I want to say, Mr. Walsh, that I do not take any orders from any officials. I belong to a class who have been robbed, exploited, and plundered down through many long centuries, and because I belong to that class I have an instinct to go and help break the chains; and so I concluded some moves had to be made to bring the men all out; and I organized the men and women, the women particularly, and I made raids every night; we marched and pulled out those mines—the men. There was no violence. The sheriff in Hazelton was a very fine man. He understood the law, and he knew he could manage the affair without bringing the military there. But I went down to Panther Creek. There were 5,000 men there that could not be reached, and I knew they had to be got out in order to get more bread for the children that were coming, so one night, without saying anything to anyone, I gathered up 2,000 or 3,000 women, and naturally the men followed. That is their natural instinct—to know what we were going to do. We started. I had to go into the saloons and tell them to close up and not give any liquor to the boys. I knew the women did not go near the saloons; I was the only one that did. We marched, and about 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning we met the militia. There was a poor little sheriff, not to be condemned at all, but he was unable to grasp the thing, and he yelled like a mad dog in the night to send the guns to him, the governor. I did not know it, or I would have telegraphed the governor, to keep the guns at home and there would be no trouble. Then we marched 15 miles over the mountains from Hazelton to Panther Creek, and there we met the militia in the middle of the night. The militia did not know what kind of an army I had with me. He thought it was just a few strikers; he told us to go back. I told him that the American workingman never goes backward; we go forward, and we did not go out to go back; and he said he would charge bayonets. Well, he didn't do it anyway; but it took us three hours to go back 2 miles. I don't like to resist officers and create any trouble, but I saw he was a sort of a Sunday-school fellow and there wasn't very much to him, and I concluded to just put him on the back a little, and I pulled out the 5,000 men.

Chairman WALSH. You mean by that that you induced the 5,000 men to go out on strike?

Mother JONES. Yes; I wanted them to win the fight. I had a large army with me and I wanted them all, and so I had to get these miners out, because they were furnishing the coal. I brought out the 5,000 men. We held up the street cars and did not hurt anybody, and the men—oh, once in awhile when a boss wanted to jump over us we picked him up and threw him over the fence to his wife, and told her to take care of him. We did not hurt him, but we wanted him out of our way; so that thing continued until 10 o'clock in the morning; and we had the 5,000 men out and that ended it, and that part of the strike was ended peacefully.

The women had nothing but brooms and mops and they were very hungry, and the militia had ordered breakfast at some hotel and I told the women go in and eat their breakfast and let the State pay for it; and it was our breakfast anyhow. So they did. We ate the breakfast. We had more strength to get back.

Mr. Mitchell, then president of the miners, did not know anything about these moves, but I saw him in the morning, and I told him I was up against the militia, and he was a little nervous. But I never get nervous when I face bayonets. I think they are human beings like all the rest of us, and I go in a fight and I am not afraid of bayonets when it comes to a struggle for our rights. One day I got my army together of little boys. I was training them for the future. And when we got everything straightened out the mines closed, and we went back to Hazelton, and Mr. Mitchell asked me what we had done. I told him nothing in the world—just pulled out the 5,000 men and told the militia to take a rest. The militia did not follow us, did not interfere with us otherwise at all. And they treated us with a great deal of courtesy, looking at it from their point of view.

At this time the winter was coming, and I knew that the people would need coal and that the strike would have to come somewhat to a climax. So in Lattimer—I happened to be in Tennessee when the 23 men happened to be shot in the back by the sheriff and the deputies. I did not come East right away, because I had other work to do. I concluded I would have to take the matter up, and the general manager sent word that if I came in there I was going to get killed. Well, it does not make any difference to me when I die, if I am dying for a good cause. I concluded I would go in there, and the newspaper men, while I am always friendly to them, I know they have to make their living just as the balance have, they were in the habit of going to the barns to get buggies to take them out, and the barn fellow would tell ahead of time what I was doing. So this night I told the clerk at the hotel, "Don't notify the newspaper men that I am going out." In that evening I had got one man from each mining department; the others did not know that I had seen anyone but themselves, and I arranged with them to bring their army and meet me.

I got the women—I got about 1,500 women lined up, and we walked into Lattimer. It was dark, and we knocked at every door and told them there was no work to do; that they would have to rest. The general manager didn't know, neither did the sheriff, so they began telephoning. The manager and the sheriff came, and he said, "What are you going to do, Mother?" And I said, "I am going to close up this mine." And he said, "Are the women going to close it up?" And I said, "Yes; we are going to close it up." So the drivers came along to take the mules to the mines, and I had all of the women centered in front of the company's store, and we had 3,000 men down at the mines that the company or the sheriff or nobody knew anything about—they had come in on different roads—and I said, when he ordered the boys to take the mules to the drivers, that the mules would not scab, he had just as well leave them at home in the barns, because the mules remembered that Patrick Henry had passed a Declaration of Independence, and that the mules were conscious of that, and he had just as well leave them in the barns. But the drivers were ordered to take them away, and I didn't worry then, because I knew they would come back pretty soon. I kept entertaining the sheriff and general manager and deputies, and the mules came back directly without the drivers. Of course, we cheered the mules. The men down at the mines were driving the miners back that were going to work. We closed those mines in the anthracite, and that really was the key to the situation. They had shot 23 men in the back, just three years before. I served notice on the sheriff that no 23 men—no 23 workers—would be shot that day; that he had just as well make up his mind that those mines were going to be closed, and we had no pistols or guns, nothing but just our hands, because I don't believe in those instruments and I don't travel with any organizer who carries them. We closed up the mines. The reporters heard of it later in the morning and they came down, but we had our work done by the time they came, so we went back, went home; that really was the key to the situation; that settled the first anthracite strike.

The militia didn't commit any brutal acts, nor did they undertake to force us in any way. I must give Col. O'Neal credit for that. He was the colonel of that militia; that was the crack Fourteenth of Pennsylvania, but it was not very crack that day, I assure you. We carried on our work and finished. That was the first anthracite strike in 1900, and at the close the men called a convention and the strike was called off, and I think Mark Hanna had something to do with settling it. Then I was sent into West Virginia——

Chairman WALSH. That was in 1902?

Mother JONES. In 1900. The strike in Pennsylvania, I think, had closed in November; that strike, it didn't last very long, only six or seven weeks was all that it lasted, and the men got some concessions; not all they wanted, but they got some to satisfy them. There was no rioting; no bloodshed. The sheriff at Hazelton, Sheriff Harvey, was a very sensible, clear, level-headed man. He came to me that morning and asked me to take them home, and I said, "No; no one is going to get hurt." And he said, "They want me to call for the militia." And I said, "Don't obey them; there is no need for them," and there was no one hurt that morning.

I went into West Virginia; the organization sent me there. I surveyed the situation there. I was mostly in the Kenowa and Norfolk & Western, in the New River country, and I was also in the Fairmount region. I never in my life was arrested until I was arrested in the Fairmount region under a Federal injunction. I was arrested while I was speaking to a large crowd in Clarksburg, and some one sent me word that we were all under arrest, and I said to the audience, composed a great deal of strikers, "Don't you undertake to surrender; I am under arrest, but you keep up the fight; it is a fight for more bread." The United States marshal, Elliott, he didn't come up to me; he sent one of the deputies to send one of our own men to tell me I was under arrest. I had never been in court before then in my life, and we were carried 84 miles, to Parkersburg, to prison, but the marshal sent his nephew with me. He sent five of the deputy marshals with the boys. There were nine of us altogether. The young man said to me, "Mother, my uncle told me to take you to the hotel; he has engaged a room there." I didn't say anything until I got off of the train, and so when I got off of the train the deputies were taking my boys that way and I was going this way, and I said, "Boy, we are going the wrong way." And he said, "Oh, no." And I said, "The boys are going the wrong way, then." And he said, "No; they are going to jail; you are going to the hotel." And I said, "If the boys go to jail, I go to jail, too." And so I turned around and went to jail.

The jailer and his wife were very nice and courteous to me; they didn't lock me up in a cell; they just took me in as a member of the family; but they locked my boys up; and then we were all taken into the Federal court and tried. The judge gave the boys from 60 to 90 days. I did think I was going to be hung, because in the close of that meeting we had I said to the audience, "We are all arrested, but you keep the strike up; don't pay any attention to that injunction machine in Parkersburg, he scabbed on his father." That was the Federal judge. I didn't know much about courts at that time; I had never been there; and so when I was taken into court the prosecuting attorney played that up very much, indeed. He said, "She even insulted your honor." And I didn't know where the insult came in, and he said, "She called you a scab." And the judge said, "Did you call me a scab, Mother Jones?" "I certainly did, Judge." He said, "Who did I scab on? How came you to say that?" "Why, when you ordered my arrest, it just struck me that when the immortal Lincoln—I made a point to read the newspapers—that when the President had sent the commission of appointment that he didn't distinguish senior or junior, that you bore the same initials that your father did, and he was away and you appointed yourself. You took the appointment, and you appointed yourself, and that was scabbing on your father, Judge." He said, "I never heard that before." I said, "I think if you will run up the files of the papers when the President appointed you that you will find it in the press of either Boston, Philadelphia, or New York, perhaps in all of them." And he said, "You must have a wonderful memory." And I said, "No; I did not, but I didn't have anything else to hit you with when you arrested me, and I thought I would hit you with that."

The prosecuting attorney recommended me to the mercy of the court. I don't want any mercy from any court. I don't do anything but what is my duty to do as a citizen of this Nation, and I don't ask you for mercy. I am asking for justice, and not mercy, and I told the judge not to have any mercy on me. The prosecuting attorney said, "If I would leave the State"; "No; I won't leave the State." And so I was turned loose, but the boys were put in jail. There was one of our boys that was rather in poor health, Mr. Walsh. I want to show you the good points in men, if they are reached, no matter where they are or what position they are in; there is a human side, I believe, to all of them. That judge was looked upon as a terrible fellow by the whole labor world, and most of the other people, and this young man said to me, "I am sorry you are going, Mother." I said, "I am sorry, too, because I should have been put in jail with the boys, but the only one I feel sorry for is old Barney Rice; his wife is very frail, and he has some little children," and he said, "If you go out to see the judge, I think he would pardon Barney." And I said, "I don't think he would." And he said, "Yes; I think he would." I said, "All right, all he can do is to tell me to get out and not come back again"; and so I went out and saw the judge and pleaded with him, and he asked me to come to dinner. His wife was a kindly, good, Christian woman—that is, as Christianity is considered to-day, and as soon as the dinner was over, the judge came in and I said, "I came to see you about Barney Rice." And he said, "What is the matter?" And I said, "Barney is in awful poor health; I don't think you would have sentenced him to 60 days in jail if you knew the condition of his health." And he said, "What is the matter with him?" And I said, "He has heart disease." And he said, "Has he?" And I said, "Yes; I am afraid it is going to prove fatal. He has a very nervous wife, Judge, and she might collapse when she hears of this." And he said, "I don't want that." And I said, "I know you don't." He called up the jail and asked for Rice to come to the phone, and he came and he asked him how his heart was, and Barney didn't use very religious language to the judge over the phone; he didn't know he was a judge, but he used some classical French to him, and the judge said, "What is the matter with your heart?" And he said, "There is nothing the matter with my heart, it is that old judge." And he said, "Have you heart disease?" And he said, "No; I have not." And the judge repeated to me what he said and I said, "Judge, that man don't know his heart from his liver; I have been out with him, and I think you had better let him out." He called up the jail doctor, and I told this young man, I asked him if he knew that man and he said that he did; and I said, "You get hold of that doctor and have him examine that fellow's heart, and show that there is a disease of the arteries, and so forth; I want to get the man out." This young fellow did; he was a very close friend of the doctor's, and old Barney got out the next day.

The judge had very many fine qualities, and I have a very kindly feeling toward him, no matter what anybody else might say about him.

We had another judge in the New River country, Judge Keller. He issued an injunction that we should not feed the miners, and food that was bought in Cincinnati by the miners' representatives for the miners was switched down into Kentucky and kept there, and he arrested a lot of our men for violating his injunction. There is no injunction on earth that would keep me from feeding hungry people if I was rich enough to get it, because there is enough in the world for all. I was not arrested; that was the only time that I was ever arrested by the civil authorities in my life. I never was arrested by a policeman or sheriff; I have always had the militia, outside of the one time, to deal with.

Now, then, I am coming to that part of it—the strike of 1902 in West Virginia. There is a very sad, sad story to be told about that. They were pretty peaceful boys down there as a rule, and we kept them in line, and there was one mountain, Standford Mountain, and they had issued this injunction, that men could not look at the mines. That injunction was always issued on me, and the boys went one day to take a walk along the highway and came back and went home peacefully and quietly, interfering with nobody nor anything. They had never been in court in their lives, none of those boys; they were law-abiding, good men, living quietly up there in the mountains. The United States deputy marshal came in the next morning with a warrant for 33 of them. They were holding a meeting in their hall, quietly, and he read the warrant, and some said, "You can't arrest us; we have broken no law; we have hurt nobody; and you will have to leave the town." I think his brother was a company doctor, and they asked him to come, and he did come down and take him away. Anyhow, the next night they went up that mountain, and they shot seven men while they slept. There were about 100 of those gunmen and their deputies and these mine owners and their sons, and they went up that mountain, and while those men slept they shot them; they riddled their little shacks with bullets and wounded 23 as they were sleeping. I was going to a meeting the next morning very early, and I was told what happened, and I went and called a couple of boys and told them that they had had some trouble on Standford Mountain, and let's go up. We went up, and the picture I shall never forget. The mattresses were all seeping with blood, and the bodies were lying there. It was sad, and I shudder at the picture, and the women were screaming, and the babies were running to me to call back their papas. It was a sad, sad picture. I knew those men had violated no law outside of walking on the highway and that supposed injunction. They got a coroner, and he held an inquest over them. A few were arrested, but no one was ever convicted for the crime.

Five or six days after this I went back up that mountain; there was a grave out in the field, and a woman was over it and a little baby, and the little baby, when she saw me she screamed, and she said, "Oh, Mother Jones, come and pick up my papa!" And she was scraping the clay with her little, tender hands, and the wife was watering with her tears. That young man was as law-abiding a young man, I think, as you could find in the country. I don't think he ever thought of such thing, but he was shot while standing up on the mountains.

Now, these men did not realize what they were doing.

I left West Virginia; I was called for to go to Illinois for a meeting there, a memorial meeting over the mutilated bodies of the men that were killed in a battle in Illinois—97—and I was to speak on that day, and I went. On my way back—Secretary Wilson was secretary of the miners—and I stopped off at the office, and he said, "You will have to go right into Colorado at once. The governor has sent the labor commissioner here and a board member to see the board and convince them there that there should not be a strike called." I went into Colorado; I examined the situation; I went around the camps; and the men and women told me their sad stories. I called a meeting of the men that night, the officers, and I related to them that the metal miners were in revolt at that time, on a strike, and so we discussed the matter until morning. I was sent back to Indianapolis. I reported in Indianapolis that the fever was there, and at fever heat. The men were almost wild to come out, and I discussed it with three or four of the officers. So I was sent back immediately to Colorado, and I went back. The governor sent for me when he heard I was down at Trinidad, and he sent for me, and I came up to Denver.

Chairman WALSH. That was when, Mrs. Jones, in 1903?

Mother JONES. In 1903. That was the first strike. The governor sent for me, and I never go to see those officers alone; I generally take some of our officials with me when I go. I know them pretty well. He said, "Are you going to have a strike in the southern coal fields, Mother Jones?" I said, "I don't know, Governor; that is up to you. If you can bring the conflicting parties together, I think we can ward off the strike, and both sides concede." He said, "I don't want a strike." "Neither do I, but we will strike rather than slavery." I said, "I suppose you are very anxious to know, Governor?" And he said, "Yes, I am; why do you think so?" And I said, "I suppose you want to get your militia ready to go out." He said that he had them already in another district in Colorado to open a mine. I was not aware that the State owned the mines. I thought they were private property, belonging to a combination of private individuals, and he said, "So they are, but we have to get the militia after that lawbreaking organization." "Who are you talking about, the Western Federation of Miners?" "Yes." And I said, "It is strange that they have become lawless and lawbreakers since you got in. They have developed this State and have their families here, and I think they would hardly become rioters at once." He said, "I won't discuss it." And I said, "What did you send for me for?" And he said, "I want to know if you are going to have a strike." And I said, "Yes, we are, and you had just as well know it now as any time."

And I went back, and the strike order went out. I went around holding meetings of the men, women, and children. We didn't have as large a tent colony then as afterwards. From the miners themselves there was little violence at that time, but the militia was brought in there. The sheriff came to me Saturday night and said, "Mother Jones, I heard the miners are going to organize and make a raid down on some camp" he told me about, and I said, "Sheriff, you are sheriff of the county, and you ought to know that these miners are not going to do anything of the kind. If they do, I would know it the first one." He said, "The governor has a representative here." "Of course, that is perfectly natural that he would have a representative here, but there is no need of the governor sending any troops here. You and your officers of the law here can take care of this situation. There has been no trouble that amounts to anything, and let me guaranty to you that if there is to be any trouble I will give you the first news. Is there any trouble in the county?" "Not that I know of," he said. And I said, "If there is, you get your buggy right out." It was 11 o'clock at night, but I says, "I will go with you to any part of the county, and I will guaranty to you that if there is any trouble we will stop it immediately." "There is none, Mother," he said. I said, "Very well, why don't you go home and to bed and don't bother about this?"

The militia came on Monday. They gambled all night. The representative of the C. F. & I.—I have forgotten his name—and the sheriff and this militiaman; one of them lost, I heard, $700, but that didn't bother me, because it didn't concern me how much it was; it was among themselves. However, Monday the militia came in, and we didn't know anything about it until I got a telephone message from Denver early in the morning, and they said they are mobilizing the militia here, and I think they are going to Trinidad; you had better watch yourself; and I said, "Let them come," and that afternoon the militia came in, and I told one of our officers that I had just got a telephone from Denver that they were mobilizing the militia, and that he had better see the boys and tell them to keep quiet, and he did, and the militia came. I went out to the camp several days, talking to the women and children, and Saturday evening I came in; I had been out all day. But before that we went out to a meeting, and coming back from that meeting I met a wagon loaded with guns that were going to Bowen, I think, and I said to the party with me, "There has been something doing; if those fellows belong to Bowen, they are the gunmen," and I think the superintendent was with them; I am not certain. But when we came back to Bowen a young woman came out screaming. She said, "Stop, oh, stop," and I said to the party with me, "I guess they are drinking in there; keep away, don't mix in it," and she pleaded and pleaded and pulled and pulled; she was an Italian; and so we finally went in. I went into the house, and old man Farley sat there with his head all tied up, and a young man named Rooney was lying in bed all covered with blood. You could have put your finger down through him. They had been at a meeting and were coming home when those fellows attacked them from ambush and almost beat them to death.

There was not very much violence during that strike until the militia came. Then one Saturday night I was going to bed when a knock came on the door, and I said, "Come in," and the militiaman opened the door and he said, "Come on;" and, of course, I had to go; there was the bayonets, and I said, "Just wait a moment, will you please, until I dress?" And so I went up to the militia headquarters, and the major asked me where I lived, and I told him I lived wherever there was a fight, and so he called the militia, seven of them, and told me to get my things, and I got a few little things I had, and there was such a hurry—there were seven militiamen, two at my back and two at each side and one in front of me—and they took me down the street and put me on the train and went with me to La Junta, Colo., and left me at the depot at La Junta. I had only 5 cents in my pocket. And a railroad man came, and an Associated Press man, and he said, "Are you Mother Jones?" And I said, "Yes," and he said, "I thought so, because I saw the militia going." And I followed the militia when I saw they were leaving me there, and I said, "I want to say to you fellows that there is not money enough in the United States Treasury to hire me to acknowledge I was the mother of one of you." They didn't say anything, and they went away. This Associated Press man and the railroad man came and asked me what I was going to do, and I said I didn't know, I didn't have time to decide. And I found out there was two of our men there, but the railroad man gave me money. They did not go back, but went to Indianapolis. I went back. I had orders not to come back, but no governor owns the State and no President owns the United States, and I happened to be in this country before any of them, and I had a share of stock in there, and I said I was going back the next morning, and I went back the next morning.

Well, I sent the governor a note, which was not a very polite one, either, because when I get worked up I am not a very polite character, Mr. Walsh.

Then I went down to the western slope, and came back after I held two or three meetings. I was going to speak at Glenwood Springs, and a railroad conductor told me that there was a company of militia coming, and I said, "Let them come;" and I held three meetings, and I went then to Helper, Utah. And I went to the hotel at midnight and got a room, and the next morning I got my breakfast and went to the post office in the morning and got my mail, and I saw I was watched; they went to the post office to find out when I got my mail, and I went to an Italian family and got a room in that house, and I took my things over there and didn't see anything more until the next day, when we were going to have a meeting. The next day was Sunday, and the miners all came up. There was a vacant lot in front of the house where I was staying, and the miners all came along and we were going to hold the meeting there, and the company doctor came and said, you know he didn't think it was right to hold the meeting, and the marshal said, "I don't think it is right for you to hold the meeting here, and I don't think you ought to do it." I said, "How far does your jurisdiction extend?" And he told me, and I said, "Well, we will go outside of your jurisdiction." And I took the miners and went 2½ miles down farther. I held the meeting. They had notified the railroad men not to come to my meeting, but the men all came, and I held the meeting and went back and went to my room. Quite a number of the boys came up town again, and I had not been in the room 10 minutes until the company's doctor and the marshal came in and said, "You are quarantined, Mother Jones, for 16 days." I said, "What is the matter?" And they said, "Why, you might have had the smallpox." Well, I said, "Maybe I have, but why don't you quarantine the whole train?" They said, "You know you mingle about a great deal." I never have an argument, because it don't do any good and it causes trouble, and I was afraid the men would get excited, and I said, "Boys, you go on down town." And he came along Monday and put a yellow flag on the door, "Smallpox in here." He brought me some books and magazines, and I put them in the stove, because I thought the poor little stove would do anything for his corporation and I put the books in the stove, and the next day, Tuesday, the secretary for the miners came and he was sitting there and I was discussing things with him what they should do, so along came this doctor, and he said, "My, my, my, didn't I tell you not to let anybody inside that gate?" And I said, "You did not; I am a patient, and if you want to keep anybody outside that gate you put a picket at the gate and keep people out; I am a patient and I am not going to do picket work also." And he took hold of this fellow and he got scared, and I said, "Mike, don't get scared, he is only going to inject something into you; don't get afraid; let him inject it."

And they took me down and I was put in the back of an old store. There was no violence, for these miners were as lawabiding as this audience is; there was not a single one of them doing anything, only just striking. They were singing a little down in their tents. I was in the back of an old store, and on Saturday night I learned that they were coming in Sunday morning and going to arrest all of the boys; so I sent for them and I said, "Have you got any guns?" And they said, "Yes." And I said, "You take them up and bury them under the range," because I thought if the boys that had their guns and those men came in suddenly there would be some trouble; and I said, "Boys, you go and bury your guns and you go back; I am going to stay up all night," and they said "No" and I said "Yes," and to-morrow we will talk things over.

At 4 o'clock in the morning the sheriff and 45 deputies came up. I heard them whooping, and so I put my head out of the window and said, "What is the matter?" The sheriff was the first one, and he said, "We are going to arrest all these fellows." I said, "What have they done?" He said, "They are striking." I said, "They have a right to strike; this Nation was founded on a strike, and they have the right to strike; and we have a right to strike; Washington struck against King George, and we will strike against King Gould." But they took them all; they were not allowed to put on their clothes, and they shook like aspen leaves. They took them up several miles and held them there until night and got a box car and took them down to Price.

After they were gone a woman came to me with her babe, weeping bitterly, and said, "You see my Johnnie?" I said, "Yes," and she said, "Let me tell you, Mother, this baby was born at 11 o'clock at night, and I got up in the morning and got breakfast for 11 men to go into the mines." And she was watering the baby with her tears. "Now," she said, "tell me what to do; they have got my John; they have got my house; we rented a little piece of land from the company, and I took in boarders and I put up a little house on it, and I want to give my children a chance; but now they have got my house, they have my health, and they have got my John, and what will I do?"

Now, I want to say to this commission and to this audience that are listening here, on the quivering heart and the aching breast and blasted hopes of this mother, and of thousands like her, Miss Gould and her class carries on her philanthropy in the Scofield mines, where 400 men were roasted to death; their bones are rotting out there, and their wives and children are carrying on life's struggle as best they can, and, my friends, we can have no civilization until such things are abolished.

That woman with her babe and four children was sad to look at, but she is only one of many thousands I know of in this terrific struggle for industrial freedom. It touches a human cord in most anyone. I brought that up before Mr. Rockefeller when I had the meeting with him. I feel that men in that position do not grasp these things as they are, nor do the people outside, nor do our officials who live in offices, nor do our newspaper men; it takes those who are down with them to see the horrors of this industrial tragedy that is going on in our Nation to-day.

I then resigned from the miners for a while; there was other work I had to do, and I took up the Mexican refugee cases; they were going to shoot and murder the men, and I raised the money to save their lives. And I came back and the boys sent me to Colorado again.

A judge had sent 15 of them to jail, and they were holding a big protest meeting, and I went there. As I said before, judges are human, like everyone else. I went to see my boys and then went to see the sheriff, and I asked the sheriff to let my boys out on the ground every day, and I said that if any of them went away they could arrest me and put me in their place. So the next morning he went up to the jail and let the boys all go out on the ground, and they could stay out until 10 o'clock every night; and then I went to see the judge himself and had a talk with him, and finally the boys got out of jail.

I then came back and was sent into Westmoreland County, where the strike was. There is where I came up with the constabulary—the mounted constabulary.

Commissioner LENNON. Was that the strike of about five years ago, Mother Jones?

Mother JONES. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Of 1910?

Mother JONES. Yes. I went into that Westmoreland strike, and I did not have any conflict with the constabulary. The only time I came against them at all was when 12 or 13 women were arrested one day and carried into a squire's office; and he, poor wretch, you could see he was a narrow creature; and I went with the women, and I told them to take their babes along. I said, "Wherever you go, take the children, they are yours"; and so the women took all their little ones and babes; and when the people gave their evidence about them, which did not amount to anything, the judge said he would fine them $30 apiece. I said to the women, "Tell him you are not going to pay it," and he said, "Then you will get 30 days in jail." I said, "Tell him all right, they will go to jail." And the women asked for some one who could take the babies, and I said, "No; God Almighty gave you the babies, and you keep them until they are taken away from you."

Two of the constabulary went with the women, and the women ran across some scabs on the way and they licked them, and I took care of the babies until they licked the scabs.

On the way to Greensburg the motorman wanted to stop the car, and I said, "You can't stop this car, it is contrary to law; you must obey the law until you get to the station." They said, "These fellows want to get off," and I said, "You won't let us off, and you won't let them off."

Well, the women were singing all the way to Greensburg, and the two constabulary turned them over to the sheriff, and the sheriff said, "Mother Jones, I would rather you had brought me a hundred men than these women"; and I said, "I didn't bring them, the old squire sent them up; you hold him responsible." He said, "I don't know how to manage them"; and I said, "What did you get married for if you can't manage women; these women are peaceable, you can manage them." And they were sent up to the room, and I sent them food, and milk for the babies; and I said to the women, "You sing all night, sing all day if you want to, but sing all night and don't stop for anybody." And they didn't; they sang the whole night, and the people complained about the singing, and the women would not shut up, and the babies would not shut up, and nobody would shut up, and they turned them all out.

And then I went out West to do some work for the Harriman shopmen; and while I was in Butte, Mont., one day I picked up a paper, and it said the Payne Creek Colliery Co. would not settle with the miners again, and renew its contract again. I said, "This means that every sort of organization is to be driven out"; and I said, "I will go into the fight and make it cost that company something before I get through." I telegraphed to San Francisco to cancel the dates with the officers of the shopmen, and took the train and went in. I went down to Payne Creek, and a little boy came running to me and said, "Mother Jones, did you come to stay?" and I said, "Yes; I came to stay." The child was crying, and said, "Mother, do you know what they have done to me and my mamma?" I said, "No"; and he said, "They beat my mamma up, and they beat my little brothers and sisters, and beat me, and if I live to be a man I am going to kill 20 of them for that."

I went up and held a meeting with them and found out—got inside information; and the gunmen were all around, and some of the military in plain clothes in the meeting we had; and I went down the Kanawha River and held a meeting with the miners already organized.

One night two of the miners came to me at about 2 o'clock at night, at Montgomery, and they said, "We have been down to Charleston, and no one will go up Cabin Creek; will you come?" I said, "Yes." For nine years no organizer had dared to go up that creek, and if he did, he came out on a stretcher, or a corpse. The boys said, "They will kill you, Mother"; and I said, "It don't make any difference to me when I get killed; there is a duty to be performed, and I am going." I said, "Is it billed?" And they said, "No"; and I said, "I will attend to that," and the railroad men circulated the bills.

I went up on Tuesday, and the governor heard I was going and sent a company of the militia; and those men came down over those mountains, and their toes were out through their shoes; they walked 12 miles, some of them. They stood there and looked up as much as to say, "Have you brought us any message of hope?" I talked to them with the militia there, and the company's representatives, and I said, "Boys, freedom is not dead," and some poor wretch hollowed, "Where is she?" "She is gently sleeping, and when you call her she will awake." Those men screamed, and they said, "Will you organize us, Mother?" I said, "Yes." They said, "Into what?" I said, "Into the mine workers," and I said, "If you get organized, will you stay organized? I left you all organized 10 years ago when I went away," and they said, "We will, Mother." I took them over by the church; I don't go to church; I am waiting outside for the fellows in the church to come out and fight with me, and then I will go in. Outside of the church I stood up on a bench and organized the men, and I said for everyone to take out their mine clothes in the morning and to take their picks and shovels and dig coal, and I said, "To-morrow you go to work and don't say anything about this meeting." And then I went home. And then they came after me again, and one day I was going to Red Warrior, and I had perhaps 20 men with me. There was not a stick among those men. One old darkey had a battered-up gun, he was carrying along for fun, and up above that tipple there was a machine gun with a company, and the machine gun was turned on the men.

I was in a buggy, and one or two ahead of the crowd, and they turned back; they got scared to death and turned back, and I jumped out of the buggy and ran up, and they said, "For God's sake, Mother, don't go up there," and I beckoned them to step back, and I went up and put my hand on the machine gun, and I said, "Boys, you can't send one bullet out of this gun." One of the men with his lips quivering—he was thirsty for blood—he said, "You take your hands off," and I said, "No; I won't take my hands off, and you won't shoot a bullet out of that gun," and my poor boys were trembling. They were in their shirt sleeves going home.

I was going to hold a meeting up there, and some one said, "What are those fellows up there for? Have they got guns?" I said, "No one has a gun. That old darkey had a battered one that wouldn't shoot a cat; he is just carrying it for fun." One gunman stood behind a tree with his sharpshooter, and I said, "You get out in the open and don't dare shoot a bullet out of that gun; you have yourselves mothers and wives and children probably, and I don't want to hear their groans; and I don't want to hear the groans of the mothers and wives and children of my boys; don't you hurt them." One of them said, "Why don't you stay up on the creek?" And I said, "I have something to do besides staying up on the creek." Then they came down like rats, and the whole army gathered there. I said, "Let us stop that, let my boys pass up to their homes, and let us have peace and not tears," and I shook hands with all of the gunmen. I said, "Let us have peace on this creek; you take care of the mines up there, and the boys won't trouble you."

Chairman WALSH. What year was that?

Mother JONES. That was in 1913. And then I went up soon after that—I was going up to Berwind, and there was a reporter from the Baltimore Sun with me that met me in the depot at Charleston, and he said to me, "Mother Jones, where are you going?" And I said, "I am going up to Cabin Creek." He said, "Can I go with you," and I said, "You certainly can go," and we went and we got off of the train and came down over the tipple; they didn't see us coming down, or they would have stopped us, but when we got by the company's store where there was a pathway, there was a creek, and the C. & O. Railroad here [indicating], and everybody walked on the road, and I started to go up on this side when a fellow hollered at me, "You get down," and the reporter said, "That creek is there; she will get all wet"; he said "I don't care a damn, she ought to be wet; if she wasn't here, there would be no trouble." He said, "You don't mean to say you are going to make her walk in that creek?" And he said, "Yes." No creek or anything else will bluff me; and I was pretty wet up to my hips, and the general manager and superintendent came, and I sat there and my dress was all wet, and I was dripping; and I was talking, and I threw it into them; I gave it to the general manager and everyone else; I don't say anything to the miners that I would not say to them. It is a fight for human freedom and liberty.

I held my meeting, but the road was only that wide [indicating], and if you step a foot east or west it was private property. One miner said to me to come up and get a cup of tea, and they said, "You can't go up." The man was paying rent for his home, but he couldn't give me a cup of tea. And the reporter for the Baltimore American came along, and I didn't get anything to eat or drink or get a chance to dry my clothes until I got to Charleston at 6 o'clock that evening.

I carried the fight on—I knew the boys would—only this is a spectacular age. They have no conception of freedom or justice; until it hits them they don't care. I thought, "I will make a move that will stir the State and draw the attention of the people to this"; and I went out, and at that time I got 3,000 or 4,000 miners and came up to the capitol with a banner which said, "Nero fiddled while Rome burned"; that is what the governor of West Virginia did. And we went into the Statehouse grounds, and I read the document to the governor asking him to do away with the Baldwin guards; that this Nation was not founded to be governed by gunmen; and I read the document on the steps of the statehouse to about 5,000 people. The governor was at my right, and I said that if the Government would not do business that we would by 8 o'clock to-morrow night. So we sent the document in, and the governor still remained there, and they said, "We will wait, Mother, for him to answer"; and I said, "No; you go back."

Chairman WALSH. That was still in the strike of 1913?

Mother JONES. Yes. So I said to the crowd, "This governor is not going to do anything for you." Some one said, "Why?" I said, "Because the biggest political crook that ever cursed a nation elected him—Senator Elkins," and when he says "Bark," he does it.

I talked for an hour and a half, and there is an inscription on the steps of the capitol that mountaineers are always free, and I called attention to that inscription and I said, "Now, I want to state right here to this audience that we are going to make that good or we will tear up the inscription," and the governor stood there; and so when the meeting was over I went away. I was tired and worn out, for I had been preparing for that for some days; and some one got up and began to blow off a lot of locomotive hot air, and the boys came up to me to stop it, and I took him by the shoulder and told him to get down, and I got up and said, "This meeting stands adjourned until I need you again. And I want you to stay away from the saloons and save your money, because you will need it." Somebody in the audience hollowed, "Well, what will we do with it, Mother?" "Buy a gun," said I; and they bought the guns; they went to every store in town and bought the guns and put them on their shoulders and went off with them.

Well, I went to Washington to see if I could get an investigation, because I believe the longer those things go the more bitter both sides get; and I worked here for a day or two and came back, and the Bull Moose charged again up in Paint Creek in the night and shot the women and shot the men and shot their legs off, and so on the 15th, I think it was, there was a great deal of excitement down in Hansford, and I went down to see what the trouble was, and came back. Well, that night the militia came and arrested a lot of our men—over 200 of them—and I heard the boys on the Kanawha side of the river was lining up to protest against the arrests, and I was afraid there was going to be some trouble. I took the train and went down, and the boys was all at the station and each group began to catch me and said, "Come with me, Mother." "Where have you been," said I. "We have been holding a meeting." And so I went down to Boomer with them; and the conductor held the train, because they were appealing to me. And I went out and held the meeting that night, and I says, "Now, everybody goes home and to-morrow at 10 o'clock come up to Longacre, and there we will discuss it." And so to-morrow at 10 o'clock I was there, and the whole mob got there, and I talked with them, and I says, "Now, boys, you go, each union, and you elect a sober, good, clear-headed man. I want to take him up to the governor, so as to have a talk with the governor to stop arresting our men until we find out what they are being arrested for." Military arrested them. So they did come, and I took them into the church and instructed them what to do and what to say to the governor, and I paid their fare, because they didn't come in the meeting with any money, and I paid their fare up; and when we got up and got off the train—now, I suppose there were 500 persons can swear to my side of it, and how I got that committee and took them up to take them to the governor peacefully and quietly, because these men were getting enraged—there were a good many foreigners among them.

I knew if I kept them quiet for a day or two that they would cool off and nothing would happen until we would straighten things out. So I was arrested as soon as I got off the train and thrown into an automobile and carried down to the Robber's Roost, a hotel near the bridge, which I call the Robber's Roost, because the pirates used always to put up there. So there was no warrant that I saw, and so I was taken to the C. & O. train and put on the C. & O. train and carried down and handed over to the military 25 miles from where I was arrested.

And I was handed over to the military while the civil court was open. Well, I was held there for three months, and they established a drumhead court and the court appointed two lawyers, and they came to see me, and they said that the court appointed them to defend me. I said, "Gentlemen, personally I have nothing in the world against you; but there is no lawyer in the United States that will defend me in that court." Well, some civilian lawyers came down, and they wanted to defend me—not to cost anything, and I said, "No, sir; there is no lawyer will ever go into that court to defend me." And so we were taken into court. I think we were five days there and some nights until 11 o'clock at night. There were about 30 of the men that consented to take a lawyer, but there were six or seven of us that would not have a lawyer to defend us, and we were sent over to the bull pen and the boys were held in their bull pen and I was held in mine, and we saw the military on each side of the bull pen day and night watching. And it was great fun for me. I used to see the poor kids dressed up in that uniform, and I wondered what their mothers thought of them; and I used to feel sorry for them, and I used to give them an apple once in a while. There was a break in the floor and they used to send things up to me out of the cellar; and I felt sorry for them because they were carrying guns to shoot people, and I used to give them an apple; and several nights the Bull Moose came down——

Commissioner LENNON (interrupting). Explain what the "Bull Moose" means.

Mother JONES. The "Bull Moose?" The train the military used. And they came down several nights; and a party in it wanted me to go to Ohio; said my health would break down there. "Well, let it break. I have only one death to meet. I am going to Ohio." Well, the attorney general, I think it was, that came down, and I said to the attorney general, "Now, I want to make a statement right here. This thing has got to end. I want to tell the governor of the State that he can chain me to that tree outside there and he can get his dogs of war to riddle this body with bullets, but I will not surrender my constitutional rights to him. I happen to be one of the women who tramped the highways where the blood of the revolutionists watered it that I might have a trial by jury. The civil courts are open, and I demand that the law be enforced." And so I did not; we were tried, anyhow. We were kept in that bull pen, but I would not surrender.

And one day these boys were taken away from there, and I listened to their babies screaming on the depot when they were taken. I did not know where they were going. I was the lone person in that jail—in that military prison—for five weeks. The others were all taken away; they carried them to Clarksburg, but I was the lone person there, and the editor of the San Francisco Bulletin sent his wife across the continent to find out what was happening to me, and she came up there and got hold of the whole information, and she went up to the United States Senate and saw Senator Kern, and went to Collier's Weekly; the other magazines would not publish it, but Collier's did after it was tamed down. And she saw Senator Kern and it was discussed on the floor of the Senate, and some one going by threw a Cincinnati Post in and I picked it up and the first thing that attracted my attention was, "Wall Street telephoned Senator Kern to withdraw that resolution and they would make it an object for him." And it said that they did not telegraph nor send anyone nor write. They took the quickest way of reaching him. "Heavens," said I. "Those officials will never understand what that means to the industrial world." And I had no writing material, but there was a book there, and I thought I would send a note to Senator Kern; and then I thought "Well, he won't pay any attention to that. They are tired of those things." And I got a telegram blank and made up a telegram, and this is about what it stated:

"Senator KERN, Washington, D. C.:

"From out the military prison at Plat, W. Va., I send to you the groans and heartbreaks and tears of men, women, and children, as I have heard them in this State, pleading with you in their behalf for the honor of the nation to push that investigation, and children yet unborn will rise and call you blessed."

And I had two bottles and I rang them together, and a fellow came down in the cellar, and he came, and I says, "You take that up as quick as you can to that telegraph office. Don't go to this one here, but go 3 miles up the road, and tell him to send that telegram to Washington for me"; and the fellow says, "This is fine stuff; tell Mother Jones it will be in Washington before you get home." And so I slept good that night, when I knew that telegram had gone to Washington, and I had bluffed the gang in Wall Street for once; and I had a good sleep. And the thing came up in the Senate, and old Judge Goff—he is not a bad fellow at all, but he has been dead for 40 years and doesn't know it. The old judge had a telegram from the governor stating that I was not at all incarcerated; that I was in a very pleasant boarding house; and he went on about outside agitators, and who they were and what they were. Well, this Nation was founded on agitation. The chattel slavery was abolished through agitation, and God grant the agitation keeps up until the last chain of slavery is broken. And he said, "That is old Mother Jones, and I want to tell you that if you listen to her as I did you will find out she will convince you." But I never convinced him; but he should never have been in the United States Senate at all. The old fellow was not a bad fellow, but he is dead and the world has run beyond him. Senator Kern pulled out his telegram and read, and the Senators in Washington told me that in 50 years nothing had ever struck the Senate like that telegram. I says, "Well, thank God, something struck them; they needed a cyclone once in a while, and if the telegram stirred them up, so much the better." Then—I hope I am not tiring you, but there is a great deal of history connected with this, Mr. Walsh.

Chairman WALSH. Just go ahead. A little matter came up which I had to answer.

Mother JONES. So the governor sent for me the next day, and I was taken up to Charleston, and he told me that I could go to the hotel and he would see me to-morrow. Well, he did not see me to-morrow, or the next day, either; but I went up to Washington then and saw Senator Kern in the United States Senate, and I worked until we got an investigation. And now I want to show before I close this West Virginia affair—I came down that creek one day—that Cabin Creek—and when I got down to the foot of the creek there was a miner, a colored fellow, and they were hammering him—the colored fellow. I watched them; it was on the platform. They rushed into the station, and the whole mob went in, and I went in to see what was the matter, and when I went in there they had him up in the corner, and this poor fellow was hollering, and I felt sorry for him, and I went over and I pushed the whole mob away, and I says, "You come here." "Oh, Mother," he says, "you take me." I says, "What did you do?" He says, "I was after scabs," he says, "over in North Carolina." "Well, you deserved all you got; but I don't want your mother crying. Now, come out here, and I want you to go down to the C. & O. Come on and get out." Now, the military, in plain clothes, were in that depot, and they never interfered; so I took the fellow out and took care of him and took him away from the crowd, and the crowd dispersed, and I put him on the train, and I says to the conductor, "Here is money for that fellow's fare; take him away." So he did.

Now, this man, Nance, was going by on the platform, and a military officer in plain clothes went to arrest this Italian, and Nance says to him, "You can't arrest him," and he says, "Well, I am going to." "Well, you can't without a warrant." He says, "You get a warrant. I have no more respect for you than I have for a Baldwin thug." So Nance went away. Now, he came back 10 days after that, and he was arrested by the military and tried in court, and got five years in the penitentiary; and that is all there was to that, because I was there, and I was the one that broke the thing up before it ended; and that was the only crime—the only charge—and they held a drumhead court and sentenced that man to five years in Moundville.

Well, another day I came down, and here was a railroad man and another one of the Baldwin train men, and the man says, "Don't go up the creek; they are on a strike," to some scabs. So he says—this fellow says—"You can't stop him," and he says, "Well, I am going to," he says. "They are going to take the bread out of my brother's mouth"; and they were in a squabble, and I walked up to see what it was about. Now, there was a militiaman there in plain clothes, and I went up and I took hold of this man and I says, "That train man is right; he was put there to do his duty, so let him do it, and you come with me," and I took him away. Now, that man was arrested, and he got two years in Moundville, and that was all there was to that; I want to say to this commission, I can go before the world and swear to it if I were dying the next moment. That was the sum total of the crimes, and he was put two years in Moundville.

There were 15 men for similar reasons put into Moundville for from 1 to 7 or 10 years, I think; and so I concluded now we will make a job of this; these men are not guilty of any crime. And I started out and borrowed the money, and billed meetings, and came to Washington, and I had a large gathering in the armory that night in Washington, and we put the matter up; and the next morning the door of the penitentiary opened, and they signed their names, and every single one of them was let loose. They went up to Wheeling, and nobody knew but the administration that they were freed. After the meeting was held in Washington, and Congressmen and Senators were at that meeting, and when the matter was put up to them there the doors of the prison opened, and they were turned loose. Now, if that is law, I think there is something wrong.

Now, I am coming back to the Colorado situation, and that will wind up. I don't know how long it is going to wind up. But after I was turned loose in Charleston by the governor—now, mind, I was not taken into any civil court nor no charges brought against me, only one, and it was the stealing of a machine gun. Well, I don't know what I did with it, whether I hid it or what I did with it; but I was accused of stealing a machine gun. However, the machine gun was lost; that is true. It was an $1,800 machine gun, but I didn't steal it; I didn't happen to be around at that time. But I want to show you the rottenness of the thing; and then you wonder that men rebel, and won't work.

I went to Texas to speak on Labor Day. The general manager invited me as their guest—him and his wife both. I declined to go for this reason—that I never do go to persons in that position. I may have to fight them, and it would not be a very pleasant thing after I had taken their hospitality; and so I declined to go, and I said to the boys, "I prefer to go to a hotel." And we held a Labor Day meeting there, and I left that day and took the train and came into Trinidad, and when I left the train the boys met me at the depot, and they said, "We are going to have a convention here." I did not know they were going to, because I was on the go all the time. "What for?" I said. The boys were all up in the air; they wanted to strike. "Well, can't you settle it without?" I said. "Well, we are going to try." So they sent propositions after propositions I learned, and the convention came and the strike was called. Now, I don't know whether you gentlemen in Colorado read the statements at that convention, but they were very deplorable and very condemnatory to the employers without a doubt; and so the sad story of these boys appealed to me. The papers, because they all represented the C. F. & I., they had to write as they were dictated to, and they charged my speech up with calling the strike. Well, I don't care for that; I don't care what charges they make against me. So the strike came, and the tent colony was established. The day of the strike came on the 25th, I think it was, of September, 1913.

I went out to the colony because it was rainy and drizzly, and I wanted to see that the little children were cared for, if there were any there; and I went to carry some clothing to them. In that 14 miles between Trinidad and the tent colony I met 28 wagons; mothers with babies in their arms were walking. It was a cold, drizzling rain. I want to say to this commission that it was the earthly belongings of those people, it was their earthly savings that were in those wagons. There is not a second-hand man in the United States that would have given $30 for the contents of the 28 wagons, yet it was all those people had. When I came to the tents, the mattresses were wet, and I said to the women, "You didn't sleep there all night?" "Yes; and the baby slept, too." And an Italian said—I said, "Joe, where did you sleep?" And he says, "Out on the ground." "Why, it was raining and the ground was wet." "Sure, mother," he said, "but I no like the company; like better than sleep in company house." Now, this was the sentiment, and nobody can understand this unless they live with those people. I know their lives, and it was on the blood of those people that we carry on our charity institutions and everything else. And that tent colony went on, and we fed them, and then the scabs were coming—there was a convention called in Denver—and I like to put fellows up against it sometimes; and that convention was not a miners' convention; it was the State convention of the Federation of Labor. And we had an old man, that I had brought in from the camps, that they made him dig his own grave—the military did. They made him dig his own grave, and they stood over it telling him to dig 2 feet more. He was going to the post office, and they would not let him go. And he says, as he dug the grave, "Let me kiss my wife and babies." "Dig that grave; go on." That was the reply. So he dug the grave. So when this convention took place, I says, "Bring him in; let him tell it on the platform here." And so I had him put on the platform. And I got up, and I asked the convention to rise as a unit and to go up to the Statehouse and demand of that governor where he stood—whether for the honor of the State and the uplift of her children or for the interest of 26 Broadway, and make him tell it right there, because he won't have time to organize his machine, and he would have to tell the truth.

I had a number of mothers, also, with their babies, to put them up to him, and ask him if they were going to deprive those babies—we had star orators, but star orators they say never get frightened, but they do get scared when they get up against it. Those people are not going to hurt anybody; they were merely going after information that they had a right to get from the governor. The next day the governor had time for his machinery to get to work, and he had two secret-service men walking into the capital with him, and any time that I have to have a secret-service man escorting me I will get down and out. If my own actions and honor don't protect me I won't ask any sleuth to do so.

Well, then, the scabbers were coming in from Mexico; I had been to Mexico a few years before that, down to see Madero and De la Barra and other men; and I was going to El Paso to stop the scabs coming in, and I went down. I was there a week and held some meetings, and I wanted to see the revolutionists and have a talk with them. The morning I came back was the 4th of January, 1914. When I got off of the train here was the bunch. I got off of the Santa Fe. They ran and said, "Here she comes," and I looked around. "Take her back." I said, "What is the matter?" "We have got you." "Here I am, take me, I am going to Denver." "Get on that train." "I am not going on that train." "Get in here and get your ticket." "They don't sell the C. & S. tickets in that office." He went and asked the telephone, and they said there would not be a train for an hour and a quarter yet, so I was put in an automobile and taken to the Columbia Hotel, and I was taken to a room. On the way to the room I said that I had not had any breakfast; I would like to have some breakfast. They said, "Take her in to breakfast," and I asked the captain who was escorting me, I said, "Who is going to pay for this?" And he said, "The State will pay for it." And I said, "All right, if the State pays for it I will get a good breakfast." I don't often have an opportunity to do that, but the State was paying for it and I got a good breakfast. I was taken to the room, and a half a dozen were there to take care of me. The train came and the automobile came, and with three bayonets, one at my back and one at my left, and this fellow that had arrested me was at my right, and there were two others in front. When I got to the depot there were the cavalry and the infantry and the gunmen after one old woman 80 years old. I said, "You are awful brave fellows, your mothers ought to put you in a nursery and give you a nursing bottle for 10 years."

I got on the train and the captain came along and said that he was going to Denver. I told him I was glad to have him. He came along and said, "Don't come back," and I said, "If I don't feel like it, I won't," and so I went on into Denver. While I was here in Washington I picked up a paper and saw where the governor would have me arrested if I came back, and I won't let any governor run a State that I have an interest in; I have one share of stock, and so I went back, and he put two detectives in the hotel to watch me. He put one at the gate watching the trains, and I thought that I would fix him right there, and I would let the world see that you are not such a wonderful governor after all. The militia was there, and a man, I think he called himself a humane man, I don't know whether he was taking care of dogs or human beings, but he came up Sunday and said, "Are you going down to Trinidad, Mother?" And I said, "Yes." And he said, "When?" And I said, "The last of the week." And he said, "I want to know because I want to go on the train with you." I told him I would be glad to have him, I knew he was a Baldwin rat, and I wanted to go along. He said, "Where are you going this afternoon?" And I said, "Trade and labor." And he said, "May I go with you?" And he escorted me up the street so no one would hurt me, and I said, "I told the boys that the governor said I could not go to Trinidad, but that he didn't own it; I had a share of stock in it, but that I was not going until the last of the week; that I had some matters coming from Washington." I went to my room, and the fellow went home contented; he said there were two other fellows in a house across the street in a room watching me.

I had my sleeper all bought on Saturday, and I got into the sleeper and went to sleep, and when the train pulled out I was asleep, and I told the conductor when he got there to stop the train before it got to the depot. He held up the train, and I got down and walked up the street and into the hotel and sent out and got my breakfast, and was in the hotel three hours before they found out I was there. I sent for the boys, and they came up and I said to the boys that they were liable to arrest me, but don't you fellows make any fuss or move; just let them arrest me; don't say a word and make a move, and keep the boys all quiet and off of the streets, because you can not do that, because the curiosity of an animal is aroused whenever anything is going on. So I had my breakfast, and presently along came the troopers—tramp, tramp, tramp—after three hours. The governor had telephoned and telegraphed, "Arrest her at once," and the general said, "Get her," so they did. I said, "You come after me," and they said, "Yes." I said, "Wait until I get my few duds." I got into an automobile, with a bunch of guns and bayonets behind me and in front, and the poor fellow that was running the automobile was scared to death, but I told him to keep that machine going straight, that they wouldn't hurt him. There was 150 cavalry, 150 infantry, 150 horses with their heads poked at me, 150 gunmen of the Standard Oil Co., and the old woman, and I shook my hands to the boys good-by. I was taken to the hospital and put in a room, and I was kept there for nine weeks and didn't see a human being except Attorney Hawkins. But there was a thing that they called a colonel that came along once in a while that wanted me to go to Denver. But I said, "No; I will stay here." He would come strutting about every now and then, and there were a lot of poor boys there. They had stationed three of the militiamen—three on the outside of the door and two in that room and one outside of the window. I couldn't eat. I didn't have much appetite locked up in a room, and so I gave my food to the militia boys. They are good boys when you get at them right, and I gave my fruit to them to eat and got on the right side of those fellows, and they told me they had not gotten any money for several weeks, and I said, "I have five or six dollars. I will give it to you boys, and you can go to the show to-night." I gave it to them, and they went, and I got them with me, and they said, "I will tell you, Mother, we will never take up a gun again to shoot a worker," and I said, "That is what you should have done before."

Chairman WALSH. At this point, Mother Jones, we will stand adjourned until to-morrow morning.

Mother JONES. I have a good deal to tell you yet, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. All right.

(Whereupon, the hour for adjournment having arrived, the commission here adjourned until Friday, May 14, 1915, at 10 a. m.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., Friday, May 14, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners Garretson, Weinstock, Lennon, O'Connell, Aishton, and Harriman.

Chairman WALSH. Call Mrs. Jones, please.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. MARY JONES—Recalled.

Chairman WALSH. I think last night when we adjourned, Mrs. Jones, you had just detailed your arrest in Colorado, and if you would, please, I wish you would continue and put in the whole Colorado incident down to the end, so far as it has to do with you.

Mother JONES. I think I closed about where I was arrested.

Chairman WALSH. You were arrested at Trinidad?

Mother JONES. And taken to the Sisters of Mercy Hospital. They turned it into a prison, a portion of it, and I was incarcerated there with three military men, one in front of the door, and one at each side of the door, and one outside of the window, and the whole military camp across the way from the hospital, and then the headquarters of the military was in the next room to me. And I didn't see anyone for the nine weeks that I was incarcerated there but my attorney—

Chairman WALSH. That was Mr. Hawkins, I believe?

Mother JONES. Mr. Hawkins and Mr. Clark, who represented him. He came once to see me to get me to sign some documents for writ of habeas corpus, and Maj. Boughton came with him; and I made some remarks with regard to they wouldn't get the writ of habeas corpus granted from the judge there. I knew very well they would not, because he represented the interests there, and I did not want our people to spend any money, because they had none to spend. So, however, they applied for the habeas corpus and it was not granted.

The superioress came and told me—I think the colonel got her to do so, thinking I would succumb and surrender—that it was turned down. I said, "All right," and she says, "You ought to go to Denver." "I will go when I get ready; when my hands are free. I don't need any instructions or advice on that at all." And so she went away and I was kept there; I never got any mail, not a newspaper or a postal card or a single thing for nine long weeks that I was alone in that room. But the colonel used to come every once in a while to see me to see if I was getting ready to surrender, and I said, "Colonel, I will not surrender," or "captain." He says, "I am not a captain; you are pulling me down." I says, "What are you?" He says, "A colonel." He was a strutting jack to tell me what his title was, and so on. I says, "All right, sir." And so he went away and didn't come back for a day or two. And I never saw Gen. Chase at all until the morning I was taken to Denver, at the close of the nine weeks, when they were going into the supreme court in Denver for writ of habeas corpus. He came to me on Sunday and he said, "Would you go up and see the governor if he wishes to see you?" I waited a moment and I said, "Well, yes; I will go up and see the governor if he wishes to see me. While I have no respect for the governor personally, I have a great deal for the office he holds, and out of respect I hold for the office he holds I shall comply with his request." And so that is all I heard of it. And he came that evening eight minutes before the Santa Fe train was to go out, in an automobile, and said, "Are you ready?" "Why," I said, "No; I am just getting ready to retire." He says, "Get ready; they are going in eight minutes." He said, "Jump, jump, jump." Well, I had a little valise there, and I got it and I handed it out to the guard at the door to put the straps on it, and he took the valise and threw it out in the automobile, and they locked the guard up in his room and cleared the whole hall, and so I was taken down the back way—not the front way at all, but the back way—and was put into an automobile in the dark.

The automobile ran away. I had the fellow that was running it—he was running it down by the C. & S. road—to make a short cut to the Santa Fe; and he made him go around some dark alleys. I want to say, Mr. Walsh, it was the first time in my life that I made up my mind I was going to die; I concluded that they were going to kill me, and I was preparing to make a fight before I left. However, after a while we struck the Santa Fe train, pulled away, out entirely away from the depot. That was switched away from the depot, and I was put on. I got a little relief when I was up in the Pullman, and so I went to bed. There were two of the military officers there, this man colonel that used to come all of the time, and another one, a doctor, and we went into Denver. In the morning the general met me at the train. He introduced me to the general, and I didn't catch his first name, and I said to the colonel, "Who is that?" (he was in his civilian clothes), and he said, "It is Gen. Chase." "Oh," I said, "that is Gen. Chase?" "Yes. We will go to the Adams Hotel." "General, if you would, concede to me the right to go to the Oxford; I have been going there for years and know them all, and I don't care to go to the Adams." It was rather aristocratic and was out of my line, and I didn't care to go there, and so we went to the Oxford, and he said, "We will come after you at 9 o'clock to go to the governor." "I think you had better put it off until 10; I want Mr.

Hawkins to go with me," and he said, "You don't need him; the governor will treat you courteous," and I said, "That is not the question involved; I want my attorney to go with me to the governor, and I won't go unless he says go," and he said "All right."

They went away and left me, and I immediately went to the phone and called Mr. Hawkins, and Mr. Hawkins was not yet out of bed, and he said, "Is this you, Mother?" and I said, "Yes; they brought me in, but I don't know what they are going to do with me." And he said, "Who is with you?" and I said, "Nobody." "What did they say?" he said. I said, "They said they were coming after me at 9 o'clock, but I got them to postpone it until 10 o'clock." Mr. Hawkins came down, and Mr. Lawson with him, and I told him the whole story, and he said, "They have kidnapped you, Mother." I said, "I don't know what they have done." But he called the Adams Hotel and asked Gen. Chase what they had done with me, and he said, "She is turned loose; she is free." But we went to see the governor. He says, "I didn't send for you." And I said, "Your colonel said you did. Somebody must be telling something that is untrue, either you or him." Mr. Hawkins and he talked for a long time, and Mr. Lawson.

I said, "Governor, I will tell you something; you don't own this State, nor you don't own Trinidad. I have broken no law; I have never in my life been in a police court or district court, and I am going back to Trinidad." He said, "If anybody told me it was not the thing to do, I would not do it." "If Washington took that advice we would be under King George the Third; if Lincoln took it, Grant never would have gone to Gettysburg." I didn't tell him just when I was going, but some newspaper men came around and wrote the matter up. I stayed at the hotel for a few days, and I said to Mr. Hawkins, "I have no use for a despot in this country; it was not founded on despotism; and I am going back to Trinidad." And he said, "Do you feel able to, Mother?" And I said, "Yes; I feel able to." "Very well," said he; "when you get ready, you can go back."

I openly got my ticket and went to the train and into the sleeper, and Reno, the C. & F. detective was right across the berth from me. My ticket was registered for Trinidad, and my sleeper also. When I got to Walsenberg, before I got in there the military man called me. I let on I knew it was the military, but I didn't undress at all that night, and he said, "You have to get up." I said, "No; I am going to Trinidad." "But we want you." "Who are you?" "Oh, I am the military," he said. "Oh," I said, "all right; I will be with you." I got up and went into the dressing room and combed my hair back and came back. I was taken off of the train by the militia, and the train crew got a little excited; the engineer jumped down and came back and shook hands with me, and the conductor, and I said, "Boys, keep quiet; let this go." We started off with the military, Mr. Brown, an organizer of the United Mine Workers, who happened to be with me on that train. I said to this young fellow, "Where are you going to take me?" He said, "To jail." I said, "Where is the jail?" "In the cellar under the courthouse." I said, "All right. Is there a fireplace in it or a chimney there?" And he said, "I don't know; do you want a fire?" "I am not so particular about the fire, as having the chimney." And he said, "What do you want the chimney for, and not the fire?" And I said, "I will tell you about that; I have a pigeon that I have trained, and it goes to Washington, and there is a new wireless invention around its neck, and every week he comes back from Washington, gets on top of the chimney and unwinds that message and sends it down to me." He said, "Did he come when you were at the hospital?" And I said, "Yes; he came every week." And he said, "They never found it out?" I said, "No; I am telling you that now." Imagine an educated woman that raised a thing like that; imagine a State that put a belt full of bullets around his stomach; imagine the Nation that stands for such insults to the intelligence of the people. And so I was put in the cellar.

It was cold, it was a horrible place, and they thought it would sicken me, but I concluded to stay in that cellar and fight them out. I had sewer rats that long every night to fight, and all I had was a beer bottle; I would get one rat, and another would run across the cellar at me. I fought the rats inside and out just alike. I was there 26 days, but one thing I have to say, the colonel that had charge of that, Col. Berdiker, came to me that morning and said, "Mother, I have never been placed in a position as painful as this; won't you go to Denver?" I said, "No, Colonel, I will not." He said—my breakfast came in, two spoonful of black coffee and some dry bread, and he said, "Don't eat that breakfast; I will send you some." He sent me my meals all the time I was there; at least, he got the miners to do it. He was very kind and did everything in the world that his officers would let him do; he had to obey orders, of course, but he was a man in every sense of the word. So I was there 26 days, and during the 26 days I never slept a night; I used to sleep some daytime. At the end of the 26 days the habeas corpus—the Supreme Court had notified the militia to deliver me in person to the Supreme Court, and they had to turn the militia loose before they could deliver me; before they could turn me loose. And so one morning the colonel said, "Mother, I have some good news for you; I don't know that you will consider it good news, but the general has just telephoned to me that you are free." I said, "No; I don't consider that good news; I consider it a very dirty, contemptible way of doing business, Colonel; it is not the method I admire at all in a person in the general's position." He said, "You can have transportation wherever you wish to go," and I said, "You tell the general I never have taken any favor from the enemies of my class and I shall accept none from him; I shall transport myself wherever I wish to go, and if I don't have the money to do so, I will walk." And so the colonel shook hands and went away, and the boys came and got my valise and I went to Denver.

Then my attorney knew, of course, the habeas corpus business was turned over, and they sent me to Washington, to Congress.

Now, I do not want to take up the time of the commission, because you are worn out, and there are a great many, many things said here that have no bearing whatever upon the discontent and unrest of the Nation, and if the commission will just bear with me for a moment or two I shall read this. This is the Pennsylvania strike, and I shall turn this over to the commission. This is simply an outline of it. I shall get through just as quickly as I can, Mr. Walsh. [Reads:]

"There is gradually creeping into the decisions of the courts a most dangerous doctrine to liberty, and that is that the militia, under the orders of a governor, may deprive people of their liberty at the will and pleasure of the governor. Such a doctrine has not existed in England for hundreds of years, and it was not supposed to have any foundation in law in the United States until within very recent years. In my judgment, this attempt on the part of some of the courts to sanction deprivations of liberty, if not checked, threatens not only the liberty of all the citizens but threatens the very existence of government itself. It is being recently held in a number of courts that where a strike exists the governor has power to imprison the strikers at his pleasure. We all know that the courts of the country would not stand for any such doctrine if a governor sought to imprison bankers, lawyers, clergymen, doctors, and merchants, and if the courts are going to hold that strikers can be imprisoned without any charge against them, when we know that the courts would not hold the same thing as to bankers, lawyers, clergymen, doctors, and merchants, there is the greatest danger of working people refusing to submit to such a government.

"Magna Charta, that great charter of human liberty, which was adopted in 1215, was a protest against military encroachment. The king, with his soldiers, had imprisoned people to such an extent that it was necessary to declare in Magna Charta that no freeman should be seized or imprisoned or condemned or committed to prison except by the laws of the land.

In the fourteenth century, during the reign of Edward III, Parliament, for the still greater protection of the rights of our English forefathers, provided that the king should have no power to seize the citizen, and that no citizen could be arrested except by indictment or presentment in court.

"Charles I attempted to deprive the people of England of this right, but he paid for it with his head. King George III attempted to force a condition of military rule on the American Colonies, and in 1774 Benjamin Franklin went to Great Britain and entered a protest in the name of the American people. The prime minister laughed in his face, and Lexington, Concord, and Bunker Hill was the answer to that laughter.

"American history affords but four attempts to set aside the writ of habeas corpus and trial by jury, prior to 1899, and each case met with a severe rebuke from the law courts north and south alike.

"Citing these cases as they appear in historical record, the first attempt was made in 1815 when Andrew Jackson, puffed up with military pride, declared himself the military despot of New Orleans. He arrested and imprisoned an editor, and refused to obey the writ of habeas corpus. The courts of Louisiana arrested Gen. Jackson and forced him to pay a fine of $1,000.

"In 1861 President Lincoln undertook to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, but the courts all over the North with great unanimity declared that President Lincoln could not exercise such despotic power. At the same time in the Southern States the military power was making the same claims as to their power that Mr. Lincoln was making in the North, but with clarion voice the courts of the South declared the same as did the courts of the North, that the military commanders had no such power.

"The most conspicuous case in all American history is known as the Milligan case. In Indiana, about the close of the war, a military commission seized a civilian by the name of Milligan and condemned him to death because he sympathized with the South, and the President of the United States approved the death sentence, but the Supreme Court of the United States promptly held that no civilian, where the courts were open, could be tried or condemned by a military commission.

"For 34 years after this no attempt was made to claim that a writ of habeas corpus did not have full force and effect in America; but in 1899 there was again a series of decisions against striking workmen, which decisions exalt the militia above the civil authorities, and which decisions, in my judgment, if not checked, will result in the destruction, not only of liberty, but of government itself. The Idaho Supreme Court held in the case of Boyle, a striking miner, that the court would not inquire into the cause of his detention, but would allow the governor and his soldiers to work their will. The opinion states no authorities, and in no way attempts to review glorious decisions delivered in favor of liberty which had been rendered for over 100 years. The court simply refused the miner his release. This was followed by a somewhat similar decision in Pennsylvania in 1902, known as the Shortall case. Then came the Moyer decision in Colorado in 1904, where it was held by a divided court that the governor could hold Mr. Moyer in jail at his pleasure. Then came the West Virginia decisions of 1912, in which the West Virginia court held that strikers could be tried and sent to the penitentiary by military commission, and were sent to the penitentiary for terms ranging from 2½ to 7½ years.

"A perusal of the details of these cases just cited from 1899 to 1914 shows an ever-increasing encroachment with each succeeding case upon the civil rights and liberties of the people by the military power. In 1899 the writ of habeas corpus was first suspended in a case growing out of labor disputes; in 1904 it was no longer considered an offense by the Supreme Court of the United States for the governor of a State, acting as the commander in chief of the military forces, to imprison civilians and hold them indefinitely; in 1912 in West Virginia we find the encroachment extending still farther. Here a definite "war zone" was established and proclaimed to be such by a declaration of martial law, yet the military power went outside of that prescribed "war zone," and placed under arrest civilians under warrants made out and returnable to the civil courts, and tried them before the military commission. That this commission may not overlook the significance of this issue, I here quote this military edict issued by the governor of the State of West Virginia in full:

STATE CAPITOL, Charleston, November 16, 1912.

"GENERAL ORDERS, NO. 23.

"The following is published for the guidance of the military commission, organized under General Orders No. 22, of this office, dated November 16, 1912:

"1. The military commission is substituted for the criminal courts of the district covered by the martial-law proclamation, and all offenses against the civil laws as they existed prior to the proclamation of November 15, 1912, shall be regarded as offenses under the military law and as a punishment therefor, the military commission can impose such sentences either lighter or heavier than those imposed under the civil law, as in their judgment the offender may merit.

"2. Cognizances of offenses against the civil law as they existed prior to November 5, 1912, committed prior to the declaration of martial law and unpunished, will be taken by military commission.

"3. Persons sentenced to imprisonment will be confined in the penitentiary at Moundsville, W. Va.

"By command of the governor.

"C. D. ELLIOTT,
"Adjutant General.

"Passing from West Virginia in 1912 to Colorado in 1913 we see the military despot still advancing. Here the militia comes onto the scene without even the excuse of a declaration of martial law, the civil courts are set aside, men and women are placed under arrest promiscuously and held indefinitely and incommunicado.

"This militia, acting under orders from its commander in chief, has committed the most barbaric of crimes culminating in the destruction of the tent colony of Ludlow, the only home these poor wretches could ever boast of, and the massacre of the men, women, and children on April 20, 1914.

"The perpetrators of these fiendish crimes were tried by a court-martial presided over by the very men who gave the orders to shoot down the citizens, and notwithstanding that these militiamen charged with the crime, confessed as to their individual acts, and in fact proudly boasted that they broke their rifles over the heads of their defenseless prisoners, yet they were exonerated by this military commission and given a clean bill of citizenship.

"Contrast this case with the case of John R. Lawson; Mr. Lawson is the international board member of the United Mine Workers of America and a citizen of Colorado. For years practically every law on the statute books of that State for the protection of life and limb, and the sanitation of mines, has been violated by the operators. Driven to desperation by the nonenforcement of the law, and the ceaseless, relentless oppression of the big corporations, the miners on September 23, 1913, went on strike.

"No sooner had they gone on strike, in fact, for weeks before the strike was called, the operators were scouring the country for gunmen, whose profession is that of shooting the miners back into submission. They engaged the services of the notorious Baldwin-Felts strike-breaking agency. These people were brought into the State by the hundreds, bringing with them their artillery, including rapid-fire guns and armored automobiles, in violation of the law. The logical results followed. Men who have the courage to strike and pit their empty stomachs against modern corporate greed are not going to be shot down like dogs without a protest. A fight took place between the miners and the hired assassins of the operators, in which one of the hirelings was killed. Lawson was charged with the murder, tried before a jury that was 'hand picked' to convict contrary to the laws of the State, and sentenced to life imprisonment by a corporation judge who was created for that very purpose.

"Last Monday I sat in this room and listened to a discussion between this commission and Mr. Gilbert Roe on the question of the existence of some mysterious thing which neither side made out to establish, namely, a condition of equality before the law as between capital and labor.

"I want to go on record before this commission by saying that there is no such a thing as equality before the law in disputes arising between labor and capital. Before we can have equality before the law, labor must possess some rights that are recognized by law. To-day the wage-workers of this country have no economic rights that are recognized by law.

"Take the case of a man out of work. He had no right to a job. The law does not say that as a citizen he shall have a right to work and earn a living. As a rule, he lives about two weeks from the bread line. If he gets out of work, he is out of money and out of home. According to the law, he becomes a vagrant. If he begs, he is put in jail; if he steals, he is sent to the penitentiary; and if he attempts to commit suicide and is caught at it, he is sent to the insane asylum.

"In Colorado they organized and went on a strike. The operators, who own the courts of law, turned their hirelings loose on them, clothed in the majesty of the law. These hirelings plundered and murdered these strikers with impunity, as the testimony taken by this commission will prove, and what has the law done?

"A grand jury indicted 150 miners, but the same grand jury found no indictments against the coal operators or any member of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., though the facts were established that these operators imported gunmen and machine guns, both in violation of the law, and that strikers were killed and even women and babies were suffocated in the fire at Ludlow. Rotten and one-sided as the law is in Colorado, it was still a question whether or not a conviction of the miners could be secured, but our modern industrial pirates never overlook a chance. During the last session of the legislature Senator Hoyden, an attorney for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., who represents in the legislature a district known as the Kingdom of Standard Oil, introduced a bill to establish a new judgeship. The bill became a law, and one Granby Hillyer, another corporation attorney, who was engaged with Jessie E. Northcutt, the salaried attorney of the C. F. & I. to prosecute the miners, was elevated to the bench, and although outskopen in his prejudice against the miners, refused to vacate his seat and allow the cases to be tried by an unbiased judge. During this trial it was brought out that John Lawson was not within 12 miles of where the fight took place between the miners and the Baldwin gunmen in which he is accused of killing one of the hirelings, yet the hand-picked jury that was established in violation of the law, and the judge who is but a creature of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., have found him guilty of murder in the first degree and sentenced him to imprisonment for life.

"Referring again to the tendencies toward militarism, what, I ask, do all these recent decisions mean? The answer is perfectly clear and plain. The American people are just like their Revolutionary and Colonial forefathers. They would have the same hatred against military rule as existed in the days of '76 or '61, but the military rule that has existed since 1899 is military rule against one class of people, and one alone, namely, strikers, and hence the great body of American people outside of the workingmen have not felt the oppression and have not been aroused to the fury that is being aroused among the working classes. If former Gov. Ammons in Colorado had treated a dozen lawyers, clergymen, doctors, bankers, and merchants the way he treated the miners in Las Animas and Huerfano Counties we know that a terrible storm of indignation would have been aroused that would have been identically the same state of feeling that existed among the colonists in 1776. The citizen of Great Britain was not oppressed by the military, and he looked with some indifference upon the struggle of his kinsman across the Atlantic to throw off military oppression. If a governor, who is the representative of capital can use the soldiers to put the workers in prison and keep them there, then a workingmen's governor may do the same thing to a capitalist. Every workingman feels that this would not be permitted by the courts. He knows it would not, and hence he is aroused to indignation against the courts permitting the governor to so act as against the worker.

"It is this feeling which is rising throughout the United States, and which, in my judgment, if not checked, will result in terrible consequences. In my judgment the working people will not stand for any such treatment at the hands of governors or at the hands of courts, and it behooves the courts, if they do not want anarchists made out of workingmen to hark back to the principles of our forefathers, and to declare that the great writ of habeas corpus is now, as it was in ancient days, a sacred writ, and one that no governor and no military commander can refuse to obey. It behooves the courts to hold, just as did the courts in the days of Lincoln, that military power can not imprison men without a charge where the courts are open and unobstructed in the transaction of business. Unless we do get back to this principle, consequences, similar to those which have occurred throughout the history of all the past will result. Charles I was not the only King to lose his head because of an attempt to hold people by the use of soldiers and bayonets. Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette lost their throne and their heads because the crown claimed the right to imprison people at the pleasure of the crown.

"I have only to add that in my own case, I was held in West Virginia for three months, in 1913, and Colorado in 1914 for three months more practically incommunicado, without the slightest charge being made against me and with the courts open and unobstructed in the transaction of business in the counties where I was confined. No one has dared to file any charge against me in court, or made any claim against me that in thought, word, or action I have done wrong."

I have this, I have Mr. Hawkins, I am not sufficiently educated and never had time enough to go down through history, but I requested Mr. Hawkins to help me to prepare that to use in my addresses to the people and awaken the American people to the dangers that were approaching us.

Before I close I would like to ask the permission of the commission, the Child Labor Federal Commission that is here, I am more or less responsible for it. I was called to the strike of the textile workers in Philadelphia. I saw the little boys who had not seen their eleventh year with their hands off here [indicating]; their wrists, taken off from their wrists. I saw their fingers, and I saw those children maimed for life. I asked the reporters; I asked the children first, "Do you work in the mills?" "Yes." "How old are you?" "I am just a little over 10, Mother." And so it went with boys and girls.

I said to the reporters, "Why don't you publish this and make comment on it?" And they showed me the advertisements, and said that they would be only too willing to, but that they didn't dare. I concluded I would have to wake up the people of this Nation, and I went to work and organized some 6,000 or 7,000 children, many of them with their hands off. I telegraphed to the papers in New York to send me down reporters, feeling that the Philadelphia papers would not take any notice of it, and so the New York papers sent down the reporters. I had those children in Independence Park; the police didn't know that we were coming until we were down there. We had our banner, and I marched them to the business part of the city and the newspaper district. I had a table in front of the city hall. I put those children up there. There were 50,000 people at that meeting; the biggest gathering that ever assembled in Philadelphia in their history, they said. I showed them children with their hands off, a sacrifice on the altar of profit, giving to this Nation maimed and useless citizens. I spoke to the ministers, and asked them if they were not carrying out Christ's doctrine, suffer little children to come unto me, they are all that is pure and holy, and you say, "Suffer the little ones to go into the slave pens, and we will grind them into profit." And that is what is done. They closed up; the New York papers and the Philadelphia papers got to fighting one another, and that was all I wanted when I can get those fellows to fight one another, I am all right. It was given publicity, and was discussed in the universities and colleges, and finally got quieted down, and I asked the parents to let me have the little boys, and they said, "Yes." I got 75 little boys; some with their fingers off and their hands off, and I said, "I am going to see the President and have a bill passed to prohibit the murder of children for profit." I was only going 30 miles, but the children were so happy, and the agitation was so great; they never had had the sunshine or the grass before, and now they were bathing in the rivers, and the people were feeding them.

They had their little tin cups and knapsacks, and were marching, and were having the finest time they had ever had, and the newspapers were hammering me, and the priests and ministers were hammering me, but I am alive yet. I am still here, hammering them, and so I marched them along until I got them in Jersey City.

I sent some one over to New York to ask the chief of police if he would give me protection for the children, and he was a military fellow, the commissioner, and the chief was away, and he said, "No; you can't come into New York." Well, I concluded I would show him whether I could or not, and I went over myself and asked him if he had any reason, and he said, "Yes"; but he would not give it to me. "Very well," I said, "I will take it to the mayor." And Low was mayor of New York at that time. He evidently knew I was coming, because the usher said that the mayor would see me directly. I said, "All right." In a few minutes the mayor came in, and I told him my business, and he said, "Mother Jones, I had to sustain the commissioner's decision." "Do you have to, mayor?" "Yes." And I said, "I don't see why New York pays an understrapper, if the other man does the business." He just kind of looked down and said nothing.

I said, "Mayor Low, have you a reason?" And he said, "Yes." "You won't object to giving it to me?" And he said, "No;" and I said, "Perhaps we can clear it up."

The reason was, I was not a citizen of New York, nor neither were those children. "Is that your chief reason?" He said, "Yes." "Well, I think I can clear that up, Mayor Low. I think we will straighten that out immediately. Some time last summer there came over here a piece of royalty from Germany, and the United States voted $45,000 to fill that fellow's stomach for three weeks. And President Roosevelt hired a massage doctor to rub him down so he could get back. Was he a citizen of New York," I says. "No," he says, "he was not." "Did he ever create any wealth for this Nation?" "Well, no," he said. And I says, "We did. Don't I have the same right to come in here that he had?" He says, "Yes." So I went in and I got my children all in, and we had a big meeting that night and the police took care of us, and the captain says, "Mother," he says, "you need never go to the chief or the mayor or to anybody else when you want to come in; you come to me and it will be all right."

So my children did have a meeting and we raised $3,000 or $4,000 or $5,000 for the strikers; and I took my children down and took them down to Boston Bay, and Boston came and took them children and showed them the elephants and everything; and they never had seen anything like it.

Now, the reporters were all going to Oyster Bay, and they blocked my job, and I wanted to see the President, so I telephoned Senator Platt to give me assistant; and he said, "All right, Mother." And I went down. Well, you know this Oriental Hotel, and that is where the robbers of Wall Street go to roost through the summer. So I took the children and went down there, and I had my little band, and they had every place blockaded. You can't step on that sacred ground without there is an officer after you. And I went to a section man, and I says, "How am I going to get in to them fellows?" He says, "I don't know. You can't go in at the door?" "Well, no; the thing is so guarded I can't get in." He says, "Well, I don't know, Mother." "Well, I want to go in with these children, and I want breakfast." And he says, "There is only one way to get in there, and that is through the saloon. And if the saloon keeper lets you in there, you can get in." "Do you know him?" "Yes," he said "I know him; yes." "Well," I says, "come on down with me, and I will get you a drink." And you can always buy an Irishman a drink. And so we went to the saloon and went in, and I says to the saloon keeper, I says, "Can I go in to see them pirates to-day with these children?" And he says, "Yes." And so I took the children and went in, and the children had a little band, and so they sang, "Hail, hail, the gang's all here." Well, that bunch all got up and ran away and went upstairs; the men and women; and the hotel gave us our breakfast, and we all had good things, and the children had never had any such breakfast. The cook fixed it up. You know, he was a miner cook, and he fixed up everything; and the little ones went off happy.

Well, I went down to Oyster Bay, and the reporters didn't know where I was going, and I got in and didn't see no one of the secret-service men; and I thought I would go up and see President Roosevelt about having passed that bill; and when I got up to go there, he put secret-service men all the way from his house down to Oyster Bay to prevent the children coming up there. He had a lot of secret-service men watching an old woman and an army of children. You fellows do elect wonderful Presidents. The best thing you can do is to put a woman in the next time, and she will do it.

Well, that ends that now, and I will not take up any more time; but before I close I have got a letter here. I will have to look it over carefully. It relates to the murder of one of the deputies in Utah. The morning after they had arrested all the men these fellows came along, three of them, and I only had a stone to fasten my door, and I heard the footsteps coming, and I jumped to my feet, and this fellow opened the door and pushed the stone in, and he came in, and he put his gun under my jaw and his finger on the gun, and he says, "Now, if you don't tell me where I will get $3,000 of the miners' money I will blow your brains out." He was one of the sworn deputies that arrested the miners the day before. And I said, "Well, wait a while; I will tell you about these brains; let's talk that over first. You need not waste a lot of powder on these brains. If you blow my brains out yours and mine will not mix. So, save your powder." "Now, where is it? Give it to me. I don't want any talk; and," says he, "I won't have it." And I says, "There are one or two good fellows up in Indianapolls that have the money in the bank." And he says, "Hasn't the secretary got any money?" And I says, "Yes; but he pays every bill with checks." "Haven't you got any money?" "Yes." "Get it out," he says. "I want it." So I took out 50 cents. That is all I had. And he says, "Is this all the money you have got?" "That is all I have here, and I am not going to give it to you." He says, "You won't give it to me?" I says, "No; I want it myself, because I have got the Gould smallpox, and when I get out I want to get a jag on and boil it out of my system, so I won't inoculate the Nation." So the fellow finally went off. And he was killed afterwards for bank wrecking in Utah. Now, that is—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Let me suggest, Mrs. Jones, that you submit that into the record.

Mother JONES. All right.

Chairman WALSH. I don't want to hurry you, but Mr. Weinstock said he had a question.

Mother JONES. Well, all right, Mr. Weinstock; go to it, now. But I want you to understand now, Mr. Weinstock, before you go to it, I am not an educated woman; you are, and I am not.

(The matter referred to will be found among the exhibits printed at the end of this subject as "Jones Exhibit.")

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In your statement yesterday, among other things you told about the experiences you had, I think, in the vicinity of Greensburg.

Mother JONES. Yes, Pennsylvania.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And there was some one with you on a street car or a railroad car, and you wanted to get off?

Mother JONES. A street car.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And the conductor refused to let you off?

Mother JONES. No; you have that wrong, Mr. Weinstock. The conductor never refused to let me off; it was the women and the babies. The judge had sentenced them to 30 days in jail. I would not let the women leave their babies behind, so they got on the street car, and when we got to a station there were three or four scabs got on the car, and the women were going to jail, and they had a certain resentment against those scabs because they go in and take their bread.

Now, Mr. Weinstock, remember we strikers are striking for a better condition for all, whether they are union men and women or nonunion; they are all workers anyhow; but they make the fight and they raise the wages of the nonunion mother as well as the union one. We are in a conference, you know.

So these women were a little irritated when they saw those scabs get on, and they gave me the babies, and I took the babies; I think I had four or five of them in my arms and another bunch of them around me, and they went and lampooned those scabs, and the scabs began to holler. There were two of the constabulary there, but they were nice boys and they didn't meddle; I think they were a little leery of what was going to happen; and I would not let the street car motorman stop to let those men off until he got to a regular station. They were hollering, "Stop the car," and the motorman got a little nervous, too, and I said, "Now, you don't stop that car; it is against the law, and you must obey the law."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is the point I wanted you to refresh my memory on. You called attention to the fact that they must obey and respect the law.

Mother JONES. Yes, the motorman; he had no right to stop the car there; it was an interurban car.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it from that, Mother Jones, that you are an advocate of law and order and would insist on people obeying the law and respecting it?

Mother JONES. I certainly do, but when the law jumps all over my class and there is no law for my class, and it is only for the other fellow, then I want to educate my people so as to put my people on the bench. I don't know whether you are a lawyer or not?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am not, Mother Jones; I am glad of it. I am a plain, everyday business man.

Mother JONES. I am glad of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. From what you have explained, Mother Jones, it is evident that some explanation is needed. There appears in the record of the congressional committee a copy of which I have here, setting forth a hearing before a subcommittee of the Committee on Mines and Mining of the House of Representatives, a statement attributed to you, which evidently is a mistake, and does you a grave injustice, and I think you should be afforded an opportunity at this hearing for the purposes of our record to correct it.

(This is entered here as Operators' Exhibit No. 105, "Address made by Mother Jones, delivered before the convention in Trinidad, Colo., on Tuesday, the 16th day of September, 1913.")

Among other things you are alleged to have said, speaking, I think, of some labor trouble in West Virginia:

"We told him we lived in America beneath the flag for which our fathers fought; that we lived in the United States, and we had a right and had a ground to fight on; and we asked the governor to abolish the Baldwin guards. That was the chief thing I was after, and I tell you the truth, because I knew when we cleaned them out other things would come with it.

"So I said in the article we will give the governor until 8 o'clock to-morrow evening to get rid of the Baldwin guards, and if he don't do business we will do business. I called the committee, and I said, 'Here, take this document and go into the governor's office and present it to him. Now, don't get on your knees; you don't need to get on your knees; we have no kings in America; stand on both feet, with your heads erect, and present that document to the governor.' And they said, 'Will we wait?' I said, 'No, don't wait, and don't say, "your honor," said I, because few of those fellows have any honor and don't know what it is.

"When we adjourned the meeting and saw we were not going to get any help, I said, 'We will protect ourselves and buy every gun in Charleston.'

There was not a gun left in Charleston; and we did it openly, no underhanded business about it, for I don't believe in it at all. We simply got our guns and ammunition and walked down to the camps, and the fight began."

Now, as one who believes in law and order and obeying the law, there must be some mistake, or you were misquoted, and this is an opportunity for you to correct it.

Mother JONES. I am going to tell you about that. I made that speech, not in Trinidad, but on the steps of the statehouse in Charleston. The strike was not on very long—three or four months, I think three months—and I did so, and the governor stood there, and the whole statehouse administration was there. When I said, "We demand of the governor to abolish the Baldwin guards," I did so; I don't deny it. I don't believe in any such brutal combination; they are a disgrace to our Nation; they violate every law; they teach the coming children to be lawbreakers, brutes, and murderers, and for that I am strictly opposed to those armies. And I would say, Mr. Weinstock, that I would ask this Government and ask this commission to demand of Congress that she pass a bill that the Government take over all of those detective agencies and run them on an honorable basis.

I don't believe—I have had more experience with those people than any other one person in America and I have never seen one of them hurt. I could have had all those deputies and sheriffs murdered that morning down at Half Way, in Utah, if I had just said one word to those men the night before, but that would not settle the disease; the disease still remained. The disease lies in the private ownership of my bread, and one class of men can say how much I shall eat and how much my children shall eat. I stand for a better citizenship, and I stand for law and have stood for law, and in all my career it can be proven, the records of the courts, police and county, and everywhere can be searched, and there has never been a charge against me; I am always in favor of obeying the law; but if the high-class burglar breaks the law and defies it, then I say we will have a law that will defend the Nation and our people, for whenever a nation undertakes to crush her producers and to debase and dehumanize them, that nation is going over the breakers; it is the history of all nations down the stairway of time. In 50 years we have created more wealth than any other nation in the world has done in 700 years, and one group owns that wealth and the masses of people are impoverished.

I am for schools. I said to the governor of West Virginia, "If you had taken that $700,000 that you spent to crush my class, the miners, and put it into the schoolrooms of the State, and given to the Nation a more highly developed citizenship, morally, physically, and mentally, it would have been more valuable to the Nation. I saw the schooldoors closed on the children, and for many of them never to open again. Many of them had to go out and struggle for bread, and many were made criminals and idiots, and if that money, that $700,000 that was put into the militia, to crush my class, had been put into the schoolrooms we would have had less use for law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. There is no change to be made in that statement?

Mother JONES. No; that can stay. I will tell you how that came to be put into the record. They had a little two-by-four lawyer in Charleston, and he made up a job with the coal company's lawyer to run that in, so that he could get it on me, and the miners are paying him $7,500 a year for doing nothing, only incarcerating them, and I am going to put a stop to that thing.

Am I through? I am tired.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You know the purposes that this commission is created for, Mother Jones—that is, that Congress expects this commission to come back to it with recommendations for remedial legislation. Now, if you were a member of the commission, Mother Jones, what would you recommend to Congress to remedy the condition that you complain of?

Mother JONES. I will tell you, as I stated before we got to discussing this question, you and I, I was not an educated woman; I belong to the classes. I should recommend to Congress that they should do away with all of these arms and detective agencies, because they create crime. They are criminals.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, to do away with the gunmen?

Mother JONES. And these detective agencies; let the Government run their agencies, and you will have less trouble, less crime, less penitentiary subjects, and you will have better manhood and better womanhood. I have a great deal to tell the commission, but it is unnecessary; but you see, Mr. Weinstock, we have spent years in the past, we are an infant in the history of nations yet, practically speaking. Now, we have spent our years following our birth inventing machinery, building railroads, telephones, telegraphs, and everything else, and we are reaching a stage where these inventions are taking the place of labor. There must be something done by the National Government to relieve this discontent, because we have armies of unemployed. Last Sunday I addressed a large meeting down here in Pennsylvania. It was the glass industry, where a thousand men were employed. The machine came in and threw the whole thousand of skilled mechanics out—10 men are doing the work of 1,000, and it is so in so many other industries.

Now, Mr. Weinstock, we had a Federal commission 15 years ago. I think Mr. O'Connell remembers that. That commission went through this Nation; it made some of the finest recommendations that could be made to Congress. Those recommendations lie up in the archives of this Nation, and I venture to say in the last 15 years not 12 Congressmen have read them. Now, you see, you had an investigation in Colorado; one whole year passed away, and two days before Congress closed they brought that up on the floor of the House. They had an investigation in Michigan that they never brought up at all. What good are the investigations if the public don't know what is happening in the country? My advice, and I give it to the workers when I speak to them is, when you send a man to the Senate or Congress or to the legislature, when he comes home have a platform at the depot, and make that representative tell you what he has done for the best interests of the Nation, and render an account of himself right then and there, and then you will not have so many Congressmen fighting for bills for the protection of 26 Broadway and other institutions like that.

Am I through?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Your recommendation, then, briefly, is this—I want to make sure that I understand it thoroughly—that the remedy for industrial unrest would be to wipe out the detective agencies?

Mother JONES. That is only one step. Now, I believe in taking over the mines, Mr. Weinstock. They are mineral, and no operator, no coal company on the face of the earth made that coal. It is a mineral; it belongs to the Nation; it was there down the ages, and it belongs to every generation that comes along, and no set of men should be permitted to use that which is nature's. It should be given to all of nature's children in other nations.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then your remedy would be public ownership of the mines?

Mother JONES. All other industries, and then we can get the hours of labor down and put men to work. I also believe in the ownership of the transportation lines. I don't want to put you out of a job, Mr. Aishton.

Chairman WALSH. We thank you, Mrs. Jones; and you will be excused permanently.

TESTIMONY OF MR. DANIEL DAVENPORT.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name, please?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Daniel Davenport.

Chairman WALSH. And where do you reside, Mr. Davenport?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Bridgeport, Conn.

Chairman WALSH. And what is your profession?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Lawyer. I have been practicing almost 40 years.

Chairman WALSH. Are you counsel for the American Anti-Boycott Association, Mr. Davenport?

Mr. DAVENPORT. General counsel; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Who are or have been in part your associate counsel for the association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. James N. Beck preceded me as general counsel and Mr. Walter Gordon Merritt as associate counsel.

Chairman WALSH. I think Mr. Merritt submitted some recommendations to this commission in New York.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I have seen a pamphlet.

Chairman WALSH. When was the American Anti-Boycott Association started, Mr. Davenport? We must have better order in the room, please.

Mr. DAVENPORT. It was along in July, 1902, that the movement first began. I believe it was organized along in 1903, in May, I think.

Chairman WALSH. Why was it started and by whom?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, the purpose of the organization is set forth in the constitution, which I don't happen to have a copy of. It was primarily—

Chairman WALSH. I have marked some sections of it, Mr. Davenport, to which I will direct your attention.

Mr. DAVENPORT. It was primarily started for the purpose of enabling the members to protect themselves from unlawful boycotts.

Chairman WALSH. Did the association have some connection with the Danbury Hatters' case that we have heard so much about?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir, Mr. Walsh. It financed the case. That is to say, it supplied the attorneys who conducted it.

Chairman WALSH. On behalf of the plaintiffs?

Mr. DAVENPORT. On behalf of D. E. Lloyd & Co., who are members.

Chairman WALSH. In article 2, please refer to there, of this constitution, it is stated that one of its objects is to protect its members and their employees and promote the public welfare by proper and legal resistance to boycotts, unlawful strikes, and other labor conspiracies, and cooperate with the public authorities in the suppression thereof.

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is section 1.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; that is right; it is section 1.

Is it the position of the association that all boycotts are now or should be made illegal?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is opening up a pretty large question, Mr. Walsh. It depends altogether on what you mean by the word "boycott."

Chairman WALSH. That is one of the things that we are trying to define.

Mr. DAVENPORT. It has been pretty well defined, so far as the Federal jurisprudence is concerned, by a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States. The first declaration against a boycott made by the Supreme Court of the United States was made at the instance of the labor unions in the case of Calvin-Wilson (137 U. S.), which arose here in the District of Columbia.

I happened to have here with me that, and I see a statement here which is the foundation case, in regard to that matter. This sort of a combination was by the Supreme Court of the United States, at the instance of the labor unions established. Certain gentlemen were indicted in the police courts here in the District of Columbia for conspiracy, and they were tried in the police court without a jury, on the ground that the offense that they were charged with was a petty offense and under the law they were not entitled to a jury trial. They were found guilty, and Mr. Calvin was put in the custody of the marshal, and the attorney of the union, Mr. Ralston, brought a petition for habeas corpus for the discharge of his client on the ground that the offense charged was a heinous offense, for which he was entitled to a jury trial under the Constitution. The matter was brought to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Now, this is the arrangement that was made among those men, which was subjected to the condemnation of the Supreme Court, at the instance and request of the unions. And you will observe what is the nature of it: By refusing "to work as musicians, or in any other capacity, with or for the persons first above named, or with or for any person, firm, or corporation working with or employing them; to request and procure all other members of said organizations, and all other workmen and tradesmen, not to work as musicians, or in any capacity, with or for them, or either of them; or for any persons, firm, or corporation that employed or worked with them, or either of them, and to warn and threaten every person, firm, or corporation that employed or worked with them or either of them, and to warn and threaten every person, firm, or corporation that employed or proposed to employ the said persons, or either of them, and that if they did not forthwith cease to so employ them and refuse to employ them, and each of them, such person, firm, or corporation so warned and threatened would be deprived of any custom or patronage, as well from the persons so combining and conspiring as from all other members of said organization in and out of the district."

Now, the court held, in other words [reads]:

"This is an offense of a grave character, affecting the public at large, and we are unable to hold that a person charged with having committed it in this District is not entitled to a jury when put upon his trial."

Now, that is probably the foundation case in this country on the subject of illegal boycotts at common law. There might be some doubt that where men combine together to oppose anybody it is an illegal thing. Of course, this subject of boycotts varies under the law as to the jurisdiction. If you care to look it up in the recent case of Gompers v. The Bucks Stove & Range Co., Mr. Justice Lamar, giving the opinion of the court, refers in a general way to the different views of different courts in this country as to what constitutes an illegal boycott. Some were there must be violence used, some that it must be this, that, and the other. I wish I had the notations from it here.

Chairman WALSH. Maybe we could get a shorter route by having you suggest what might be defined as a legal boycott.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I doubt very much whether that process of elimination would answer. But that is the law so far as the common law is concerned, but under the Federal law, under the Sherman Act, as has been established by the Supreme Court in the Lawler case, the principles are quite different. Any combination whose purpose is directly to affect or directly restrains trade among States is illegal, and I would say, for instance, that this combination set forth in the proceedings of the American Federation of Labor would be directly in point.

In the proceedings of the American Federation of Labor, at its convention held in 1905, the committee on boycotts reported, and it was unanimously adopted by the convention, as follows [reads]:

"We must recognize the fact that a boycott means war, and to successfully carry on a war we must adopt the tactics, as history has shown, that are most successful in war. The greatest master of war has said that war was a trade of the barbarians, and the secret to success was to concentrate all of your force upon one point of the enemy, the weakest if possible. In view of these facts the committee recommends that the State federations and the central bodies lay aside minor grievances and concentrate their efforts and intelligence upon the least number of unfair parts or places in their jurisdiction. One would be preferable. If every available means of the central bodies and State federations was centered on one point and kept up until successful, the next on the list would be more readily brought to terms, and in a reasonable time anyone opposed to unfair conditions or wages or hours would be brought to their senses and submit to the inevitable."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Whose sentiments are those?

Mr. DAVENPORT. The American Federation of Labor. That is the report of the committee on boycotts to the convention in 1905, and unanimously adopted.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Does it give the names of the committee?

Mr. DAVENPORT. It can be found in their proceedings. This was taken from that.

Now, what kind of a thing is an illegal boycott? If I were obliged to distinguish in my own mind between combinations that are illegal in the sense of a boycott, I would say that they are those that are illegal which seek to oppress the victim. Now, you know the distinction between secondary and primary boycotts. That, to my mind, don't impart any distinction. There is no difference in my mind as to the character of the boycott, providing the purpose and necessary effect is the same.

Chairman WALSH. A very marked distinction has been drawn between secondary and primary boycotts by expert witnesses.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Certainly. Ex-President Taft when a judge of the circuit court originated that expression, I think, and he has expounded it on a great many occasions. Mr. Gompers has never recognized any such distinction or principle in his editorials in the A. F. of L. But it is all put at rest, as far as interstate boycotts is concerned, by a recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Eastern Retail Lumber Dealers' Association against the United States, and if you care to run down that matter you can find it in that case. I can give you the notation of the case.

Chairman WALSH. Just submit it into the record, please.

Mr. DAVENPORT. It is Eastern Retail Lumber Dealers' Association v. The United States (234 U. S., 600).

Chairman WALSH. Now, in that same section, Mr. Davenport, the language is used, "Legal restraint of unlawful strikes." What strikes are considered by your association to be unlawful?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't know that I can say what the association considers unlawful, but I as an attorney consider any strike unlawful which has for its purpose to coerce. Of course, you differentiate and ramify those things. For instance, in a railway strike an entirely different principle comes in there because of the provisions of the interstate-commerce act. This is the general principle of law, as I understand it, that any combination of men to accomplish an unlawful purpose by lawful means and enter a combination to accomplish a lawful purpose by unlawful means is an unlawful conspiracy. You must recognize the fact that there is a great system of laws that govern the interstate carriers—interstate commerce—which make combinations between the employers in many respects, unless perhaps it has been changed by the Clayton Act, unlawful.

In a case—one of the cases before Judge Taft 20 years ago he pointed out a combination then under consideration violated the interstate-commerce act and the Sherman Antitrust Act, as well as it was in that particular instance an unlawful boycott, which he attempted to define. But wheresoever there is a law of the United States that requires a man to do a thing, as, for instance, the employee of the railroad, you know every agent, employee, and officer of that railroad company is required to do certain things. Now, any combination for the purpose of inducing that person not to perform that duty, or any combination which prevents his doing it, is a violation of the criminal statutes of the United States, and therefore, of course, any such combination is unlawful. That has been the basis of very many decisions by the courts. If it would save time at all for the commission, or if it has the time to spare, I could call your attention to some particular cases.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would give us reference to the cases, if you have them; or, if not, you can put them in the record afterwards.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, will what I say here be submitted to me for correction?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Then, I will take the pains to insert those cases, with possibly quotations from them.

Chairman WALSH. Now, in section 2 of article 1 one of the objects of your association is stated to oppose State and Federal legislation injurious to the public good which would impair the rights and remedies of members in the employment of labor or destroy industrial freedom. Upon what basis does your association determine what is or is not injurious to public good?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is the class of legislation to which we have given attention. All attempts to strip the Federal courts of power to protect persons and property by the use of the writ of injunction. All such things have been opposed; also every attempt to weaken the power of the Federal court to enforce their injunctions. In one particular instance—I think that was all—is where we had the eight-hour law agitation here. When we thought men were boycotted or supposed to be by the Federal court who worked in a shop more than eight hours. That is the only kind of legislation that I know anything about that we have been interested in.

Chairman WALSH. Well, now, suppose that the other great societies of the people believed that legislation that is a diminution of hours as is cognizant with the public welfare, or for the public welfare, do you assume to speak for them also, or do you limit it to members of your organization?

Mr. DAVENPORT. It came up in this way. Mr. Commissioner O'Connell will remember it. Many years before the House Committee on Labor and before the Senate Committee on Labor legislation, there was effort to take out of the field of Government employment those men that did not run shops on the eight-hour basis. In opposition to that proposition I appeared before both the Senate and House committees, in opposition to Mr. O'Connell and those who believed otherwise. As far as I know, that is the only way in which it ever came up.

Chairman WALSH. Well, have you an example of any other sort of legislation which you have promoted or opposed purely from the standpoint of the public good, as expressed in section 2 of article 2?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't recall any.

Chairman WALSH. Just on the eight-hour law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Not the eight-hour law, but the rights and remedies of people. You know society would not exist without a court of equity to enjoin things that would cause irreparable injury to persons. Now, courts of equity exist only to give orders forbidding things to be done, or commanding; and the only way by which they can be made effective is for the court to have the power to punish those that disobey them, and long-continued efforts have been made to take away from the courts their power. Both the power to issue injunctions in certain classes of cases and also the power to punish for contempt without the interposition of a jury, and in a certain way to take away the power to issue injunctions without previous notice.

Now, all such kind of legislation is what has been my business to, as far as I could, before committees, oppose; but that is all I know about anything else, other than the particular instance or feature of the eight-hour law.

Chairman WALSH. Were you in the organization from its inception, Mr. Davenport?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I might say yes.

Chairman WALSH. Who drew the constitution and by-laws?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I don't know but what I did; I can not say; I helped, at any rate.

Chairman WALSH. What is meant in that section by industrial freedom, and for whom?

Mr. DAVENPORT. If you will tell me what that means—I suppose it is industrial freedom for everybody, employer or employee.

Chairman WALSH. In what instance has the organization sought to promote or impede legislation or affect the freedom of employees?

Mr. DAVENPORT. It is in regard to those things I spoke of—injunctions, maintaining the power of the Federal court unimpaired—to protect the freedom of employer and employee.

Chairman WALSH. In the article, referring to section 1, article 3, in which it is stated that no membership shall be made public without the consent of the member; what is the reason for that provision, please?

Mr. DAVENPORT. The reason for that was that members were timid for fear they would incur the hostility of organized labor.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider it desirable socially that any large organization should keep its membership secret; that is, engage in a business which affects legislation or affects the Government so closely?

Mr. DAVENPORT. You will notice this does not say secret, but it shall not be made public without his consent.

Chairman WALSH. Maybe I don't see the distinction.

Mr. DAVENPORT. There is a great distinction.

Chairman WALSH. Just state it in your own way.

Mr. DAVENPORT. The distinction is this, that probably one-half of the membership would state that they were connected with it. But it shall not be published.

Chairman WALSH. It just means that it shall not be published in the newspapers?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Published generally.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you to submit to Mr. Manly, in charge of our department of research, a list of the membership.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I would have to decline to do that. In the first place I don't know it myself, and in the second place—

Chairman WALSH. That first one is an awful good reason.

Mr. DAVENPORT. A sufficient reason.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any place we could get a list?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I can tell you who would know about it, but I don't suppose they would want to break faith with their members. The secretary of the association is Mr. H. F. Lee, of 27 Williams Street, New York City, where the offices are.

Chairman WALSH. Is Mr. Lee an attorney?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No, sir; secretary of the association. The treasurer is Mr. Henry A. Potter, and he is at 25 Madison Avenue, New York City.

Chairman WALSH. If this is not secret, would you indicate who you would be willing to tell it to or what body or what persons?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't suppose they would be willing to give a list of it to anybody, but I have no doubt but what a very great number of the members would be perfectly willing to have their connection with it known.

Chairman WALSH. Now, then, why is it not secret, if you are not willing to tell anyone—if the organization itself is not willing to tell anyone or any Government body?

Mr. DAVENPORT. As far as a Government body is concerned, I think very likely that a Government body, if it was strictly necessary for the purpose—but I would suppose this is going a little too far.

Chairman WALSH. Well, who would determine that for the Government, whether or not it was strictly necessary?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I suppose that perhaps the courts; I don't know. But that, I suppose, is entirely irrelevant to the purposes of this hearing; I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. What is the initial membership fee?

Mr. DAVENPORT. $25.

Chairman WALSH. Will you describe the methods of assessment which the executive board may authorize the treasurer to levy?

Mr. DAVENPORT. The assessment shall be at the rate of $1 on each $1,000 of the pay roll—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Say, I have been asked—Commissioner Weinstock has submitted a question here [reading]: "Can we insist on the names any more than we could insist on Lawson and Doyle telling us whether they spent money for arms?" Let me say that Lawson and Doyle were two members of the United Mine Workers of America, involved in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. strike in Colorado; and when we asked them this question they declined to answer, because there were certain indictments pending against them in the State courts of Colorado. Do you refuse to answer this on the ground that it might tend to incriminate you?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, no.

Chairman WALSH. Or furnish the link in a chain of evidence that might lead—

Mr. DAVENPORT (interrupting). Oh, no; not at all.

Chairman WALSH. What ground do you place it upon?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I tell you. In the first place, I am not familiar with the membership; I am an attorney, but aside from that I suppose that the actual membership is irrelevant to the subject.

Chairman WALSH. And you do not place it, then, on the ground, either, that it is a confidential communication between attorney and client?

Mr. DAVENPORT. So far as I am concerned?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. No.

Chairman WALSH. Just simply for purposes or for your own purposes you do not want us to know it?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Why, I do not want to have it made public, not because I do not want you to know it, so much, as it might—in the estimation of some of the members—precipitate the very evil against them that they are seeking to avoid; and upon that ground I should suppose that they would decline, so far as they could legitimately, to disclose the membership.

Chairman WALSH. Well, we will go back to the question of assessments. I asked you, please, to describe the methods of assessment which the executive board can authorize the treasurer to issue.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, at the rate of $1 on a thousand of the pay roll, no member having to pay more than $500.

Chairman WALSH. For what purpose is the fund thus collected used?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, it is for the purpose of carrying on the association, paying the salaries of the officers, and I suppose paying the attorney's fees.

Chairman WALSH. Well, who is on the general executive board at the present time?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, Charles H. Merritt, of Danbury, is the chairman, and really I couldn't give you the others. Oh, I think Mr. Potter and Mr. Lee, by reason of their membership—I think the secretary and the treasurer are also members; but I won't be sure about that.

Chairman WALSH. Please refer to section 5, article 5, in which it is stated that it shall be the duty of the board to classify the members of the association in such groups as will give reasonable representation on the board to the different classes of industry.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I should think that sufficiently indicates—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Well, I was going to ask you a question on it, and was just going to call your attention to that. What is your present method of classification?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Why, for instance, in the metal industries, hat industries, carpet industries, and so on. That is the way they are classified.

Chairman WALSH. Are any of the records of your association kept in the city of Washington—

Mr. DAVENPORT (interrupting). Oh, no.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). Or the District of Columbia?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No.

Chairman WALSH. Where is your roll of membership?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I suppose that the secretary treasurer in New York would have it.

Chairman WALSH. That is the gentleman—

Mr. DAVENPORT (interrupting). Whom I have mentioned.

Chairman WALSH. Do you remember approximately how many industrial groups are now so classified?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No; I could not. Probably—I should imagine 25 or 30.

Chairman WALSH. Could you give the industries?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I could not with any—I know, of course——

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). The coal industry?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't know whether there is any such group.

Chairman WALSH. The steel industry?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't think there is any such group as that.

Chairman WALSH. Boot-and-shoe industry?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I doubt—I couldn't tell you.

Chairman WALSH. The railroads?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, I guess there aren't any railroads.

Chairman WALSH. The oil industry?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No.

Chairman WALSH. The Metal Trades Association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. The what?

Chairman WALSH. The Metal Trades Association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No; but I think there are different classes or branches of the metal industry.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. National Metal Trades Association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh that has nothing to do with it. These associations are entirely distinct from that. Nothing to do with it.

Chairman WALSH. Who could supply this information to the commission?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I could not think of anyone except Mr. Lee, the secretary, and Mr. Potter, the treasurer.

Chairman WALSH. Now, in regard to Mr. Merritt's recommendations which were given to us in writing, we would like to get some of your views. It states in the recommendation that organizations of workmen have been fostered and encouraged in this country, and the right to strike is recognized as a necessary defense against oppression. By whom is it your understanding that the workmen have been encouraged to form organizations?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No better answer could be made to that, Mr. Walsh, than the following from the decision of the Supreme Court in the Gompers case, the case of Gompers v. the Buck Stove & Range Co. (221 U. S., 239). The court said, speaking by Mr. Justice Lamar: "Society itself is an organization and does not object to organizations for social, religious, business, and all legal purposes. The law therefore recognizes the right of workingmen to unite and to invite others to join their ranks, thereby making available the strength, influence, and power that come from such association. By virtue of this right, powerful labor unions have been organized. But the very fact that it is lawful to form these bodies, with multitudes of members, means that they have thereby acquired a vast power in the presence of which the individual may be helpless. This power, when unlawfully used against one can not be met except by his purchasing peace as the cost of submitting to terms which involve the sacrifice of rights protected by the Constitution, or by standing on such rights and appealing to the preventive powers of a court of equity. When such an appeal is made it is the duty of Government to protect the one against the many, as well as the many against the one."

But perhaps equally good is the statement by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Adair v. The United States (208, U. S., 178), where they were putting at rest the notion that Congress could deny the right of labor unions to organize [reads]:

"Manifestly any rule prescribed for the conduct of interstate commerce, in order to be within the competency of Congress under its power to regulate commerce among the States, must have some real or substantial relation to or connection with the commerce regulated. But what possible legal or logical connection is there between an employee's membership in a labor organization and the carrying on of interstate commerce? Such relation to a labor organization can not have in itself, in the eye of the law, any bearing upon the commerce with which the employee is connected by his labor and services. Labor associations, we assume, are organized for the general purpose of improving or bettering the conditions and conserving the interests of their members as wage earners, an object entirely legitimate and to be commended rather than condemned. But surely those associations as labor organizations have nothing to do with interstate commerce as such. One who engages in the service of an interstate carrier will, it must be assumed, faithfully perform his duty, whether he be a member or not a member of the labor organization. His fitness for the position in which he labors and his diligence in the discharge of his duties can not in law or sound reason depend in any degree upon his being or not being a member of a labor organization. It can not be assumed that his fitness is assured or his diligence increased by such membership, or that he is less fit or less diligent because of his not being a member of such an organization. It is the employee as a man and not as a member of a labor organization who labors in the service of an interstate carrier."

Not only is such the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States, but of every other court that I know anything about. The right of a man to join a union is inherent in his personal liberty, as well as the right of a man to refuse to join. In the recent case of Coppage v. Kansas (236 U. S.) this doctrine is reaffirmed. They not only have the right to form these associations, as long as they keep within the law and confine their operations to lawful purposes and by lawful means, but those rights are guaranteed by various constitutional provisions.

Commissioner LENNON. What value is that right in the Kansas case if the employer, for no reason except membership, can discharge the man?

Mr. DAVENPORT. In a union?

Commissioner LENNON. Yes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, because the right of the employer, of course, is equal with that of the employee.

Chairman WALSH. Another recommendation: In the first list of recommendations we find that emphasis is placed on the necessity for defining the rights of those engaged in business and giving them adequate protection. In what manner would you advise that the rights of both parties to a dispute can be more clearly defined?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, now, Mr. Walsh, this is not my production, and I would be unable to answer that question satisfactorily at this time to anybody. I would suggest that the man who drafted this is a very intelligent man. I think he has appeared before you—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). He has appeared before us, and this is his testimony, and it contained many suggestions, and some of them, to my mind, of very great value; and, inasmuch as you were the head of the legal organization, I thought—one of the objects of having you here was to get you to amplify and make it a little more definite in regard to the machinery.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, Mr. Walsh, my relations with that association are those rather of a man who takes the law as it is and advises as to what the legal rights of his people are, and we do what we can to enforce them. Now, I have never given any attention to these broad recommendations made there and I should—with all respect to the commission, I think my opinion on that subject would not be worth taking your time on. I know of nothing else that is useful except the fact that every person in this country has the right to work. He has a right to buy and sell his labor, and the Constitution of the United States, according to the decisions of the United States Supreme Court, absolutely protects that right from any invasion by the legislature. That is the doctrine laid down in the Adair case. Now, any sort of legislation that impairs this right is null and void, of course, being beyond the power of Congress or of the State legislature, and anything that would deprive the courts of the power to protect those rights is for obvious reasons a nullity. Now, specific pieces of legislation here relating to those matters, like the Clayton Antitrust Act or the Sherman Act or the Ferree bill, so called, that has been adopted in several States, but I am quite willing to give such views as I might have on those subjects.

Chairman WALSH. That is the explanation I was going to make. Now, here is an organization formed for specific purposes, as laid down in the by-laws, and you are their representatives here, and you have stated that you go before committees of Congress and promote or oppose legislation.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't say that I promote any legislation. My entire activity has been directed and confined to opposing, as far as I could, legislation which would dismantle the courts or strip the citizen of his rights to legal protection.

Chairman WALSH. If there was a law passed, or if there was a law sought to be introduced or an amendment to the Constitution submitted making it a misdemeanor for an employer to oppose the formation of labor organizations by discharging any man that joined one, would you feel it a part of your duty, under your general instructions from your organization, to oppose that law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I don't know as I would.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of regulation of labor organizations would you suggest, if you have any suggestions?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Nothing but that they submit to the laws. The fact of the business is I would not recommend any change in any law. I am that fossilized gentleman who thinks that existing laws are sufficient to deal with all these matters.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think labor organizations should be regulated by statute law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, to a very limited extent; that is my own individual opinion.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think employers' associations should be regulated by statute law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Further than they are?

Chairman WALSH. In any way?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, you know, all organizations are under a general law.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I am asking you now——

Mr. DAVENPORT (interrupting). No; not specifically, no.

Chairman WALSH. Well, you said you thought labor organizations might, to a limited extent?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I don't know that—I don't know but I would qualify that, and perhaps retract it. I would let them be just as they are under the laws to-day.

Chairman WALSH. Do you favor incorporation of labor unions?

Mr. DAVENPORT. From the standpoint of the laboring man?

Chairman WALSH. From the standpoint of the public good, we will say, first.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, now, you know the American Federation of Labor—you may not know it, but for many years one of their planks was in favor of the incorporation of labor unions. Mr. Lennon will remember that. But for a good many years they have abandoned that idea. Now, if I was a member of a labor union perhaps I would favor the incorporation of it for the reason, as at present voluntary associations, the individual members, are responsible personally for the acts of the officers done within the scope of their employment and the business of the association, the same as any other. That is the principle, you know, that underlies the decision in the Danbury hatters' case. If a labor union was incorporated, the officers of the labor union would not be, in the sense that they are to-day, the officers of the members; but, speaking broadly, I don't believe I would favor, myself, personally, a law requiring incorporation of labor unions. I would come around to the same view that Mr. Gompers and others contend for on that ground.

Chairman WALSH. Personally, you say you would not favor it?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't think I would.

Chairman WALSH. As a member of a labor union?

Mr. DAVENPORT. If I was a member of a labor union, I would favor it for personal protection against the unlawful acts of my own officers.

Chairman WALSH. Well, now, as an employer, or from the employer's standpoint, would you favor the incorporation of labor unions?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, for the same reason, the rights and privileges of an employer against the unlawful acts of the members of the labor union are much greater now than they would be if they were incorporated; and it would confine its redress substantially to the means and property of the union, the same as against that of a corporation. To-day every one of the 2,000,000 members of the American Federation of Labor who owns a piece of property is responsible to any person injured by the officers of that organization in and about the business of the association, just the same as any other person.

The only distinction between the liability of the members of a voluntary association and the members of a partnership is this, that the members constitute the officers of the association their agents to act in and about their business; that is the only distinction. Now, we will suppose with a labor union that a person is injured by the officers of the American Federation of Labor in something done in and about the business of the association, every individual member is liable in damages for that. If you care to have me give you the cases, I will do so.

But that, of course, was the principle established or recognized in the case of Loewe v. Lawler, the Danbury hatters' case. Now, here is exactly what was done in that case. I brought that suit.

Mr. Loewe's business had been injured and substantially destroyed by the acts of the officers of the United Hatters. Upon the principle that every principal is responsible for the acts of his agent done within the scope of his employment, and in and about the business of his employer, why, I claimed that the individual members of the union are responsible, and that their property could be taken to respond. So I picked out 250 members of the union who had property and brought suit directly against them on the seventh section of the Sherman Antitrust Act. That was contested throughout until it was finally decided by the Supreme Court. Under the circumstances of that case, the individual members were responsible for the acts of their officers, and any organization—labor organization—which has in its constitution a provision for boycotting, every member is responsible for the acts of the officers, not for what some other member may have done, but for the acts of the officers.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think, Mr. Davenport, that it was intended that the Sherman antitrust law should apply to labor organizations at the time of its passage?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Surely; it is so expressly decided by the Supreme Court. Anyone that ever examined the history of those debates, and there is a volume accessible to the commission, will see that.

Commissioner LENNON. I had the pleasure of interviewing Senator Sherman and Senator Plumb and a large number of gentlemen in the Senate at the time, and they did not look upon it that way.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Which one did you interview Mr. Sherman about, the one he introduced?

Commissioner LENNON. Yes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is not the one that was passed, although it bears his name.

If you want to see the history of that matter, you have only to refer to the case of Loewe v. Lawler (208 U. S.) where, in that case in the Supreme Court, we debated this question, and we produced the records, and the other side made their contentions; and the Supreme Court, after careful consideration, said that the history showed it was the intention, and indeed you could not—it would not be a workable statute unless it was so intended.

Commissioner LENNON. I do not want to set aside their view, but I have my own view of that.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Sure; but in our church, however, whenever the highest authority speaks we acquiesce.

Chairman WALSH. We have asked many of the legal gentlemen and legal educators who have been before us this question, which I would like to ask you, "What do you think the attitude of the courts of this country is toward labor disputes? Do they show, as a whole, bias one way or the other?"

Mr. DAVENPORT. Not a particle, as far as I know.

Chairman WALSH. You have found them, so far as you have observed, to be perfectly fair?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes. I have known more or less about the legislation in courts for 15 years. The first case I ever had, Mr. O'Connell, followed the strike of the machinists—was it in 1901 or 1900—for the nine-hour day?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. 1901.

Mr. DAVENPORT. From that time on I have had occasion to follow that, and as far as I know, Mr. Walsh, they are absolutely impartial, as their oath requires them to be.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider the boycott should in any way be restrained by statute law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Further than it is now?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. It is restrained by statute law now.

Chairman WALSH. Give me a typical example.

Mr. DAVENPORT. The Danbury hatters' case is one.

Chairman WALSH. Outside of the Sherman Act?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, there are several statutes—antiboycott statutes—in force in States, but the common law is enough for that.

Chairman WALSH. You would not suggest any legislation along that line, then?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, no.

Chairman WALSH. What is the position of your association in regard to the legality of what is called by the employers the "closed shop"?

Mr. DAVENPORT. It would be impossible for me to say what the position of the association is.

Chairman WALSH. What is your own opinion?

Mr. DAVENPORT. My own opinion is that as illustrated by the last decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in Coppage v. Kansas (236 U. S., —). Apart from all questions of monopoly, and apart from all questions that affect the public, a man has a right to hire anybody but union men, and a union man has a right to refuse to work for anybody but union men, and the closed shop is absolutely verified, so far as that phase of it is concerned, by the Constitution of the United States. That is the sum and substance of the opinion of Mr. Justice Pitney in the case of Coppage v. Kansas. But when you come to questions outside of that, where you have got a monopoly, other questions come in; but, as a general proposition, men have the right to refuse to work for an employer that employs other than union men, and likewise the employer has a right to say, "I will employ no one but union men," or "I will employ no one but nonunion men."

It is so fundamentally buttressed in the Constitution that I am surprised that anybody takes any different view about it.

Chairman WALSH. Any different view than what?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That the closed shop is strictly legal. Now, we can not, on these subjects, have any better authority than the Supreme Court, because they are the last word on the subject. In this case of Coppage v. Kansas Mr. Justice Pitney said:

"Can it be doubted that a labor organization—a voluntary association of working men—has the inherent and constitutional right to deny membership to any man who will not agree that during such membership he will not accept or retain employment in company with nonunion men? Or that a union man has the constitutional right to decline proffered employment unless the employer will agree not to employ any nonunion men? We refer, of course, to agreements made voluntarily and without coercion or duress as between the parties. And we have no reference to questions of monopoly or interference with the rights of third parties or the general public. These involve other considerations respecting which we intend to intimate no opinion."

But in a free country a man has the right to say who he will work for, and state the terms on which he will work, and the employer has a right to say who he will employ, and state the terms, and no legislation is possible that interferes with that right.

Of course there are other phases of the matter where there might, as for instance in the case of Connors v. Connolly—where the principle of monopoly comes in, decided by the supreme court of Connecticut, and perhaps you will permit me to refer to that; it is the case of Connors v. Connolly (86 Conn., 600). That is where the closed shop had gone so far it had monopoly of the industry in that community. The court said:

"Where the agreement is one that takes in an entire industry of any considerable proportion in a community so that it operates generally in that community to prevent or to seriously deter craftsmen from working at their craft or workmen obtaining employment under favorable conditions without joining a union, it is contrary to public policy."

And the whole matter is elaborated.

Those are collateral, of course, to the question the chairman puts to me.

I say if there is anything established by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of every other court I know anything about, the right of a man to work—the right of a man to accept or decline employment—the right of a man to employ or not employ any person can not possibly be invaded by any legislation that the commission could recommend, either State or Federal. The right of the closed shop entered into freely between the employer and the employee is as secure as the Government itself.

Chairman WALSH. Are you familiar with the general purpose and nature of the British trades disputes act?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Not particularly. I have heard it read, as far as that is concerned. I do not think your commission could go very far in recommendations along that line, because of constitutional difficulties.

Chairman WALSH. I was going to ask you to make whatever comment you have in mind, Mr. Davenport, with regard to both the desirability or constitutionality of similar legislation in the United States.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Speaking generally, we have a written constitution, both State and Federal. The Federal Constitution says that no man shall be deprived of his liberty or property without due process of law. The same provision is inserted in the fourteenth amendment, so far as the States are concerned, that fourteenth amendment providing, "Nor deny to any person equal protection of the law."

Now, any legislation which conflicts with those provisions is, of course, a nullity. Not until the Constitution is amended and those provisions stricken out would any legislation which had that effect be valid in this country, whereas in England they have no constitution and the will of Parliament is supreme, and those provisions of the trades disputes act, which remove the protection that property of the individual has in this country, which they would have over there, would not be of any avail here; and I think when your honorable commission comes to report on this matter and you look into the matter you will find that for the same reason the Clayton Antitrust Act will not be worth the paper it is written on if that contention is made in behalf of it by the friends or supporters of the measure. So that legislation along these lines is a waste of time unless you can recommend some constitutional amendment which shall take out of the Constitution the provision that no person shall be deprived of his life, liberty, or property without due process of law. If you take that out, you will be in the same situation. Now, if you take that out, you will be in the same situation that they are in England.

Now, I do not know exactly that what I would like to say to the commission on this subject would be pertinent. Of course, I am nothing but a practicing lawyer, and my business is to try cases, and, as I have said, so far as I represent this association, to oppose the legislation such as I have described; but, upon my word, if I was in your position and was called upon to make some practical recommendation as to changes in the existing law, I would not know what to recommend.

Take, for instance, the law as it is left by the Clayton antitrust bill—am I going over the time?

Chairman WALSH. No; you may proceed.

Mr. DAVENPORT. For 10 years I have appeared before committees—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). It is close to the time of adjournment, and I think we had better adjourn at this point, as some of the commissioners will have some questions to ask you. Please resume the stand at 2 o'clock.

The commission will now stand adjourned until 2 o'clock this afternoon.

(Whereupon, at 12.30 o'clock, Friday, May 14, 1915, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock.)

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. I guess we may proceed now, Mr. Davenport.

Mr. DAVENPORT. There is a question propounded, or sent to me, as to what I think about the social and economic effect of injunctions. Well, I suppose that is impliedly confined to labor.

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir; it is intended to be confined to that.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Now, personally, and from my experience in matters, I think they are of the greatest good socially and economically, and I only regret that any kind of limitation of the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court with injunction processes is available. Of course, it is idle to talk about taking away the right to issue injunctions and to protect the rights of a man to work, or the right of a man to sell his labor, or the right of a man to buy it. The Supreme Court in the Adair case says that is a property right, as well as a right of liberty, that is protected in the Constitution from invasion by any legislative authority, and so in regard to a right of a party to go into a court of equity, when the court is clothed with general equity powers to protect his property or his property rights. It is invulnerably protected by the Constitution, but there is another aspect about the thing, from my experience, that leads me to think that if in some way that process could be extended it would be very beneficial.

I want to tell you a little bit about what is called the Danbury hatters' case. You know the labor unions, particularly the American Federation of Labor, have always upheld the right to boycott; that it is a fundamental constitutional right of a man to boycott, and what any man may do, or a number of men may do; for a great many years, ever since the organization of the American Federation of Labor, and of course, I suppose, for a great many years before that, the practice of the boycott has been, you might say, fundamental with unionism; that a man had a right to work for another, that he had a right to trade with him, and that what one could do a great many could do, and so forth. The consequence was that the laboring people of this country, especially those that were associated in what is called organized labor, believed religiously that they had a right to boycott. Now, the union hatters of North America have been for a great many years engaged in a campaign to unionize all hatters' shops, make them closed shops, and they have very largely succeeded, and they had used the boycott as an instrument to do it—both the primary and what is called the secondary boycott. Well, in the campaign they came to Mr. Loewe. Mr. Loewe was a small manufacturer of hats in Danville, and ran an open shop. The ma-majority of his employees belonged to the union hatters' union, but the others did not, and they had worked for him a great many years. The officers of the union went to Mr. Loewe and said, "Here, we want to have you unionize your shop; all men in the making and finishing department belong to the union." And Mr. Loewe declined.

Now, so far as I know, from the beginning to the end of that long contest, which was in the courts for 13 years, there was not a particle of animosity on the part of the members of the union toward Mr. Loewe, nor a particle of animosity or feeling on the part of Mr. Loewe toward the union. Here seemed to be the collision: Mr. Loewe said, "I will not discharge those men, because they work for me, and I claim the right to run an open shop." And they said, "If you don't, we will make you, and we will make you by the use of the boycott." And with the result that they pulled out the union men, and then the nonunion men were prevented from manufacturing hats, and they sent out their men throughout the country with a view to stopping the sale of his hats, and with the result that they closed up his business practically, and he sustained a damage of perhaps $200,000. After it had been running a little while, Mr. Loewe put a notice in the papers informing the unions and sent it to every hatter in Danville that he would hold them responsible for damages if they continued for anything they did in the way of injuring his business. They paid no attention to it, evidently believing that they had a right to do what they did, and it ended finally after the thing had been going on for a year, Mr. Loewe had sustained a loss at that time of perhaps in the neighborhood of $50,000—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How much?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Fifty thousand dollars, I think. But it became necessary for him to seek the aid of the courts for protection or be ruined. Now, if the state of law such, and there was no limit on the jurisdiction of the Federal court to have interfered in that matter, these parties could have been brought into court, a hearing could have been had, the right or wrong of the matter determined, and a decree of the court been had. We did ultimately go into the circuit court of California and obtain an injunction there, and so far as I know the unions observed it. But that was too late.

Now, what is the consequence? These men went on, and in what condition were they placed? In the unfortunate condition that they are individually and personally responsible for the amount of the judgment that was rendered, $252,000 with interest.

Had the court had the power to have brought that matter to a head by injunctive process, these people would have been free, absolutely, from all this heavy expense and burden. Now, I can not help but believe that if the injunctive process had been effectively available in that case the result would have been in every way desirable, and that these people who are now confronted with the loss of their property unless the union takes care of them, which it agreed to do when the suit was commenced—all that would have been avoided. Now, so much for a particular private case.

Now, I must say I think the doctrine is—

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are you not in error when you say that the union agreed to it? Are you sure of that?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you anything you could file with the commission—

Mr. DAVENPORT (interrupting). This is the way it was, Mr. Commissioner: When the suit was brought and returned to court we had garnisheed about $60,000 of bank deposits and had attached the homes of 250 men. The officers of the union sent to each defendant a letter in which they agreed that if they would turn over the management of the suit to them they would conduct the suit and pay all expenses and pay any judgment that might be rendered in the case. That was accepted by the people. Now, of course, those people have a legal and enforceable contract against the United Hatters to protect them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I thought you were referring to the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, the American Federation of Labor came into it later, and in this way: After the decision by the Supreme Court in February, 1908, that if we could sustain the allegations of the complaint in the Danbury hatters' case, we would be entitled to damages. At the Denver convention in November, 1908, a resolution was passed reciting the fact that the Supreme Court had so held and pledging the union and these 250 men such moral and financial support as was necessary, and instructing the executive council to carry it out when the time came. After 1909 the American Federation of Labor conducted the defense. These individual defendants never have had to pay a dollar. Their expenses when they were testifying in their own behalf were paid by the union—first by the hatters and then by the American Federation of Labor—their own legal expenses were paid. Well, as I say, they have a binding legal agreement against the United Hatters. But, I suppose, as against the American Federation of Labor that would be hardly true. But if any of these defendants have to pay, or have their property taken, they can fall back upon the union by reason of their written agreement with the union.

So much for a particular and private case.

Well, now, we all know what situation arose at the time of the great railroad strikes in 1893, and how the matter came to the Supreme Court; and I want to read what the Supreme Court said about the advisability and the advantage of proceeding by way of injunction. In re Debs (158 U. S. Appeal, 597) Mr. Justice Brewer, in giving the opinion of the court, said [reading]:

"We find in the opinion of the Supreme Court a quotation from the testimony given by one of the defendants before this strike commission, which is a sufficient answer to this suggestion"—

That is, that it was inadvisable to resort to the injunctive process in that situation. [Continues reading:]

"As soon as the employees found we were arrested and taken from the scene of action, they became demoralized, and that ended the strike. It was not the soldiers that ended the strike; it was not the old brotherhoods that ended the strike; it was simply the United States courts that ended the strike. Our men were in a position that never would have been shaken under any circumstances if we had been permitted to remain on the field among them. Once we were taken from the scene of action and restrained from sending telegrams or issuing orders or answering questions, then the minions of the corporation would be put to work.

"Our headquarters were temporarily demoralized and abandoned, and we could not answer any messages. The men went back to work, and the ranks were broken, and the strike was broken up, not by the Army, and not by any other power, but simply and solely by the action of the United States courts restraining us from discharging our duties as officers and representatives of our employees."

Now, the court had pointed out the illegal nature of the conspiracy in which they were engaged. Now, they proceed in this way—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). Pardon me. When you say, "They were engaged," whom do you have reference to when you say "they"?

Mr. DAVENPORT. The officers of the railroad union.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Don't you mean the old American Railway Union?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes; not the brotherhood, but the old American Railway Union.

Commissioner AIGHTON. Debs and his party?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes. Justice Brewer proceeds [reading]:

"Whatever single individuals may have thought or planned, the great body of those who were engaged in these transactions contemplated neither rebellion nor revolution, and when, in the due order of legal proceedings, the question of right and wrong was submitted to the courts, and by them decided, they unhesitatingly yielded to their decisions. The outcome, by the very testimony of the defendants, attests the wisdom of the course pursued by the Government, and that it was well not to oppose force simply by force, but to invoke the jurisdiction and judgment of those tribunals to whom by the Constitution and in accordance with the settled conviction of all citizens is committed the determination of questions of right and wrong between individuals, masses, and States.

"It must be borne in mind that this bill was not simply to enjoin a mob and mob violence. It was not a bill to command a keeping of the peace, much less was its purport to restrain the defendants from abandoning whatever employment they were engaged in. The right of any laborer, or of any number of laborers, to quit work was not challenged. The scope and purpose of the bill was only to restrain forcible obstructions of the highways along which interstate commerce travels and mails are carried. And the facts set forth at length are only those facts which tended to show that the defendants were such obstructions."

Now, the point as to that is this: How much better it is to have resort to a court of equity to hear and pass upon the rights of the parties than to force them either into a contest with the civil authority in the shape of the police, and, if necessary, the military resources, or to fall back upon a suit in damages, which can only be heard after a long time, and then ultimately result in a great loss to the defendants if they are successful. So it seems to me, in my personal opinion, if I was the lawmaker and I could do it, I would say, as Mr. Justice Brewer has said in some address once, that it would be wise and beneficial socially, economically, and in every way to extend the powers of courts of equity rather than to restrict them.

Well, now, there is another aspect of this matter that I thought would be well to speak of, in view of some of the questions that have been asked, and that is in regard to the existing procedure in the Federal courts, in the matter of injunctions, and in the matter of contempt proceedings, and it was about that that I was about to talk when the adjournment was had. Perhaps you gentlemen have not followed or had particular occasion to know what is the precise situation in which those matters are left by the existing Federal legislation.

You know, at the time of the Debs case it was claimed by the unions that a man was entitled to trial by jury in contempt cases, and Mr. Debs asked for trial by jury in that case, which was denied, and the Supreme Court sustained that action.

For 10 years I was before committees of the House and Senate, resisting the enactment of laws which would attempt to change the method of trial by jury in contempt cases, and it was the contention of Mr. Gompers and those associated with him that it was a constitutional right for a man to have a trial by a jury in a proceeding of that kind, and they steadily took that position ~~until~~ about a year ago.

In the next place it was the contention of the unions there that there should be—that an injunction should not be issued to restrain an act which was a crime, because that was an invasion of the right of trial by jury, too; and they steadily adhered to that position until a year or two ago, when, to my surprise, they abandoned all those positions and took up the position that a court had a right to enjoin the commission of a crime, and that in Government cases like the Debs case that there should be no trial by jury in contempt cases. And it finally took shape in what is known as the Clayton antitrust bill, in some of its provisions. Now, that bill explicitly recognizes the right of the courts to issue injunctions to restrain acts which are crimes, provided they affect the right of property, etc., and that expressly grants to the Federal court, in cases like the Debs case, the right to have a trial by jury in contempt cases. It is an absolute abandonment by those gentlemen of the position for which they had always contended.

Now, so far as I can understand that bill, it has not made any change in the law—the substantive provisions of the law—in regard to the right to issue injunctions or the right to proceed to try cases—contempt cases—without a jury. There are, as I say, these specific exemptions in regard to the Government cases like the Debs case; but they put in that bill something that I think ought not to have been put in any bill yet. Mr. Gompers clamored for the passage of that bill, and I understood he had the support of the labor unions in this country, and that is this: That when a man is brought up for the violation of an injunction, the court having tried him, can not only sentence him to jail, and not only fine him a fine as a punishment, but can also fine him the amount of the damage he has done the party complaining or any other party. Any person who violates an injunction under the Clayton bill—for instance, if he were to burn up a railroad car that had $50,000 worth of property in it—he can be fined $50,000 in addition to the other fine, and he can be sent to jail to pay that fine—until that is paid—for the benefit of the party; and under the pardoning of the President there is no power to pardon for such an offense.

Now, that is a provision in the existing law which I think is so drastic and cruel, whether you apply it to labor men or to anybody else, that it ought not to be retained in the law.

Well, I guess I have said about all there is to say.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell wishes to ask you some questions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Of course, what you are telling us is your own construction of the Clayton law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, of course—

Commissioner O'CONNELL (interrupting). There are no decisions on it?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then it is your own construction of the law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. There can be no question about it, because it reads only one way.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But it is your construction of the law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes; but let me show you about that [reads]:

"If the accused shall be found guilty, judgment shall be entered accordingly, prescribing the punishment, either by fine or imprisonment or both, in the discretion of the court. Such fine shall be paid to the United States or to the complainant or other party injured by the act constituting the contempt, or may, where more than one is so damaged, be divided or apportioned among them as the court may direct; but in no case shall the fine to be paid to the United States exceed, in case the accused is a natural person, the sum of one thousand dollars, nor shall such punishment exceed a term of six months."

Now, in case of a fine payable to the United States of $1,000 there is a further fine of $50,000 for burning the car or blowing up a building or anything of that kind, and that is the property of the complainant, and the pardoning power of the President does not extend to that phase of it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understand, when you were discussing the question of possible extension of the right of injunction—I am not sure that I get your meaning right; do I understand that you hold that the employer has the property right in the workman?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No; but he has a property right in his business; he has a property right in his contracts with his workmen. That is the doctrine, you know, in the Adair case.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. His contract, then, would be on the so-called open shop, that he agreed to pay a man so much money for so many hours of labor?

Mr. DAVENPORT. But, here, suppose I have a contract with a man to work for me for a month, we will say. That is a contract right in him and in me. That is the same in its relation to the law and the Constitution as if it was a horse. And Congress can not take away from the courts the power to issue an injunction to preserve those rights. And if you care to have me do so, I will insert in my revised remarks the authority that established that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. We would be glad to have them.

Mr. DAVENPORT. It is not a contract right in the man, but it is the sacred right of everybody. I would like to read what the Supreme Court of the United States said.

Chairman WALSH. Well, it is better just to give the gist of it.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I will stick it in.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You say a man has a contract if he works for you a month?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Supposing the 250,000 workers in the United States Steel Co. were employed on a day, or so much a month, or so much an hour?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There is no written contract?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you mean to say that that employer has a property right in those men to prevent them from going on strike, by injunction?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No, sir; he could not prevent them from striking unless he had a contract with them, but he can go into a court of equity and get a restraining order prohibiting outsiders from interfering with their relations, on the basis of the property right or rights of a pecuniary nature.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did I understand you to say that there was no strike—all strikes were illegal where there was a coercive attachment with them? In other words, where it meant to coerce the employer into doing something?

Mr. DAVENPORT. In substance, something that he had the right, the legal right to do. Now, not where they merely quit and leave, but where they do the other things. In other words, the right to strike is not an absolute right.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Can you conceive of a strike of any character that has not for its purpose the coercion of an employer to do something?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I can conceive of it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I would be glad if you would enlighten us.

Mr. DAVENPORT. A man who don't want to work for another man—or men—can quit collectively or separately.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That would not necessarily take a strike to quit?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That would be a strike, would it not?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would you consider the question of a man asking them for an increase of wages a strike?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No, sir; not unless he didn't want to do it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If they strike to compel him to do it——

Mr. DAVENPORT. Then you put another phase of the matter in. It is well illustrated by Mr. Justice Harlan in the case of Thomas v. Oakes. Take railroad employees. Those men now under contract, of course, and every man not in such a situation that by ceasing to do work he endangers life, or something like that, has a right to quit. And they have a right to quit together, but if their purpose is to tie up the road——

Commissioner GARRISON. That is the Northern Pacific case?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir—why, it is an unlawful combination. Of course, when we are talking about enjoining a man from striking, we have to remember also that under the thirteenth amendment involuntary servitude is prohibited in this country. All the horses and the king's men can't compel a man to work for an employer, yet the courts can enjoin men from persuading men to quit, or ordering men to quit, or doing anything involved in the carrying out of an illegal combination. Perhaps I am not answering the question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes; it is very interesting.

Now, Mr. Davenport, this commission, among other things, is authorized under the law which has created it, to make investigations into a number of things, and among them is the growth of associations of employers of wage earners, and the effect of such associations upon the relations between employer and employee. It takes it that your association, the Anti-Boycott Association, is an association of employers?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I suppose so.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And it comes within the scope of what is meant here by associations of employers?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I think probably it would.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And because of such I will ask you some questions along that line.

You said you could not give us the names of the members. Can you give us the number of the members of your association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. What, with definiteness?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. No; approximately.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I would imagine 500.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does the Anti-Boycott Association have relations with other associations, such as the National Manufacturers' Association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. None whatever. What do you mean by relations? There is no connection whatever.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I will ask the question, do you exchange information with them?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I guess the bulletins.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. For instance, I understand the National Manufacturers' Association maintain a legal department the same as your association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I think they do.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does your legal department exchange as to what you are doing, and how you are doing it, with the legal department of the National Manufacturers' Association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't think so.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you keep in the affairs of your office, or of the association that you represent, files or indices of any kind that would indicate the type and character of organizations, or labor, and the men with whom you may or may not have legal controversies?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I could not give you any information on that, you would have to ask the secretary.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You as counsel for the Anti-Boycott Association, do you keep a record of any kind of individuals and associations?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No; all that I ever had to do with the association, a case comes up, and a member is threatened with labor troubles, and the question is whether he has legal redress—whether it is a case that calls for it. That would be passed on by me probably, and I have had charge in a general way with litigation. For instance, the Buck Stove & Range case, I drew the complaint in that case, and did so in the Danbury Hatters' case, I drew the complaint; and I conducted the litigation, I conducted the litigation, of course with the assistance of others, or I assisted them in conducting it in court, in these cases, but I have no such facts as you perhaps would like to know of.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, I am interested in knowing whether your association maintains any sort of a bureau that has for its purpose the collection of information that might be used, or would be valuable in the future for any imaginary case.

Mr. DAVENPORT. You mean law cases or decisions?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Decisions, records of men who are alleged to be active in movements—

Mr. DAVENPORT. Never, never. You perhaps have a mistaken idea about the association.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am trying to get it.

Mr. DAVENPORT. It is nothing along the line that you think of. The most that could be said about it, perhaps, would be, I think Mr. Merritt made a very careful collection of all decisions pertaining to labor, has collected the briefs in those cases, and all that, but nothing along the line you suggest.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does your legal department furnish, for instance, to State manufacturers' associations, or if they have local antiboycott associations in various States, prepared information in cases to go ahead without probably having to go to the expense of having to gather the information?

Mr. DAVENPORT. On law points?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I could not say, but I think very likely.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you defend the members of the Anti-Boycott Association in individual cases that may be brought against them, say, for instance, damage cases, or alleged damage cases they may have against somebody or some firm?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I never have had any such case as that that has been brought against any of them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The individual members, not the association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, no; I never have heard of any such case.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What was the cost to the Anti-Boycott Association in conducting the so-called hatters' case?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I couldn't tell you. It was 13 years in court. The aggregate amount?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Approximately the aggregate amount.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, now, I would give a guess of twenty or thirty thousand dollars.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And in the case of the Buck Stove & Range Co.?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I would think about eight or ten thousand dollars. I would think so. You see, the distinguished counsel that represents that association, he is under a general retainer. He gets paid whether he works or not, and he don't get any more pay when he works than when he doesn't work.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are you speaking of yourself now?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir; and that is the same way, I guess, with Mr. Merritt.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, since you bring the point up, are you retained at an annual salary by the Anti-Boycott Association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I have an annual retainer.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is that?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, now, I must decline to answer; it is too small.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you get a commission upon judgments secured on behalf of the Anti-Boycott Association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Never a cent, and nobody else.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What was your fee to the Anti-Boycott Association when you take charge of cases for them?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Nothing. These men club together and hire a lawyer at a stated retainer, and he does the work.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. For that retainer?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Sure.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is your entire time occupied in the affairs of the Anti-Boycott Association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Pretty nearly, mine.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you practice otherwise than for them?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, yes; I have an office in Bridgeport, and wish that the labor attending the service for the association were not such that it would keep me so busy.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. When you appear in your capacity on behalf of the organization, as I understand you to say you do, when you appear before a committee of Congress—

Mr. DAVENPORT. Or something.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You are there under a regular retainer?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is all.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do I understand you to say that you only appeared before Congress in those matters that directly or indirectly affected the Anti-Boycott Association or the members of that association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Sure; that is to say, in the respect I testified to. By the way, I was thinking since then there was one occasion when a matter came up before the House Committee on Labor, and that was when the question of having compulsory arbitration, and I did volunteer the position on that to be unconstitutional, but that was the single exception.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you consider the question of the hours of labor to affect the Anti-Boycott Association members?

Mr. DAVENPORT. In this way: Any concern that is running a 9 or 10 hour shop is precluded from competing for the work which is to be let to 8 hour and 9-hour shops. And in that way, of course, the Government is one of the greatest purchasing agents in the country—purchases—and that proposed action was a boycott on all these concerns. At any rate, that is the way it struck me.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It did not prohibit them from bidding; but I take it from what you mean they bid at a disadvantage.

Mr. DAVENPORT. These eight-hour laws prohibit the Government from buying from such concerns.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Unless they were brought under the eight-hour law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir; and you appeared there for it and I in opposition. But you ask why the Anti-Boycott Association was concerned in that. It was a boycott, I think, on all of those concerns that wanted to engage in Government work.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How far back, did I understand you to say, since you first appeared in Congress in the interest of these matters?

Mr. DAVENPORT. The first time I appeared was in the winter of 1903 and 1904, when I had the pleasure of forming your acquaintance.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the Anti-Boycott Association was formed when?

Mr. DAVENPORT. In 1903; it was formally organized along about May, and steps were taken to interest people in it commencing perhaps in July, 1902.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you consider if a Government in its appropriation makes a certain requirement for the standard of work, requires the employer shall build an engine at a certain standard, and that it also adds to that that certain conditions shall prevail in the manufacture of that article, that the latter part of that provision affects your association?

Mr. DAVENPORT. The way it strikes us or struck me was that to say that John Smith is manufacturing an engine, for instance, that the Government would want; to say he could not sell his articles to the Government because he worked his men 9 or 10 hours, and that the man who worked 8 hours only could, was to boycott the other fellow. That is my idea about it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But the present law says, or the present riders that were put in the appropriation bills the last couple of years provide, that the work shall be done on an eight-hour basis?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Sure.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It doesn't say that any man can not bid for it, but all he has to do is to comply with the requirements of the law.

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is true. Of course, this eight-hour business passed out of the realm of anything that I was interested in years ago. When they adopted the practice of putting these riders on, of course.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They got around your opposition in another way?

Mr. DAVENPORT. They knocked it out. But as far as that is concerned—well, I forget exactly the question you asked awhile ago.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It is answered, I think.

Now, the question that we are directly interested in just now is the conduct of courts in connection with industries, and so on, and we have had some very learned legal minds before us here. Do you believe that the poor man or laboring man, who is the poor man as a rule, has equal opportunity before the law with the rich man and the employer?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I think so. As far as my observation goes and in any case that I ever had—the fact of the business is, you know, in these labor cases the laboring man has altogether the advantage so far as resources are concerned.

For instance, now, in the Loewe case. The American Federation of Labor would levy a 1 cent assessment on each of its members, and that would raise $20,000, and they were able to pay counsel that charged $2,500 a day for every day they appeared in court. The price of a poor cigar, 5 cents, would raise $100,000. There is not so powerful a financial institution in the country in the way of raising money than the American Federation of Labor, and it is the same way in regard to the Union Hatters. They had 9,000 members, and an assessment of $1 would raise $9,000, and they used to raise it.

On that point, Mr. O'Connell, if you would look among the statements of the American Federation of Labor as to what moneys they have collected and what moneys they have disbursed in the conduct of the Gompers case, the Buck case, the hatters' case, you would be staggered at the amount of it. Lawyers get $50,000 out of a case. That is doing pretty well. And yet without any burden at all, either upon the defendants or upon the member, because an assessment on an individual, of course, is automatically collected. The executive committee calls for a penny assessment. Thereupon each national union has to pay over the amount of that penny assessment, according to their numbers. If it is the miners' union or a carpenters' union, which is their largest, about, they pay that sum right into the treasury, and they then in turn get it out of the local, and they in turn get it out of the individual member. And that is one of the things in regard to organized labor, the command they have got for pecuniary resources—of pecuniary resources—is a matter that should be considered.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes; but, now, I think I have heard you say on different occasions, in court, I think once, that the American Federation of Labor represented a very small percentage of the workmen in the country.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Sure; yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How about the thousands and millions of workmen who have not these means of collecting funds? What position do they occupy, compared with the rich man?

Mr. DAVENPORT. In what kind of a case?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Any kind of a case. Say that a man sues his employer for losing his leg?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, I should say that the poor man in that case would be at a disadvantage with his wealthy defendant. That is the reason why I have reconciled my old-fogy mind to the idea of these workmen's compensation laws. But in any case where the war is between organized labor and, as you call it, organized capital, so far as pecuniary resources are concerned, and the ability to command eminent counsel, the labor union gets more money and is able to use it more than any employer that I know anything about or any combination of employers.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But, so far as the individual workman is concerned, who has not the association, probably has not seen the advisability for a number of reasons for joining his fellow men in an association, the so-called hearse chaser, the ambulance chaser, is the man who gets it, if there is any money, gets the largest portion of it?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is true.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the poor man either is driven from court for want of funds to carry his case on—

Mr. DAVENPORT (interrupting). That is true.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. His leg is gone?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is true.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There is no remuneration for him?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is true.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He is a fit subject for the scrap heap?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is true.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is the inevitable result?

Mr. DAVENPORT. And it is for that reason, as I say, that I think the movement for workmen's compensation laws is a very excellent one.

Is it implied in your question, any suggestion that it has been stated by me, that it is not an excellent thing for men to form unions?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Oh, no. I give you credit—

Mr. DAVENPORT (interrupting). And it is so laid down by the Supreme Court.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I give all men of this enlightened age credit for intelligence enough to know that they ought to associate.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Sure.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. We are living in that age.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Sure.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, I want to discuss with you a second the incorporation of labor unions. I understood you to say, in answer to a question of the chairman, you believed organized labor should not incorporate, but that probably it would be best for the individual if they did?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I thought I explained my—

Commissioner O'CONNELL. (interrupting). Yes; I think I understand; but I just want to catch if that is the outline.

Mr. DAVENPORT. This is the idea, as I said this morning. Originally the idea of incorporation of labor unions was very popular with the active men in what is called the labor movement; and if you will look back into your proceedings, you will find that for many, many years it was one of the planks in organized labor's doctrine. I think Mr. Lennon, perhaps, can remember it better, because I know Mr. Lennon was there at the beginning.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He is a good deal older man than I am.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, he was there at the beginning.

Commissioner LENNON. Forty-three years is all.

Mr. DAVENPORT. How many?

Commissioner LENNON. Forty-three.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, the idea was that it would be a good thing for labor unions to incorporate. And in accord with that ultimately there was passed through Congress an act providing for the incorporation of labor unions here in the District of Columbia. But subsequent reflection has evidently induced the leaders in the labor movement, so called, the organized labor movement, to change their position in regard to that, and for the last 10 or 15 years they have been very bitterly opposed to it. I should think, from the trend of their views as expressed, that the reason was that they thought they would bring themselves under governmental supervision, the same as any other corporation, and that that was an obnoxious interference with private rights of the individual workingman; that their funds as union funds could be got at and appropriated in that way. That is unquestionably true. But the trouble is this: That unless you are incorporated the individual member stands the same as the member of any other voluntary association and is responsible personally and individually on the principles of agency for the acts of their officers and not like a stockholder. A stockholder in a corporation is liable—his liability is confined to his subscription to the stock—to the amount he has paid in; possibly in the case of Government banks, national banks, it is double; but the individual stockholder is not responsible for the acts of the officers of the bank, though done within the scope of their employment as officers of the bank and in and about the business of the bank, to avoid which incorporation has been resorted to. The principle is that the individual members of the association—of a voluntary association—are responsible for the acts of the agents of the association done in pursuance of or within the scope of their employment and in and about the business, even though they forbade the act to be done, on the same principle that if your chauffeur takes your auto out and you tell him, "Be careful, now; don't you run into anybody," and he does, and in spite of what you told him he runs into somebody, why, you are responsible. That principle of agency exists, and it is the same way in regard to every kind of voluntary association. And, moreover, you know that in some States disputes are permitted against the voluntary association, and you can go after its funds and you can also reach, through proper process, the property of the individual member of the association; but you can also proceed directly, as we did in the hatters' case, against the individual member.

Now, the effect of incorporation would be to relieve the individual members from responsibility, but in doing that, of course, they would have to come under Government supervision.

Now, I know what is stated in this little pamphlet by Mr. Merritt; those are his views. If I was a Senator or Member of Congress and I was called upon on my individual responsibility to decide whether, as a whole, I would vote for the compulsory incorporation of labor unions, if such a thing is possible—I doubt if it is possible—but whether I should vote that all unions should be incorporated, I think I should vote against it on the general grounds of public policy. I should as soon think of requiring all partnerships to be incorporated and requiring all people to do business as partners as requiring all workingmen to incorporate, and force them to do so, for the various reasons I have stated.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The purpose I had in asking that question was to get clear your position. As I understand, you would advise that labor unions do not incorporate, and if you were in a position to legislate you would not legislate for the incorporation of laboring men?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I would not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But you feel, on the other hand, that the employer has a greater advantage against the individual, when he is not incorporated, for damages?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I think so.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. We have had before us a great number of employers, large and small, legal minds, and I think probably you are the first one I ever heard representing organized employers in any capacity who has said that you would not favor the incorporation of labor organizations. Others say that one of their complaints against organized labor is that they have no remedy, because the unions are not incorporated, and that they should be incorporated, so that they could be held legally and be on a level in that respect with the employers; that is the sort of argument we have had.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I repudiate that argument; I say it has not any foundation in law. I point to the Loewe case and a hundred other cases. The very object of incorporation is to limit the liability of the men that compose it; that is the very object of it. A voluntary association is in its form, and so forth, the same as an unincorporated society. The very object of incorporation is to limit the liability.

Of course, I do not say that if a member of a labor union says to another man that he shan't do a certain thing that he is liable. The distinction, as I tried to point out this morning in my imperfect way, between a voluntary association, like a labor union, and a partnership is as follows: Anyone of the members of the partnership acting within the reasonable scope of—of the work of the partnership can bind his partners and by his contract bind every member of it. It is not so in voluntary associations. They are bound only by the officers that they select to conduct their business; otherwise there is no distinction whatever.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you believe, Mr. Davenport, that if labor has the right to boycott that the employer should also have the right to blacklist; that that would be a case of equity?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't think either of them should have that right; neither has that right in spite of the Clayton Antitrust Bill.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Say they have not; in the case of the labor man, if he boycotts, he must do it in such an open way that it must necessarily be known. If I go to you and ask you not to buy a hat from John Brown, why it is publicly done. How are we to discover whether blacklisting is going on or not?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I don't know.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is there any equity between the two?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Of course the basis of a boycott is combination. I or any individual person, not associated with others, has got the right to go to everybody and ask them not to trade with a certain person.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, one employer who blacklists must do it in conjunction with another?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Now, then, to bring it in condemnation of the law it has got to be a combination of employers, respectively. To illustrate it in this way, Mr. O'Connell: Suppose there are half a dozen bakers in my town and I go to one of them and I say, "I would like a loaf of bread and here is the money"; that man has a perfect right to say to me, "Do you belong to the Methodist Church?" And I say, "No"; and he can say, "Well, if you don't I won't sell you any bread." And then I can go to the next one and he can say the same thing, and so I can go to all of them and they can each one say it; but if they combine together not to sell the bread in order to make me join the Methodist Church they are guilty of conspiracy. Now, as I say, it is the combination to oppress.

Now, if the employers unite for the purpose of blacklisting a man, as I understand it is claimed they may do under the Clayton bill, just the same as the unions it is claimed may do it, it is an outrageous wrong, and no laws like that should be permitted to stand.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, if the workmen, as you say, combine, as the bakers did, because the man did not belong to their church; on the other hand, the employers generally in the different trades combine and they maintain employment bureaus or offices and they maintain the index-card system of all their employees, and if a man is discharged or leaves the employment of one of them, or he quits one of them and goes to another for employment—he has been an agitator, or a union man, or he has done a thousand and one things which are charged against him; and that information is held and when he goes to another employer in search of work they will call up the one for whom he has been working and ask for his record, and they send his card over to the other shop, and for no reason the other employer says, "We have no work for you to-day." He might as well say, "We have no work for you because you don't belong to our church."

Mr. DAVENPORT. Do you observe the recognized distinctions in things?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Oh, yes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Suppose my wife wanted to employ a servant and a servant applied to her for employment, and she learned she had worked for Mrs. Harriman. So she called Mrs. Harriman up on the phone and asked her all about this servant and as to her habits, as to her honesty and as to her skill and one thing and another; and she told my wife about her—that is a privileged communication under the law, she could not be sued as long as she acted in good faith. Now, so far as this bureau you speak of is devoted to legitimate purposes—and every sensible man knows what it is—diffusion of the character of the man, it is entirely legitimate, and I should suppose commendable.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Where, then, would the line be drawn?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, if it is used for the purpose of preventing that man from getting employment because of his activities as a union or as a nonunion man, why the books are full of cases where men have brought suit and recovered damages, not only against his employers, but against officers of unions for getting men discharged. It is where the purpose is to injure; and I can see that the fate of the case you quote would depend in a large degree upon the circumstances; but any combination of anybody—two or more persons—with intent to oppress or injure anybody—to deprive a man of his opportunities of earning a living—is an actionable conspiracy and in a court of equity its execution can be restrained where the damage will be irremediable.

Chairman WALSH. Would it be convenient, Mr. Davenport, for you to remain over until to-morrow?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Then, if there is no objection, I will ask you to leave the stand at this time; there is a witness that we have promised to let go to Chicago, and Mr. Weinstock has some questions to ask of you, and also Mr. Lennon.

We might get through with the other witness this afternoon, if you will remain in attendance.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I will; but I can stay until to-morrow.

Chairman WALSH. Would it be more convenient for you to leave now with the assurance that you will not be needed until to-morrow morning?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I am getting used to the atmosphere, and I believe I will stay. I have had the pleasure of examining Mr. Lennon and Mr. O'Connell in court, and I want to see how it seems for them to have the power of questioning.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Johannsen.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ANTON JOHANNSEN.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, please.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. A. Johannsen.

Chairman WALSH. What does the "A" stand for, Mr. Johannsen?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Anton.

Chairman WALSH. What is your age?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Forty-three.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. California.

Chairman WALSH. What place in California?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Corte Madera.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you resided in California, Mr. Johannsen?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. About eight years.

Chairman WALSH. Prior to that time where did you live?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. In Chicago.

Chairman WALSH. Have you, during your life, been in any official position with labor organizations?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I was business agent for the Amalgamated Wood Workers a couple of years in Chicago, and was State organizer for the Building Trades Council of California, and at present I am general organizer for the United Brotherhood of Carpenters.

Chairman WALSH. Please sketch, as concisely as you can but still completely, your history in industry, when you started to work and what at, give us a brief story of your life in industry down to the present time.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. It is a long story. I started to work in the mill business in Clinton, Iowa, for Curtiss Bros., a good nonunion shop.

Chairman WALSH. At what age?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No—I worked the first thing when I came here in a brickyard.

Chairman WALSH. Were you born in this country?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No; in Germany, in that portion where they have no "Kultur," but a lot of black bread. I don't want anyone to be prejudiced against me because I was born in Germany; that is a pretty bad statement in Washington at this time.

I worked in the brickyard for a year and a half, and worked for Curtiss Bros. after that.

Chairman WALSH. How long—how old were you when you came from Germany?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Between 9 and 10.

Chairman WALSH. Did you go to school in Germany?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I went to school about two and one-half years in Germany. I did not get any chance to go to school here.

I worked for Curtiss Bros. until I was 19, and I was always threatened by father that he would give me a beating if I lost my job, and I lost my job, and so I skipped out and got my experience on the road three or four years, and then I came back, and my mother was kind and considerate, and she saw to it that I got married, and I married well; I got a good wife; I got the best of the bargain.

After working for Curtiss Bros. about four or five years I moved to Chicago, and there I became interested in the Amalgamated Wood Workers' International Union and became a member of that organization and was more or less active, and was its business agent for a period of about two years, and then I moved to California. There I became a member of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters, and after being in California for about a year became the general organizer for the State Building Trades Council of California. My place of employment as organizer was in Oakland, seven or eight months, after which I was sent to Los Angeles, as a general campaign was anticipated in Los Angeles to organize that State. With that object in view, several general organizers were sent to Los Angeles to make an attempt to organize Los Angeles, and I was sent there as a representative of the State Building Trades Council. That was in 1910.

I have made a few notes, and I suppose there is no objection to referring to them?

Chairman WALSH. No. You know the general topic we are on, and if you have had any connection with any of the events out of which charges of violence have grown, I wish you would tell about them.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I would like to speak about the ironworkers.

Chairman WALSH. What connection did you have with the ironworkers?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Only as I was State organizer of the Building Trades Council. And that trouble was in 1910, when the Times Building in Los Angeles was blown up, and I was quite intimately identified with the defendants of that trial in Los Angeles.

Chairman WALSH. The McNamaras?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes, sir; and also the ironworkers in Indianapolis; and I was on the road soliciting funds for the defense of the ironworkers while they were on trial in Indianapolis.

Chairman WALSH. Were you acquainted with the McNamaras?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I got acquainted with J. J. McNamara before he went to the coast, and I got acquainted with J. B. in the Los Angeles County jail and have interview him several times since at the San Quentin prison. I hope that the commission will take into consideration that I am under indictment at the present time and have been. I am charged with the transportation of dynamite from State to State. I have not seen a stick of dynamite, although I might be able to recognize one because I have read and heard so much about it. I am under indictment, although I have demanded trial every six months, periodically, but I have failed to get a trial in Los Angeles on Federal indictment, and I am out on bail of $1,000.

Chairman WALSH. Were you indicted in connection with the McNamara incident?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I was indicted on the 30th of December immediately preceding the trial of the McNamaras. The men in Indianapolis were indicted in the month of January following. O. A. Tveitmor, Mune, and Clancey were indicted in both Indianapolis and Los Angeles. I was indicted in Los Angeles only. But that is about enough of that.

I want to read a brief if I can, if you are interested in the fight between the Erectors' Association and the ironworkers [reads]:

"Since the great strike of 1892, known as the Homestead strike, which failed, every effort has been put forth by the owners and proprietors and directors of the United States Steel Corporation to discourage and annihilate unionism in their industry.

"Directly after the Steel Trust was organized it began the business of issuing stocks and bonds, and within a short time the common and preferred stock and the interlying bonds of this company amounted to $1,500,000,000. On all of these bonds and preferred stock have constantly been paid interest since that time, and most of the common stock has paid dividends at the rate of from 4 to 5 per cent.

"In addition to that, an enormous amount of property has been accumulated to the earnings of this company.

"This property originally capitalized at $1,500,000,000 was not worth more than $300,000,000. It was therefore stocked and bonded at the rate of $5 per $1.

"The Steel Trust must provide a way to pay interest and dividends upon this vast amount of water. There was nothing to do but to take it from the workingman.

"According to a statement made by Louis Brandeis, of Boston (and Brandeis is considered, I believe, an authority on economics), a meeting was held in J. Pierpont Morgan's office in New York June, 1901, by the board of directors of the United States Steel Corporation. At this meeting a resolution was passed to prevent any further extension of unionism in the steel industry.

"As an indication of what has happened since that time, the American Federation of Labor at their Atlanta convention in 1911 points out in one of their official documents that every labor union in the steel industry has been exterminated, with the single except of the Iron Workers' International Association.

"At the Philadelphia convention of the Iron Workers in 1905, a declaration of unfairness was declared against the National Erectors' Association and the American Bridge Co., two subsidiary organizations in the steel industry.

"Since that time a bitter and relentless industrial war has raged from coast to coast between these two contending forces.

"In the course of this war the Steel Trust stood for profits and greed. The ironworkers fought for a shorter workday, a living wage, against the 12-hour day 7 days per week which had been in vogue in the steel industry for many years.

"On the side of the Steel Trust were allied the following forces: Enormous wealth, Government, great newspapers, the police powers of the State, and the greatest of all powers—starvation.

"On the side of the ironworkers were men, women, and children fired with social courage to fight as best they could against this antisocial institution. They were afforded very little or no opportunity of protection from any source outside of that which they were able to develop within themselves. The very nature of their work, being as it is exceptionally hazardous, tends to develop physical courage as well as a social instinct for collective self-help.

"It should be evident to any reasonable human being that the policy of the Iron Workers' International Union gave better protection to their organization and members than that which was adopted by other labor unions in the steel industry, which have long since been annihilated and subjected to a 12-hour day 7 days per week, with an average wage of $409 per year.

"I got this data from the Stanley committee several years ago that investigated the steel industry: Average wage $4.09 a year, 12 hours a day, and 7 days a week.

"Whatever may be said for or against the iron workers, the bold fact remains that they had little or nothing to choose from. Either they must surrender to this power and be subject to its economic and social tyranny and suffer long hours' toil with short pay, such as is now in vogue in all other departments of this industry, or do just what was done until the public conscience could be aroused against the Government's indifference to the social needs of labor.

"If a man represented the ironworkers in the capacity of an organizer and approached a contractor who was building steel bridges, or buildings, on the question of organizing his men, establishing the eight-hour day, and paying the union rate of wages, it was not an unusual thing to have the contractor acknowledge the social justice of labor's demand. But invariably it would be pointed out that the National Erectors' Association and the American Bridge Co. had such control over the output of steel that any contractor who should in any way antagonize the Steel Trust's labor policy would be confronted with the possibility of financial ruin. And so it came that this great corporation, with its allied corporations, like the Standard Oil, exercised a power and force that even the Government itself seemed unable to control.

"The United States steel industry is protected by a high tariff, which makes it possible for them to escape competition abroad. But the labor market has little or no protection from the Government, and therefore is compelled to compete with the cheap markets of the world.

"J. J. McNamara informs me that during his administration as secretary of the iron workers that the erectors' association filled their organizations of labor with spies in all the large cities. But in spite of all the opposition the membership of the iron workers constantly grew until they reached nearly 14,000 members, as compared with a little over 6,000 when he took office. The 8-hour day was established from coast to coast as against the 9 and 10 hour day which prevailed in many localities prior to his administration. An average rate of wage of $4.30 now prevails for an 8-hour day, as compared with an average wage of $2.30 for 9 hours 10 years ago."

For fear I forget at this time, before I get to Stockton, I might call your attention, especially of my friend Mr. Weinstock, that in the lockout in Stockton that was brought against us last year and lasted over six months. During the course of that lockout they put up a building known as the—I forget the name of the building now, but it was a five-story, Class C building. They were very careful before they declared the open shop on that building. They waited until iron workers were through erecting the steel. It is absolutely impossible in any city, outside of Los Angeles, to erect a steel building without the assistance of the organization of iron workers. They have a good organization. Drew knows that.

Some three years ago the American Federation of Labor made an earnest effort to organize the unorganized in the United States Steel industry. With this object in view a circular was issued in 13 different languages for distribution amongst the men working 12 hours a day for this corporation.

I was present with the officers of the Chicago Federation of Labor that went to Gary, Ind., for the purpose of distributing these circulars in the hope of interesting these workers to form labor unions that might afford some opportunity to alleviate this colossal social injustice.

When we arrived at the plant we found a large wall barring out all visitors, and private police protecting each entrance against interlopers. Over 10,000 men are employed at Gary, a small city named after the head of the United States Steel Corporation. When the men came out of the gates one could read on their faces despair, lack of faith, and no hope, completely dominated by fear that this antisocial beast, the United States Steel Corporation, would dismiss them from service if they should exercise the ordinary right of reading our message. Hence they refused to take our handbills and, in nearly every case, were afraid to look at us, to say nothing about the possibility of social intercourse as freemen.

Any institution that is responsible, as this corporation is, for driving the last bit of hope from the human heart and soul of over 700,000 men, women, and children, is infinitely more criminal and dangerous to a higher civilization and a better society than all the charges made against the McNamaras and other union men, even if they should all be true, which labor denies.

The McNamara brothers are in prison, and so are many of the members of the Iron Workers' Union and many other unions. But little effort has been set forth to ascertain the cause of this social disease that is responsible for the eternal conflict between the house of want and the house of have.

The McNamaras, so far as I have been able to learn, had great hopes to make the world listen to labor's suffering. It is their belief, as well as the opinion of thousands of others, that this very commission is in a large measure the response to their activities. If this be true, then they are not suffering in vain, for the men, women, and children, not only in the ranks of labor, but in many other walks of life, are hopeful that through this commission the lights will be turned on, and industrialism will be shown as it is. Labor has nothing to fear from the full truth. We believe this would help to bring about a greater intelligence, and a more humane understanding could be obtained by the public of the real economic and social condition of our industries.

During the course of this industrial war it is common knowledge that the employing class have not only used every effort to control the courts by legitimate or other means, but they have invariably imported professional strike breakers and thugs to commit acts of violence, in the hope of crystallizing a public opinion against labor.

These large corporations have such a distinct advantage over labor by reason of their control of the press which makes the fight so much more difficult and tends to embitter men and women in the ranks of labor who feel the suffering of our class the keenest.

It is common knowledge that in every large industrial strike the newspapers of the country so arrange the information for the public, giving it a color that is intended to be favorable for the employers, regardless of the mere little thing called the truth.

An organization called the Associated Charities of Pittsburgh made an investigation of the conditions of labor in the steel industries, and they report in their findings that the rate of wages paid is far below what is necessary for an ordinary family to sustain themselves on.

I was at the trial in Indianapolis for some time. Now, if I had not learned to read and had no social intercourse with anybody, and didn't know anything, had never met anybody, I would have sworn that that trial was a meeting of the board of directors of the United States Steel Corporation. If I didn't know Drew and had not seen him, I would have imagined that Judge Anderson was Walter Drew. A fair trial? Heavens! I would not begin to consider it a fair trial. The jury retired on Thursday night, and according to their own statement this jury that was considering a blanket indictment against 40 men, there were originally 54 men indicted, but when the case came up for consideration it was set for the 1st of October, and when it came up for trial there were six or seven of them dismissed, although this indictment had hung over them for six or seven months. That is unimportant, of course, they are only working-men; but when the trial started, gradually the number of defendants dwindled down, were dismissed, until the case finally went to the jury, and when it finally went to the jury there were 40 defendants to which the jury had to give consideration, which would mean their life and their liberty. The jury retired on Thursday, and acknowledged, according to their own statements, that they did not begin to give consideration to the testimony until Friday morning at 10 o'clock, and admitted that they had reached a conclusion before 5.30 on Friday night, and did not report until Saturday morning. I will tell you why. If you will go back a little bit you will find that every time the M. & M., or Manufacturers' Association, or Burns Detective Agency, or any other detective agency, or enemy of labor, when they thought they had a good story against labor they arranged so that it happened on Saturday. You will find that Haywood was kidnapped on Saturday, the McNamaras on Saturday, the grand jury brought in their verdict on Saturday; everything on Saturday. They have a fine publicity agent; they pay for it the same as Rockefeller. That is not force or violence, that is just money.

They have figured out, and I have had it reliably from newspaper men from this city, from New York, from Chicago, from San Francisco, in fact I have never yet met a newspaper man who was inclined to deny it, at least, those that they could occasionally, on the q. t. tell the truth and they are not many, but they tell me that it is figured out that about 10,000,000 more human beings read the Sunday papers than any other paper, and so a message that shall have for its purpose sending out some more poison against the social hopes of labor must happen on Saturday, so it can be put in on Sunday. They don't believe in violence, that is a mistake; they believe in law and order.

During that trial there is positive evidence that the train was ordered by the Government officials on the 19th day of November, 40 days before the trial closed. They ordered a special train to convey 90 people to the Leavenworth Penitentiary. I will show you how close they guessed—an ordinary person, if you were next to the game you would not be surprised, but to show you that they guess pretty close, there were 93 or 96, maybe 99. But anyway, the jury were all farmers. I have nothing against the farmer, but after all a man who is so far removed from the industrial whirlpool, it is difficult for him to get the point of view of labor at industrial centers, and when a person does not get your point of view, don't blame them for convicting you, if they have the power. They can not give you any consideration, and don't understand you; they don't know your language. That was the trouble with those poor farmers.

I don't say that the jury was fixed, but I do say if you had fixed it, Mr. National Erectors' Association, you could not have done it better, with the single exception they were too anxious, they brought in a blanket verdict, a blanket indictment covering 38 men, finding them equally guilty on a blanket indictment, and it was so wrong that even Judge Anderson couldn't stand for it, and he dismissed 5 of them. There was one man dismissed after he was examined by Judge Anderson. It seems that some one got word to Judge Anderson to this effect—I can't think of his name now, but I can get it if necessary—but there was some man, a member of the executive board of the International Iron Workers' Association at the time they declared the National Erectors' Association unfair, he voted against the closed shop, and Judge Anderson found it out somehow and he asked him about it, and when he found out he voted against the closed shop he was acquitted, there was no evidence against him; he was all right. He was for the open shop. There were men who were indicted that it was found had not been members of the organization for some time and were not taking active part any more, and they were dismissed also, everything was all right; but when the jury came out and convicted 38, 33 of them finally went to the penitentiary.

Everything was so staged; I don't know whether the Government did it or not, but somebody did it, and I am inclined to think that it is not unreasonable to think that the National Erectors' Association, who were interested in making this as spectacular as possible; anyway, those men were chained alongside of deputies and taken down the principal street for exposé to the county jail. I am very glad to say that their relatives and their friends had sufficient courage to stand by them. I can not help but say for the women, at least, not one woman in that whole fight of the ironworkers, either in Indianapolis or Los Angeles, showed any yellow streak. They all stood pat, every one of them.

Mrs. Painter, the wife of one of the men convicted from Omaha, Nebr., lined up all of the women in the hall after the conviction and went to them with clenched fists and said to them: "Don't you cry; don't you give the erectors' association the satisfaction; put your tears in your muscles; and if our men go to prison, we will have to make the fight. Some day labor will understand."

God! If they ever do, there will be something doing, believe me! That is all. I understand labor; you don't; and the other fellow can't understand; you can tell that by the last witness.

I was in California when the conviction came. I went to Santa Cruz to tell Tveitmoe's wife and children all about the trial, and tried to give them some encouragement and some hope.

Chairman WALSH. Was that Tveitmoe from San Francisco one of the defendants?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. O. A. Tveitmoe, from San Francisco, one of the men convicted, and his case was appealed, and he got the Supreme Court, or the higher court, to throw his case out on account of lack of evidence. A man had a right to send a Christmas card from California to Indianapolis, so the higher court said, but they were mistaken according to the erectors' association, but we won't go into that. When Mrs. Tveitmoe was interviewed by the Examiner, I thought she gave a very unique interview. She said: "I don't know nothing about his union affairs. He is good to his family and true to his friends, and they had better not make him mad." She was a Viking Norwegian woman.

I am glad to say that every union of ironworkers had sufficient social courage and loyalty to reelect every man that was convicted. When they went to prison they took care of the families, and those that are in prison now, including old lady McNamara. When they went to prison the first thing we did in our State convention in Los Angeles we suspended all rules and order of business, and took up the first thing, the reelection of general secretary and treasurer, and executive board members, and elected Tveitmoe and Clancey by acclamation, and it was the first time this proceeding ever took place in our convention.

Now, about Los Angeles. The organizers went there in the early part of January, 1910, and I don't know of anywhere where the Merchants & Manufacturers are so well organized and have so much power and so much influence as in Los Angeles. There was a time in Los Angeles when we could not engage a lawyer for love or money, except a few socialists. They had not much to lose, anyway, you know, and you could not get any other lawyer; you had to get them from San Francisco.

Los Angeles was recognized by the labor movement, at least on the Pacific coast, and I am satisfied in most of the East, as a city of slaves, where labor had scarcely any power whatsoever. The full strength of the Merchants & Manufacturers' Association was in every instance directed against any individual or against any individual union at any given time they showed any signs of strength, in order to keep them squelched. We have always been told that whatsoever ye sow, that shall ye also reap. I wonder if Otis believes that? We always reap what we sow. In 1910 a general strike was organized in the metal trades. Although not an act of violence occurred, the city council, four weeks after the strike had been inaugurated, passed an ordinance drafted by Earl Rogers, chief council for the Merchants & Manufacturers' Association, making it unlawful for any union picket to speak to a nonunion man. You would hardly believe that if you were not there. Well, I happened to be at the city council when this ordinance was passed. Now, this city council is comprised of what we call "Goo-goo's." The Goo-goos are reformed Republicans and Democrats, whatever that may mean. The city council was, of course, elected as an anti-corporation council. They were against corporations, and against the Southern Pacific particularly, and against corporate interests that were controlled by the crooks, and such men as Otis, Fredericks, and that gang. And when the strike came on and this respectable democratic anticorporation city council had to choose between taking the dope, as it were, from Earl Rogers, whom they hated and looked upon as vicious and crooked, for years active in California rotten politics and connected with the corporation interests, Earl Rogers dictated that, wrote it, read it to the council, and made an argument. Do you know what the argument was? Oh, I wish every one of you men could have heard that. It was rich. Earl Rogers argued before this city council as follows [reads]:

"About five years ago a great strike took place in a city not over 500 miles from Los Angeles"—

He didn't want to name San Francisco. There is an awful feeling between those two cities, you know. [Continues reading:]

"And in that strike some bricks were thrown and some men were hurt and some men were nearly killed; and therefore I advise you to pass this ordinance."

Well, if you can see any logic in that—maybe a lawyer would, but a shoemaker would not. Because there was a strike in San Francisco five years previous to this—that was the famous street car men's strike—therefore the city council of Los Angeles should pass that ordinance prohibiting all kinds of picketing, and they voted for it unanimously, and the old mayor signed it immediately, and it got into a journal right away and became a law. Well, we consulted the peacemakers, as we always do, and so we called a meeting of the representatives of all the unions in Los Angeles, two or three men from each union, and called in the only two lawyers we could get, Job Harriman and Fred Spring, because the others knew they would be boycotted by the M. & M.; and the M. & M. do it on the "q. t.," but it is very effective. But these lawyers pointed out to us that the city of Los Angeles had a democratic charter, and that this charter provided that when this council passed an ordinance, why, such an ordinance would lie on the table 30 days, and if within that 30 days 15 per cent of the voters should send in a petition asking that the ordinance be submitted to a referendum vote it would be submitted to referendum vote. Then there was something else in the charter. Oh, my! They always get that in. "Except an ordinance to preserve the peace of Los Angeles."

They can always get you on that. They can get almost all the working people. Now, when the politicians come around the camp they say they want this, because this means peace. And nobody can get up and say, "I am not for peace. I want to fight." You can't get elected to office if you do that. So they had this joker in the charter: "Except an ordinance to preserve the peace of Los Angeles." So it was written up, and so it was worded accordingly. And Earl Rogers personally, when he became the chief counsel for Darrow subsequently, he did not hesitate in telling me personally, he said, "This was a joke on the Goo-goos; I put it over on them." So they passed the ordinance. We couldn't do nothing at all—had to do one of two things, either be cowards and call the strike off, or else tell the city council to go to hell; and we did the latter. You will excuse me, Mrs. Harriman, if you please.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Certainly.

Chairman WALSH. We will leave that out, please, Mr. Johannsen.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Very well, Mr. Chairman.

So we advised these men against calling this strike off. We have a right to speak to men. This is a rank invasion of the worst kind. And we called a meeting of the men who were affected, about 1,200 of them, and put it to them plain and straight.

The union men and women of California had pledged themselves to pay 25 cents a week out of their wages for an indefinite period until Los Angeles should become organized, and they were sending that pledge, about $6,500 a week, for the Los Angeles strikers from San Francisco to finance the strike with, together with what we were getting from the international organization. We called the men together and described the situation briefly and without any exaggeration, and told them what it would mean; told them we could not afford to hire expensive lawyers; we could not afford to pay fines; we could not afford to bail anybody out. But they ought to resist this ordinance, and if they were willing to we were willing to. We took a secret vote—a secret ballot—after the explanation, after everybody was informed that if you go on the picket line and get arrested you will not be bailed out. If you are found guilty, your fine won't be paid. You will have to suffer. We wanted to go to jail as a protest against this rank injustice. And so we put it to a vote, and the vote was unanimous on the secret ballot that the men would rather go to jail than surrender to such a rank piece of favoritism in legislation.

The passage of this ordinance more than anything else instilled a feeling of hatred and bitterness and resentment in the working people of Los Angeles against the Government. The result was that every man engaged in it unanimously voted on the secret ballot that he preferred to go to jail, and so forth, and so on.

During this year 1910, in the month of August—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). What was the "so forth and so on?"

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, I have already repeated that to you.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, you have?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. During this year the now governor of California, Gov. Johnson, made a speech in Los Angeles in Simpson's Auditorium when he was a candidate for governor, denouncing Harrison Gray Otis in the following language:

"In the city from which I have come we have drunk to the very dregs the cup of infamy. We have had vile officials, we have had rotten newspapers, we have had men who sold their birthright, we have dipped into every infamy, every form of wickedness has been ours in the past, every debased passion and every sin has flourished. But we have nothing so vile, nothing so low, nothing so debased, nothing so infamous in San Francisco, nor did we ever have, as Harrison Gray Otis. This man has attacked me on the only side to which I will not respond, concerning which, rather than respond, I will lose the governorship of the State of California. He sits there in senile dementia with gangrened heart and rotten brain, grimacing at every reform, chattering impotently at all things that are decent, frothing, fuming, violently gibbering, going down to his grave in snarling infamy. This man Otis is the one blot on the banner of southern California; he is the bar sinister upon your escutcheon. My friends, he is the one thing that all California looks at when in looking at southern California they see anything that is disgraceful, depraved, corrupt, crooked, and putrescent—that is Harrison Gray Otis."

It is reasonable to presume that had Samuel Gompers made this speech at this time he would have undoubtedly been indicted by the grand jury, charged with being an accomplice in blowing up the Times.

It was common to hear people on the streets in every city on the Pacific coast give vent to the sentiment "Why didn't they get Otis?" I have heard it all over the country, "Why didn't they kill Otis? It would have been all right."

I am informed that a statement of this character was made by William J. Burns, the great detective, to some of the newspaper men in San Francisco.

The demands of labor in Los Angeles were very nominal and only that which they were already receiving in San Francisco and other coast cities, the metal trades employers in San Francisco contending that unless labor could raise the standard in Los Angeles the employers would be forced to lower the standard in San Francisco.

The Merchants & Manufacturers compelled their members to deposit a cash bond of $5,000 as a guarantee that the employers would not deal with the unions and would insist upon the so-called "open shop," which is open only to a working class that is docile and sufficiently browbeaten to accept whatever terms the employer may insist upon. All men and women who make an intelligent and militant effort toward a better social life are boycotted and penalized with all the power that the M. & M. can rally against them.

I submit for the commission's information a copy of the San Francisco Bulletin, under date of January 10, 1911, which contains the M. & M.'s attitude toward employers that are inclined to be fair, which will show the viciousness of the employers' association, quite regardless of law, order, civilization, or anything else.

(Witness submitted a copy of the San Francisco Bulletin of January 10, 1911, containing an article entitled "Los Angeles boycotts all workingmen who are members of union. Merchants & Manufacturers enforce black list and use methods that are 'un-American' when employed by organized labor.")

This concerned the McCann Iron Works, who signed up with the union, and we compromised with them. They came down to the strikers and made this suggestion. The demand was for an eight-hour day and a minimum wage of $4, the same as in San Francisco in the iron trades, comprising the iron molders, the machinists, the boiler makers, the blacksmiths, the patternmakers, and their respective helpers, and finally it involved the structural-iron workers, who were not organized at that time, but they came off the building like flies, but they were not organized at that time. And this man who was boycotted by the M. & M. came down and signed up an agreement with us, providing that the men might work nine hours a day at a $4 rate until the first of January, 1911, which we agreed to, and he went on and employed 250 men. But the M. & M. put him out of business. He had finally to quit and go back to the open shop. They did not do it with violence, and so we could not do anything with them. They do a lot of violence, but they cover it up with money. If you gentlemen don't believe that, ask the erectors' association, and they will develop that.

I recall an instance where some of the strikebreakers were hurt on a building, and when union men went to the coronor's inquest in the hope that some of our people would be chosen as jurors, only to be disappointed.

You understand under the charter there if anybody is hurt and is taken down to the coroner's office to the inquest, why the jury is generally picked from men who are in close proximity. We knew, of course, that that was the law, and were all law-abiding citizens. So we did not want to give them an opportunity to know we were there, and we sent 200 men down there, and while we were waiting an automobile came along, and in that automobile was the jury, of course. Oh, it was a fine game! In every case the M. & M. dictated supreme, and the juries were selected that were considered safe. Now, of course, there is going to be another trial in Los Angeles on the 1st of September, 1915; M. A. Schmidt and David Caplan. Otherwise I should present to this commission the document which we have in our possession, but which the commission can obtain, I am satisfied, within the next two or three weeks; but we have the documentary evidence that the Merchants & Manufacturers' Association personally and absolutely dictated the character and names of the grand jurors. We have documentary evidence of that, signed by Mr. Zeehandelaar.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He is secretary—

Mr. JOHANNSEN (interrupting). He is secretary of the Merchants & Manufacturers' Association. Oh, they believe in law and order! You bet your life!

In this they O. K'd Bill Jones, for instance; marked him "hates the union." Samuel Brown, "friend of the Manufacturers," and some other man, "friend—personal friend—of mine—O. K." Oh, it is fine! If we ever wrote a letter like that we would all go to prison, if we represented labor. That is the reason the executive officers of the A. F. of L. have to be pretty careful—have to be, because they can get after them much easier.

My experience in strikes and lockouts has been that labor is by far more law-abiding and less vicious than the employers.

Whatever our sins may be, what little we know we have learned from observing the tactics of the manufacturers' associations.

It was no surprise to the average working man when news came out about Mulhall and his million and a half corruption fund to be used in Congress to influence men against the proposed remedial labor legislation.

Say, if Gompers had done that! Good night! The papers wouldn't have stopped yet.

In the city of Stockton, Cal., we have just emerged from a general lockout brought about by the Merchants, Manufacturers & Employers' Association, in which it was conclusively proven, not alone that they employed 20 professional gunmen and sluggers, but that they actually had a list containing the names of union officials and active men, with a price attached, ranging from $25 to $75. If they were slugged. I was worth $75. I was worth more than the rest of them. I was kind of proud of that.

These union men were to be beaten up and waylaid. Affidavits sustaining this fact can be obtained in San Francisco.

One man by the name of Emerson was caught with a sult case of dynamite and arrested.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is that Stockton or Los Angeles?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Stockton.

When it was discovered that he was employed by the Merchants & Manufacturers Association he was promptly released, but a week later rearrested. He has been tried twice in Contra Costa County and once in Stockton and finally dismissed. In all his trials the Merchants & Manufacturers employed counsel for his defense openly and defiantly, notwithstanding the fact that he had made a confession involving active officials in the Merchants & Manufacturers' Association, which afterwards he modified and changed to suit the convenience of the M. & M.

Now, this man Emerson told me personally from his own lips the program. He was sent to Contra Costa County to steal dynamite—break into a box car and steal five or six hundred sticks of dynamite—and then he was to put some of it at Tottens & Brant's planing mill. I am a member of the millmen's union and general organizer of the carpenters, so that would directly connect me with it. And he was to put one plant under one part of the Sperry flour mill and thereby directly connect the State Federation of Labor with that, which had had an active boycott against this institution for some time; and also place a plant under the Sampson Ironworks, which could connect up the metal-trades department in that locality. And then he was to fill my suit case full of dynamite in the room at the Clark Hotel, and he was to take another suit case full of dynamite and check it at the Santa Fe Station and place the check in Tveitmoe's pocket during the meeting of the State Federation and then arrest Tveitmoe and me, and then the rest would follow. Nine out of ten of the men would have believed it, and if it had been pulled off everyone would say, "Gee! Johannsen and Tveitmoe should have had better sense." Oh, it is fine! If you have the price you don't need to use so much violence. You can make the other fellow do it. That was the program.

Of course he got caught at it. He got caught with his suit case of dynamite; and, of course, he was a coward and a crook all the time, and he would work for three sides, if there were three sides. He would work for anybody for that matter. I really felt sorry for the fellow. He told me; and I told those fellows I would not prosecute him; I would treat him like Christ treated the prostitute, Go away and sin no more. I didn't want to prosecute him. It was a good thing, to tell the truth about it. I am only sorry for him. He was a poor devil and had a wife and children, and she felt awful bad about it; and he told me that he would never go into that kind of a game again; and I don't suppose he will.

But Brokaw was indicted also. Brokaw was in charge of the fighting forces of the Merchants & Manufacturers in Stockton. One thing I admire about those men, they were bold about it and fresh about it. They took their gunmen and brought them down there and took them in an automobile. They didn't know, of course, that we had women in Stockton that had some spirit. We organized 30 militant women in that city of Stockton, and those women—oh, they were fine! They were not handicapped with any philosophy. They didn't have any program to save the world. If they thought that they could see something good in the A. F. L. or in the I. W. W. they were glad to accept it. I suppose they would accept it even in the Republican or Democratic Party if they could have found it; and they may find it some day if they look long enough. I don't know. Of course we had to instruct them, and I had to get them out, and I had an awful time with them. They didn't know anything about discipline and obeying orders. They just wanted to know what we wanted done. We told them we would like to see them go out on the picket line and not to use the word "scab," and those words which were considered vulgar and bad form and liable to suit; and we told them it was much better to punch a man in the nose first and explain it afterwards than it was to tell him beforehand; there was no use getting arrested for just threatening a fellow. So they were all right, though.

The biggest bunch of scabs was down on what we call the West Side School Building. So I took those women down with me—or rather I meant I went down with them. I had four men who volunteered their machines. They gave me their cars, seven-passenger cars, every day from 4.15 until 6 o'clock. I had charge of all the pickets. I was the captain of all the pickets of all the unions. I got these machines and took these women down in front of this building. I told them that they were to stay there but they were not to call them scabs; and it is awful hard to keep a woman's tongue still, but they done fine. And so there were about 30 men around there and about 20 women, and pretty soon along comes the patrol, and the chief of police was a very decent sort of a fellow. They say he was a poet. I don't know how he became chief of police if he was a poet, but he was really a decent sort of fellow; but I knew if there was any demonstration on the part of our people in his favor it would not be a very good thing to do; and I also appreciated that it would be very easy to start something—start a fight—and I did not want to have that done. So, after the patrol wagon came and stopped about a hundred feet away from where the pickets were, along comes an automobile with six of these gunmen in it. Oh, that was fine! Well, they stopped right in the middle of the crowd of pickets; and these women—I couldn't hold them any longer. These women just went after the automobile, three or four on each side of their machine, and they went for them; and they would say, "Look! Don't he look like a gunman?" "Now, how would he like for his mother to see him now?" "Wouldn't he be ashamed for his mother to see him?" "And wouldn't he be ashamed when he went back to meet his sister?" And all that kind of thing. And it was too much for them. They couldn't stand it. They ran down to the next corner, and ran to that corner and this corner, and the women after them. Oh, it was fine!

Well, finally we discovered that there was no number on the automobile, and undoubtedly they were expecting to start something, and it would not be easy to follow them. The women noticed that and insisted on arresting them. There was a policeman on the corner, and they got hold of him and had them arrested, and when they came to jail they searched the machine and found 12 pick handles about that long [indicating] and 12 blackjacks and a six-shooter about that long [indicating] on each one of them. They all admitted that they were hired by the Merchants & Manufacturers' Association, and I understand that the officers admitted before the commission that they had hired those men. There were 12 pick handles, 12 blackjacks, and 6 big guns. Those men have never been tried, the cases were never called, they were out on bail of $100, and, of course, they disappeared. The women handicapped them. The women were all right. They horsewhipped the president of the chamber of commerce on the street. Of course, that was fine. I didn't know anything about it, neither did the strike committee, when, all of sudden, four women came up the street with horsewhips and were going by the office, and the strike committee said, "You will have to go out there; they must cut that out; they can't walk in front of here with horsewhips;" and I went out and told them, and they wouldn't listen to me, and then Woods, one of the strike committee, went out, and one of the little women came up to him and said, "I suppose you are a Sunday-school man." That got him, and he went back.

They got their man, though, Mantley, the president of the chamber of commerce, and the next day the women were arrested, and the man was arrested, and here is what they finally settled on: The attorney for the Merchants & Manufacturers' Association and the attorney for our side came in and got this agreement, that Mrs. Palmer and Mrs. Hines should be dismissed, and Mrs. Cotte should plead guilty, she was an I. W. W., or at least she thought she was. She was red-headed, and had a lot of fire, but she wore the I. W. W. button, and the Merchants & Manufacturers employers thought they would have to convict her, and she had to agree to plead guilty with the understanding that the man that got horsewhipped would have to pay the fine. So that was agreed to. Well, after that was done, of course, these women felt that they could do anything and get away with it. I had quite a time to manage them after that, but we kept them pretty well. The fight was finally settled, and things are going along very well there. The union has agreed to withdraw the boycott, and the Merchants & Manufacturers and employers agreed to retract, or rather to rescind their resolution adopted on the 26th of June, declaring for an open shop, so that things are peaceful in Stockton now.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In Stockton.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. In Stockton. I don't know what the newspapers would have done if a laboring man, such as me or Tveitmoe, had been arrested under similar circumstances as Emerson, and made a confession, but I imagine, without being prejudiced or anything, that they would have given more publicity to that than they did to Emerson. I don't know how you are going to correct those newspapers; they are hard people to deal with.

I know of no instance where professional strike breakers having deliberately waylaid and murdered active members of labor unions, where they have not been defended to the very last by the Merchants & Manufacturers' Association. I am not saying that in criticism, I think they should defend them, especially if the enemy is the Merchants & Manufacturers or National Erectors' Associations.

No intelligent man or woman who has a strong sense of social justice will be satisfied with the manner in which labor has always been treated, so long as the poor go to jail and the rich go free. There is no equality before the law. It is unreasonable to conceive of a situation where a man without means and few friends will attain the same consideration in a court of justice as a man with plenty of means and plenty of friends.

During the Darrow trial in Los Angeles for jury bribery, 11 different people were given immunity by the State in the hope of convicting Darrow. It would be an insult to human intelligence to draw any other deduction than this: The question of law and order and so-called justice was secondary in the consideration of the public officials of that county as compared with the mad desire to blacken the character of men who had made at least some effort to relieve the weak from the constant oppression of the strong.

In the Ford and Suhr cases in California, these men are at present imprisoned in the penitentiary convicted on a charge of murder, notwithstanding the fact that the conditions of the hop fields—and I want to say in connection with that matter, the Ford and Suhr case, there were four men on trial. If they had been anybody else except hoboes or I. W. W., if you will, they would have had immediately competent counsel, and would have in all probability been able to have separate trials, and the public would have had an opportunity to make some investigation before those men were convicted. Those who attended the trial seemed to be so optimistic, seemed to think that the evidence in that case was so meager and so far from anything like a charge of murder, that there could not be anything else except an acquittal. The judge that tried that case, his son is a member of the carpenter's union in Marysville. I am a member of the carpenter's union, and general organizer of that organization, and work almost entirely in California. That union was requested by the son of the judge that tried the case to pass a resolution prior to the trial that these men, in the judgment of the carpenter's union, would get a fair trial. After the conviction this same son of the judge came to the union and asked them to pass a resolution that they had had a fair trial, and the carpenters' union, I am glad to say, refused to acknowledge that Ford and Suhr had had a fair trial.

In San Francisco five or six women were organizing defense committees. Of course, they were in a sense not directly associated with the labor movement, but they were sympathizers. Some have means; they all had good clothes, and most of them were good looking, and they were in a very sympathetic attitude in all instances, and believed in the social war that is being waged everywhere, and so they came in to see what could be done, what we could do to help. I was with them and also with the attorney, chief counsel for the defense. I told those women I thought that labor would be interested in them if they had the time and inclination to make a canvass. They canvassed every union in San Francisco and in Oakland, and most of the women's clubs and churches, and not a one that I have been able to learn, not in a single instance were they met with opposition, and they raised in a period of six weeks in those cities $4,000 for the purpose of investigating these cases, and taking an appeal and so forth, and the matter is now before the governor, and I hope and believe that the governor will pardon those men on the ground that they were railroaded by the hop owners.

It is my opinion that the employers should be held at least as much responsible as so-called labor leaders are for the social unrest which is rampant throughout the country seeking and waiting for expression. Failing to find it in one form, it invariably takes another.

It is not always the question of what we like or dislike. It is in many instances our prejudice and lack of understanding which prevent an opportunity to find the real source of corruption, which, after all, should be found and removed if we desire to eliminate the social disease commonly called poverty.

That is all that is the matter. If people have plenty to eat they can smile. I know I can; I don't know how you fellows feel about that.

The manufacturers' association don't want labor to strike; it don't want them to organize; it does not want them to become Socialists. Of course, they don't want us to strike except a nice, little strike, a sort of Salvation Army strike. They don't want us to organize and don't want us to become Socialists. We would not be good citizens then; and they don't want us to be anarchists. Some people think that they are anarchists; if they are, I don't suppose we want to be. They don't want them to be single taxers, and they don't even want the working class to get scientific information on the limitation of families. That is against the law, too. And just at present, just the same as it was 8 or 12 years ago, I venture to say that between now and a year from now that the American people, and especially the working class, will be threatened by Wall Street if they vote the Democratic ticket.

You know when Wall Street locks out the American people, which they do occasionally, the newspapers call it a panic. It is nothing at all but a lock-out; you are locked out, and the newspapers want you to say it is a panic, but the real fact is the American people are locked out for selecting a national administration that Wall Street objects to.

I don't know whether I have anything else to say or not.

Chairman WALSH. We may have to ask you to stay over to-night.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I don't like this town; I don't like the atmosphere of this city.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock has some questions to ask you. We will proceed a while and see how we get along.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I have in my hand here, Mr. Johannsen, a pamphlet entitled "Some Recommendations Submitted to the United States Commission on Industrial Relations by the American Anti-Boycott Association, prepared by Walter Gordon Merritt, associate counsel." In it I find certain indictments and certain charges—

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Was that the man that testified here just previous to me?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No. Certain indictments and certain charges against organized labor and I feel you should be accorded an opportunity to answer. The first statement that was made is the following [reads]:

"Organizations of workmen have been welcomed and encouraged in this country, and the right to strike is recognized as a necessary defense against oppression. 'Thank God, we have a system of law where men may strike,' said Abraham Lincoln, and our people say amen. But these bulwarks against oppression have become oppressors, and have written into our history in recent years a manifestation of oppressive power so recklessly and inhumanely exercised, and industrial crimes of so grave a character that even their true friends see the necessity for the firmer hand of government. Lawlessness and discontent have been encouraged until there has grown up in our midst, within the circles of organized labor, a group of lawbreakers who, with pernicious sophistry, too often repudiate the ordinary claims of decency and humanity. 'I did what I did for a principle,' said J. B. McNamara. To deprive a nonconformist worker of his job and drive him from his trade; to destroy the property of those who employ any nonunion men; to recklessly attack the business of neutral and noncombatant merchants and manufacturers; to dynamite, maim, and murder—these practices, opposed to all standards of civilization and humanity, are prominent features of labor-union activities at the present. But with few exceptions, no hand of organized labor has been raised to deter or discipline the wrongdoers. Leaders make bold to publicly assert that the sacredness of their cause justifies the support and retention of criminal officers. When serious books in defense of such a position are plausibly written by intimate observers, published by reputable houses and issued as serious reading; when organized labor arrays itself in argument and act against State constabulary and militia, police and guards, injunctions, financial responsibility, enforceable contracts, and scientific management, what are we to conclude? 'This bodes some strange eruption to our State,' unless forces arise to cure and control."

Now, what comment, if any, do you care to make on that indictment?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. In the first place, the whole thing is all right excepting one thing, it is not true. That is the only thing that is the matter with it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, specifically, you would deny as a representative of a labor organization that "lawlessness and discontent have been encouraged until there has grown up in our midst within the circles of organized labor a group of lawbreakers who, with pernicious sophistry, too often repudiate the ordinary claims of decency and humanity." You would deny that "to deprive a nonconformist worker of his job and drive him from his trade, to destroy the property of those who employ any nonunion men"—

Mr. JOHANNSEN. You had better separate that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Very well, we will take it up serialim.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. What do you mean, do I believe in discriminating against a nonunion man? If you do, I say, absolutely.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The charge made here is that you deprive a nonconformist worker of his job and drive him from his trade.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Certainly. What do you mean by nonconformist worker?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. A nonunion man.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Certainly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And to destroy the property of those that employ any nonunion men. In other words, the charges made are that as an organization labor does not hesitate to destroy the property of those that employ nonunion men.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That can not be answered without the specific situation. Suppose there was a certain house burns down in a certain place, at a certain time, and they would say, "Did union labor do that?" and I couldn't answer it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You brought up the McNamara case?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. What I meant to do was to compare the sins of the organized workers with the employers.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Suppose both are guilty?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. They ought to both go to prison.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you believe in destroying the property of those who employ nonunion men?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That depends on circumstances.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you in the McNamara case?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I don't care to justify them; it is up to them. I don't know what I would do until I got up against it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But tell us what you understand is the attitude of organized labor in this sort of a fight. Do they justify such acts?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I can tell you what I do, the places where I talk to organized labor, and what my judgment is as to how I find the membership; that is the only thing I have to go by.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir; I think that would be of interest.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, when I got into Butte, Mont., I spoke to every union there, including the miners' union; that was prior to the eruption in Butte. The miners' union a very peculiarly constituted organization there; they had about 8,000 different members in what you might call four different groups; about 2,000 are Irish Catholics and work at it; about 2,000 Socialists; their chief aim is in the capture of the ballot, and they work at that; and about 2,000 were I. W. W.'s; of course, they work at that; and the rest of them are what they call "Cousin Jacks," I think—Cornish miners—and those four factions were all interested in that union to shape its policy at different times, with the result that there was considerable interest in that union; more than the ordinary interest, and at election time a good deal of interest. When I spoke there I outlined what the iron workers were up against, the social background of it, how hard it was to fight the Steel Trust, how they used the other industries, how the carpenters and the longshoremen, the sailors, the other workers in that field advised, "Wait, wait, wait." They worked 12 hours a day, 7 days a week, for an average of $8 or $9 a week. I found out that the iron workers voted to fight, and that that was the only thing left for them to do.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What was that?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Solidarity, or dynamite, or anything you want to call it. I don't care what you call it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are we to understand from what you just said that grievances——

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Let me finish this.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let me finish my question. That the real or imaginary grievances of the iron workers justified them to dynamite——

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is the way they felt about it; I couldn't say as to that. You might feel that way if you had been an iron worker.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you think they were justified?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I was not there.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You don't have to answer that question unless you want to.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. You know I am under indictment myself, and I don't care to answer it. I don't think I am competent to answer it. I have a pretty good job, and don't suffer personally. I think McGillicuddy, of Maine, in the House of Congress, a number of years ago, said, "If I was an iron worker I would have done like they did." That was right in the Congress. I say this to the union men, to our friends, to the enemies; they talk about the 21 lives that were taken in Los Angeles. I don't hesitate to say that no man has a right to take another man's life; he can't take something that he can not give back; but I do say this 21, 21, 21 lives lost is not all. Why don't they say something about the 300 or 400 or 5,000 or 10,000, compare their sins with the iron workers; put on the searchlight, let the whole truth be told, send them all to prison, that is satisfactory. We object to your justice on the ground that the rich go free and the poor go to jail.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The next charge is that organized labor recklessly attacks the business of neutral and noncombatant merchants and manufacturers.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is not true.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You deny that?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Those fellows are as "buggy" as an I. W. W.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are we to understand, then, that you deny that the noncombatant merchants and manufacturers——

Mr. JOHANNSEN. What do you mean by noncombatant? Men that don't fight you? Do you suppose we fight a man that don't fight us?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Here is a merchant that advertises in a paper, and the printers are on strike on that paper, and they come to the merchant and say, "You take your advertisement out of that or we will ruin your business."

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I wish we were that well organized.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He has done no wrong in this case? You deny that is done?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Of course, it is not done; I wish it were done.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The next charge is they resort to dynamite, maim, and murder; that these practices are opposed to all standards of civilization and humanity, and are prominent features of labor-union activity at the present time; but, with few exceptions, no hand of organized labor has been raised to deter or discipline the wrongdoers. Is that denied?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No; nothing has been done to discipline the wrongdoers; we always do, but we don't take the Anti-Boycott Association for a judge.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Can you cite any instance where a member of your organization, or labor organization, has been expelled for resorting to violence in labor trouble or breaking laws?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. So far we have not decided to try that; the Manufacturers & Merchants' association and other associations have control of all of the police departments.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have no case that you could cite?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No, sir; I would be ashamed of them if I had.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Leaders make bold to publicly assert that the sacredness of their cause justifies the support and retention of criminal officers.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is not true.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Criminal officers have been rejected and have been thrown out of the organization?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. What do you call criminals? Let them show the case and I can answer.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Men that were convicted of crime?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Let them show the case.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Take this very case, this dynamite case. Mr. Frank Ryan, president of the union; he was convicted and sentenced——

Mr. JOHANNSEN. He was reelected up until the last convention. Thank the Lord for that; they had that much courage.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That would corroborate the charge made here?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is up to the iron workers to answer why they reelected him. If you had suffered like they have, you might be able to answer.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The next statement is this: "It seems needless to array facts—a parade for Sam Parks on his way from Sing Sing; the dynamiters defended by the American Federation of Labor, reelected to office by the iron workers, officially recognized by the federation without protest after conviction, met by a public procession of applause at Fort Leavenworth when on their way to prison. In that prison President Ryan performs his official duties and renders his official reports as president of a union of 10,000 members, and a part of the federation."

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I don't know whether it is true, but I hope it is true.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, it is not disputed, is it?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I want to say before you go any further, if you want to be fair in this matter, I think the only way for me to answer that question is for you to give me that book and let me write a book in answer to it, and that would take two weeks.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are sufficiently conversant with the facts?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. You want to compare our sins with their sins, and I want to show you their sins.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have already pointed out their sins, and they state your sins here, and here is an opportunity for you to answer for the record; otherwise this would appear in our record uncontradicted.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I see; oh, that is your purpose?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Another statement here reads as follows:

"Though there are cities where markets are monopolized for union products, and this fact is well known, prosecuting attorneys remain inert. 'Do you want to embarrass the administration?' inquired one district attorney. A strange commentary is it that men who entered into a nation-wide conspiracy to dynamite buildings and thereby destroy human life should only be tried and punished for transporting dynamite. Would you punish a murderer for carrying concealed weapons?"

Do you care to comment on that?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I don't care to pass any judgment on anybody, not even on Drew; I don't care to pass judgment on people; I am not a judge.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. We have heard a good deal in this commission, Mr. Johannsen, of the courts failing to give the workers justice. Now, here we get the other side of the story. The writer of this pamphlet goes on to make this statement:

"In a recent case against John Mitchell and the United Mine Workers a permanent injunction was dismissed on appeal by three Federal judges, who held that in cases of this character 'a reasonable delay in the issuance of the writ would have a tendency to bring about a settlement between the parties.' To escape the displeasure of organized labor, this court recommends that relief be temporarily withheld from the persons injured, in the belief and hope that the delay will compel the injured person to surrender his rights and accept the terms of the lawbreakers. A Federal judge in New York, acting upon a similar conception of his duties, denied a preliminary injunction against boycotting, while admitting that authority would probably compel the issuance of a permanent injunction when the case was reached for trial. The plaintiff, unable to survive the delay, was compelled to unionize, and delay 'had the tendency to bring about a settlement.' There is something more ominous than coincidence in this same abnormal conclusion of different judges in different parts of the country, and it illustrates the fact that even in Federal court the wind blows from a different quarter than popularly believed.

"The emergency which led to the invention of preliminary injunctions and the reasons which support their issuance in behalf of all litigants when delays can not be endured are forgotten and the remedy summarily ended by legislation. With such decisions, those who can not survive until final hearing—and they are many—are lost. Courts also show a notable aptitude and inclination to avoid the issues in important and well-presented cases, thereby leaving present and future litigants in a state of uncertainty. One judge continued an injunction on condition that no attempts would be made to enforce it, and communicated that condition to the defendants. Is that the way to cultivate respect for court decrees? Doesn't that explain why Gompers publicly proclaims, 'Go to hell with your injunctions'? Other judges make strange efforts to settle such cases or try to pass the responsibility over to some associate. Is this the question that men are afraid of?"

Do you care to make any comment on that?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Except to say that I don't recognize any right under any circumstances of a judge to issue any injunction against a laboring man on strike, if such injunction was issued.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would you respect it?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I got four or five of those things against me in Stockton; they were served on me, and the strike committee said we would have to be careful and not break into jail. I don't think the power of an injunction goes much beyond the courage of those who are enjoined. I think that if a person is convinced in his own mind and in his own feelings that his cause is just, that his demands for an increase in wages, or whatever the fight may be—in Stockton it was against the breaking of our unions—if you think and feel you are right, why, then go ahead, and never mind about those pieces of paper. We didn't pay any attention to them, except this: The attorney advised us not to make any comment to the public, which we didn't; but I went and got 75 strikers, and there was a special house which was designated—I think the Sutter Hotel—and I instructed the pickets, and they all obeyed instructions; they were served with injunctions and they left, and then they served them again and they left, and kept that up until they didn't have any more paper, and then there wasn't any more trouble.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are we to infer from what you say, Mr. Johannsen, that if a man or group of men have any real or fancied grievances they are justified in defying the law?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Oh, real or fancied?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Real or fancied; I don't know what you mean. That is so indefinite.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I may have, for example, what I believe is a real grievance, but which may prove to be only fancied.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. After you prove it to us we change our opinion; see?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let us limit it to real grievances; would you say that any man or group of men that have any real grievance is justified in taking the law into his own hands or ignoring it?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. My advice to labor would be, if I was asked for my advice—I am not sure I would take the stump—if you are sure you are right, if you are convinced of judicial invasion of your rights, stand for your rights and take the consequences. Don't engage any attorneys or anybody else.

By the way, this policy was recommended by the President of the American Federation of Labor at the Denver convention, if my memory is right, and the committee brought in a report at that convention for labor to take that attitude, not so much because of contempt of the judges, but because we found that the policy of the National Manufacturers' Association was to use this thing to drain our treasury by making us employ high-salaried counsel, and spending our money for lawyers instead of bread.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You were telling us, Mr. Johannsen, about the numerous instances where the employers had employed gunmen?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Numerous? Why, every place.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, let us call it every place.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Sure.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know of any instances where organized labor has employed gunmen?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Were you here the other morning when the police commissioner of New York City, Mr. Woods, testified?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes; I heard him testify.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let me refresh your memory by reading the testimony given by Mr. Woods before this commission [reads]:

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. As a result of your investigation, what have you found to be the method of procedure in industrial troubles; do these gangsters offer their services to both sides and take the highest bidder, or do they confine their operations and offer their services to one side of the labor trouble?"

"Mr. Woods. I should not say it was 'offering their services,' but the result of our investigation shows a course of procedure like this: There would be a strike, and the strikers would retain some gunmen to do whatever forcible or violent work they needed. The employer, to meet this violence, would, in a comparatively small percentage of cases, and not as many cases as the gunmen were employed on the other side, would hire a private detective agency.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, when the unions employed these gunmen, what function were the gunmen expected to perform?

"Mr. Woods. To intimidate workers that were hired to take the place of the strikers.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, so-called scabs?

"Mr. Woods. Yes, sir; so-called scabs.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Have there been instances where there has been violence against the so-called scabs?

"Mr. Woods. Yes, sir.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. To what degree?

"Mr. Woods. Oh, very strong violence.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Have they committed murder?

"Mr. Woods. Yes, sir; I think that is being brought out now. As I remember it, last night in the newspaper article there were three indictments for murder in the first degree.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. There is no limit, then, to what degree they will go to intimidate the so-called scabs?

"Mr. Woods. No. Now, there was an innocent man who was noticed a good deal in the newspapers a while ago by the name of Straus, who was shot and killed on the east side, and the Dopey Benny gang was employed by the strikers, and some other gangsters were employed by the employers; I can not remember which particular gang it was. One of the Dopey Benny gang had been killed by one of the other gang.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Competing gangs?

"Mr. Woods. Yes; one gang employed by one side, and one gang by the other side. I may have my things a little twisted here, but the gang that killed the member of the other gang was holding a ball, and the other gang came up to get revenge for the killing, and the man that they tried to shoot jumped behind this perfectly innocent citizen, Straus, and Straus was killed.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, are the so-called gangs of gunmen confined to the East Side of New York, or are there other gangs in other parts of the city?

"Mr. Woods. There are gangs in other parts of the city.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In what other parts of the city, for example?

"Mr. Woods. There are gangs on the West Side. The gang—I think I am justified in saying that the number and virulence of gangs has been very much reduced in the past 12 months. The situation we found was a bad situation. The policy under the former administration had been to use mild methods; the whole thing has been very much reduced in the last 12 months, but you will find headquarters of gangs and places they hold out in the lower East Side, and the middle West Side, and in some parts of Brooklyn, on the upper East Side.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is every member of the gang of one nationality usually, or are they composed of mixed groups? For instance, on the East Side, are they all Jews?

"Mr. Woods. No; they would be mixed groups.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Of different nationalities?

"Mr. Woods. Yes. Of course people are naturally nationally clannish, more or less, and you naturally have a predominance of one nationality in one group."

This testimony makes it clear that the unions employed gunmen and gangsters.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is, if it is true.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. As an evidence of that, we have this testimony [reads]:

"In how far have your investigations warranted this statement that appears in the New York Herald of this date," quoting from the New York Herald:

"Several of the indictments mention assaults upon members of the union, and in this connection District Attorney Perkins said last night that the reign of lawlessness was caused by union leaders who wished to perpetuate themselves in power, who hired assassins to assault contenders in their own union for their places, and who used their union offices to extort blackmail under threats from employers.

"Seven men are indicted for assault in a riot for control of a union. Four men are indicted for hiring Dopey Benny's band to go to a nonunion factory and "rough house" the employees as they left and "wreck" the plant. A dozen workers were wounded in that fight.

"Six union men are accused of extortion and assault in using violence to collect a fine of $100 upon an employer. Four others are accused of hiring the Dopey Benny band to shoot up a nonunion factory. Many shots were fired, the factory suffered a damage of $1,000, and several persons were injured. Other indictments mention cases where the band was employed by union leaders to attack nonunion workers, to wreck factories, and even to assault union men who opposed the leaders.'" That is the end of quotation from the New York Herald.

"Does your investigation substantiate those statements here?"

"Mr. Woods. Yes, sir; that is the general line of things that we found. All that sort of thing.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So that this is not mere newspaper exaggeration, to your knowledge?"

"Mr. Woods. No, sir."

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, I don't know anything about this case in New York, but I know something about common sense and what the process of reasoning is, the ordinary process of reasoning. I know that every man who places any confidence or any trust of any kind or description in another man who is willing to hire himself to beat some one up, to murder some one, or to slug some one, without any other consideration than money, he certainly is an awful chump who will take that chance.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Did you see in to-day's paper an article ascribed to the district attorney of New York about Dopey Benny's further testimony to the effect that he was bragging on himself because he refused an offer of $7,500 from the same employers to double-cross the labor-union men for shooting them up?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No, I didn't see that; I wouldn't have anything to do with a man that would hire himself for a purpose like that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I have one question here which I am not sure you are in a position to answer, but if you are I am sure it will be of interest to us. Do you know about the wages in the Steel Trust paid at the present time; do you know how the wages in the Steel Trust paid at the present time compare with the current wages paid before the Steel Trust was brought into life?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No; I could not say as to that, except this: From what information I have been able to obtain from the report of the committee in Congress, and also from Mr. Brandeis's investigation, and Fitz—whatever it may be; from all of the investigations made, I am convinced and led to believe that in only one other tariff-protective industry outside of the steel industry that pays lower wages, and that is the woolen industry, and then the steel industry.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, the steel industry to-day pays the lowest wage?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes; and has the highest protective tariff.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But you don't know whether the wages to-day are higher or lower than before the Steel Trust was brought into life?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No; I could not say.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I think it would be well to make a note of that and try to get that information.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Do you want to adjourn?

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Aishton has some questions he wanted to ask.

Commissioner AISHTON. I will forego my question.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I can come back in the morning, and go down to-morrow at noon.

Commissioner AISHTON. I want to ask only one question.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I want to make one more statement myself.

Chairman WALSH. Very well, then, you may return in the morning.

The commission will now stand adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon the commission adjourned at 5 p. m. Friday, May 14, 1914, until Saturday, May 15, 1915, at 10 o'clock.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., Saturday, May 15, 1915—10 a. m.

Present, Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Aishton, Weinstock, and Harriman.

Chairman WALSH. We will please be in order.

Mr. Johannsen, please resume the stand.

TESTIMONY OF MR. ANTON JOHANNSEN—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Aishton would like to ask you some questions, Mr. Johannsen.

Commissioner AISHTON. I believe I understood you, in giving your testimony yesterday, to say that you were unwilling to permit the Anti-Boycott Association to take their interpretation of the law, or to interpret for your people, I think you said?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is correct.

Commissioner AISHTON. In reply to Commissioner Weinstock yesterday, in regard to the obeying of the law by the workers, in cases where injunctions were served, I think you said that you instructed the workers to interpret the law and obey the injunction according to their own judgment; is that also correct?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I said that would be my advice; it would depend on circumstances; if I thought we could get away with it, it would be my advice.

Commissioner AISHTON. In the particular case in Stockton?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. That was your attitude?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. So that, in that particular case at Stockton you advised and directed the workers to interpret the law according to what they thought was right?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Oh, no; not the law.

Commissioner AISHTON. Well, the injunctions?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. The injunctions.

Commissioner AISHTON. Which was the law, as interpreted by the court, I believe; that was correct, was it?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes; that was correct.

Commissioner AISHTON. Mr. Johannsen, this commission has been seeking the causes of industrial unrest. It would be rather interesting if we were to analyze the cause of industrial unrest in the individual. I didn't quite catch your testimony, but I think you said your first employment was as a worker in the Curtis Bros. Sash, Door, & Blind Co., at Clinton, Iowa?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. And that you worked there for two or three years?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Five or six years.

Commissioner AISHTON. Five or six years you worked for Curtis Bros.?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is, George and Charley Curtis?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. One was a Senator for a number of years.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. He was a Congressman.

Commissioner AISHTON. My reason for making the inquiry was that I personally worked in the carpenter shop myself of the Curtis Bro.'s plant in Clinton, Iowa.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Is that so?

Commissioner AISHTON. Probably about the time you worked there, about 1898 or 1899, I think it was.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I left there in 1899.

Commissioner AISHTON. You worked in the plant at the corner of Second Street and Eleventh Avenue, the Sash, Door & Blind Works?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Between Twelfth and Thirteenth Avenues on Second Street.

Commissioner AISHTON. I was rather curious—you seem to have this unrest the commission has been trying to probe into, and I thought it would be rather interesting for the commission to know what first started that with you. You worked for the Curtis people, and they were fairly good people to work for, were they not?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. If you were willing to work cheap enough and long enough it was all right.

Commissioner AISHTON. It was a question of wages and hours that started your unrest?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. What form did that take when you ceased connection with them?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. For instance, to give you an illustration of what I mean by the unrest, what I believe has largely contributed to the causes of unrest is the utter inability of the average employer to conceive anything like a human point of view, a social point of view. For instance, when Curtis ran for Congress I was just a boy and had a good deal more enthusiasm than judgment, and perhaps I have yet; but at any rate I made the statement that he ought at least to furnish the employees in that factory with ice water in the summer time. I made that statement and made it very unguardedly, and I got discharged. He had an arbitrary power which one was unable to meet, except through organization, and organization could only be fostered by a larger social vision. The lack of social vision—you take the average employer and you find he can talk about wood and coal and iron and railroads and land and trees and ships and war, and everything except humanity; that is just a side issue with him.

Commissioner AISHTON. In that particular case, Mr. Johannsen, the unrest ferment or idea started in the difference of opinion between yourself and Mr. Curtis as to whether or not ice water should be furnished in the sash and door company's plant?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. If you want to put it that way.

Commissioner AISHTON. We want to get down to the facts as to what started it. We have heard a great many statements in a mass of generality about unrest and the oppression of employers and the state of the employee; all that sort of thing. And there is probably a good deal of truth on both sides; but the only way we can determine is by analyzing the individual cases, and you seem to be quite an advocate of unrest by your testimony, and I think it would be interesting to know what led up to it. The statement about Mr. Curtis and his lack of appreciation of the needs of the employees, that might be further enlarged on by calling on Mr. Curtis to give his side of the story; and from my knowledge of Clinton in those days, it was not considered healthy to drink ice water. There were a number of artesian wells there, and artesian water was pumped through the mains——

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, we put oatmeal into it. It was considered safe then.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is a common practice, I believe, so there must have been something else rather than the ice water.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is just an illustration. I don't mean to consider that of any great importance.

Commissioner AISHTON. Of course, that didn't create any great, tremendous amount of unrest. I think you said you quit there and went on the road?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No; I was on the road before I was married.

Commissioner AISHTON. Selling goods?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No; hoboing.

Commissioner AISHTON. Oh, hoboing? I thought there possibly might have been something about your work on the road that caused unrest, but it was hoboing and association with hoboes. I think you stated, Mr. Johannsen, in your testimony yesterday, that the United States Steel Corporation and American Bridge Co., which I believe are the constituents of the Steel Corporation, wielded tremendous power with all other steel companies and structural companies, in that they controlled the material that was manufactured, and refused to furnish it unless certain things were done. I judge from your testimony they are in a position to refuse to furnish material to people. What actual knowledge have you of that?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I said it was not an unusual experience for an organizer of ironworkers, when he came in contact with a contractor who was erecting a steel bridge or a building, that invariably you would meet men who agreed with your position as to the hours and wages and had no objection to unionists, but who would inform you or advise you that if they should comply with your demands and employ all union men and observe the union rules that the erectors' association had sufficient power and influence to bring about a financial ruin of that individual.

Commissioner AISHTON. Then the testimony as it shows in the record regarding the steel corporation and the American Bridge Co. controlling the output is hardly correct? You mean to say that the—I forget the name.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. The erectors' association.

Commissioner AISHTON. The erectors' association are the people that control this. Is that the way the record should read according to your last testimony?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I think the record—I suppose what I said yesterday was correct; I am giving it as near as my memory serves me.

Commissioner AISHTON. Yesterday you specifically stated that the United States Steel Corporation and the American Bridge Co., and I think you also mentioned the erectors' association.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I said the United States Steel Corporation with its allied companies, such as the Standard Oil Co., controlled or exercised power that the Government itself seemed unable to cope with.

Commissioner AISHTON. Yesterday you didn't mention the Standard Oil Co. Are we to understand that the United States Steel Co. and the Standard Oil Co.—

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Its influence on the Government and on the press and public opinion.

Commissioner AISHTON. What has that to do with material furnished to outside concerns?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. It has a great deal to do with it.

Commissioner AISHTON. Please say how?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. For illustration, suppose you come into a city like San Francisco or Chicago, if the ironworkers' union, for illustration, would have to make their own fight in any given large city without any allied interest to help them, it would be difficult for them to do anything. It is equally true of the National Erectors' Association. It is perfectly reasonable, it seems to me, to presume that wherever the National Erectors' Association or the American Bridge Co. or any other institution which has for its purpose the maintenance and establishment of what they term the open shop, each has the moral support and financial support of these other institutions and individuals that stand for that.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is largely a matter of assumption, isn't it, Mr. Johannsen?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No, sir; that is my experience.

Commissioner AISHTON. Coming back to this matter of control of material and the furnishing of material, is your statement made yesterday that the steel company and the American Erectors' Association controlled the erecting and controlled the furnishing of material correct?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. So far as I know that is correct.

Commissioner AISHTON. Your knowledge does not go other than as a matter of general report among your people?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is quite generally accepted by our people.

Commissioner AISHTON. You made a statement as to the attitude of the employees at Gary. Is that a matter of report about the downtrodden look and that they did not dare to take a paper?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is my personal experience. I went, together with Mr. Nockels and John Fitzpatrick and with the general organizer, a fellow by the name of Flood.

Commissioner AISHTON. When was that?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. About two years ago, I think.

Commissioner AISHTON. How long were you there?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I was in Chicago then about five or six weeks.

Commissioner AISHTON. How often were you at Gary?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Once.

Commissioner AISHTON. Just once?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Isn't that enough?

Commissioner AISHTON. I didn't ask you whether it was enough or not.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I meant that the experience there was hopeless.

Commissioner AISHTON. You were there once?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. And Gary is quite a large plant, is it?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes, sir; quite a large plant.

Commissioner AISHTON. And what particular part of the plant were you in or gate were you at?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I have forgotten the name of the street. There are two or three entrances there.

Commissioner AISHTON. And your personal observation, together with what you saw at that time—

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Why, certainly.

Commissioner AISHTON. Mr. Johannsen, you have stated in your evidence yesterday that the employers largely controlled the courts, and you were referring then to this court at Indianapolis, were you?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No; I was referring to——

Commissioner AISHTON (interrupting). Generally?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Generally. Well, of course, it is a matter of comparison, you understand.

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes; you made some definite statements about the control of juries and judges and other things, I believe, at Indianapolis.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, I don't know about the control of the juries, but it left that inference.

Commissioner AISHTON. It left that inference?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. Your knowledge is not definite on that, only from inference?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I am assuming, if you want me to correct my statement.

Commissioner AISHTON. Well, what records have you to show about that?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, for instance, it is a positive fact from documentary evidence that a train was ordered by the agents of the Government on the 19th day of November, 40 days before the trial closed, to carry 93 passengers from Indianapolis to the penitentiary at Leavenworth. I believe or assume, from the fact that the man who could order that train and make such a close guess as to the number of passengers, must have had some reasonable fact to base his estimate on, as to how many men would go. It is probable that they were very close to the jury. I don't know that they were:

Commissioner AISHTON. So, so far as the record is concerned, whatever you stated yesterday may be, some of that is from inference, and the one fact you have that you can produce proof of, that that train was ordered for 93 men?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. You were at Indianapolis during this trial, were you, Mr. Johannsen?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes; part of the time.

Commissioner AISHTON. What part of the time during this trial?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I was there six days at one time, and three days another, and two days another, I think, or such a matter.

Commissioner AISHTON. You, at this time, were the organizer of Brotherhood of Carpenters?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No; at that time I was organizer of the State Building Trades Council of California.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is something similar to the State Federation of Labor that they have in some States, is it, or is it another organization?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, it has some similarity; only difference in it, in the building trades and the State organization, our business is confined largely to the question of industry. The State federation is confined more to the question of advising social legislation.

Commissioner AISHTON. This is another organization outside of the State federation?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes; it is an independent organization.

Commissioner AISHTON. And don't take in all the trades?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Only takes in the building trades.

Commissioner AISHTON. I see. The building trades are members of the federation largely——

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. As well as members of this other?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. What attracted you to Indianapolis; you were representing whom?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I attended a convention of the Brotherhood of Carpenters in this city, Washington, in September, 1912, and on my return, going back to the coast, I stopped off at Indianapolis; and at that time the executive officers of the ironworkers who were on trial held a meeting and requested me——wanted to know if I had the time and was willing to go out in the larger cities in the East and to tell their story, and incidentally to raise some funds to help, to assist the defense. I got permission from the Building Trades Council of California and so I went to the different cities in the East.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is, you went to the different cities in the East, speaking in the cause of the ironworkers and raising funds for their defense?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is correct.

Commissioner AISHTON. And you stopped, you say, three weeks in Indianapolis?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, I should judge, altogether about 10 days.

Commissioner AISHTON. Were you engaged in soliciting funds in Indianapolis?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Oh, no; you couldn't raise any funds there.

Commissioner AISHTON. You couldn't raise any funds there?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No.

Commissioner AISHTON. What were you doing at Indianapolis?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Oh, consulting with the defendants and watching the trial.

Commissioner AISHTON. And you represented nobody but the building trades council, and by their permission you were there helping the ironworkers in their case?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. Were funds furnished you for that purpose?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I should say—to me personally, you mean?

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. To pay my expenses?

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Why, the State Building Trades Council took care of the expenses of my family while I was in the East, and the ironworkers paid my railroad fare and hotel bill.

Commissioner AISHTON. Who employed counsel for the ironworkers? Did you do that?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No; that was all arranged before I got there.

Commissioner AISHTON. That was all arranged before you came, and you did not have anything to do with that?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No.

Commissioner AISHTON. And there was no attempt made to influence the courts or anything of that kind by you or any of your associates?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. By me?

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Of course not. I couldn't influence no court.

Commissioner AISHTON. You spoke about the control of the press. What makes you think the press was controlled, Mr. Johannsen, at Indianapolis? Take Indianapolis, for example; they have four or five newspapers.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I can tell you that; but before that let me give you a little illustration.

Commissioner AISHTON. All right; go ahead.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. When I was at the Darrow trial at Los Angeles—the first trial—I met “Golden Rule.” What I call “Golden Rule” was Lincoln Steffens. We called him “Golden Rule.” He took me out to dinner one evening, and I discussed with him everything and nothing, and we came to the same conclusion on both. And all of a sudden he said to me, “Joe, I wish you would be indicted for murder.” I was somewhat flabbergasted. I asked him what he meant by that. He says, “Well, if you were indicted for murder and permitted me to advise the defense, I would have engaged for your defense some of the best criminal lawyers in the country—not philosophers or poets, but real criminal lawyers. You would plead not guilty, and we would have to agree that the attorneys would defend you on the ground of emotional insanity. Of course I know you are crazy, but everybody doesn't, and of course you are insane on the labor question. Under that theory the defense would be permitted to introduce any testimony which would be considered as contributory to your insanity, and in that event, in such a trial, every injustice that labor has suffered under the present social and economic system could be introduced as testimony on the grounds of its being contributory—all about the Cherry mine disaster and the Triangle Shirt disaster, and all these different lockouts and things, and hunger and starvation and oppression, and all the system could be exposed at the trial. Of course it would all come out; but you know civilization couldn't stand it. Of course you might get hung, but it would make a hell of a fine story.”

Commissioner AISHTON. That was the opinion of Steffens?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes.

Commissioner AISHTON. You said Steffens said——

Mr. JOHANNSEN (interrupting). I said that was his story. And it strikes me that while that might be somewhat extreme, it strikes me that that is a very good picture of the psychology and state of mind of the average newspaper man.

That anything that has any real social value can get little notice in the papers, unless it comes in such an exceptional or extraordinary way that it is real good news. Our suffering is very seldom good news.

Commissioner AISHTON. Coming back to the concrete case of the press at Indianapolis, I did not see the Indianapolis papers, but don't you think, Mr. Johannsen, that the dastardly nature of the crimes that these men were accused of had something to do with the publicity, with the papers' side?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. The point of view of the men who write the story certainly has something to do with it; that is what I mean. They can not get our point of view, and I am not condemning them for it.

Commissioner AISHTON. You think that a man who is a newspaper man and engaged in writing news that his point of view is such that he can not give your side a fair deal. Now, he is not an employer ordinarily; he is an employee; and is it not fair to assume that if he could not give the point of view for the other side as well as of the worker?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No, sir. For instance, let me give you a specific instance in Indianapolis. A man by the name of John Lofthaus, a member of the Millmen's Union, No. 42, of San Francisco, was subpoenaed by the Government as a witness and came to Indianapolis and was taken into a private room of the district attorney's office to be sweated, the same as all other witnesses, or nearly all other witnesses. He was taken into that private room, and there were present two Burns detectives, or detectives for the erectors' association, I am not sure which, but at any rate two detectives, and they are all alike, it don't make much difference who hires them; and in that room Lofthaus was asked—was told what he knew. "You know, Mr. Lofthaus, that Tveldmoe, secretary of the Building Trades Union, paid money out of the treasury to hire dynamiters." Lofthaus said, "I don't know anything of the kind." They said, "You know it, and unless you testify to that you will be charged with perjury." Lofthaus had the courage to call their bluff, which he did, and they never put him on the witness stand, and they paid him $360 to get him out of town. That was not published in the papers. You could not get it in.

In another case the business agent of the carpenters' union of Detroit, Mich., was on the witness stand for the defense, and the district attorney, Miller, made a charge in open court while this man was on the stand, "This man, your honor, is guilty of perjury, and we want him held." He was held on a charge of perjury, and he was dismissed without a trial or a hearing immediately after the court had adjourned, after the trial was over. The whole thing was simply a scheme of publicity, in my opinion, to create an unfavorable atmosphere in public opinion against our men.

Commissioner AISHTON. I think you said that the attitude of the press was largely, in these matters, determined by their lack of ability to get the point of view on social questions. That is correct, is it?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is one phase of it.

Commissioner AISHTON. I do not want to take up too much time, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead.

Commissioner AISHTON. On this matter of peaceable picketing, this commission has heard a good deal of testimony about peaceable picketing. We have heard some agent of an organization in Pennsylvania tell about peaceable picketing, and that really was a very pretty picture; but I understand your idea of peaceable picketing in California is, according to the advice that was given these ladies, to punch them in the nose. Isn't that it?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Oh, no; I want you to get my spirit.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is what we want to get. The record shows that, however, the way I stated it; and if that is incorrect I would like to have it corrected.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. You can not get much feeling in a record.

Commissioner AISHTON. I wish we could.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. What I intended to convey was this: That these women, by reason of their lack of experience—they were very anxious to make some threats to the scabs or strike breakers, and I tried to point out to them that it was much better to be arrested for punching a scab than threatening a scab. Of course, I advised them against punching the scabs or attacking them. I tried to persuade them in that way, or to show them that the mere threatening of a scab did not get any results. "That gets you nowhere; you can be punished for threatening as well as punching them in the nose."

Commissioner AISHRON. Naturally, the thing that would get the most results would be to punch them in the nose?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That does not logically follow. It means that if I was going to do one of two things I would rather punch them in the nose than threaten them and have the same penalty assessed against me for doing it.

Commissioner AISHRON. I think that creates the same impression that was created by your testimony of yesterday.

I think that is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock wishes to ask some other questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I want to call your attention, Mr. Johannsen, to the fact that the record that is being kept here will, of course, become public property, and that it will be a source of information to students all over the country on both sides of the problem, and therefore whatever is said here will tend to make character in the minds of the students and the readers of the output of these students for the witness and the sides they represent and the issues that are at stake. In looking over this testimony of yesterday I notice you make some pretty sweeping statements here, and I felt it was only fair to you to give you an opportunity, if you cared to exercise it, to amend or modify or correct the statements made. Let me read this one to you [reads]:

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I may have, for example, what I believe is a real grievance, but which may prove to be only fancied.

"Mr. JOHANNSEN. After you prove it to us we change our opinion; see?

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let us limit it to real grievances; would you say that any man, or group of men, that has any real grievance is justified in taking the law into his own hands or ignoring it?

"Mr. JOHANNSEN. My advice to labor would be, if I was asked for my advice—I am not sure I would take the stump: 'If you are sure you are right, if you are convinced of judicial invasion of your rights, stand for your rights and take the consequences.'"

Of course, in plain language, this seems to defy the authorities. Now, I think you ought to be afforded an opportunity to modify or change this, if you care to do so.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is all right as it stands.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You prefer to leave it the way it is?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Sure.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Toward the close of the hearing here last evening Commissioner Garretson and you were discussing a situation in New York, and in going over the testimony of Commissioner Woods, Police Commissioner Woods, Commissioner Garretson asked you if you had read yesterday morning's Sun, in which Dopey Benny, the head of the New York gangsters, in his confession had made the statement that he had refused an offer of $7,500 from the employers' association in New York to work on their side, and you said you had not seen that. I also had not seen it, so last evening I got a copy of yesterday's Sun, and I was unable to find the statement that Commissioner Garretson referred to, but I did find this. Let me read it to you and for the record. This is the Sun of Friday, May 14, 1915, under the heading "Inquiry shows labor ring as bloody assizes;" I will just take extracts from it, because the article itself is rather lengthy. [Reads:]

"The deeper Assistant District Attorney Breckenridge delves into the alliance between union men and gangsters the more startling becomes his discoveries. He has found and expects to prove that the despotic ring which ruled by force in the garment workers' unions resolved itself in a secret tribunal and dealt out punishment to nonunion men and recalcitrant union members; to be called before that body meant a beating, maiming, and in some cases death. * * *

"These mock courts termed 'bloody assizes' by their victims sat after strike meetings of business sessions in halls that the union leaders hired in many parts of the city and sometimes in local headquarters. After the ordinary business was finished a few officials with some of their strong-armed men would form around a table with one man sitting as judge. They had what was known as a bailiff, and the man accused was addressed as the defendant. * * *

"Generally one or two men were tolled off to do the actual slugging. If a man protested that he was not nonunion he was knocked down. If he became so infuriated as to call his accuser a liar he was beaten into insensibility. Mr. Breckenridge knows of three men who had ears cut off, and charges at least one murder as the result of one of these trials. * * *

"There are no indictments against the employers, Mr. Breckenridge said yesterday, because there has been nothing brought out in the investigation to show that the employers did more than try to defend themselves against assault. * * *

"We have got the gangsters and the labor men working against each other," he said, "and they are giving each other up. They are running for cover, so deep into the system as the investigation gone, and they are cutting each other's throats in the effort to gain protection for themselves. There has never been such a revelation."

Now, if the statement that you made in your testimony wherein you went on to show that the employers hired gunmen and detectives is true, and if the statement made by Police Commissioner Woods of New York contained in the press is also true, it would make it clear that you were in error yesterday when the question was put to you, "Do you know of any instance where organized labor has employed gunmen, and you answered no." It would indicate that neither side, if both sides are correct in their charges, that neither side can come into court with clean hands; that both sides evidently resort to the employment of gunmen and sluggers?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Will you allow me to read into the record an article in order to verify Mr. Garretson's statement of last night? This is from the Washington Times of yesterday. [Reads:]

"NEW YORK, May 14.—Dopey Benny Fein, gang leader, whose confession lead to the indictment by the grand jury of 34 labor leaders and gunmen on charges ranging from assault to murder, refused offers of $7,500 to double-cross the men who hired him.

"This statement was made to-day by Assistant District Attorney Breckenridge, who has charge of the case.

"Fein declared manufacturers approached him and offered him $7,500 more than he was receiving to use his gunmen against the unions that were employing him. Fein turned these offers down flatly. Breckenridge declared he had substantiated Fein's statements by talking to different manufacturers."

Now, in this morning's Post, I read it coming down in the car. I can't lay my hand on it just now—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then Mr. Garretson must have been mistaken in the paper that he read; he said it was the Sun instead of the Times.

However, admitting that that is so, the facts would indicate that both sides are guilty, or that neither side can come into court with clean hands.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. The statement that you read in the paper, the fact that those men have been indicted, or the statement made by Commissioner Woods, does not convince me that it is true. I refuse to pass judgment on any man, no matter where he is from or who he is on the mere indictment against him. That doesn't mean that he is guilty; neither does his conviction necessarily mean that he is guilty. I would not want to pass any opinion, except what I passed yesterday, that it does not seem reasonable to me that a union man, especially an officer with any experience, would be so lacking in judgment and in his information as to trust any man who was willing to slug another man with no other consideration except money.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then all that you say, Mr. Johannsen, on the one side, could also be said with equal force on the other side; the charges made by the unions against employers hiring sluggers?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. With this exception. I don't think the other side are as wise to that as we are. They have too much faith in gold.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What has that to do with it?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That has a lot to do with it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I don't get your point.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Everthing. If a man is paid, they think, he will do it and not betray them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you say that the indictment of sluggers hired by organized labor and their convictions before courts and juries are not to be accepted, then why can not that same thing be said on the other side? What if sluggers and gunmen are convicted as employees of employers, what then; would they still be innocent of the charges?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I presume they do say it, don't they? Did you ever meet a member of the manufacturers' association that told you they hired sluggers?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir; you and I heard it in the city of San Francisco, where they admitted it very frankly. You will remember that question came up, that Commissioner Garretson asked Mr. Totten, a member of the association, "Why do you men hire gunmen?" and he answered by saying, "Were you ever in a mob?" And Mr. Garretson said, "I was"; and he said, "Did you ever have half a dozen strikers or representatives of strikers jump on you?" And Mr. Garretson said, "I am too smooth." And Mr. Totten said, "If I was as smooth an article as you are, I would not need them, either." There they frankly admitted employing gunmen.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. He said in self-defense. They could not very well deny it there, because we found the pick handles.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Can I read the Post in here, an article from New York of the 14th [reads]:

"EVEN LAWYERS IN THE NET."

"Dopey Benny's story involves, according to those in the district attorney's office, not only labor leaders, cloak and suit manufacturers, but lawyers and those who have to do with the conduct of justice in this city."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In your statement yesterday, Mr. Johannsen, you brought up the McNamara case. May I ask whether you attended the Los Angeles hearing?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Certainly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You probably then will recall—were you present when Job Harriman was on the stand?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. In the Darrow trial?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; before our commission?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No; I was not present there.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. For your information, let me recite an incident when Mr. Job Harriman was on the stand, and I was questioning him and I said, "You have been interested in labor organizations for years?" "Yes, sir." "You are familiar with their spirit and aims and purposes?" "Yes, sir." "Does organized labor stand for law and order?" "Yes, sir." "Do you know of any instances where organized labor standing, as it claims to stand, for law and order, has disciplined or expelled unionists who have violated law and order by having resorted to violence in labor trouble?" "No." "What then, Mr. Harriman, is the answer to the charge made by organized labor against its opponents that it does not stand for law and order as evidenced by the fact that it retains in high offices of trust and honor and responsibility men who have been convicted of crime?" He said, "Well, you must give me some specific or concrete case." I said, "Let us take the case of Frank Ryan, president of the Structural Iron Workers, who, after being convicted, was retained in his position of international president." Mr. Harriman said, "Did you read the testimony in that case?" I said, "No; I did not." He said, "If you will take the trouble to read that testimony, you will find that Ryan and his associates were innocent men railroaded into prison."

When I came to inquire about the testimony I discovered that it contained only 25,000 pages of type matter, and life being short and I, living under pressure, found it inconvenient to read 25,000 pages of type of testimony in order to determine the guilt or innocence of Frank Ryan and his associates. Last evening, however, there was placed in my possession a copy of the decision rendered by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Seventh Circuit, October term and session, 1913, in the case of Frank M. Ryan et al., plaintiffs in error, v. the United States of America. I find in this decision those 25,000 pages of testimony were epitomized and condensed into a brief form, and I want to read it into the record, and then I want to ask you a question about it after I finish reading it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The whole book?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; just a page or two. Before I start to read it, I want to ask you this question: Do you, in common with Mr. Harriman, believe that Mr. Frank Ryan and his associates were innocent men railroaded into prison?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. What do you mean by innocent?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That they were not guilty of the crimes charged and of which they were convicted?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Of course I do.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You believe they were innocent men, railroaded into prison?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I wouldn't want to put it that way exactly—railroaded.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Put it your own way.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I am satisfied they never committed any crime against labor or a better society.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And therefore were unjustly convicted?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, this is a decision, not of the trial judge, Anderson, whom you say was unfair——

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I have read that very carefully.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (continuing). Who you say was unfair in the trial; but this is an opinion and decision of the circuit court of appeals, including Judges Baker, Seaman, and Kohlsat, against whose integrity I have never heard a word, and who seemingly went into the evidence most exhaustively and most carefully. That will be demonstrated from the fact that they released Mr. Tveitmoe and others, that the testimony in their judgment did not justify a conviction. If they had not gone into it exhaustively in their review, they would not have made those exceptions. This is a decision by the court [reads]:

"The facts thus recited, as proven by the Government on the trial, may be mentioned in part as follows:

"The nature of the contest between the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers, of which 'all of the defendants except two that were convicted were members,' and the American Bridge Co., and of the ensuing general strike declared and supported by the association 'throughout the United States,' extending from 1905 continuously down to 'the time of the trial' is described. In the early months it was attended by 'numerous acts of violence' in various places, and commencing in 1906 dynamite was brought into use 'to blow up and destroy buildings and bridges that were being erected by "open-shop" concerns,' and such explosions started in the eastern part of the country and 'extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific' in many places. This course continued 'until the arrest of the McNamaras and McManigal in April, 1911.' Almost 100 explosions thus occurred, 'damaging and destroying buildings and bridges in process of erection where the work was being done by "open-shop" concerns.' And 'no explosions took place in connection with work of a similar character that was being done by "closed-shop" concerns.' From February 17, 1908, until April 22, 1911, 70 of such explosions occurred, 43 of which were in connection with work either of the National Erectors' Association or American Bridge Co. and affiliated concerns, and 27 of the explosions occurred in connection with the work of independent concerns in no way connected with either thereof. Dynamite was first used together with fuse and fulminating caps, the fuse being generally about 50 feet in length, 'and when lighted the explosion would occur in about half an hour.' Nitroglycerin was next brought into use provided with a clock and battery and attachments to be used together with dynamite and nitroglycerin, constituting what was termed an infernal machine, to be used in connection with the dynamite and nitroglycerin in the destruction of buildings and bridges of 'open-shop concerns'; and 'from this time forward the clock and battery was used in connection with charges of dynamite and nitroglycerin in the destruction of life and property.'

"These infernal machines 'were so made and arranged that they could be and were set to cause the explosion to take place several hours after it was set, so that the person setting the explosion could be hundreds of miles away when the explosion took place.' The headquarters of the international association was at the outset in Cleveland, Ohio, but was removed to Indianapolis, Ind., early in 1906, and there remained. The various places in which the several defendants were located are mentioned in various States. The dynamite and nitroglycerin which were used for the explosions mentioned 'were transported in passenger cars on passenger trains of common carriers engaged in the transportation of passengers for hire into and over and across' various States named. Explosions took place 'in all of the States named, and a number of times in some of them and were planned to be made in other States named.' In connection with this work of destruction, 'dynamite and nitroglycerin was purchased and stolen and various storage places arranged to conveniently store such explosives that were to be used in the destruction of property in the various States' referred to; and 'such explosives were carried and taken on passenger trains from such storage places in the various States to various places in the other States where structural ironwork was in process of erection,' and the various locations are named.

" 'Large quantities of dynamite and nitroglycerin were at various times stored in vaults of the association' in Indianapolis and also in the basement of the building. These storage places 'were so arranged that dynamite and nitroglycerin could be readily obtained and transported from such place of storage' to other places for their use in destruction of property, also clocks and batteries, as described, and fuse and fulminating caps, as well, in large quantities, 'all to be used in connection with the dynamite and nitroglycerin for the destruction of property'; and some thereof were stored in the vaults of the association at Indianapolis, 'so that the same would be accessible for immediate use in connection with any explosion desired at any other place in the United States.' For the purpose of carrying such explosives, 'suit cases and carrying cases were obtained and purchased, in which such dynamite and nitroglycerin, clocks, batteries, fuses, caps, and attachments could be conveniently placed and carried by persons going from a place of storage to a place in another State on passenger trains of common carriers, etc.' All the explosions mentioned 'were accomplished with the materials, including nitroglycerin and dynamite' so stored, and were transported 'from said storage place to the various places throughout the United States where such explosions occurred in suit cases and carrying cases by persons traveling upon the passenger trains of common carriers,' etc.

" 'Four explosions occurred in one night at the same hour in Indianapolis,' and 'explosions were planned to take place on the same night two hours apart at Omaha, Nebr., and Columbus, Ind., and the explosions so planned did occur on the same night at about the same time, instead of two hours apart, owing to the fact that one clock was defective. The explosions referred to at Omaha and Columbus were all 'open-shop concerns,' and the infernal machines used therein were taken from the storage places of said materials above set forth. The 'Times Building at Los Angeles was destroyed by the use of dynamite' on October 1, 1910, and 21 persons killed, 'and immediately after the happening of this event arrangements were made to have an explosion in the eastern part of the United States, as an echo in the East of what had occurred at Los Angeles.' Prior to 'the arrest of the McNamaras and McManigal,' seven or eight explosions were planned 'to take place in different parts of the country widely separated on the same night.' All the dynamite and nitroglycerin, 'except the dynamite that was stolen, the batteries, clocks, caps, fuse and attachments, suit cases and carrying cases, as well as the expense and work of carrying the explosives and articles to be used in connection therewith, including the expense incident to the stealing of dynamite, were paid out of the funds of the international association, and these funds were drawn from the association upon checks signed by the secretary-treasurer, John J. McNamara, and by the president, Frank M. Ryan,' plaintiff in error. * * *

" These basic facts directly bearing upon the issues are followed up with connecting evidence of the following nature: Written correspondence on the part of many of the plaintiffs in error, both between one and another thereof and with other defendants, inclusive of the above-mentioned conspirators, together with letters from one and another of such conceded conspirators to one of the plaintiffs in error and to other defendants, properly identified, constitute one volume of printed record; and these letters furnish manifold evidence, not only of understanding between the correspondents of the purposes of the primary conspiracy, but many thereof convey information or directions for use of the explosives, while others advise of destruction which has occurred, and each points unerringly not only to the understanding that the agency therein was that of the conspirators, but as well to the necessary step in its performance of transporting the explosives held for such use. This line of evidence clearly tends to prove and may well be deemed convincing of the fact of conspiracy on the part of many, if not all, of the correspondents; and many, if not all, of the uses of explosives therein referred to are established by other evidence to have occurred, together with direct evidence of carriage of explosives for such use, as charged. * * *

" One feature of circumstantial evidence is brought out by the testimony and justly pressed for consideration, as tending to prove the conspiracy in all its phases, namely: That use of explosives for destruction of property as described embraced exclusively 'open-shop concerns' and was continuous and systematic from the commencement of such course up to the time of the above-mentioned arrest of the McNamaras and McManigal, and then ceased throughout the country. * * *

"We are of opinion, therefore, that the general challenge for insufficiency of evidence must be overruled; that support for the charge of conspiracy, to say the least, by no means rests on the testimony of McManigal; and that no error appears in submission of his testimony for consideration by the jury. * * *

"1. Plaintiff in error, Frank M. Ryan. This plaintiff in error was president of the association and of its executive board and was active manager and leader of the contest and policies carried on throughout the years of the strike and destructive explosions in evidence. Letters written and received by him at various stages of the contest clearly tend to prove his familiarity with and management of the long course of destroying 'open-shop' structures, however guarded in expression. He was at the headquarters of the association for supervision of operations periodically, usually two or three days each month, uniformly attended the meetings there of the executive board, and made frequent visits to the field of activities. As previously stated, Ryan wrote the letter suggesting that reports of expenditures be discontinued while 'our trouble is on,' and presided at the board meeting adopting such course; and presided as well at all subsequent meetings referred to wherein all expenditures for allowance out of association funds 'were of necessity presented.' He signed all of the checks in evidence (as recited) for payments of expenditures for purchase, storage, and conveyance of explosives. One of Ryan's letters (Jan. 20, 1908) to McNamara in reference to obnoxious work in course of erection at Clinton, Iowa, was followed up by destruction of the bridge (Feb. 17, 1908) by explosives carried there and applied by McManigal (under direction of plaintiff in error Hockin), and the expense was paid through a check signed by Ryan. Letters received by Ryan from the defendant Edward Clark, who resided at Cincinnati, one of the places of bitter contest, and was an active manager in that field, bring home to the former plain information of 'needs' for 'other kinds of methods,' which were carried out in explosions; and many other letters in evidence, both from and to him, however disguised in terms, may well authorize an inference of his complete understanding of and complicity in the explosions, both in plans and execution. Edward Clark testifies of a meeting with Ryan in Cincinnati to examine the work of 'open-shop' concerns, and that Ryan called his attention to a location where a 'shot could be placed to advantage.' McManigal testifies of meetings and conversations with him in reference to explosions caused by the witness, on two occasions, at least, and corroborative testimony appears for one of these interviews. Ryan's own testimony admits visits and conferences tending to confirm the foregoing inferences of complicity.

"The assignments on behalf of plaintiff in error Ryan are overruled, and the judgment against him must be affirmed."

In view of this epitomizing of testimony and the decision of this higher court, whose integrity has not been doubted in any way, as far as I know, will you still say that Ryan is an innocent man, falsely accused and unjustly convicted?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I would still say that Ryan and his associates failed to get all of the benefits the law prescribed and that the law generally gives to the rich. I want to call your attention—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). You say, "To the rich"; what do you mean by that?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. The man that has plenty of money and friends.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How many attorneys were employed in this case to defend Ryan?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Only 1, and 14 helpers.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What was the name of that lawyer.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Senator Kern.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He is not a cheap lawyer.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No; but he came into the case too late; he came in after the trial had started.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know how much money was expended by the structural ironworkers in defending Ryan and his associates?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I am willing to admit that, but that is not so important. This case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the United States Supreme Court refused to review the case. Now, on March 2, 1913, the United States Supreme Court handed down a decision on a case of a man whose name I have forgotten, but he is in the Kansas City district; I can get his name. He was charged with fraudulently using the mails. The Supreme Court decided that the principal evidence used against the defendants had been taken from him by forcible means, by agents of the Government and detectives, something like 600 letters, and the letters used against him as evidence, and therefore the court sustained the defendant and overruled the other court, and ordered a new trial, and further ordered that these letters stolen from him by the Government agents could not be used against him.

It is my deduction, and a reasonable one, had the United States Supreme Court considered the ironworkers' cases and made the same decision, that the documents stolen from the ironworkers by the National Erectors' Association or by Burns and his detectives and by the officers of the Government—if they could not be used against the defendants, they naturally would have been up against it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would that have changed the fact of their guilt in any way?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. It would have given them the benefit of the law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would it have altered the fact that those letters had been written and the crimes committed?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I am not the one to judge of the defendant's guilt; that is not up to me. I say, that, so far as the law is concerned, these men did not get the same process, the same consideration, that other men get in other circumstances.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And therefore your conclusion is that they were innocent men?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. My conviction is that they did not get the benefit of the law; that the law that is made by the other class—the lawyers—that the rules of the game were ignored as against the defendant.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I did not follow the thing as closely as you did; but may I ask—I have an indistinct recollection of a petition presented to President Wilson, asking him to pardon Ryan and his associates—is that so or not?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. You know there is also a petition presented for the pardon of Hawkins, presented by William J. Burns, I understand.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is not answering my question.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes; I think there is such a petition.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Can you tell us the result of that petition?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. As near as I can remember, I think four or five were pardoned.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But Ryan and his associates were not pardoned?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is it reasonable to assume that the President, whom we all respect and whom we all believe is fair-minded and high-minded and disinterested, could have refrained from pardoning Ryan and his associates, if, as a result of the facts as represented to him, he regarded them as innocent men?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I am willing to concede the President's honesty, and that if he has not pardoned these men that he assumes, from his information, that they are guilty under the law. I don't know that that is his presumption. I have great faith in his integrity, and that he has a more sincere humanitarian point of view than most of the employers, I can tell you that. I wish we had more like him.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Johannsen, I can not use your words, but you practically made the statement that where the law or decisions of the courts invades the personal rights or human rights of the individual you would disobey the law or decision of the court and take the consequences?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, I meant in connection with injunctions.

Commissioner LENNON. Yes. Prior to the Revolutionary War, Great Britain passed what was known as the Stamp Act. The people of the Colonies, feeling that it was an invasion of their rights as subjects of Great Britain, refused to obey the law, and many things happened which can be, some of them, ascertained in the History of the American People, by President Wilson. Has history vindicated the actions of the colonists in refusing to obey that law?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I should say it has.

Commissioner LENNON. Perhaps it may be out of place to use personalities, but prior to the war of 1861 to 1865, in the fifties my father lived in a slave State and operated a system of underground railway and helped slaves to escape, contrary to the fugitive-slave law. Has history vindicated a position of that kind?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. History and everything else has vindicated it.

Commissioner LENNON. And it always will?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Criminals of one generation become the saints of the next, socially speaking.

Commissioner LENNON. Are you at all familiar with the starting of the strike of the tailors in Los Angeles, which was one of the first great strikes there—that the members of the union were called into the shops, and they were called in at different times—that is to say, one shop would call them at 10 o'clock and another shop would call them at 11 o'clock and another at 2 o'clock, and so on—and the employer notified them that if they wanted to go to work the following week they would have to turn in their books as members of the tailors' international union and sign an agreement not to become members again while working for these firms?

Did you ever hear of it being done in that strike in Los Angeles?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes, I have heard it; but just in a general way. But the tailors' strike in Los Angeles was before I came to the city.

Commissioner LENNON. The strike lasted 14 months?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. And they won.

Commissioner LENNON. Of course they won.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Which was very important.

Commissioner LENNON. In the matter of the employment of gunmen, not only did Mr. Totten testify to the employment of gunmen, but while not so direct, it was practically admitted by the president of one of the banks who testified in San Francisco, whose name I have forgotten, he was a contributor, and that it was known such things were done. This was certainly contrary to the law, which was complained of quite often, and rightfully so in many instances. Have these men been indicted or punished or in any way brought to task under the provisions of the law in California or of the United States in these instances?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. No; they are still staying in the same gambling house in San Francisco, waiting for the next job.

Commissioner LENNON. You have been associated with the trade-union movement for quite a long while and have seen much of it in many cities. What is your observation as to the general compliance with the laws of good citizenship by trade-unionists in the cities where you have been as compared with men of the same class, or women of the same class, who are not members of the union? How do they stand as to taking care of their families, as to wife beating, as to drunkenness, as to the general run of crimes that make up the great bulk of the charges that come before the minor courts?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, I will tell you: I have been so awful busy with the union end of it I really have not had much time to draw the comparison between union and nonunion, in addition to being a little bit prejudiced against the nonunion. I think that the workingmen—certainly if the workingmen were not law-abiding citizens there would be something doing. Why, sure there would. The average business man likes the law as long as the law favors him. As soon as he thinks the law does not favor him, then he takes the law into his own hands, the same as he did in San Diego.

Commissioner LENNON. The fact of the matter is that with the belief in the minds of so many workingmen that their personal rights and constitutional rights are invaded by the courts at times, that is the reason, if there is any violation of law on their part, it is because of that feeling of invasion?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Certainly; decidedly.

Commissioner LENNON. I think that is all I care to ask you.

Chairman WALSH. Mrs. Harriman would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Mr. Johannsen, you speak of an inhuman point of view amongst employers. Do you think this point of view is a willful one, or the result of conditions?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Why, of course, it is not a willful one. No one has a willful point of view, neither our side nor their side.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Do you think it is the result of their environment and conditions?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Of course. Let me give you a little story, if you would not mind, just on that line.

Shortly after the arrest of the McNamaras, Mr. and Mrs. Fremont Older, editor of the San Francisco Bulletin, were about to take a vacation in the country, and they asked my little girl Loretta, who has since died, to go with them; and she went to the country with them, and while in the country they stopped at a country hotel, and there was a rich man and his wife and their son from Los Angeles stopping there, and they were very bitter in their an-tagonism and arguments, and talked to Older about the condition of things in Los Angeles, especially about agitators, and claimed that the working people were all satisfied and would be if it had not been for Johannsen and Tveitmoe and McCarthy, these agitators that came down there talking to their working people and stirring up trouble; but that they were going to put them all in jail; that they were going to hang the McNamaras. My little girl sat and listened to all that. So the next morning this millionaire—I have forgotten his name—came around to my little girl to get her to go around back of the hotel and see where his son had shot a big deer. My little girl had been taught by her mother not to hurt animals, and so she refused to go and said, "No; I don't want to go." So on the way back from the hotel Mrs. Older asked her, "What did you think about those people, Loretta? Didn't you think they were awful bad when they talked about agitators and about your father?" "No; they can't help it. They have always lived at the finest hotels and never heard anything else." So even she could see that, you know. It was perfectly clear to her.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Well, the statement has been made before us that the ignorance on the part of the employer is part of the system, and that they do not wish to be enlightened and think about these things.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, I think we are all very much handicapped in getting enlightenment. Of course those of us who are more fortunate in our opportunities to travel and have time to read and to observe and to draw comparison and to meet different kinds of people—why, just now when I met Mr. Drew right here, I felt like really he was not quite so bad as I thought. I hope he did the same as to me. I don't know—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I think you ought—you keep referring to "Drew," which is Mr. Walter Drew, whom you speak of meeting here. Now, you keep assuming—

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Oh, yes; I am assuming everybody knows who he is.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Drew was the attorney at Indianapolis for the erectors' association?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes; he is chief counsel, of course. I don't mean to reflect on him, but—

Chairman WALSH. I didn't mean to criticize you, but you might leave some wrong impression, you understand.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I think that the question of communication is an all-important question, so far as education and understanding are concerned, or getting the point of view; and so I believe—I have felt that if the people could get the whole story of every strike and every fight and a real character sketch of both contending parties, no matter what they did or how they did it, so they could try and find out what was back of them, and why their attitude, and would they have tried to have done differently under different circumstances. If we could all get that, I think we would have a much better society.

Commissioner AISHTON. Yes; but how—

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Yes; that is it.

Commissioner AISHTON. How, through what channel?

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Yes. Have you any plan?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, I am in hopes that the Associated Press and the journalists will become a little more Christlike in the future; I hope so.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Mr. Johannsen, do you believe that the workers, when they feel that they are not getting justice at the hands of others, should take the short cut and take the law in their own hands or depend on the ballot for correcting their evils?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, I have not much faith in the ballot. I am glad you asked that question, Mrs. Harriman. Several years ago, in England, when there was a great agitation on for to elect laboring men to the Parliament, they elected several men, and amongst others they asked John Turner to accept the nomination. John Turner was the general organizer of what they call "shop assistants" over there, and what we would call "retail clerks." John Turner is a very intelligent man, well read, well versed, and has a very exceptionally pleasing personality. He refused to accept any nomination. He made this statement: That it was his judgment, from his experience, that the Government only reflected in its legislation the social needs of the people in proportion to the crystallized public sentiment in a given direction from time to time; that that being true, whatever intelligence he might have, whatever ability he might have, he thought he could serve the interests of labor and the interests of the people outside of Parliament better than inside of Parliament.

And that is exactly my opinion, and I take the same attitude toward Gompers or any man in such circumstances.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. How are you going to improve the Government, from your point of view, for your people whom you represent if you do not—

Mr. JOHANNSSEN. Oh, the average politician is not so bad. If you can get a public opinion strong enough, even the politicians will pass a social law. Sure they will.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Well, do you believe in taking the law into your own hands if you have not much faith in the ballot?

Mr. JOHANNSSEN. If you mean to ask me that question personally, you understand, I don't want to break into jail. I don't want to help make a case against myself. If I have to go, all right; but I would have to be confronted with the circumstances and the situation. It would depend on how rotten the court might be or how unjust the administration might be in any given city in any given time or under any given circumstances. The police commissioner, for instance, in Stockton, came to me and asked me to take the women off the street and not let them do picketing; that they could not do picketing. I finally convinced him that I knew more about picketing than he did; and I am very glad we finally agreed, because we got along much better.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Johannsen, following up the idea expressed by Mrs. Harriman, as to whether you would take the law in your own hands, you believe, I think, that the wageworkers of this country could more successfully, if they agreed to do it, put into effect the shorter workday than they could do it by legislation.

Mr. JOHANNSSEN. Why, certainly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They could more forcibly put into effect a minimum wage or an average wage or a maximum wage than they could do it by legislation.

Mr. JOHANNSSEN. Certainly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They could correct the employment of children or of women or compel the proper sanitation of workshops if they would agree to do it unanimously among themselves than they could do it by legislation.

Mr. JOHANNSSEN. Certainly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So in that direction of affairs the wageworkers of this country have it within their own hands to establish within 24 hours any rule of employment that they can agree upon, if they can only agree upon it? They don't need to wait for legislation.

Mr. JOHANNSSEN. Not quite that quick, Mr. O'Connell. Twenty-four hours is a very short time.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I would like to have the opportunity of saying for them that Monday morning a certain thing would prevail, and if they stood by what I said it would prevail in 24 hours; as I understand it, it is largely a question of education and understanding of the point of view.

Commissioner LENNON. The question that is causing this unrest, of which you were asked, is it not largely because of misrepresentation, as, for instance, in the locality where you came from, which is Los Angeles, which has been in the public eye for several years. It is known as the home of the "open shop." This commission held a hearing in San Francisco and in Los Angeles, and we had before our commission in Los Angeles Gen. Otis, of the Times, and the secretary of the Merchants & Manufacturers' Association—the M. & M.—and the president of it, and a number of manufacturers and Los Angeles business men; and practically all of the witnesses who appeared before our commission gave evidence to the effect that the so-called "open shop" in Los Angeles was open only to nonunion men and that it really was not available to union men. Gen. Otis said upon the stand—I don't venture to quote his language, it is so long ago, but I am sure I am right, in so far as the sentiment was—that the new Times Building or any other Times building that might come in the future would rot before he would ever permit a union printer to enter his establishment, and yet he was the advocate and his paper was the leading advocate in that part of the country for the so-called "open shop." Other manufacturers in the metal trades and in the building trades—I won't say in the building trades, but in the metal trades and in other industries there—made practically the same statement, that they would not permit a union man to be employed in their plants, and that they maintained an employment agency and office in the town and kept a secretary there, and that all workmen making application for employment in any of the plants must make the application at this one office, and that the specific question asked him was whether he was a member of a labor organization. If he was, he could get no employment.

Now, it is the general impression that Los Angeles has been standing for the so-called "open shop," and the evidence before this commission is absolutely to the contrary; that it is standing absolutely for a nonunion shop in the sense that union men will not be employed. Is that not the real cause of this industrial unrest and war in Los Angeles and vicinity?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Certainly; only it is worse than what you put it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is your impression?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. For instance, in the millmen—I am a millman by trade, planing mill. The agent for the Southern California Mill Owners' Association there, every millman knows him on the Pacific Coast. They not only insist on dealing with the workman individually, but suppose you are a millman, and you go to Los Angeles, whether you are a member of the union or not, the rule applies just the same. You go to Flannagan's office, in the Bryson Building, at Second and Spring. Well, Mr. Flannagan examines you just the same as you were going to join the Army, or something else; there is a blank sheet—I suppose you got that in Los Angeles. After he examines you and sends you to a mill—to Jones, for instance, and you work for Jones—now, understand you can not get a job if you are a union man; not if they know it; only they have to have, once in a while, a man—can't get anybody else and can't help it—once in a while they might take a union man. But you work for Jones, and you have a neighbor who is working at another plant, and he says to you, "You could get a job over here, and the other fellow wants a 'sticker,' and you can get 50 cents more." So, then, I quit with Jones and go to work for the other man, and Jones, if he wants me back, all he has to do is to telephone Flannagan that "Johannsen has quit me, and now he is working for Squire, and I want him back." I have got to go back or else leave town. That is as sure as I am sitting here on this chair.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The fact is that the employment agent of the manufacturers of Los Angeles—the one individual—has the power of saying to any human being in Los Angeles you can work in Los Angeles or you can not work in Los Angeles.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Correct.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And he can drive him and his family away and break up his home and compel him to leave Los Angeles?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Correct.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is that not one of the underlying causes of industrial unrest?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Certainly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that makes for hatred among men?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Certainly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That that power should be placed in the hands of one individual or any number of individuals, that a man whose life may have been spent in Los Angeles, his life's little savings, whatever they may be, whatever they may have been invested in, in the home or a little piece of land, and he may have raised his children there, and that he must be compelled to sacrifice all of that thing to what they are pleased to call a so-called "open-shop" condition in Los Angeles, which, before this commission, was proven to be absolutely nonemployment of union men in favor of nonunion men. If that, then, is the evidence of what is meant by the open shop by the employers of this country, that it means the absolute elimination of the union man from their employment, then the so-called right of men to seek employment, or of a man to give employment, or of the equity between union and nonunion men, and the right of citizenship for the employees of our country, is not truly represented by these associations, nor is not being carried out by them?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Of course not. I don't think anybody believes that very seriously.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, Mr. Johannsen, unless there is some further statement you wish to make.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I would like to make an explanation in regard to a certain matter to indicate how difficult it is for labor to obtain anything in the way of legislation from the Federal Government, especially, in many States. I have in mind a specific case—

Commissioner O'CONNELL (interrupting). If you will permit me, I wish to put this in the record before you speak of the Federal Government. I meant to say this when I first started to question you. Several years ago myself and several others—and this statement can be verified by others who are living—called upon the late Senator Hanna, who was then in the United States Senate, in connection with the Federal eight-hour legislation, at which time one of the witnesses who just preceded you, Mr. Davenport, was also interested in the prevention of the passage of that legislation. We met Senator Hanna in the Senate Chamber, and discussed with him the advisability of assisting us in securing the passage of that legislation. Senator Hanna made this remarkable statement to us. He said, "Gentlemen, if you want the eight-hour day, why don't you go out and take it." That is the thought I want to bring to you in the question of labor and the law, and securing an eight-hour day and other things industrially.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I think that was good advice, Mr. O'Connell. The seamen's bill recently passed both Houses and was signed by the President. The leading man who went through the high seas, politically and socially, as an advocate of the passage of that bill, was Andrew Furuseth, whom I knew personally for many years. I believe a typical incident of his character may be shown, and I would like to tell a little story briefly.

Some time ago Mr. Furuseth was cited for violating an injunction, in contempt of court, in San Francisco; and from newspaper reports there appeared to be a possibility of him being sent to jail. The editor of the San Francisco Bulletin, Mr. Older, called him into his office, and he sat down, and Older said to him, "Andy, it looks as though they were going to put you in jail." Furuseth looked over at him and said, "I don't know and I don't care; they can not put me in a smaller place than I have always lived in. They can not give me simpler food than I have always been accustomed to. They can't make me any more lonely than I have always been."

I was at a loss to understand how a man with such a character, and that is very characteristic of him, whose sincerity and devotion to his people can not be questioned, whose tremendous unselfishness and his simplicity in life, how such a man had to sit on the doorsteps of Uncle Sam's palace 21 years, notwithstanding the fact that he had all the moral influence of all of the unions from coast to coast unanimously. He had to wait 21 years for what? To get the Government to agree, by the passage of this bill, to take the shackles off of the seamen, so that they would be afforded an opportunity to work out their own salvation; not to give them anything, but to allow them the same opportunity other workingmen had, so that they could quit individually without going to jail. That is all this means. And when labor has to wait, notwithstanding it has a champion of this character, and notwithstanding the fact that it is a unit from coast to coast—when, as I say, it has to wait 21 years, then I think it is all wrong.

Commissioner LENNON. And that only gives them a right to quit in a safe port?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I want to ask a question in connection with the seamen's bill. I want to say frankly that I telegraphed President Wilson, asking him to sign that bill.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Good, fine; I like you much better, Mr. Weinstock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But I want to say to you, also, that since I did that I have great doubt as to whether I did the wise thing.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. That shows there is a chance for mental improvement.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And I want enlightenment from you. The question has occurred to me since, whether the passage of that bill will not absolutely work to the advantage of the oriental sailors and the displacement of the white sailors, at least on the Pacific coast, and give the oriental sailors a monopoly of that industry.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. I have such a supreme confidence in the ability and the knowledge and the wisdom and the integrity of Andrew Furuseth when he says that it will not that I am satisfied it won't.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are simply banking on his judgment?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Certainly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am frank to confess that I also banked largely on that.

Mr. JOHANNSEN. And his courage; I have the greatest respect for his courage.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Can you give us an idea of who has been working to prevent the passage of this legislation to break the shackles of the sailors for the last 21 years?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. The great Shipping Trust and all of the other interests commonly considered antagonistic to organized labor.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. A general lobby of all interests, and that lobby has been before Congress for 21 years interesting themselves in the prevention of the passage of this legislation?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Certainly.

Commissioner AISHTON. We have heard a good deal about the "verdict of history," and it would be idle for any of us to express any definite opinion as to the wisdom of that bill; you have your viewpoint, and some of us have ours. I agree with Mr. Weinstock, and I think history will indicate that the legislation possibly has not been for the best interests of the country as a whole. You agree, do you not, that history—that the verdict of history—is really the true verdict?

Mr. JOHANNSEN. Well, in a large sense.

Commissioner AISHTON. That is all, thank you.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you, Mr. Johannsen; you will be excused.

TESTIMONY OF MR. DANIEL DAVENPORT—Recalled.

Chairman WALSH. Now, at what point—

Mr. DAVENPORT (interrupting). Mr. Chairman, sitting here and listening to the statements of Mr. Johannsen, and hearing some of the views expressed by some of the members of the commission on certain points, I think that, as far as my specialty is concerned, I would like to call the attention of the commission to certain, you might say, legal aspects of this matter.

I heard Commissioner O'Connell graphically describe the condition of affairs in the city of Los Angeles, which was this, that a combination exists between the employers in Los Angeles which excludes from the ordinary avocation of life anybody who belongs to a union; that that is what is called in Los Angeles the open shop. Now, I don't know anything about the situation there myself; but if his position is correct, if that condition is correctly described, then that is an unlawful combination existing between the employers and it can be condemned by law, and is condemned by the court, exactly the same as if the reverse condition existed; and I thought I would call the attention of the commission to a very recent decision which has been rendered which briefly indicates the law and vindicates that right to every man to be free from the opposition of such a monopolistic condition.

Chairman WALSH. Now, unless Mr. O'Connell wants it in, I will ask you to submit it by title and page.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I was about to indicate it to the commission. I suppose the commission is expected to render some report and give—and, as Commissioner Walsh suggests, perhaps it would be as well or sufficient to just call attention to the authorities. This was a unanimous decision of the higher court of Connecticut in the case of Conner v. Connell. Eighty-sixth Connecticut, 641, and is found in the Eighty-sixth Atlanta Reporter, at page 600. I would indicate notations in it which are directly on that point, and it commences with the words "Where the agreement is one which takes in an entire industry of any considerable proportion in a community, so that it operates generally in that community to prevent or to seriously deter craftsmen from working at their craft or workingmen obtaining employment under favorable conditions without joining a union, it is contrary to public policy," citing authorities, then down to the words, "The monopoly need not be complete to come under the ban of the law. It is sufficient if the agreement tends to that end and deprives the public of the advantages which flow from free competition."

So much as to that aspect of the matter.

Now, something has been said which would indicate that in the opinion of some, and, I think, from what I saw in the newspapers it was expressed by the distinguished lawyer, notable Justice Clark, of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, and by Mr. Gregory, if he was properly reported, that the attitude of the court toward labor, and toward organized labor particularly, is unjust. Now, I thought that I would call attention to the real facts about the matter. They are blanket charges; they are generalities. What specific case do they name as indicative of that? Take the Supreme Court of the United States, to which reference was made. I want to call the attention of the commission to the fact that in the first place the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States as established absolutely protect the rights of all labor, in the first place, and, in the second, that the rights of organized labor are supported and sustained by that body, and on that point I wish, on the first point, I want to call the attention of the commission to one or two authorities, quotations from the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States; and the first is in the case of Live Stock Association against—in the slaughterhouse cases, in 83 U. S., page 36: "It is one of the privileges of every American citizen to adopt and follow such lawful industrial pursuits, not injurious to the community, as he may see fit, without unreasonable regulation or molestation, and without being restricted by any of those unjust, oppressive, and odious monopolies or exclusive privileges which have been condemned by all free governments. * * * There is no more sacred right of citizenship than the right to pursue unmolested a lawful employment in a lawful manner. It is nothing more nor less than the sacred right of labor."

That was by Mr. Justice Field, and in the same volume, 83 U. S., page 366, it was said by Mr. Justice Miller:

"For the preservation, exercise, and enjoyment of these rights the individual citizen as a necessity must be left free to adopt such calling, profession, or trade as may seem to him most conducive to that end. Without this right he can not be a free man. This right to choose one's calling is an essential part of that liberty which it is the object to protect; and a calling when chosen is a man's property and right. Liberty and property are not protected where these rights are arbitrarily assailed."

And in the case of the Butchers' Union v. Crescent City, 111 U. S., 757, the court says:

"The common business and callings of life, the ordinary trades and pursuits which are innocuous in themselves, and have been followed in all communities from time immemorial, must, therefore, be free in this country to all alike upon the same conditions. The right to pursue them without let or hindrance, except that which is applied to all persons of the same age, sex, and condition, is a distinguishing privilege of citizens of the United States, and an essential element of that freedom which they claim as their birth-right."

Now, so much for the general attitude, the attitude of the Supreme Court, toward the right of labor in general.

Now, in regard to organized labor. Has it been suggested by anyone that there is any decision of the Supreme Court that is antagonistic to that right? On the contrary, as I pointed out yesterday, in the first place, the Supreme Court of the United States has decided, in the case of Adair against the United States, 208 U. S., that it is beyond the power of Congress to interfere with rights of men to form unions in interstate trade. That power to regulate interstate trade did not embrace the right to say whether or not a man shall or shall not belong to a union. But they have gone further. Has it not been for years the contention of labor that it is in the power of the legislatures of the States and Congress to exempt labor unions from the operation of these laws which prohibit, as against the producer and seller and dealer in commodities. That contention of the Supreme Court is upheld in the case of Coppage v. Kansas in the 236 U. S.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You mean an organization for profit or not for profit?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No, sir; between the vendors for service and the vendor of the product of their service. That distinction is written into the law of this country, and in the institutions of this country, by the action of the Supreme Court only last winter. So much for that.

Now, in the next place, no decision of the Supreme Court has been made in regard to the right to boycott that has not been made at the instance of the labor unions. The first decision of any consequence in this country to the effect that a boycott was not only illegal but criminal and heinously criminal was made by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the demand and upon the request of the labor unions. That principle was written into the law, not upon the argument of any representative of any plutocrat, but upon the representation and arguments of the labor unions, and when any man, be he the former president of the American Bar Association or the justice of the Supreme Court of North Carolina, comes here and tells you that the decisions of the Supreme Court as to the legality or illegality of boycotts by labor unions is an indication of any partiality on the part of the courts to the employers, he is utterly at sea and ignorant in regard to the history of the law.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you in mind the case you referred to where the labor asked the Supreme Court——

Mr. DAVENPORT. The case of Callan v. Wilson, 137 U. S.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What was the organization?

Mr. DAVENPORT. The Knights of Labor and the musicians' union.

Chairman WALSH. You cited that yesterday?

Mr. DAVENPORT. And it was done on the demand of Mr. Ralston, who represented those men, that such an offense as that was no petty offense for which a man could be held without a jury, but a most heinous crime against society, to boycott, and the Supreme Court accepted his argument, and adopted his principle, and wrote it into the jurisprudence of the United States, not upon the demand of any employer, but upon the demand of the unions, just and proper. But whenever we hear it said that the rights of labor are invaded by the courts, either the Supreme Court or any inferior court, when they hold men there responsible either in damages or criminally, or enjoin them for boycotting, remember that that was obtained by the unions, and for the protection of the unions against the action of the Government.

Well, now, that is the other case. Why, in my time there have been three noted cases in the Supreme Court of the United States bearing upon these matters; the first was the case in re Debs, 158 U. S., which followed along after, about 30 volumes later than the case to which I refer. The second is the great case of Loewe v. Lawler, 208 U. S., and the case of Gompers v. The United States.

Now, I want to call the attention of this commission to the fact that every principle laid down in the Debs case has been approved of and has been clamored for by the labor unions, and by their action they have secured the enactment of legislation which has crystallized in the form of a statute every proposition laid down in that case.

Now, of course, we all know how that case originated. The United States Government went into a United States court of equity and secured an injunction against the American Railway Union, and other unions, against obstructing the commerce and the passage of the mails by these gentlemen. The injunction was granted, and Mr. Debs violated it, and Mr. Debs was brought up in court to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt, for violating the injunction which had been issued by Chief Justice Fuller. On the trial he made the claim that he was constitutionally entitled to a trial by jury, and that claim was overruled. He claimed further that injunction was void because it interfered with personal rights of the employees. He claimed, also, that it was—the acts, that they sought to enjoin, were criminal acts, and that an injunction for that purpose was prohibited for constitutional reasons. That case went to the Supreme Court, and the court held these things: First, that the injunction was properly issued; a familiar exercise of equity power. Second, that when charged with a violation of it Mr. Debs was not entitled constitutionally to trial by jury. The third was that the acts which he did, either they were crimes for which he was tried, and he was not entitled to a trial by jury. Every principle that is there established is written down literally in the Clayton bill, at the request and at the demand of the labor unions.

We know that for a long time there was a great clamor against Government by injunction. That was the cry, and 10 years after, this was in 1904, in 1914 the Democratic Party, having control of both Houses and the President, put through that bill. Now, that bill expressly recognizes the right of the Federal Government to go into court and get an injunction against the commission of crimes, where the consequence is the injury of property. In the second place, it recognizes absolutely the right of the courts to proceed and try that person without a jury, and forbids the use of jury upon the application of the accused in that class of cases. And in addition to that it expressly provides that that injunction—that the fact that the things involve a trial, that they were acts of crime, is no objection to the issuing of the injunction, or to the punishment of that person by a trial where there is no jury had.

Then, another thing, they go further than that, and they add to the propositions laid down by the Supreme Court in that case, the one that, in addition to punishment by imprisonment for his act against the public, they may fine him in the amount that his act has done injury to a party, and cause him to be incarcerated, be it $50,000 or $100,000, or any amount, until such time as the complainant may let him out of jail.

Commissioner LENNON. We are in hopes that the court will overrule your opinion of what the Clayton bill means.

Mr. DAVENPORT. There can not be any question about these things I am talking about.

Chairman WALSH. It has been suggested by one of the commissioners, inasmuch as this matter is largely technical, it deals with concrete propositions of law, that you would be kind enough to give us a brief, that we would be obliged to you.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I will do so. I think it is a good suggestion. I was about to take up the Gompers case and the Loewe case. The fact about it is, it is a little difficult for a lazy man and a busy man together, to get down unless he is pretty well paid for it, to write out his ideas about these matters, but I know that the commission is pressed for time.

Chairman WALSH. I was going to make this suggestion; we have gathered, I think the commission has gathered, a splendid first-hand idea of these cases as you have gone along; I am sure I have. Anything that you would say about the Gompers case, or the Loewe case, would be an amplification of what you have already said. I think it would pass over the heads of the commissioners, because I happen to be the only one on this commission practicing law, and I think that anything that you might have to say would be better in a concrete form.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Of course, my idea was to point out to you, if I could, that the courts of the United States, particularly the Supreme Court, should not receive any such condemnation as is made in this way, that it is made here. I could show you how the unions have, under the Supreme Court, the only very cruel thing that the Supreme Court may be said to have done is that it makes every poor workingman that violates an injunction a criminal. Makes him an infamous criminal.

Chairman WALSH. Who got that decision? According to your statement, it was the attorney for the unions?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. We have been over that?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Not that. They went before the Supreme Court, Mr. Gompers, Morrison, and Mitchell, and said, we are infamous criminals. You know that in law a man is liable to imprisonment in jail for a crime, and three years have passed in which we could have been prosecuted, and we want to be liberated. And the Supreme Court of the United States laid down the doctrine as they requested it, that a man who violates an injunction is an infamous criminal, and if he is not prosecuted within three years he is outlawed, and then when we said, that is not the law, when we said, why, if that is the law, a man is entitled to trial by jury, the representatives of the unions, or the lawyers for the unions said, "No; it is a crime, it is an infamous crime, but the law is not so that a man has a constitutional right to be tried by a jury in that kind of a case."

Chairman WALSH. Is there any contention that the court in that particular case, or in the Buck Stove case, in upholding that case, followed a precedent and declared the law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. They upheld the law.

Chairman WALSH. Did they follow any established precedent, or did you concur in their opinion?

Mr. DAVENPORT. We fought it tooth and nail, and when the court decided it, I say it is my business to accept the law.

Chairman WALSH. We are trying to get your state of mind, if you get that into Johannsen's mind, for instance, then we could probably get along better. You thought that the law was not declared in accordance with the established principles which you have enumerated?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir; I contended that when a man violates an injunction and goes to jail he is not a criminal.

Chairman WALSH. According to your opinion the Supreme Court was wrong, but as a good citizen, and a practitioner, you abided by it, and say that is the law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No. The Government of this country and the constitutions say that we have tribunals to decide those matters, and just if I was a Catholic, I would accept the decree of the Pope, so I accept the decree of the court.

Chairman WALSH. Notwithstanding, you do not believe it was correct or in accordance with established principles of law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. According to my theory of it, but the contention of Mr. Ralston was more persuasive and more convincing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The court did not agree with your opinion in the matter?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No; they did not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understand in your testimony yesterday that you said that no citizen could be deprived of his liberty without due process of law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. It is in the amendment to the Constitution, nor can any State deprive any citizen of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, securing to him equal protection of the law.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you think that there are any citizens who have been deprived of their liberty without process of law in recent days?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Undoubtedly they have, and they are entitled to habeas corpus. That is what the habeas corpus writ is provided for.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What, in the case recited before us by Mother Jones, in connection with the Colorado situation, where she was for months locked in the basement of some courthouse, or something—I don't remember the place—and in another case locked in a room in charge of the militia, when the courts in the district were then in operation, ready to perform their business, habeas corpus was denied, and she was held in spite of the very fact when the court said, "You are free," the military officers said, "No; you are our prisoner"?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, now, Commissioner O'Connell, I could not take the law for that matter from Mother Jones.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. No; I would not want you to.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I could not take the statement of facts from her. I have never read those cases, the decision by the supreme court of that State, as to precisely what relation under the constitution of that State the military authorities, under such a condition as existed there, possibly bear to civil tribunals. But I know this, that if she was incarcerated in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution that the process of the Federal court is open for her relief. Now, I should guess—I don't know anything about it—but I would surmise that the difficulty with her case probably lay in the supremacy in that particular situation of the military tribunal over the civil. Now, you know that a state of war exists. It is in the power of the President to say to-morrow that a state of war exists, and then in certain sections of the country there comes into play under the Constitution the military law, and the same power must be granted and conceded to the governor of the State; and while I never have examined those cases I suppose that the highest tribunal of that State, charged under their oath to enforce the Constitution and the laws not only of the United States but their State, that there was some reason why his lady was kept in custody that was not inconsistent with the requirement that due process of law shall exist in every case.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, supposing—I don't think, Mr. Davenport, the question of whether that was so or not is necessary. I think you will agree with me that cases of that character do occur in our country.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I have no doubt in the history of this country in the last 125 years there have been hundreds of instances of men who have been——

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They have been deprived of their liberty?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Illegally deprived of their liberty, and that the writ of habeas corpus properly applied for would have granted their discharge.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, the point I want to get at is this: Conceding that there have been and are and will be cases of that kind, men will be deprived of their liberty without due process of law, what opportunity has the poor man to avail himself of the habeas corpus process?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Oh, I think he has every.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What opportunity has he? Supposing, in the case you just cited, of Gompers, Morrison, and Mitchell—supposing they had not behind them the influence of organized labor and the possibility of organized labor carrying their cases on, you would have them in jail?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't know about that. It is not so easy to get them. At first they said they wanted to go to jail.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is not the question.

Mr. DAVENPORT. And all of a sudden they switched around and said, "Get us out, even if they brand us for all time as criminals."

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is your impression of it?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No, sir; that is what their attorney said in court. The Supreme Court said the only defense is they have committed a crime, and it is outlawed.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If they were poor men—and they are poor men personally—but that they had no association behind them, on one to assist them financially to carry their case from court to court, you would have had them serving their time?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't know about that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What opportunity would they have had to carry their cases up until the Supreme Court of the United States finally decreed as to their guilt or innocence?

Mr. DAVENPORT. You mean they would be unable to employ an attorney?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes, sir; to pay the expenses necessary for carrying their cases up.

Mr. DAVENPORT. There are in the statutes of the United States a provision where a man is hard up and can not get justice he can apply for aid from the court.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the court would assign, I suppose, him the best talent in the city?

Mr. DAVENPORT. They would have assigned him Mr. Ranston, especially familiar with that kind of law, and an excellent lawyer.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I think the impression was created here, it was on my mind, by Mr. Gregory and Judge Clark and others, as to laborers and the poor man getting his right before the court, that it was based upon the impossibility of a poor man——

Mr. DAVENPORT. Without the union?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes, sir; getting his right with the court?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I concede that, and that is the very situation of these poor devils in the American Anti-Boycott Association, those that belong to it. Take poor Loewe, ruined and helplessly involved, unless he belonged to an organization that would provide lawyers and pay the expenses. Why, he would have to lay down, and the same reason exists for unions. I don't think that I questioned the right or the wisdom of men to join unions. If I was a working-man I would belong to a union provided the union abided by the law.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And as I catch your remarks, Mr. Davenport, and your construction of the right to strike, your union would be as ineffective as——

Mr. DAVENPORT. Is it so, for a union to be effective they must break the law?

Mr. O'CONNELL. No; but they must have the right to strike.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I say you have the right to quit, to strike, but you have not the right to use that power for the purpose of pursuing anybody.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Of compelling a person to pay more wages, to shorten hours, or to improve conditions of living, and not employ generally?

Mr. DAVENPORT. It is the way you get at it. A man can retire and say, "I won't work for you because you don't pay me enough wages," or I can say, "I won't work for you because you hire fellows that don't belong with us." You have a perfect right to do that, but where they use their power for the purpose of coercing an employer to do something that he has got a legal right to refuse to do, then it is an illegal conspiracy, and I would not belong to a union that did that. I belong to a sort of union, the lawyers' union; all the lawyers in my county belong to it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is a closed shop.

Mr. DAVENPORT. It is closed by outsiders. I also belong to the American Bar Association, but if those men—there is a distinction that I am sure, Mr. Commissioner, with your acuteness of mind you can see.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The employer has a right to refuse to raise wages?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Sure.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There is no law which says that he must pay more wages?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And if a union says that he must pay more wages, are they not coercing him?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Not in the sense I mean; it is entirely within the privilege of men to say, "I don't pay more than 10 cents a day, or I will pay $5 a day, to a man," and you can say, "I won't work for you for $5 a day or for $10 a day," and if I have to have help and I come to a bargain with him, that is one proposition; that is entirely within the rights of the contracting parties, but it that fellow says to me, "You have got to employ me, or you shan't employ anybody else, and we will shut up your shop, and we will prevent you from running it," that is a combination and conspiracy that the law condemns.

Not every strike is unlawful, but any strike that is carried on for the purpose of carrying out an unlawful combination or conspiracy is condemned by the law.

But what is the use of you and me, Mr. Commissioner, arguing about these things; we can never settle our respective views about that. I am with you on the subject of unions to this extent—

Commissioner O'CONNELL. When they do not do anything?

Mr. DAVENPORT. When they do not do anything that is unlawful; but I am against them if they do it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Your union would be absolutely ineffective, because it would not do anything.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Would not do anything unlawful.

Commissioner LENNON. I suppose, Mr. Davenport, you recognize the right of union men and all men, if they are not satisfied with the decisions of the courts, and if they are satisfied that the laws are not conducive to the interests of labor, they have a right as citizens to say so?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes; sure.

Commissioner LENNON. That is what we are doing.

Mr. DAVENPORT. The trouble, as I was going to suggest to the commission, is this: In any recommendation this commission may have, if I can be of assistance to them I would be glad to do it. Here is the point, I think, before you can do anything in the lines that have been suggested by some, you have got to commence and amend the Constitution. The first thing you have got to do—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). The Federal Constitution.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes; the Federal Constitution. You have got to wipe out this provision: "The judicial power of the United States is vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as the Congress shall from time to time ordain and establish, and the judicial power shall extend to all cases arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and to controversies between the citizens of the different States."

When you have gone that far you have got another step to take, you have to wipe out this provision in the fifth amendment: "No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law"; and then you have to go another step and go to the fourteenth amendment and wipe out this provision: "No State shall deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, or deny to any person equal protection of the law."

Now, when you have done that you have got a clean slate; you have got the privilege of doing those things which the Parliament of England can do: you can do those things which these gentlemen come before you and say ought to be done toward crippling the courts, toward stripping men of their constitutional remedies, by injunction or otherwise. You can do all of those things, but not until that is done, and I would suggest to the commission that they say to the court that until this is done it is a mere waste of breath, a mere expenditure of energy, fruitless, and wholly inoperative, because the scheme—the propositions that are aired before such a commission as this, and you have to sit and listen to them, of course, and you will hear them—involves—they are up against these propositions; and I say to them that probably the people of the United States will never consent to the elimination from the Constitution of those provisions, especially never will the union men do it, because they are the bulwark of the Union, as they are of everybody else.

Now, Mr. Chairman, another thing: I have the utmost respect for this commission and I would like to do everything I can to facilitate its labors. The question was asked me yesterday about the membership of our organization, and to give a list of its members. I have thought the matter all over, and I do not believe it would be of the slightest assistance to you gentlemen, and I do not believe it is proper for you gentlemen to insist upon it. If you think, if you have any idea that seems to be implied in these questions, that some of the great trusts are among its membership, that is not correct. I do not take this stand in any disrespect to the commission, but I do not think I would be justified in giving that information.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until 2 o'clock.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 p. m., Saturday, May 15, 1915, the commission adjourned until 2 p. m.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. The commission will now be in order, please.

TESTIMONY OF MR. DANIEL DAVENPORT—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock has some questions he wants to ask you.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I have been asked, Mr. Davenport, to put these questions to you, if you will be good enough to answer. How do you distinguish between the terms "in concert," on the one hand, and the term "in combination or pursuant to an understanding," on the other hand?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, that is the question. I presume there is a distinction. I would suppose "in concert" might be like the result of common impulse, acting together. A combination rather implies an agreement among the people to get together. Perhaps this illustration that I gave yesterday expresses it. In case I went to every one of a half dozen bakers in a town and ask them to sell me bread, and one after another refused, and gave as their reason why that I did not belong to the Methodist Church. Now, each, I think, would be perhaps impelled by the notorious fact that I did not belong to that church; but if they had agreed together not to sell me bread in order to make me join church, that is a combination.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Which of the two terms is used in the Clayton bill; can you recall it?

Mr. DAVENPORT. In one section the word "concert" is used, either singly or in concert, ceasing to work. In other places, I think, is combination.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, in the legislation that preceded the Clayton Act, I take it the word "combination" is used?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Now, to start into a history of attempted legislation, that covers a period of many years. As long ago as the winter of 1903 and 1904, when I was first obliged to come down here because of the effect of intended legislation upon our hatters' suit, there was a bill that used to be known as the Grosvenor bill, and that remained there until in 1906 without a report. The labor organizations made up their mind they were on the wrong tack, so they enlisted the services of Mr. Spelling, who is a distinguished writer on legal subjects, and has written several important textbooks on the subject of injunctions, and, as I recall it, prepared that bill. It was introduced in the House and referred to the Judiciary Committee by Mr. Pearce, a Member of Congress from Maryland, and it took the name of the introducer of it. I think he stated that it was introduced by request. Now, that was the Pearre bill. It led to a very sharp contest before the House Judiciary Committee, in which one of the subcommittee, Mr. John Littlefield, of Maine, presided, or at least was a very prominent member. We had a long series of fights over that, session after session, without any report until later; and I would imagine it was after the Democrats got possession of the House a bill was introduced by Congressman Wilson, then of Pennsylvania, now the present Secretary of Labor, who took the Pearre bill and modified it somewhat, and after that it went by the name of the Wilson bill. Until in the summer, or coming in of Congress, of 1911, several bills were introduced on the subject of injunctions and on the subject of contempts and combinations, etc.; and finally the House Judiciary Committee, of which Mr. Clayton was then chairman, reported two bills—one the Clayton anti-injunction bill, as it was called, and the other the Clayton contempt bill—both of which passed the House of Representatives and were referred to the Senate Judiciary Committee and referred to a subcommittee of which Senator Root was chairman. That committee did not report. We had hearings in the summer of 1912, and then after the election in 1912, and getting control of both the Senate and House and the Presidency in 1913, those bills were again introduced and referred and mauled over, and no discussion was had upon them before the committee—that is, as far as those that opposed them were concerned—and finally the bill, known as the Clayton bill, was reported, which bill contained and embodied both the Clayton anti-injunction bill and the Clayton contempt bill.

Now, that bill, thus reported, was amended in the House and passed the House, and was then referred to committee in the Senate, and reported with amendments and passed both Houses and was approved by the President. That is the history of the struggle that we have had before Congress in regard to those matters; that is the history of the Pearre bill.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, Mr. Davenport, speaking for myself, my mind is confused on the merit and the sphere of the Clayton Act, for this reason: On the one hand I have had the representatives of organized labor declare it is the modern Magna Charta of labor; on the other hand, I have heard it said that it has practically brought nothing to labor, that it is a delusion and a snare, so far as granting labor any advantages that it did not previously enjoy. Now, you, as an authority on the subject, will you be kind enough to let me have, for my information and the rest of us, an explanation of what are the advantages and disadvantages under the Clayton Act to organized labor?

Mr. SPELLING. Can I hand you one more question?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well—

Mr. SPELLING (interrupting). Just wait a moment.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The question Mr. Spelling put, Mr. Davenport, is this: "Do you remember that Mr. Bartlett introduced in the Sixty-third Congress a bill containing the essentials of the Pearre Act, and that Mr. Gompers made an argument in favor of it in December, 1913?"

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes; 1913. I know that the Bacon-Bartlett bill was introduced simultaneously in the House and Senate by Senator Bacon and Mr. Bartlett, and those were introduced in the spring of 1912, and instead of being sent to the Judiciary Committee, was sent to the Labor Committee in the House and to the Committee on Education and Labor in the Senate. A pressure was brought to bear by these two gentlemen to get a report from the Judiciary Committee, which led to the reporting of these bills I have mentioned.

Now, when it comes to 1913, in the fall, I do not think I was present when Mr. Gompers made an argument on that subject. I think that was rather in camera, and it may be I was there, but I do not recall that.

Well, now, taking up the subject you speak of, there are various provisions in the Clayton antitrust bill which clear up the situations which have heretofore been troublesome to us. I speak representing the parties who have had occasion heretofore to resort to the law—which are now cleared up and obviated entirely by the Clayton antitrust law. I refer to the section which provides that a private party may maintain an action for an injunction for violation of the antitrust law, including certain sections of that law, the same as parties in equity—parties could according to the usual procedure in equity resort to those proceedings. That cleared up a difficulty that existed on account of difference of opinion between the judges of the inferior courts whether, under the Sherman Antitrust Act, a private party could maintain a suit in the Federal court in equity to enjoin the commission of acts which violated the Sherman Antitrust Act, to the injury of his property or business.

In Ohio, Michigan, Kentucky, and Tennessee, that great circuit, they held they could. Judge Taft, Judge Lurton, Justice Harlan, and Judge Knappen held you could maintain that. Whereas in the second circuit, which comprises Vermont, New York, and Connecticut, the decision was directly the other way. In behalf of the Payne Lumber Co., which is one of the members of the American Anti-Boycott Association, and others, we brought a suit against the Carpenters' Union in the city of New York and the building contractors there, and the manufacturers of woodwork, to restrain the carrying out of the combination between the unions and the employers and the manufacturers whereby the product of these men, the western concerns, which was made in open shops, was entirely excluded from the New York market. And the lower court having held all the points in our favor, held that because of this decision we could not maintain that suit. We went to the court of appeals, and the court of appeals stood by its former decision. Then we came up to the Supreme Court, and that case has been argued and is now submitted to the Supreme Court.

Now, that difficulty of proceeding against the unions, and every other combination in restraint of trade, is entirely obliterated by this provision—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). By the Clayton Act?

Mr. DAVENPORT. By the Clayton Act. That is sections—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). Well, is the change one that is favorable or unfavorable to organized labor, as you see it?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Why, it gives to the people that are trying to enjoin the strikers and to protect their business from their actions greater certainty. I contend that the law is also—and so contended in the Supreme Court—that it clears up that. And it was objected in that case by the attorneys of the union that it prevented our maintaining such suits. In that respect I should say that it would be unfavorable to the unions. I will give you the section in a moment—it is very short. It is section 16 [reading]:

"That any person, firm, corporation, or association shall be entitled to sue for and have injunctive relief in any court of the United States having jurisdiction over the parties against threatened loss or damage by violation of the antitrust law, including sections 2, 3, 7, and 8 of this act, when and under the same conditions and principles as injunctive relief against threatened conduct that will cause loss and damage is granted by courts of equity under the rules governing such proceedings."

So much for that section.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You take it, then, that that section, so to speak, takes away from organized labor certain advantages which it had previously enjoyed?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, which they claimed to have enjoyed and which several courts held that they did enjoy.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, to that extent, at least, the Clayton antitrust law will be to them a disadvantage. Now, what advantages it did not previously enjoy will it enjoy now under this law?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, my view about that is that it would not enjoy any.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, if you strike a ballot the act is really a disadvantage to organized labor instead of an advantage?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, it is if you view it in that way. As far as my judgment is concerned, the legal situation is unchanged, that the various provisions in the act do not alter at all the law that existed at the time of this passage, with the single exception that I spoke of this morning, that a party brought up for a contempt proceeding is liable to be punished not only by imprisonment to the extent of six months and fine payable to the Government to the extent of $1,000, but for any damage to that citizen, to the complainants, or any other party, and that sum is payable to the complainant.

Now, you understand my construction of this act is not acquiesced in by the gentlemen who see great benefits from it, and it would require considerable analysis of the act to point out what these various sections mean.

In the first place, as was stated here, I think by Mr. Commissioner Lennon, it was claimed that the Sherman Antitrust Act, as it was enacted, did not apply to labor unions and farmers' organizations; that it was so represented to the advocates or to the representatives of the unions, and that their fears in regard to that matter were groundless, and so they neglected to vigorously oppose it. Well, of course, in the first Loewe case in the Supreme Court we fought that all out before the Supreme Court, the representatives of the unions and Hon. James M. Beck and myself, who argued the case for Loewe; and the Supreme Court held that was not so, that the history of the act showed that it was not intended to exempt them, and that, on the contrary, repeated efforts had been made in Congress to amend the act at that time and subsequently so that it should not apply to labor unions, and that they had always been refused. So that the act stands, as Justice Fuller said, as we have it before us to-day.

Well, now, for a great many sessions of Congress the representatives of organized labor have been there pressing an amendment, stating that the Sherman Antitrust Act will not apply or be construed to apply to labor unions and farmers' organizations for the purpose of taking them out from under the Sherman antitrust law. Well, now, the Clayton Act don't do anything of the kind. On the contrary, repeated efforts were made in Congress to have such a provision put in and they were voted down by Congress in the House of Representatives. But, on the other hand, the act is so worded as to accomplish precisely what it ought to accomplish, to wit, this, that it shall not be construed to forbid the existence of labor unions or other activities for lawful purposes. That was carefully considered, evidently, and adopted; and the construction that the court, I think, should and will put upon it—and that is one of the matters that we discussed before the Supreme Court the other day of this case that I speak of—that it leaves the Sherman Antitrust Act exactly where it was before, as the same has been construed by the Supreme Court.

But further than that the Loewe case, the Danbury Hatters' case, was brought under section 7 of the Sherman Antitrust Act, and that the Supreme Court held covered this kind of a case, to wit, the Loewe case. The Clayton Act reenacts, word for word, the seventh section of the Sherman Antitrust Act, including other antitrust laws, to wit, these two or three sections in this law. Now we, upon familiar principles of construction adopt the construction that the Supreme Court put upon that act, so that I think—of course, I am speaking my own opinion about these things—I think the Supreme Court will hold that section—that the Sherman Antitrust Act is not altered in the slightest degree by the Clayton bill, and instead of exempting labor unions from its operation, it clears up any doubt whatever that those acts in violation of the Sherman Antitrust Act are forbidden, and they are responsible for it. In other words, if anybody thinks that the Clayton Act has changed the legal situation at all, so far as the Sherman Act is concerned, I think they are mistaken.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it that the purpose of organized labor having this law passed was to cure certain spots in the Sherman Antitrust Act that was granted organized labor?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is a very peculiar thing. When Mr. Gompers was before the House Judiciary Committee the question was put to him, "What is it now you want done to the Clayton Antitrust Act? Tell us what you are after." And he stated to the committee that all they wanted was to be assured that their existence as unions was not imperiled by the Sherman Antitrust Act, and when the committee reported on the bill this is what the Senate Judiciary Committee, who is the interpreter of the bill, said: "It is well at the outset to state the theory of the bill, both as it passed the House of Representatives and as it is proposed to be amended, for the general scope of the House measure is unchanged. It is not proposed by the bill or amendments to alter, amend, or change in any respect the original Sherman Antitrust Act of July 7, 1890. The purpose is only to supplement that act and the other antitrust acts referred to in section 1 of the bill."

They also quoted in that same report from the House committee's report the following:

"The bill does not interfere with the Sherman Antitrust Act at all. It leaves the law of conspiracy untouched, and it is not open to effective criticism on any constitutional ground."

So it is my judgment that as far as the Sherman antitrust law relates to the activities of labor unions in restraint of interstate trade or in the District of Columbia the law is now as it was before.

Now you come to the twentieth section, which was an attempt or is an attempt to regulate the issuance of injunctions, and in that respect my judgment is that the only construction that will save the law or those provisions from utter destruction by the courts is the construction that the law is left just as it was before. Now, on that subject I want to call the attention of the commission to the difference between the Clayton and the Pearre bill. This Pearre bill is very short, and they drive right straight to the mark. I don't believe it is constitutional. I opposed it on the ground of its invalidity, but the scope of it is what I want to call attention to, and to show you how in the Clayton bill the provisions are so narrow from the Pearre bill that it almost requires a microscope to find the class of cases or a case which comes within the purview of it. Now, the Pearre bill, to which we have referred, reads this way:

"SECTION 1. That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and an employee, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed to labor and persons seeking employment as laborers, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment," etc.

Now, that is the scope in all of the cases mentioned, and any case growing out of or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms and conditions of employment, which would cover all of those boycott cases. For instance, the Loewe case, that was not a suit between employer and employee or employees, but it was between Mr. Loewe and the unions and the members of the unions. There were not but two of those defendants that ever worked for Mr. Loewe. Now, that was covered by this provision. In the Clayton bill this is the way it is worded, so you will see how it narrows it down:

"That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and employee, or between employers and employees, or between employees, or between persons employed and persons seeking employment involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment."

In other words, the provisions of section 20, which we were talking about, is confined by the terms of it to this class of cases. It must be a case between an employer and employee, or employers or employees, or between employees or persons seeking employment and those employed, which involve or grow out of a dispute between them; and it must be by those with whom that relation exists when the suit is brought; it does not touch cases where men have struck and left their employment, where the relation is terminated, where they have been discharged. That relation specified here must exist at the time the suit is brought or this provision does not relate.

Now, you know that the great majority of cases—it is hard to find a case that comes within it except possibly some of these I. W. W. cases, where men remaining in the employ, by their acts of sabotage or some of the other things they do, injure the property and remain there—and there was a dispute in that class of cases; but except those classes of cases, and it must necessarily be a limited class, section 20 has no application; it does not affect the ordinary boycott, because it does not affect a case like those between combinations of laboring men and combinations of employers in cities like New York, Boston, Chicago, and other places; they are excluded from it. And it is narrowed down so, and purposely narrowed down so, that the scope of the act is, in those provisions, extremely limited. It would not touch, for instance, a case like the Debs case. There the United States brought a suit against the union, the officers, the members of the union; it would not touch those cases, because it is not between them and the employee, nor is it between employees, the relation does not exist.

So you can run through the entire category. In the next place——

Mr. SPELLING (interrupting). May I call your attention to one case?

Chairman WALSH. Please excuse me, but you can not do it.

Mr. SPELLING. I can not do it, unless I ask a question.

Chairman WALSH. You can not do it. It is in accordance with a fixed rule of the commission, established since our inception; any question you care to hand up will be asked.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Mr. Spelling has asked me to submit this question. It is a source of great satisfaction to me to find a man whose penmanship is more wretched than mine.

Mr. DAVENPORT. It is not mine.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. With the permission of the chair I will ask Mr. Spelling to read it.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask Mr. Spelling not to read it, with all due respect to the commissioner. Please take your seat, Mr. Spelling.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Perhaps you can read it, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH (reading): "You said instead of exempting labor, it leaves them, as it were; no; would not the enactment of section 6, containing negative and prohibitive provisions, have the effect of sanctioning, by implication, the prior judicial views applying the antitrust act to all conduct not legalized by the terms of section 6?"

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I think I will have to pass that question. Perhaps I can take it and by reading it grasp the meaning of it, but I think I had better go on with what I am talking about now.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I wish to straighten out one matter. You said, speaking of the section applying to differences between employer and employee and all that—did I catch your idea right that if the employees were on strike and therefore not in the employ of the employer that the law would not apply?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No; it would not apply.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That would not be considered a difference between employer and employee?

Mr. DAVENPORT. It would not be a case between them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Your idea is that the moment a strike takes place they are out of employment and it does not apply?

Mr. DAVENPORT. When they strike or quit, it does not apply.

Now, these are the interesting features of this bill or this act, to which your attention could be given with a good deal of profit, and, having it narrowed down in the class of cases as I have described, they go on: "And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from terminating any contract of employment or from seeking to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do, or from attempting at any such place where any such person or persons may lawfully be for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or from peaceably persuading any person to work or abstain from working or from ceasing to patronize or employ any party to such dispute, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful and lawful means so to do, or from paying or giving to or withholding from any person engaged in such dispute any strike benefits or other moneys or things of value, or from peacefully assembling in a lawful manner or for a lawful purpose, or from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto; nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of any law of the United States."

Now, it is contended by the gentleman who framed this law and procured its passage that the effect of that law is to strip the courts of the United States of the power under any and all circumstances in the class of cases to which it refers, or all power to protect the business or the property rights, as defined by the Supreme Court—all power to protect them—and that it goes further and it makes lawful under all circumstances all acts specified in this.

Now, if that construction were adopted, then this section would not be worth the paper it is written on, because of two things. The last section says that they shall not be held or considered to be in violation of any act or any law of the United States. That would repeal probably 20; it must be construed in one of two ways: Either it is a direction to the Federal court not to hold acts which are violations of the laws of the United States to be such violations, in which event, with such a construction, that is a direct invasion, would be a direct invasion by the legislative body of the judicial power and function and would be void on that account. On the other hand, if you take it as a comprehensive repeal and amendment and alteration of all of the laws of the United States, why, you are presented with this difficulty: That it repeals absolutely the civil-service laws of the United States; that it would repeal absolutely the interstate commerce act, both as to the carriers and as to the employees; it would repeal the great laws under which the great post-office system of the Government is conducted.

Now, of course, the Supreme Court or any other court in construing that law would never take such a construction as that, and they would not take the other construction if they could avoid it, because it would be a violation of the Constitution; it would be void law.

In the next place, take the first section of the first clause: "No such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person from refusing to perform work," and so forth.

What would be the necessary effect of that? It would strip the individual who had this property absolutely of his rights. Not only in the District of Columbia, in which the doors of the courts are barred by this law, but every other Federal court, of the right to go to court to protect the people in these constitutional rights, and it would be void on that account.

Now, the true construction of this act is this: That wheresoever any of the acts specified in this section, in this paragraph, are lawful, no injunction shall be issued to restrain their performance of those acts. The words "Nor shall any of the acts specified in this act be held to be violations of any laws of the United States"—the construction which I think is the correct construction is this: That wherever any of these acts mentioned here can lawfully be done, they shall not be enjoined, nor shall they be held to be violations of any law of the United States, and the history of the times leads up to that construction, so that I conclude that, so far as that section is concerned, the law is left exactly as it is now, or was at the time of the passage of the act.

Now, we come to this provision of the act that relates to contempt proceedings. As I have explained this morning and the other day, the provisions in regard to a trial of contempt cases are limited, so that it is almost impossible, without a microscope, to find a case in which they apply. In the first place, section 24 says that nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court, or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice. Now, the courts have held that any violation of an injunction wherever it is committed obstructs the administration of justice, because it interferes with and hampers it, and that exception, "so near to as to obstruct the administration of justice," would take out from under its provisions all contempts that are in the nature of violations of an injunction. [Continues reading:]

"Nor to contempts committed in the disobedience of any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States, but the same and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 21 of this act may be punished in conformity with the uses of law and equity now prevailing."

Now, the Debs case, for instance; there was a suit brought by the United States, and an injunction was obtained and Debs violated it, and he was tried without a jury. The provisions of this section exempt such cases as the Debs case. In short, all those cases which gave rise to the cry of no government by injunction are covered—are excepted from this law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And the violation such as Debs was charged with, in what way would it be treated differently now from what it was treated prior—

Mr. DAVENPORT. Not a bit. Why, it is excepted. You remember the origination—Mr. Lennon will remember it—of the cry of “no government by injunction.” The United States went into a court in Chicago and got this injunction, and then when the order was not complied with brought the troops there to enforce the decree of the court, and Gov. Altgeld claimed that that was an invasion of the State of Illinois; that the act of the court issuing an injunction and then hauling men up under it and punishing them for contempt and sending them to prison without trial by jury was an invasion both of the powers of the State and of the rights of the individual. In other words, that it was using the equity power for the purpose of enforcing the criminal law. And so arose the cry of “government by injunction.” And it was made the slogan, as you will remember, of many Democratic platforms.

And in 1896—it was in 1894 that I have been talking about—but in 1896 Mr. Bryan made his campaign not only upon the silver question, but upon this question of “no government by injunction.” This Clayton Act throws all that to the winds. This Clayton Act rejects all that. This Clayton Act affirmatively approves of, ratifies, and enacts as a statute the thing that the Supreme Court in the Debs case declared to be the law.

Not only that, but in what class of cases is the right of trial by jury given to anybody? We are talking now, for instance, about the laboring man, as that is more intimately connected with the subject that the commission has uppermost in mind. Now, observe what it is, section 21 [reading]: “Any person who shall willfully disobey any lawful writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command of any district court of the United States or any court of the District of Columbia, by doing any act or thing therein or thereby forbidden to be done by him”——

“Only the acts that are forbidden are the matters that come within the scope of the provision, if the act or thing so done by him be of such a character as to constitute also a criminal offense under any statute of the United States or of the laws in any of the States in which the act was committed, shall be proceeded against for his said contempt as herein provided.”

That is to say, anything forbidden to be done is a criminal act against the statutes of the United States or the laws of any State where the act is committed, the violation of that injunction shall be proceeded with in this way. In other words, it specifically and in terms authorizes the issuance of injunctions to restrain the commission of crimes, which was precisely the thing the labor union fought against so strongly in the Debs case, contending—they employed that great lawyer, Lyman Trumbull, to argue the case for them, and he argued it with consummate skill, and he contended that this was a misuse of the equity power of the court; that it was a use of it to execute the criminal law. The Supreme Court said not so. It is true these acts are crimes, but those crimes, when they injure a party, are torts also, and that injury can be restrained by the power of a court of equity. This statute expressly confers upon the court the power to do the very thing that the unions contended against, and which the Supreme Court was, for a time, until they accepted this doctrine, as they have done, because they asked for the passage of this bill, which they have denounced the Supreme Court for having done.

Well, the next thing is section 22. It provides [reading]:

“When there is reason to believe that there has been a violation of the order for which the party can be brought into court,” which does not materially change the existing law in any way.

Now, then, comes this provision about trial by jury (reading): “In all cases within the purview of this act such trial may be by the court or, upon the demand of the accused, by the jury.” It must be a case within the purview of this act. What does that mean? What class of cases are within the purview of this act? Well, the trust cases not relating to labor are within the purview of this act. This provision inserted in this act, so far as it applies to such cases, makes applicable to them the provision of trial by jury. But are the other classes of cases embraced in this act still included? What are they? Those are the cases where the courts are prohibited from issuing injunctions. "No restraining order or injunction shall be issued by any court or any judge thereof in a case between any employer," and so forth. No such injunction shall be issued. You can not try a man for violation of an injunction when no injunction is or can be issued. So that class of cases, the very class of cases it was sought apparently to include are excepted from this law.

Well, now, when you come to the question of trial by jury—if you can find a case that will come within this purview; that is to say, if you can find some case where an injunction is issued forbidding the doing of an act which is a crime either under the laws of the United States or of the State, and you can find a case where it is within the purview of this act—then the following procedure shall be had:

"In all cases within the purview of the act such trial may be by the court or, upon demand of the accused, by a jury, in which latter case the court may impanel a jury from the jurors then in attendance before the court or judge thereof."

In all cases within the purview of the act such trial may be by the court or, upon demand of the accused, by a jury. In which latter case the court may impanel a jury from the jurors then in attendance on the court or the judge thereof.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Does that mean it is not mandatory but discretionary?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I say it is discretionary.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Discretionary on the part of the court?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Surely; as it always has been.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Not on the part of the defendant?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No. That was put in there deliberately. There were 11 or 12 statutes introduced relating to trials by juries at that session of Congress, and everyone had the word "shall" impanel a jury. The word "shall" was stricken out and the word "may" inserted. Why was that done? For the very reason, if you put the word "shall" in there, it would undoubtedly be declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, because all during this time the Supreme Court has been pointing out case after case that any such law as that would be unconstitutional. It was put in there for the purpose of obviating any such difficulty, with the effect that the law is left as it is. I could go on with these features, but it would amount to this, that this act regulates and controls the class of cases to which it is related in a way substantially, as it does now, so far as procedure in contempt cases is concerned at the present or before the passage of this law. It was always within the power of a court to call a jury in, and then proceed to find the facts—such facts as the court submitted to them. They didn't find a general verdict of guilty or not guilty. That was from long and familiar practice, and in the Gompers case the Supreme Court said they might do that, because Gompers had asked for a jury trial, and then withdrew it in the lower court on the ground that he was not entitled to it.

Now, if I were to sum up the whole situation, I should say that the application of this law is by its terms so confined to such a limited class of cases that it is almost impossible to find any that come within the scope of it, and then it is not changed in any material effect, but there is this awful provision which makes me shudder when I think of what condition the unfortunate inhabitants of this country are liable to. We are liable to violate injunctions, not only in labor cases, and then look at it. If the accused shall be found guilty judgment shall be entered accordingly prescribing the punishment, either by fine or imprisonment, or both, in the discretion of the court. Such fine shall be paid to the United States, or to the complainant, or other party injured by the act, in contempt, or may, when more than one is so damaged, be divided proportionately among them, as the court may direct, but in no case shall the fine be paid to the United States in case the accused is the natural person, exceed the sum of $1,000, or such imprisonment exceed the term of six months. Now, an injunction may be issued in any kind of a suit, and if this provision relates to any other kind of a suit than the possible imaginary one under this, any citizen is liable without a trial by jury to have assessed against him damages to an extremely large amount; it might be $100,000 or $200,000, and upon the order of the court he has to be incarcerated until when? Who can get him out? Then Attorney General long since decided that it is not in the power of the President to pardon or remit a fine or damages that is assessed for the benefit of a party, and he has to stay there. Now, that in brief is the outcome of it. But there are other features of it. Take Mr. O'Connell's condition; he lives here in the District of Columbia, and he is a machinist by trade——

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is questionable.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I think he must have been a good one, and I don't believe he has lost the skill. That man stands in and upon the soil of his country in the District of Columbia stripped of every right for which our fathers fought and died. If the construction is put upon it then that I have explained, the door of every court in the District of Columbia, including the Supreme Court of the United States, is closed to him. His skill, his strength, his time are his own, which he can sell. That contract that he makes is a property right. His employer can discharge him without a minute's notice under the statute and not commit an unlawful act, or anybody could go to his employer and say, "Don't employ O'Connell," and persuade him to discharge him, and the party would not be liable to him for the wrong that he has done him, and so in all other respects. Take the employees in the Government Printing Office here, 3,000 or 4,000 of them; they are under the civil-service laws; the Government officers are prohibited from discharging those men without cause. Under the terms of that act, as some people contend for, they can be discharged without a moment's notice, and without any cause, or for any cause further than belonging to a union, or not, or without any reason given, and the officers of the Government Printing Office have full sway; and so of all the 300,000 employees of the Government. I could expatiate on this to an unlimited extent.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. We have an unwritten law in the District of Columbia under the civil service, "For the good of the service."

Mr. DAVENPORT. Suppose it is not for the good of the service?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It is unquestionable. When the highest authority of the Government says it is for the good of the service there is no appeal.

Mr. DAVENPORT. But suppose he says, "I don't care if it is for the good of the service, I will discharge him because he belongs to a union."

Commissioner O'CONNELL. For the good of the service. The President can issue an order for the good of the service, and any civil-service officer can be discharged.

Mr. DAVENPORT. But I am talking about where he has not done it. You have legal rights here.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But the rights I have now, I have not the political right to protect myself, which is very unfortunate.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I would move out of this district, if this law is as the friends of it contend it to be. I want to contrast the situation, a man like Mr. O'Connell, and other inhabitants of this city, the Capital of the greatest country of the world, I want to contrast it with the condition of the inhabitants, if this construction of the law is true, the inhabitants of Brussels, in Belgium, where that invading army came into that country, and finally occupied the city of Brussels, but the military commander proclaimed that the rights of private property would be protected, and invariably it is the same; it is done by every military commander wherever he goes, and they are protected, and the whole power of the Imperial Government of Germany is behind it, but by acts of Congress it is claimed that inhabitants of the District of Columbia are stripped of their property rights, and the courts of the United States have nailed them up so they can not go in there for protection. Now, the Supreme Court, in my opinion, I think, will hold the act to be susceptible of another construction, such as I have given, and not objectionable on the ground of its invalidity.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Your judgment, then, is in accord with that of Mr. Walter Drew, counsel for the National Erectors' Association, who says it may be said that the Clayton law does not make lawful any conduct of a labor union that was previously unlawful? For years Mr. Gompers and his associates tried to secure legislation which would exempt unions from the rule that governs other combinations. The Clayton law does not confer any such exemption. It is possibly better from Mr. Gompers's point of view to believe that it does, than to admit the failure of his long campaign in that behalf.

Mr. DAVENPORT. There is a criticism upon Mr. Gompers, which I don't feel called upon to join in. I agree with the legal effect of it. Now, Mr. Gompers was probably in very much the condition in regard to that act that Commissioner Weinstock said he was; that he was confused about it. I can not believe that Mr. Gompers ever intentionally forsook all of the positions he has taken in fact, and turned about face and came and occupied the position that we had occupied, but he has done it, and I think it is a very good thing that he did. I think that no harm was done by the act, but when you come—now, we all have our ideas about these things, but there is only one place left yet in this country where they can be settled, and that is in the courts. Many of the things I have been talking about are involved in the decision of Payne Lumber case now submitted to the court.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Any further questions?

Mr. DAVENPORT. If there are none, I would like to inquire, I stated to the chairman, I asked him if I could revise what I have said. I would like to have that opportunity, I would like to make some corrections, and would like to shape it up somewhat. Would I be allowed the privilege of so correcting it?

(Chairman Walsh having retired, Commissioner Weinstock acted as temporary chairman.)

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. There can be no objection to your correcting your testimony, so far as the construction is concerned, but it has been a rule of the commission not to permit witnesses to change their testimony.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I will stick to what was said. This is the idea, I want to stick in some cases and shape it up so that I shall not be ashamed to read it myself, and with the permission of the commission I will now retire.

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. Mr. Spelling.

TESTIMONY OF MR. THOMAS E. SPELLING.

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. Will you please state your full name and residence to the stenographer?

Mr. SPELLING. Thomas E. Spelling; I reside in New York City, 215 Broadway.

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. Your profession?

Mr. SPELLING. An attorney at law. I have some other professions that I need not mention.

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. Will you state for the commission whom you have generally represented in the matter that you have up to discuss before the commission?

Mr. SPELLING. The only party I ever represented was the American Federation of Labor two years, or a little more, in two cases in the courts, and on several occasions before congressional committees. Especially, and I believe solely, in the advocacies of anti-injunction legislation.

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. Will you please state in your own way for the information of the commission such matters as you think will be of interest in this connection?

Mr. SPELLING. I would like to ask Mr. Davenport a few questions. I couldn't do that when he was on the stand. I think I can throw more light on the subject in that way than to go ahead and say what I have to say.

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. It has not been the practice of the commission.

Mr. SPELLING. I got the permission from the chairman this morning. It is a part of my own statement, if he is willing to answer.

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. Are there any objections on the part of any members of the commission to allowing him to do that?

Commissioner LENNON. I have no objection; it is a question of whether it is agreeable to Mr. Davenport.

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. If it is agreeable to Mr. Davenport.

Mr. DAVENPORT. If they are questions I can answer.

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. You may proceed, if Mr. Davenport has no objection.

Mr. SPELLING. Mr. Davenport, I want to ask you—you can keep your seat. You said that courts had uniformly and consistently held that labor unions were within the antitrust act. Now, did any court ever hold that a labor union as such was within the act?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No, sir.

Mr. SPELLING. Then, we are not in conflict on that.

Mr. DAVENPORT. But that is expressly held by the Supreme Court that they are not.

Mr. SPELLING. Do they not simply hold that when members of unions conspire or combine together and violate the antitrust act that they were held to accountability just like anybody else?

Mr. DAVENPORT. The same as the members of a church, I suppose.

Mr. SPELLING. And in that sense they were within the antitrust act, prior to the Clayton bill?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPELLING. And are within it yet, according to your view of it?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPELLING. Now, you spoke of the case of Connor v. Connolly?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPELLING. What town was that?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Danbury.

Mr. SPELLING. That town has figured in the litigation that you have been connected with very prominently. However, that is no part of my question.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I was not in the Connor-Connolly case.

Mr. SPELLING. The court denied the union men the privilege of uniting and combining together to exclude the nonunion men. Is that not about it?

Mr. DAVENPORT. It was an agreement between the union manufacturers of the town and the unions by which they would not employ anybody but a union man.

Mr. SPELLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVENPORT. And Mr. Connor was a member of the union?

Mr. SPELLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAVENPORT. And they had a great strike on, and they were out for several months with the result that the union owed him quite an amount of money for strike benefits. Then they called upon Mr. Connors for his dues, and before he could go to work again, and Mr. Connors said that he wouldn't pay it; that he had this coming; and that was contrary to the rules of the union and he was in bad order.

Mr. SPELLING. I beg your pardon, I didn't ask you——

Mr. DAVENPORT (interrupting). I want to come to this. Then Mr. Connolly, representing the union, in pursuance of the agreement that they had with the unionized hat manufacturers, went around and said, "This man is in bad order with the union," and got his discharge.

Well, he sued the union and the officers of the union, and it was tried before a jury, and he recovered a verdict of $1,100, and it went to the Supreme Court, and they sustained it.

Now, the claim was that the agreement between the union manufacturers of Danbury and the union was a valid agreement, and the supreme court of the State held, relying upon decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, that that was a contract for a monopoly in violation or contrary to public policy and void.

Mr. SPELLING. Is there any statute in Connecticut that covers that case?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No, sir.

Mr. SPELLING. Suppose all of the men engaged in the jewelry trade in that town had formed a copartnership, or had gotten together and had a monopoly, would there be any law covering that case?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I guess not.

Mr. SPELLING. We don't want to get into any argument, we want to hasten along and not prolong the discussion. Now, you know the courts have made a distinction between primary and secondary boycotts?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPELLING. Do you think there is any legal distinction?

Mr. DAVENPORT. There is none, and it was expressly decided so in the Supreme Court of the United States on the Sherman Act, in the Eastern Lumber Dealers' Association v. The United States.

Mr. SPELLING. I had a little book; I guess I must have dropped it. Now, in a boycott, the clause says, no court shall enjoin or restrain any person, singly or in concert—hand me that, please. That little book. I guess it isn't there. No court shall issue any restraining order or injunction restraining any persons, singly or in concert, from, and then we can skip a few clauses, and come to the boycott clause, from ceasing to patronize or peaceably persuading others from ceasing to patronize any party to such dispute.

Now, what is the effect of the use of those words, "any such dispute," when you consider it in connection with the limitations of the first paragraph of section 20?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Have I not said all I can possibly say on that subject to the commission?

Mr. SPELLING. Does it not limit it to the particular realms which are specified in the first paragraph?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't know but what you are right about that; I have not considered that. That would narrow it still more.

Mr. SPELLING. Did you ever hear of a boycott between employees?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No.

Mr. SPELLING. Did you ever hear of a boycott between employer and employees?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No; I don't know that, unless the I. W. W.'s—

Mr. SPELLING. I don't think we care to get into that.

Mr. DAVENPORT. No; I never did.

Mr. SPELLING. Now, did you ever hear of a strike between persons seeking employment, I mean a boycott?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No.

Mr. SPELLING. Now, if that connection were broken and in place of the words, "any party to such dispute," were inserted the words "any persons whatever," wipe out the first paragraph and read it that way, it would cover all kinds of boycotts?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes; sure.

Mr. SPELLING. The Clayton bill don't do that, by a long sight?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't think it does. Now, you are punching holes in that bill; there are so many in it, it is not worth while to talk about other additional ones. It is shot full of holes now.

Mr. SPELLING. I am not going to take up those things. The strike provision, however, you have very well explained, and I agree with you that the words "lawful and peaceable" clear the whole thing, and when you consider it in connection with the first paragraph it is worse than no legislation; for this reason I want to see if you agree with me on that; it confirms to the courts all acts and all conduct by any party which is not—I mean jurisdiction to enjoin the conduct and all acts which are not lawful?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir; anything that is not lawful can be enjoined.

Mr. SPELLING. If the parties to a strike should violate, should commit a misdemeanor and violate some town ordinance or some State statute which did not injure property heretofore, you would have trouble defending or maintaining an injunction in a case like that, would you?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, I don't know. It depends on what you consider property. I regard property as any right of a pecuniary nature.

Mr. SPELLING. We will not debate the question of what is property. I said it did not injure property that you had trouble heretofore in maintaining an injunction against that conduct which is unlawful?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir; in the Debs case the Supreme Court said it must be property or right of a pecuniary nature, but there have been injunctions issued to protect some personal rights.

Mr. SPELLING. Here is a clause which forbids a court from restraining lawful conduct. Does that not, by essential implication, give the court authority to restrain illegal conduct?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes, sir; sure.

Mr. SPELLING. You said something about this Kansas case.

Mr. DAVENPORT. About what?

Mr. SPELLING. About this Kansas case, Coppage v. Kansas.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes.

Mr. SPELLING. The Supreme Court in effect held that an employer could refuse to employ a man or discharge him because he belonged to a union. Was not that the gist of it?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Sure.

Mr. SPELLING. Couldn't he discharge him or refuse to employ him for any reason?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Sure; good or bad.

Mr. SPELLING. But if those employers formed a combination, you do not think that is exempted by the Clayton Act, do you?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Surely not.

Mr. SPELLING. And another can cease to serve another; he can relinquish employment and persuade others to do so, and strike in concert. What do you understand "singly or in concert" to mean?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I understand that to mean all.

Mr. SPELLING. You mean to act by common impulse?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Rather.

Mr. SPELLING. Suppose that same man went down the street in an automobile and ran over a child or something, and a hundred people rushed at him and beat him up and tore up his automobile. Wouldn't that be acting in concert?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes; in a sense it would.

Mr. SPELLING. Well, if they acted together and agreed to do that thing it would be a combination, wouldn't it?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes.

Mr. SPELLING. Do any of these things exempt a case of that kind from injunction?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I don't think it does at all, as I have explained.

Mr. SPELLING. So that people are only protected from the use of injunctions in cases where they act in concert, or by a common impulse, without an understanding to do that very thing?

Mr. DAVENPORT. According to my idea of the Clayton Act, it is like a treaty of neutrality with Belgium; it is a "worthless scrap of paper."

Mr. SPELLING. Now, you said, in regard to section 6, that it left the unions just as they are now, in their relation to the Sherman Antitrust Act. Now, then, is not the language, the negative and prohibitive language which makes concerted conduct and certain relations of men lawful—don't that sanction and confirm to the courts to decide as violative of the Sherman Antitrust Act and place the stigma of illegality on it?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I think what was illegal before is illegal now, and I do not think that anything that was illegal before is legal by the act.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Chairman, I do not think this procedure is really valuable to this commission; it may be a matter of value to Mr. Spelling, but I do not think it brings out anything from Mr. Davenport up to this time that he has not already put in the record.

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. If there is any objection on the part of any member of the commission—

Mr. SPELLING (interrupting). I wish to say a word about section 16.

Commissioner AISHTON. I wish to object to this questioning; it does not get us anywhere, and, as Mr. Lennon says, it is of no value to the commission. It is simply a matter of difference of opinion between attorneys.

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. Mr. Spelling asked permission to ask some questions of Mr. Davenport, and permission was granted; but if there is any objection I will ask him to desist and proceed in the usual way.

Mr. SPELLING. I wish to get something in the record of a formal, concise, and logical nature, as my own statement, in regard to the status of unions and the laws governing labor organizations; it will take about 15 minutes, and then I will be ready to yield to the wishes of the commission.

Commissioner AISHTON. I suggest that the witness proceed with his statement.

Mr. SPELLING. I am ready.

Acting Chairman WEINSTOCK. The witness will proceed.

Mr. SPELLING (reading). "There is undoubtedly a disposition or tendency of labor to attach undue importance to legislation already enacted, or which is desired at the hands of legislative bodies. If labor as organized had immunity from legislation enacted by the courts, it could take care of itself, and need only guard against discriminatory statutes. But rules and customs have grown up among business men, and especially among business corporations, which, while appearing to be merely salutary and protective, yet in reality place the public, and especially that part of the public dependent upon the employment of capital by others, at a great disadvantage. These rules and customs come at length to be acquiesced in by all, and become, for all practical purposes, new rules of jurisprudence."

Now, we find in the Clayton Act conclusive proof of a part of the general fact which I have just stated. Instead of its being a new chart of liberty for labor as has been claimed and extensively proclaimed, I see in it nothing but admissions at the hands of Congress, in the form of concessions, of unjust and prejudicial limitations upon the individual and collective rights of labor.

Let's now examine one or two of the clauses of section 20 of the act. There is found here legislation on the subject of strikes. It says here "And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from terminating any relation of employment, or from ceasing to perform any work or labor, or from recommending, advising, or persuading others by peaceful means so to do." Is it possible that any legislative sanction was needed to exclude the courts from interfering within so limited a domain?

When Congress was requested to protect labor from unwarranted interference by the courts therein, it improved the opportunity to insert a qualifying term which by essential implication recognizes a jurisdiction heretofore always denied to the courts and contested. Congress says here, in what purports to be a codification of injunction law in labor cases, that the courts must not interfere with strikers proceeding peacefully, and the idea that they may interfere with strikes that are conducted by means not peaceful is included. I think this conclusion is warranted by the language of section 20 alone without reference to other parts of the act. The result is to confirm to courts exercising equitable jurisdiction powers similar in some respects to those exercised by the chief of police in a city, or more nearly resembling those of a military governor in a district wherein martial law has been declared. But the power which the judge can exercise is much more far reaching than that of either. The policeman must proceed according to existing laws and the military commander according to established rules. But the judge initiates the repressive proceeding by making a law to suit himself, after which he proceeds to apply it to a case already before him, and consummates the procedure by executive action, because he measures the penalty for a violation and enforces it. I do not lose sight of the fact that courts are legitimately vested with all these powers in proper cases, but until this enactment labor insisted with ample legal reason that if in the initiation and conduct of a strike violence was resorted to or a state of disorder created, a case arose to be dealt with only by the police authorities and the law courts.

But so vague and comprehensive a word as "peaceful" ought never to be used in an act of legislation without specifications as to its meaning, and no one could describe the result of even the most intelligent attempt to paint its proper application and limitations. As this provision now stands, and strike so conducted as to disturb the equanimity or shock the nervous systems of any considerable number of persons is liable to be held to be outside the immunity attempted to be given by it; and under present industrial conditions and owing to the magnitude of enterprises, a strike which does not cause considerable local inconveniences and disturbance is hardly worth winning. And there is some truth in the assertion so often heard that there is no such thing as a peaceful strike. Ample judicial precedent can be found for enjoining strikes by employees of public-service corporations on the sole ground of improper motives in instituting them, coupled with considerations of disturbance of social and business conditions.

But collateral to and yet outside the scope of this narrowly restricted limitation upon the jurisdiction—accepting now the theory that it restricts instead of enlarging jurisdiction—lies the vast, practically unlimited law of conspiracy. The Judiciary Committee of the House in reporting the bill explicitly and truthfully stated that the bill if passed would leave the law of conspiracy untouched. When these provisions come before the courts they will attend to the exact legal import of the words used. That is one important function of the courts, and they will hold that the words "in concert" are not synonymous with and have not the same legal import as acting pursuant to a preconcerted plan or common understanding. Persons oftener than otherwise act in concert from a common impulse without an agreement or mutual understanding, as where they rush simultaneously to a place of safety in case of fire or flood or to the rescue of their fellows in distress. But let it not be forgotten that where laborers deliberate and agree among themselves to strike, the courts have in some cases held that that goes beyond merely acting concertedly for the promotion of a lawful object, and have asserted and exercised the power of inquisition as to the legality or illegality of their motives and purposes; and if they disapproved them the case fell within the legal meaning of conspiracy and might be enjoined as such; and it was this domain of jurisdiction which the Judiciary Committee meant to preserve intact, and which it did preserve, as conclusively shown in its report.

It is the wish of the commission that testimony be not loaded up with authorities; I will cite only one case illustrative of my last statement. In Payne Lumber Co. v. Neal, a Federal court case, it was held that although a course of conduct by organized labor was termed a "strike" and had the form and all the characteristics of a strike, yet the court could inquire as to the inner motives of the strikers; and upon making such inquisition in that case, the court held that though started and carried on as a strike, it was in fact a boycott. I submit that such a ruling completely upsets the theory and nullifies the doctrine that the unions may strike for any reason satisfactory to themselves or for a variety of reasons, and that in all their deliberations on a question of striking or not striking the judiciary participates at the council board; and a judge having stamped the movement as in fact a conspiracy, to wit, a boycott and not a strike, of course the clause I have quoted from this act does not apply, and the movement would be tested by another provision which I now quote with its context: "And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from ceasing to patronize any party to such dispute."

A comprehensive discussion of the boycott and of the bearing of this provision upon it would occupy considerable space. I must therefore content myself with a presentation of a few pertinent suggestions, ample at any rate to correct certain erroneous views which have been promulgated concerning its legal effect.

That the boycott is morally wrong no one with my mental attitude on the subject need deny. I had as soon deny that the spirit of the boycott is evil as to defend ingratitude. But does it follow that because a thing is morally wrong it should be enjoined by the courts? As a matter of mere expediency, I would treat the boycott as a sort of safety valve for human passion, safeguarding individuals and to some extent the whole community from greater evils, and from manifestations of malignity more difficult to deal with or endure. In short, I would leave it severely alone. In fact, all but an infinitesimal fraction of the boycotts intertwined with every thread of the social fabric are let alone. An occasional tradesman or manufacturer may be ruined by a boycott, but many more may be ruined in business by the neglect, or aggressive competition, or malignant conduct of others engaged in trade. In no such instance would any court of equity entertain a complaint for injunctive relief, notwithstanding that in many such cases the injury results from combinations of individuals. Every form of social hate or vindictiveness is, in effect, a boycott.

In view of the constitutional guaranties of free speech, a free press, and of the right of free assemblage, I look upon the use by a Federal court of the injunctive process or other remedy against a labor organization not amounting to a conspiracy in restraint of interstate commerce as a denial of rights protected by the Federal Constitution and a stark usurpation of jurisdiction. I except the jurisdiction to enjoin boycott of interstate commerce only because an injunctive remedy is given in the antitrust act without regard to general principles governing equitable jurisdiction; and of course I limit this denunciation to what enters into what is, properly speaking, the boycott itself. I do not deny liability for damages and criminal prosecutions where illegal acts are done in carrying on a boycott; but such liability would not justify an injunction. The boycott itself consists entirely of an interchange of information and opinion which, however erroneous, should not be interfered with by injunction, and the courts can not interfere with them in any other capacity than as high priests of morality. Of course, this contravenes the judicial and prevailing legal view. But should I concede its unsoundness, yet I would not know of any property or property right which, according to legal definition, could ever be injured or menaced by a boycott. On other occasions I have gone into this topic at length and deem it unnecessary to reiterate the arguments.

Returning now to the above-quoted provisions of section 20 of the Clayton Act, I premise that it is based on an understanding that injunctive jurisdiction in boycott cases is well established, and it has been widely, and I dare say, recklessly claimed that this provision lops off the jurisdiction and renders the boycott immune, especially the primary boycott. Various statements have been made to the effect that this provision "legalizes the primary and probably also the secondary boycott." Those who made them have never analyzed the language of the act nor compared its various provisions, nor is it usually necessary that this be done in order to reach the public through the press and to falsely impress and mislead a large number of credulous readers. The statement contains the erroneous absurdity first promulgated in the Phelan case that there is any such thing as a secondary boycott differing substantially from a fanciful primary boycott. Bearing in mind that the illegality of all boycotts is grounded in the general law of conspiracy, which, as the Judiciary Committee correctly said, remains untouched, such statements need be given no further notice. The question before us, however, is as to what this legislation accomplishes, and the immediate question relates to the legal effect of this particular provision.

The first thing to notice is that this clause differs from the preceding in the respect that the right here exempted from injunctive process is unquestionably limited by the provisions of the first paragraph of the section, because the party against whom the effort to deprive of patronage is directed must be a "party to such dispute," and the term "dispute" is not used in any preceding part of this paragraph, though it is used in the first. Hence the exemption is inapapplicable generally and is to exist only where a dispute has arisen; that is to say, "involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment." And no one can be recognized or given status as a party to such dispute unless he holds a relation to another party either of employer or employee or be at the same time seeking employment.

Let us notice the effect of the use in the boycott clause of the words "any party to such dispute" in connection with the use of the same words in the first paragraph. The right to boycott because of such connection is restricted and the exemption narrowed not only to cases in which a dispute has arisen, but to cases in which a dispute has arisen between persons holding the particular relations specified in the first section, and parties holding such relations never boycott each other or strike against each other.

The exact and full effect of this limitation is not very clear, but certainly there remains not even the right of what is termed the primary boycott until a dispute has arisen, nor is any character of boycott exempted from injunctive process unless conducted by "peaceful and lawful means." The use of these qualifying words excludes from the exemption and sanctions and preserves to the courts unrestrained and arbitrary police powers previously mentioned under the strike provision, to be exercised and enforced injunctively. The primary right to withhold patronage and to induce others to withhold it from a party against whom a boycott is immediately directed, and without waiting for a dispute to arise between him and his employees, or between him and persons seeking to enter his employ, fancifully differentiated as a primary boycott, has been heretofore generally conceded by the courts. Only what were differentiated as secondary boycotts were under the ban. That right no longer exists. This clause takes it away. Suppose that deplorable or intolerable conditions existed between a manufacturer of stoves and his employees, but dissatisfaction had not gone so far as a strike or resolution or agreement to strike; in other words, that no dispute in legal sense had been evolved. In that case and until such dispute arises there can not be in the presence of this legislation inaugurated any kind of boycott against that employer.

But a pretense of making an exemption, and only exempting such acts as are done "by peaceful and lawful means" is so farcical and absurd as to insult the commonest intelligence, because an illegal act can not be done by lawful means. This provision, like the others, merely forbids the issuance of an injunction against lawful conduct, and no court ever held, nor any intelligent lawyer ever asserted, that any lawful act could be enjoined.

There are other so-called exemptions in the same paragraph of section 20, to each of which all I have said about the two that I have discussed is equally applicable. But those defending and seeking to capitalize for political purposes the so-called labor provisions of the Clayton Act have called attention to and emphasized two closing clauses of this second paragraph of section 20. One of them, when connected with its context, reads: "And no such restraining order or injunction shall prohibit any person or persons, whether singly or in concert, from doing any act or thing which might lawfully be done in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto." The most general statement that I can make about this clause is that it is totally abortive, so far as I can see. I have given it much thought, turning it this way and that, and it still appears to me wholly meaningless and innocuous. I could not truly say this were it not for the presence here of that constantly recurring word "lawfully." That completely thwarts any such construction as would relieve laborers from the menace of injunction against them otherwise referable to that clause. Its use throws the question back to the domain of judicial decisions heretofore rendered; and it remains for the courts to determine what any person or persons may "lawfully" do "in the absence of such dispute by any party thereto."

I have likewise given considerable thought to the last clause, "nor shall any of the acts specified in this paragraph be considered or held to be violations of any law of the United States." This has been broadly claimed to contain preservative values, but no one has thought it worth while to specify what such values are. Even if it made any change in existing laws, the courts would be very reluctant to give effect to amendments attempted in a form so slovenly and inept. Under the Constitution Congress can not, of course, tell the courts how they shall construe and apply existing laws to a given fact. But I may pass that by. What act "specified in this paragraph" is now violative of any law of the United States? Not one. There is not a line of Federal statutory law applicable to one of them per se. What law there is consists of precedents founded on general principles of jurisprudence analogous to the common law. Not one of these subjects is mentioned or comprehended in any "law of the United States." I might ask how any act which must be lawful and peaceable could be violative of any law. But the question furnishes its own answer.

Before dismissing section 20 I will give brief attention to its first paragraph preliminary to comments on section 17. It provides in substance that in cases arising between persons holding certain relations, and which involve disputes concerning terms or conditions of employment, no injunction shall be granted by any Federal court or judge "unless to prevent irreparable injury to property or to property right of the party making the application."

This has been proclaimed by politicians as a substantial compliance with the demand by organized labor, persisted in for several years, for the enactment of the Pearre bill, having particular reference to the first section thereof. But only a little attention to the respective wordings of this act and that bill is required to see the fraudulent and makeshift character of this provision when viewed in that light. This provision is substantially a copy of section 1 of the Pearre bill, except that the word "or" is so omitted that the provision is rendered wholly abortive, or thereby completely "queered." The first section of the Pearre bill began thus: "That no restraining order or injunction shall be granted by any court of the United States, or a judge or the judges thereof, in any case between an employer and an employee, or between employers, or between employees, or between persons employed to labor and persons seeking employment as laborers, or involving or growing out of a dispute concerning terms or conditions of employment" and so forth. Now the effect of the omission of the word "or" here found before the word "involving" is apparent at a glance. It eliminates an almost unlimited class of cases covered by the phrase "involving or growing out of" and so forth, and turns the phrase into words of limitation. In fact, nothing worth considering is left. A scrutiny of the language should be convincing to the effect that cases within the description so limited could rarely if ever arise.

But still more important comment relates to the mutual bearing on each other of this provision of section 20 and one found in section 17 of the Clayton Act. Ignoring, however, for the moment, section 17, Congress has here declared that in certain cases an injunctive process shall not issue unless to prevent irreparable injury to property or a property right; if a legislative body enacts that street cars must not stop until they have reached the far side of street crossings on which there is no other street car track, this obviously permits them to stop on either side or both sides where there are such tracks. And so the natural import of such a prohibition as this part of section 20 is to authorize the issuance of injunctions in all cases not so exempted regardless of any question of property or property right. So it is in order here to ask what cases in which labor may be interested are thus safeguarded. Still bearing in mind the fact that the specific exemptions in the second paragraph are mere drivel or persiflage, as I have already explained, it is difficult to conceive of a case ever arising to which this first paragraph would apply. There is no strike while the relation of employer and employee exists, nor do those in another's employ ever institute a boycott against him. And permit me to inquire if anyone ever heard of employees or persons seeking employment boycotting or striking against each other? Yet the fantastic legislative theory that there might arise some such case serves as a sufficient peg upon which to hang this prohibition, the only real effect of which is to charter, not the liberty that is claimed for it, but infinite mischief to labor's rights and interests.

If any confirmation of this view were needed, we have only to turn to section 17 to find it. This act is an entire body of legislation, and, unquestionably, all the parts must be construed together.

All of section 17 which seems necessary to quote is in these words:

"SEC. 17. That no preliminary injunction shall be issued without notice to the opposite party.

"No temporary restraining order shall be granted without notice to the opposite party unless it shall clearly appear from specific facts shown by affidavit or by verified bill that immediate and irreparable injury, loss, or damage will result to the applicant before notice can be served and a hearing had thereon."

The first sentence was inserted either because the constructor of the provision knew little of the subject of injunctions or because he intended to deceive. I prefer the latter construction because of the high degree of cunning displayed in the whole performance. In fact, I think the men who controlled this situation knew exactly the effect which they wished to produce and how to produce it. This first sentence is completely nullified by what follows it, and is as completely functus officio as if the space it occupies had been left blank. While there is a technical distinction between a preliminary injunction and restraining order, there is none in legal effect.

Either the part of section 20 which I have been discussing or the provision just quoted is alone sufficient to confirm to the courts jurisdiction so arbitrary, absolute, and boundless that not even the most zealous employing interest ever dared insist upon it before a congressional committee or elsewhere. But both together confirm such extraordinary powers beyond peradventure, with a total indifference to the fundamental restriction of injunctive process to the protection of property and property rights, and to the complete discomfiture of labor with respect to its persistent demands.

Section 17, as here quoted, has the form of a regulation in the matter of notice in injunction cases. But care is taken to preserve to the courts the power to restrain and enjoin without notice in every conceivable case where a court was heretofore authorized to issue an injunction or restraining order at all, and in an illimitable class of cases in addition. But this ripper act does not stop at this. There is the essential implication, as much a part of the law as the part that is expressed, which gives the courts the power to enjoin for any cause, or for the accomplishment of any object whatever, for the protection of any personal right or privilege that may be claimed, subject only to the condition that notice be given.

Having a rather intimate knowledge of the situation in and around Congress with reference to efforts to obtain for labor relief from judicial abuses, I dare say that no one was deeply concerned on the subject of notices in such cases. It has been usually conceded by organized labor that where a party was entitled to an injunction at all he was entitled to as speedy protection against the threatened wrong as could be extended by the courts. Labor's grievance concerned judicial transgression of constitutional limitations in entertaining and acting injunctively on complaints which properly should have been taken jurisdiction of only in civil and criminal courts of law. And this legislative pretense or bluff of regulating notices is but another peg upon which Congress has hung augmentations of judicial power.

As the Clayton bill went from the House to the Senate, it contained between the words "to" and "the" where they occur a second time in the part above quoted, the words, "property or a property right of." The provision, though containing these words, was almost as objectionable as after their elimination, because of its other parts. But the Senate pruned out these words and left the provision as above quoted.

This matter of limiting injunctive jurisdiction to the protection of property and property rights is somewhat technical, and it has ever seemed difficult for the lay mind to become interested in its discussion, or realize its importance. But if ever the organized-labor movement should fail or should stop short of substantially improving conditions, it will be attributable to the power exercised by the courts, and thus confirmed by Congress, to check and restrain united and aggressive action. In the committee report on the Injunction bill in the Sixty-second Congress, in May, 1912, it was said that the time had come when labor could be trusted with liberty. But it seems that the Sixty-third Congress, in September, 1914, by the Clayton Act, barred the way to liberty.

The importance of the limitation to property and property rights where judicial usurpation in labor cases is being considered can not be overestimated.

However much I would like to further develop this line of thought, I must refrain, owing to limitations of time. But this provision has the same inclusive and exclusive aspect as have those provisions of section 20, already noticed. This provision forbids the issuance of restraining orders and injunctions without notice except where the facts are so and so, thereby leaving power in the hands of the judges to issue them without limit or restriction where the facts are otherwise, provided that they cause notice to be given.

Another of these so-called labor provisions of the act to be noticed is section 6, which has been supposed to exempt labor organizations from the remedial provisions of the antitrust act. As a literary production it is unique, and reads as follows:

"SEC. 6. That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce. Nothing contained in the antitrust laws shall be construed to forbid the existence and operation of labor, agricultural, or horticultural organizations, instituted for the purposes of mutual help and not having capital stock or conducted for profit, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from lawfully carrying out the legitimate objects thereof; nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws."

I want to say, in regard to what Mr. Davenport said to the effect that unions could become incorporated and escape individual liability, that no labor union can incorporate unless they go into business for profit. Take the laws of his own State. They authorize two classes of corporations—corporations for profit and corporations not for profit. The labor unions would come under the latter designation and can not be authorized with capital stock, consequently they can not limit their liability.

Also, as a consequence of going through the form of incorporation, it would give them merely perpetual existence and the right to carry on an organization in a corporate form; but it would have not the slightest effect upon the relations of the members to each other, nor upon their individual relations to the law, nor to judicial remedies.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Well, but, Mr. Spelling—

Chairman WALSH. Just a moment, Mr. Davenport.

Mr. SPELLING. I am perfectly willing—

Chairman WALSH. Just one moment. Just proceed, please, Mr. Spelling.

Mr. SPELLING. On no subject has there been more deception, some of it no doubt deliberate. In other instances ignorance or lack of proper study of the matter was responsible for it. It is my individual belief that no legislation has ever been needed to exempt labor organizations from the provisions, civil or criminal, of the antitrust act, and that even if such legislation were needed this so-called exemption accomplishes no such purpose. As my view may not be immediately and universally accepted—I would be surprised indeed if they were—I will briefly give my views on section 6 and my reasons for entertaining them:

In the first place, we observe that the declaratory or substantive part of the antitrust act, according to recent constructions, is merely an embodiment of common law and, except for the fact that there are no Federal common-law crimes, creates no new legal liabilities. Then we come to the remedial part and observe that it is directed against personal conduct exclusively. It is not a statute affecting the ownership or title or corpus of property, notwithstanding that in its enforcement property rights and interests are often seriously affected. Now I come to the statement of a proposition which might provoke conflict were it not so firmly founded on legal principle. No labor organization has ever violated nor ever can violate the act, as such, and if any court ever held to the contrary it was merely because of the neglect of counsel to call attention to the legal status of such organization, or the neglect of the court by which such status was overlooked. It legally is as impossible for a labor union, as such, and in the pursuit of the objects for which they are organized to violate the antitrust act as it would be for this commission, under the act creating it, to violate it; but, of course, it is conceivable that its members might conspire together to violate it and might misuse or pervert the name of the commission in carrying out an illegal purpose. That would not, however, involve or in any way affect the legal status of the commission or render it liable to a proceeding against it in any form as a defendant. If it were dragged in by parties complaining of such violation it might be dismissed from the record on motion, or by the court of its own volition; or if no such action were taken and its name were continued in the record as a defendant, notwithstanding that the court should render a judgment against it, which is an unreasonable supposition, such judgment would be, so far as concerned the commission, simply null and void and have no legal effect upon it. But, of course, the proceeding would be legal and the judgment valid as against the individual members of the commission, as individuals, but not as commissioners in the suppositious case.

Prosecutions and other proceedings against labor organizations and their officers are of the same legal aspect. Of course, a body of workingmen might frame a constitution or adopt by-laws embodying a scheme of illegality, but such scheme would stamp it as an illegal body and not a labor union in any legal sense. But if we concede that the fact that proceedings against unions by name have been in some instances ignorantly tolerated constitutes sufficient reason for demanding an exempting statute, our next inquiry is as to whether the demand has been responded to substantially or in any degree by the enactment of this section?

The first sentence, declaring that "The labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce," has no logical connection with or bearing upon what follows or upon any other part of this or any other statute. It is a mere abstraction and truism. No one after examining the definitions of the terms "commodity" and "article of commerce" can find where anybody ever claimed that the "labor of a human being" was within either definition. If the sentence had been so constructed as to exclude as property or a property right the right to do or continue business and the incidental right, often made the basis of equitable protection by employers seeking injunctions, of going into the labor market and hiring labor, as in the Pearre bill, then there would be some basis for the claim that it accomplishes some desirable end; but as meeting any demand for relief that labor has presented to Congress it is utterly vain.

The balance of section 6 covers a topic which has been the subject of endless discussion, both in and out of Congress. But to what I have already said with reference to the relation of labor organizations to the antitrust act I need add but a few words.

Congress here attempts to construe a prior act of Congress which is clearly a function of the courts; but waiving that defect I may inquire as to the net result. I do not deem it necessary to do more than call attention to the effect of one or two words. The language is that the antitrust act shall not be construed "to forbid" the existence and operation of certain organizations, instituted so and so, or to forbid or restrain individual members of such organizations from "lawfully" carrying out the "legitimate" objects thereof. The concluding clause, "Nor shall such organizations, or the members thereof, be held or construed to be illegal combinations or conspiracies in restraint of trade under the antitrust laws," are merely surplusage. They add nothing to what precedes. But an act of legislation which merely authorizes men or a body of men to "lawfully" carry out their "legitimate" purposes is a waste of words. To what test or standard will the courts resort when, if ever, called upon to apply this language? Obviously they must look to their own prior decisions, and to these alone, in order to learn what purposes are "legitimate" and how such purposes can be "lawfully" attained.

There are in the act provisions on the subject of jury trials in contempt cases, but as they can not be properly designated as labor provisions I shall refrain from any lengthy criticism of them. I will remark, however, that in the vital provision, which is contained in section 24, the whole scheme is thwarted by an exception exactly as wide as the right, rendering nugatory the whole scheme.

The section reads:

"SEC. 24. That nothing herein contained shall be construed to relate to contempts committed in the presence of the court or so near thereto as to obstruct the administration of justice nor to contempts committed in disobedience of any law, writ, process, order, rule, decree, or command entered in any suit or action brought or prosecuted in the name of or on behalf of the United States; but the same and all other cases of contempt not specifically embraced within section 21 of this act may be punished in conformity to the usages at law and in equity now prevailing."

Without dwelling upon the exception of all cases to which the Government is a party, I call attention to the established law which extends the "presence" of the court to every point in the country which its process can reach; and an act of disobedience in Oregon of an order made in Maine is constructively committed so near the court as to obstruct the administration of justice, and thus an exception to the rule is made just exactly as broad as the rule itself.

Upon a full consideration of the fact and in anticipation of the consequences of its removal of all judicial limitations I do not wonder at the sore discomfiture of those who have striven so long and earnestly for remedial legislation.

(Chairman WALSH. Mr. Weinstock has some questions.)

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The situation is not altogether clear to me, Mr. Spelling. You have represented the American Federation of Labor in legislative matters?

Mr. SPELLING. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. They take the position that the Clayton Act is the Magna Charta of labor, and yet you seem to agree with Mr. Davenport that it brings no advantages, but, on the contrary, a disadvantage to labor.

Mr. SPELLING. I don't know about such representations; they may have been made by the officers of the A. F. of L. You will have to inquire as to their present state of mind; it may have changed very materially.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then from your point of view labor has gained practically nothing by the Clayton Act, and labor is under a disadvantage greater than it labored under before?

Mr. SPELLING. I may exaggerate a little and put it too strong; but I think they have not only a lemon but dynamite in this act.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are in accord with Mr. Davenport?

Mr. SPELLING. In matters pertaining to this act we don't disagree in any particular, except in regard to a part of section 6. He seems to think it leaves the unions about as they were before. I think it prejudiced them, because of the essential implication which covers a part of the act, and not being exempt, and matters which are not satisfactory in the language of the act. I can not make it any plainer. I think these lawyers know what I mean, and possibly the members of the commission.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, Mr. Spelling; thank you.

We will now stand adjourned until Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

(Thereupon, at 4.30 p. m. Saturday, May 15, 1915, the commission adjourned until the following Monday, May 17, 1915, at 10 a. m.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., Monday, May 17, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Aishton, Lennon, Weinstock, and Harriman.

Chairman WALSH. We will please be in order.

Mr. Drew.

TESTIMONY OF MR. WALTER DREW.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state your name?

Mr. DREW. Walter Drew.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your place of residence, Mr. Drew.

Mr. DREW. New York City.

Chairman WALSH. What is your profession?

Mr. DREW. Attorney at law.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe, Mr. Drew, concisely but as exhaustively as the facts warrant, your connection with what might be called industrial affairs as an attorney.

Mr. DREW. You mean a complete history, down to date?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; a complete history of what your profession has been or your connection in general with such matters?

Mr. DREW. Well, my former residence was Grand Rapids, Mich., and there I was a member of the law firm of Crane, Norris & Drew. We had some cases come into the office involving labor matters, and later I disconnected myself from that firm and practiced law by myself. During that time I became the attorney for the Citizens' Alliance of Grand Rapids, Mich., and the Employers' Association of Grand Rapids, Mich., both of which were organized chiefly for the purpose of taking part in industrial matters.

In the spring of 1906 I was asked by the National Association of Manufacturers to go to Washington to make an argument before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives against the antiinjunction measures then being proposed by the American Federation of Labor—that is, the old Pearre bill that you have heard mentioned here. At that time, during that visit in Washington, I came in touch with the gentlemen who later composed the National Erectors' Association.

Chairman WALSH. Briefly, that is what—the National Erectors' Association?

Mr. DREW. An organization composed of people who fabricate and erect structural iron and steel. From that acquaintance I was asked to become counsel for the National Erectors' Association, when it was organized, and I have occupied that position as counsel and executive officer of that association from April, 1906, to the present time, and still occupy it. I was also called in, I think it was in 1907 or 1908, as counsel for the Employers' Association of the City of Washington. At that time there were some industrial troubles here, in the nature of a general strike, largely over the open-shop issue. I have been counsel for different associations at different times. At the present time I am counsel for a group of plate contractors organized under the name of the American Erectors' Association. In connection with the particular work of this commission, I am special counsel for the National Association of Manufacturers, National Founders' Association, the National Metal Trades Association, and the National Council for Industrial Defense.

Chairman WALSH. You became a member of the New York bar at what time?

Mr. DREW. I never have been a member of the New York bar; I never had a case in the New York courts.

Chairman WALSH. Is your time usually devoted now to those classes of cases—this class of work you have mentioned here?

Mr. DREW. I have had a few private matters, Mr. Walsh, which are remnants of my old law practice in Grand Rapids. Aside from that, all my time is taken up with the industrial questions.

Chairman WALSH. You were furnished with a general outline of the industrial matters undertaken by the commission last week, as to the application of the law to industrial matters?

Mr. DREW. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And I believe you have been kind enough to prepare something in advance?

Mr. DREW. You were kind enough to furnish me the questions early enough so that I have prepared a reply in advance.

Chairman WALSH. All right, you may read it, and we will then ask you any further questions.

Mr. DREW (reading). "Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the commission: The letter of Mr. Manly, the director, requesting me to appear before your body, asks me to 'be prepared to discuss along broad lines the question of the law and the courts in relation to the development of what is generally known as the labor movement.' The three first specific subjects assigned me are (1) Attitude of the courts in labor cases; (2) attitude of labor toward the law; (3) protection of constitutionally guaranteed rights.

"These three questions are closely related to one another, and all of them are different parts or aspects of the original and general question. A union, legally speaking, is a voluntary, unincorporated association. There have been a few instances in this country where organizations of workmen have incorporated under local State laws. Such cases are rare, and I believe none of the unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor or with the railroad brotherhoods have incorporated, although there are statutes permitting such incorporation in different States and also a Federal law which permits the incorporation of a trade-union national in scope.

"The first great legal fact in connection with the trade-union, because of its being a voluntary, unincorporated association, is that it is not legally responsible in a suit at law for injuries which it may unlawfully inflict upon others. A great national trade-union may develop the most compact form of organization and government. Its thousands of members and hundreds of locals scattered all over the country may be knit together by the most effective machinery for purposes of promoting the interests and purposes of its membership. It may collect vast sums and gather them into its treasury. This vast power of compact organization, aided by equally vast financial resources, may be used by its properly delegated officers in ways which are, under accepted principles of law, contrary to the rights of other members of society. It is the power of the organization, the money of the organization, the common purpose of the organization as distinct from the individual purposes of its members, and the directing intelligence of the organization which may inflict this unlawful injury upon some third person, and yet the injured person has no action at law against this same organization for the damages he may suffer. He is left, if he so choose, to seek out the hundreds or thousands of individual members of the organization and to begin action against them as individuals. The mere description of such a legal remedy indicates that for practical purposes it is no remedy at all.

"As an example, those contractors and owners whose work was destroyed by the hundred or more dynamite explosions, caused by the Structural Iron Workers' Union, can not recover a dollar in damages from that union. The evidence is full and clear that these explosions were planned by the executive officers of the union, that the moneys to carry them on were voted by the executive board of the union and drawn from the union treasury and expended under the direction of members of the same executive board. Yet that same treasury can not be reached by any known action at law to recover damages for the injury inflicted.

"In the famous Danbury hatters' case, so widely heralded as a new and unprecedented advance in trade-union liability, it seems not to be generally known that the original action was begun against hundreds of the individual members of the hatters' union. The judgment obtained is not against the union, but against individual members thereof, and unless the judgment is paid by the unions in order to protect these individual members, or is paid by Congress, in accordance with the request in that behalf made, it will devolve upon the plaintiff in the Danbury hatters' case to collect his judgment from these hundreds of individual defendants as best he may; and proceedings for that purpose have been recently instituted.

"While, therefore, the labor organization may develop an immense power for inflicting injury and ruin upon others, it occupies a unique position of possessing absolute legal immunity for the injury thus inflicted. Power without corresponding responsibility—this fact is, in my judgment, the one most important fundamental fact connected with the legal status of the union. What human institution can successfully endure possession of power without responsibility? What more dangerous millstone to be hung about the neck of a labor organization in its upward climb to its proper place in society and in industry? In recent history, what one thing has retarded the growth and development of trade-unionism along right and proper lines so much as the reckless and lawless conduct of those who have achieved its leadership, and why is not the possession of immense power without corresponding responsibility the direct cause of reckless leadership?

"Much has been said about the obsolete doctrines of the common law in their relation to the labor movement, and also about the failure of our courts to keep pace with the progressive development of modern social and industrial thought. Yet what principle of our industrial law can be considered as so unfitted to our present industrial system, so obsolete from every standpoint of social and industrial ethics at the present time, as this same ancient rule that a voluntary association, no matter what its power or its resources or its aims and purposes, or its actual invasion of the rights of the rest of society, shall be permitted to do what injury it pleases, lawfully or unlawfully, without any legal responsibility? In the old days the principles of the law of conspiracy were so strict and so rigidly enforced that any combination for trade purposes of either masters or workmen was held illegal and even criminal. No necessity, therefore, existed for the possession by third parties of any right of action against industrial associations. Now, with the old common law of conspiracy so modified as to permit the widest latitude in combination, and with the great increase in the power of industrial organizations, with consequent greater ability to inflict injury, distinctly new conditions have come about and a need has been created on the part of the rest of society for protection which did not before exist in such character or degree.

"The establishment of the trade-union upon a proper basis of legal responsibility is a simple matter. It could be accomplished either by incorporation of the union through its own initiative under the Federal or State acts permitting such incorporation, or it could be accomplished by the passage of laws permitting actions for damages for either tort or breach of contract to be brought against trade organizations in their own names, and making any judgment secured collectible out of the funds of the association. In a few States statutes permitting voluntary associations to sue and be sued in the association name have been enacted, but it is very questionable if under such statutes any action is possible except against an association domiciled in a particular State. Whether a national organization extending over many States could be held under such a local statute is exceedingly doubtful, and it is interesting to note that the headquarters of different national unions are located in States where no such statutes exist."

Chairman WALSH. Does that apply to all unions; are their headquarters generally in States where no such statutes exist?

Mr. DREW. I have not investigated that, but I know a great many of them are. [Reading:] "So far as present statute law is concerned, therefore, it remains the general fact that trade-unions are practically immune from civil responsibility in this country."

Right here I want to say that some question has been raised as to the application of the eighth section of the Sherman Antitrust Act. The eighth section of that act says that the term "person" as named in the act shall be held to include associations existing under or by the authority of any State or Federal law. And some of my good legal friends think that an action could be maintained against a labor union in its own name as an association under this Sherman Act; but no known cases of that kind have been brought or have been decided, so that it still remains true that the trade-unions are practically immune from civil responsibility. [Reading:]

"The other course open for placing the union upon the plane of legal responsibility—that of voluntary incorporation—does not seem from the attitude of the leaders of organized labor to be in any near prospect of accomplishment.

This fact of legal irresponsibility, which seems to be so little understood by the general public, is evidently keenly appreciated and understood by the union leaders, who have no intention of relinquishing its obvious advantages. The suggestion that the unions incorporate has been made at different times and indorsed by friends of organized labor. In this connection I refer to and offer in evidence the able article by Mr. Louis Brandeis entitled 'The incorporation of trades-unions,' in which he advocates union incorporation as a benefit to the unions. The article is published in Mr. Brandeis's book, Business a Profession.

"Of such suggestions, Mr. Gompers, in his report as president to the convention of the American Federation of Labor in November, 1904, says: 'We still frequently hear the proposition urged for the incorporation of trade-unions, the evident purpose of many advocates being honorable and sympathetic, notwithstanding how unwise and injurious the results would unquestionably be to labor. Others, again, who advocate and insist upon the incorporation of the trade-unions know full well the purpose they have in view and the schemes they could then hatch to harass organized labor still more with suits at law, regardless of the flimsiness of the cause or the pretext for civil suits. They would not only divert our attention from the effort at economic improvement to a defense against every species of civil suits brought by our opponents against any officer of organized labor, but they would make every effort 'under the forms of law' to mulct our unions in damages for supposed injurious results from trade-union action.'

"Mr. Gompers then points out that the chief argument for union incorporation is that it would bring about equality of responsibility between the union and the employers in cases of breach of contract, and he insists that such a claim has no foundation, because, as a matter of fact, employers, in spite of their many violations of trade agreements, have not been held in damages for such violations. In the hearing before this commission at New York Mr. Gompers reaffirmed his opposition to any incorporation of the unions, his reason there being that legal responsibility on the part of the union would be made use of by the employer to harass and to oppress with unfounded suits.

"Such reasons for preserving a condition of legal irresponsibility are, of course, no reasons at all. Equally well might it be said that no action for damages should exist against any of us because, forsooth, our enemies may subject us to unwarranted litigation. Neither is it true that the chief reason for trade-union responsibility is to secure equality with the employer in the making of contracts. That, of course, is one reason, and a most important one, and it would seem that no one more than the unions themselves should be interested in taking every step possible to put organized labor in the position of being able to make a business contract to which there should be two responsible contracting parties and the basis of which should be mutual interest, mutual respect, and mutual responsibility. Such condition would do more than any other one thing I can think of to extend collective bargaining and to place it upon a stable and firm foundation.

"But aside from all questions of contract, why, in all fairness, should not a labor organization be responsible in damages to others whose rights it unlawfully invades? It has been suggested during the hearing of this commission that civil responsibility on the part of unions would interfere with their democratic development, the inference being that the working out of the democratic principle in a trade-union is too important to be jeopardized by any such harsh principle as legal responsibility to the other members of society. The application of such a principle to an industrial organization, the basic essentials of which should be economic and not political, is scarcely deserving discussion; yet even from the standpoint and in the spirit such suggestion is advanced it falls before the first commonplace observation. Our cities are organized and administered on a democratic basis. In them society at large is working out the experiment of democracy, yet for that reason no immunity is granted the city from liability on its bonds or its contracts; and if a city unlawfully infringes your rights or mine, we can maintain an action at law and recover damages therefor. Why, then, should not a labor organization, which is organized for the primary purpose of promoting the interests of its members as opposed to the interests of other classes of society, be legally responsible for its conduct, and is not such absence of responsibility one of the most retarding influences in the growth and development of the union toward its true and proper place as a permanent industrial institution?

"In passing from the remedies, or lack of remedies, afforded by courts of law in connection with trade-union activity to the remedies afforded by courts of equity, it may be well to consider for a moment such of the aims and purposes of the present-day union as most frequently bring it into conflict with the rest of society. That the individual by himself or in combination with others should use every legitimate effort to increase the rewards for his service is recognized as just and proper. The advantages of combination of workers for this general purpose are obvious. Under the early statutes and common-law rules affecting combinations, whether of masters or men, there was little that the guild or labor union could lawfully do, except to assist its members to develop skill and craftsmanship. The use of the power of combination for any purpose of changing conditions of labor was in that early day unlawful and even criminal.

"But these old restrictions upon the right to act in combination have long passed. In this country the right of workmen to act in combination in matters affecting conditions of labor was recognized by our courts long before such rights were admitted in England. As early as 1842 Mr. Chief Justice Shaw, of Massachusetts, in a leading case of Commonwealth v. Hunt (4 Metcalf, 111), held that it was neither illegal nor criminal for a union of workmen to bind themselves under their by-laws not to work for any person who should employ nonmembers of the union after he had been given notice to discharge such nonmembers. In reference to the by-law, he says: 'It is simply an averment of an agreement amongst themselves not to work for any person who should employ any person not a member of a certain association. It sets forth no illegal or criminal purpose to be accomplished, nor any illegal or criminal means to be adopted for the accomplishment of any purpose. It was an agreement as to the manner in which they would exercise an acknowledged right to contract with others for their labor.'

"This same principle of law was announced in almost exactly the same terms in the case of Coppage v. Kansas, of which you have heard here.

"This was in 1842, and this interpretation of the rights of unions at common law has been a leading case in American jurisprudence since that time. In England, however, in 1858, in the case of Hilton v. Eckersley (88 E. C. L., 47) the agreement of a manufacturers' association that each member would abide by the will of the majority as to whether he should carry on or suspend the work in his establishment was held to be unlawful and the bond to enforce such agreement was held void. Justice Crompton said: 'I am of the opinion that the bond is void as against public policy. I think that combinations like that disclosed in the pleadings in this case were illegal and indictable at common law as tending directly to impede and interfere with the free course of trade and manufacture. Combinations of this nature, whether on the part of the workmen to increase or of the masters to lower wages were equally illegal.'

"In the later English case of Hornby v. Close (2 Q. B., 153), decided in 1867, a trade-union was held an illegal combination with no standing in court, even to sue one of its own members for unlawfully withholding its moneys."

Chairman WALSH. What is the date of that?

Mr. DREW. 1867. [Continues reading:] "Chief Justice Cockburn said: 'Here we find the very purposes of the existence of the society not merely those of a friendly society, but to carry out the objects of a trades-union. Under that term may be included every combination by which men bind themselves not to work except under certain conditions, and to support one another in the event of being thrown out of employment in carrying out the views of the majority. I am very far from saying that the members of a trades-union constituted for such purposes would bring themselves within the criminal law; but the rules of such a society would certainly operate in restraint of trade, and would, therefore, in that sense be unlawful.'

"The right to organize, in England, for offensive and defensive purposes and to strike was later conferred by acts of Parliament in the trade-union act of 1871, as amended by the later acts of 1875 and 1906. The right to act in combination in industrial matters is, therefore, seen to have been recognized by our courts without the compulsion of any statute long before such right was obtained in England by acts of Parliament, and it is also clear that the restrictive principles of the law of conspiracy as affecting industrial combinations applied as well to combinations of masters as to combinations of workmen. Now, no legal restriction or disability attends the acts of industrial combinations that does not affect the acts of any other kind of combinations.

"This increased freedom of action has resulted not only in greater extension of trade-unionism, but also in a radical change in its policies and methods. Now, the power of the combination, rather than the merit or skill of the individual, is relied upon to secure the advancement of the interest of the members. Everywhere emphasis is laid upon the development of the power of the union as an aggressive and militant institution. The individual is taught to rely upon the strong arm of his organization. The law of supply and demand as a determining factor in wages is recognized, but in much different fashion. The union policy now is not to increase the quality of the service and so increase the demand, but by use of the power of combination to limit the supply.

"Here, then, is the genesis of the closed-shop idea—the arbitrary control of the law of supply and demand, through a monopoly of the supply secured and maintained by the strong arm of combination. So important in the minds of the union leaders is the establishment of the artificial monopoly known as the closed shop, that it has become its one most vital and important principle. The chief, primary aim of all the great national unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor is the establishment of the closed shop, and the question of the closed shop is the one question that these unions will refuse to arbitrate or to have brought in issue. A closed shop, wherever it can be obtained, is the one fundamental prerequisite to collective bargaining with these unions. Many of the most costly and bitter strikes of recent years have been waged for the chief purpose of compelling the acceptance of the closed shop, and many great industries of this country to-day are either partially or wholly under closed-shop control. And the closed shop as a purpose leads naturally to force as a method, for it is an artificial, not a natural, monopoly of labor, and rests upon the ability of the union to check the free working of the law of supply and demand.

"The strike—that is, the organized refusal of men to work—is the universal and natural weapon of the union. In its simplest form it is not an appeal to force, but to the law of supply and demand. If the labor market does not contain a supply of suitable labor outside the ranks of the strikers, which the employer can secure on the desired terms, then he must do what he can toward coming to an agreement with the strikers. To the strike in its simple form, the modern union with its ideal of closed-shop monopoly, its militant spirit, and its tremendous increase in power and wealth, has added a greater and increasing use of the power of the combination in different forms of force and coercion.

"Force is brought to bear upon the outside supply of labor through the intimidation and violence of the picket line to keep it from filling the places of those on strike. Sympathetic strikes are called by other unions against the employer or against those with whom he has business relations. Through the boycott, pressure to the point of ruin is brought to bear against those who sell the employer his material, or who handle or buy his product, or who deal with him in any way, in order to compel them to cease all business relations with him until he accedes to the demand of the combination.

"And let it not be supposed that the attack of the union upon others always grows out of the effort to secure from the employers better terms and conditions for its members. The closed shop in operation develops naturally into the conspiracy between the closed-shop union on the one hand, and a combination of employers upon the other, whereby they work together to prevent outside competition in the particular locality or industry, to fix such wages and prices as they choose, and to assess the cost of their common monopoly upon the general public. Many such combinations exist in this country. Certain trades in some of our great cities are absolutely controlled by them. Their power rests upon the closed shop of the union which is in a position to prevent any outsider who attempts to break into the prohibited field from securing labor to fulfill his contracts or to produce or handle his product. To perfect and maintain such combinations, many bitter labor wars have been carried on and the rights of innocent third parties ignored and invaded. The conspiracy itself, when perfected, is, of course, a legal and moral wrong as against the rest of society."

I would like to quote from the pamphlet issued in the Johns Hopkins University Study on History and Political Science, by Dr. Frank B. Stockton, at page 61, where he speaks of these combinations as "exclusive agreements," which he calls "An agreement under which a union does not allow its members to work for any employer who is not a member of the employers' association with which the agreement is made." That is what I call the combination between the closed-shop unions and the employers' organization. At page 174, Dr. Stockton says:

"Neither employers nor unions have much to say concerning the advantages of exclusive agreements. This is explained by the fact that such agreements are generally condemned as being in restraint of trade, and therefore against public policy. Employers who are parties to them obtain a great advantage over competitors in localities where the unions are strong, since they secure virtually a monopoly of labor supplied. Consequently the employer outside of the association is nearly always desirous to enter. He complains of the losses that come from having to employ nonunion men, and is eager to hire union men exclusively. But while the closed shop, under such conditions may be an advantage to those employers with whom unions agree to deal exclusively, the public interests suffer, inasmuch as competition is effectively stifled."

Again, in the wars over questions of jurisdiction, the unions violate every legal and moral obligation to innocent outsiders. The closed-shop union controlling all the labor in its own trade, but desiring to increase its power and monopoly, arbitrarily extends its jurisdiction to cover work claimed by some other union. New tools and new methods may develop new classes of work, which may be claimed by several different unions in jurisdictional quarrels. Each of the contending unions is usually supported by allies among the other unions, with the result that the work of the owner or contractor is completely tied up by strike and counterstrike on the part of the warring unions, and over questions in which the employer has no control and in the settlement of which he has no voice.

The following extracts are quoted from the report of Mr. Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, to its convention in 1902:

"Beyond doubt the greatest problem, the danger, which above all others most threatens not only the success but the very existence of the American Federation of Labor is the question of jurisdiction. Unless our affiliated national and international unions radically and soon change their course, we shall at no distant day be in the midst of an internecine contest unparalleled in any era of the industrial world, aye, not even when workmen of different trades were arrayed against each other behind barricades in the streets over the question of trade against trade. They mutually regarded each other with hatred and treated each others as mortal enemies.

"There is scarcely an affiliated organization which is not engaged in a dispute with another organization (and in some cases with several organizations) upon the question of jurisdiction. It is not an uncommon occurrence for an organization, and several have done so quite recently, to so change their laws and claims to jurisdiction as to cover trades never contemplated by the organization's officers or members; never comprehended by their title; trades of which there is already in existence a national union. And this without a word of advice, counsel, or warning.

"I submit that it is untenable and intolerable for an organization to attempt to ride roughshod over and trample under foot the rights and jurisdiction of a trade, the jurisdiction of which is already covered by an existing organization. This contention for jurisdiction has grown into such proportions and is fought with such intensity as to arouse the most bitter feuds and trade wars. In many instances employers fairly inclined toward organized labor have been made innocently to suffer from causes entirely beyond their control."

Mr. Gompers said all that.

Mr. Commissioner Lennon said in his report, as treasurer, to the federation convention in 1903: "One question in particular has been forced strikingly upon my attention during the past year in connection with our trade-union movement. The subject is the one involving jurisdiction of different organizations and the claims made by different unions for jurisdiction over the same people. To me the danger to our movement lies in the divisions existing in the trade-unions themselves, and those divisions are very largely over the question of jurisdiction."

[Continues reading:] "Dr. Nathaniel Whitney, of Johns Hopkins University, has published a pamphlet entitled 'Jurisdiction in American Building Trades-Unions.' The following is quoted: 'In spite of the exhortations of President Gompers and the warnings of the executive council, disputes continued to arise with unabated frequency. In 1908, during the 11 days in which the convention of the federation was in session, there were 19 cases of jurisdictional disputes under consideration. To each of these disputes there were at least two parties. This makes the number of unions involved at least 38, and when one further thinks of the number of members in these 38 unions some idea will be afforded of the extent to which the labor world is disrupted and agitated by such disputes. In addition, it should be kept in mind that the jurisdiction disputes considered by the convention or by the executive council of the American Federation of Labor do not represent more than a fractional part of such difficulties, for only those disputes which have attained the dignity of national importance—that is, of being discussed by the national officials of the two contending unions—are considered by federation. Besides these there are almost countless controversies over jurisdiction. Each national union has from a dozen to several hundred local unions under its authority; each one of these thousands of subordinate unions is likely at some time to have its trade infringed upon by a branch of another national union, and these disputes may be and frequently are settled locally, and so do not become an issue between the national unions. Moreover, there are many jurisdictional disputes between branches of the same national union which are settled without recourse to the American Federation of Labor.

"Said the secretary of the bricklayers' union in 1910: 'Our disputes with the operative plasterers' union during the past year have taken thousands of dollars out of our international treasury for the purpose of protecting our interests. The loss in wages to our own members has amounted to at least $300,000. The losses to our employers have been up in the thousands also. In several instances the writ of injunction has been brought into play for the purpose of restraining unions involved in trade disputes, and unless the unions provide some means of eliminating jurisdictional warfare it is only a question of time when the legislatures of our country will be called upon to pass laws that will penalize labor unionists who indulge in such struggles.'

"Secretary Duffy, of the Brotherhood of Carpenters, said, in 1911: 'It is a shame when we have good friendly owners, builders, and architects, who are willing to place in their contracts a provision that union labor only must be employed, and when the building is only half completed have the workers go out and strike. The public does not understand it, and it seems nobody understands it but ourselves.'

"Speaking of an agreement over jurisdictional matters between the bricklayers and plasterers, the editor of the Bricklayers and Masons' Journal, November, 1908, said: 'The agreement removes from the trade-union movement a jurisdictional dispute that has involved the building industry for over 30 years, and which has not only been a source of great loss to the journeymen financially, but has caused most vexatious delays in building operations, and consequent financial loss to employers and to the building public, the latter being innocent parties to the trouble and perfectly helpless in providing a remedy for its correction.'

"Prof. Commons, in a study of the New York building industry, has this to say: 'Building construction was continually interrupted, not on account of lockouts, low wages, or even employment of nonunion men, but on account of fights between the unions. The friendly employer who hired only union men, along with the unfriendly employer, was used as a club to hit the opposing union.'

"In 1911, in the city of Chicago, the grim prophecy of President Gompers was actually fulfilled in the bitter jurisdictional wars fought by rival unions in that city, in which paid thugs and gunmen turned the streets of Chicago into a condition of anarchy, and in which, as a mere incident from the union standpoint, millions of dollars of construction work remained idle, with a resultant loss to owners, contractors, and the business interests of the city beyond possibility of measurement.

"It remains to say that in spite of the efforts of union leaders jurisdictional disputes have increased rather than diminished. Twenty-two disputes, involving great international unions with their thousands of locals, came before the executive committee of the American Federation of Labor in 1914, as against the 19 mentioned by Dr. Whitney in 1908. Perhaps it is not too much to say that the chief concern of the labor leader in this matter has been over the danger to the organization itself, rather than the injury and damage done to others. However this may be, it remains true that these wars among the unions, in the carrying on of which every obligation to outside parties is ignored and violated, have increased with the increase in the extension and power of the closed shop. It is the desire of the particular union to increase its spoils under the closed shop, which furnishes the reason for the dispute, and it is the power of the union under the closed shop which enables it to thus ignore the rights of the rest of society with so little fear of reprisal or punishment."

I quote again from Dr. Stockton's pamphlet.

Chairman WALSH. I won't ask you to do it now, but have you some of Dr. Stockton's conclusions drawn?

Mr. DREW. They are here, and I will submit the whole pamphlet in evidence, if you wish.

Chairman WALSH. I have not read them; I tried to quickly, and could not do it and listen to you at the same time, but at the end please epitomize them, but not now.

Mr. DREW (continues reading). "Dr. Stockton says: 'More than the closed shop is involved—employers in wasteful jurisdictional disputes in which they have no concern. Where there are no closed shops such disputes would be robbed of all their bitterness.'

"The closed shop, when established, also leads to arbitrary and reckless conduct on the part of labor leaders, and disregard for the rights of others.

"I quote from a pamphlet in the same Johns Hopkins University series, Dr. F. E. Wolfe, entitled 'Admission to American Trades Unions,' on page 173: 'When a trade-union by a thorough organization obtains complete control of the workmen within its jurisdiction, its position may become dangerously powerful. Such a union would be enabled, through the enforcement of the closed shop and prohibitive requirements for admission, to restrict the freedom of labor and capital in the industry. The wisdom of intrusting such great power to unregulated private associations is questioned because of the liability of its abuse by short-sighted leaders.'

"If the necessity for some protection on the part of the rest of society against the aggression of powerful industrial combinations pursuing these militant practices and policies has been made clear, and if the courts of law afford no adequate remedy, we come to the point of inquiry as to what courts and what rules of law furnish any such protection. Such courts we find to be the courts of equity, and the principles of law in which are found the limits and restrictions upon the conduct of men acting in combination are found to have their basis in the common law of conspiracy.

"It is the primary function of a court of equity to take cognizance of cases in which there is no adequate remedy in a court of law. The court of equity looks forward rather than backward. When unlawful injury is threatened, for which, if inflicted, the injured party would have no remedy at law which would compensate him properly, the court of equity will interfere by its writ of injunction to prevent the infliction of that injury. Another most vital distinction between law and equity practice is that the court of equity deals with the individual rather than his property. Its decrees are in the form of mandates directed to the individual persons and directing them to do or to refrain from doing certain specific things; while the judgment of a court of law on the other hand calls for the payment of money and is enforced by levy upon property. It is the natural and proper function, therefore, of the court of equity, in accordance with the purpose of its creation, to interpose its protecting arm between men who combine to unlawfully injure others and those who are threatened with such injury. No new function or authority needed to be claimed by the court for this purpose.

"It is also clear that a greater and increasing use on the part of courts of equity of this power of protection would indicate, not the development of any new functions, but rather the increase in the need for such protection. Still further is it clear that the entire power and authority of courts of equity rest upon their ability to secure obedience from the persons to whom their decrees are directed. If such obedience can not be secured or enforced, the decrees of a court of equity become so much waste paper, and its power and jurisdiction are meaningless terms.

"The law of conspiracy, by which the acts of combinations are limited, is exceedingly simple. A conspiracy is a combination having an unlawful purpose or using unlawful means. A combination whose purposes or conduct comes within either branch of this definition comes under the ban of the law. Outside of this simple formula there is practically no limit to what men in combination may do.

"So far as the methods or means employed are concerned, any conduct on the part of a combination which would be unlawful for an individual would likewise be unlawful for the combination, even though it were pursuing a lawful and even laudable purpose. In general, also, it may be said that what would be an unlawful purpose on the part of an individual would likewise be an unlawful purpose on the part of a combination. The law, however, goes further than this and makes unlawful on the part of combinations purposes which would not be unlawful on the part of an individual, and it may be noted that herein lies the basis of all the objections of organized labor to the law as it affects its activities.

"In the eye of the law a combination is a separate and distinct thing from the individual. It has purposes that are not those of any one individual but the common purposes of the combination. Its individual members in carrying out the common purpose do not act on their individual judgment and initiative, but in accordance with a common plan—the plan of the combination. The combination has much greater power than is represented even by the sum total of the powers of the individuals that compose it. For instance, the 11 members of a football team, each acting individually and all filled with the common purpose of advancing the ball, would not accomplish much, but when they act together as a trained football team, obeying certain signals and following certain formations, they gain irresistible power. And this simple rule applies equally well to industrial combinations or to any other group of men acting together for a common purpose.

"This immense increase of power which comes with combined action brings with it greater responsibilities and in law is the basis of the principle that men may not do in combination all the things they may do as individuals.

"Said the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission in its report: 'Combinations are more than mere aggregations of the rights and powers of the individuals composing them. They become new and powerful entities and factors for good or ill.'

"Said Mr. Chief Justice Harlan, in the case of Arthur v. Oakes: 'An intent on the part of a single person to injure the rights of others or of the public is not in itself a wrong of which the law will take cognizance, unless some injurious act be done in the execution of the unlawful intent. But a combination of two or more persons with such an intent and under circumstances that give them when so combined a power to do an injury they would not possess as individuals acting jointly has always been recognized as in itself wrongful and illegal.'

"It follows naturally from the fact that the action of men in combination is in accordance with the plan and purpose of the combination that their conduct as individuals becomes colored and impressed with the character of the common purpose. If the purpose of the combination be unlawful, the action of the individuals in carrying out that purpose becomes unlawful, even though ordinarily the things each one may do, if done for an individual purpose, would be innocent. Much fallacy of reasoning comes from the refusal to recognize this principle. It is a common defense on the part of a combination, when called to account, to point to the single, isolated acts of its individual members and to say, 'These things are lawful.' It is the familiar complaint of organized labor that the writ of injunction is used to deprive workmen of the right of free speech, free press, and other constitutionally guaranteed rights. They complain that men are prohibited from walking the streets, from accosting others, and from doing other ordinarily legal and innocent acts. All such claims in actions against combinations are, of course, based on the refusal to recognize the principle we have noted, namely, that what a man does in carrying out the plan and purpose of a combination is judged by the character of that plan and purpose. The effort, of course, is to free men acting in combination from the responsibility that comes with combined as distinct from individual action.

"Of such an argument Mr. Justice Holmes, in the case of Aiken v. Wisconsin (195 U. S., 194), said: 'No conduct has such an absolute privilege as to justify all possible schemes of which it may be a part. The most innocent and constitutionally protected of acts or omissions may be made a step in a criminal plot; and if it is a step in a plot, neither its innocence nor the Constitution is sufficient to prevent the punishment of the plot by law.'

"In the famous Danbury Hatters' case Mr. Justice Holmes said of this same argument urged in defense of a national boycott: 'It is suggested that the several acts charged are lawful and that intent can make no difference, but they are bound together as parts of a single plan. The plan may make the parts unlawful.'

"Such an argument was likewise urged in the Northern Securities case—the case of a combination of capital rather than of labor. The Northern Securities Co. was lawfully organized under the laws of New Jersey. It began the purchase of stock in the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railway Cos., buying the stock in the open market and in accordance with all the forms of law. In proceedings begun under the Sherman Act this company, the Northern Securities Co., was dissolved by injunction. The injunction prohibited the company from acquiring any more stock in the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Cos. and from voting the stock it already owned in those companies. It prohibited the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific Cos. from paying any dividends on their stock held by the Northern Securities Co.; but, as stated by counsel, each one of these things prohibited by the injunction was in itself absolutely innocent and lawful, and for that reason counsel urged that the combination was lawful and that such acts could not be enjoined.

"Said Mr. Justice Harlan: 'If there was a combination or conspiracy in violation of the act of Congress between the stockholders of the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific Co., whereby the Northern Securities Co. was formed as a holding corporation, and whereby interstate commerce over the lines of the constituent companies was restrained, it must follow that the court, in execution of that act, and to defeat the efforts to evade it, could prohibit the parties to the combination from doing the specific things which, being done, would affect the result denounced by the act. To say that the court could not go so far is to say that it is powerless to enforce the act or to suppress the illegal combination.'

"Said Mr. Justice Brewer: 'The prohibition of such a combination is not at all inconsistent with the right of an individual to purchase stock. The transfer of the stock to the Securities Co. was a mere incident, the manner in which the combination to destroy competition and thus unlawfully restrain trade was carried out.'

"It is thus clear that the acts of an individual in carrying out the unlawful purposes of a combination can not be judged as standing alone, but must be considered in relation to the common plan and must become colored with the purpose of the combination. It is likewise clear that this principle of law has not been called into being for the special purpose of restricting or oppressing combinations of labor in their activities, but that it applies equally to all combinations, whether of workmen or capitalists. The mere statement of the rule in the strong and clear terms above quoted should be sufficient to answer any questions as to its propriety, its fairness, and its absolute necessity.

"In further consideration of the standard applied by law to the purposes of combinations we come to the distinction drawn by the courts between the combination and the individual so far as the lawfulness of purpose is concerned. As a general rule, the purpose of an individual does not affect the legal quality of his act. He may inflict malicious injury upon others without incurring any legal liability so long as he carefully stays upon his own side of the legal fence. The greater power of the combination for injury and evil over that possessed by the individual is the basis for a distinction between them, and it is a fundamental principle that malice on the part of a combination constitutes an unlawful purpose, and that a combination inflicting malicious injury upon others is unlawful and a conspiracy. The conduct of a combination which results in damage to others must have some proper motive, some legal excuse or justification, else it is deemed malicious and unlawful.

"Said Mr. Justice Holmes, as a member of the Massachusetts Supreme Court, in the case of Vegeahn v. Gunther: 'I agree, whatever may be the law in the case of a single defendant, that when a plaintiff proves that several persons have combined and conspired to injure his business, and have done acts producing that effect, he shows temporal damage and a cause of action, unless the facts disclose or the defendants prove some ground of excuse or justification. And I take it to be settled, and rightfully settled, that doing that damage by combined persuasion is actionable, as well as doing it by falsehood or by force.'

"In other words, Mr. Justice Holmes holds that a combination using even the innocent methods of persuasion may be unlawful, if its conduct is without some legal excuse or justification."

And I might say at this point that Mr. Gregory, in his testimony the other day, rather ignored this particular principle in speaking of the boycott. Of course, "boycott" is just a name or a descriptive term. If the boycott is a combination to injure in a particular case, then it comes within this principle of the law that has been so clearly set forth—if it is a combination to injure. If the boycott in some other case is not a combination to injure, the mere fact of its being a boycott would not make it illegal. [Continues reading:] "On the same point Mr. Judge Taft, in the famous"—

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you something in mind where a boycott would not injure anyone?

Mr. DREW. I do not think, Mr. O'Connell, that simply withdrawing patronage, although it is clearly a boycott, is unlawfully a boycott. I think I have a right not to trade with anyone. I think all the people in this room could have some cause of grievances against a storekeeper and agree not to trade with him; and I do not think there would be the slightest legal wrong.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would it not have a tendency to injure the storekeeper?

Mr. DREW. Of course. Lots of things all of us do every day in pursuance of our personal aims injure others, though they do not give rise to causes of action. [Reading:]

"On the same point Mr. Judge Taft, in the famous Toledo and Ann Arbor case, said: 'Ordinarily when such a combination of persons does not use violence, actual or threatened, to accomplish their purpose, it is difficult to point out with clearness the illegal means or end which makes the combination an unlawful conspiracy, for it is generally lawful for the combiners to withdraw their intercourse and its benefits from any person'"—

That covers the point you just raised, Mr. O'Connell. [Continues reading:] "for it is generally lawful for the combiners to withdraw their intercourse and its benefits from any person, and to announce their intention of doing so; and it is generally lawful for the others, of their own motion, to do that which the combiners seek to compel them to do. Such combinations are said to be unlawful conspiracies, though the acts in themselves and considered singly are innocent when the acts are done with malice, i. e., with the intention to injure another without lawful excuse."

"What constitutes lawful excuse or justification for the infliction of injury by a combination of men? The courts, under different phraseology, have one general answer, and that is legitimate self-interest. So long as the acts of a combination are prompted by a desire to secure benefits for its members and not merely to injure others, they are held lawful, even though incidentally such acts may cause great injury to others. When, however, the infliction of injury is a direct and primary purpose, such purpose is held in the law to be malicious and the conduct of the combination to be unlawful. To afford justification there must be a reasonable connection between the means adopted and the benefits to result. A remote or intangible benefit sought for the combination will not justify the infliction of great and immediate injury upon others.

"The boycott is the chief weapon of modern unionism and also characteristic generally of its spirit and methods. The discussion of the boycott as a mere withdrawal of patronage is idle and academic. When that is the extent of the boycott in any particular case, the patronage is simply withdrawn and nothing more is heard about it. From such simple procedure the modern boycott has been developed into a very different thing. Said Judge Taft, in an early case (1893): 'The boycott is a combination of many to cause a loss to one person by coercing others against their will to withdraw from him their beneficial business intercourse from threats that unless those others do so the many will cause serious loss to them.'

"Said the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission in its report: 'What is popularly known as the boycott (a word of evil omen and unhappy origin) is a form of coercion by which a combination of many persons seeks to work their will upon a single person or upon a few persons by compelling others to abstain from social or beneficial business intercourse with such person or persons. Carried to the extent sometimes practiced in aid of a strike, and as was in some instances practiced in connection with the late anthracite strike, it is a cruel weapon of aggression, and its use immoral and antisocial.'

"It is clear, then, that the boycott is a war measure; that its plain and avowed purpose is to injure and destroy.

"From the standpoint of purpose what is its excuse or justification? A number of defenses in this connection have been urged. I am speaking of legal defenses and not economic. It has been said that the business competition between the union and the employer was sufficient to justify the boycott as a competitive measure. It has also been urged that a larger competition between labor and capital in general existed, each striving for a greater share of the product of industry; that between them there is a natural conflict of interest; and that the union, in promoting the interests of its members in this larger class competition, is justified in using such weapons as the boycott. It is said that by the use of the boycott the union gains greater power and instills fear and respect for itself in the community, so that it is put in a position where it can better assert and maintain its demands for its own members as against the interests of the rest of society. Since, therefore, the ultimate purpose is to benefit the union, the injury inflicted by the boycott is claimed to be justified.

"Said Judge Taft of this claim, in the case of Moore v. the Bricklayers' Union of this point: 'The right of the plaintiffs to sell their material was not one which, in its exercise, brought them into legitimate conflict with the rights of the defendants to dispose of their labor as they chose. The conflict was brought about by the effort of defendants to use plaintiffs' right of trade to injure Parker Bros., and upon failure of this, to use plaintiffs' customers' rights of trade to injure plaintiffs. Such effort can not be in the bona fide exercise of trade, is without just cause, and is therefore malicious. The immediate motive of defendants here was to show to the building world what punishment and disaster necessarily followed a defiance of their demands. The remote motive of wishing to better their condition by the power so acquired will not, as we think we have shown, make any legal justification for defendants' acts. We are of the opinion that even if acts of this character and with the intent shown in this case are not actionable when done by individuals, they become so when they are the result of combination, because it is clear that the terrorizing of a community by threats of exclusive dealing in order to deprive one obnoxious member of means of sustenance will become both dangerous and oppressive.'

"Said the Anthracite Coal Strike Commission, in its report: 'It was attempted to defend the boycott by calling the contest between employers and employees a war between capital and labor and pursuing the analogies of the word, to justify thereby the cruelty and illegality of conduct on the part of those conducting a strike. The analogy is not apt, and the argument founded upon it is fallacious. There is only one war-making power recognized by our institutions, and that is the Government of the United States and of the States in subordination thereto when repelling invasion or suppressing domestic violence. War between citizens is not to be tolerated, and can not, in the proper sense, exist. If attempted, it is unlawful, and is to be put down by the sovereign power of the State and Nation. The practices which we are condemning would be outside the pale of civilized war. In civilized warfare women and children and the defenseless are safe from attack, and a code of honor controls the parties to such warfare which cries out against the boycott we have in view. "Cruel" and "cowardly" are terms not too severe by which to characterize it.'

"In accordance with the broad principles noted, courts of equity have interposed the protection of the writ of injunction against the boycott and its twin, the sympathetic strike, and also against the organized intimidation and violence of the picket line and other familiar forms of coercion common to union warfare when used in particular cases for unjustified attack upon others. With the growth in the power of the militant union and with the increasing use of these war measures has naturally come a greater need for the exercise of this power of protection. There has come also a determined and systematic effort on the part of closed-shop unionism to break down this protective power of the courts of equity.

"This effort has taken two general forms: An attack upon the courts of equity and a political campaign to secure by statute immunity of labor combinations from the operation of the principles of the law of conspiracy. The attack upon the courts has been bitter and personal, alleging discrimination, partisanship, venality, and usurpation of legislative authority. The obvious design of the attack is to arouse general contempt and distrust for the dignity and authority of courts of equity, and it has been accompanied not only by every form of vituperation and abuse, but by open defiance.

"Said Mr. Spelling, then general counsel of the American Federation of Labor, speaking before the House Judiciary Committee of Congress, upon an anti-injunction measure urged by the federation: 'Now, I might recount to you at great length the abuses of Federal courts in the matter of sending forth what may be properly called special legislation—that is, they usurp the legislative power and make an ex post facto law and crush and destroy one side in a labor dispute. They turn over the judicial power that the Constitution and Congress has given for other purposes. They turn that over to one side in a trade dispute where vital and far-reaching interests are involved, and that side employs it as an unfair, a crushing, and overwhelming advantage against what, despite its numbers, is the weaker adversary.'

"Said Mr. John Mitchell, at an annual meeting of the National Civil Federation: 'It has been the proud boast of the people of our country, at least that no citizen might be deprived of his liberty except upon the verdict of a jury of his peers. As the result of the indiscriminate issuance of injunctions, this feeling of security has lately been dissipated, and the American workmen now feel that their security has been jeopardized. * * * I wish to say for myself, and I yield to no one living in loyalty to this country, that if a judge were to enjoin me from doing something that I had a legal, a constitutional, and a moral right to do, that I would violate the injunction. I shall, as one American, preserve my liberty and the liberties of my people, even against the usurpation of the Federal judiciary, and in doing this I shall feel that I am best serving the interests of my country.'

"Said Mr. Mitchell in his book called 'Organized Labor,' published in 1903: 'Moreover, when an injunction, whether temporary or permanent, forbids the doing of a thing which is lawful, I believe that it is the duty of all patriotic and law-abiding citizens to resist, or at least to disregard the injunction. It is better that half the workingmen of the country remain constantly in jail than that trial by jury and other inalienable and essential rights of the citizens of the United States be abridged, impaired, or nullified by injunctions of the courts.'

"Mr. Mitchell says practically the same thing in his book on organized labor.

"Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, in connection with the injunction sought in the Buck's Stove & Range case, in a Labor Day speech at the Jamestown Exposition, said: 'An injunction is now being sought from the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia against myself and my colleagues of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor. It seeks to enjoin us from doing perfectly lawful acts; to deprive us of our lawful and constitutional rights. So far as I am concerned, let me say that never have I, nor never will I, violate a law. I desire to be clearly understood, that when any court undertakes, without warrant of law, by the injunction process, to deprive me of my personal rights and my personal liberty guaranteed by the Constitution, I shall have no hesitancy in asserting and exercising those rights.'

"This personal defiance, issued even before there had been any action of the court, was repeated by Mr. Gompers in a public interview, in which he said: 'When it comes to a choice between the surrender of my rights as a free American citizen and violating the injunctions of the courts, I do not hesitate to say that I shall exercise my right as between the two.'

"After the injunction was issued, Mr. Gompers, writing officially as president of the Federationist, the official organ of the American Federation of Labor, said as to the rights of laboring men: 'They have a lawful right to do as they wish, all the Van Cleaves, all the injunctions, all the fool or vicious opponents to the contrary notwithstanding. * * * Until a law is passed making it compulsory upon labor men to buy Van Cleave's stoves we need not buy them, we won't buy them, and we will persuade other fair-minded, sympathetic friends to cooperate with us, and leave the blamed things alone. Go to — with your injunctions!'"

This sounds a great deal like the statement of Mr. Anton Johannsen, organizer for the unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, made upon the stand here a few days ago. In fact, you can not distinguish between the two. Mr. Johannsen frankly stated that if he was enjoined from doing what he thought he had a legal right to do, he would violate the injunction.

As far as Mr. Johannsen is concerned, I consider the chief significance of what he had to say lies in the fact that he spoke as representative of organized labor, occupying an official position with the unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and sent out by their authority as their official spokesman, speaking to different bodies of workmen in this country, as an organizer affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, and part of his official duties is to organize other unions into the unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. In other words, Mr. Johannsen spoke as the official spokesman of the American Federation of Labor.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Before this commission?

Mr. DREW. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Sent here to do so?

Mr. DREW. I suppose he was subpoenaed, but at the present time he is an organizer for unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor. Do you want to repudiate that?

Chairman WALSH. You must not ask questions of the commissioners.

Mr. DREW. Then I will withdraw that question.

Chairman WALSH. I will say here that Mr. Johannsen was subpoenaed as a witness, covering the general phase that you are subpoenaed on. You are a member of the American Bar Association, and we do not ask you to speak for them. We don't want any false impression created here.

Mr. DREW (continues reading). "The character and tendency of these utterances of these leaders of organized labor require no comment in a community which rests upon a democratic government and in which the rights and liberties of each of us are vouchsafed to us only by the correlative observance of the rights and liberties of others. Such a community, of course, can not continue to exist as a democracy when one group of its members can successfully defy the rules and obligations common to all. It may be observed, however, that when such a group has reached a position of such power that its spokesmen and leaders feel able to defy and refuse obedience to the courts charged with the common defense of our rights and liberties, there is indicated not a diminished but an increased need on the part of the rest of us for protection. It is to be also observed that these men are the responsible leaders and teachers of millions of organized workmen, that their defiance and abuse of our courts has been systematically continued for years, and that if the 'attitude of labor toward the law' is at the moment charged with hostility, distrust, and contempt, there is no need to seek further afield for the reason therefor.

"The entrance of the American Federation of Labor into politics had for its chief cause this desire to break down and remove the protection of the rest of society against the acts of industrial combinations. The unions, of course, have asked for sanitary laws, child-labor laws, and other measures in the category of social and remedial legislation, but no measure of this kind was important enough to bring about a concerted labor movement in politics. The desire, however, to free labor combinations from any restrictions upon the unlimited use of their power was considered vital and important enough to warrant the systematic development of the political power of organized labor in city, State, and Nation.

"The changes asked have taken many different forms, but all of them upon analysis disclose the one fundamental purpose of freeing labor combinations from the operation of legal rules and principles by which the conduct of other men in combination is measured. The chief effort has been to destroy or cripple the use of the writ of injunction in labor cases. The demand for jury trial in cases of contempt of court has this underlying purpose, for if a court of equity may not punish for disobedience of its decrees except after jury trial, its whole power and authority is made dependent upon the action of a jury, and 1 jurymen out of 12 would be in a position to nullify the decree of the court. The demand that in labor cases any conduct on the part of combination shall not be unlawful unless the same conduct on the part of an individual would be unlawful, is readily seen in the light of our previous discussion to destroy the foundation principle of the law of conspiracy.

"The Sherman Act, of which so much has been heard, added the attempt to restrain interstate commerce to the things it was unlawful for a combination of men to do, and it is this provision which brought the union into conflict with this law. The Sherman Act gave no injunctive remedy to the employer against the union; it gave him no action at law against the union itself. Under it, however, such damages as he could recover against the individual members of the union for injury suffered through its violation were trebled. The effort to take labor combinations from under the operation of the Sherman Act is a natural part of the plan to secure their immunity from all the legal rules which apply to other men.

"The many legislative proposals designed to secure privilege and immunity for labor combinations need not be further gone into. The recent Clayton law seems of doubtful meaning, although it was supposed and intended to realize to some extent the demands of organized labor. Should it prove disappointing, we are already advised that a more determined campaign than ever will be carried on to secure laws which will accomplish the ends sought.

"One legislative victory, however, has been gained of clear and unequivocal import, namely, the provision in the sundry civil appropriation bill that none of the moneys appropriated shall be used in the prosecution of labor and farmer unions. This victory was the greater inasmuch as such a provision in previous measures called forth the exercise of the power of veto by President Taft and a statement by President Wilson condemning the provision in principle. Such provision is significant in that it defines unmistakably the political purpose of organized labor to be the securing of special legal immunity and a license to do things which other men can not lawfully do. It is significant also as an acceptance by our national administration of the principle of arbitrary class legislation.

"And it is important to remember in any discussion of this demand for special legal immunity that those who make it speak in behalf not only of such unions as may be orderly in conduct and wise in leadership—and which, by the way, have no need for license to do what other men may not do—but they speak also in behalf of such organizations as the Structural Iron Workers' Union, which retains its national officers in power even after their conviction of the greatest criminal conspiracy of the age, and in whose different locals at the present time may be found thugs and ex-convicts as duly elected officers. They speak in behalf of those unions which waged civil war in the streets of Chicago without regard to the rights of others, and in behalf of that final conspiracy between the closed-shop union and the employers' organization against the rights and interest of the general public. The Structural Iron Workers' Union, the unions chiefly engaged in jurisdictional warfare, and the unions generally to be found as parties to these combinations with employers, are members of the American Federation of Labor, and the representatives of that organization in demanding this legislation speak not only in behalf of these unions but in behalf of an extension of their power to do the things they are doing.

"What guaranties are offered that such legal immunity and special privilege will be well and wisely used? The recent history of the activities of the militant closed-shop union under the present status of the law affords no comfort on this score. Mr. Gompers has testified before this commission that the American Federation of Labor has no power of control over its affiliated unions. We have noted the inability of the federation to adjust or control jurisdictional wars. Mr. Gompers's own great personal influence has been brought to bear in many such cases without results. Even the power of expulsion from the federation is not used in cases where unions exceed all rules of legal conduct, for after the conviction of the executive board of the ironworkers' union, Mr. Gompers announced that that union would be retained as a member of the federation and would be sustained and strengthened. Forgetting some of the unwise utterances of the national labor leaders who seek this legislation and granting them possessed of wisdom and prudence and respect for law, still under the loose character of the organization of the federation, and with its lack of control over affiliated unions an accepted fact, what is the conclusion? Simply that reckless and lawless organizations, under reckless and lawless leaders, will, through the legislation demanded, be given greatly increased ability to use the immense power of their combinations for purposes of oppression, selfish ambition, civil war, and plunder of the public. Should not increased rather than diminished legal responsibility be sought by the labor leader who is really wise and far-seeing?

"The first of the special topics assigned to me under the general heading is 'The attitude of the courts in labor cases.' It has been placed at this point in discussion because all that has been said on the other topics seems logically to be preliminary to its proper consideration. The principle and remedies which apply to labor combinations and their conduct and the functions of the courts in their administration are found to be precisely the same with respect to combinations of labor as to combinations of other classes of men. In the administration of the law, it is the fundamental duty of the court to look with impartial eye upon the litigants before it. It has, properly speaking, no attitude, for the very term 'attitude' implies discrimination. It is a tribute to the success of the organized attack upon our courts which we have noted that such a phrase as 'attitude of the courts in labor cases' could have been formed, or such a topic be considered of enough seriousness to warrant its being embodied in the official program of this commission.

"The charge that our courts have unfairly and in a partisan manner administered the laws of the country in labor cases rests only upon the constant statement and restatement of those whose effort is to avoid the equal enforcement of law. Such statements have been challenged time and time again in the halls of Congress and elsewhere, and never has anything in the nature of substantial evidence been offered to sustain them. To enter upon a defense of our courts against such reckless, vague, and unsubstantiated charges is belittling to the courts themselves. That the thousands of our judges, Federal and State, scattered over this country from one end to the other, unknown to one another personally, should by some hidden and occult process arrive at a mutual understanding and purpose to discriminate against organized labor in the administration of law is a self-evident absurdity, and yet the great bulk of our decisions, both National and State, show a general uniformity in the interpretation and application of the principles of the law of conspiracy as applied to all combinations, whether of labor or of capital. The fearless enforcement of law and the denial of special and unequal consideration to labor combinations as compared with other combinations constitutes the 'attitude of the courts,' which is the real basis of complaint.

"A brief study of that much-used union term 'unfair' will be illuminating in this connection. Any person or company or political party or legislative body which refuses to grant any demand of organized labor is called 'unfair,' no matter what the nature or character of the demand. My first experience with this phase of unionism was as counsel for an undertaker who refused the demand of the teamsters' union to cease from patronizing a certain team owner, who, by the way, happened to be a widow. In order to compel the undertaker to cease from securing carriages from the widow for his funerals he was subjected to a bitter boycott and his funerals were stoned and in some instances stopped by union pickets. The local president of the teamsters' union assured me that the undertaker had been put upon the 'unfair list,' and that the war against him would continue until he ceased to deal with the objectionable widow. So, also, the storekeepers who furnished provisions to families who were under the ban of the union in the coal fields during the anthracite strike were placed upon the unfair list of the union and themselves subjected to a boycott described by the coal strike commission as 'antisocial, cruel, and cowardly.' In the city of San Francisco, the bricklayers' union has a rule providing that contractors shall pay into the union treasury one-half of 1 per cent of the contract price of work where brick is used. The contractor who refuses payment becomes unfair and subjected to all the coercion of strikes and boycotts until the payment is made. I have in mind the case of a man who was expelled from one of the great national unions because his wife unknowingly took in as boarders some open-shop workmen. His miserable and abject letter to the national executive board of the union asking for reinstatement on the ground that he could not get employment and was in desperate circumstances was rejected. The man was 'unfair' to organized labor.

"The legislator who refuses to pledge himself in advance of election to the legislative program of organized labor is unfair; the alderman or supervisor who refuses to assist in the giving of all public work to establishments favored by the union is unfair. The word 'unfair' in union parlance has gained a new meaning. The closed-shop union knows no neutrals. It classes as unfair and as enemies all who refuse unquestioning obedience to its demands without regard to how vicious, unreasonable, unsocial, or uneconomic those demands may be. If a business man having no dealings or dispute with organized labor becomes unfair because he will not at its demand engage in a boycott of some one who has come under its ban, and if a public officer or legislator becomes unfair when he will not violate his oath of office by administering that office in the special interest of organized labor, it can readily be seen what is the real meaning of the charge of unfairness as applied to our courts. It is obvious that a fearless court in labor cases would almost inevitably be called unfair, for the even holding of the scales of justice is 'unfair' in the opinion of litigants who cherish such views and conceptions.

"In the discussion thus far civil courts and civil remedies have been the only ones considered, but much that has been said as to the attitude of organized labor toward the rest of society and toward the law finds equal application in the administration of the criminal laws in cases growing out of labor matters. Here, also, in cases of convictions for crimes committed in the interests of organized labor we find the same charges of unfairness against the prosecuting officers and the courts. The fact that the trials of such cases are always jury trials and that one of the insistent objections by organized labor to courts of equity has been the lack of jury trial seems to make no difference. A result unsatisfactory to organized labor in any court appears to be all that is necessary to bring forth the claim of discrimination, unfairness, and persecution.

"It is natural that the minor courts and local police and prosecuting officials should be more or less sensitive to this attitude of organized labor, especially in view of its political activities. Such local officials and courts, generally with short tenure of office and desiring reelection, would, even with the best of intentions, be careful not to incur the displeasure of a strongly organized political group of the community. When such local officials, however, are not governed by the best of intentions, as sometimes happens, cases may be found of an actual breakdown in the administration of the criminal law, so far as cases involving labor matters are concerned. A union business agent, writing in to the national headquarters of his union during a period of strenuous picketing on the part of the union, says: 'Some of our members had been arrested once or twice for a little skirmish, which we succeeded in getting them out of. * * * The police court judge said, "For God's sake, don't come around again with the bunch, or I will have to do something," but at the same time he is in our favor.'

"A member of the national executive board of one of the national unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor writes to a brother member as follows: 'I met this Miller on the street last night and had some words with him, which brought it to blows, and I hit him, knocked him down, and his head hit a post. I was arrested and charged with assault and battery.'

"In a later letter he says: 'I have hired a couple of witnesses to testify that Miller struck me first. Trusting I will be able to get out of it without a jail sentence, and with kind personal regards,' and so forth. He again writes: 'I arrived here this morning and went to court. A friend of mine had already seen the judge in the case, and the judge told my friend to have me plead guilty to simple assault and he would defer the sentence until Monday, as this Miller and Wilson leave here Saturday, and they won't know what the judge sentences me. It is all fixed so I will not receive a jail sentence.' And finally he writes: 'I was sentenced yesterday for the sum of $25 or 30 days. This was the best my friend could do in the case. I had very near the whole city hall behind me, as this Wilson was certainly trying to get me the limit. Miller had a silver plate put in his head. I don't think he will scab for a while.'

"Cases, too, may be cited where the regular strong-arm men of certain unions, in spite of criminal records and after a long series of assaults, have been let off on conviction by local magistrates with either a suspended sentence or a small fine. After the arrest of the McNamaras at Indianapolis there fell into the hands of the local State prosecuting attorney a mass of documentary and other evidence involving the other national officers of the union, as well as being of great importance in the trial of the McNamara cases at Los Angeles."

I would like to state to the commission at this point that that evidence was found in a vault of the ironworkers' union in the basement of the American Life Building, which vault was opened under search warrant primarily issued for the purpose of searching for dynamite. It was not seized from the officers, but taken under due process of law upon search warrant. That is in answer to a statement Mr. Johannsen made. [Continues reading:]

"This State prosecutor, however, not only neglected and refused to take any action toward the prosecution in the State courts of the parties involved, but successfully opposed the request of the Los Angeles court that important evidence be turned over to that court for use in the McNamara trials. He even went so far as to announce publicly that the letters and records of the iron workers' union would be returned, and only the intervention of the Federal court prevented this disposition of this mass of criminal evidence which later formed the basis of the Federal prosecution and trials. This prosecutor's 'fairness' to organized labor resulted in his return to office at the next election. In cities where the closed-shop union is powerful, the frequent breakdown of criminal law in labor cases is notorious and of common knowledge. It is part of the accepted industrial conditions of the locality, for the inability to punish lawlessness committed in labor disturbances becomes a fact of serious importance in the consideration of labor questions, and so is properly termed 'an industrial condition.'

"If the basic elements and influences in the general question of the relation of organized labor to our laws, civil and criminal, have been made at all clear, little more need be said in the discussion of the next subject assigned to me; that is, 'Protection of life and property during industrial disputes.' That life and property will be endangered either by organized effort or by the individual acts of men in the heat and frenzy of industrial conflict goes without saying. That it is the primary duty of Government to preserve the peace under such conditions, without respect to any other or further consideration, also goes without saying. That local officials charged with that duty under the influences we have noted will often evade or willfully refuse its performance is also clear.

"Said a business agent, writing to the officers of his national union: 'There are 9 scabs working and 21 deputies watching them all the time, sworn in by the marshal. * * * Sheriff Carey * * * refused to give them any support, and told them he was a card man himself (which he is). I was up to see him to-day and he told me to tell the fellows if they got into any trouble to have their buttons on and he'd pinch the other fellow.'

"Aside from the influence of political pressure and fear, there are a surprising number of policemen, sheriffs, and even chiefs of police in this country who are members of unions and who have a direct personal sympathy in such cases. It is fair to state, however, that there are chiefs of police holding union cards who have been fair and fearless in the enforcement of law and order in troubles growing out of labor disputes.

"When the employer in time of labor trouble is unable to secure adequate protection from the regular authorities, it becomes not only a necessity but a duty for him to take such measures as may be at hand for such protection. Such necessary course is to be deeply regretted, but the responsibility for it rests solely upon those who fail in the performance of their duties as public officers. The employer in such cases must rely upon such hired mercenaries as he can find in the market for such men, and with the greatest of care there may become included among these hired agents vicious and even criminal types of men. The successful opposition of organized labor to such State bodies as the Pennsylvania State Constabulary and to the State Militia generally, and to the use of the police authorities of our cities for protection in time of labor trouble, will, of course, directly tend to increase the evils which have grown out of the hiring of the armed guard by the employer.

"The attitude of the plumbers used is shown by this quotation from Mr. Wolfe's pamphlet, at page 147: 'Since 1903 the plumbers have forbidden any members to enlist in any military organization under penalty of expulsion.'

"The whole interest of the employer lies in the maintenance of peace and not in the provoking of violence. So far as he can, he will put men in charge of his property upon whose character and discretion he can rely."

That is a matter of common sense. Perhaps you will remember that Mr. Johannsen said that a man who would hire a gunman, or criminal type of man, for the purpose of inciting violence or doing any other criminal act, was a "chump," as he expressed it; in other words, he was foolish to put himself in the power of such an individual. [Continues reading:]

"From every point of view, the logic of the situation as well as the history of actual fact must acquit the employer for the chief responsibility for such unfortunate results as come in some cases from the use of private guards.

"The last of the special topics assigned me is 'State and Federal action in labor disputes.' I shall not attempt to go extensively into the wide field opened up by this question, but will confine myself to one or two matters which have come within the range of my personal experience and observation. The action or nonaction of the State authorities at Indianapolis in the dynamite cases, so-called, has already been mentioned. It must be said of the Department of Justice at Washington that at different times and under different administrations it has also shown exceeding reluctance to institute action against labor combinations charged with the violation of Federal law. In the writer's personal experience several requests for the institution of such action, based upon evidence which later proved sufficient to secure decrees in actions instituted by private litigants, have been refused. Likewise a formal request to the Department of Justice, made long before the arrest of the McNamara brothers, and asking that the investigating machinery of the Government be employed to secure evidence for the prosecution of the criminal conspiracy against the companies whose work was being constantly dynamited, was refused, although even at that time there was ample evidence that the activities of the officers of the ironworkers' union were such as to make that organization an unlawful combination under the Sherman Act. In all fairness, however, it must be added that the Department of Justice under Mr. Wickersham, although at first reluctant to take action in the dynamite cases on the ground that State action in those cases had already been instituted, still when convinced by the evidence produced that Federal crimes had been committed and further convinced that the action of no single State, even if undertaken and prosecuted in good faith, would be able to deal effectively with all the ramifications of a great national conspiracy, moved promptly and effectively. From that time there can be nothing but the highest praise for the thorough, able, and unpartisan action of the Government authorities in these cases, both under Mr. Wickersham's direction and under the direction of his successors in office.

"The action of another arm of the Government—the Department of Labor—in the case of a recent strike of the boiler makers' union in Oklahoma, hardly measures up to this standard. A group of companies engaged in the erection of oil and gas tanks were conducting their work under a closed-shop agreement with the boiler makers' union. In the Oklahoma field the question of work was such that the union could not supply sufficient workmen. Recognizing the value of its closed-shop monopoly, it refused to admit new members to the union, but instead adopted a permit system by which permits to work were issued to nonunion men on condition that the man receiving such permit should pay 10 per cent of his wages into the union treasury, and payment of this 10 per cent was enforced by the simple method of compelling the contractor to deduct it from the wages of the permit men and to turn it over to the union. This tax did not even secure the permit man in his job, for if a union man at any time became out of work, the rules of the union provided that a permit man must be discharged to make a place for him. In other sections, also, the individual members of this group of contractors were subjected to strikes and all sorts of high-handed and arbitrary conduct on the part of the union agents, in violation of the trade agreement. As a result of all this a number of these contractors allied themselves together and formed the American Erectors' Association, and placed their work in the Oklahoma field and elsewhere upon an open-shop basis, making no change in wages or hours or other conditions, but simply refusing to acquiesce longer in the closed-shop control of the union. The permit men were employed direct and paid their full wages, without any 10 per cent deduction, and there were so many of them that the work of the contractors was well manned from the beginning. The union called a strike, resorting to picketing and violence, and when in a few weeks it was apparent that the strike was a failure, recourse was had to the Department of Labor.

"Mr. John Moffitt, former president of the hatters' union, as the representative of Secretary Wilson, met with the members of the American Erectors' Association at Pittsburgh on March 9, 1915. He stated that as a representative of the Department of Labor he had investigated the situation and found that the charge of the contractors of breach of contract, the unfair action of the union agents, and the maintenance of the vicious permit system were all correct. He said that the union itself had admitted these things. The remedy which, as a representative of the Department of Labor, he suggested to the contractors for this condition of affairs, was that instead of individual agreements between the contractors and the union, the American Erectors' Association should enter into a closed-shop agreement with the union, involving, of course, the placing of the union back in the same position of power and control as it previously occupied and involving also the discharge of such of the employees of the contractors as could not or would not secure membership in the union.

"No question of wages or hours was involved in this matter; no grievances presented for adjustment. The only question at issue was whether the contractors should renew their closed-shop agreement with the boiler makers' union after that union had admittedly made a most unfair and vicious use of such an agreement and had shown disregard of it by frequent violations. I believe it to be a fair subject of inquiry on the part of this commission whether it is a proper function of the Department of Labor to exert its power and its influence in the assistance of trade unions to secure closed-shop contracts, especially under such circumstances. The permit men who, under the open shop, were relieved of the extortion of 10 per cent of their earnings for the benefit of the union, were eager and willing to go to work directly for the employer. What moral, or legal, or economic justification is there for the interposition of any of the machinery of a democratic government to prevent their doing this? Are not they, as well as the members of the unions, entitled to the protection of every department of the Government? Should not the Department of Labor in the proper exercise of its functions seek out such instances as this in behalf of men oppressed by such vicious misuse of union power and relieve them therefrom, rather than to take the part of the oppressors when relief has been obtained by force of other circumstances? This case has been cited because there is and can be no dispute as to the facts, and it is to be regretted that it is typical of the general conduct of the Department of Labor in its attitude in labor controversies."

Commissioner O'CONNELL. May I have that last page, please?

Mr. DREW. I have a stenographic report of Mr. Moffitt's remarks to the American Erectors' Association, if you wish it offered in evidence.

(The matter referred to above will be found among the exhibits at the end of this subject as Drew Exhibit No. 1.)

[Continues reading:] "In conclusion and with special reference to the demand of organized labor that it shall be the beneficiary of special legislation exempting its conduct from the limitations of legal rules which apply to the actions of other men, may I briefly refer to the attitude of organized labor toward unorganized labor? This question becomes material because underlying all other justifications urged by organized labor for special consideration is its more or less tangible claim that it is charged with the divine mission of uplifting the laboring class as a whole, whether within or without its ranks, and that in what it does it is endeavoring to realize the high ideals involved in the performance of this mission. It is the credit extended to this claim by the public which secures for organized labor a large measure of sympathy for its efforts and pardon for its mistakes and offenses. It is the spirit of our age that large social and ethical considerations shall overrule oftentimes the strict application of legal limitations and restrictions.

"But aside from all rhetoric, all pretensions, and all romantic conceptions, what is the real and actual attitude of the closed-shop union man to the outsider?"

Let us call Mr. Johannsen as a witness. He was at least frank and without hypocrisy. He said that the attitude of organized labor was uncompromisingly hostile and bitter toward unorganized labor. [Continues reading:]

"We have also noted the attitude of the boiler makers' union in Oklahoma to be that of plain, every-day plunder. Not only might the nonunion man work only by the payment of a tax to the union, but he might not work at all if some union man wanted the job. There is much evidence before this commission showing a similar use of the permit system in other trades and other localities. More than this, the closed-shop union not only prevents the nonunion man from working at his trade, but through its limitation of apprentices it prevents him from learning the trade at all in the first instance, thus practically sentencing him for life to the ranks of common, unskilled, unorganized, and unorganizable labor.

"These things the union man does, but one final fact is necessary to crown his attitude toward his brother workers. He reserves the right to compete with the outsider in the field of common labor, while denying the outsider the like right to compete with him in his trade.

"If the closed-shop man finds himself out of work in his trade for any reason, does he, in return for the prohibition he has placed against the outsider, consider himself morally bound to wait until he can secure work at his own trade? Not at all. He promptly takes other work where he can get it and thereby enters into competition with the common laborer. Here, then, we have the worker who is really exploited—the common laborer. Every one of us is his potential competitor, for if the lawyer, or the doctor, or the merchant fail in his particular calling, he finds the ranks of common labor always open to him. In turn, however, we find all avenues of progress to higher callings open to the common laborer except those barred by the closed-shop union. It remained for organized labor, asserting the guardianship and protection of the common laborer as a reason for special privilege and license, to be the one institution in modern society which closes the door to its progress and at the same time retains for itself the right to remain in active competition with him in his own field.

"Let us look at these questions sanely without pretense or hypocrisy. Workers have a right to organize for their selfish interests just as any other group of society has such right. They have the right to push those selfish interests as against the interests of the rest of society, but by legitimate and lawful means. It is no reason for condemnation of a union that it seeks the advancement of its members as against the interest of outside workers. In considering, however, the application of principles of law to organized labor let it be frankly admitted that combinations of labor, combinations of capital and business, and industrial combinations generally are actuated fundamentally by self-interest and may be expected always to do the things dictated by self-interest even though that self-interest may conflict with the interest of other classes of society. Labor combinations, with the great power and wealth they have achieved and under clever and able leaders, have no need and no justification in the pursuit of their special and selfish aims and purposes for a special privilege or dispensation not accorded to other combinations of men."

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell has some questions he would like to ask you.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If you had to say, Mr. Drew, whether organized labor in its present capacity, with all the faults that you have alleged against it, with all its weaknesses and ramifications, would you have it wiped out of existence?

Mr. DREW. Not at all, Mr. O'Connell; I think that would be a very foolish thing to do. You may plant a tree out in your back yard, and because of its location or the lack of proper training it may grow to be crooked. That don't mean that you have got to tear the tree up and throw it away.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I take it that the general thought you have given to bring your mind to its general criticism of organized labor that you must have given some thought as to what organized labor might be and how it should conduct itself and how it should be organized. I am sure this commission would and I would be intensely interested to have your opinion, because of the specialty you apparently have made of one side of the question, as to whether you have given thought to the other side.

Mr. DREW. Mr. O'Connell, I am a firm believer in the organization of workers. I am a firm believer in collective bargaining. I think that nothing more effective could be done in the direction of realizing both of those things than to get the union movement of to-day back to bedrock—a sound economic foundation; to think a little more of the plowshare and perhaps a little less of the sword. There isn't any fair argument against a laboring man using this power, even in militant methods, using your people when they are organized with all the discipline of soldiers in war. But the trouble with that is that you develop class consciousness, according to my mind, along the line of organization; you emphasize the strong arm of the organization so much that the man forgets his own duties and responsibilities and strength as a productive factor in industry.

Now, I have read through the different trade magazines of the country, including the Federationist, and I do not find a word from cover to cover advising the workingmen to increase their efficiency or capacity or to cooperate with the employer in securing as great an output as possible for the common result of his capital and their labor.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Probably the laborer believes there are now enough engaged in that work——

Mr. DREW (interrupting). Well, I don't know; labor is the one great essential to production; and if the laborer limits production or takes a stand that limits production there is just that much less in the pot for him to fight for a share of.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understand you to say, Mr. Drew, that you are a firm believer in organization, and with that in the right of bargaining?

Mr. DREW. No sane, sensible person nowadays objects to those conceptions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And you agree that we can not have collective bargaining without organization?

Mr. DREW. Exactly; exactly. Therefore, I think it is a greater pity that the ability of organized labor to realize its proper functions as a party to collective agreements should be so handicapped by a lot of these things that they do.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, first, how are we going to have organization with the opposition of employers, who employ the workmen, against organization? How, then, can we have collective bargaining?

Mr. DREW. Mr. O'Connell, if you will go through the great national industries of to-day that are upon the open-shop basis, you will find that they were once upon a closed-shop basis. Organized labor has collective agreements; had collective agreements with our people; they had collective agreements with the metal trades and founders. They developed the strength to secure them and to have them in actual operation. Why have they lost them? I think that is a very pertinent inquiry. Why are industries that were once closed shop to-day open shop?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I think the answer is that employers have combined for the purpose of declaring for what they called the open shop.

Mr. DREW. But why did they do that if the agreement with organized labor was desirable, was right, was good for the industry, brought about an increase of output, brought about peace in the trade? There were no questions of competition among these men, because the great mass of employers in these industries were parties to those agreements, so that each manufacturer was competing on the same basis with others. Why did they get together to throw off the control of the closed shop? I can tell you why they did it with the structural-iron workers.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I think you were with us in Los Angeles during our hearing?

Mr. DREW. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And heard the witnesses of the manufacturers of that city who came before our commission?

Mr. DREW. I did.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And who declared they were running open shops?

Mr. DREW. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that they had agreed not to employ union men?

Mr. DREW. Yes. I want to say to you right now, and I want to say it publicly, as I have said it privately, that I am not at all proud of the particular use which has been made of the open shop in Los Angeles. It is simply evidence that we are all human; that no class can stand power without some responsibility. The excesses that we complain of on the part of the closed shop when it gets control, we find exemplified there in the open shops when our employers got control. It all goes to show that no one of us, being human, can stand too much power without responsibility.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You heard Mr. Davenport, I think, Saturday, in his opinion as to whether it would be beneficial either to the employee or to the employer for organizations of labor to incorporate, and his statement that he was unalterably opposed—these are not his words, but the intent, I think—that if he was in the position of a legislator to do it, he would not vote in favor of it, nor if he was in a position to say so, would he say to them to incorporate?

Mr. DREW. We do not present a united front on that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Lawyers are not all agreed?

Mr. DREW. No, in the first place; and in the second place, Mr. Davenport happened to bring an action up in Connecticut where the Connecticut laws permit an attachment before suit, and also against a union where there was a large number of individual members owning their own homes and some of this world's goods. That made his action against the individual members of the union a good and valuable asset. Generally speaking, that does not hold. Certainly it does not hold with the structural-iron workers, many of whom are a roving class, and do not own their homes and are scattered all over the country.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then you do not agree with Mr. Davenport's opinion on the matter of incorporation?

Mr. DREW. No, sir; not at all.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Davenport expressed a new view to me in regard to the legality of strikes, or the illegality of them; whether you heard it or not, I don't know, but it struck me as a rather peculiar construction—as to strikes that might be considered coercive, that would be illegal; and I can not bring myself to an understanding of what strike would not be coercive. Have you given that any thought?

Mr. DREW. Well, I touched upon that in my statement by saying that a strike—a simple strike—just the withdrawal of the members from employment was just an appeal to the law of supply and demand and not an appeal to force and coercion.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, that would not be a strike in the sense of a strike—just the withdrawal from employment?

Mr. DREW. Oh, yes; that is a strike. If the men in my employ come to me and say, "We want $5 a day instead of $4," and I say, "I will not pay it," and they say, "Well, all of us will quit," and they do quit, that is a strike.

Now, if that is all they do, just to go away and cease employment, and I can not fill their places, I have to go back to them and dicker with them and give them $5 a day if I can afford it. That is a strike in its simplest terms; and in the light of what we mean legally by "coercion," there is no coercion in it. If you come to me and say, "I want to buy your house," and I say, "I want $10,000 for it," and you say, "I can only give you $5,000," and I say, "You can not have it until you come to my terms," just so 100 men may collectively bargain with an employer, and the law of supply and demand, if there is no coercion, determines the final terms of the bargain; but if men quit, and in addition to quitting they say to others who come to take their places, "You can not work there," and intimidate them from working, then the strike takes another step forward; and the law even permits the use of fair argument with the outsider. But when they go still further and say to the outsider, "Here, this injury will happen to you if you take our places," social ostracism or violence, or whatever it may be, then there is the further step that takes them over the line of the law.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am yet in doubt as to the course; if you say to a man, "You have got to pay me $5," and he can not get anyone for less, and you still demand $5, you would not be coercing him into paying you $5 a day?

Mr. DREW. Not legally coercing. When you come to terms that apply from a legal point of view it would not be coercion.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And then I combine myself with others and do the same thing?

Mr. DREW. You had a perfect right to do it so long as you don't combine to do injury. A strike can become unlawful if it becomes a combination to injure. A business agent goes to an employer and says, "I want $100," and the employer says, "I won't pay it; it is graft," and the business agent says, "I will call your men out," and he does it. That is a strike for the purpose of injuring that employer until he pays $100 in graft to the business agent, and such a strike is illegal. It has no legitimate purpose or excuse, but it is a combination to injure, pure and simple.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I would agree with you upon that.

Now, supposing the men are working 10 hours a day and the business agent comes along and says, "Unless you reduce your hours to 8 I will call your men out and won't let you get other men if I can prevent"?

Mr. DREW. There is nothing unlawful about that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the paper you read you discussed the question of jurisdictional disputes, and quoted from a number of persons, President Gompers and others, as to this being one of the greatest causes of friction between employers and employees, and friction between employees themselves in their organizations; that the federation itself was unable to cope with this jurisdictional question; that instead of being able to reduce the number of them they showed an increase; I think that is the sense of what you said. I think I can speak rather intelligently on this subject. For more than 15 years I have been chairman of the committee during that time that has had to do with jurisdictional disputes; all of them have come before me as chairman of the committee, and other committees of which I was a member, I think for at least 15 years, and maybe a few years longer. At the last convention held in Philadelphia, held last November, I think there were somewhere around 25 cases before this committee; I think you said 24.

Mr. DREW. Twenty-two, I said.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I think probably it was greater than that.

Mr. DREW. One or two I was not certain of; I did not count them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But here is the situation: Two or three organizations maybe have a dozen of these cases interwound in various ways among themselves, as, for instance, the stationary engineers' organization, I think was involved in six or seven of them. Now, there is not at the present time before the American Federation of Labor or in the labor movement but one case of undecided jurisdiction, or unsettled jurisdiction of any great import, and that is a dispute between the carpenters and sheet-metal workers; the others are minor. And in the years gone by some of the greatest difficulties have been to straighten out by the federation in convention and by its committees and mediation, methods for the adjustment of these disputes. But here is the difficulty: Over night the industry changes sometimes; the entire method of manufacture, or of material used in the construction of something, is changed in its form, and we have never discovered—it has never been my experience in all these years that the employer attempts ever to give this changed method of work to a trade that is receiving a higher wage than the trade that was formerly doing it, but always trying to pass the new method of performing the work, or new work, to a trade receiving the lower wage, and this causes the great friction between the organizations and the fight that has, as we all recognize, been most disastrous to all parties concerned, but in numbers and numbers of cases the employers themselves are wholly responsible for it.

Mr. DREW. That is true in some cases, Mr. O'Connell, but not in all, and that is the reason why I cited the whole question of jurisdictional disputes, and there is nothing that will justify in law or morals two unions in making war upon each other, and thereby doing injury, not to the immediate employer perhaps, but to the owner and the general public and to third parties generally who have no voice or interest in the disputes. If organized labor can prevent a united front for the purpose of carrying on an offensive warfare and enforcing its agreements, it certainly has a right to do so, but it ought to settle its own quarrels within its own ranks and not invade the rights of the innocent public in this settlement; there is no question about that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But the public, in as far as the employer is concerned, is not always the innocent party. We have discovered in a great many instances that he is the guilty party, and that some judgment on his part or cooperation on his part with that, the dispute might have been avoided and the jurisdiction adjusted. Now, you cited a case in San Francisco where the bricklayers entered into an agreement with the brick employers' association whereby the brick employers' association were contributing a certain per cent of the profits of their business to the bricklayers' union. I think one-half of 1 per cent, something like that. Now, the fact is in that case that the brick manufacturers entered into an arrangement with the union to prevent the terra-cotta manufacturers from getting their material in to displace the brick manufacturers' material?

Mr. DREW. It was part of the combination to control the whole market.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And they did contribute some money to the bricklayers' union, and I believe when our hearing was there, there was testimony that they were still doing it to prevent the terra-cotta manufacturers' from getting in.

Mr. DREW. The way the bricklayers' union did was to pass a rule and make it a part of their rules that every brick contractor should, whether he wished to or not, pay one-half of 1 per cent to the bricklayers' union, and there was placed in evidence before your commission a number of receipts where such payment was enforced by strike.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The receipts that I saw were receipts through the secretary of the brick manufacturers' association.

Mr. DREW. No, sir; the bricklayers' union.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The receipt from the bricklayers' union to the manufacturer?

Mr. DREW. No, sir; I have in mind a receipt from the bricklayers' union for $40 from Brandt & Stevens, contractors, after strike had been called to enforce payment.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But the fact is there was no strike, no coercion shown, that the bricklayers compelled the brick manufacturers to pay them this money?

Mr. DREW. If brick manufacturers were a part of this illegal combination, they are as much to blame as the unions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But the paper that you read before us, there was nothing to indicate that the bricklayers were compelling the brick manufacturers to pay to them a certain per cent every month, without any qualification.

Mr. DREW. They were compelling the men that erected the brick in the buildings. This was forced from the brick contractor, who didn't care about it, but was willing to buy his brick anywhere he could get it, and if it was an attempt between the unions and the manufacturers to control the market in San Francisco it makes it all the more reprehensible.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It was a fight between the brick manufacturers and the terra-cotta people as to whose material would go into the buildings.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Terra cotta or the concrete people?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Both.

Mr. DREW. I say for the bricklayers' union to lend themselves to such a thing is all the more reprehensible.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It doesn't relieve the employer?

Mr. DREW. Bless your heart, the employers are the worst part of the combination. They oftentimes are the ones that get them together. They use the closed shop of the union to swindle the general public. The bricklaying industry in New York is practically closed—in New York and San Francisco and Chicago—by deals between the employers and the unions, and the power of that rests upon the closed shop as the power of the union and the ability of the union to prevent any outsider from getting labor in that particular market. I say that is a misuse of the closed-shop power of the union against the rights of the general public.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do we see any general criticism offered or published against the employers in their associations for entering into these illegal combinations?

Mr. DREW. You will find our people criticizing them wherever they come together, and there are two court proceedings to dissolve such combinations now pending. We don't approve of it. We say that is the ultimate crime of the closed shop, and it is the logical development of the closed shop.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You cited or read from a communication that apparently had come to you, and I take it during the ironworkers' case the business agents, writing to their officers—

Mr. DREW. I have photographic copies of those letters if you want them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. No; I don't want them. I just want to bring it to your attention. Did you hear the ex-mayor of Altoona's testimony before this commission last week?

Mr. DREW. No, sir; I did not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the case of detectives or police officers—I think it was a constable he was called in Pennsylvania—beating up a business agent of the organization in Altoona very severely, and he was sent to the hospital, and after he got out of the hospital he went home and died. A man by the name of Gallagher; the gentleman that appeared was mayor of the city of Altoona at that time; during some strike of the shopmen on the Pennsylvania Railroad. This man went away, and warrant was issued, but they never caught him; and after the strike was over it was all settled, and an official of the Pennsylvania Railroad, the master mechanic at the Altoona shops—I don't recall his name just now—called upon the mayor, with others present, and said he wanted to have him come off of any further attempt to punish this man who had run away from the court; and said that they had fixed the judge, fixed the district attorney, and fixed somebody else. Everybody was fixed but the mayor, and if he would come off the man could come back there, as his home was in Altoona, or in the country there some place, and everything would be all right; and the mayor said, "Very well; if everybody else is agreeable, I am." And the man immediately showed up; he was there the next morning on the street. Does that not show that others have influence, or try to have, with the courts?

Mr. DREW. There is no question about that at all. I would not attempt to defend the acts of all the employers of this country, because they are human just as the rest of us, and are going to fight their fights under the circumstances in which they find themselves at the particular times. And I would like to see some of the labor unions' funds to back up, if they have evidence, such a charge of fixing courts; I would like to see some of your funds used in prosecution of cases of that kind.

Furthermore, I would like to say now that I have been counsel before this commission, as you all know, for nearly a year for the open-shop employer, and I have never offered before this commission a line of evidence on the subject of violence. I am not particularly concerned with the features and incidents of war after war starts. War is brutal business; you must expect that you will have brutality and hatred and bitterness. My chief concern is with the cause that leads up to war before it begins, and not with the way they carry it on after it starts.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In that direction, I don't think you were with us when—in some of the western places, like Lead and Butte. However, the question that came up before us was in various ways and is quoted, that men should not be deprived of their liberty without due process of law and all that. It is alleged here before this commission every place we have been that citizens are deprived of their liberty without due process of law and where courts are in operation ready to perform the functions of the courts and in disregard for the courts men are deprived of their liberty. Now, what is your opinion, Mr. Drew, of that sort of conduct?

Mr. DREW. There is no excuse for either party to an industrial dispute violating the laws of the land, of course. There are no two ways about that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, where is the equity in the proposition? That is what I want to get at. Where is the poor man's equity?

Mr. DREW. I don't think it concerns the genesis of our discussion if we can not find equity in every case. Some people are born to the world cripples. What compensation can there be for that? Some are feeble-minded. What compensation can there be for that?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the case of men born into the world cripples we train or educate; great surgeons grow up, and thousands of cases have been successful.

Mr. DREW. Sometimes the law of compensation seems to operate, does it not?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It cures these ills in nature; but there does not seem to be a unanimous opinion of the legal minds in our times. There don't seem to be any unanimity of construction. I asked Mr. Davenport the other day what he would suggest as a remedy for all these things that he was talking about, and he seemed to be a standpatter; he said nothing.

Mr. DREW. Here is the general proposition: The minute you have a law of universal application you will have individual instances where what appears to be injustice comes from the application of that law. The minute you try, however, to make a law to apply to each individual case as it arises you have need of all the functions of a court of equity. Furthermore, if you try to apply that law outside of some judicial action you have chaos. You have each man a law to himself. Now, you have to take your choice between the two. It is one of the prices we pay for not being perfect people and living in a perfect age, that the minute we make rules to govern ourselves of universal and general application there will be individual instances in which they seem to work out unfairly. That applies to the shopkeeper, the real estate dealer, the laboring man, and all the others.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The laboring man seems to be the most helpless of all. The shopman, he has his shop and his goods in his shop; they stand as a sort of guaranty for him—guaranty that his attorney's fees will be paid—but the laboring man, he has nothing. He seems to be helpless.

Mr. DREW. You show a regard for the laboring man outside of the ranks of organized labor that Mr. Johannsen does not seem to feel; and as to the laboring man inside of the ranks of organized labor, he has ample protection.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am not speaking of that man, because I think we have heard you say that there are millions of men outside of organized labor?

Mr. DREW. Yes. What are we going to do with them? That is our problem.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am asking you now. What would you suggest?

Mr. DREW. You people keep them from learning trades and oppose them in different ways wherever your interest clashes with them. You don't go out maliciously and attack a man; but where your interests conflict with the outsider in any way you fight him. Where your interests don't conflict you are perfectly willing his conditions should be improved, the same as are all of the rest of us. But what are we going to do with him? Why should we fight or you fight for an increase in union power from the Government to get a man who may be getting 70 cents an hour, 75 cents an hour, and for an eight-hour day, when some of these poor fellows have not even got a job at a dollar and a quarter a day? There is the problem. The employers and leaders of labor organizations and social reformers—all of them should get together and do something for these masses of people, because, after all, the progress of society is to be measured by the upward lift of the masses below. You don't get any appreciable progress by giving a 70-cent bricklayer 75 or 80 cents an hour, but you do by getting the man at the bottom of the pile a little higher up.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose we all start out to get an increase in wages and decrease in hours——

Mr. DREW. One of the first things, Mr. O'Connell, that would make possible a reduction in the hours of labor would be a general teaching on the part of labor of increase in efficiency, so that they could do in 5 or 6 hours what they now do in 8, 10, or 12 hours.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I think we have so many people teaching that they have got things all mixed up.

Mr. DREW. You people that reach the ear of the workers don't agree with them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There are so many taskmasters and teachers we can not agree; they are like lawyers somewhat. I want to ask you a few questions in regard to the erectors' association. What connection have the erectors' association with other associations, for instance, the National Manufacturers' Association?

Mr. DREW. Absolutely none. At the present time we are a member of this joint committee that was organized solely to work with this commission. We call it the Joint Committee of Associated Employers, and I am counsel of it. That was organized last June, and that is the only connection we have ever had.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is there a change or exchange of anything between your association and the National Manufacturers' Association that would be a record of the acts of organized labor?

Mr. DREW. Absolutely none, and here is the general conception about the National Association of Manufacturers that I would like to correct. The National Association of Manufacturers takes no part whatever in industrial disturbances. If one of its members is under strike, he does not even notify headquarters of it. He gets no assistance from the association; they furnish no men, no money, or assistance of any kind. Its general functions, so far as trade is concerned, are entirely along different lines.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I know it, but it was originally organized——

Mr. DREW (interrupting). It speaks a great deal about the open shop, and its leaders make speeches about it, but it is not a fighting or defensive organization as ours is.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How is it, then, that the legal talent representative of the National Manufacturers' Association can always be found in the State capitals and other places where legislation is going on, speaking for that association as against legislation sought by organized labor?

Mr. DREW. Mr. Emery, if he is the one you refer to, is not the counsel of the National Manufacturers' Association. He is counsel of the National Council for Industrial Defense, composed of about 250 employers' associations, including the National Association of Manufacturers and the National Erectors' Association and others. He has no official connection with the National Manufacturers' Association.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But in that degree, and in that sense, speaks for the national manufacturers?

Mr. DREW. As a party to the National Council for Industrial Defense.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And cites that as one of the organizations that don't believe this or that legislation in favor of organized labor should be passed?

Mr. DREW. The National Manufacturers' Association has overcome some of the criticism to the effect that they take no interest in these new social and remedial measures by taking a very important interest in such measures, chiefly such as workmen's compensation laws.

Commissioner LENNON. Did you read in yesterday's paper, I think it was, the statement of the president of the Pennsylvania State Manufacturers' Association, which, I take it, is associated with the National Manufacturers' Association, the same as other associations——

Mr. DREW. It is not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As to its position on the child-labor bill just passed?

Mr. DREW. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And its general criticism of everybody connected with it?

Mr. DREW. No; but we have no connection with it, or the National Association of Manufacturers.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What number of members in the National Erectors' Association?

Mr. DREW. I would say about 40.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What are the dues and expenses?

Mr. DREW. Our dues are based upon the number of tons that each concern erects. I think it is 3 cents a ton on material.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would you give us the names of some large concerns and cite what it would cost them?

Mr. DREW. Post-McCord, of New York, comes to my mind now; its dues are sometimes $25 a month; or sometimes $125 a month, depending upon the amount of material that they are handling at that particular time. At the present time I am frank to say that our dues are pretty slim.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is there a publication of any kind showing the receipts and expenditures of the association?

Mr. DREW. No; but our general income, if you want that, is about $2,500 a month—about $30,000 a year.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Can you furnish this commission the documents, or have proper officers do it, showing the receipts and expenditures of the association for the past several years? I suppose they are published annually to the officers or members, or something, if not publicly; and the membership and the cost of membership?

Mr. DREW. Well, I will furnish you with the membership and the cost of membership, but I will have to consult our executive committee about our expenditures for the last several years, but I don't think there will be any question about that.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock has some questions he wants to ask you.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You went on in your statement, Mr. Drew, to point out that unions are not legally responsible. In view of that, will you explain how damages were collected against the Danbury hatters?

Mr. DREW. They were sued individually, as individual members of the hatters' union. The judgment lies against several hundred individual men.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Can that be done in the case of any union?

Mr. DREW. Yes, sir; if you can hunt up all of the men and they are financially responsible.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you now recall the other day, as we were walking out after adjournment, a conversation between yourself and Mr. Davenport on this very point?

Mr. DREW. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And I was unable to remain to hear the discussion to the end, but I recall your saying to Mr. Davenport, What redress have you with a lot of union members who individually are financially irresponsible?

Mr. DREW. And badly scattered.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir; despite the fact the union may have $100,000 in its funds. And if I remember rightly, I heard Mr. Davenport say as I walked along there is no difficulty about reaching that $100,000.

Mr. DREW. Mr. Davenport thinks, under the eighth section of the Sherman Act, that the association is a person, so it can be sued and damages recovered from its treasury. No case of that kind has ever been brought under that section, and it is a question whether that language of the Sherman Act makes a voluntary association a responsible entity, so it can be sued as such. I doubt very much whether it does, but that is what he meant. We have had previous discussions on that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then you are not sure that Mr. Davenport is right?

Mr. DREW. I am not sure that I am right. If an association can be sued as a person under the Sherman Act, still all the action that we would have against the association as such would be for a violation of the Sherman Act, and a great mass of our boycotts over the country would still be untouched. Where you had a case violating the Sherman Act you might get it through, but the general fact of civil immunity of the labor organizations in the mass of cases would still remain unaffected.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If a boycott is levied against a concern doing interstate business, would that or not be a violation of the Sherman Act?

Mr. DREW. It depends entirely upon whether it restrains the interstate commerce of that concern. The mere fact that it did an interstate-commerce business would not be controlling, unless you can show that it took steps that actually restrained interstate commerce.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Take the breweries of Washington, D. C.; I notice at this time that they are almost on strike, and assuming that they do an interstate business, the unions are sending out bulletins to other organizations to refrain from buying that kind of beer; would that be in restraint of trade?

Mr. DREW. I think under the Danbury hatters' case it probably would.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that would be in violation of the antitrust act?

Mr. DREW. I think it would.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And would those unions, if they had funds, be liable, for that matter?

Mr. DREW. Yes; being located in the District, you would not have to restrain their interstate commerce; but the very fact of their being located in the District brings them under the Sherman Antitrust Act, because this is United States territory.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, if those unions have funds and are issuing bulletins or letters or communications to unions outside of the District, then the brewers would have an action, according to Mr. Davenport's view?

Mr. DREW. According to Mr. Davenport, they would.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, now, admitting that the unions are not held legally responsible, is that situation, then, any worse in the United States than in Great Britain? As you doubtless are aware, in Great Britain the funds of a union are absolutely exempt from court judgments.

Mr. DREW. No; I think that by a law expressly passed, you can not sue a union, agent, or the union in Great Britain for any damages which grow out of their conduct in furtherance of a trade dispute; that if you sue a union or its agents, and it comes into court and pleads that what it did was in the furtherance of a trades dispute, then you may not maintain your suit. That, I think, is the law by an express act of Parliament.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, that being the law, and I happen to know that it is the law unless it has been recently changed, the employers of Great Britain are even worse off than the United States employers?

Mr. DREW. Of course, there is this, Mr. Weinstock: Parliament has also passed laws in England which specifically and in precise terms made criminal on the part of a union a great deal of the conduct that over here we can reach only through injunction—picketing, accosting, watching, and besetting. They are all criminal acts by express act of Parliament in Great Britain. I don't think the unions would accept in this country the conditions of the English law as it stands to-day, as regarding their activities. I don't think they would accept it for a moment—the whole English system of law on that. I am sure they would not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Despite the exemption?

Mr. DREW. Despite the exemption; I don't think they would accept it.

Commissioner LENNON. We would, some of it?

Mr. DREW. Well, You would not accept it all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In saying what you have said about your ideas on the questions of collective bargaining and organized labor, which, in brief, I gather in substance to be the following: That you believe that the worker not only has the legal and moral right to organize, but that he should organize for his own protection; that you are not opposed to the closed shop when it is established in the proper way. Now, in that are you simply speaking for yourself, or are you voicing the sentiments of the employers of the association which you represent?

Mr. DREW. Well, I am speaking for myself in the opinions which go beyond our activities, Mr. Weinstock; but I know that is the general feeling among intelligent employers.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That they are not opposed to collective bargaining?

Mr. DREW. Why, no. But the collective bargain is the same as any other bargain. It should have two contracting parties, both of whom should stand upon an equal footing and possess mutual respect for each other and mutual responsibilities. How can you have any bargains, collective or otherwise, without those factors and those elements? Now, if a closed union shop is so powerful that it absolutely controls the situation, you have no collective bargain. You have a demand and a surrender.

Chairman WALSH. At this point, will you please resume the stand at 2 o'clock?

We will adjourn until 2 o'clock.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 p. m., Monday, May 17, 1915, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

Acting Chairman LENNON. We will please be in order. Chairman Walsh can not be here for a few minutes.

Mr. Drew, will you take the stand, please?

TESTIMONY OF MR. WALTER DREW—Continued.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Mr. Weinstock desires to ask some further questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How long have you been connected with these labor questions, Mr. Drew?

Mr. DREW. Well, I suppose, since 1905.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. For a period of about 10 years?

Mr. DREW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. During that time have you had opportunities of coming into personal touch with labor representatives and labor leaders?

Mr. DREW. Why, to a certain extent, yes, Mr. Weinstock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are you familiar—fairly familiar with the attitude of mind and the sentiment of labor representatives and labor leaders?

Mr. DREW. Well, so far as that attitude of mind has been expressed in their conduct, I think perhaps I am. I have been a student of industrial questions, more particularly as applied to my own activities.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see. Well, it would seem to me, Mr. Drew, that in justice to Mother Jones, and in justice to Mr. Johannsen, and in justice also to organized labor we must assume that when Mother Jones spoke as she did, and when Mr. Johannsen spoke as he did, they were simply voicing their own sentiment, that they were not officially representing organized labor, and what they said should be permitted to carry only such weight as an individual's judgment would carry who did more or less official work for an organization. Now, this question I was to put to you in view of that situation is this: I want to read to you the expression of sentiment on the part of Mother Jones, and on the part of Mr. Johannsen, and to ask you whether, as the result of your broad experience in the study of these problems and in your personal contact with labor leaders and with labor representatives, whether you think they are voicing the sentiments of labor leaders and labor representatives, generally speaking.

Let me read to you the paragraphs I have in mind.

Mr. DREW. You mean their attitude toward violence?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Just a moment; let me read the precise language [reading]:

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. From what you have explained, Mother Jones, it is evident that some explanation is needed. There appears in the record of the congressional committee, a copy of which I have here, setting forth a hearing before a subcommittee of the House, on Mines and Mining, of the House of Representatives, a statement attributing to you, which evidently is a mistake, and does you a grave injustice, and I think you should be afforded an opportunity at this hearing for the purpose of correcting the record."

This was the statement attributed to Mother Jones said to have been made at a convention of labor unionists in Trinidad, Colo.; she goes on to say [continues reading]:

"When we adjourned the meeting and saw we were not going to get any help, I said, 'We will protect ourselves, and buy every gun in Charleston; there was not a gun left in Charleston. And we did it openly; no underhand business about it, for I don't believe in it at all. We simply got our guns and ammunition and walked down to the camp and the fight began.'"

(At this point Chairman Walsh takes the chair.)

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (reading): "There is no change to be made in that statement?"

"Mother JONES. No; that can stay."

Now, in the examination of Mr. Johannsen, this appears; in questioning Mr. Johannsen I said:

"In looking over this testimony of yesterday I noticed you make some pretty sweeping statements here, and I felt it was only fair to you to give you an opportunity, if you care to exercise it, to amend or modify or correct the statements made. Let me read this one to you:

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I may have, for example, what I believe is a real grievance, but which may prove to be only fancied.

"Mr. JOHANNSEN. After you prove it to us we change our opinion. See.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let us limit it to real grievances; would you say that any man, or group of men, that have any real grievance, is justified in taking the law into his own hands, or ignoring it?

"Mr. JOHANNSEN. My advice to labor would be, if I was asked for my advice—I am not sure I would take the stump—if you are sure you are right, if you are convinced of judicial invasion of your rights, stand for your rights and take the consequences.

"Of course, in plain language this seems to defy the authorities. Now, I think you ought to be afforded an opportunity to modify or change this, if you care to do so.

"Mr. JOHANNSEN. That is all right as it stands."

Now, how far, so far as you have been able to judge, does Mother Jones and Mr. Johannsen, in speaking as they did, and taking the position they did, reflect the sentiments of labor representatives and of labor leaders?

Mr. DREW. Mr. Weinstock, you can not draw a blanket indictment of a class. It is just as unfair to attribute lawless sentiments to organized labor because one or two make statements of that kind, as to say that every employer in this country is unfair and unscrupulous because you find some employers that way. Now, this is my understanding of the sentiment of organized labor on these matters, so far as actual crude lawless violation is concerned. I am not speaking now of violence of injunctions, because the laboring people have their ideas about injunctions, and from their point of view they think the injunction is a lawless thing, but I am referring now to just these matters of brute violence. The better thought in the circles of organized labor is against the idea of its employment. A union is just like the rest of us, an aggregation of individuals—like a city, if you please. Sometimes the administration of a city gets into the hands of corrupt people and then a rotten administration with all sorts of corruption exists. So labor unions, under their democratic form of government, get into the hands of corrupt and unscrupulous men, and you have all sorts of such cases. My objection to the closed shop is that it encourages those cases and that it furnishes that kind of a leader the power of misusing the strength of the union; that is one of the objections to the closed shop.

You take a street car company with a hundred stockholders. The managers of that company will bribe a city council and get a charter, and the company has no objection to getting it by bribery or corruption. The stockholders of that company may know perfectly well that that has been done. They would not do it themselves, the most of them, yet they will take the dividends that come from the corrupt action of the managers of their company. They will wink at the action of their leaders. So the rank and file of organized labor know that oftentimes methods which they themselves would not use are used in their behalf by their leaders. They do just what the stockholders did; they wink at it and take the benefits that come from the employment of such methods. The two are exactly on a par.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, is the stockholder or is he not liable morally and otherwise if, knowing the methods of his representative, he condones them?

Mr. DREW. Why, of course he is.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would that rule work both ways?

Mr. DREW. Exactly; there is no rule that don't work each way.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And if the rank and file of the labor organization do know what their leaders do is unrighteous and unlawful, though it is believed to be in the interest of the rank and file, and they condone it, and do not take exceptions to it, they really assume the responsibility?

Mr. DREW. Well, not entirely; because that leader is a forceful, able man generally. He builds up an organization that safeguards him in his position. He gets himself beyond the reach of the better element in his organization. It is just the same as a city administration which can bulwark itself against the effort of decent citizens to get hold of it. That holds good all along the line. You can not always hold the organization for what the leaders do. You take the better class of labor organizations, the things that they deplore most in their own councils and try to get rid of are the excesses on the part of the leaders. And I think they would add a great deal to their efforts in that direction if they would encourage greater responsibility on the part of the organization. Then the labor leader misusing the power of his organization would know that the organization was held to account, and the members would be more careful who they elect to office. I think that would be a good thing to help men like Mr. Lennon and Mr. O'Connell and Mr. Gompers to get a better condition of affairs.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What would be your remedy of raising the standard of labor?

Mr. DREW. There is no one remedy. We can not any of us sustain power without responsibility.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In the course of your argument you referred to-day at considerable length to the structural ironworkers' case. Did you follow that? I suppose, being the counsel, you followed it from start to finish?

Mr. DREW. I did.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you are familiar with every phase and angle of the case?

Mr. DREW. I think I am.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You probably heard the statement, if you did not hear it, perhaps you read it, by Mr. Job Harriman in Los Angeles?

Mr. DREW. I heard it; I was present.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And among other things, you may recall the statement that he made, that F. D. Ryan was an innocent man, railroaded into jail?

Mr. DREW. He didn't say just that, but that was the substance of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you also heard the statement of Mr. Johannsen here the other day when he said he thought Ryan had been unjustly convicted; that he didn't get the full benefit of a trial, and if he had he would not have been convicted?

Mr. DREW. I heard that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Will you give your point of view as an authority on the subject and familiar with it?

Mr. DREW. I don't pose as an authority on the question of judicial procedure. Every man that loses a case in court thinks that the court was biased against him. He would not have been in court in the first place if he had not thought he was right, and when the court holds that he is not right then the court is wrong. That is the common thought of litigants.

I was present at the Indianapolis trial, and from my point of view I think that the trial was absolutely fair. So far as some of the substantial statements that Mr. Johannsen made, I know they have no basis in fact. The statement as to seizure of evidence and papers, the first bunch of correspondence and papers were seized under a search warrant by the State authorities from the vault of the ironworkers. The second mass of evidence later was taken from the office of the ironworkers themselves, which was entered with a key furnished by Mr. Hockin. And he was present, and he was at that time the acting secretary of the union, and the entry was absolutely lawful, and the papers were delivered by the acting secretary of the union.

As to the fact that a United States marshal on December 19, after the trial had been in progress nearly three months, and the evidence was all in and the case ready for argument before the jury, saw fit to order a train, if he did so order it, to take the men to Leavenworth in case of conviction, I can only say that if there is anything out of the way in that procedure, the United States marshal should be called upon to explain it. That the United States marshal was advised by Judge Anderson or the jury that they intended to convict those people I don't think for a moment.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You heard the statement made by a witness on this stand, and at other hearings, that labor can not get a fair deal in the courts. How about the employers getting a fair deal in courts?

Mr. DREW. Mr. Weinstock, I never have begun for our people an injunction proceeding.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Why?

Mr. DREW. Because it would be pretty hard to enjoin the particular things that we had to contend with, unless you had evidence that would be sufficient to start criminal prosecution, and when we got that the criminal prosecution was instituted.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have represented employers in courts, have you, at different times?

Mr. DREW. In the old days, yes; not in recent years.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Did you have any grievance against the courts from the times when you felt that your clients were not getting what is called a square deal?

Mr. DREW. I tried to get an injunction against the printers in Grand Rapids in 1906, and the court didn't give me all I thought I was entitled to.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, from your knowledge and observation and experience, would you admit the charge, made by labor representatives, that capital or employers always get a square deal in court, and labor does not?

Mr. DREW. I don't think you can draw a blanket indictment there. Courts are human beings, with different training, and to some extent different points of view, even in judicial matters, and one court goes a bit further than the other, or not quite so far. You can not say it is due to partisanship, or due to preconceived opinions or bias. Personally, I like to feel that our judiciary in this country is above charges of that kind, and if it is not, we are certainly in a sad way. I do know there is a general uniformity both in National and State decisions on the fundamental principles applying to combinations of labor and other combinations. Even in the famous McQuened case, where Chief Justice Parker held there was no action, it was not a difference on the law, but on the facts. Chief Justice Parker held in that case, which was a strike to compel the discharge of a nonunion man, that the evidence failed to show any malice on the part of the combination. He held that they were trying to get the job for themselves, and that the particular case did not show any malice. It is true that Mr. Justice Mann and one or two others in a dissenting opinion held that it did show malice. The majority, though, decided that the facts did not show malice, and no injunction was issued. The difference was on the facts of that particular case, not on the general principle of law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In your statement this morning, among other things, you more or less criticized the Secretary of Labor, because of certain things that he had done in connection with labor disputes. What, in your opinion, should be the qualification of the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. DREW. I think he should represent the laborers of this country, not any one class. Say we had a Department of Commerce that represented the Standard Oil Co. and the Steel Trust and other large corporations and refused to take cognizance of these little manufacturers over the country. What kind of a Department of Commerce would you call that? The organized laborer, through the strength of his organization, less needs the protection of an arm of Government than the unorganized man.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is the attitude of the Secretary of Labor, as you have come to know it in your experience?

Mr. DREW. I have recited the one instance in which I came in personal contact with that attitude, and I have stated it here. The rest that I know concerning his activities is gained from general reading, and I presume this commission has as good access to that as I have.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. As a student of the problem, Mr. Drew, what is your remedy for industrial unrest?

Mr. DREW. Well, I can not give any remedy, Mr. Weinstock, that would be worth your consideration.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If a man who has given the thought and time and energy to the problem that you have has no remedy, where are we at? It would appear it is a hopeless situation?

Mr. DREW. No, sir; I am rather of an optimist. I think we are making headway, in the general education of our people. I think all this talk that we get from people like Johannsen and Mother Jones is good. It sets people to thinking, and if we tell a thing to a man, even if it don't agree with our ideas, as to the kind of mental food that we ought to feed him, still, if he is a thinking animal, he will turn it over in his mind and reject it if it is not right, and will accept it if it is according to his standard. But if we can make him think, that is the important thing. As I have said to Mr. O'Connell a while ago, we can not make any general social progress unless it comes from the bottom of the mass, and the more we can make those people think about themselves and their relation to the industrial problem and social problem, the nearer we are to their expression, their self-expression in some effective way. Such expression would be most effective through organization. Where you can get a lot of them together and exert their force, that, of course, is a greater advantage. But the individual has got to understand fundamentally his relations to industry and to society; and educating and stirring him up and making him think, all these things are helpful. There is no general panacea; there is no one rule of growth. The moment an institution becomes established, some philosopher has said, it becomes obsolete, because the things out of which it grew—the conditions out of which it arose—have changed, so that it is obsolete. You can not force any hard and fast rule upon society.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You doubtless have heard more or less discussion, Mr. Drew, in the commission and out of the commission, of the proposed recommendation or suggested recommendation to be made by this commission to Congress for the creation of a permanent board of mediation and conciliation to deal with the interest of labor disputes. What is your judgment of such a proposed body?

Mr. DREW. Well, I can not speak for all the people I represent on matters of that kind. Personally, I think it is a good thing to get big industrial issues national in character into the hands of the Federal Government as far as possible. I think one of our troubles now is having a multiplicity of laws in different States dealing with these questions—different laws, different provisions, and different ways of administration. It make industrial chaos, not only for the worker but for the employer who seeks to do business. I think the more we can simplify and concentrate our legal rules and our administration of those rules, the better it will be for all of us.

So far as mediation and conciliation is concerned. I believe in two people sitting down and talking things over across the table. They will find things in common that they did not dream of, and they will certainly find that they are human beings, which they have a tendency to deny now.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, you, for one, would not look with unfriendly eyes on such a proposed board of mediation or conciliation?

Mr. DREW. I would not look with unfriendly eyes upon any experiment, Mr. Weinstock, because that is the whole spirit of modern society. We have to try out things—even if a thing is wrong we have tried it and discarded it. We have made some progress.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. There will be some things, of course, from your experience, that you know in advance would fail?

Mr. DREW. I might think they would fail, and yet sometimes we get surprised at the way things turn out.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Could you express an opinion for those whom you represent in this connection?

Mr. DREW. You mean as to what—to a remedy?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. As to a proposed board of mediation and conciliation, yes.

Mr. DREW. No; I would a little bit rather not do that. Some employers believe in compulsory arbitration, especially for people in the railroad service and other forms of public service. Our people I don't think would oppose any such suggestion as that you mention.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon has a question or two.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Drew, is there any opportunity for unorganized labor to express themselves as to their desires for betterment and human uplift except through the voice of organized labor?

Mr. DREW. Well, you assume that they are so expressing themselves, and I would have to debate, of course, the hypothesis before we discussed the conclusion.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, suppose they are discontented; what method of expression have they of themselves?

Mr. DREW. Mr. Johannsen, of San Francisco, is part of the organization which absolutely controls the industries in San Francisco. You have heard him state that their attitude toward unorganized labor is absolutely and uncomprisingly hostile. Now, he does not speak for the average man in San Francisco, but speaks for those whom he represents directly.

Commissioner LENNON. The ends for which organized labor is striving touch all our people; doesn't organized labor speak for those who are unorganized as well as for those who are organized?

Mr. DREW. Mr. Lennon, a while ago I said that whenever in any particular matter the interest of organized labor was not in conflict with that of the unorganized man, then it was perfectly willing to include him in its representation. That, I believe, is true. I believe you, just as any other good citizen, will try to get child-labor laws and other reforms of remedial and social legislation which would include all labor. But wherever any question of legislation comes up, where the interest of organized labor is in conflict with that of the outsider, then I believe the attitude of organized labor would be absolutely different.

Commissioner LENNON. You believe those instances where there is a conflict of interest of laborers do occur?

Mr. DREW. Oh, no question about it. They are competitors for a job.

Commissioner LENNON. Did you express in your paper a seeming belief that there was a hatred and hostility toward unorganized labor by the union men?

Mr. DREW. No question about it. I can read you extract after extract from the official labor magazines expressing that hatred. The very terms of "scab" and "rat" for the unorganized man expresses hatred.

Commissioner LENNON. As to evidences of hostility, are you aware of the fact that a large part of the income of the unions is expended to organize the unorganized workmen?

Mr. DREW. Wherever the unorganized worker, by reason of furnishing a market for the employer, or for some other reason, becomes a menace to organized labor, then organized labor goes out to organize him for its own interests as well as those of the man; and I can demonstrate that from your periodicals.

Commissioner LENNON. I said he did it for his own interest, but primarily for the interest of unorganized labor.

Mr. DREW. Incidentally, but not primarily. May I read right here an extract from the Bridgemen's Magazine bearing directly upon that point?

Commissioner LENNON. Why, I can't stop you.

Mr. DREW. It is not very long. Well, I do not find it; I have mislaid it. I will state the substance of it and file it in the record later.

(The matter referred to will be found among the exhibits at the end of this subject printed as "Drew Exhibit No. 2.")

The substance of it was that reports were coming to the international organization that competent men were being secured in the outlying districts in the South and in Canada to work open shop for the members of the erectors' association; and the proposition was that in view of that a determined effort must be made to organize these outside men so that they would cease to furnish a supply of labor to the open shop work, to the open shop employers. Before that they had made no effort toward organization in those districts.

Commissioner LENNON. Doesn't that justify the conclusion that their interest was to maintain wages and conditions of labor for the unorganized man as well as themselves?

Mr. DREW. There has never been any question about wages or conditions or hours between the International Association of Bridge and Structural Iron Workers and the members of the National Erectors' Association since the open-shop fight. The fight was not over wages or conditions or hours. There has never been any question between them on that score. Our people have increased the wages under the open shop.

Commissioner LENNON. More than they have been increased in the union shop?

Mr. DREW. I made a compilation about three years ago which showed that our people had increased wages on an average of about 11.2 per cent, while the general average of increase in the closed shop trades, taken the country over, was something like 10 per cent during the same period.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, I can not—or have not those figures, but that is not in accord with my experience.

Mr. DREW. Well, on that point may I read a letter from Mr. McClory, president of the International Bridge & Iron Workers, which I received just a few days ago? Mr. McClory wrote and asked for a conference. I wrote and told him that I did not think such a conference would be granted. In my letter to Mr. McClory, which is dated May 4, 1915, I used this language:

"None of the dire evils prophesied from the open shop regarding the exploiting of labor or the oppression of the workmen have come to pass. You allege no grievances or conditions which call for adjustment. The fundamental purpose of trade agreements is to secure proper wages and conditions for the men, not to secure arbitrary unchecked power over the industry. You will find both this association and its individual members not only willing but anxious to take up at any time any question which concerns the well-being of its workmen. We do not consider it a necessary prerequisite to the discussion of labor conditions that your organization or any other be given an unlimited and arbitrary closed-shop control."

In answer to that Mr. McClory says, in part:

"In paragraph 4 you state that none of the dire evils prophesied to follow from the open shop regarding the exploiting of labor or the oppression of the workmen have come to pass. To this I will say that the reason these evils prophesied have not come to pass is because organized labor stands as a barrier between the open-shop employers and the realization of the fruitfulness of that beautiful dream known as the open shop; but the evil of this plan is apparent where it is completely established. I refer you to some of the large cities in the South, where there is no semblance of organized labor and where the conditions of the working people are most deplorable; and it is such conditions as those of the South that the apostles of the open shop would like to establish in the industries of our northern and western cities, and they undoubtedly would but for the opposition of organized labor."

So Mr. McClory admits that in our case at least the exploiting of labor has not come to pass.

Commissioner LENNON. I was just going to ask you, was it not probably a fact that the existence of the ironworkers' organization has been a deterrent against any effort to reduce wages?

Mr. DREW. I think it has, Mr. Lennon, to a certain extent. I think undoubtedly it has, in the first place; and in the second place we are only a small group of people, and we can exercise a general control over the industry which a larger group would not be able to do. Therefore, if our large open-shop concerns desire to adopt a fair and liberal policy in regard to wages, they are in a better position to carry it out than perhaps a larger number of people would be. I think there is something in that.

Now, we have increased the wages, maintained the same hours, and paid the cost of all these dynamitings and all these assaults—hundreds of them—and yet our people can erect steel from 20 to 30 per cent cheaper than they could under the old closed-shop system, and it is something which the public gets the direct benefit of in that decreased cost. Labor has the increased wages, the cost of erection has been lessened, and I see nothing but an economic advantage from the open-shop in the iron-erection industry.

Commissioner LENNON. Then, if you feel that way, you believe that the situation would be better if there were no unions in industry?

Mr. DREW. I believe—I have no objections to unions. No; I do not believe that. I don't see why, Mr. Lennon, a union has got to have absolute power of life and death over an industry in order to exist and to be done business with. I don't see why you can't go to any dry goods store down town and patronize it without patronizing it exclusively.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, if they do not continue the struggle they will soon give away their wages, their hours, and their conditions.

Mr. DREW. It has not been so in our industry. It has not been so with the metal trades.

Commissioner LENNON. Maybe; but I want to say, though, as a union man, for the record, instead of there being hatred and hostility toward the nonunion man, more than half of my time since I have been a union man, which is more than 40 years, has been devoted to trying to promote the interest of the non-union man; although I have been an official a great many years of my life, my experience is that that is true of nearly all the union men with whom I have been associated.

I want to ask a question: You spoke regarding the legal responsibility or irresponsibility because of not being incorporated, rather intimating that because of the lack of incorporation the unions were not legally responsible in any direction. Is it not true that members are guaranteed benefits, and all the other things guaranteed by the unions, and that they can bring suit and recover, and have done so?

Mr. DREW. In the States that provide that a voluntary association can sue and be sued in its own name; in other States, no.

Commissioner LENNON. I want to ask you one question in connection with a matter pertaining to the Ironworkers' case that I think has not come directly before the commission while I have been present. I want to say that it is a cause of tremendous unrest among the workers of this country who believe that John J. McNamara was extradited from Indianapolis and taken to California, not in accord with the law but the very opposite.

Mr. DREW. Do you want me to explain that?

Commissioner LENNON. What have you to say to that?

Mr. DREW. I was advised by long-distance telephone from Mr. Burns's office in Chicago that McManigal and J. B. McNamara were under arrest in Chicago. I went to Chicago. In Mr. Burns's office I met Mr. Ford, assistant prosecuting attorney of Los Angeles County. Mr. Ford had with him extradition papers signed by the governor of California for the extradition of J. B. McNamara and McManigal and J. J. McNamara. The extradition arrangements were made with the governor of Illinois. With that I had nothing to do. I went to Indianapolis with Mr. Ford and Mr. Burns. Mr. Burns was detailed to get in touch with the superintendent of police and make arrangements for the actual arrest of McNamara, after the proper warrant was secured from the governor of Indiana. Mr. Ford and myself called upon Gov. Marshall, stated the situation to him, showed him the extradition papers properly made out and signed by the governor of California. Gov. Marshall signed a warrant directing the arrest of J. J. McNamara. We took that warrant back to the superintendent of police and turned it over to him. J. J. McNamara was arrested under that warrant.

Under the extradition laws of the country, as I understand them, that was all that was necessary to constitute a legal extradition. The man appointed by the sheriff of Los Angeles County was present to take possession of Mr. McNamara after his arrest. The statute of Indiana provides that in extradition cases the man to be extradited, after arrest, shall be taken before a court and a hearing conducted for the purpose of determining whether he is the man described in the warrant. The superintendent of police said that the judge who usually took care of extradition cases was the police-court judge. On his own initiative he called up the police judge, who came down town and held court after the arrest of Mr. McNamara. Mr. McNamara was taken before this judge, and he was asked if he was the J. J. McNamara mentioned in the extradition warrant, and he said he was. Thereupon the police-court judge turned Mr. McNamara over to the State officer of California. Mr. McNamara asked for the privilege of a day or two to get affairs in order before being taken out of the State. The judge replied that so far as the State of Indiana was concerned the matter was now beyond its jurisdiction; that he had been arrested under a warrant of the governor and had been turned over to the officer of the State of California; and that the court had no further jurisdiction in the premises.

Commissioner LENNON. Had the court—

Mr. DREW (interrupting). Now, Mr. Burns and myself and a number of the rest of us were thereafter arrested for kidnapping Mr. McNamara, and the ground of our arrest was this, that Mr. McNamara should have been taken before a circuit court and not a police court for purposes of identification. There was no question but what he was the J. J. McNamara; no question but what the extradition papers were all right; no question but what the governor of Indiana had signed a warrant for his arrest. Only the incidental fact of identifying him as the man desired, which he admitted, was involved in that matter, and finally this whole Indiana statute was held void by the Federal court at Indianapolis.

Commissioner LENNON. At the time that the deportation took place under the law to which you refer, was that a court of competent jurisdiction to pass upon the question?

Mr. DREW. Mr. Lennon, we were in a hurry—

Commissioner LENNON. That is evident—

Mr. DREW. We said to the superintendent of police, "What is the court before whom extradition cases are taken?" and he said, "The police judge always handles them, and I will call him up over the phone." And he called him up, and that is all the discussion there was as to what court should handle the matter, or that Mr. McNamara should be taken before. And it developed afterwards that the police court generally and almost universally had assured jurisdiction of cases of extradition, and that no other court did generally do so.

Commissioner LENNON. Have you any knowledge of any other similar case in Indiana where the same judge passed upon the question of deportation and where, after the usual court hours, the judge went out of the usual order to come down town and open court for a specific case of this character?

Mr. DREW. No; I do not; and I will say to you frankly that this was Saturday, that by the time we got the warrant signed by the governor it was noon, and the courts closed at noon in Indianapolis, on Saturday, and whatever court come down would have had to be summoned for that special purpose.

Commissioner LENNON. The cause of unrest lies in this, Mr. Drew, that it is alleged that, and labor believes properly alleged, the undue haste and the way it was conducted deprived Mr. McNamara of rights that he was entitled to exercise through the courts.

Mr. DREW. Well, admitting the deprivation of the technical right, which I don't admit, Mr. McNamara later confessed that he was guilty of the crime of which he was charged. Does organized labor stand in the position of setting up mere technical defenses in the defense of men confessing themselves guilty?

Commissioner LENNON. No; they do not.

Mr. DREW. What is there to all of this argument but that?

Commissioner LENNON. They do contend that any legal right a man has the court could not deprive him of.

Mr. DREW. But legal rights are for the purpose of securing justice, and it would have been an injustice for Mr. McNamara to have asserted a technicality in Indiana, and thereby have escaped a trial in Los Angeles, and if organized labor had had its way and asserted that technicality successfully, it would have been a party to the escaping of Mr. McNamara from just prosecution and punishment.

Commissioner LENNON. That is not the way we see it.

Mr. DREW. It seems to me a pretty fundamental proposition, if organized labor wants to put itself in a position of fighting by technicalities in defense of men they know are guilty.

Commissioner LENNON. Then, there must have been technicalities used in order to prevent his having the opportunity of having technicalities, as far as he was concerned?

Mr. DREW. I have explained exactly what we did, and the governor of Indiana, and the former superintendent of police, and the judge, and all, will bear me out. There was no choice of this particular court, for any particular purpose. We simply followed out the regular procedure, and after it was all over, it developed that there was a technical question as to whether a police court judge in Indiana was a court of general jurisdiction, or something of that kind.

Commissioner LENNON. That is the kind of thing that causes labor to believe that they do not get a fair show in court. That all their rights can not be exercised, exactly the same as it could have been done if these men had been——

Mr. DREW (interrupting). I don't see much point to be made out of the McNamara case, for the reason that the police court judge was the one that generally took charge of extradition cases. The police always take them to him as a matter of course; the other courts have not been called upon to do that; his authority to do that has been unquestioned.

Commissioner LENNON. I have a different understanding of it.

Mr. DREW. No; that is a fact, Mr. Lennon; and if you will look the matter up in Indiana you will find it to be the fact.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Drew, you said you had in your papers the report made by Mr. Moffitt, the representative of the Department of Labor, in connection with the strike of the boiler makers?

Mr. DREW. Yes, sir; I have.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I wish you would file that, for the reason I have sent a verbatim copy of your testimony this morning to the Secretary of Labor.

Mr. DREW. I will say that I wrote a circular letter to our people some time ago, which was forwarded to the Secretary of Labor, stating exactly what I have said here, so he is familiar with all that I have said here.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I sent a copy of your statement to him this morning.

Mr. DREW. Shall I read this, or do you wish it in the record?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just file it.

Mr. DREW. He states specifically that the charges made are true.

(The document referred to and offered by the witness is printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Drew Exhibit No. 1.")

TESTIMONY OF MR. CLARENCE S. DARROW.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name.

Mr. DARROW. Clarence Darrow.

Chairman WALSH. And where do you reside?

Mr. DARROW. Chicago.

Chairman WALSH. What is your profession, please?

Mr. DARROW. Lawyer.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you practiced law?

Mr. DARROW. About 37 years.

Chairman WALSH. How long in the city of Chicago?

Mr. DARROW. Twenty-eight or thirty years.

Chairman WALSH. Have you during the course of your professional career had to do specially with labor cases or with cases growing out of industrial disputes?

Mr. DARROW. I have had a good many of them.

Chairman WALSH. You might state, if you can, the professional connection you had with any labor organizations.

Mr. DARROW. I have never represented them only on occasions. I have never been the general attorney of any of them.

Chairman WALSH. You got the general outline of this hearing; that is, the application of the law in labor matters and the attitude of courts in industrial disputes and the fundamental underlying question has been couched differently, and different phases, and do you think that the laws are equally administered between the rich and the poor?

Mr. DARROW. I think they are not.

Chairman WALSH. Now, can you give your own comment and illustration to back up that statement?

Mr. DARROW. To my own satisfaction; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Try it on Commissioner Weinstock and myself.

Mr. DARROW. I might not convince him; I might have a little better luck with you. The law is made by the acts of legislatures and Congress and decisions of courts. Most all the law is made from court decisions. Legislation is a small part of it. The first trouble is that all the men that make the laws are lawyers, and they are what we call good lawyers—that is, lawyers who get good fees—who have no sympathy with any union except the lawyers' union. Their associations are all with the rich. Their clients are all on that side; they have no knowledge of the questions that confront the poor. If they ever knew anything about them, they have forgotten them, and on any question that arises their whole feeling and whole life is on the other side. Members of Congress and legislatures are pretty nearly all lawyers who have had good practices. If they have not had, they expect to have, and good practice for a lawyer means working for the rich. Judges are all lawyers, and lawyers of standing in their profession. Most of them have been corporation lawyers, and those that have not been hope to be, and their opinions are governed by their views of life.

Men do not act from logic and reason but from impulse. Any man with good intellect can give a good reason for anything he wants to say, and his opinion on either side of the case he is on is always logical if the court is an able man. He first makes up his mind what he wants to do and then gives a good reason for doing it, and if the law had been made by carpenters and shoemakers and day laborers it would have been different from what it is. It would have represented their side of it, perhaps, not any more fairly, but their side. The whole law has been made and administered by the controlling force of society, like everything else in this world, and it could not be any other way. I could give illustrations of it now.

Chairman WALSH. Now, we have called you in, Mr. Darrow, as one from the field of life, as it were, who has had much to do with actual contact with courts and juries and the administration of law, and we have had academic gentlemen here, law writers and students, and people that have given it a great deal of thought, and we are drawing them now from the field of conflict, as it were, and we would like to have you give us any comment that you can that will enlighten us on this subject, and do it in your own way. Give us any illustrations that you can that are pertinent growing out of your actual experience.

Mr. DARROW. Why, here are some as I have observed them, and I think they are.

Reference has been made here to the Debs case, for instance, by Mr. Davenport. I believe, who represented the other side of these questions. First, he did not state his facts right, and next he does not state the law right. The witness who just left the stand referred to the McNamara case, and in that he said that McNamara, by whom he means J. J. McNamara, the secretary of the Bridge and Structural Iron Workers, was arrested in Indianapolis, and it did not make any difference whether he was legally transported or not, that he afterwards pleaded guilty; which is not true. Mr. McNamara was arrested on a warrant charging him with murder, for the blowing up, or setting a bomb in the Times Building, and a fire resulted from that causing the death of a number of people. He did not plead guilty to that charge. He did afterwards plead guilty to a charge of having placed dynamite under the Llewellyn Iron Co.'s Works, for which he had not been indicted until he reached California. Neither does he state the legal proposition right. Whether they had a technical right, whether it was simply a technical right as to whether or not McNamara was to be taken 2,000 miles away to be tried or not, it was a right, and it was a substantial right to anybody, for instance, that lives in Washington, whether he is going to be tried here at home, or taken to Germany or France or Lower California. It is a technical right, but a legal right, but perhaps involves his whole case. Mr. McNamara was arrested and kidnapped. A police judge was called at a late hour on Saturday night, a police judge who had no jurisdiction in his case, and, of course, the courts would have been opened Monday, there is no question about that. He was arrested in that way and taken in that way, so he could not resort to the courts, nothing else. It is not a correct statement of law that the only thing the court had to do was to inquire if he was the right man and there was a requisition. The court had the right to pass on the primary question, whether he was a fugitive from justice and he was not a fugitive from justice. A fugitive from justice is one that commits a crime and runs away, and J. J. McNamara had never been in California.

Chairman WALSH. Is that the legal test, that at the time of the commission of the alleged crime he was in the State?

Mr. DARROW. He must be in the State at the time of the commission of the crime, or he can not be extradited under the law. He may be kidnaped. If there was ever a charge of murder against J. J. McNamara, or a charge such as he pleaded guilty to, as having planted dynamite at the Llewellyn Iron Works, if that charge was one which could be prosecuted at all, it could only have been prosecuted in Indianapolis, Ind., where he lived. Whether it could or could not, I can not give an opinion, because I am not certain about it.

But if the State or Government were entitled to try him they were bound to try him where he lived and not take him 2,000 miles away from home, and that is a substantial right. He was taken to California. That was not the first time it was done. Moyer, Haywood, and Pettibone were arrested in Colorado charged with the crime of murder in Idaho; they were arrested on Saturday night also, which is a favored time of arresting labor men, long after dark, and long after the courts were closed. They were loaded on a train and taken to Idaho. Under the law they could not have been taken to Idaho, and if they were guilty they should have been tried where they lived, and there is a mighty sight of difference between trying a man at home and in a hostile country. They were taken to Idaho, and the question was raised that the State of Idaho had no right to try them because they had been kidnapped, and did not get there by due process of law. That case was taken to the Supreme Court of the United States by writ of habeas corpus, and the Supreme Court of the United States held that they had no right to take them, and that they were kidnapped, but they were there, and since they were there it was none of the business of the Supreme Court to inquire how they got there. And in that opinion Justice McKenna dissented, but no judge, as far as I know, and I think I am familiar with the cases, has ever held that you had a right to extradite a man unless he was present in the State when the crime was committed, bodily present. Both these cases were entirely different, and still they were tried.

Commissioner LENNON. Before leaving those cases, please tell us how they are a cause of social unrest.

Mr. DARROW. Why, I think pretty much all working people think that they do not get a fair show in the courts of the land, and these cases are common cases that are pointed to as examples of it.

The Debs case, which in a measure was discussed the other day, is another case in which I happened to take a part. Eugene V. Debs was the president of the American Railway Union, and a strike was called by that organization, I think, some time in 1893—I am not sure of the date. It tied up the railroads of the country, especially of the West. The strikers stated various grievances. The American Railway Union consisted of members in all lines of railway employment, and, of course, the railway service was pretty well paralyzed because of it. Anticipating this kind of action, the railroad companies had formed a general managers' association, which consisted of one member from each of the great railroads of the West, and perhaps of the East, whose business it was to deal with labor difficulties.

I am not criticizing their purpose at all. They anticipated this and got ready for it and opened headquarters as soon as the strike came on.

Their attorney was Edwin Walker, one of the ablest lawyers we ever had in Chicago, who for years had been general counsel of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co. When the strike occurred Mr. Walker went to what is called the Department of Justice and laid his troubles before them, and the Department of Justice immediately appointed him to represent the Department of Justice. It is hardly conceivable that they would have appointed Mr. Debs's attorney to represent the Department of Justice, but they did appoint Edwin Walker, and he filed the bill against Mr. Debs and his associates, signing it as "Assistant Attorney General," which he was, although he never represented anything but the railroads and represented them all through the case.

He filed a bill to enjoin the strikers, and he likewise went into the court and had them indicted for the very same act. That injunction was granted, not by Judge Fuller, as Mr. Davenport stated, but by Judge Woods, of Indiana. The case came on for trial, and Justice Woods sent Mr. Debs to jail for violating the injunction, and the facts he found was that he violated the injunction because violence and force had been used in the strike and that Mr. Debs was responsible for the violence and force, although there was not a scrap of evidence in the case that Mr. Debs ever raised his hand in any way or gave any orders or directions excepting that the men conduct themselves peaceably and not destroy property or interfere with the law. But he did hold that Mr. Debs had started it, and therefore he was responsible for the consequences.

Afterwards the case came on for trial in the Federal court, under the indictment, where the exact facts were applied on trial before a jury, and after fighting that case for six weeks or more we were told that a juror was taken ill—I never knew whether he was or not—but, anyway, we offered to go on with 11 jurors, and they refused, and the case was continued because the juror was taken ill. We demanded a trial again, and rather than try the case the Government dismissed the criminal case on exactly the same facts.

We went to the Supreme Court of the United States for a writ of habeas corpus on the civil case, in the Debs case, and the Supreme Court of the United States did not pass on the question of whether Debs had been guilty of the act—but, as the chairman here understands at least, it was a question of purely of jurisdiction as to whether a bill had been filed before the Federal judge, which gave him jurisdiction of the case, and they held that it had. Mr. Debs was sent to jail for six months—the first time the courts had found a case where the Sherman antitrust law would operate. It would not operate on any of the various corporation cases that had been before the courts before, but here it did.

After it was amended—after many years of agitation, they pronounced the Standard Oil Co. an illegal combination and a violator of the same act, and they gave them six months, not in jail, but six months to amend their charter, so they could do the same things over again, and their stock is worth more and they get more money out of the people than they ever did before the Supreme Court declared them an illegal combination.

Those are some of the facts that every intelligent workingman knows, and what is true of the Standard Oil Co. is also true of the Tobacco Trust and pretty much every combination that has been prosecuted.

The whole business of injunction in labor matters has grown up in a few years; within the memory of all of us. I think perhaps in the railroad strike of 1893 about the first one was issued; possibly one somewhat before that against Arthur. Before that time the courts of chancery had universally held they were only interested in property, and that they would not use a court of chancery to interfere with personal relations, or that they would not use a court of chancery where a court of law could be used, or to interfere where the charge was the commission of what amounted to a crime; but gradually during these labor strikes they have enlarged the powers of the courts of chancery in that direction until they have held that an injunction may be issued against strikers, making service by publication in newspapers, and by posting it upon telegraph poles, or anywhere else, binding everybody, whether they are parties to it or not; and that a man may be tried without a jury; he may be sentenced to prison without any hearing, if necessary, upon affidavit. We have had them sentenced in Chicago where no witnesses appeared on either side, simply on affidavit, and they were sent to jail. Everybody that knows anything about affidavits know that they are easy to get, and under that power the courts have enjoined strikers from quitting collectively on the ground that that was a boycott or use of force; they have enjoined them from committing acts of violence; they have enjoined them from sympathetic strikes where one body of men goes out to help another; they have enjoined them from levying assessments to get money to feed the wives and children of those who are on strike, and they have practically said that they must work unless the courts gave them permission to stop.

And that whole law as to injunctions has grown up—oh, in 20 years at least—until there is not a well-informed lawyer to-day who dares advise anybody as to what the law is on injunction. You do not know. It depends on what the judge is going to say, and the reason for it all is that judges act from their feelings, as all of us do. I am on the one side, some other man is on the other side; it is no use to try to convert you by argument; no one cares anything about that. The instincts and intuition are the moving power with all of us, and that is the way the law has grown up.

If we could get the people on the other side of these questions to make the law a while it would be different, but that is out of the question; the rules of our lawyers' union are too strict for that. Before a man can be a lawyer he must have had at least a high-school education, which carries him along toward 20 years of age; then he has to study law three years after that, which carries him along so that after that most of the poor people are barred; and it is quite a while after that before he can get on the bench, and it is simply natural gravitation which no one can help.

Take another branch of the law that has borne as hard upon the working people as anything else—take personal injury cases. Switchmen perhaps have a chance to live six or seven years and keep all of their more important members intact; ironworkers perhaps the same time; I would not be sure about the figures. When one of them gets hurt, he may have been careless at the time he got hurt; but when we lawyers are careless we do not fall down from the top of a 20-story building, we stumble over and get up again; but it is death to the switchman or the man on top of the building. Sooner or later everybody is careless. A man is careless and he gets hurt, or he is not careless and he gets hurt; he gets a leg cut off by a steam engine and is brought into court. The judges say, "No; you can not recover; you assumed the risk. If you had had any sense you would not have been a switchman, you would have been a banker."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Does that hold equally when workmen's compensation laws are in force?

Mr. DARROW. I am going to get to that in a minute; I will cover that.

They will say: "True, you got hurt, but it was not the railroad corporation that was to blame; it was the train dispatcher who gave the wrong order 500 miles away; and if he had given the right order you would have got through, so you can not recover; it is the act of a fellow servant."

We always go back to find out the law, and when we go back we find that in 1815, which is the date of the Battle of Waterloo, which is the only way I remember it, two men were employed driving a butcher's cart in England; the butcher had two men going out to sell meat on the road. In the morning one of the fellows greased up the axle of the wagon, and in putting the wheels back on forgot to put on the nut, and they got on the wagon and started off, and after they had driven a ways the wheel ran off, and the fellow that did not know anything about it got hurt and sued his employer. The case came on for trial, and the employer no doubt had the best lawyer; the case was argued, and the judges decided that where two men worked together for a common master public policy required that they shall know each others habits, and if one of them is not a safe man the other fellow ought to tell the master and have him fired, or else quit himself and open a law office or something like that.

And that law has been repeated and enforced by the decisions of courts for a hundred years, until it is the law that if a train dispatcher in Pittsburgh gives the wrong order which causes a train to go wrong and kill a trackman in Washington, that that is the act of a fellow servant; and in the case of a company like the Pennsylvania Railroad that employs 200,000 men, every employee ought to know all about the character of every other employee, which would not leave him much time for his work.

The reason for the law has entirely disappeared in a hundred years. There were no railroads in existence then and there were no factories in existence such as we speak of now, and no one knew about the application of steam.

The modern world has been made over, but lawyers still apply the old precedent until people outside of the law take a hand; all of the reforms in the law have come from the people outside, the same as all reforms in medicine have come from others than doctors. And they finally became so shocked over it that in many States within the last few years, probably within five or six years, they have changed the law of fellow servants and the law of assumed risk; and in many States they are getting an employers' liability act which gives a man in most of the States for a leg something like, oh, I should say, $1,000; the workmen's compensation law fixes a regular table—so much for the phalangeal of a finger, so much for the second, and so much for the third; and while it is very inadequate I think it is a law along the right line and will probably be worked out. That is quite common in many States, but through all these years, by these decisions and others, the employer has had all the best of it.

If the lawyers had been lined up right in 1815, the court might have said that an employer who hires a man ought to be responsible for the kind of man he hires, rather than the other fellow, who did not have anything to do with hiring him; but they did not decide it that way. They decided it the other way, and this is the natural evolution of the law.

Then, it takes lawyers to get legal rights. For instance, a bill of rights in Illinois says every man shall have redress for every grievance that he suffers, and then he goes on with another clause which says—but no one pays any attention to it—it says he must have it immediately and without expense. That is in the constitution of Illinois and the constitution of most of the States; but if a man loses a leg by the negligence of a steam railroad and brings suit in Chicago it is two years before he gets a trial; and then, if he happens to win, which he probably wont, then it is appealed to the appellate or supreme court. If he loses, he can not go any further himself, because he can not afford it; but if he wins, it goes there and takes two years more. That is four years. Then, if he and his family are alive they spend half of it for lawyers and court expenses, while the constitution says he shall have a remedy immediately and without cost. And that is true everywhere; the poor man can not get into court with any kind of safety.

Chairman WALSH. Are judges usually qualified by education and experience to decide upon economic and social questions brought before them in labor cases?

Mr. DARROW. Well, they do not pass any examination in that; they are just examined in the law; they are qualified to look up decisions of courts to see what the decisions are; but as to economics, they have not got time to do that; they are studying law.

Chairman WALSH. How is the institution of law meeting the present economic and social questions that seem to be predominant at this day?

Mr. DARROW. Holding them back as hard as it can, and it always has. The law essentially goes back to the old things; it is a creature of precedent. If they want to know what the law is, they want to see what some other judge has done a long ways back; and that applies now. The industrial world is made over; the world of medicine is made over. A doctor who would take a prescription book of 25 years ago and go out and practice on his patient under that authority would be tried for murder; but the farther a lawyer goes back for precedents the better he finds it established.

Chairman WALSH. Dr. Goodnow suggested the other day that perhaps the time for legal study should be extended and instruction taken by applicants or intending practitioners along economic and social lines. What would you say about that? Dr. Goodnow, you know, is a constitutional lawyer and president of the Johns Hopkins University?

Mr. DARROW. Yes; he is an able man. I know about him. Why, if you could extend the course and have them belong to a labor union and work as a switchman for several years and work in a structural iron works, then, if they were alive and got through, that would help; but to extend the course for them to study law would simply make them worse.

Chairman WALSH. Dr. Goodnow, in answer to a question asked by Mr. Lennon, said that it would not be desirable to have them work in workshops.

Mr. DARROW. Well, he must be a lawyer.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think of any plan by which economical and social advice could be given to judges who are not otherwise equipped for the settlement of these questions that are constantly coming up now, like minimum-wage laws and laws limiting the hours of labor, and so forth? I ask that question growing out of the suggestion made in the Oregon and other questions where outside lawyers intervened and who had also given study to such subjects and gathered data for judges?

Mr. DARROW. Why, these questions we are discussing are the most important questions of the day, and any man who has any feeling or imagination is interested in them and will know something about them. But the trouble with lawyers is, that, like everybody else, it is a profession, a business, and they want to make money out of it, or get in office, and they have to stick close to the ordained thing, and they have to make money where there is money. We really haven't any system for the establishment of justice, we have courts but all the courts do is to give a forum for lawyers to try cases, that is all. Courts do not look up the law, they take no hand in the trial, and the different lawyers on the different sides enter into a combat to see who can win, and in the combat, of course, the man who has been able to get the best lawyers, going on down through the ages, consistently prevails, the decision in one case being the starting point in another case, and all the time the strong force pressing against the weaker force until it has made the law entirely lopsided.

I do not know any way under that system, which is the system of the common law of America—I do not know any way that it can be changed. If we had courts to inquire into matters, to settle things without lawyers, to examine facts, and examine law so as to get at justice, something might be done.

But you take an ordinary case, and two lawyers go in, the corporation generally having the most successful lawyer, and the best talent that they can, against the poor fellow with a leg off, having an inferior lawyer, perhaps his first case. They fight it out. If that occurred in the prize ring, and you led out a dwarf to fight a man like Jack Johnson, the crowd would not stand for it, and yet it occurs every day in court—a constant pressure. One thing furnishes the basis for another until property rights have become nearly the whole thing.

Chairman WALSH. To what extent, if any, are the interests of poor persons prejudiced by the selection of jurors, or have you given any attention to that?

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir. Of course, the different States have different laws as to that. Federal courts—they are only chosen from the well known in the community—politicians and people who have some standing, some class about them. Not the people who work. Then, of course, in our Federal courts the judge is the whole thing, anyway. The jurors, they very readily find out what the judge thinks about a case, and most all of them unload it on the judge, and say, "I couldn't do anything else under the instructions they gave us." You never yet got beaten in the Federal court but what the jurors came and told you that they wanted to find your way, but they couldn't do it because the judge said so and so.

In the State courts—there are some States where every juror's name as it appears on the poll books, or every person's name as it appears on the poll books goes in, and from the whole the juror is drawn indiscriminately. That gives a workingman a jury not prejudiced against him, sometimes prejudiced for him. In our State we have a jury commissioner who picks out the jurors, in Chicago at least, and very carefully examines the list and looks over their occupation, and we find as a rule a large number of foremen and clerks and very few working people. It is a good deal safer to try a case before an employer than his clerk. In many States there is a property qualification for jury service, which, of course, makes it more or less a class proposition, but so far as it can be done every citizen ought to be drawn impartially for jury service. This helps the workingman and he gets a fair standing in court.

Chairman WALSH. What would be your suggestion with regard to that; that is, the man that possibly insists on the administration of justice should disturb themselves?

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Has it not been taken up by workers generally, the fact that they are, if it is true as you stated, discriminated against in the selection of jurors. Is it not a sort of basis where justice or triers of facts is concerned?

Mr. DARROW. It has not been taken up very much, but in some cases. Sometimes the better-paid workingmen, as we call them, are in a way to blame for it. The workingman gets from three to four or five dollars a day, always poor at that, can not afford to do the jury service for $2 a day. It is a very serious handicap to them, and they often get excused, where they might otherwise serve. And the lower paid workingman seldom gets on a jury, although they sometimes do. It could be remedied somewhat by paying more to jurors, but it is an important question, I think, in the administration of justice.

Chairman WALSH. Do you find a reluctance in everyday practice and everyday observation on the part of labor organizations, as well as individual workers, to present their grievances to the courts of the country for judicial determination?

Mr. DARROW. I never knew anybody that wanted to get into a court but lawyers. Farmers are taught to stay out or lose their property; mechanics and business men and everybody are taught to stay out. It is regarded as cumbersome and expensive and a wholly unsatisfactory tribunal. Workingmen, of course, in their labor disputes feel that they have no chance as a rule; not before juries, however, because many times they have the best of it before juries. Take a criminal case, where it is a question of a labor organization, and you get a jury of trade-unionists, they will probably stand by him, and the other fellow would go the other way, neither paying much attention to the facts, but each going for their side. That is human nature.

Chairman WALSH. I am calling your attention to what might be called guaranteed constitutional personal rights and ask you to make whatever comment you might have to make on the conservation of these rights by law or the lack of it. For instance, first, the trial by jury. Is it being observed?

Mr. DARROW. Well, in labor cases constitutional provisions have been absolutely nullified. For instance, a court can issue an injunction against a strike or anybody engaged in it, which would only enjoin them from committing unlawful acts, and if they do the act it is a crime, but in order to escape the right of the defendant to have a jury determine whether he commits a crime or not, the court won't try him for the committing of the crime but try him for disobeying his order not to commit it, which amounts to the same thing if a man is in jail, but it is legal under the law.

I noticed Mr. Davenport's statement of the proposition, which, of course, he did not state correctly, the other day in reference to the Debs case and Mr. Gompers's case. They went into the court defending an injunction on the ground that the court of chancery had no jurisdiction and thereby confessed that they were criminals. I believe he said infamous criminals, a different kind, perhaps. But no such thing ever happened. What they did say was, "You charge me with being a criminal and therefore I want a jury to pass on it," rather than you. They didn't admit it in either case.

Chairman WALSH. As to the personal right to the writ of habeas corpus, is that being conserved, from your observation, or not?

Mr. DARROW. Courts have great reluctance to grant a writ of habeas corpus. Once in a while they do it. The trouble with the writ of habeas corpus, like everything else, is it is such an easy matter to get around it if you want to. It is not hard for a court, any more than for you and me, to decide a thing the way we want to decide it. It is perfectly easy, and we give excellent reasons for it, just as I do for my views of the law, but if a court thinks that a writ of habeas corpus should not be granted in a particular case, it is easy to conjure up any number of technical reasons against it, and then it is impossible for the poor man to get into court. The ordinary man that is in jail has no money or he would not be there. He is poor. You go through the jails in this country and you can hardly find money enough to hire a lawyer, and he can not get into court with a writ of habeas corpus or anything else. No jailer comes around and tells him, "I think I could get you a writ and I will get it for you"; but he sits there, and if he does get a lawyer it is somebody that has been looking him up, and he is generally better off without him.

It is the administration of the law which is all on the other side.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention been called to the specific violation of that alleged—or specific alleged violations of that writ in cases where the military was called into the district?

Mr. DARROW. Of course there is no such writ when there is the militia. As a witness said the other day, "The Constitution provides for it, but that don't help the fellow any." Any governor can declare martial law when he wants to, or the President of the United States. I believe the court issued a writ of habeas corpus for Mrs. Surratt before she was executed in Washington, but he couldn't deliver it—the military authorities took her away and tried her before court-martial. In West Virginia the courts are all right perhaps, but the governor declared military law, and there were no courts. In Colorado, not also recently but in the strike of the Western Federation of Miners, they at once declared martial law.

Chairman WALSH. What became of the constitutional provision, for instance, in Colorado and perhaps in West Virginia, I am not so familiar with that, which provides that the military law shall always be subordinate to the civil power, and in the case of Colorado the governor issued no proclamation of martial law.

Mr. DARROW. As I recall the Moyer case, I am not very clear on it, they held that while they had not really declared martial law that in effect they had. It was simply a way of getting away from it.

Chairman WALSH. In everyday practice of a man that is deprived of his liberty rightfully or wrongfully, has he access to a writ of habeas corpus, and is it generally used?

Mr. DARROW. It is almost impossible to use the writ of habeas corpus. In the first place, a court, under writ of habeas corpus, takes notice only of the record. The thing is, have you made a paper case against the man. He takes no note of the fact, and any lawyer of fair attainment can write a paper or file an information or draw an indictment that is good on its face. It goes to the face of the case, whether the papers are true, barring the case of extradition that I mentioned a while ago.

Chairman WALSH. I was going to ask you was Joseph McNamara entitled by right, or under the Constitution, to the writ of habeas corpus?

Mr. DARROW. There can be no kind of question about it. The reason he was taken out of Indianapolis on Saturday night was so he could not get to the courts. He asked for a lawyer and they would not give him one.

Chairman WALSH. I have left the subject I was discussing to ask you that question, but now, going back: What is the basis and reason for the right of trial in the district, or in a man's own community? Where does it come from, the right to be tried in his own community, or what is the basis of it?

Mr. DARROW. That is as old as the common law; it comes from England, and I don't know but from way back in Germany. A man has some friends, some standing, perhaps his reputation, if he has any, in that community. It is a community where he can defend himself, his witnesses may all be there and he can't get them some place else; he can't take them 2,000 miles if he is poor, and for that reason a man is entitled to a trial in the vicinity where he lives.

Chairman WALSH. Ought it to be looked upon as a mere technical right?

Mr. DARROW. It is about the most substantial right.

Chairman WALSH. Going back to this question of guaranteed personal rights, I wish you would say from experience in courts generally, the class of cases that you have been in and observed, whether the constitutional right of free speech and free press is carefully conserved by the law and the courts?

Mr. DARROW. Every provision means nothing, when you come to have them interpreted. For instance, the Constitution says every man may bear arms, but a city ordinance in a town of 2,000 people can pass a law sending a man to jail for having a pistol. The Constitution of the United States says he may have them. The right of free speech is hemmed in, and legislated in by every village council, and by every State legislature, and by the Federal Government, until it simply means you have a right to speak if you say what we want you to say, and the right to publish comes to about the same thing. Whether a piece of literature is obscene depends on Anthony Comstock; whether it is revolutionary depends upon the courts that have been educated along the line, believing that almost any kind of talk against existing things is revolutionary. Nobody can tell what they will hold on the question. It is out of the question to tell. The constitutional guaranties, where you do find them working, is when it reaches property.

Chairman WALSH. I was just going to come to that. Could this not be worked out under a proper administration of the law so that due process of law would mean that a man could not be deprived of his right to speak, or right to trial by jury, and other rights? In other words, could that guaranty of right of due process of law be extended to personal rights to be invaded?

Mr. DARROW. It could if the courts and lawyers didn't find some way to get around it after a while. Legislatures could do it and Congress could do it. They have done it, but we find it easy to get around it, and while they are constantly limiting the constitutional provisions that protect the individual, they are constantly increasing those that protect property. For instance, we have a constitutional provision that where a person sues a citizen of another State, he can go into the United States court, because they are citizens of different States. The theory of that is perfectly plain. That was done because a man who would be at home amongst his friends would be supposed to have a better chance, and if citizens of two different States are involved, they go into the Federal court where they stand equally. But the courts have held that the word "citizen" applies to corporations. Of course, a corporation is nothing but an intangible business created by the law, but they say a corporation is a citizen within that amendment, and a body of high-finance men in Chicago get an organization to run the street cars in the city of Chicago, every one living in Chicago, and organize under the laws of New Jersey, which issues letters of marque and reprisal in commerce and calls them charters, and a man sues the street car company in Chicago, it is a foreign corporation and you immediately go to the Federal court.

Chairman WALSH. What does he want to go before the Federal court for?

Mr. DARROW. Because judges in Federal courts are appointed for life or during good behavior, and they always behave and never die. The idea of the Federal court does not depend on lawyers like me, whose sympathies are with the working people, but there is not a corporation lawyer in the United States that doesn't go there when he can; not one. You never heard of a corporation lawyer that didn't move a case to the Federal court the first chance he gets, invariably, because they are sure that their chances to win are greater.

Chairman WALSH. To what extent are boycotts legal?

Mr. DARROW. I don't think anybody knows; you have to get at your boycott, and then get a decision of the court on it to define it, whether it is legal or not, but boycotts ought to be legal; there is no reason why a man can refuse to trade with any man because he doesn't like his religion, or why he need not work with another man because he don't like the color of his hair, or due to a mere whim; if he is going to be free, he can and should. Of course, the boycott has fallen into disrepute because it has been used by working people, but it has a very distinguished and respectable history. In this country, at the time of the Revolutionary War, the revolutionists got together and boycotted every Tory there was in the country, not only boycotted them, but hanged them, drove them out of the country and settled Nova Scotia with bankers and preachers and lawyers. They refused to buy goods made in England, and refused to associate with anybody that bought goods made in England, and now, of course, the great-grandsons and great-granddaughters of the American Revolution are sending people to jail for boycotts. The boycott has been used in good causes and was respectable until the common people came to use it. It may be a drastic means, but we use it in society. Everybody is boycotted, some for being good citizens and some for being bad, but it simply means that people in this world choose their kind, and they do it unjustly many times, but they have a right to do it, or should have a right to do it. I think in the main—I don't know what I do think about it. They have said everything about it. A fellow that starts a boycott, he has to take a chance; maybe the court will say it is legal, maybe they won't.

I don't hear of many of the other people being prosecuted. There is not a corporation of any great strength scarcely but that will refuse to sell goods if a little merchant buys some goods of its rival. Over and over again they do that and nobody pays any attention to that. "Take our goods or leave them alone. You can't take part unless you take all." All of us are in the boycott business.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed to what extent private guards and detectives are used in the industrial disturbances?

Mr. DARROW. Yes; I have observed a good many of them.

Chairman WALSH. I would like you to give us an idea, if you can, of the extent and method of such uses?

Mr. DARROW. Well, it is safe to say that there is no great labor organization in the country that is not full of detectives—full of them. There are employment agencies whose whole business is to furnish union men to work in labor organizations. There are over and over again officers of unions, secretaries, treasurers, presidents, who are detectives. There is hardly anybody who dares speak to his neighbor, no matter how closely he is associated with him, without fearing that he might be turned up, whatever he says, and that his statements might be lied about. I know in the trial of the Haywood case in Idaho we had one man closely associated with us who at the last minute developed to be a detective who was in the employ of the other side all the while. We had a number of detectives in the office; have them in every great trial; and we use them when we can on the other fellow, but they have the best chance.

Of course, the private gunmen, everybody, I think, knows about that. There is a firm down here in New Jersey that is a common example of it. I had occasion to go over a lot of affidavits made by people in Michigan during the copper strike—affidavits of men who were appointed as guards or officers in Michigan and must be citizens of that State. Those men had been appointed first in West Virginia, then in Kansas City, then in Chicago, and then in Michigan; going right around all the way wherever they were used, where they were wanted, sent here and there.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed any feeling or unrest on the part of workers on account of delay in securing legislative enactments for their own relief? A question arose here the other day on a statement made by Mr. Johannsen to the effect that efforts had been made for 21 years to secure a seamen's bill before there was one secured. I am not familiar with the provisions, but the general provisions, he said, were simply to release the seaman from what might be termed a condition of slavery, and to give him an opportunity to express himself, to work out his own salvation, I believe he said.

Mr. DARROW. Yes; I understand that bill. I am not very familiar with it, but I understood from what Mr. Johannsen said and what I have heard of it and what Mr. Weinstock here said in asking him the questions, that it was a bill which permitted seamen to leave their job whenever they wanted to do so—that is, in a port; simply leaving them free. And I know they have been working some generations to get that bill—just to have a right to freedom.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a history connected with efforts to get other legislation of a similar nature?

Mr. DARROW. I used to know a good deal of details of it and have forgotten a good deal of what I did know about it and some of the rest is vague. But I think it took 16 years to get a safety-appliance bill for the railroads, so as to get rid of the man-killer coupling and couple cars automatically. Then it took about as long to get it enforced afterwards.

Chairman WALSH. What causes this delay?

Mr. DARROW. Why the vested interests—the people making money out of it. Of course, in some instances no doubt it takes time to equip and get ready, but everybody opposes everything that will cut down profits. That is the first thing. One of the commissioners said they had a doubt as to whether that seamen's bill should have gone through, because it might interfere with our competing with Japan. Now, I don't know. I would not examine that question at all. I should say if the American merchant marine could not live without making slaves out of the sailors, better let all of the ships rot in the harbor or be sent to the bottom of the ocean. There is not a single move made along this line that they do not say, "You can't do it. You can't shorten the hours of labor. You can't keep children out of the factories, because otherwise it will interfere with the profits," as it will. But that's not a matter of any importance.

Chairman WALSH. In your observation is there a general feeling of industrial unrest in the country?

Mr. DARROW. Oh, I think there is no doubt about that.

Chairman WALSH. Among the workers?

Mr. DARROW. No doubt about it at all; about that at all.

Chairman WALSH. What are the principal causes of it?

Mr. DARROW. Well, of course, life is unrest. It is idle to talk about curing unrest, because when you get it cured you are dead. It is the aspiration of people for power and to live; that is the cause. And you can not cure anything in this world. You can only help along to new adjustments and better adjustments. Of course, the great mass of people who are interested in a social question will not stop to analyze accurately. They see a few facts, just enough that they know, for instance, here is all the oil there is in the earth owned by one great corporation; they know that 8 or 10 railroad lines exist between Chicago and New York, but the rate of fare is the same on each except they permit a differential among themselves on passengers. And they know that perhaps a dozen men in the United States are influential enough to shut down the wheels of industry when they want to; and they know the coal mines are owned by a few people; and they know if you get a job you have got to get it from the fellows who have things, and that the great mass of men are poor and struggling along, in debt, hard up, can't get their teeth filled, and can't get anything that the rest of us get; that's about all they do know; and that's enough to know. And there will always be unrest as long as that exists, and if you cure it why they will get restless about something else, of course.

Chairman WALSH. What would be your suggested remedy to relieve the situation? But before you leave that do you think the wage question bears upon it in any way?

Mr. DARROW. Certainly; certainly. The men who see that others get so much more than they do are not satisfied with their wages. They don't live as well. So long as the fellows who do the work of the world live the poorest and the fellows who don't do it get all the good things of the world they are not satisfied, and they would not be if they were fit to live at all. And there is a constant effort to increase wages.

Of course, what you are going to do for it, that is harder. That is what this commission is for—to find out. I presume we will know after you get through, but it's hard to know what to do.

So far as any help for this generation or the next generation, the most substantial things are the organizations of labor. There have never been anything else that I know anything about which has stood back of the working people, excepting their organizations. Otherwise, they stand alone and have no power whatever to make a bargain. Talk about collective bargaining, there is no use for the individual to bargain any more. The Pennsylvania Railroad employs 200,000 men. Suppose they are not organized and one man should go there and say, "I think it is about time for you to raise my wages as a switchman." What do you suppose he would hear? They would say, "I think it is about time for you to quit your job." If there is no organization there is no bargaining at all. They simply post their schedule up there on the wall and say we will give you so much an hour and so much a month. Take it or let it alone as you please and go on about your business. But the railroad men have got to get together as the railroads get together. But if they are organized and say, "If we can't have this or that there won't any of us work," then there is a chance to bargain. Of course, they might do something by law, but there is not much chance to effect anything by law. Our Government is so medieval in its construction and its institutions that there isn't any chance for the people to be heard from.

It does not seem like a system of Government like ours could be got up by design. It is a lot of stupendous blunders. Suppose the working people wanted to get some law that really substantially affected things. How are they going to get it? Well, you have first got to get it through Congress perhaps. Congress is made up of a body of men from all over the country, elected for two years, and taking seat a year after they are elected and have had time to forget everything; and then if you win there you have got to get it through the Senate, and that is made up of fellows who have their seats for six years, two-thirds of them elected on some other issue entirely. And if you get it through the Senate, then it has got to be signed by the President, and he is elected for four years on some other question, and you have got to get all three, and get all three at once, or else you are lost. You can't get all three by getting one this year and then one the next year, and so on. You have got to get it all at the same time. Then if you have been able to get it through Congress and signed by the President—which you won't—then there is the Constitution. Then you have got to inquire whether John Hancock or some of the rest of them told us whether we could do it a hundred years ago, and, if not, it is all off. And the only way you can tell what the Constitution says—you can't read it and tell; nobody can tell—you have got to ask the Supreme Court, and there are nine judges there for life, and most of them old men who are clear out of this generation; and you have got to do it all and get it all at once and—well, the only way you can get along with it is to not think about it.

Commissioner LENNON. What is your view as to the authority of courts under the Constitution or under legal enactment to pass upon the unconstitutionality of laws?

Mr. DARROW. Why, it is not given to them anywhere; it is not necessary; they have got it.

Commissioner LENNON. It is a usurped power?

Mr. DARROW. Oh, well, lawyers have all kinds of theories. They say that the Constitution is part of the organic law of the land, and the judges have to decide what the organic law is, and therefore they take it into consideration. But I don't think it was ever meant to be used by them, but it is. Yes; there is no constitutional provision requiring it. Take the English Government, for instance, and compare it with ours and you will find that you can do something in England. There is a House of Commons. The House of Lords is about out of it. And the House of Commons is elected directly by the people and goes immediately to work. And the King can not pay any attention to it. He has no power, only sort of to fix the table manners for the people. He has no political power at all. And the House of Lords can not affect it, and they have no constitution. So if the English people want something and pass it through the House of Commons, they have got it. But we can not do it in the life of any generation, and few people have an imagination running beyond their generation.

Chairman WALSH. It will be impossible to finish with you this afternoon, Mr. Darrow, and there are a lot of the commissioners have said they have something to ask you, and so I am going to excuse you and put on a witness that has to leave and whom we call in this 25 minutes that we have left. I am sorry, but—

Mr. DARROW. I will stay over until I can get away to-morrow.

Chairman WALSH. All right.

Mrs. Benedict.

TESTIMONY OF MRS. CRYSTAL EASTMAN BENEDICT.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, please.

Mrs. BENEDICT. Crystal Eastman Benedict.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mrs. BENEDICT. New York City.

Chairman WALSH. What is your profession?

Mrs. BENEDICT. Well, I am—I have been an industrial investigator, writer, lawyer, organizer of one kind and another.

Chairman WALSH. Have you made a special study or given special consideration to the question of women in industry, and women in industry particularly so far as the administration of law is concerned?

Mrs. BENEDICT. I can not say that I have made a special study of women in industry except as a person interested in labor problems as a whole. I have studied the works of others in this connection and associated very closely with people who have made these individual studies. But my own labor investigations have not been with reference to women in industry.

Chairman WALSH. Have been in industry generally?

Mrs. BENEDICT. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What, in a general way, are the statistics as to women wage earners in America to-day as compared with, say, 10 years ago?

Mrs. BENEDICT. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have some facts in regard to that from the census. In 1910, 23.45 per cent of the females over 10 years of age were wageworkers. In 1900 this was 18.8. Without going into the figures from 1880 up, which I have here, if the increase continues at the present rate, by 1920, five years from now, 50 per cent of the women over 10 years of age will be wageworkers. By "wageworkers" I mean paid workers, excluding women who work in their homes without definite recognized economic reward.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any cases where women doing the same work as men are receiving currently lower wages for their labor?

Mrs. BENEDICT. I should say that generally speaking it is a matter of common knowledge that both in public employment—Government employment, city, and State, and municipal work, and in private industry, women, generally speaking, receive less for their work than men. At least this is true in the nonsuffrage States. I have a few figures in regard to that also. And many figures can be submitted to the commission afterwards.

In the first place, the general average of women workers throughout the country get one-half of what the general average of men workers get. This, of course means little. It is simply an indication.

Chairman WALSH. I did not get that. What are those figures?

Mrs. BENEDICT. The wages of the women who are income-producing women, definite recognized income-producing women, average a rate of one-half of what the wages of income-producing men are.

Commissioner LENNON. Do you make an application of that to where women are employed in the trades that are organized as, for instance, in the printing industry?

Mrs. BENEDICT. Now, there, when it comes to the question of organization, I want to get back to the special point of view which I am presenting to-day, and I think if I may state that, Mr. Chairman—

Chairman WALSH. Why, you may; we will be very glad if you will do so.

Mrs. BENEDICT. As a preliminary statement, I am here representing the Congressional Union for Woman's Suffrage. I am a member of the executive board of that body and have asked for a hearing by the commission—a brief hearing on the question of the disenfranchisement of women as one of the causes of social and industrial unrest. I just want to get that stated so that these figures in regard to women in industry may be listened to and regarded in relation to this point of view.

We do feel—I personally feel that the continued disfranchisement of women is one of the causes of social unrest to-day both because there goes with it a growing deep resentment and sense of injustice that this fundamental right has been denied after so much of a struggle and, in addition, because we feel that denial of political rights to women is an actual and practical handicap to them in economic advancement.

The organized women workers have been mentioned, but before I go into that I should like to take up the chairman's question in regard to whether women are paid less than men for similar work. Take, first, Government employees. The advertisements for Government clerks right here in the Federal Government at Washington recite that women start in at $720 per year, and men start in at $900 per year. These women pass the same examinations as the men and their general average is higher, yet they start in at $720, and the men start in at $900. We know of many, many cases where many women earning $1,400 a year after years of service are instructing men clerks at $1,800 per year in the duties of their offices, and the men clerks as soon as instructed will, of course, be passed on further. These women are instructing men who are getting more money than they are getting.

There is actually a statute which provides that the head of any department may, at any time when he finds that he can, substitute a "lower-class" clerk or a "female" clerk. That mere phrase, I think, makes it very clear that the women are considered lower paid, regardless of the value and efficiency of their work.

So much, then, for the Government clerks. It is a matter of common knowledge that teachers of public schools, who are women, except where vigorous campaigns have been conducted in their interest, receive lower pay for exactly the same class of work than men; this is true, then, not only of Federal work, but State and municipal work and all kinds of public work.

Now, that is comparatively a small group of women; but it is small only in the face of the enormous number of people involved in the problem of industrial unrest, and it is growing. It is a growing group. And as the Government takes over more and more social activities a greater number of women will be employed by the Government. In regard to these Government positions, the disfranchisement of women is an actual handicap, which no one could deny, in securing equality of opportunities and wages. And in addition, I would say that with the Government setting a standard which declares women to be of less value than men, it is no wonder that private industry follows that standard.

Now, let us take the position of women in private industry as a whole. There are about 8,000,000 women wageworkers in this country to-day. This 8,000,000 is about 24 per cent of the women over 10 years old. If the rate of increase continues, there will be 50 per cent of the women over 10 years of age gainfully employed in 1920.

The question of whether these women are getting wages that they can live on as a whole need hardly be brought before this commission. I know that your own investigations have brought out the fact again and again, no matter how low the wages of men are, the wages of women are lower, and that, I think, is a matter which needs no proof.

But let me give you a few facts from a most recent exhaustive inquiry made in New York covering four trades, the confectionary trade, the paper box-making trade, shirt factories, and retail stores. In the first, of over 90,000 persons for which weekly rates were given, more than three-fifths of the male workers received less than $15 per week, while more than three-fourths of the women received less than $10 a week. In the stores half the males get less than $14 a week, and half the females get less than $7.50 a week. In the shirt factories half the men get less than $12 a week and half the women less than $6.50.

Mr. Chairman, I know you are better educated on these matters, after two years of this kind of work, on all these facts, than I am, or anyone else is. I merely want to call your attention to these facts about women. In facing this tremendous industrial question which you have before you do not forget the women; do not forget that whatever you can say about the wages of men, the wages of women are less.

Now, then, the question is, has this thing any relation to the vote? If it has not, then I, as a representative of a suffrage organization, have no logical reason to be here before the commission; but I think it has. Women can not raise their wages directly by the vote, except in Government employ. They must raise their wages as men have raised their wages, by organization. But I think even Mr. Johanssen would admit that the vote has been essential to labor in winning what it has won. It is not always the actual casting of the ballot; it is not always the immediate control over legislators whom you have put in office that counts, but it is the fact that the vote makes a person a little less defenseless in the face of power than he would be if he did not have the vote.

I just want to give one historic illustration of this.

The greatest strike of women, I guess, in the world was the shirt-waist strike in New York. During that strike the women pickets were subjected to probably as crude a line of police abuse as any strikers ever have been subjected to. During that strike some 5,000 of those women strikers marched down through the streets of New York with their women supporters to see the mayor and appeal to him, not in the interest of their demands, but in the interest of police protection and fair treatment from the administration, and the mayor refused to see them. He said he was not interested. Now, regardless of how powerless the men workers of to-day are, and we have many instances before us of that, I doubt if it would be possible to find in history of the United States any instance in which 5,000 voters, no matter how poor and downtrodden, have gone to see an elected official and been refused admission—refused an interview. I think that epitomizes the situation of women workers.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So that there may not be a wrong impression from the record, you might state the time that was so that some person might not be held responsible for it that should not be.

Mrs. HARRIMAN. Just what mayor was in office at that time?

Mrs. BENEDICT. I think it was Mayor McClellan.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Wasn't it Mayor Gaynor?

Commissioner LENNON. No; the big strike was under—at the time of Mayor McClellan.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I will ask, then, that you supply for the record the exact data on that.

Mrs. BENEDICT. Yes.

I would state that this opportunity has come to us very recently, and that my preparation has been brief, and that the Congressional Union will be very glad to furnish an authoritative statement in regard to this whole proposition and our claim.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I also want to mention another great class of workers. After all, I can only say that 24 per cent of the women of this country are wage earners. That leaves us the vast majority who, you might say, have no economic responsibility, and after all perhaps you might say that my plea is in the interest of a very small proportion.

However, it is not true that the vast majority of women who do not work for wages do not work. It is not true that they have no economic responsibility; it is true they have no economic reward of any definite character. They are relieved of economic reward but not of economic responsibility. These women, especially the poor ones—because I am not now speaking of the very few who actually are supported by men, but of women who work in homes, who work on farms, who cook and wash and sew, who produce children and train them and keep them clean, perhaps more continuously than any other class of workers we have, these are the women who have no recognized economic reward. They have the right in law to support from their husbands. That is all. If the husband goes away or is irresponsible, this right is practically nonenforceable.

Now, some solution of the problem of those women must be worked out by this commission, if this great cause of social unrest is to be removed, and I can not see any way it can be done except through legislation, and I can not see how legislation can be achieved until that great mass of women have some representation in legislation. So, I think, it is perhaps even more important for them to have the vote, than it is for the wage-earning women, certainly equally as important.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have, so far as I feel prepared, stated why I believe there is a connection between economic power and the ballot, lessening as the years go on, but still in existence.

Would the commission care to hear what I wish they would recommend in regard to that?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; just make any recommendation you please, Mrs. Benedict.

Mrs. BENEDICT. I should like to see this Industrial Relations Commission recommend the passing of a Federal women's suffrage amendment (of the bill) of a bill which would prohibit the States from denying the right of suffrage on the ground of sex. And I should like the commission to make that report now, not wait until it makes its regular report. I should like to see you make it now, and this is my reason: This reform I am talking about, granting suffrage to women, has no business in the twentieth century; it is an eighteenth-century question we are talking about. Now, I think it would be a great thing if you could clear the decks of this whole question of giving women political rights for what they amount to. Get that out of the way; make this great body of courageous, devoted, intelligent women in this country, free to help in working out the big industrial-labor problems of the future; free from this irritating, humiliating, continuous demand for political rights, which they will not cease to make until they win. That is why I should even ask that the commission make a report on this question at once, remove it from their minds, go on record on it, and then go on. It does not belong in the twentieth century.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The body to which this commission reports does not meet until next December.

Mrs. BENEDICT. I have thought of that, and I think it would be a great thing for you to make your report on that to President Wilson. He can bring about this reform. If you could convince President Wilson during the summer that the success of the Democratic Party depends on taking a stand on this question you will have done a great thing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But the law says that we shall report to Congress.

Mrs. BENEDICT. There would be ways of getting that expression of opinion into the public press.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Just one question, please. Do you think that a legal minimum wage for women and minors would be of advantage to women and would help equalize the wage problem?

Mrs. BENEDICT. Mr. Weinstock, I have never fully made up my mind about the minimum wage; I don't know.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have no opinion on it?

Mrs. BENEDICT. I have no final opinion; no.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You are not alone in that opinion then.

Mrs. BENEDICT. No.

Commissioner LENNON. There is one member of the commission who could report on the women's suffrage question years ago.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you, Mrs. Benedict.

We will now stand adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 4.30 p. m., Monday, May 17, 1915, the commission adjourned until 10 o'clock Tuesday, May 18, 1915.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., Tuesday, May 18, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh; Commissioners O'Connell, Harriman, Weinstock, Lennon.

Chairman WALSH. We will please be in order.

Mr. Darrow, please resume the stand.

TESTIMONY OF MR. CLARENCE S. DARROW—Recalled.

Chairman WALSH. I had finished your examination, Mr. Darrow, as far as I am concerned, and I think Mr. Weinstock has some questions he would like to ask you. Had you finished your answers last night?

Mr. DARROW. I ran onto this [indicating]. A friend handed me this magazine; this is a copy of an old boycott bill, which would be considered respectable now; the Sons and Daughters of Liberty, in the days of Revolution. This is a placard that was put up:

"William Jackson, an importer at the Brazen Head, at the north side of the townhouse, in Corn Hill, Boston.

"It is desired that the Sons & Daughters of Liberty would not buy any one thing of him, for in so doing they will bring disgrace upon themselves and their posterity forever and ever, amen."

The modern boycott does not generally use that word at the end, but it is the same thing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The name of Dr. Goodnow, the president of the Johns Hopkins University, was brought in during your testimony yesterday?

Mr. DARROW. Yes, Mr. Weinstock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I would like to read some statements which were made by Dr. Goodnow, and invite your opinion thereon with a view of seeing how far you concur with Dr. Goodnow in his attitude; this is how it reads:

"Taking a concrete case, doctor, taking the case, for example, of the Colorado situation, and analyzing it, let us see what your counsel in the matter would lead to. The governor ordered out the militia in connection with some coal strike that took place in Colorado. There was a conflict of testimony there as to the cause and effect. The National Guardsmen maintain that they fought in self-defense; that they were first attacked by the strikers. The strikers deny that and claim that the initiative was taken on the part of the National Guardsmen, which led to riot. Let us assume for the purpose of our illustration, and for the purpose of our analysis, that the workers are correct in their statement and that the militia did take the initiative and did abuse their power and did harass and fire upon innocent people. Your advice and counsel under those circumstances to the worker is, take the result? Yield for the time being; do not attempt to take the short cut and get immediate redress, but recognize the existing authorities and abide by their demand? Let your remedy come by use of the ballot, see to it that the commander in chief that is responsible for this is either recalled, under your recall law, or is condemned by public sentiment and not reelected? Do I follow you?

"Dr. GOODNOW. Yes, sir; it seems to me that any other advice is going to lead to anarchy. It seems to me that the fundamental proposition you have to start with is that we must have peace, and we shall not recognize any such thing legally as right to restrain the constituted authorities. The right of revolution or violence or anything of that sort. We must as civilized men adopt that idea, or else there is no peace for our Government.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, the short cut to the remedy must be condemned?

"Dr. GOODNOW. Yes, sir; as I look at it.

"Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that it is better for a group of men to suffer from real or fancied injuries temporarily than to have chaos prevail?

"Dr. GOODNOW. Certainly. One of the many troubles seems to be the workers in the country never will gain anything by any such thing as organized violence. The people as a whole condemn it, and they can do very much better by presenting their case as forcibly as it can be to the courts, where that is possible, or to the public as a whole."

Now, will you please, Mr. Darrow, state how far you are in accord with Dr. Goodnow's attitude and position in the matter?

Mr. DARROW. Not very far. The officers of the law have the least right of anybody to violate the law. If a constable seeks to arrest a man without having legal authority to do it the man not only has the right to resist, but ought to. If the militia attacks people brutally and without authority they should be resisted if there is a chance to resist them and win. Of course, if they can not, safety might dictate something else; but because a man is a militiaman that does not give him the right to make the law or violate it so far as it is made, or outrage conscience and decency. The idea that a man who is an officer can do anything is only fit for slaves to harbor.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, are we to gather from that, Mr. Darrow, that if the governor of the State should order out troops, and do it in accordance with the law, and those troops under their command should exercise their very best judgment, and do what they believed was necessary to be done, in order to preserve law and order; that if in the judgment of the strikers the troops were exceeding their authority, would you justify the strikers in resisting and resorting to violence?

Mr. DARROW. As a plain question of law, whether the troops thought they were right or not cuts no figure, the question is, were they.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The strikers then would be the judge, whether they were or not?

Mr. DARROW. No; afterwards, I suppose, it would be submitted to some tribunal, and if nothing else, to the people, as to whether they were; but neither one are the judges, each one acts for himself as far as he can.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, if in the judgment of the strikers they were warranted in resisting the constituted authorities, and did resist, and bloodshed followed and lives were lost and property was destroyed, would you say the strikers should or should not be punished, under the law, for such resistance?

Mr. DARROW. Well, suppose blood was shed and property destroyed, but liberty was saved, then what? There are other things to consider besides property and other things to consider besides bloodshed. The liberty of the man, which is the one thing worth defending, and it is to be judged by history, in the light of all that has happened, and the consequences and result of it. There has been very little improvement in the world that has not, at least, been accompanied with bloodshed. It seems to be the law of nature. The scriptures put it, "Without the shedding of blood, there can be no remission of sins."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are you a believer in bloodshed?

Mr. DARROW. Neither a believer nor disbeliever in it. It is in the course of nature, and we have nothing to do with it. To say that I believe a thing, do I believe it exists, or approve of it, or disapprove of it? There are times when it is absolutely necessary. We would not have any Government here except for bloodshed. The slaves would be slaves yet except for bloodshed. Lots of good has come of it. You take from the world everything that is gained in that way, and we would still be living in caves and clothed with hair instead of wool.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have heard it said, Mr. Darrow, I think it was brought out here at different times before the commission, that the attitude of—I won't say all organizations, but the attitude of some labor representatives and some labor leaders is that a strike is war, and that everything, so to speak, is justifiable in war. Are you in sympathy with that point of view?

Mr. DARROW. I don't think that everything is justifiable in war, to start with. I think there are many things in the present war in Europe that are not justified under the laws of humanity, and I think it is a mistake to say everything is justified in war. One ought not to forget their human instincts in time of war, although they are often swept away. But a strike is in the nature of war, and conflict between capital and labor to-day are in the nature of war, so regarded by both sides, each side trying to win, and using such power as they have to win, but I think employers do many things they should not do, and the working men do many things they should not do. They are cruel and unnecessary.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you think, living in a Republic, enjoying, as we are permitted to enjoy, our political and civil rights and liberty, do you think anybody has a right to declare war except the Government itself?

Mr. DARROW. I don't think we live in a free country or enjoy civil liberties. Of course, it is almost impossible to get at whether you have a right to do a thing; there is no way of fixing what you mean by that word. Things happen in this world, and the happening is a justification of it alone. I don't know that the San Francisco earthquake was right, but it came. What are you going to say about it; was it wrong? It don't make any difference whether it was or not, it was in the order of nature. Whatever is right, according to philosophers, as Pope said it is in the order of nature. There is no use quarrelling with it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I want to make sure that I follow your reasoning and get your point of view. I should infer from what you said, reading between the lines perhaps—

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (continuing). More than what you say, that we are living under a delusion and a snare, and we imagine we are living in a free country and enjoying political and civil rights, and since we are not living in a free country and are not enjoying civil and political liberties, we are practically as much warranted in resisting authority as in Russia, where there are no civil and political rights, and any group of us that have wrongs, or think we have wrongs, are justified in resisting the authorities?

Mr. DARROW. I don't think I stated it that way or meant to put it as strongly as that. I want to be perfectly frank with you about it, and although the subject that we are discussing is apt to be wrongly quoted, and we are apt to be misunderstood, still I will attempt to tell you fairly. Freedom, of course, is a relative term. People of the United States are freer probably than the people of Russia or Germany; they are not as free as the people of England. They are nowhere near as free as they were 75 or 100 years ago. Everybody, I think, must, who has any vision, know that they are not as free as they should sometime be, when they are ready for it. It is all relative.

As to protecting it by the courts and statutes, they are invoked by the strong and can not be invoked by the weak, as I tried to show yesterday. It takes money; it takes education; it takes opportunity to resort to such safeguards as the law gives us; and the weak are without them. Pretty much everybody in jail are poor people, and in all the prisons all over the world.

Now, the constant struggle of every individual, as of every animal and plant, is for liberty, reaching out for it in all directions, and struggling for it. When the masses struggle for it and the strain gets too great it breaks. Of course, the individual who alone takes up arms against the constituted authority must die. It is the law of nature. A few individuals must die. If I had any power over it, and men should ask us, Shall we do it, I should say "no," probably almost in every instance. I do not know of a time that I should not say "no," because I think the unrest has not reached that point where the change of system should come. The revolutionists in America were against the same proposition. The English Government was fairly free—the English Government that controlled the United States. There were many matters of injustice, practically the same as exist to-day, and a few of them started the revolution, and it went on until it grew and they resisted against the law and won. John Brown got 19 men to wage war on the United States Government; and the movement he started won in the end, because people were ready for it. The injustice was so great and the imaginations of men worked and it made a new system. If it succeeds, it is all right; if it fails, you have to take the consequences. That is all. I don't know whether I have made it any clearer or not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, your attitude is, as I understand it, that while, so to speak, on paper we enjoy a free government, as a matter of fact we do not enjoy free government. Now, can you conceive of any more effective way of securing for the big body of the people their civil liberty and their political rights than by manhood suffrage; or, let's go a step further and say in the States, where it has been carried out—universal suffrage plus the referendum, plus the initiative, plus the recall.

Mr. DARROW. Why, I don't know. Now, I don't see anything else; some time we may be discontented with it. Of course, I can conceive of better ways. For instance, if every coal miner in the United States refused to dig coal until the coal mines became public property, they would get at it a thousand years ahead of the ballot.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, do you know of any better way of the coal mines becoming public property than by giving not only the coal miner but every other worker the ballot plus the referendum, plus the initiative, plus the recall? Supposing—I am sure you will not dispute the fact—that the great body of the voters of every Commonwealth in the Republic, and the great body of the voters of the Nation as well, are not wage payers, they are wage receivers.

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, suppose that the great body of the wage receivers of the Nation felt that the time was ripe for the Government to take over the coal mines, for example, as you have suggested. What would prevent it?

Mr. DARROW. Congress, the Senate, the President, the Constitution, and the Supreme Court.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Who elects the Members of Congress?

Mr. DARROW. The people.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Who elects the President?

Mr. DARROW. In a round-about way, the people.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Exactly. Now, if the people wanted—and who appoints the Supreme Court?

Mr. DARROW. The President.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Exactly. Now, if the great body of this Nation wanted to own the coal mines, and said so through their ballot, how could it be stopped?

Mr. DARROW. Well, we will assume that there is an election next year, and assume that we could get that issue; of course our country is so spread out and diversified that it would be hard to make an issue in Kansas or Oklahoma or Nebraska on the coal mines in Pennsylvania; but assuming you could—you go to work and elect a Congress that does not take their seats for a year—don't begin working. In the meantime they take their places with the Senators who have been there some four years, and some near six years; two-thirds of them have been elected two years sooner on some other issue. Then you have a President who comes from a different place in society; and then you have the Constitution, which was made 125 years ago and which told us we could not take private property without due process of law; and you have a Supreme Court, the majority of whom have been in their offices for 25 years, and who, I would say, would average 65 or 70 years old, and who, from the natural order of things, could not be seized with any new emotion, if any; and it is out of the question to get them all to say this thing together; never has been done in any very substantial way. You have got to get them all, and have got to get them all at once. It is too clumsy.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, may I call your attention to this fact, then, Mr. Darrow, as an evidence of the possibilities along the lines of achieving desired results in legal ways. A decade or more ago such a thing in this country as workmen's compensation, the eight-hour day for miners, and the eight-hour day for women and minors, the minimum wage, child-labor laws, public ownership of street railways, State insurance, and women's suffrage were practically unknown. Now, doubtless there were hot-heads and zealots who, feeling that the public weal and the public welfare and individual liberty and individual rights depended on some or all of these things, might have been ready to take up a gun and fight for them, but time has shown that that would have been a very unwise thing to do. Absolutely by virtue of the ballot, and, in some Commonwealths, aided by the initiative, referendum, and recall, which, likewise, were unknown in this country a decade or more ago, every one of these things has been brought about peacefully.

Mr. DARROW. And all of them are not worth a pinch of snuff.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Will you tell us why?

Mr. DARROW. Because they are insignificant. Minimum wage of $6 or $8 a week when the unions can get one much higher, and an 8-hour day for women and a 16-hours day for railroad men and a compensation act, which leaves them no better off than before. They are little bit of trifling things that do not go to the root of the question. I do not say they are entirely useless, but they are so near it that they are not worth the effort that has been taken. Instead of trying to find out whether there are any fundamental causes that tend to the great inequality between men to-day we are tinkering at little fool symptoms and spending the time and life of a whole generation curing some little symptom and leaving the world no better off than it was before.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You regard women's suffrage as a little fool symptom?

Mr. DARROW. Well, I have some friends here that believe in it, and I do not like to talk about it. I think it does not touch the industrial question at all. If you would cut out three-fourths of the men's votes, it would not make any difference on the industrial question; it is not how many votes, but how they vote.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The point I want to get at, Mr. Darrow, is this: Regardless of how much these things may be worth, which is only a question of opinion, you in your judgment may belittle them and think they are of little value, and others of us may regard them as of great value?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But let us forget their value and ignore whether their value is great or small. I think we will have to admit, and I am sure you will be frank enough to admit it, that every one of these measures was fought and fought bitterly by the so-called interests.

Mr. DARROW. That is true.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that, despite the alleged tremendous power of the interests in the Nation, a power believed by some to be great enough to stifle the things wanted by the many, despite that power all these steps in the direction of progress have been made, and if these steps have been taken before, why can not still broader steps be taken and made in the same manner without resort to resistance and violence?

Mr. DARROW. I do not want to minimize those things; I believe in them and I am glad to see them; I think it does show some progress. Complaints have gone on for years and years and these things have resulted. Of course, I know they were all fought by the strong and the rich; they instinctively fight anything that is new; I do not blame them; they are like the rest of us; they feel their own interests and they are on that side, but the things themselves are so insignificant; people are not richer on account of them, or very much richer; and you take the workmen's compensation law, which I know something about and I know you do, too; in pretty nearly every State in the Union this law has been framed by the employers and made by them. They did not want it, but when it was forced on them they say, "We will do this much; we will stand for this much." Now, that is something, but it is almost ineffectual. Poor people come to my office day after day injured and apply for relief under it, go away with next to nothing; they do get something, but it is so trifling and inadequate it is not worth the fuss made over it, instead of getting down to the simple fundamentals that would bring about relief. I do not like the attitude of saying, if you will pardon me, that these are legal ways and any other way I suggest is unlawful. I do not care much about ways or the laws to provide ways, but the thing is whether you get it. But if the coal miners say they won't dig any more coal as long as they are digging it for other people, it would be lawful, just the same as if they say they won't work more than eight hours a day or for less than $5 a day; and if the people cutting lumber say, "We won't cut any more trees until the Government owns them," that is perfectly legal so far; and if it is not legal it corresponds with all of our conceptions of right, and many times in the history of the world we reach those things by going cross-lots, and pretty nearly all that labor has gotten has been gotten that way.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Two points you have made, Mr. Darrow, that I want to spend a few moments on, so as to equalize our viewpoint more sharply. The first is your criticism of the workmen's compensation act. If what you say is true, then the workmen's compensation act is a sort of delusion and a snare;

It gives the worker a stone when he asks for bread; and I think perhaps in some Commonwealths it may come pretty near being true, but it will not apply to all Commonwealths, and it will not apply to the tendency that is going on every hour of the day?

Mr. DARROW. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, to point out to you the merit of workmen's compensation and to show you how it is a very great one of the great remedies to remove industrial unrest, let me give you a leaf out of my own experience as a member of the Workmen's Compensation Commission of California.

I was called on recently by a little widow; her husband had been an elevator operator and he had been earning $75 a month. He met with an accident in the elevator and was instantly killed. He left his wife and baby with just 15 cents in the world; that is all she had between herself and starvation for herself and babe. Without workmen's compensation the little woman, not being a breadwinner, the first thing in all likelihood that would have happened, she would have been separated from her baby, the baby would probably have been sent to some asylum, and the mother would have to shift some way for herself, and the chances are that she might have gone downward instead of upward. Under the workmen's compensation she was entitled to a reward equal to three years of her husband's wages; her husband received $75 a month, $900 a year, or $2,700 for the three years, payable in weekly installments spread over about four years and one-half.

Mr. DARROW. Without interest?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Without interest; her income was about $50 a month for four years and a half. She was saved from immediate distress to begin with; she was made independent; she was put in a position where she could take care of herself and baby for four years and one-half, and in the meanwhile she could qualify herself to become a breadwinner; and therefore she and her baby were saved from falling below the poverty line and becoming a burden on society, and she was able to become self-respecting and self-supporting. I simply state this as one of the thousands of cases that come under our observation?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, it is true that all of the States do not treat their injured workers as generously as some of the other States; but those things are naturally a matter of growth, and with the ballot in the hands of the workers and their sympathizers it is not difficult to foresee the day when the highest possible degree of equity will be exercised in practically every State in the Nation toward their injured workers.

So much for workmen's compensation.

You take the ground that the coal miners, if they act as a unit and simply follow the I. W. W. preachment of sitting down with folded arms and paralyzing industry and refusing to dig out a pound of coal until the State or Government take over the mines, that the best possible results would be achieved.

It seems to me that could be hoped for only if the coal miners not only could get within their ranks every able-bodied man who could be taught how to mine coal and were in a position, either by force or coercion or intimidation, to prevent other men from taking their places. As long as it was possible for other men to take their places they could not monopolize the world of labor, and little if anything could be accomplished along those lines. Now, I would be glad to get your answer to that. What has been accomplished in the matter of better condition of the worker in the way of legislation?

I happen to know in my own Commonwealth, and I take it the situation is very much the same in other Commonwealths, organized labor, for which I have the greatest respect, and to which I give the fullest possible credit for having rendered labor heroic service, but for decades in my own Commonwealth organized labor endeavored to secure for women and minors an eight-hour day, and failed, except in some isolated spots. Here and there there was a union of women that managed to get an eight-hour day, but the number of women who had secured, through organized labor, an eight-hour day were infinitesimal. Through legislation, so to speak, overnight, with a wave of the hand, all the people collectively established for all the women workers and minors an eight-hour day. In other words, it was accomplished by legislation, so to speak, at the drop of the hat, what organized labor had not been able to accomplish in decades and would not have been able to accomplish for many, many more decades. The same thing will apply to the question of the minimum wage for the female worker and the minor. Organized labor has tried very earnestly and very energetically to secure that minimum wage. In isolated cases it has been able to do so for women and for minors, but on the whole up to to-day it has failed. Again, so to speak, overnight and with a wave of the hand and at the drop of the hat, through legislation, the minimum-wage commissions have been appointed in Western States, and while those wage commissions may not have established the minimum wage that you and I and some others think is right, they made a tremendous stride along those lines, and they have succeeded in securing a living wage as a minimum, not as the maximum, and again they have accomplished overnight what organized labor has not been able to accomplish up to this time and is not likely to be able to accomplish for an indefinite period yet to come. In the face of these facts, will you still belittle the achievements that can be brought about by legislation?

Mr. DARROW. To go back to your statement, I don't want to be in the attitude of unduly belittling it, because I think the workingmen, and everyone sympathizing with them, should use every means they have, and the ballot is one, but at least stand up and be counted, whether it means much or not, and I don't want to say that your workmen's compensation act has not been of some value, or that it is a snare and delusion. The reason it is of some value is because the law before that had been a delusion and snare. That is because a man killed in the line of his duty and leaving a family had been left by the courts of this country in such a position that a family was destitute after his death, and therefore this law is of some little value. Take your elevator men for instance. That family you say got in the neighborhood of $2,300?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Two thousand, seven hundred dollars.

Mr. DARROW. Four years interest was deducted out of it?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; there was no deduction of interest. I probably misunderstood your question.

Mr. DARROW. No; I think we understand each other. This was payable weekly?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. DARROW. The gross amount of $2,700 was paid in four years?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. DARROW. And the present worth would be less than $2,300?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. From that point of view, you are right.

Mr. DARROW. Under that statute the stingy States, and Illinois is one of the many, you can recover, or could before that statute, for a death $5,000 as a minimum.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That was before the law, at common law?

Mr. DARROW. Yes. If the courts had not cut to pieces all of the rights of the poor, that widow would have been entitled, in any State of the Union, to $5,000 or possibly $10,000.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May I make a statement at this point on that issue? What you say is true, but this I think you will admit is also true, that under the common law the records show that the average time from start to finish under the common law in a damage suit is six years?

Mr. DARROW. Probably you are right; I don't know, but I presume you are right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And the records further show that under the common law for every dollar that is paid out of the pockets of the employer in a damage suit the injured worker only got about 20 cents, the other 80 cents going—

Mr. DARROW (interrupting). I have no doubt you are right about that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Those are the records. Now, under which of the two circumstances do you think the dependent is better off?

Mr. DARROW. I think under your compensation act, and I have always said for it, and do now, although it is very inadequate, and has been passed as a last resort in all of these States by the consent of the employers for fear they would get something worse. I won't say in all, but as a rule. We are trying to amend it in Illinois. It is almost out of the question. It may be, after long years, we will get something more, but it is very inadequate; but still I am glad to see that much, and I want to see people support it.

Now, as to your second proposition, which relates to the minimum wage and the ownership of coal mines and the like, I would disagree with you in saying that the law has first obtained the minimum wage, or the shorter hours. I think the labor organizations got shorter hours and minimum wages 25 years ahead of the law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. For women and children?

Mr. DARBOW. Yes; not universally, but in most lines of work the law at the first did only what the organizations had accomplished before, and did not do that as completely. If they had—now in most building trades of the United States they have eight-hour days, and in most of the organized lines they have constantly reduced the hours of labor and raised the price. In unorganized lines of labor the hours have been longer and the price lower, depending on everything else in this world, on the amount of force back of the demand. But I think it has been the 30 or 40 years since they began reducing the hours of labor to eight hours. The general law has not added anything to it, except possibly in a few cases. For the coal miners it has added nothing; they have had an eight-hour day for 25 years; no longer than eight-hour day, when you take it on the average. They work less than that; they probably work less than that in any one day, or any one week. They already had that. There has been some lack of uniformity in it. Sometimes they work too long, and for a long time they do not have any work at all. I think I am pretty safe in saying that the working women of California, of the stores and shops, are not better off since that law has theoretically reduced their hours and fixed a minimum wage at $7 or $8 a week, which is below what life fixes—you can not get it much below life. It does one thing, in my opinion, and that is pretty near all it does; it interferes with what is supposed to be a sacred right of the employer to buy labor as cheap as he can buy it, and it says that the State has some right to say what the price shall be. That is about as far as it has gone, but I am glad it has done that much, although I think it could be done quicker. I admit the difficulty that you speak of with reference to taking the coal mines in the way I say. It is a terrible hard thing to get working men to stand together. It is easy for me, a lawyer, who had always more than I deserve, and the plain workman getting a fair living, to criticize because they don't stand together. Men like you or me have no right to judge of that matter. If we were living along the life line we would probably grasp the first crust of bread that we could get hold of and let the rest go. That is about what we are doing, anyhow. If they do stand together to a considerable degree, it does look like an almost impossible thing to say that all of the coal miners would refuse to dig coal until the coal mines became public property. It would not require them all. It would require 50 or 60 per cent, but you have the same difficulty with the balance. You have to get them together, and you can not get them any easier, and the man who is what the unionists call a scab in the mines, is a scab in the election, too. That is, he votes for the interests of his employer as against the interests of his class, and it is just about as hard to bring them together in one place as it is in another. They never can be brought together as a matter of reason; nobody acts from it. They are brought together through some great emotion that sweeps them along, and it is hard to get it focused on the election; you can generally get it focused on a general strike. Men don't think anything about it, they just do it. In that way some of these things come to pass by a general movement, and when it comes to pass it will come that way.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let us see where your line of reasoning leads us to. On the one hand you admit it is almost an impossible task to get all the coal miners to act as a unit along the line of securing public ownership of coal mines, and on the other hand you admit that it is almost a hopeless task to get the workers to work together with the ballot. If that is true, what is the remedy? If it can not be done through the ballot or collective action, where does your remedy come from?

Mr. DARBOW. I don't know whether my philosophy is helpful or cheerful. I don't believe there is any remedy for anything in this world. I am not an optimist, and don't think life is worth while. We are here because of the will to live. You can not prove we get pleasure out of it or it is worth anything. We are here working out our instincts and emotions. You can not prove that the future is going to be better than the past. We are just living it, and we can not get out of living it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Admitting all of that to be true, is it not better to look at the doughnut than the hole?

Mr. DARBOW. We differ in our temperaments. It might be better for me to be constituted like you, or the chairman, but I was not, and I can not help it. The forces that mixed up the clay mixed them in a certain way. May be they didn't do right by me, but I can't help it. It is so with you and everybody else. My inclinations drive me to be on the side of the poor man. My emotions are quickly reached, and my sympathy is quickly touched, and I have a lot of imagination which has caused me a lot of trouble, but I can not help it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You heard the comparison made before this commission in the last few days, and if I mistake not I think you yourself made use of it, along the lines of justifying the boycott?

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. By quoting the action of the American colonists during the Revolution. That was practically a boycott on England?

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And was resistance to constituted authorities, and that has been used possibly by yourself?

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir; I did use it, Mr. Weinstock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I know it has been used by other witnesses as a justification for boycott and for resistance, but is that a fair comparison, Mr. Darrow? Are the conditions parallel? Is it not a fact that the Revolution was brought about and there was resistance to the constituted authorities on the part of the colonists because they had taxation without representation? That was the issue? Can it be said to-day that you and I and the rest of us have taxation without representation? Have we not the fullest representation?

Mr. DARROW. Women say they have not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Admitting that it is so, as far as the women are concerned, in the States that do not have women suffrage, can you and I say that as citizens, as voters?

Mr. DARROW. No; but that is only a small thing. The idea is that the boycott is a natural weapon which is resorted to for good and evil which comes from the philosophy of life. I have been boycotted all my life, sometimes because I ought to be, and sometimes I ought not to be, and sometimes because I was too good for the bunch I was living with, and sometimes perhaps because I was too bad for them. A man gets out of line of the common life and he is boycotted. It does not make any difference whether he is ahead or behind. He has got to keep step. There is no man here who has not been boycotted, or does not boycott. I boycott people because I do not like them. I know they are just as good as I am and just as bad, but they don't mix with my chemistry. There is no chemical affinity with me. Everybody boycotts what he don't like. You can't mix a scab and a trade unionist, because the trade unionist believes the class should stand together, and you bring in a workingman that won't stand with his class, they don't like him and won't associate with him. I don't want to be personal, but I can take a man like yourself who has been really and honestly interested in the labor movement, as doubtless you have, and you have doubtless found a good many of your employing class, your associates, who look upon you with considerable doubt. You let an employer be interested in the cause of the poor and the employer thinks he is a traitor, and don't like him. You let the poor be used by the employer, and the poor thinks he is a traitor and don't like him. We are boycotted for our religion and politics, and social views and conduct, and everything else good and bad; and it is a natural thing and you can not help it, and the law is idle to try to help it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Were you present yesterday, Mr. Darrow, when Mr. Drew gave his testimony?

Mr. DARROW. I heard some of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, possibly you may have heard his explanation of where he draws the line between a legal and illegal boycott. Let me see if I can present his thought clearly. He took the ground that the mere refraining from buying things or patronizing other people, individually or collectively, is not illegal. That this group, for example, would have every moral and legal right to say that for any reason, or for no reason, we won't patronize this hotel or that hotel or some other hotel. Nobody could find fault with that or take exception to that. But that the moment that we went beyond that and intimidated or coerced other people because they did what we did not want them to do, then we went beyond the limit and committed wrong, moral and legal wrong, and are subject to punishment.

Mr. DARROW. Those fellows are always strong for the law; they make it. Now, let us see how that question really works out. Under the law, as it is fairly well understood, I think, or has been, to constitute crime, there must be an association of act and intent. Well, what it might be in mental philosophy I won't discuss, because it is outside of the realm of law and lawyers; but there must be a combination of act and intent. A prayer meeting is a perfectly legal thing, but if a combination of men, for the sake of breaking up the business of John Smith, would arrange to hold a prayer meeting at 12 o'clock every day in front of his store or saloon it would be an illegal combination, because the purpose is bad. The purpose is malicious and born of spite against the man. A boycott should be—I don't know what it is any more in the law, because nobody knows. These fellows all talk learnedly about it, but they do not, any of them, know, because these judges are guessing all the while, and there are so many judges that they can't all guess together. But under the law as it was fairly well laid down, if a combination of men should say, out of pure malice, to me "I won't trade with you," and should go around amongst neighbors and say, "You must not trade with him," through a desire just to work havoc and destruction to me, that is illegal; but if a body of union men or a body of any other men would say, "Here is Darrow running a store; he pays low wages and he hires children, and he cuts prices and we want to make him come into line with the rest of us and pay decent wages; and we are not going to trade with him until he does, and we go around amongst our neighbors and everywhere else and say 'Don't trade with him until he conforms with what we think is right.'" That is not illegal. The purpose is high.

Now, I won't say that some court has not said it was, but the courts make a good deal of illegal law; that is, law that does not correspond with the principles of justice and equity, or to many of the other decisions of courts, which I think are more in line. But that is the line at least. Any body of men ought to have the right to say where they will trade, and where they will buy, and where they will sell. Now, of course, the boycott lots of times works a good deal of injustice. I remember as a boy at district school the boycotts of us children were terribly hard and unjust; we couldn't get out of it; we stood and had to stand them, and everybody else did. But you can't help it until human nature is good, and that probably will never be. But it is a weapon which is an important one, and which has always been resorted to, and everybody else resorts to it, and the workingman has a right to resort to it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then you are a believer in the justice and moral and legal right, whatever the law may be, of the worker to collectively resort to the boycott to the very limit to gain his ends?

Mr. DARROW. Well, I don't know what you mean by "the very limit." As far as I have indicated I think they should have the right not to trade with anybody, or not to trade with anybody who traded with anybody, or to buy or not to buy of anybody, or to associate with anybody who bought of anybody.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think they are justified in doing this. Mr. Darrow, as has been brought out in the evidence here. I haven't it at hand, but I think I can remember it. Do you think the workers would be justified in carrying the boycott to the limit which they are said to have carried it in Pennsylvania, where they compelled—I think it was a district school—to discharge a teacher against whom there was no complaint of any character, who stood very high, but they insisted she must be discharged because she had a brother who was a so-called scab?

Another instance, which I think a lad was employed in a baker shop, and either his brother or his father was a so-called scab, and he was driven out of his job by the workers, who insisted that unless the baker dismissed him they would boycott him. Do you think it is justifiable to carry the boycott to that extreme and to punish innocent people?

Mr. DARROW. I was the attorney in the coal strike case—arbitration case—and your statements of fact are substantially correct. One of the most striking illustrations of a boycott was at a Catholic mass one morning, when some man got up and said, "There is an unfair man in the house," and everybody left, except the man and the priest. Now, the cleavage in Pennsylvania was absolute and complete. I don't want to leave the impression with you that I am a hard-hearted fellow, for I am not. I am sorry for anybody that suffers under these things; but the innocent and the guilty suffer alike. Natural law knows no such thing as innocence and guilt. A saint is just as likely to be struck by lightning as a sinner, and even more so, because he don't know where to go so well.

I know when I was a boy my father's family was boycotted because my father was not a Christian—that is, because he was, but did not belong to church—and it was kind of tough on us children, but we could not help it.

The anthracite region was in a state of war. There was an absolute cleavage between the one side and the other. The employers were bringing scabs from the four quarters of the earth to defeat the miners in what they thought was a just fight—and what was. The miners, of course, were busy, too. The employers brought gunmen indiscriminately from every big city in the country, who handled their guns without mercy, and it was a fight to the death. Women and children were on the verge of starvation. The strike lasted for months. You asked me whether they should have said to the teacher, "You can't teach school because your brother is a scab." They hated the brother, and that was reflected to the teacher. You might ask me whether I think the English are justified in the mobs in Liverpool against the Germans. Sitting here, no. Being there, with the Lusitania in sight, I can not criticize them. It simply means the emotions of life uttered themselves, and when they do, reason and judgment have to step aside while the emotions are working. That is all it amounts to: I don't know as I have answered your question. I don't know; it is true, that is all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, do you say, Mr. Darrow, that you think the law should permit men to exercise the hate within them and the spirit of ill will within them to do what was done to this school-teacher, or would you have the law forbid it and draw the line at hate?

Mr. DARROW. Mr. Weinstock, if you were a lawyer and broad-minded, you would not have such unlimited confidence in the law. The law can not forbid any of the passions in the human heart, and if it did it could not affect them. The human heart does not take any account of statutes at all. It just acts. As the heart drives the blood around through the system, it does not take any kind of law. Now, you may pass a law that every man that does thus and so shall be hung by the neck until dead, but that does not control his emotions. It is just simply to annoy somebody after the trouble is over with.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It is a fact that the law itself can not prevent me from committing murder, but it can punish me if I do commit it, and that punishment may be some restraining influence to prevent the commission of such an act by others?

Mr. DARROW. To prevent the next fellow, perhaps.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, if a law were passed to prohibit strikers from doing what they did to that school-teacher, it might not prevent their doing it, but it would punish them for doing it, and that punishment would act as a restraining influence on others from repeating that act?

Mr. DARROW. Well, isn't that all theoretical? Does it act so?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is the history of civilization?

Mr. DARROW. No; it is not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Our civilization is thousands and thousands of years old, and up to date that has been the best method we have been able to devise—the best method the human mind has been able to conceive of.

Mr. DARROW. I think the ablest people who are studying criminology doubt the whole idea of whether the punishment of one man affects another; but be that as it may, if you punish the people who acted from a perfectly natural impulse to boycott a teacher, punished them long after it was all over with, and the passions had subsided, it would only work cruelty in that case; and when you work up the same feeling again the human heart once more would do the same thing. I think so anyway. We may differ about that, but that is the way I think of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But don't you know that the reason for punishment is because we believe it has the effect of restraining others—

Mr. DARROW. I think punishment is barbarism, and vengeance.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Very well, then; how would you protect life and property against the vicious and criminal?

Mr. DARROW. Well, the vicious and the criminal have the property and should protect it themselves. But to answer your question: I think it is somewhat aside, but I am always glad to discuss it, because I think perhaps I know about this subject more than others which have—which I have been talking about. The idea of punishment is formed on the theory that a man knows right and knows wrong and willfully and wickedly chooses the wrong. It has no foundation in logic or philosophy. A man is a creature of circumstances. He acts from motives. He goes where he must. Nobody is entitled to either credit or blame for what he does; they do it; that is all. Now, to consider the matter a moment, let us assume that it is true. If I punish you for doing something, why it keeps somebody else straight. That is all theoretical. The origin of punishment is not that at all. The original of punishment is vengeance. You hit a dog with a stick, and the dog will bite the stick because he is mad at it, and in that way punishments have grown up. You are mad at somebody and want to harm them, and you punish them and hurt them, hang them, put them in jail, burn them in oil, start a fire around them—something so they will suffer. That is penalty. That is what the brutal parent does to his child—whips it when it does something that the parent used to do when he was the child's age.

But people have got ashamed of it, and so they accordingly say: "We are not doing that because we think the fellow is bad, but to serve as an example to some one else." To start with, it is not fair to punish me to keep you straight; to hang me to make a good citizen. That is all theoretical; no one knows whether you will or not. You have been doing it for a long while, and there are just as many murderers; and intelligent people are beginning to find out that there is a cause for crime, the same as there is for typhoid fever. Lawyers are the most ignorant people in the world; that is the trouble about these things. They think we can cure a condition by hanging some one.

Now, suppose a doctor was called to treat a case of typhoid. He would go and examine the well or find out about the milk supply and find out whether there were any poisonous germs around, and then have the well cleaned; but if a lawyer came along to treat it, he would give the patient six months in jail, thinking he could cure the typhoid, and at the end of six months he would let the patient out whether he was cured or not; and if he got well in six days, he would keep him until the whole six months was up. That is the whole theory of punishment. There is a cause for burglary and a cause for robbery, just as there is a cause for going to church.

You may take all of the murderers and all of the robbers, and as a rule they come from a certain section of a town or city; they come from the slums or the poverty district, where boys have no place to play but on the railroad tracks and the streets; and they come, in the main, from among adolescent boys, boys between the ages of 15 and 25 years, who may do anything. You can not tell anything about a boy between those ages, and it is just as natural for them as for other boys to work on the farm. Sometimes we will try to find the cause and get somewhere with it. Now, we are simply brutal. We say, "You have done this and should suffer thus"—no relation at all. "If you do that, we will send you to jail for 30 days, and next after that for 60 days," You do not think of 40 or 45 days, but 30, and then after that 60, and after you pass 60 it is 90 days and not 70, and then after you pass 90 days it is a year. It is not 7 or 8 months; it is just purely a matter of guesswork and vengeance and ignorance; that is just what it is.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It is not to be denied, Mr. Darrow, that you have an uncommon knowledge of human nature.

Mr. DARROW. I don't know; I have been fooled a good many times.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have a knowledge of human nature that I envy you.

Mr. DARROW. Thank you.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And I think you have diagnosed the case quite correctly when you point out that when you or I or the rest of us are wronged we are filled by hate and revenge, and I think that if, as in prehistoric times, the remedy was to be left to us as individuals, we would be very cruel and unjust. I know I have been filled at times toward individuals who have done me what I thought was a wrong with such feeling; I have had murder in my heart, and if I had had my way I suppose I would have used the big stick.

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you and the rest of us are no different, but that is not the legal way of dealing with conditions. While I, as an individual, may feel that feeling of hate, bitterness, and revenge against my enemy, it is not true as a rule—there may be exceptional cases—that a court and jury are filled with the same feeling of hate, bitterness, and ill will, and therefore, except in exceptional cases, I should gravely doubt the statement that the average criminal who is brought before the court for having violated a law or having committed some crime, that he is dealt with in a spirit of revenge, hatred, and ill will.

Mr. DARROW. May I just—I do not want to be philosophizing here and using up your time, but you are kind of suggesting this. I guess I have lived in the courts for 37 years. I ought to know better; ought to have better sense, but I have not. I do know how courts and juries—I think I do, anyway—know how courts and juries act. If not, I have not made much of my opportunities. Juries do hate and courts hate, and they love, too. I think you do not mean personal criticism, because you think what others do; you think too much of the words "criminal" and the "law." Most people have an idea that a man who is a criminal is different from a man who is not a criminal. There is no difference; we are all partly criminal and partly conventional; put it that way. It is a question of degree, and that is all there is of it. And some of the fellows who have done what society thinks are the worst things have also done some of the best things, as everybody knows who takes any pains to find out; that is, we are creatures of all kinds of emotions, sometimes one kind predominating and sometimes another.

Now, a practicing lawyer, if he has any sense, knows that a jury does love and does hate, and a lawyer prosecuting a man tries to arraign a whole lot of things to make the jury hate the victim; it does not appeal to his judgment or logic; that does not appeal to anybody; but they stir up the feelings. On the other hand, if you are defending a man, you try to throw around the case a feeling of pity, of love, if possible, for the fellow who is on trial. If you can do that, the jury thinks, "Well, I am on trial;" through their imagination they feel the other fellow's pain and position and they act to satisfy themselves. We all do that; we can not act from any other motive, and it is the real feeling of the jury, and a juror can give a good reason for anything he wants to do. If a man wants to do something, and he is intelligent, he can give a reason for it, but you have got to get him to want to do it; you can lead a horse to water, but you can not make him drink; but if you can get a man to want to do an act, he can find a reason for doing it. That is the way the mind acts, I think.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You were saying a little while ago, Mr. Darrow, that under our modern system, the poor man has little or no chance in the courts, and you pointed to the statement that the jails were filled, as a rule, with poor men. Do you think that holds good as applied to men brought into court in connection with labor troubles?

Mr. DARROW. Why, no; I did not refer to that. The labor leaders who are brought into court are able to defend themselves generally; but they are a very small number of the people who are in jail. Of course there are often a good many that are very helpless fellows who are arrested. I refer to the ordinary run of people in jail.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes. Of course the theme that is of prime interest to us here, and the theme to which we are directing our thought, is the labor problem, the industrial situation.

Mr. DARROW. It does hold good that injunctions and the processes of the courts, and all those things that involve labor unions, that they are poor and can not do it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You defended the McNamaras in California?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And I take it that the McNamaras as individuals are poor men?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I would hesitate to ask you this question, Mr. Darrow, had not my friends on the commission who represent organized labor established a precedent.

Mr. DARROW. You may ask me anything; perhaps I will answer it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. They asked Mr. Davenport, who represented the employers, what compensation he received; may I ask you what compensation you received for defending the McNamaras?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Davenport declined to answer.

Mr. DARROW. I will not take advantage of him, Mr. O'Connell; I would just as soon tell.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I thought you ought to know that Mr. Davenport declined to answer.

Mr. DARROW. May I preface that with a little sketch about it?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. DARROW. I presume I have been working for 25 years on labor cases. I have managed to make enough out of the rich to help the poor now and then for nothing, and I presume that I have given—well, I think I am safe to say one-third, and I think one-half of my time, in my office in the defending of poor people without any pay at all, and I think three-fourths of the labor cases I have tried for nothing. I have tried—I have been employed in three cases where I got something like a fee from labor. Now, that is not the fault of labor at all. It has always meant to treat me generously, but I know their situation. It is an organization on a strike, and I do not care how rich they are, they have to feed their women and children, and they do not have much left for the courts.

In the coal-strike case—I had just as soon state the three at once, if you do not mind—I spent four months' time; I was the chief attorney for the strikers. We got an award which I think in the course of years amounted to ten or fifteen million dollars and about a half million dollars back pay. For the four months' time I charged them $10,000 and got it. I have no doubt that any corporation lawyer would have charged them ten or fifteen times as much and got it, as I would have, if I had asked them, and they would not have thought anything about it. That is the only case in which I ever made anything.

In the Moyer, Haywood, and Pettibone case—I have a large office in Chicago, and, like every other lawyer, his business is his income, and it takes a long time to build up a business, I left my office and went to Idaho, and spent a year and a half, and not only ruined my business, but my health. I was operated on afterwards, and it was six months more before I could go to work, and I got $35,000 and I came back and my practice was gone. But that was all right, I got what I asked.

In the McNamara case—of course I dissolved my firm and closed out my business, hoping that after that case I would not have to practice law any more. I spent six months and a little over on the work in that case, and I got about $48,000. I spent a year and one-half after that defending myself, and that took it all, practically all, and I have gone back to work; but I got my pay as I went along.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, you have the reputation, Mr. Darrow, and I think you thoroughly deserve it, as being one of the ablest attorneys in America, on these questions especially. Then it is clear that despite the fact that the McNamaras are poor men, that they had the benefit of the ablest lawyer money could employ?

Mr. DARROW. Well, I am too modest to admit that. I did the best I could for them; I know that. I am sorry I could not do more.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So it is clear, then, that so far as poor men who are brought into court in connection with labor troubles are concerned, it can not be said they are not properly defended.

Mr. DARROW. Well, that case and the Moyer, Haywood, and Pettibone case were two striking examples of there having been money raised sufficient to give them a good defense, as good as they could get; but as a rule that does not hold good, Mr. Weinstock. I defend many of them for nothing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it in that connection you are very much in the position of the physician who was obliged to treat a great many charity cases?

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir; I am; but I am sorry to say that most lawyers are not. A lawyer will let a man die on the gallows, because he has no money to pay him. A physician will see that the poorest man has an operation by the best physician, to save his life. Their profession is ahead of ours.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May I ask, Mr. Darrow, whether you regard public opinion as of any value to organized labor in striving for its objectives?

Mr. DARROW. I think it is the greatest force and value.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You believe then that organized labor can not hope to achieve its ends, and can not hope to go on striving to secure a higher wage, shorter working day, and better working conditions unless it can bring public opinion up behind it to aid it?

Mr. DARROW. It is very important, Mr. Weinstock, and probably I will go pretty near as far as you will, even if I see what you are leading to.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, if that is true, and public opinion is of value, and of course you can not hope to have public opinion behind us unless we can win the good will and the respect and the confidence of the public generally?

Mr. DARROW. Now, you are putting in some things I can not stand for.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You mean that it is not necessary to win the respect—

Mr. DARROW. No at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Of the public?

Mr. DARROW. Not at all. Capture their imaginations, that is all. Nothing else in the world, especially public opinion. You have to strike while the iron is hot.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But then we know that organized labor's objectives are not things that can be achieved; things that organized labor has in mind must necessarily take time to bring about, and perhaps a very long time. Now, do you think it is possible to so blind public opinion that it can be held and restrained indefinitely, despite unfitness and unworthiness of the object that they are striving to get the benefit of public opinion on?

Mr. DARROW. You can not hold public opinion to anything indefinitely. Everybody, you take any person in the public eye, good or bad, if we can classify it, they have a season of popularity, and then they throw stones at them, or vice versa. I have had my day of it both ways, and the public was wrong at both times. I did not deserve their praise, and I did not deserve their stones. Every public or quasi-public man has been through the same mill, more or less. It does not make any difference whether a man is good or bad, as far as public judgment goes. You take all the heroes and martyrs in history, and wherever you go it is the same thing. Nothing so changes and shifts as public opinion, and nothing is so powerful. We are just victims in its hands.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Admitting for the sake of the argument all that you have said, is it not a fact, as far as you know, whether the American people deserve it or not, they at least have the reputation of standing up for what is right and condemning what is wrong?

Mr. DARROW. If they had that reputation, I never heard it. I think they are about the poorest class there are on earth, as far as that goes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The American people as a unit?

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are the poorest class for what?

Mr. DARROW. As to standing up for what is right and going back on what is wrong. In the first place, we are not a Nation at all, we are a conglomeration of everything from everywhere. We have no nationality. You could depend pretty well on what an Englishman would do, because they are one people; or what the Frenchmen would do, because they are one people; or what the Germans would do; but you can not tell what Americans would do. It will take hundreds of years for them to get welded into a country, and they veer around, and one day Mr. Roosevelt is the idol of the American people and the next day they are busy to see who can throw the most stones at him; because he is conspicuous and spectacular, and those things about him. Look at Dewey. Let me give you one simple illustration. There is a man—captured the imagination of the people because he battered to pieces a few old tubs in the harbor of Manila, without heroism or anything else; but the whole country went mad over him. People got up excursions from the remotest points in America to go to New York to greet him. They got up a donation for him and bought him a house and lot, and he deeded it to his wife and they all went back on him in a minute.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are we to understand from what you say, Mr. Darrow, that the American people, you believe, stand up for the wrong and condemn the right?

Mr. DARROW. Right or wrong cuts no figure. People like it because it is a spectacular thing; it is imagination that moves people. Something captures them. Right or wrong cuts no figure in the world anywhere as to moving people. A great warrior will go out and kill thousands of men without what we would call moral excuse. Napoleon is possibly the most popular idol of the world; maybe he had good qualities, but he was popular because of the great many people he killed, and his dash and brilliancy. Morals had nothing to do with it; just the spectacular part.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you were advising organized labor, who stood before you as a unit and invited your counsel and advice and would say to you, "Mr. Darrow, we want to get public opinion in our favor," I take it you say to them, "First capture the imagination of the American people, regardless of what you do, whether it is right or wrong. Capture their imagination and you will have public opinion behind you, whether right or wrong, and you will have it permanently."

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir; but the trouble is you have to capture the newspapers, because the great mass of people only know what they read in the newspapers. Of course what you say is right. Capture the imagination of men and then you can do something, because popular opinion is irresistible; no human being can stand up against it and live. They may duck a while until the waves go by and get up in a kind of dazed way, but you can not live against it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The first thing to do along those lines, if organized labor believes as you believe—that public opinion is of great value to it, and that public opinion is influenced primarily by the imagination, whether right or wrong, the first step is to capture the press, and your advice would be, "Boys, go out and capture the press." How could they do it?

MR. DARROW. It is a hard job; I don't know that they can do it at all. It is pretty nearly necessary to get public opinion to get the press. I don't know how they could do it, Mr. Weinstock. I wish I did.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That would be in the nature of a circle. To get public opinion you have to get the press; and to get the press you have to get public opinion?

MR. DARROW. I don't believe I said that; but that is what it would result in. Capturing the press is a hard job. Mr. Scripps has been trying to establish a newspaper in this country that would not take advertising—he has one in Chicago—and he says he thinks he can do it all over the country. If he can do that, it might go some distance; but to run a big newspaper you have to be very rich, and the owner feels what Grover Cleveland once called communism of combined capital. You can not help it. It is a tough job, and I don't know how we can do it. I would rather raise problems than settle them; it is easier.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I have been asked to put this question to you, if you will be good enough to answer it: Will Mr. Darrow point out what principles, if any, have been applied to the issuance of injunctions in labor cases which have not been generally applied to all combinations, irrespective of the character of the persons forming the combination?

MR. DARROW. I will answer that as near as I can, Mr. Weinstock, but the trouble with that and this whole discussion about the poor and the law is the impossibility of the weak to use the machinery and the ease with which power can use it against the weak. Now, you make a statute which on its face looks like it hits every man alike, but it doesn't hit every man alike. I remember Anatole France in speaking of this question said: Of course, the law is perfectly equal; it provides that it is a crime for anybody to sleep under a bridge, whether he is a millionaire or pauper. But the millionaire don't sleep under bridges. The law is equal, all right, but it catches the poor man only. You take the constitutions of the States, which provide that legislation shall be uniform all over the State, that you can not make it for one section and not the other. Thereupon the legislature will say it applies to all cities over 1,000,000 population where there is only one in the State. You can not make it apply to the city of Chicago, but you can make it apply to any city of over 1,000,000 population. Indirectly they accomplish the same thing.

Now, this particular question. If you can imagine any combination of men outside of the labor unions that would be injured by these injunction cases, it would cover them. You can imagine some acts that would be covered by them like boycotts, which are common in mercantile business, as I am informed, but I never heard of it being applied. I never heard of it. You could imagine that it might be applied to a great mine, where its owners have determined that they would lock out their men, which often happens. Can a workman go into the court and ask for an injunction against their closing down the mine? The theory would be the same thing, but it has never been done, and I don't apprehend you could find a court that would grant it. For instance, in Pennsylvania they hold, and I think very properly, that an employer may refuse to hire any union man simply because he is a union man, but these and other courts have held that a workingman can not say that he will not work with a nonunion man; that is illegal. It depends on the force back of it, and the application you want to make of it and the facility you have for making it. On the face it might look the same, but this whole thing has been built up on labor unions, and has not been applied otherwise as a rule.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, Mr. Darrow, summing up, may I review the different points that have been touched upon by you and see what we can take away as the result of this most interesting statement on your part?

MR. DARROW. Thank you.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Speaking for myself at least, I wish to make sure that I understand your philosophy correctly. If I misunderstand you, I wish you would correct me as I go along.

MR. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The frame of mind that you have left me in is this: First, that while theoretically we are a free country, practically we are not; that while theoretically you and I and the rest of us have our civil and political rights, practically we have not.

MR. DARROW. That applies to the weaker.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That applies to the weaker?

MR. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That the English, for example, are much freer than we Americans are?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That they have rights and privileges that we do not enjoy?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Second, that all the progressive laws that have been passed in this country and in the various Commonwealths in the last decade or two, including such laws as workmen's compensation acts, maximum and minimum wage acts, eight-hour day for women, and safety acts, and the initiative, referendum, and recall, are mere patches, are mere makeshifts, that they don't touch fundamentals, and therefore are of little value?

Mr. DARROW. That is about the way I put that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That in the matter of violence you would justify resistance on the part of strikers, for example, if in their opinion the authorities were not giving them a square deal?

Mr. DARROW. Well, now, I will just have to explain that. I justify any man in doing whatever is right, whether rich or poor. The highest thing a man can do is to follow his conscience, no matter where it leads him, and the harder it is the higher credit the man deserves. I think that it would be poor wisdom to resort to violence when there is no chance. I would not advise it or urge it. I recognize it in the scheme of things as one of the inevitable things that go along with human development, but as to saying here I think you ought to go and do this or that, I never do it, and would not take the responsibility. If it is done, I understand it, and I don't blame the man. Remember Victor Hugo's Les Misérables, where he takes the old priest up on the mountain to see the revolutionist, and after the revolutionist has converted him on everything else, he said, "You remember the cruelty and bloodshed of the revolutionists," and he looked at him and said, "Yes; a storm had been gathering for thousands of years; it burst; you blame the thunderbolt." That is the attitude of the people that blame the men for the consequences of those things that have gone before. I don't think I gave any opinion one way or the other. It is not a question of opinion, but of fact and natural law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, you say you would not blame the man; that while you would not justify him resorting to violence, if he did you would not blame him? Would you punish him?

Mr. DARROW. No, sir; I would not punish anybody for anything.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think it is a delusion and a snare?

Mr. DARROW. I think it is barbarism. I don't think that anybody should be confined. I think there are people that are antisocial in their nature, and for many years to come there will be people that need confinement. It is not because of any wrong they have done, but a wrong that has been done to them, and they should be treated like hospital patients and kept until they recover or never turned loose.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You only leave us this inference that if you had your way you would wipe out all penitentiaries and prisons and establish hospitals?

Mr. DARROW. I would, but I would try to get at the cause of what we call crime and cure it, so there would be only a very small portion of it. But while it might look to you for the moment—and I guess I am carrying you away from what you were asking—it would not make much difference whether you called them jails or hospitals, but it makes all the difference in the world. You say to me you need to be restrained, but it is because you have an evil heart, then you punish me. Then you say to me you are ill and society has not treated you right or nature has not, and I am sorry for you and want to help you, and I must keep you here until you are well; that is another question entirely. It is the attitude of the world toward what we call criminals that I complain most about. If we get them we can cure it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Admitting when we reach that ideal day, when Utopia is here and we wipe out jails and penitentiaries and substitute hospitals, what are we to do in the meantime? What will we do with our criminals?

Mr. DARROW. What we will do is to abuse them and misjudge them and practice all kinds of mistreatment. It is not so far away. I can see a great change in the attitude of the world in the last 10 years. Can't you?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. DARROW. It was called at once a crazy idea to say what I have said about crime. Probably half of you people on the commission believe it; maybe all of you. Ten years ago very few believed it. Most of the criminologists of to-day have accepted it. We find people going at it as the warden in New York, in Sing Sing, is doing. We have very much the same attitude on the part of the warden in the penitentiaries in Illinois and Colorado. The attitude is growing very fast. I don't believe it will be 25 years until there will be no more prisons, practically. We will be looked on as barbarians for doing those things. There will be people confined, but not in that attitude. I think that is coming faster than a lot of these things, but maybe I am wrong.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, continuing as to the frame of mind I have been left in. On the question of boycott. I take it you feel it is morally and ought to be legally right; that the boycott be carried to the limit, no matter how many innocent people are injured or hurt?

Mr. DARROW. Of course I kind of shrink from the idea of injuring innocent people, and I don't suppose I could boycott anybody myself. I can justify other people who do it. But everybody is innocent. Mr. Rockefeller, of the Standard Oil Co., who represents, to my mind, what is the most antisocial thing in the world of business to-day, is doubtless as innocent as anybody who looks at it in any other way and justifies himself to himself, the same as the rest of us. Everybody is innocent. You might think there are degrees of it, but hardly that. These things happen. Putting it as you say, I would say that I would justify it, whether it affected the innocent or guilty. I would be sorry for it. But it is not only right, but necessary. For instance, you might take the same causes in the war in Europe. To destroy the German power England has thought it necessary to keep bread from Germany, although the wives and children and noncombatants suffer. It is absolutely justifiable and necessary from their standpoint.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would then regard a strike as war?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You believe that there is power other than the Government itself, then, that has a right, so to speak, to declare war?

Mr. DARROW. Well, of course, legally, under the laws of the country, to declare what we call war must be done, if I remember it, by Congress. I have not read the Constitution for some time. That and the Book of Genesis I have kind of passed up. But the Constitution does not apply to industrial war, and if it did I would say they had the right to do it, or should do it. I don't like the word right; there is nothing to base a right on. Everybody has their own conception of right and wrong.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And finally, your view is that public opinion is very important to organized labor to aid it in carrying out its desired ends, and that to get this public opinion it is not necessary to be right, but it is very necessary to capture the imagination of the public?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Either right or wrong, you are likely to win?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But you think that the question of right or wrong would enter into an industrial trouble, or do you believe, as our friends the I. W. W. believe, that whatever is good for labor is right, and whatever is bad for labor is wrong?

Mr. DARROW. Well, those are kind of hard questions; questions that a man does not always like to answer, and questions that are not easy to answer, but I will be as frank with you as I can about it. Of course, right and wrong are purely relative terms. You say a thing is wrong, if it sort of shocks your sense of justice and fitness, and it is right if it does not. There is no way to base it. There is no foundation for right or wrong, so nobody can tell. Now, perhaps it is not hardly fair to say that right and wrong in that way have nothing to do with catching the imagination. If you could classify the emotions of men as between hate and fear and revenge, which are some of the emotions that move all of us, and love and pity and sympathy, which are emotions which move all of us, you might call them the higher and lower and the conflicting emotions. Now, we call the one class the higher. I think that on the whole the tendency is that gradually they will survive. You might look for more, based on it, but we are always being ruled by hatred and by fear, and the imagination of the world is always being captured by it, but I think perhaps in the evolution of things it is better the other way and stronger the other way. I don't know whether that makes my position clear on that question or not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have a faculty of making yourself very clear.

Mr. DARROW. I don't want you to think I am dodging any of these, but they are some of the things that are rather embarrassing, and a man is liable to be misquoted.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Lennon has a few questions he wants to ask you.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Darrow, this thing you call imagination, and the higher ideals of it that have been expressed by man, is the world making progress toward those higher ideals, or are we going backward?

Mr. DARROW. Well, Mr. Lennon, that is a hard question to tell. I have sometimes thought that we were going forward. I think, on the whole, we are, but in science or in philosophy I doubt whether there is any foundation for the theory that man is going forward. All we know about life is that there is constant activity and change. Out of that it may for a time go forward or backward, but I believe on the whole it is going forward at this time.

Commissioner LENNON. As to our conception as to what is freedom under government, and what are human rights in society, are we making progress as to those things?

Mr. DARROW. I think we are getting higher ideals and seeing further.

Commissioner LENNON. What force in the history of mankind has been the most potent in that direction has it been the struggle of the laboring class for better conditions, or the advocates of the policy to let things remain as they are?

Mr. DARROW. Oh, whatever position they may take there is no doubt but what the future is to have labor socialism. Whether you call it socialism, or labor, or any of the progressive ideas, the fact is that the imagination of men is working that way. Whether you do a thing to-day or to-morrow or some other time, they have everything to win and nothing to lose, and it is going that way.

Commissioner LENNON. You have been asked some questions regarding the violations of law by individuals and the consequences arising therefrom. Is it not a generally recognized principle that if men believe the law is wrong, and are perfectly willing to take the consequences of violation, that that is a right that they may exercise?

Mr. DARROW. Well, there are lots of people believe it. Who was the great statesman, or something, I don't remember his name, a lot of you recall it, who said that resistance to tyranny is obedience to God. I don't know his name, but his name ought to give it some weight beyond his words.

Commissioner LENNON. A fact was mentioned here the other day that had close connection to myself. My father operated a station on the underground railway before the War of '61-65, and lived in a slave State and did it. Has history justified that resistance to the laws as being right or wrong?

Mr. DARROW. I don't believe you could find many people, either North or South, to-day who would not justify it; there might be some; but events have justified it; as long as it happened that way, it could not have happened any other, although it was a terrible price.

Commissioner LENNON. You expressed at one point something of the hostility of the labor unions toward the scab, as you said?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. Do you believe that there is a general hostility, industrially, to the nonunion man on the part of organized labor?

Mr. DARROW. Well, I think that you will disagree with me, but I think organized labor distinctly dislikes the man who would not join the union, and I don't see how they could help it. Whatever labor has now is practically through the labor organizations, and the nonunion man or the scab, as he is called, is the first to take advantage of it, and he is always used for the destruction of unions and the destruction of all their efforts, and I think the attitude of the union man is unfriendly to the man who refuses to come in. Of course, he does not hate the scab as a man, or does not hate him if he has no chance to get in, or is working where he can not be a member of the union, but in the great industrial strife a nonunion man lends himself to the employer to defeat the objects of the union man, which is really the situation, I think he is not liked; he is hated. Every effort is made by the unions to get them in. They spend their money and time trying to convince them they ought to come in, but a lot of men stayed out through selfishness, some through cowardice, and a lot that think they really ought to stay out.

Commissioner LENNON. Now, in the discussion of rights under the law, certain rights, this commission heard testimony regarding the situation in Colorado of this character, that the civil courts were in operation. Upon a certain writ of habeas corpus two men were brought into court, and the militia were also in the field at the same time. Two men were brought into court on a writ, and after hearing the case the justice ordered them discharged, and the militia, however, took them and held them. Has the militia such a right to exercise such power when the courts are in operation?

Mr. DARROW. Not unless martial law has been declared; and as I remember it was not formally declared out there. The law is plain on the subject. Courts have jurisdiction everywhere except where it is declared.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, it seems almost like a farce that they should have been permitted to go before the court and their case be heard and their release ordered and that they should then have been detained in captivity. It would seem the legitimate thing for the militia to have done would have been to tell the court to go on and mind its own business and held them from the start.

Mr. DARROW. Well, that is what they generally do, surely. Of course, in the last analysis, the fellow that has got the most power has got the most right. The judge can not take a man away from the Army; he can take him away from the strikers because he has got an army back of him; but he can't take him from the Army.

Chairman WALSH. Mrs. Harriman has a question to ask you.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. You spoke, Mr. Darrow of a fair social system. I think you used that phrase?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Will you give us your definition of a fair social system?

Mr. DARROW. Well, I don't know as I could. I think a state of society where everybody who is able to work and is willing to work, where one can find opportunity to employ his labor, and where people practically get the same reward for the same amount of time, would come about as near being a fair industrial system as you could get. I think you would have to abolish the private ownership of mines and forests and railroads and perhaps land, and possibly more, before you could ever reach it. We can approximate it—go toward it.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Does that differ from the popular conception of socialism?

Mr. DARROW. Well, socialism says that you have got to abolish rent, capital, and interest, and have a cooperative Commonwealth where all production is done by the State—for the people collectively. Now, it may be they are right. The trouble is there is no way to determine exactly how anything will work out; and there is no certainty that any one road is the only road. Of course, I am sympathetic with socialism, sympathetic with single tax and labor unions, and pretty nearly any new thing that comes along; though I do discriminate a little I like to see the disturbance going on and giving them all a chance. If I was laying out a scheme I would say let's get the land monopolies first; let us take the mines and the forests and the railroads and see how they come out, and if that don't work let's get busy and do some more. We won't rest. I don't think anybody can tell in advance the absolutely necessary way or the easiest way; at the present time to feed the present generation and the next, while we are getting all these things, labor unions—organized labor—takes care of a number of these wants that none of these other things can do or have done at least.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Mr. Darrow, do you think this commission has done or can do any good?

Mr. DARROW. Yes; I think both.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. How?

Mr. DARROW. Well, my answer to Mr. Weinstock as to public opinion—that is the greatest force there is in the country, and always has been; and so far as you reach public opinion, if it is nothing but talking about it, it has its effect. The recommendations that this commission will send out will have some effect on public opinion; whether you get it into laws nobody knows, or how effective they would be if they got into laws nobody knows. But from my standpoint the more fundamental and radical your recommendations are the more good they will do; and the more you recognize the division of classes and the injustice of it, the more good it will do; but it does good at least.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. That is to give it daylight?

Mr. DARROW. Yes, it attracts the attention of the public.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. That would be your remedy then, for industrial unrest; or do you think there is no final remedy?

Mr. DARROW. There is no final remedy for unrest excepting the grave. We are all the time—society is all the time—in a state of unrest. You may take a piece of glass and every atom is revolving around another. You may melt it, and it takes new relations. Society, in the same way, is operating around certain orbits, and some great thing comes along and changes the orbits, and perhaps the resistance is less or perhaps it is greater. We can change only the immediate things. If we all get rich, we will have cancer or tuberculosis, or a tumor or corns, or something to bother us.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Do you believe in arbitration of labor disputes?

Mr. DARROW. I think in many instances they have done good. I believe in everything that works at the job. I don't believe in compulsory arbitration. I think people should have more freedom instead of less, as a general proposition, in all lines of life.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Commissioner WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell has some questions he would like to propound.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Some writer said, Mr. Darrow, that I have read somewhere, that the real agitator was injustice, or that injustice was the real agitator, one way or the other. Since I have been on this commission and have heard approximately a thousand witnesses, the impression of a great number of those that have appeared before us seems to be that a great proportion, at least, of the so-called unrest is caused by the agitator, implying, I take it, that the agitator that he had in mind is the so-called labor leader—not necessarily the president of an international organization or the president of the American Federation of Labor, but the men who were in office locally, and by State and by national and international organization, and all that?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Implying that all these men were the agitators, my observation of some 30 years or more of injustice being the agitator, the fact that a man or woman or child has to work under conditions that they feel unjust to them; low wages, long hours, and insanitary conditions; in days gone by terribly insanitary conditions; a total disregard for life and limb; the whole object of the employer being to get production out of his employees; what is your opinion as to the real cause, the real agitator?

Mr. DARROW. Well, I think it is largely an injustice, of course. My experience in 25 years of pretty close relation with labor unions and leaders is that the last man to encourage a strike is the labor leader. Of course that might not always hold true, but the man who is charged with the responsibility—like we call the walking delegate or business agent—is almost always most conservative, because he feels the weight of the thing. Of course, there is a large pressure behind him of people who want their conditions bettered, and then there is the terrible grinding down against men on the other side, and it places him in a hard position. But as a rule, and I think almost universally, the so-called walking delegate is the most conservative man in the whole body, no matter what he might have been before he got his position. I don't believe I ever saw an exception.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As one having to do with courts—and I think you said when it came to speaking about the criminal law that you felt at home in dealing with that?

Mr. DARROW. Yes; very much at home.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You must of necessity have given very much thought and study or made some comparison as to the class of people that are in the jails and prisons. I want to ask you if you have made a comparison or given thought as to the comparative number of so-called labor agitators, labor leaders, labor representatives, that are in jail as compared with the number of bankers, doctors, lawyers, and professional men?

Mr. DARROW. No; I never did. If there were more, I would not know whether it would be to their credit or discredit. I guess the labor leaders keep out of jail about as well as the rest of us, and better than the poor.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I have been informed, and I don't know that I can give the figures exactly—I think it was in connection with Sing Sing, N. Y., as to the occupations that had been followed by the men who were in prison—I won't venture to quote the figures, but I know the comparison was not favorable to the professional man.

Mr. DARROW. Well, there are very few, comparatively, outside of poor people. There are some bankers and some lawyers. It is pretty hard for a banker to defend himself when you get him into court, and they presume he is guilty anyway of something; and also the same way with a lawyer. They are not far wrong, either. Might catch them on something. But, as a rule, they do not get into court much; but I would say 99 per cent of the people in all the prisons are poor. Their crime has been that they have tried to get something.

Commissioner LENNON. The poor, of course, are excepted in this case. I have reference to another matter.

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They can not help it when they get in jail—they simply break in. The circumstances compel them to break in?

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am talking now of the learned man. The labor agitator is held up to the police as a horrible example of a brute and a man with instincts of brute force, who cares little for life and less for the property of some one else and less for the rights of some one else, and seek to compare him with the learned man—the college man, the doctor, the lawyer, and the preacher, if you will—

Mr. DARROW (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL (continuing). Compare the number of these men that have been convicted and are in jail with their class—

Mr. DARROW (interrupting). I have no doubt there are fewer of them, but, of course, the people do not understand. They might view a surgeon as a brutal man because he cuts off a man's leg and makes the blood run. Lots of people thought that John Brown was a cruel man; but what he did he did because he loved the world and not because he hated it. Most of the labor leaders who have been imprisoned, wherever they have done the things they were charged with did them not for their personal benefit at all, but because they saw the sufferings of thousands and tens of thousands of poor and weak and out of sympathy for them; and the motives of men are everything when you come to judge them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Commissioner Weinstock was discussing the question of abolition or dissolution of jails and penitentiaries, and your suggestion that they be turned into hospitals. May I ascertain what could be done to reduce the crime necessary to keep these institutions for the home of criminals? Is not the greatest preventive of crime to do away with the things that result in crime, that cultivate crime? For instance, like lack of people having an opportunity for a fair livelihood—not even a respectable so-called livelihood, but a living opportunity?

Mr. DARROW. I believe you would get rid of nine-tenths of all the things we call crime in one generation if people had a fair chance to live. At least nine-tenths in one generation.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As, for instance, we had brought before us the other day by the police commissioner of New York, evidence regarding a condition of crime in the city of New York; and we find that the trouble when we look into it is that those people, a considerable body of people who are committing these crimes, come from the terribly dense district in New York, the east side of New York City, where people live by thousands in single buildings and in single rooms; where there are dozens that are living, working, cohabiting in every way in a single room. Is that not in itself a condition begetting crime?

Mr. DARROW. You can not prevent it by punishing as long as those conditions are there. No one who had a choice would dream of letting their own children be raised under those conditions. Still they punish the children of other people for what they can not help.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. One of these subjects that has been before this commission more or less, and at this hearing particularly—two or three gentlemen have called it everything but a respectable name, and that is the so-called union shop, known by the employers as the open and closed shop and by the union men as a union shop or a nonunion shop. The employers charge criminality of purpose, depriving the American citizen of his right to work and the American employer of his right to employ whoever he pleases and under whatever conditions he pleases, and all that. I know you have spoken and written on this subject, and I am sure the commission would be glad to know, and I would, your opinion of the so-called open shop.

Mr. DARROW. I would be glad to say just a few words about that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I would be glad if you would take your own time about it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Take considerable time, and I would be glad to have your opinion on the subject.

Mr. DARROW. Of course, there is a lot of nonsense talked about it. They talk about the inalienable right of a man to work; he has no such right; no one has a right to work, and the man who stands for the open shop does not care for anybody's rights to work, except the nonunion man, and they only care for him because they can use him. If a man has any constitutional right to work he ought to have some legal way of getting work. If the Constitution is going to guarantee the right to work, it ought to guarantee some place to work, and there is no such thing. A man can only work if there is a job; he can only work for a man who wants some man to work for him.

The workingman spends a good share of his waking moments in a shop. He does not need to invite a nonunion man into his house if he does not want to, and probably won't, and he is under no more obligation to work with him in a factory if he does not want to. If a Presbyterian does not want to work with a Catholic, he may be narrow and bigoted, but he does not have to. Of course, a union man has a direct reason for it; he believes and he understands and feels that the nonunion man is working against the interests of his class; that the only way a workingman can get anything is by collective bargaining, and by saying, "If you don't give us a raise, not only I will quit but we will all quit and tie up your business"; that is the only way he can do it. One man quitting out of 50,000 is nothing, or even 10 men or 100 men, but if they all quit, so they can do with the employer what the employer does with you, when he discharges you, then they can bargain and there is no other kind of bargaining but collective bargaining.

The nonunion man comes along and says, "I will take your place." He is not loyal to the union, and the union man regards him as a traitor to his class, and he won't work with him, and he has a perfect right to refuse to work with him.

There is no such thing as the open shop, really. There is a union shop and a nonunion shop. Everybody that believes in the open shop disbelieves in the union shop, whatever they say; and I do not say that unions are perfect, they are not. The people that work with them know that better than anybody else. They are just doing the best they can with the job they have, which is a hard one, and with the material they have, which is not perfect. In many instances they are brutal, and have to be, and it is generally like the law, and works individual hardship here and there, but it is one of the necessary things in the industrial world, and the fight is between those who believe in unions and those who disbelieve in them. Those who disbelieve in them say they believe in the open shop; but the open shop is simply a back door to put the union man out.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You think, then, the employer is not sincere in the open-shop idea?

Mr. DARROW. No; I think he is not sincere.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will adjourn until 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon at 12.30 p. m., Tuesday, May 18, 1915, an adjournment was taken until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. Will you take the stand, please, Mr. Darrow. I think we can just proceed.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Darrow, we were discussing when we took a recess the question of so-called and closed shops, from the employers' standpoint. The last question I asked you just before we adjourned was, if you believed the so-called open shop was a subterfuge?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It is therefore a snare, in a term, to induce men to believe that the employer, on his theory of the so-called open shop, is behind it, the real right of the citizenship, workmen?

Mr. DARROW. Yes; I have more respect for the integrity of the fellow that says, "I don't believe in unions and will have nothing to do with them," than the fellow that says, "I do believe in them, but want an open shop."

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The practice of having contractual relations between employer and employee is only successfully possible where there is organization of workmen?

Mr. DARROW. You can not have a contract with any large number of employees only through organized labor, organizations. One man can not do anything. There are too many men in the world and too few jobs.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The question of the right of the citizen to individually bargain for his own employment, in our present-day industrial affairs, is rather a joke, is it not?

Mr. DARROW. It doesn't mean anything. Under ideal life, which all of us fellows would like to see come, but which does not exist. I suppose there would be no unions, but that is so far ahead it is hardly worth speculating on.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If we had not had the activity of the last 25 or 30 years of organized labor in this country, what position do you think the wage-workers of this country would be occupying at the present time?

Mr. DARROW. Unless it had taken some other form, they would have been like the wage-workers of China or any other country, where there is no organization, they would simply have gradually reduced the standard of living. Competition of workmen would have prevented better working conditions and lowered the standard of living.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In a debate at Boston some years ago between President Elliot, then president of Harvard University, and Frank K. Foster, a union man, now dead, the question under debate was the following: "Has the nonunionist a moral right to work how, when, and where he pleases?" Mr. Foster had the negative side of this debate with President Elliot. Do you believe that the nonunionist has the right to work how, when, and where he pleases?

Mr. DARROW. No; I do not. I don't think anybody has that right.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If he exercised that right in what is expressed by the open shop, I take it that that is what it expresses; at least, that is what they intend to express to the workman?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If that expresses the opinion of the advocates of the so-called open shop, but is not practiced by them, what is to be the inevitable result if the wage-workers are led to believe they have this moral right under the so-called open shop, and in actuality it does not exist? Where will they be led to?

Mr. DARROW. They will be led gradually back to taking whatever they can get, reducing the standard of living, being the subject of charity, etc. That whole idea comes from the thought that a man has a right to work. He has not a right to anything unless he can get it, that is the only way you can determine rights, whether a fellow can get it or not. He has a right to work if he can get a job, is all there is to it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In your observation of the affairs of organized society, in its present form, what I mean is to say of people that come together in the form of organization, for instance, laboring people and their organizations of employers, as a rule from your general observation and legal point of view, which form of organization gives the greatest obedience to the law, as such?

Mr. DARROW. Well, I don't know; I might disagree with you somewhat on that. The rich have no trouble obeying the law, because they make it. They would be fools to break it; they simply need to change it the way they want it. It rests on the poor and the weaker class of society, who sometimes have to break it. I don't think obedience to law is necessarily one of the prime virtues. It may show servility rather than heroism or nobility.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Commissioner Weinstock asked you this morning regarding the compensation received by you in various labor cases. He stated that he would not have asked the question had not other commissioners asked similar questions of others that had been on the stand, and I said the one whom I had asked at least had declined to answer it. The impression prevails that the American Federation of Labor employed you and others to defend the McNamara brothers. Is that true?

Mr. DARROW. No; not as an organization. Certain members of it were instrumental in enlisting me, and in raising money.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you know whether the funds that were raised were the funds of union men or funds from other sources?

Mr. DARROW. They were taken from anybody that wanted to give. I think probably the majority came from union men, I assume it did, but I don't know; but they were taken from anybody that wanted to contribute.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And there were undoubtedly other contributions?
Mr. DARROW. I know there were.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I have here a complete statement of the receipts and expenditures in the McNamara defense fund, and these receipts show that a large volume of money was contributed from various sources, even the now popular moving-picture show was used?

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And of one donation I see about $25 was from one picture house in Indianapolis, and a number of other large contributions are here that indicate that it came from the public indiscriminately. That the defense fund was not raised entirely by the trade-unionists, but that they were intensely interested to the extent of contributing some finance toward this defense. I want to put this in the record, because of what I believe to be a misconceived idea on the part of the public, probably on the part of some of our commissioners, that you were employed by the American Federation of Labor to defend the McNamara brothers, and the American Federation of Labor raised the funds to carry on that defense. This will show that that is not true, with which I think you will agree.

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir; as an organization they did not do it. Some members were instrumental in doing it.

(The document referred to by the witness, entitled "Financial Report of the McNamara Defense Fund," dated Aug. 9, 1912, was submitted in printed form.)

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In addition to the question as to whether the non-unionist has a moral right to work how and when and where they please, to which I think you said you agreed, I want to file for the benefit of the record this part of the debate, taken by Mr. Foster, who is well known in trade-union matters, and a speaker of great force and a writer of force on subjects with which the trade-unionists are thoroughly familiar and are in accord.

Mr. DARROW. He is dead now?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He is dead.

(The document referred to, entitled "Has the Non-Unionist a Moral Right to Work, How, When, and Where he Pleases," by Frank K. Foster, issued by the American Federation of Labor, and dated Washington, D. C., 1912, was submitted in printed form.)

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The position of the American Federation of Labor in connection with the McNamara case is fully set forth in a pamphlet prepared by President Gompers, which shows that the American Federation of Labor, as such, took no part in the defense of the so-called McNamara case, and that the means to carry on that defense was raised by a committee of gentlemen that came together without any particular person calling them together, but being interested in seeing that the McNamara brothers got what they believed they were not getting, a fair trial, and that they would take it upon themselves to raise sufficient funds to guarantee what they believed to be a fair trial for the McNamara brothers and those involved with them. These gentlemen proceeded by different ways and activities to appeal to the trade-unionists and their sympathizers to raise the funds, and the expenditure of the funds in connection with the conduct of the case was left entirely in the hands of those who were engaged to look after it legally, were they not?

Mr. DARROW. I think so. Mainly, anyway.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There was no direction on the part of the men that raised the funds to the counsel how they should conduct the case?

Mr. DARROW. Not to me.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And you were recognized as chief counsel in the case?

Mr. DARROW. So far as the Los Angeles end of it was concerned, I was. There were other people in Indianapolis.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But the American Federation of Labor, or the gentlemen who raised the funds to carry on the defense, in no way indicated to you what you should or should not do, or those that were associated with you, in the direction of the case?

Mr. DARROW. It was left to us to manage.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The funds were sent to you without question as to how they should be used or suggesting any method as to how they should be used?

Mr. DARROW. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The American Federation of Labor, therefore, and the trade-unionists of the country took no part in the direction of how the case should proceed other than raising what they believed to be sufficient funds to conduct the case and see that the McNamara brothers got what they wanted them to have, a fair trial?

Mr. DARROW. Naturally, over 3,000 miles away, they could not and did not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So that impression that prevails among some that the American Federation of Labor or the trade-unionists of this country, whether affiliated or nonaffiliated with the American Federation of Labor, because the record shows that many organizations not affiliated with the American Federation of Labor contributed very largely toward this defense fund—that organization did not indicate to you or to those associated with you in conducting the case how this case should be tried, or intimate whether these men were innocent or guilty, but looked upon you to see, as the leading counsel, that they would receive, so far as you could bring it about, a fair and impartial trial?

Mr. DARROW. None of them ever told me whether they were guilty or innocent.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that when the McNamaras confessed to the guilt, which I understand you to say was not the case on which they had been originally indicted—

Mr. DARROW. J. B. was the case; J. J. was not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. When they did confess and acknowledge to their guilt along certain lines, that then the people who were interested in raising these funds ceased raising further funds in connection with that case and directed you accordingly, or notified you accordingly?

Mr. DARROW. There were no funds raised after that time that I know of. They did not confess; they pleaded guilty.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But when they pleaded guilty the gentlemen that were interested in raising the funds for the purpose of having these men get a fair trial, believing, as they had some reason to believe, that in the first instance they were kidnapped from the the State of Indiana, and were not receiving fair treatment in accordance with the law of that State, and had not received fair treatment, that after this confession took place, or whatever it was, these men ceased their efforts in raising further funds?

Mr. DARROW. The case was over at that time.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But so far as the McNamara case was concerned, in itself, the American Federation of Labor, as such, had nothing to do with the raising of funds, and had nothing to do with the McNamara case?

Mr. DARROW. I think various unions contributed of their funds, and I have no doubt that the bulk of the money received was by the unions, and I think the purpose, they thought their men were attacked, and they felt it their duty to defend them, but the organization did not undertake to do it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. None of the organizations, as organizations, undertook to raise this money?

Mr. DARROW. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. All the money that you received in defense of the McNamaras came through committees self appointed for the purpose of raising these funds?

Mr. DARROW. I think they were self appointed.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I happen to know, because I was one of the members of that committee.

Mr. DARROW. I know you were.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And I know of every method and means that was put forth to raise money in that case. I wish to put this pamphlet in evidence.

(The document referred to, entitled "The McNamara Case," by Samuel Gompers, issued by the American Federation of Labor in 1911, was submitted in printed form.)

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock says he has some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You were discussing the question of public opinion this morning, and the value of public opinion to organized labor, Mr. Darrow, and you expressed your views freely on what you thought public opinion amounted to, and how it was to be gotten. I want to make sure, in my mind, that I got your point of view correctly. I gather from the opinion that you expressed the fact that right or wrong did not enter into the capture of public opinion, but that public opinion was largely a question of capturing the imagination of the people, no matter what the objects in the case were. In that you seemingly differ from Abraham Lincoln, who said, as I recall the statement, "You can fool all of the people some of the time, and some of the people all the time, but you can not fool all the people all the time."

Mr. DARROW. Well, I want to say we pretty much agree on that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, if that is true, then public opinion can not be retained unless the basis for such retention is along the lines of right doing.

Mr. DARROW. You can not retain it, then.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You can not retain it?

Mr. DARROW. No, no. The righteous man suffers the same as the unrighteous. The good is crucified as often as the evil, and evil triumphs as often as the good. There is no moral purpose in the universe that we can see.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, you do not believe that in the end righteousness prevails?

Mr. DARROW. Not at all. There is no end, and nothing that prevails. The preacher is just as apt to get a cancer as a labor agitator.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is in the physical world, and you believe the same holds in the moral or ethical world?

Mr. DARROW. Well, the moral world is a question of opinions of the people who make up the world at the present time, and is constantly changing. The physical world is all we know anything about.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Mrs. Commissioner Harriman asked you this morning whether, in your opinion, you thought that arbitration was of value and importance. And will you be good enough to refresh my memory with your answer?

Mr. DARROW. I said I thought in many instances it was, and I believed in it, but did not believe in compulsory arbitration.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see. You do believe, then, in arbitration?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, evidently, I take it, that your views must have undergone a change in the last three or four years on the question of arbitration?

Mr. DARROW. Well, that is entirely possible. However, I do not recall that I said otherwise, but I may have. I have said a lot of things, and a lot of foolish things.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May I refresh your memory on the point?

Mr. DARROW. Certainly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You probably have forgotten the incident, though I have not. Several years ago, I think it was either the fall of 1910 or the spring of 1911—

Mr. DARROW. Oh, yes; I think—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). When you were in San Francisco.

Mr. DARROW. I think I remember the circumstance.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May I refresh your memory on your attitude at that time?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I was invited to appear before the labor council in San Francisco and explain to them a plan of mediation and conciliation that I had advocated—a plan that called for the chamber of commerce appointing 12 representing employers as a panel and the labor council a panel of 12 labor representatives, making a joint panel of 24, out of which, in the event of a labor dispute arising in the community, an equal number could be chosen from each panel to sit as conciliators and mediators; and I was invited, being the father of the idea, to appear before the labor council and explain the plan with a view of getting the council to approve it and to appoint 12 representatives to act on that panel. I did appear before the council and did explain it. By a coincidence you happened to be present that evening, and you were called upon to make some remarks immediately upon my having finished. As nearly as I can now recall your attitude, you said, "I have been sitting here for half an hour listening to one of your local lawyers." You paid me the honor of assuming I was a lawyer. "And he has been making an appeal to you in behalf of arbitration." I can not quote you literally now, Mr. Darrow. I can give you only the substance as I recall it. You said, "You have nothing to gain from arbitration. Arbitration is a delusion and a snare from the workers' point of view. You have tried arbitration all over the country, and what have you gotten out of it? Always the small end. Your remedy does not lie along the lines of arbitration. Your remedy lies in getting possession of the machinery for production and distribution, and getting into your own hands political machinery of the country. Don't waste your ideas in striving for arbitration. Get at the fundamentals and control those, and you will get what is coming to you." Now, I am not quoting you literally.

Mr. DARROW. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But giving the substance as near as I recall it.

Mr. DARROW. Probably you have given it about right, as I have said.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, taking the position you take to-day, it would indicate your mind had become modified on the question of arbitration, and that you have a higher regard for its merit and value to-day than you had at that time.

Mr. DARROW. Well, it is possible that I have. It is also possible that I might not have agreed with some special things you said and made statements too general. I do believe, however, that arbitration is not a solution of the labor question at all, and I do believe that the employer gets the best end of it, although the working man often improves his condition, and I think I may say generally; but it is small, and I do believe that the other things are the big things. If I left the inference that I thought it was of no value, why I have either changed my mind, or else you were entirely right, and I was entirely wrong in that matter, because I do think it is of value—some. I think it ought to be tried in many instances, and I have in many instances had to do with it. I have acted as an arbitrator in industrial cases, and I have represented the railroad unions of the United States in that way and the coal miners and many large organizations and some small ones; and I think sometimes they have done some good; and I think everything does good if it is nothing but agitation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You believe, then, from your position as it comes to my mind, then, Mr. Darrow, that it is thoroughly worth the while of this commission to do what it can in aiding the spirit of mediation, conciliation, and arbitration?

Mr. DARROW. I feel that; I think this National Commission—I don't mean your commission, but the Arbitration Commission——

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The United States Mediation Board?

Mr. DARROW. Has in many instances done some good; but I do not believe that you ought to carry with it the recommendation of compulsory arbitration.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, I don't think there is any such thought in the mind of any member of the commission.

Mr. DARROW. Well, then, that would be about my view of it; about as you seem to hold.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Among other things, in your statement this morning, Mr. Darrow, you said that—I don't know as I can frame it just exactly—but in substance I think you said that there are many men who commit acts of violence in connection with labor disputes who do not do it for selfish purposes, but do it in the interest of the common good—do it for a cause—and therefore ought to be treated accordingly?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, now, that, I take it, would apply to a case such as the McNamaras, for example?

Mr. DARROW. I said that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would you regard the McNamaras then as criminals, or martyrs to a cause?

Mr. DARROW. I said they did it in what they regarded as the interest of the public good; and I am glad to answer that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, how would you look upon them? How would you regard them? As criminals deserving punishment for their crimes, or would you look upon them as martyrs?

Mr. DARROW. There was no element that goes to make up what the world calls a criminal act, which is an act coupled with a selfish criminal motive. J. B. McNamara, an obscure printer, in a great labor fight in Los Angeles, took 16 sticks of dynamite, I think it was—about a quarter of a pound each—and went in the nighttime and deposited them in an archway of the Times Building, of course, without any intention of killing anybody, as he did not by that. It was done in the nighttime. Unfortunately it was deposited close to some barrels of ink, and they exploded. The barrels of ink became vapor and scattered through the building and set the building on fire, and there were no facilities for escape and they died. Now, let's look at it from his standpoint. That is the only way you can get at it.

If he succeeded and escaped he could get neither money nor glory; he could tell nobody he did it. If he failed, it meant a long term of imprisonment and perhaps death; what did he do it for? He did not do it for money; he did not do it for malice. He was a union man in a great industrial struggle running over the years. He believed in it, and believed it was necessary to the welfare of his class; he was thinking of the structural iron workers, of the men, women, and children living in poverty and want, and of the wonderful riches on the other hand, and in his mind he thought he was serving his class, and taking his life in his hands without reward. Now, if anyone can condemn him for it, they reason differently from myself, and they feel differently from what I do; I can not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would you say, then, Mr. Darrow, that under those circumstances, he was a criminal or a martyr?

Mr. DARROW. A criminal, as we understand the word, is one who does a thing for a low personal purpose, and he did not, and could not properly be classified that way. Under some other definitions a criminal is one who violates the law; under that definition he was like John Brown; under that definition he was a criminal; John Brown was a criminal. They were likewise martyrs; very likely Socrates had a fair trial, possibly Christ had a fair trial. Nobody disputes their motives, because they were so far away in point of time. Nobody much disputes John Brown's motives now. Some time they will not dispute the motives of any man who may unselfishly move, whether misguided or not. Everybody has not got the same brain that you have or I have; they do not see things the same way; they are more impetuous and enthusiastic and feel deeper, and you have to put yourself in another man's place, in order to judge him, and when you do that you judge him the way you judge yourself, and you excuse everything. You might say, for the safety of society, that such and such a man ought to be confined, because of the harm he might possibly do his fellow man, but to punish him for the sake of causing him suffering, no.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, from your point of view, you don't regard him as a criminal?

Mr. DARROW. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would then regard him as a martyr?

Mr. DARROW. Well, he was risking his life in a case he believed in; I would not have done it; I would not have advised it; but looking at it from his standpoint, he was a martyr.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you so regard it?

Mr. DARROW. I can only judge from his standpoint. If I had done it I would not have been, because I would think it would be futile, and I might consider that the evil that might be accomplished would be equal to the good that might be accomplished, or would be.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you had the power, would you or would you not punish him for what he did?

Mr. DARROW. I would not punish anybody for anything.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would permit him to go free, then?

Mr. DARROW. I did not say that. I explained very carefully that I might believe in the confinement and restraint of all kinds of people, but not that I would punish them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But if the power was vested in you, what would you do with a man like McNamara, living as we are in our present conditions?

Mr. DARROW. I do not know what I would do at this time. I want to see him pardoned some of these days, and I think it is pretty near time.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You doubtless are more familiar with all of the details of the method of procedure on the part of the structural iron workers than I. Will you tell us what was the fee paid by the structural iron workers to these dynamiters; how much did they get for every case of dynamiting in which they were engaged?

Mr. DARROW. I never saw any schedule; I did not know that there was any.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I can not say this authoritatively, but my impression is, from what I heard of the testimony, that they were to receive $200 for every successful case of dynamiting.

Mr. DARROW. I do not remember about that. I do not believe there was anybody, or almost nobody, that did it for money; I have no idea there was. They were all intense, fanatical union men, and everyone is a fanatic if he believes a thing strongly enough, whether he be a Christian or a union man, or whatever he may be; and they did not need anything, except they had to live, I suppose. I do not know, however, Mr. Weinstock.

Mr. WEINSTOCK. The testimony, as I recall it—I am open for correction, because I did not study it carefully—is that McManigal and every one of the men engaged in dynamiting received somewhere around $200 a case?

Mr. DARROW. I do not know that, because I do not remember to have heard any such thing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If that testimony is true, and these men did receive at the rate of $200 a case, who were engaged in work where they were only able to earn $3 or $4 or $5 a day as mechanics, it would indicate there was a profit for them?

Mr. DARROW. No; it did not indicate that they made any more money than they would in their own business, and they incurred very much more danger. Of course, the number of cases was comparatively limited as compared with their daily work. I do not think that even McManigal or any of the rest of them was in the business for profit. I think they were fighting the United States Steel Co., and had to do it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The fight, as I understand it, was for the union shop, was it not?

Mr. DARROW. I think so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, the employers refused to confine themselves to union men—

Mr. DARROW (interrupting). As I recall it—I don't know whether there was any question of wages or hours involved, or in how many cases they called strikes for the purpose of enforcing the law to put up the floors of buildings as the scaffold went up, so that they would not have quite so far to fall.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But the circumstances in this case—the fight was for the union shop; the employers had refused to recognize or deal with the unions, and the unions were making every effort at their command to have unionism recognized and dealt with, and to have the shops unionized, and that seemed to be the issue?

Mr. DARROW. That is my impression.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, under those circumstances, do you believe that the structural iron workers were justified in resulting to violence? In dynamiting properties and imperiling human life and destroying human life in order to establish the union shop?

Mr. DARROW. Well, I do not know; I think the other side did much worse. I would have to be a structural-iron worker and know the dangers and the surroundings and the fight to pass judgment on it. I would want, before I took any responsibility, to know; I would have to know. I know that everybody on both sides regards it as industrial strife, and a man who would not think of committing violence in the daily walks of life will do it; employers who would go out of their way to feed women and babies, will starve women and babies for the sake of winning their point, and no rules govern. You ask me about a theory; I do not know; that is, I do not know just what provocation it would take if I were in their place.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So you are not in a position to say clearly and definitely that you think they were not justified?

Mr. DARROW. No; I am not; I am not in a position to say that either side were not justified or that they were.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You just made the statement a few moments ago, Mr. Darrow, I have forgotten the initial, whether it was Joe or Jim McNamara, was the principal?

Mr. DARROW. J. B. McNamara.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is that Joe or Jim?

Mr. DARROW. Jim.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He was the one who put the dynamite under the Times Building?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You said he did not mean to kill anybody?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He was a printer, was he not?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And he knew that the Times was a morning paper and the printers worked all night?

Mr. DARROW. No doubt.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, how could he be ignorant of the fact that the explosion of that building would, in all likelihood, mean the death of the inmates of the building?

Mr. DARROW. There was not a chance in a thousand of it killing anybody; the explosion did kill nobody; it did not stop the machinery. Unfortunately, in setting it down, it was set down in an open alley where there was not a chance in a thousand that it would do any damage beyond scaring some one; but that day there had been a number of barrels of ink rolled in there, and, of course, the violence of the explosion made vapor of the ink and scattered it throughout the building, and it caught fire and burned. He might have thought it possible that such a thing might happen, but the chances are that he never contemplated that, and it certainly did not happen from this. There is no question about that, Mr. Weinstock; nobody, I think, disputes that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And, therefore, from your point of view, then, he was not guilty of murder.

Mr. DARROW. Are you talking about legal or moral guilt; or do you think they are the same?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I think they ought to be the same, whether they are or not.

Mr. DARROW. Well, if they are not, is it the fault of the moral or legal law? Legal and moral guilt are not the same, in my opinion, and that is all I have to go by. Under the law one who, in the commission of an offense, causes the death of another accidentally is guilty of murder. It has been carried so far that even a trifling misdemeanor that causes death, and the man has no idea of doing it; I disagree with the law utterly; but it is the law. One should be judged only by what he intends to do, but the law is that the criminal intent is made up from the result, whatever it is, and if a larger one holds the legal responsibility is there. So, legally, he was guilty of murder.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let us see whether or no he was merely guilty of murder. The statement came to me yesterday from a man who knows; he was on the situation; that this bomb was placed directly under the desk of Mr. Chandler, the son-in-law of Gen. Otis, and that by a miracle Mr. Chandler was called away at the precise moment, and his secretary occupied that desk, and the bomb shot up through the desk and forced a typewriter into the chest of the secretary.

Mr. DARROW. I do not think he told the truth.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that it was placed there with design?

Mr. DARROW. He did not tell the truth. No such thing happened, in my opinion. The bomb was placed in an alley; it did not go in the building at all, and if there was any office above it, it was certainly unknown, and the general offices were far away, and no such result followed, and nobody knows, because the whole building was in ruins after the fire. I do not think anyone honestly doubts what I have stated here as to the purpose. I know those who drew the indictment did not doubt it, and that was the statement accepted by the State's attorney on the plea.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I want to ask one question. Now, Commissioner Weinstock was asking about your agreeing to arbitration of industrial disputes, in which you agree with him; I take it, in your agreement with Mr. Weinstock on the question of arbitration, you have in mind that arbitration is only fair and can be successful only when the wage earners are organized on the one side?

Mr. DARROW. No one will bother to arbitrate with one man.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I do not know what Mr. Weinstock had in mind. In speaking of railroad questions, the fact that it has been successful at all is because the railroad men have been organized; they have been able to gather and expend large sums of money in gathering statistics and to go into arbitration with the employers as an organization. As unorganized men they would be utterly unable to go into arbitration on an equal basis under those conditions.

Mr. DARROW. You can not arbitrate without organization.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As, for instance, the brotherhoods. Mr. Garretson was a member of a commission that gave assent to the statement made by me the other day that the arbitration in the Eastern railroads, which occurred recently, and of which Seth Low was chairman, that it cost the brotherhoods in that case over a quarter of a million dollars to gather statistics and prepare to go into arbitration?

Mr. DARROW. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the Western case, just closed—in that matter it cost nearly a million dollars on the side of labor, and no one can tell what it cost the other side in preparing to go into arbitration. If arbitration is going to be as expensive as that, then in no manner could it be successful unless the men on the one side were organized and prepared to gather the proper statistics and information to go into arbitration successfully.

Mr. DARROW. You can not do without it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Therefore if we are going to recommend arbitration we must also recommend organization with it on both sides?

Mr. DARROW. I suppose that was assumed. There is no one to arbitrate with unless there is a union, and I suppose Mr. Weinstock assumes that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There could not be successful arbitration without it?

Mr. DARROW. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And when an employer suggests arbitration and connects it with the open shop, then there is no sincerity of purpose on his part, or he does not know what arbitration means?

Mr. DARROW. There must be organization to have it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, Mr. Darrow; you will be excused.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JAMES A. EMERY.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state your name?

Mr. EMERY. James A. Emery.

Chairman WALSH. What is your profession?

Mr. EMERY. Lawyer.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you practice, or where is your place of residence, rather?

Mr. EMERY. It is in Maryland; I have offices here and in New York.

Chairman WALSH. Please briefly sketch your professional career; you understand what we have asked of the other witnesses, to get your viewpoint or angle.

Mr. EMERY. I began the practice of law in San Francisco in 1899, and some three years afterwards became counsel for the local association of employers, associate counsel.

Chairman WALSH. In San Francisco?

Mr. EMERY. Yes; and thus became interested, through intimate contact with questions arising out of industrial disputes that led to litigation.

I came east on private business in 1904 and 1905, and in the course of my eastern visits I became acquainted with officials of employers and manufacturers' organizations in the East, because of my contact with similar matters in the West, and afterwards became associated with the employers' movement in the East. Since that time I have become counsel for a large number of associations of employers and manufacturers, practically confining my work in recent years to work as counsel and interesting myself in both phases of litigation and proposed legislation, together with a great deal of work that had nothing whatever to do with labor matters, but was confined particularly to the conduct of business in interstate commerce.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please indicate the organizations with which you have been connected professionally?

Mr. EMERY. Why, the National Association of Manufacturers is the largest and best known, and I have been also counsel, and am now, for some 250 organizations of employers and manufacturers in different parts of the United States.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Emery, you understand the matter we are considering is the relation of the law to labor.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The attitude of the courts, the trend of decisions, and the light on industrial disputes, and I understand that you have been kind enough to prepare a paper covering some points that you think are significant, and asked for in our outlines, and will you be kind enough to give it to us without specific questioning?

Mr. EMERY. I have not prepared a paper because of the fact that I found that those that did necessarily covered much ground covered by others, and to save the time of the commission and to avoid the repetition of statements I would rather follow the suggestions that the commission have given me for consideration, and so far as any inquiry, the commission can assist me by contributing any fact that you regard as valuable to this matter.

Chairman WALSH. Will you take those parts of the outline that you deem have not been covered, and give your idea, without specific questioning from the commission? We may have some questions to ask you afterwards.

Mr. EMERY. I would like to preface this statement with this observation, that the point of view of any individual who looks at any of these highly important questions, not merely as lawyers, but as men, is necessarily influenced by the fundamental concepts with which to prejudice the discussion. The gentleman that preceded me has discussed these matters and their important relations from the standpoint of his philosophy of life and law, and I must necessarily do the same. Perhaps with that statement and the fact that as a lawyer I accept as binding upon me in construing the law the decisions of the highest courts, that as a man I recognize the individuals making up the universe as having moral responsibility. I can not conceive them as automaton, who are merely acting in obedience to the human machinery installed by the unknown Hand, and consequently can act without responsibility, because they necessarily obey the law of their being. I can not concede that to be the philosophy upon which individuals or society can work out a safe existence, so I preface whatever I may say in regard to these things, predicated the discussion upon the fundamental idea of moral responsibility. Of course, it is utterly impossible for two men to discuss any matter in which they fundamentally differ, especially such matters as are treated here, without that consideration. It is impossible for two men to discuss moral responsibility one of whom believes that individuals have free will and the other who believes they have not and are creatures of circumstances, controlled by minds of passion, and are as irresponsible as the breezes that blow the trees.

The commission has inquired in one of the questions whether I have formed any opinion as to what may be called the attitude of the courts in labor cases, and if so, to please outline it. I assume the commission to mean "in labor cases" to mean not only in labor disputes but cases involving social disputes, such as hours and wages and working conditions?

Chairman WALSH. The word probably should have been industrial causes.

Mr. EMERY. I assume, too, that by "attitude" you mean attitude of mind on the part of officers of the courts?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir; or any particular trend of decisions, if you have observed such.

Mr. EMERY. Well, I think there is a very obvious change in the public attitude toward social legislation, which is reflected in the much more greater investigation of the facts upon which social legislation is now being predicated, with the result that cases presented to courts are more carefully prepared in the first instance, and where they are test cases, they are more carefully selected, so that the test may decide the real issue of law, and finally that the investigations of facts are more thorough and more comprehensive and more frequently in the hands of those that are best qualified to make that investigation. I say that is particularly true with what we might call social legislation, which is frequently before the courts where it involves the regulation of hours, wages, and working conditions; and which was confronted always with the limitations that are necessarily placed upon the acts of legislatures by the guaranties of our Constitution, which undertake to protect the freedom of contract of the individual and which do not permit property to be taken without due process of law or persons deprived of liberty. That, of course, is subject to the right of the States to protect the health, morals, and welfare of its citizens, and having once chosen a policy to be the sole judge of the policy involved, into which I understand no court inquires, but it is bound to do when legislative power is concerned with a subject that it has in hand.

I think that most of the criticism of the courts in these matters in labor cases is due to the fact that the cases are not adequately presented to the court, and the legislation is often loosely and badly drawn so that it does not affect its purpose directly. The courts are naturally, I think, from their very nature conservative institutions. It is their purpose to interpret the law, not to make it. These people during the early period of our own generation, particularly coming from the stock we do, we set perhaps an almost undue value upon the preservation of the fundamental liberties which the Government has been founded on to practically safeguard and establish, and to which end not only have powers been granted to legislatures but very significant and serious limitations have been placed upon their acts. Of course, everyone or no one can fully discuss the attitude of our courts without realizing that our form of government is not a mere matter of chance, but it has reflected in every phase of its constitutional provisions a thousand years of English government, and that everything that was put in there was with due regard to the protection of rights that represented the slow process of the English people through five or six hundred years of continued effort to protect themselves against continued power.

So far as I have been able to see, there is no prevalent attitude or prejudice or antagonism to social legislation as such, but it has been the evident desire of courts to have clearly shown in them, where the question is raised for their adjudication, that the exercise of the power in question is within the authority of the body exercising it, and the presumption of whose lawful exercise is naturally in their favor. The power is not arbitrary, because for every single case we have it, while there has been public discussion over the exercise of legislative power, I think the courts, over a long period of time show that again and again and again there have been sometimes groups in the minority, sometimes in an organized majority that has been the victim of arbitrary exercise of power. I had this thought practically forced home upon me recently by the necessity of examining cases that arose after the Civil War. When we find that the States after the Rebellion were placing all sorts of the severest form of restrictions of civil rights on those that had participated in the civil struggle, and there was no relief for them except in the courts, and the effort to pass bills of attainder were constant. You recollect in your own State the priest that was unable to take the ironclad oath was also kept from giving the last sacrament to a dying man. Such incidents were common, and the people that have suffered much from it have realized its meaning, and have been proud and emphatic in the assertion of their powers, and when we run into a case of that kind there is a strong instinct to get to those happy illustrations of Mr. Darrow—a spectacular creation of public sentiment for a movement, and if the court does not readily respond it is immediately condemned as prejudiced.

I think, moreover, Mr. Chairman, that if any gentlemen will examine the cases which have brought social legislation to the eye of the Supreme Court most recently and most effectively—I refer to the Lockner case, which has been very much criticized, in which the New York baker's law was involved, and the Muller case, in which the Supreme Court sustained the Oregon law, making a distinction between the hours of labor for women and for men; and the recent supreme court decision in the State of New York on the subject of night work for women, as well as the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on the Ohio law, with respect to the compensation act—that he must appreciate the fact that there is no lack of economic discussion between the justices either of the Supreme Court or of the appellate courts when the facts are presented to them for consideration. Anyone who reads the argument of Mr. Louis Brandeis on the minimum-wage law, recently submitted, will find the economic necessity for the legislation and the basis for it as an evidence that the power is not necessarily exercised is the chief subject of his discussion throughout the entire time before the court; and if you read the dissenting opinions as well as the assenting opinions of the judges in the Lockner case or in the Muller case you will find that they are devoted very largely to the discussions of statistical information and as to the economic views of the position of women in industry. Thus, for instance—and I merely take this as typical—I call your attention to the court's decision in the Muller case, as to the care with which the court considers these matters in its decisions.

The court said:

"In patent cases counsel are apt to open the argument with a discussion of the state of the art. It may not be amiss in the present case, before examining the constitutional question, to notice the course of legislation as well as expressions of opinion from other than judicial sources."

Now the court said again:

"In the brief filed by Mr. Louis D. Brandeis for the defendant in error is a very copious collection of all these matters, an epitome of which is found in the margin. * * *

"That woman's physical structure and the performance of maternal functions place her at a disadvantage in the struggle for subsistence is obvious. This is especially true when the burdens of motherhood are upon her. Even when they are not, by abundant testimony of the medical fraternity, continuance for a long time on her feet at work, repeating this from day to day, tends to injurious effects upon the body, and, as healthy mothers are essential to vigorous offspring, the physical well-being of woman becomes an object of public interest and care in order to preserve the strength and vigor of the race. * * *

"Doubtless there are individual exceptions, and there are many respects in which she has an advantage over him; but looking at it from the viewpoint of the effort to maintain an independent position in life she is not upon an equality. Differentiated by these matters from the other sex she is properly placed in a class by herself, and legislation designed for her protection may be sustained, even when like legislation is not necessary for men and could not be sustained. It is impossible to close one's eyes to the fact that she still looks to her brother and depends upon him. Even though all restrictions on political, personal, and contractual rights were taken away, and she stood, so far as statutes are concerned, upon an absolutely equal plane with him, it would still be true that she is so constituted that she will rest upon and look to him for protection; that her physical structure and a proper discharge of her maternal functions—having in view not merely her own health, but the well-being of the race—justify legislation to protect her from the greed as well as the passion of man. The limitations which this statute places upon her contractual powers, upon her right to agree with her employer as to the time she shall labor are not imposed solely for her benefit, but also largely for the benefit of all. Many words can not make this plainer. The two sexes differ in structure of body, in the functions to be performed by each, in the amount of physical strength, in the capacity for long-continued labor, particularly when done standing, the influence of vigorous health upon the future well-being of the race, the self-reliance which enables one to assert full rights, and in the capacity to maintain the struggle for subsistence. This difference justifies a difference in legislation, and upholds that which is designed to compensate for some of the burdens which rest upon her."

I merely point that out as evidence of the fact that economic considerations receive continuous care from the courts.

Chairman WALSH. At that point I am going to ask you, Mr. Emery, have you observed any difference in the trend of decisions so far as upholding personal rights is concerned, where the cases are political, like the Cummings case, this case of that priest—that is, where it affected a whole class in their political rights—do you see any line of demarcation in the tendency of the decisions in political cases and of those in cases with an economic base?

Mr. EMERY. Yes; because I think that there is less difference of opinion over the protection of political rights than there is with reference to the nature as well as the protection of economic rights.

For instance, I think I may refer to the time of the minimum-wage discussion. When that first came up there was a wave of feeling sprung up over the country to the effect that perhaps the minimum wage (low wages) was perhaps the chief cause of immorality among women. Now, later researches of those who have been especially interested in the sending and propagating the minimum-wage idea have apparently relegated the minimum wage as a cause of immorality to the rear. However, I think if it had been—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You said the minimum wage or the low wages?

Mr. EMERY. The low wage. I speak of the minimum wage as the expression of the movement to protect against the low wage.

Now, at the time that discussion first came up and during the time it was attracting great attention in the press, the tendency was to believe that that was the chief cause—the economic cause, and perhaps if not the chief cause, one of the great primary causes of immorality. I say that idea economically has been abandoned by people most strong to advance it. Now, to say the court was not immediately responsive to the first statement of that proposition would simply mean that the court was waiting for the crystallization of opinion. It seems to me that wherever an economic opinion is sustained by inquiry, until it may be said to be the fixed, calm judgment of the public, or of that portion of it that are interested in these questions sufficiently to express themselves, that there is little difficulty in translating into law a dominant, well thought, and considered public opinion. But during that period of crystallization it is very easy for those who are strongly attached to the necessity for a change to accuse those who do not act as speedily as they do with a lack of sympathy or with a prejudice against the cause.

Now, the minimum-wage law has been argued before the Supreme Court, and argued with great elaboration as to economic conditions. Moreover, I would like to call the commission's attention to the fact that when we discussed whether or not these economic questions are passed upon by a court in accordance with sound, economic views, or by a court which is well informed on economic questions, we may very well ask to what school of economics we refer. You can take a number of professors of economics and put them on this stand, and you will find a great variety of opinion among them on economic questions. Here is one man who believes in the economics of Adam Smith; here is another who is an adherent of the doctrines of John Stuart Mill, and here is one that is an advocate of the more modern school; and among others you will find those having doubts about the correctness of anything, which merely calls itself pragmatic. To which school is the judge to be sent for his necessary economic information? Is he to accept the composite of all of these, or the doctrines of any one of them? Is he to attend the economic school of those who would concur entirely with the preceding witness on his fundamental concept of life, or to join that school which entirely disagrees with him? So that in selecting a university for the education of judges on economic subjects, there would be quite a diversity of opinion as to which school they ought to attend.

As to the use of the law for the purpose of bringing social benefit and protection to the health or morals of our workers, the courts have sustained with, it seems to me, increasing progress the tendency toward that as rapidly as modern economic science has ceased to be as much of a pseudo-science and become fixed principles. So I think that much of the judicial diffidence on this subject is due not to lack of progress among judges but the lack of agreement of opinion among economists.

Chairman WALSH. Has it been your experience that labor organizations and that individual workers are reluctant to present their cases for judicial determination?

Mr. EMERY. It has been my experience as a lawyer that everybody is reluctant to get into court. That question is a somewhat difficult one to answer directly, Mr. Chairman. It involves the expression of opinion.

Chairman WALSH. I think, however, Mr. Emery, you can catch the drift of it. You have heard a great deal of testimony, you understand.

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And when I say that, I am adopting the language in this instance of those who claim to have been reluctant. You have heard them on the witness stand here.

Mr. EMERY. Why, I have heard many representatives of organized labor discuss the reluctance of labor organizations to appeal to the courts—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). You have heard the expression here about their not getting a square deal in personal-injury cases, and heard the expression of some men that I have considered heretofore rather conservative, saying to pay no attention to injunctions, and all that sort of thing?

Mr. EMERY. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That is what I am directing your attention to.

Mr. EMERY. Yes. I think there is no department of law in which the worker has had so much just cause for impatience with his treatment, and one that has produced such a sense of injustice as in connection with personal injuries. The law has been very slow, indeed, in conforming the protection of personal rights to the changing conditions in industry. But our civilization has been modified so fast that perhaps while it is not an excuse, it is an explanation of the omission; that in many departments of government the machinery of the Government has not kept up with the rapid change in human life. And the courts are naturally slow by their very nature. They are not leaders. They follow the course of thought, because taking its basis in the common law, the law grew up out of the habits and expressions of its opinions.

As Mr. Justice Holmes, in his remarkable volume on the History of the Common Law, calls to our attention, it is merely the experience of mankind, or the experience of the English-speaking people, and the common law expressed their historical development. And these views and rules which grew up under very simple conditions and were very fair and just with respect to those conditions did not change as rapidly as the conditions themselves have, and thus, while fair as to the conditions out of which they grew, they became unfair and incapable of doing exact justice, or even approximate justice, under the conditions which rapidly grew up.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any suggestions to make with reference to the methods of present social and economic questions?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Then, though I deem it to be pretty well answered by what you have said, have you any suggestion along the line of perhaps any more definite or specific rule of practice that might be adopted to get such questions into the case or to get such information into the case? How could it be done—just by the introduction of testimony?

Mr. EMERY. I can not see any difficulty in presenting that point of view to the court. The Supreme Court of the United States finds no difficulty in hearing the economic side of the minimum-wage question. The New York Court of Appeals has, as part of its opinion on the recent female labor law limiting night work for women, paid a special tribute to the character of the investigation which presented the economic phases of the subject to the courts.

Chairman WALSH. Your idea would be just to present it as testimony by calling experts or by what other means of information you might have at hand and putting it in the record and let the court pass on it?

Mr. EMERY. Now, I suppose, Mr. Chairman, that when a State presents a case of police enactment it will present to the court, so far as it may, the evidence as to the facts and conditions on which the police power is predicated, and I say I think very frequently the cause of the failure of our courts to respond as quickly to what may be termed the reform social legislation is the failure to adequately present the case. Now, that occurs in other departments of law with great frequency. You will recollect the nature of the first decision under the Sherman Act, which is said to have caused us twenty-four or twenty-five years of fruitless litigation. That was the Sugar case, and Senator Edmunds criticized it years afterwards as a case that had been inadequately and improperly presented to the Supreme Court, and it resulted in a decision which has been a plague to the profession and business ever since.

Chairman WALSH. What is your attitude toward the existing legal liability of trades-unions, for acts committed as organizations?

Mr. EMERY. Do you mean, do I believe that they ought to be liable?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. First, should they be liable; and if they should, then how can it thus be enforced—that liability? That would involve the question as to whether or not they should be incorporated, and all that you have heard?

Mr. EMERY. Yes. I believe that every organization should be liable for its acts. It is axiomatic to say that there should be no power without corresponding responsibility, no matter who exercises it or what class in society exercises it.

The present state of the law is of course that voluntary associations can not be sued in State courts where they have not been given legal personality for the purpose of suit. Neither can they sue. On the other hand, the individual members of the labor organization become liable for the acts of their members within the scope of their employment. That state of the law of course results in this that a few individuals who have been fortunate enough or provident or frugal enough to get some of this world's goods and make a saving, become responsible, as a matter of law, for the more reckless or criminal of their fellow members—the condition of course which they recognize in associating themselves with them. Perhaps, socially speaking, it may have the effect of causing the more responsible in the material sense of the word of an organization to exert their influence more in the conduct of affairs in the organization; but it has never seemed to me an entirely just matter, but one that is difficult to avoid because of the lack of pecuniary responsibility of those composing the labor organizations.

The incorporation of trades-unions is a matter upon which I must confess that I have had a divided opinion because of the naked difficulty of the incorporation—the difficulty of limiting the liability with due regard for the rights of those who may be injured by the acts of the combination. It is easy to incorporate them to such a point that, not having of course capital stock or share capital, they might dispose of their funds in such a manner that a suit is vain. And predicated my conclusion on the proposition that no organization should be permitted to exert power that will not be responsible for the injury that it may do to others when the exertion of that power is injurious, it seems to me that an incorporation in the ordinary acceptance of the term “incorporate” is not sufficient; but that the State should probably give labor organizations a legal status—I am speaking of the organization as such irrespective of its members—so that it can sue and be sued as voluntary associations may be, and assume such control or provide for such control of its funds as will make it responsible within its limit for such injuries as it does. I say this with respect to labor organizations, but it has reference also to organizations of employers, or to any organization that can be party to labor disputes resulting in injury to others. I do not care whether it is the immediate parties to the dispute, or the innocent bystander that gets shot in the course of the conflict, he is entitled to reparation for that injury.

Chairman WALSH. What do you consider has been the great effect of injunctions upon the outcome of individual disputes? Have they served a purpose one way or the other?

Mr. EMERY. I think they have served a very important purpose. Injunctions issued in labor disputes, despite a good deal of wild talk, are generally obeyed. The great body of the working people of the country are law-abiding men, and whether they agree or disagree with the view which the court takes, they generally obey its order. And I think the injunction has been a tremendous conservator not only of property but of life; and it seems to me that you can not have a more striking illustration of it as a social remedy for these conditions which too frequently, unhappily, exist in a labor dispute—you can not have a better illustration than is presented in the two West Virginia cases, one of which will immediately arouse the critics of the injunction; but the other of which admits of but little dispute. I referred to the recent strike in West Virginia, accompanied by the use of the military, and much bloodshed on both sides. Prior to that you had the case of the Hickman Coal Co. v. Mitchell, in which case an injunction was issued by the lower court against a number of members of the coal miners' organization and their officers, and which injunction was substantially obeyed. So that the acts of violence and intimidation and interference with personal rights ceased, and a condition in which there had been much disorder and threats of life and destruction of property stopped. On the other hand, you had the military called out against the same organization, under exactly the same conditions, and you had wholesale riot, bloodshed, and destruction of property. In the one case you had the peaceful process of the law, which was generally obeyed; on the other hand you had the military force undertaking to put down disorder with the bayonet.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there is no chance for difference of opinion as to the comparison between the peaceful order of a court issued in a proper case and a bayonet control, because society, quite apart from the employer or the employee, will not submit to a condition of insurrection or disturbance or disorder that interferes with all the functions and duties upon which modern society is dependent for its continued existence, because one of the first features of all these cases is the interference with and injury which they do not only to the employer and employee, but to the great number of people who are not parties to the conflict, and in which disturbances the property of innocent parties is not only injured but destroyed. And you have cases, such as the Debs case, where it is the Government that intervenes for protection of its own functions, so that the carriage of mail and the performance of the duties of the Government itself can be carried on without interference by private parties determined to stop operations even of the Government itself in order to accomplish their purpose.

Now, no matter what form of government you have, you can not have a condition like that. And as society moves on and as material civilization develops and becomes more complex, it becomes more interdependent, one part on another; and you can to-day starve a great city by cutting off transportation; and you can accomplish the same purpose, not only by cutting off the things necessary for daily food but for the production of those things for which their daily activities are exerted. And if they do not obey the orders of the court where the court's orders are issued in a proper case—quite apart from the testimony as to this or that case, but assuming the proper exercise of that power—then if they do not obey, if they do not obey the equity power, there is nothing left for the protection of life or property except force.

Chairman WALSH. Might there be any modification of the mode of procedure in individual cases that might reduce friction in regard to the application of the practice?

Mr. EMERY. Well, what particular method of procedure do you allude to?

Chairman WALSH. Well, any feature. There are claims, for instance, made that injunctions are issued without notice or without proper notice; that restraining orders are issued returnable at remote periods which may affect the outcome of the strike, the persons upon whom they are served not understanding them thoroughly, and so forth. You know the common—

Mr. EMERY (interrupting). Yes; so far as the issuance of injunctions without notice is concerned, there are cases in which the issuance of such orders may be absolutely indispensable. And in no legislation that has been offered to Congress by the American Federation of Labor itself has there ever been a line that questioned the propriety of the issuance of injunctions without notice under proper circumstances. In fact, when Mr. Karl Spelling was counsel for the American Federation of Labor I remember very well his argument before the Judiciary Committee of the House, in which I participated, that he made that very statement, and made it clearly that they were not objecting to the proper issuance of injunctions without notice.

Now, it is a fact that injunctions are sometimes issued and made returnable at a remote time. I have seen cases where I thought there was a considerable lapse of time between the injunction and the hearing; but on examination of the record it was discovered that the judge sitting for a very large circuit was under the necessity of appearing in another part of the circuit, and issued the injunction and put it over for a week or 10 days until he could return to that point. But of course the fact must not be overlooked that the statute affecting Federal injunctions provides that the party against whom the injunction is issued has the unquestioned right to make a motion for dissolution immediately where the injunction is issued without notice to the opposite party. And in addition to that, in our practice in the appeal of orders granting injunctions to the circuit court of appeals, appeals from the order issuing the injunction of that kind have precedent under the practice act at the present time. And under the equity rules adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States, which are binding upon all Federal courts, every effort has been made by that court itself to expedite the hearing of injunction cases.

Now, of course, I insist, Mr. Chairman, and I should be glad to be presented with a case which disputes that conclusion, that there is no different rule and no different principle involved in the issuance of injunctions in labor cases than is involved in the issuance of injunctions in other disputes that have nothing to do with conflicts of that character. And I do not see, as Mr. Darrow has aptly put it, that that is a mere abstraction. I say that there are a number of concrete cases that illustrates that precisely the same thing to which laboring men object in connection with the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes is applied to other combinations in other disputes; and they are forbidden to do the same things without any question on the part of the public or anybody else. I can not use an illustration that will bring that home better perhaps. I will say let us take a case as to which we hear much criticism that the fact that the court enjoins a man from the freedom of locomotion. He is enjoined from going to a particular place to do a particular thing. Well, in all cases in which an injunction is issued against the doing of an unlawful act or a carrying out of an unlawful purpose, or the interfering with some established right, the moment that the combination is formed or undertakes to do an unlawful or criminal thing, then, of course, every act of the combination, however innocent in itself, is made unlawful by the purpose for which it is accomplished. That seems to be a proposition that is often in dispute in these cases; so that if you will permit me I will simply call attention to the fact that in the everyday affairs of life, without any contention as to the law, that condition is recognized by every one of us everywhere.

In the famous White murder case, the case in which Daniel Webster made his famous speech, which has been recited, I suppose, by every schoolboy, a citizen exercised the right of free locomotion walking up and down the streets of a New England village at the midnight hour, and he was tried and convicted and hung for a crime, because the purpose for which he walked up and down the village streets was to warn his accomplice who was at that time engaged in killing an old man in the first sleep at night. The walking up and down on that street was not an absolute crime. He had the right of free locomotion on the village streets for lawful purposes. But when he walked there in order that he might inform his accomplice of the approach of the police, in order that he might accomplish his crime, the innocent act of walking up and down that street became in itself a crime.

That is true of all these acts which are the subject of dispute in these cases. We speak of free speech. We say that men are enjoined from persuading a person to quit, and from persuading him to break a contract, persuading him to do this or that thing. Well, now, of course, the mere persuading by itself can not be an unlawful act. The purpose of the act—of the persuading—is what makes it good or bad. If I persuade you to do a lawful thing, no one, of course, can object to that, unless we happen to be persuading each other in a place where we interfere with traffic, or undertake to prevent others from their accustomed use of the sidewalk. But to say that the use of an injunction issued against the use of the tongue, with which to perform an unlawful act, is an interference with free speech, merely points out the fact that the tongue has no privilege over the other members of the body, and as a man commits crimes with his hands and his feet, or his head, and as it is possible to enjoin the use of his hands or his feet or his head to do some unlawful thing, the other conditions being proper, it is also proper to use the injunction in connection with the use of the tongue.

Now, to illustrate that, if you will turn at any time, any of you gentlemen, to a very familiar case, that of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad v. Bitterman, you will find a case in which round-trip tickets to a fair or some place of popular assemblage were sold at a special round-trip rate, and where this process was used by the railroad for the purpose of preventing their resale. The person buys that ticket and goes to that destination and only uses one-half of the ticket, and then a scalper comes along and offers him so much for his ticket, and he sells it, and the scalper buys it, and the person has made as much out of the ticket as the cost of the ride. Now, the railroads suffered very much from activities of the combined scalpers in many of our large cities; you would see these scalpers' offices on the side streets and would see advertisements in the papers offering to buy return tickets of certain kinds and railroads, and offering so much. Now, to get at the scalpers, the railroads went into court under the general equity powers to enjoin the scalpers from undertaking to produce a breach of the contract between the railroads and customers to whom they had sold the tickets, because they had sold the tickets under an express agreement printed on it that it would be used by the person who purchased it, and that he would not—that he would use it himself and not dispose of it to another. The scalpers induced him to sell the ticket to them, and in this particular case they even advertised in the newspapers of the city of Louisville, Ky., that they would buy tickets to or from such a place, and even that they would pay so much for them. In this case the Supreme Court enjoined the scalpers from persuading the individual passenger to breach his contract with the railroad company that he would not sell his ticket, but use it himself or not at all, and to enjoin the scalpers from advertising that they would buy these tickets, which they regarded as a method of inducing a breach of contract.

Now, of course, the term "breach of contract" need not astound anybody as a technical term. It is nothing more nor less than a breach of an agreement between men that one shall do something for the other for a consideration. A man can not sell or buy or secure a service unless by agreement with someone by which he is to get or give something; and ever since we have had a society among the English-speaking people we have protected that agreement between two people to do something, and have protected it from interference by outside parties who have tried to step in and make one man refuse to do what he had agreed to do for a consideration. Now, there were no public meetings held in the United States when the Louisville & Nashville decision came out in the Bitterman case. There was no organization of scalpers over this country who came down and petitioned to Congress that they had been deprived of their constitutional right of free speech, having been deprived of the opportunity to buy these tickets from the passengers; and the passengers did not even hold an indignation meeting.

Chairman WALSH. Are injunctions issued fewer at the present time than formerly in labor disputes?

Mr. EMERY. I should say on the whole that the courts are much more careful in the issuance of injunctions in labor disputes than they have been, because, naturally, of the criticism that has been directed to the issuance of injunctions in labor cases. So that courts, as a general rule, have got to be satisfied of a very strong case before issuing an injunction. I think, for instance, in the District of Columbia, here, and I take it as an example of the care which surrounds many of the Federal courts—I have not seen the record certainly for many years of the issuance of a restraining order. I don't know that there has been any injunction issued outside of those issued in labor disputes here, and there have been only four or five issued that I know of in the last four or five years; but in all those cases the application for a restraining order was refused and an injunction issued only after hearing.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether there is any relation between the efficiency of the local police and the necessity for injunction?

Mr. EMERY. How is that?

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to ask you, do you think there is any relation between the efficiency of the local police and the necessity for injunction?

Mr. EMERY. I think there is a very intimate relation between the proper administration of law by executive authority and the issuance of injunctions. It would often not be necessary, if the local police would perform their duty in the matter of protecting people against intimidations.

Chairman WALSH. What is the position of the National Association of Manufacturers with regard to the practice of boycotting? What has been the position?

Mr. EMERY. The National Association of Manufacturers adopted an expression on that subject some years ago, and if you will permit me, I will read this. It is very brief, but expresses the platform adopted by them, because it relates to all of the subjects you wished to inquire. It was adopted at the New Orleans convention of the National Association of Manufacturers in 1903 [reading]:

"(1) Fair dealing is the fundamental and basic principle on which relations between employees and employers should rest.

"(2) The National Association of Manufacturers is not opposed to organizations of labor, as such, but it is unalterably opposed to boycotts, black lists, and other illegal acts of interference with the personal liberty of employer or employee.

"(3) No person should be refused employment or in any way be discriminated against on account of membership or nonmembership in any labor organization, and there should be no discrimination against or interference with any employee who is not a member of a labor organization by members of such organization.

"(4) With due regard to contracts, it is the right of the employee to leave his employment whenever he sees fit, and it is the right of the employer to discharge any employee when he sees fit.

"(5) Employers must be free to employ their workpeople at wages mutually satisfactory without interference or dictation on the part of individuals or organizations not directly parties to such contracts.

"(6) Employers must be unmolested and unhampered in the management of their business, in determining the amount and quality of their product, and in the use of any methods or systems of pay which are just and equitable.

"(7) In the interest of the employees and employers of the country no limitation should be placed upon the opportunities of any person to learn any trade in which he or she may be adapted.

"(8) The National Association of Manufacturers disapproves absolutely of strikes and lockouts, and favors an equitable adjustment of all differences between employers and employees by an amicable method that will preserve the rights of both parties.

"(9) The National Association of Manufacturers pledges itself to oppose any and all legislation not in accord with the foregoing declaration."

Chairman WALSH. To what extent to you consider that it is desirable that Federal action should be extended in connection with labor disputes and in the regulation of labor conditions generally? I would like to have you discuss the proposition that we have heard from time to time with reference to the extension of the principles of the Erdman Act.

Mr. EMERY. Of course, the Erdman Act is a method of bringing employer and employee together for the discussion of their differences, and it is applied to corporations which, while private in their nature, are dedicated to the public service. And I think that the principle of investigation into labor disputes, within the Federal jurisdiction, that are of the nature that affect the commerce between the States, is a principle to be encouraged in a way, I believe. I do not believe in compulsory arbitration. It is not possible in this country. I think that these experiments within reasonable limits would better conditions and the relations between employer and employee, with due regard to the rights of each and of the public, and it should be given a fair trial.

Chairman WALSH. What do manufacturers in this country think in regard to uniformity in the application of labor laws throughout the United States, if you can gather any consensus from them?

Mr. EMERY. I think manufacturers as a whole are, I know them to be, very much concerned, indeed, about uniformity in legislation on any subject that relates or is in relation to employer and employee, or relates to the doing of business by combinations. They suffer very greatly from a lack of uniformity. A man has to do business in 48 sovereignties under 48 types of law, and he finds himself very frequently in difficulty, not only great inconvenience, but put to enormous expense, if not the real violation of some law of the State. I speak of those engaged in interstate commerce, and that constitutes about 90 per cent of the business of this country, and what we may call interstate business. About 90 per cent of commodities produced in this country are consumed outside of the State of their production.

Chairman WALSH. I will not ask you for any suggestive remedies, because I believe you have been asked in a more formal way. I understand that we will have your advice on some proposed laws to be gotten up?

Mr. EMEBY. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I know you would want to give them consideration anyway after they are drafted?

Mr. EMEBY. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock has some questions he wishes to ask you.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You were present, Mr. Emery, when Mr. Darrow was on the witness stand?

Mr. EMEBY. Most of the time.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it that your views on the questions that were discussed while Mr. Darrow was on the stand come from a different angle, an angle that to this commission would be important. I would like to get your opinion.

Mr. EMEBY. We probably would disagree also as to facts in some of the instances stated.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I would like to get your judgment on some of the points on which Mr. Darrow expressed himself very fully. You may recall that in the case of the McNamaras the question was put to Mr. Darrow, "Do you regard the McNamaras as criminals or martyrs?" And as near as I can epitomize his answer, it was of some length, he left in my mind that looking at the situation through the eyes of the McNamaras he would not regard them as criminals. His distinction between a criminal and a martyr is that the criminal commits a crime for a selfish act; the martyr does things that are unlawful for the common good; that what he believes to be a common good. Now, if we are to take Mr. Darrow's definition, and if the point of differentiation between the criminal and the martyr rests where he places it, is it or is it not a fact then that men like Booth and Guiteau and Czolgosz, who assassinated three Presidents of the United States, from unselfish motives and had nothing to gain by it individually, but were doing it, as they believed, for the common good—was it then not a national crime to treat those assassins as criminals, and should they not have been canonized and lauded and held up as martyrs?

Mr. EMEBY. They have been in some instances. You recollect for many years they had an annual celebration in Chicago in honor of the martyrs, so called, in the Haymarket Square trouble. Mr. Darrow very properly says that martyrdom depends upon one's part of view. Very few people regarded Mr. Czolgosz, or whatever his name was, as a martyr. There were undoubtedly a few that did. There were men that wrote letters at the time of Guiteau's trial that indicated that they believed that Guiteau was performing what he believed to be an act of self-sacrifice. And certainly he did more than McNamara did; he risked his life to kill the President of the Nation; and if one is to be canonized for risking his life, he should be. But I take it that Mr. McNamara's thought in placing explosives in industrial disputes was "safety first."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, you say they took good care to be as far away as they possibly could when the explosion occurred?

Mr. EMEBY. In that particular case there are one or two facts worth noting. Assume that Mr. McNamara believed that he was performing a social service in registering protest, through murder, against a condition existing in the industry that he wanted to free, yet McNamara was not a structural ironworker; he was a printer. The Los Angeles Times had nothing to do with the struggle between the structural ironworkers and their employees. I don't know that it ever had a line about the strike. The destruction of the Los Angeles Times was a mere friendly act, from the testimony at Indianapolis, done by one familiar with the use of dynamite, for the purpose of working a revenge on a man who had been, so they deemed him, a bitter and uncompromising antagonist of labor organizations in California. The conviction of one of the men at Indianapolis was predicated upon the fact that he had written letters referring to conversations evidently had in the East, at some time or other, with respect to some one coming West that was familiar with the use of explosives, to throw a scare into Otis. Now, the Los Angeles Times had nothing to do in relation to the structural ironworkers, and it was not the organ of the erectors' association, and Mr.

McNamara himself was a printer and not a structural ironworker, and he received his scale for every job pulled off.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know how much it was?

Mr. EMERY. I don't know in that particular case, but the price ran from $75 to $225 a job, and there were about 106 jobs pulled off, of which there were records in the Indianapolis case. Now, all of them, of course, were the work of McNamara. McManigal and the younger McNamara did the most of this work, but there were others that were permitted to participate. In fact, McManigal testified that the man who paid him what he received for taking a load of these explosives knocked down on him to the extent of $50 on a number of explosives, and I am speaking of his testimony now, when he says that some time later in conversation with the younger McNamara he learned that he was not getting the scale that other men were receiving for the same work.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Was it known whether this knockdown was for the good of the cause or for the individual that was knocking down?

Mr. EMERY. I suppose even the martyr has to have his perquisite.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You heard Mr. Darrow say that public opinion was of value in aiding organized labor to secure its objective. You also probably heard him say that the American public opinion is based upon emotion and feeling and imagination and not upon the right or wrong involved, as we understand right and wrong. Do you agree with Mr. Darrow in that opinion?

Mr. EMERY. I am more inclined to believe that personal feeling of individuals is often predicated upon spectacular appeals of an interesting personality rather than opinion in any true sense of the word. It is predicated upon mere spectacular performance. I may use the word "opinion" in a different sense from what he does. We have many public men that attract a following by their activity for spectacular publicity, and we have had many interesting examples of that in the course of our political life, but as a rule the opinions, I think, of our people, that have been registered in law or expressed themselves at the ballot box—I speak now of opinions on subjects rather than mere opinions of men, because they are generally two quite different things—I think an opinion in that sense of the word has been very slow of formation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. We, of course, know that organized labor is here and here to stay; that it is a permanent institution.

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And we can no more hope to wipe it out than we can hope to keep back the waves of the ocean by the use of a broom? Now, if organized labor is a premanent institution and is here because it ought to be here, and I for one believe it ought to be here, then for them any ephemeral public opinion would be of little value. I take it you agree there is such a thing as ephemeral public opinion and permanent public opinion. Organized labor could get little use out of ephemeral public opinion, and if it is to be of value to it it must be the permanent opinion. How can it get permanent public opinion best?

Mr. EMERY. I suppose like all movements that attract or repel public sympathies, it gets it by its purposes, by its methods, and by its conduct. Organizations, ever since men have had them, have been judged by what they undertake to do, and also by the manner in which they undertake to do it, so it is not only the end which we seek, but the ends by which we accomplish them that seems to give to us the good will of our fellow man permanently.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, if we assume that public opinion is of value to organized labor in its fight for betterment, and if we assume that permanent public opinion can be retained only by commanding this respect and this good will and sympathy, do you think that organized labor is pursuing the right course to win that permanent public opinion when it retains in its high places and reelects to high offices men convicted of crime?

Mr. EMERY. No; I do not. I think it is condonation of the offense. I can readily see that men would feel bitter, and would feel keenly, and would condone the acts of fellows done in their interest, but I can not see how the cool second thought of a great body of men can permit them to approve, by their conduct, acts which I am sure a great body of them in sober mind would condemn. I don't say that particularly of them, but of any body of organized men.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Another point that has been brought out frequently in the hearings here, Mr. Emery, and upon which I would be glad to get your point of view is this: You heard boycotts justified on the witness stand and compared with the attitude of the colonists during the Revolution?

Mr. EMERY. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And it was said time and again that if the American colonists had not applied the so-called boycott to England, and had not rebelled and resisted England, that we still would have been slaves, so to speak, of George the Third. What is your view on that justification of boycotts?

Mr. EMERY. Of course, in the first place that is a very loose use of the term boycott. It often happens, and I think it has in the course of this discussion, men use the same words without thinking the same thought. To discuss boycotts in a legal and moral sense, we refer, I assume, to the act of a combination to prevent another from being benefited in business or social intercourse with one or more of his fellows, until he grants some demand of those engaging in the boycott. Now, of course, the use of the term of the word boycott in the sense of the Boston Tea Party and the refusal of the colonists after the declaration of war to purchase or wear British-made clothes as an expression of antagonism of the people in rebellion and at war with one another socially. If the parallel is perfect, then the boycott which is thus vindicated expresses the permanent and determined hostility and warlike attitude of those engaged in it against the society of which they are a part. If it is an act in war it is defended on the ground that those engaged in it are at war against society or the individual. The word "boycott" in its origin referred to acts which were part of an agitation against landlordism in Ireland at a very acute period in the history of that unhappy land, when a peasant boycotted a landowner, cut him off from all food supply and from all intercourse with the world as far as it was possible, and the person that first did this was a Capt. Boycott, from which it takes its name. When I refer to it I speak of it in the sense in which I have found it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you regard the conditions parallel to what existed between the American colonists and Great Britain and between the conditions to-day between a lot of strikers and the employer?

Mr. EMERY. I hope not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Where is the difference?

Mr. EMERY. It depends on the cause of the strike. It may be a mere economic difference of 5 cents or 3 cents a day. One may say on the one side that to those engaging in that strike it may mean life or death in their economic relation. It is equally true, of course, that that may be the situation of those that desire to remain there at work, or take the places of those that quit, and, of course, we can not make the righteousness or regulate the conduct of the individual, in which he interferes with the rights of another, depend upon his belief in the rectitude of himself. If we do that each man in society becomes his own final judge; we have a state of anarchy, in which each man is his own law and own supreme court. We can not have civil society protected under the right of each man to be his own judge of the law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let us assume that the issue is not a question of wages in the strike.

Mr. EMERY. It very frequently is not. I think in fact that the figures given by the Department of Labor indicate that the greater percentage are not over matters of wages.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But let us assume that the question at issue is the open shop. Is it parallel with the case of the colonists?

Mr. EMERY. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Wherein does it differentiate?

Mr. EMERY. Of course, in the case of the colonists you have people who were engaged in a life and death struggle with a public enemy, and they did not intend to give it aid and support by buying from it, and they wanted also to make themselves self-supporting, as is the occasion in many of the American boycotts, which is always accompanied by the purchase of homespun or home-made goods. It was defended as a hostile act, and excused as an act of war, not of peace.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Wasn't the issue there, Mr. Emery, the one I pointed out to Mr. Darrow, the cry that they were taxed without representation?

Mr. EMERY. There were many conditions named in the declaration of the independence of the Colonies; that was one, and another was that they were taken to England without an opportunity to be heard—without the right of local trial. There were many, many things enumerated in there, but that was one of the popular cries of the hour—"taxation without representation." In other words, they were deprived of their civil rights, and they were in rebellion against those who had deprived them of those rights.

When you speak of boycotts, you have not only primary and secondary but you have also tertiary and quaternary; you can go as far as you like. I remember the Hall case in Michigan, where an employer was boycotted because he bought his milk from a milk dealer who had the tips put on his cows' horns by a nonunion tinner. This case merely illustrates the length to which you can go on piling one boycott on another. In this case the local tinmiths were organized, and this dairyman had simply had a wandering tinker put some tips on his cows' horns, and that started a boycott against him, and the local union took it up. The man who was boycotted was a department-store employer, and he was boycotted because he bought milk from this man who had the tips put on his cows' horns by this tinker.

I can remember, and perhaps you can, 10 years ago in San Francisco, when men were engaged in carrying sandwich boards before the places of those who were boycotted; and in the case of the cooks and waiters' strike, I think in 1904, the sandwich men struck for an increase in wages, and the members of the Cooks and Waiters' Union were hard-hearted and refused to increase the wages of the sandwich men, and these other sandwich men got other sandwich men to march up and down the street with placards stating that the Cooks and Waiters' Union, who were boycotting a restaurant picketed by them because they declared the restaurant unfair, were themselves unfair in so declaring the restaurant unfair.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Mr. Darrow pointed out that the liberty of Great Britain was far greater than the liberty of this country; that our liberties are on paper and are not liberties as a matter of fact; that organized labor, for example, is much better treated in Great Britain by legislative enactments than in this country. Have you studied that issue at all, and can you enlighten us on it?

Mr. EMERY. I have. I have been very much interested in it. I am sure that Mr. Darrow did not recall the very many distinct instances in which not only organized labor but any citizen is subject to the purely arbitrary will of Parliament.

The distinction between our two Governments is this, that we live under a written constitution, which is our permanent law, and it expresses the restrictions which a free people have imposed upon themselves for the protection of their liberty, and have granted to the different departments of their Government those rights and duties which they consider necessary to protect the rights which they desire to have guarded; and all the rights thus not granted are still held by the people or held by the States.

Parliament is the repository of all of the law-making power of Great Britain. Parliament, with the King's consent nominally, can enact a condition of slavery in Great Britain to-morrow morning; it can take away any right, not only that the people of Great Britain have, but can take away the right of any individual by name or any class of individuals.

Gentlemen interested in the home-rule movement may recall that in 1881 or 1882, it was about 1880 or 1881 that the Irish Nationalists held a famous meeting at Sligo, in which they bitterly denounced the Government of Great Britain, and language most seditious was indulged in. The Government had no law in existence at that time on which it could rely for their suppression, but the agitation was spreading, and the expressions were bitter, and the feeling was so great that Parliament enacted a law two and one-half months after the committing of those acts in Sligo, which not only made them criminal but led to the arrest and imprisonment of those who took part in them two and one-half months before the law was enacted and did things at that time perfectly lawful. There is there no prohibition against the passage of an ex post facto law; Parliament can enact a statute to-morrow and make it apply to a condition of affairs that existed last year. Parliament can enact legislation with reference to any particular class or individual in the community which it desires. Parliament can do anything except turn a woman into a man or a man into a woman. They have done all sorts of things with respect to labor legislation.

My attention was called in your questionnaire to the British trade-disputes act, and I think many of my labor friends firmly believe that the British trade-disputes act, if enacted into law in this country, would be a very distinct advantage to American trade-unions, chiefly because it relieves them of any liability, any authority, for acts of their agents; that is the particular phase of it to which they have directed attention. But very few of them pause to consider the disabilities which accompany the same act.

The trade-disputes act of Great Britain is an amendment in part of the conspiracy and protection of property act of 1875, which succeeded the criminal amendment act of 1872, and is to be read in connection with the English registration act of 1871 and 1876, and in these acts trades-unions were given a limited right of legal existence. And to-day, when a trades-union desires to register, it files a copy of its constitution and by-laws with the registrar, and he has the power to reject or approve the registration of that trades-union. That condition was brought about by the condition in which trade combinations found themselves under the common law and under the so-called combination acts, many of which were passed between 1800 and 1825, so that it had been held, under the common law, that a combination of workmen to raise wages, or a combination of employers to depress wages, were equally unlawful under the common law as being in restraint of trade. So the combinations of either masters or of men, for these purposes or for purposes for which union men in this country get together, are held practically outlaws, and of course the incidents that accompany these things, the strike to raise wages or the lockout to depress wages, are illegal over there.

The trade-disputes act of 1906 grew out of the Taft-Vail decision, in which the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants were held liable in the sum of £21,000 for damages inflicted through conspiracy upon the Taft-Vail railroad and the destruction of property and stoppage of traffic incident to that strike.

The act of 1906 amended this conspiracy and protection of property act of 1875, and while it did these two things it relieved the unions of liability for the acts of their agents, and it also authorized what is called peaceable picketing to no greater extent than it is recognized to-day, because it is substantially the law of all jurisdictions, State and Federal, that I know of, that picketing for the purpose of information or persuasion, unaccompanied with intimidation, is lawful; but the protection of property act of 1875, to which that is an amendment, and which is unaltered, remains in force with it, and it carries conditions which not only no trade-union but no worker or employer in this country would support.

For instance, in the first place, public conspiracy or unlawful assemblage made an offense under any act of Parliament is still unlawful and criminal. Then there are a whole series of acts which are enumerated. I have a copy of the trade-disputes act and also of the protection of property act.

In the first place nothing in the trade-disputes act or in the protection of property act exempts any person from punishment who is guilty of conspiracy, or for which a punishment is awarded by act of Parliament. Nor does it affect the law relating to riot, unlawful assemblage, breach of peace, or sedition. And, further, you will observe that in section 7 it is provided: "Every person who, with a view to compel any other person to abstain from doing or to do any act which such other person has a legal right to do, or abstain from doing, wrongfully and without legal authority—

"One, uses violence to or intimidates such other person or his wife or children, or injures his property; or

"Two, persistently follows such other person about from place to place; or

"Three, hides any tools, clothes, or other property owned or used by such other person, or deprives him of or injures him in the use thereof; or

"Four, watches or besets the house or other place where such other person resides or works or carries on business, or happens to be, or the approach to such house or place; or

"Five, follows such other person with two or more other persons in a disorderly manner in or through any street or road may be imprisoned for a term not exceeding three months at hard labor, or a fine not exceeding twenty pounds" (or $100).

Now, the trade-disputes act of 1906 amended this fifth section of the act so that the section was to be construed:

"It shall be lawful for one or more persons, acting in their own behalf or on behalf of a trade-union or of an individual employer or firm in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute, to attend at or near a house or place where a person resides or works or carries on business or happens to be, if they so attend merely for the purpose of peacefully obtaining or communicating information, or of peacefully persuading any person to work or abstain from working."

That is the amendment. Now, under this amendment there have been a number of criminal prosecutions for intimidation, and the courts in construing the act have held further that while that permits peaceful picketing, that if a body of men surround a house or place of work, or a number of men silently follow an individual workman, this section affords no defense for criminal prosecution.

Furthermore, it is the law of England to-day, and has been since 1875 the statute law in effect, by the trade-disputes act of 1896, that if a man, by himself or in combination with others, breaks his contract of service alone or with others while working for a gas or a water company, if he has reasonable cause to believe that by so quitting, by himself or in combination with others, he will deprive the community, in whole or in part, of water or gas, he is guilty of a misdemeanor, for which there is punishment by imprisonment for three months at hard labor or a fine of £20.

Furthermore, the fifth section of the same act provides that if any person, in any employ, either by himself or in combination with others, willfully breaks his contract of employment, having reasonable cause to believe that his doing so will endanger human life or cause serious bodily injury, or expose valuable real or personal property to destruction or serious injury, he is punishable by a fine of £20 or 3 months at hard labor, and there have been many prosecutions under this act.

That last section would prevent a strike on a steam railroad or a street railway, and the section would make any man liable where he quit, either by himself or with others, in such a manner as to expose valuable property to destruction.

And in the case of Arthur v. Oakes Mr. Justice Harlan pointed out that under the law you could not enjoin a man from quitting where, if he quits, he exposed life to danger or any amount of property to destruction; you could not keep him to work by injunction. If there was some positive duty that required a man to keep at work, like a signal man in a tower, it might be done in a case like that, but ordinarily his quitting could not be prevented by injunction.

That is the criminal law of England, and still is the law of the land, and it is a condition to which no laboring man in this country would submit, and that accompanies the trade-disputes act, and it has to be considered with those disabilities connected with it, and consequently the terms of the act apply absolutely to combinations of workmen or of employers.

Now, in the State of Massachusetts a section of the trade-disputes act of 1906 was offered as a legislative bill, and in the State of Massachusetts the supreme court of that State is authorized to give advisory information, so that the legislature, if it is in doubt as to whether or not it has power to enact particular legislation, can ask for the advice of the supreme court; and in this case this bill provided that in the language of the trade-disputes act of 1906 no trade-union should be liable in tort for acts of its agents when done in furtherance of a trade dispute. The words "organization of masters" in the act of 1906 were not in this bill, and the Supreme Court of Massachusetts advised the legislature that such legislation was invalid under the Massachusetts constitution. The supreme court said:

"It deprives all individuals or associations other than those named of the protection to safety, liberty, and property which any free government must secure to its subjects. It takes from them the unhampered right to assert in the courts claims against all which tortiously assail their person and property and to recover judgment for the injuries done. It would prevent all persons from having recourse to law for vindication of rights or reparation for wrongs against a privileged few therein designated, and imposes upon some burdens of which others in like situation are relieved. It throws obstacles in the pathway of those outside unions or associations in the pursuit of their livelihood and in the prosecution of their business not interposed in the way of members of such organizations. * * * In short, it destroys equality and creates special privilege."

So the Massachusetts Legislature found itself unable to enact such legislation, and that is the general condition in this country.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, summing up and giving them the same wage and the same working hours and the same working conditions, if you were a wage earner or unionist, would you rather live in England with such laws or in America?

Mr. EMERY. In America, by all means. But as you know in the celebrated Osborne case over there, the unions were forbidden in that case to assess their members for the support of a member in Parliament. In England members in Parliament do not receive a salary, and the labor members are supported by funds raised by their unions. This particular member objected to that, and they expelled him, and the case went to the House of Lords, and they decided that it was against public policy to permit any class in the community to pay the salary of a member of Parliament who was devoted to their exclusive interests. The same principle was applied to the political activity of trade-unions in much more minor offices.

Under that rule over there a case came up along about 1909 which illustrates as powerfully as anything can not only the great injustice that such a condition of law brings about, but the difference between the fundamental law of Great Britain and ours. It is the case of Conway v. Wade. In this case a laborer brought an action against a trade-union official for maliciously procuring his discharge. The court said:

"The facts are simple. For 18 years the plaintiff has been a member of the laborers' union intermittently. Seven years ago he was fined 10 shillings, but did not pay, and no action was ever taken against him for such default.

"In September, 1907, he rejoined the union and got his card of membership, and showed his receipt to the defendant on September 25, who told him it was all right, and that he could go to work. On October 1 he was given higher wages as charge man. On October 2 the defendant told Baines, the foreman, that he had better stop the plaintiff or there would be trouble with the men, and he did so. The defendant is a district delegate of the laborers' union; he is not a laborer. It was not part of his duty to inflict a fine or to stop any man from working. He had not authority to call out the men without the sanction of the executive, and he had no such sanction. He gave no notice to the plaintiff, nor did he suggest that he pay the seven-year-old fine."

Then he goes on to say that the plaintiff saw the defendant and remonstrated with him and asked him if he would stop him wherever he went. The defendant said, "Certainly, I will," and the plaintiff said, "Have I got to starve? What shall I do?" And the defendant replied, "Do what you like."

The jury found in this case that the defendant did by his threats procure this man's discharge, the employer being under coercion by threat of strike of the men if he did not discharge him. He recovered judgment in the sum of £50. The case went to the court of appeals on appeal from the judgment of the lower court and the finding of this jury awarding damages. The court of appeals held, under the trade-disputes act, that this being an act done in furtherance of a trade dispute that it was not actionable. The case then went to the House of Lords, and the House of Lords held that it was actionable with regard to this individual because there was no evidence that when he procured this man's discharge he had been authorized to do so by the union; but that if the union had directed him in the furtherance of a trade dispute to cause this man's discharge, and he had done so under those circumstances, neither the union nor he would be liable. So the condition was precisely what that case predicates, that a man could be maliciously injured, that a man's discharge could be procured for any purpose by a combination and any injury done to him.

A man was prosecuted for malicious arrest in which the officers of a union were relieved from tort liability because of the trade-disputes act of 1906, the court holding that because the malicious prosecution was in furtherance of a trade dispute, this writer having attacked them in a newspaper, and they procured his arrest, they were not liable. The court in pointing out the lack of remedy made this remarkable statement: "It is said there was not a time and has not been for centuries in which an Englishman did not have redress against an act injuring himself in the courts of his country, but this court is powerless. Parliament can not make evil good, but Parliament can say that evil shall not be actionable, and you are the victim of the act of Parliament."

Now, that case could not occur in this country because, for the reason laid down by the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, they could not say that any combination of employers shall not be liable for an injury they shall do another, but everyone else shall be liable under the same circumstances. That is precisely the course of the law to which objection has been taken most of the time.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then you do not agree with Mr. Darrow that the English workman enjoys labor legislation that the American workman does not enjoy?

Mr. EMEY. If the condition that Mr. Darrow pictures here were true in England, and as he says that the people have the power are running everything in the Government, if that were true in England and the employer was master of Parliament they could press them to anything they wanted in the way of special legislation. No Englishman has the right to a speedy trial.

Men have been thrown into prison, especially during the Irish agitation, have been thrown into jail for three or four years without trial.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is there any other industrial country in the world that you know anything about where the worker is better protected than in this country by legislation?

Mr. EMERY. None. I think the whole tendency of the time is to give more and more protection to the industrial worker. I think in fact it can be almost demonstrated that the industrial worker in this country at the present time is privileged under the law. If I may call your attention to a few things here—

Chairman WALSH. We will have to excuse you and ask you to come back in the morning. Commissioner O'Connell has some questions he wishes to ask you.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I have no questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. This is my last question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is what you said before.

Chairman WALSH. Proceed; we will try to get through. I suppose you are anxious to get away.

Mr. EMERY. I don't want to be misunderstood when I say that industrial labor is a privileged class in a sense that is improper or unduly protected by the law. It should be. All labor, not merely industrial labor, but many things that I can call your attention to in regard to industrial labor is not true of agricultural labor or household labor. The protection of the wages of laborers which is thrown around every industrial laborer—the mechanic's lien and all legislation of that character—are examples of the matter; the protection against all acts of that kind. I want to show you that the law has taken particular notice of the interest of industrial laborers in protecting their property and rights. Furthermore, the law of 12 States in the Union to-day makes it a criminal offense for an employer to advertise for labor without stating whether or not a strike exists in that industry. And in most of these States there is some industrial board that has to have the final word and say when a strike is there.

Now, in many of these States, particularly the States of Minnesota and Texas, as typical examples, the employer may, according to the statutes of the State, not discriminate against an employee or applicant for employment on account of his participation in a strike. He may not ask another employer, nor may that other employer tell him—whether he be an individual or corporation—whether or not the applicant for position is engaged in a strike. At the same time, the legislatures in other States—in Texas it is very severe, and even goes so far as to say that a corporation that violated that act can not do business in the State while in Minnesota it is punishable by fine or imprisonment; but at the same time the employer is required to advertise all the facts with respect to his strike yet the law says that the workman shall not tell any facts in regard to the strike that he has been engaged in. It is criminal for the employer to ask a man to go to work for him unless he says he has had a strike, but it is criminal for him to ask the laborer if he has been on a strike.

Now, organized labor says that these injunctions commit great wrongs because they prevent a man from discussing with another things that are about to take place in a strike or about to take the place of a striker, we will say, whether or not he is given the facts in the strike, and induce him to quit employment. In other words, he tells you about the strike. That is precisely what the employer has been forbidden from doing in many States. In other words, the law is making it criminal for the employer to conceal any fact about the strike, and at the same time making it criminal for him to ask an applicant anything about a strike in which he has been engaged. These acts have been sustained in some of these States. That is manifestly a very great consideration on the part of a State for the protection of persons engaging in strikes and for the persons for whom they are to be employed the right to get information respecting them. That discrimination is made and not a word is said against it. When I refer to a strike, I don't refer to a mere quitting of employment. I believe a strike to be a systematic quitting of employment for the purpose of inducing the employer to grant some demand of the striker, accompanied by an effort to prevent others from taking the places of those that quit.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Going back to Mr. Weinstock's question about Booth and Guiteau, do you happen to know the number or per cent of criminals sent to the penitentiary that test way below the normal mentally?

Mr. EMERY. No, ma'am.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. You never have heard of it?

Mr. EMERY. No.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. I would like to quote from my memory, but I might not get it right, and I would be glad to send you some figures on that.

Mr. EMERY. I would not question that. Insanity is always a defense—or feeble-mindedness, or imbecility, or the failure of a person to understand the act that they do.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. I am not referring to the insane, but—

Mr. EMERY. I would join very cordially in the comment of Mr. Darrow on the question of our criminals. I do not refer to responsible criminals; but still I think it is in the power of the State to better crime under the conditions. Of course we have to realize, whether we believe in the particular form of organization in which we live or not, a condition in which any individual can be judged, is to how he shall disturb property in which he is not interested however willing we may be to see the man succeed.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Commissioner O'Connell desires to read a letter into the record.

STATEMENT OF MR. W. B. WILSON.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. During the testimony of Mr. Walter Drew he made a charge that the Department of Labor was being unjustly—its application was being unjustly made, and charged that the Secretary of Labor and his representatives in the field were not giving the employers a fair opportunity, and that the department was being used to force the so-called closed shop. I sent a copy of Mr. Drew's statement to Secretary Wilson day before yesterday and asked him to reply to it. I have received this evening a communication from Secretary Wilson which I wish to read. I also wish to file this letter and a letter from Mr. George Reeves to the Secretary, in which he inclosed a letter addressed to him by Mr. Drew, of the erectors' association, a copy of that letter, a copy of Secretary Wilson's reply, and a copy of the decision reached by the commissioner on the conciliation which provided for the open shop. I wish to read this letter into the record (reading):

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 18, 1915.

Hon. JAMES O'CONNELL,

Commission on Industrial Relations, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. O'CONNELL: Your note inclosing copy of statement made by Mr. Walter Drew before the Industrial Relations Commission, asserting that the Department of Labor is using its influence for the "closed shop," is at hand.

The Department of Labor is not authorized by law to either promote or oppose the "closed shop." Its functions in labor disputes are those of a mediator, whose duty it is to endeavor to find a common ground which will be acceptable to both sides.

I assume that the particular case that Mr. Drew had in mind was the strike of the boiler makers in the oil fields of Oklahoma and Texas. On February 27, 1915, I was informed by representatives of the boiler makers' union that a number of companies operating in Oklahoma and Texas oil fields had declared for the "open shop," which had resulted in a strike of the workmen and the good offices of the Department of Labor were requested in an effort to bring about an adjustment. On March 2, 1915, Mr. John A. Moffitt was detailed as commissioner of conciliation in connection with the dispute. On March 12, Mr. Moffitt made a report, a copy of which is herewith inclosed. On March 20, 1915, I received a communication from Mr. George Reeves, president of the Reeves Bros. Co., of Alliance, Ohio, inclosing copy of a communication under date of March 16 from Mr. Walter Drew, counsel for the American Erectors' Association, copies of which are also inclosed. I am also sending you a copy of my reply to Mr. Reeves, under date of March 26, 1915. My reply concisely sets forth the policy of the department in such matters.

As a matter of fact, the department has handled cases where the so-called "closed shop" has existed. It has handled cases where no organization has existed amongst the workmen. It is directed by the organic act "to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, to improve their working conditions, and to advance their opportunities for profitable employment." In carrying out that purpose it is utilizing every element available, whether the workmen are organized, partly organized, or unorganized. You will observe that in the case in question Commissioner Moffitt advised the union officials to accept the "open-shop" proposition made by the American Erectors' Association. In doing so the department was not committing itself to the "open shop" any more than it would be committing itself to the "closed shop" if it had advised the employers to grant "closed-shop" conditions.

Each trade dispute, as it arises, has its own problems and is dealt with in accordance with the circumstances surrounding it. During negotiations innumerable suggestions may be made to either side, no one of which in any manner commits the department to the support of the principles involved in them. They simply represent the efforts of the conciliator to find a basis of an agreement that will be mutually satisfactory.

Respectfully, yours,

W. B. WILSON, Secretary.

(The documents referred to by Secretary Wilson will be found among the exhibits at the end of this subject, marked "Wilson Exhibit.")

Chairman WALSH. We will now adjourn until to-morrow morning.

(Thereupon the commission adjourned on Tuesday, May 18, 1915, until Wednesday, May 19, 1915, at 10 a. m.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., Wednesday, May 19, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners Harriman, Weinstock, Lennon, and O'Connell.

Chairman WALSH. We will please be in order.

Mr. Weinstock has a letter he desires to read into the record.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT OF MR. WALTER DREW.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am in receipt of a letter this morning, Mr. Chairman, signed by Mr. Walter Drew, counsel for the National Erectors' Association, which he asks to be made a part of our record. It reads as follows:

[National Erectors' Association, 286 Fifth Avenue, New York.]

NEW YORK CITY, May 18, 1915.

Mr. HARRIS WEINSTOCK,

United States Commission on Industrial Relations,

Shoreham Hotel, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WEINSTOCK: Yesterday I heard only a part of what Mr. Darrow had to say, but I did hear him state that Mr. McNamara had been deprived of a substantial right and that, in effect, he had been kidnapped. These charges are both untrue.

The fact that the original indictment against McNamara was for murder in connection with the Times explosion, and that after he arrived in California this indictment was dismissed and another one issued charging him with the Llewellyn explosion is absolutely immaterial, so far as the question of extradition is concerned. Formal extradition papers, conforming in all respects to the requirements of law, were presented to the governor of Indiana, and a warrant for the arrest of McNamara was signed by him. In most States of the Union, this comprises all that is necessary to authorize the arrest of the men charged and his removal to another State. It is all that is required by the Federal laws. The fact that after removal to such other State one charge is dismissed and another made can have no effect upon the situation as it existed at the time of the extradition proceedings, nor affect their validity in any manner.

In the State of Indiana, however, a statute existed providing for a court hearing to determine the identity of the man described in the governor's warrant. As Mr. McNamara admitted his identity, I still think, so far as this question is concerned, that whether he was taken before a police court or a circuit court was a technicality. However, all the claims based on this matter of court procedure fall absolutely to the ground, as Mr. Darrow must be well aware, from the fact that this statute was held unconstitutional by the United States court in the proceedings begun in that court by Mr. Burns, who was under indictment for this alleged kidnapping. The whole legal status of extradition matters is one primarily within the jurisdiction of the United States and not of the individual States, as any lawyer well knows, and no State has the right to throw such restrictions or limitations about the procedure of extradition as will abridge the general right of one State to demand and receive persons charged with crime who may be in some other State.

Had no court procedure been had at all, the taking of McNamara under the governor's warrant would have still been absolutely legal, since the statute providing court procedure was held unconstitutional. Mr. Darrow must know, as a lawyer, that his charge that Mr. McNamara was deprived of any right whatever, substantive or technical, is absolutely unfounded.

I would appreciate it if this letter could be filed as an answer to such a charge.

Yours, truly,

WALTER DREW, Counsel.

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. If the house will please be in perfect order, we will proceed. I understand that Commissioner Weinstock has some letters he desires to read.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am in receipt of a communication from Mr. Walter Drew, counsel of the Erectors' Association, in New York, requesting that this exhibit be made a part of the record. His letter reads as follows:

NEW YORK CITY, May 18, 1915.

MR. HARRIS WEINSTOCK,

United States Commission on Industrial Relations,

Shoreham Hotel, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WEINSTOCK: I inclose copy of the Chicago Herald of April 28, 1915, containing article upon the indictment of Chicago labor leaders and contractors. The Chicago situation, as outlined in the article, is exactly in line with my statement that the ultimate result of a closed shop in the union was a conspiracy between the union and a combination of employers against the general public. I would be glad if this article could be filed as part of the record.

I also call your attention to the article on page 4, in which the Herald refers to its campaign for the exposure of graft in union labor circles of Chicago. It seems to me that valuable data as to this use of the power of the closed shop by corrupt labor leaders could be obtained from the files of the Herald authenticated, if necessary, by a statement of the editor.

All the evidence of excesses on the part of union agents is valuable, not so much as an indictment of the persons involved, as evidence of the tendency and results of a system which confers immense power upon labor organizations without corresponding responsibility. When the millenium is reached and all men are perfect then, of course, our cities and our unions will be wisely and honestly run, if, indeed, we need any such institutions at all. Until that time comes, and human nature remains frail, we must admit that all possible safeguards must be thrown about the administration not only of our cities but of our unions and other organizations of men in order to prevent them from falling to accomplish their true missions, because of the ignorance or the selfishness or the corruption or the mistaken zeal of men intrusted with leadership. It is the system that permits graft and corruption rather than the men involved that is to be condemned, for where conditions favorable to misuse of power come into existence it must be expected that sooner or later men will achieve leadership who will devote such power to its most vicious uses.

Yours, truly,

WALTER DREW, Counsel.

(The articles referred to by Mr. Drew are entitled "Chiefs of unions and employees in Federal net," and "How Herald exposed grafting labor men." They appeared in the Chicago Herald of Apr. 28, 1915.)

Commissioner LENNON. I desire to give notice that I will file a letter in reply to that at the first opportunity.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT OF MR. JAMES A. EMERY.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am also in receipt of a request from Mr. Emery, who testified before the commission yesterday, to make a part of the record the following statement published in a congressional document, in a hearing before a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, United States Senate, Sixty-second Congress, second session, at page 263. Mr. Emery also asks that this communication be read into the record in rebuttal of a statement made yesterday by Commissioner O'Connell, in which Commissioner O'Connell said as follows:

"In one donation I see about $25 was from one picture house in Indianapolis, and a number of other large contributions are here that indicate that it came from the public indiscriminately. That the defense fund was not raised entirely by the trade-unionists, but that they were intensely interested to the extent of contributing some finance toward this defense. I want to put this in the record, because of what I believe to be a misconceived idea on the part of the public, probably on the part of some of our commissioners, that you were employed by the American Federation of Labor (referring to Mr. Darrow) to defend the McNamara brothers, and the American Federation of Labor raised the funds to carry on that defense. This will show that that is not true, with which I think you will agree.'

"Continuing, Commissioner O'Connell said:

"'The American Federation of Labor, therefore, and the trade-unionists of the country took no part in the direction of how the case should proceed other than raising what they believed to be sufficient funds to conduct the case and see that the McNamara brothers got what they wanted them to have—a fair trial.'

"And again he says:

"'The American Federation of Labor, or the gentlemen who raised the funds to carry on the defense, in no way indicated to you what you should or should not do, or those that were associated with you, in the direction of the case, and the funds were sent to you without question as to how they should be used or suggesting any method as to how they should be used.'"

The article contained in this Congressional Record, which Mr. Emery desires to have placed on file in rebuttal, reads as follows:

"WASHINGTON, D. C., July 27, 1911.

"To all workers:

For right is right, since God is God,
And right the day must win;
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To falter would be sin.—Faber.

"From Los Angeles last October came the news that a terrible catastrophe had occurred in that city; that the Los Angeles Times Building had been destroyed, with the loss of a number of lives. The first word spoken, even before the flames had completed their destruction, by the emissaries of the Times contained positive declarations that organized labor was responsible for the disaster. Qualifying statements were conspicuous by their absence. Wide publicity was given; warped and unsupported allegations against the organized workmen of the entire country were featured. Vast sums of money were dangled in the faces of unscrupulous men to fasten the crime upon some member or members of the trades-unions. The National Manufacturers' Association, backed by the Erectors' Association, citizens' alliances, detective agencies, and a hostile press, brought their every influence to bear and appropriated every available circumstance to bulwark and fix in the public mind a mental attitude that the charges against organized labor had been proven beyond the peradventure of a doubt.

"The authors of the charge, after months of intrigue and searching investigation, utterly failed to substantiate the flamboyant and positive accusations that had been made. The public mind was slowly emerging from the hypnotic spell in which it had been developed, and mutterings of suspicion began to be heard against the originators of the indictments against labor men. The position of the hostile employers' associations became exceedingly desperate. The Times management, with its years of relentless warfare against humanity, fearing that its Belshazzar feast of organized labor's blood was about to be denied, redoubled its efforts and demanded that a sacrifice must be furnished that its unholy appetite might be appeased, specifying that some union workman or workmen must be supplied to assuage its unnatural and abnormal hunger.

"The record of events is too well known to make it necessary to recount them in detail. That "the end justifies the means" became the slogan is patent. With all the forces of greed compactly joined there began a campaign of vandalism the like of which has never before found lodgment in the pages of our American Republic's history. A prominent member of union labor was selected, J. J. McNamara, and one at whom the finger of suspicion had never before pointed, whose life had been characterized by an uprightness of purpose and loyalty to the cause of labor, and whose activities in every walk had drawn to him the commendation of his fellows. To give the stage the proper setting and to involve other trades than the ironworkers, J. B. McNamara, the brother, was selected for the sacrifice.

"With intrigue, falsehood, and an utter disregard for all forms of law, applying individual force, conniving with faithless officials, the two McNamaras were rushed in feverish haste to the scene of the alleged crime. The rights of these two men have been trampled upon willfully, flagrantly, and wantonly.

"Every man, even the meanest, under the constitutional guaranties of our country is entitled to a trial by a jury of his peers, and every man is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty. Thus far the proceedings have been outside the pale of those guaranties. The charge has been lodged against organized labor, and two of its members are now before the bar to answer these charges. What is the duty of the organized-labor movement? What shall be our course? What effort shall we put forth to see to it that justice shall finally obtain?

"The intellect, heart, and soul of the men of labor yield to no body or class of citizens in their fidelity in obedience to the law, and their history is replete with instances of sacrifice that humanity may be protected. If within the ranks of labor there are those who permit infractions of the law, then they should be punished, but there should not be instituted a double standard of justice, one for the wealthy malefactor and another for the workman.

"The organized-labor movement believes that the McNamaras are innocent. Upon that belief there devolves upon us another duty. The accused men are workmen, without means of their own to provide a proper defense. The assault is made against organized labor equally with the McNamaras. If we are true to the obligations we have assumed, if it is hoped to forever settle this system of malicious prosecution of the men of labor, our duty is plain.

"Funds must be provided to insure a fair and impartial trial. Eminent counsel has been engaged. Arrangements are proceeding that a proper defense may be made. The great need of the hour is money with which to meet the heavy drain incident to the collection of evidence and other necessary expense.

"Every man who was connected with the kidnapping of the McNamaras will be prosecuted to the full limit of the law. It is proposed that the interests of organized labor shall be fully protected and punishment meted out to detective agencies that assume to be superior to the law. The rights of the men of labor must, shall, be preserved.

"The men of labor, unlike the hostile organizations arrayed against us, have not the vast sums of wealth to call upon, but they are imbued with the spirit of justice and are ever ready to make sacrifice for principle.

"The trial of the McNamaras is set to commence on October 11. In the name of justice and humanity, all members of our organizations are urgently requested to contribute as liberally as their ability will permit. All contributions toward the legal defense of the McNamara cases and for the prosecution of the kidnappers should be transmitted as soon as collected to Frank Morrison, 801-809 G Street NW., Washington, D. C., who will forward a receipt for every contribution received by him, and after the trial a printed copy of the contributions received, together with the expense incurred, will be mailed to each contributor.

"Fraternally,

"SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

Attest:

"FRANK MORRISON, Secretary."

Mr. GOMPERS. As the party whose name has been read here as signing this circular, I ask that I may have an opportunity to make a statement to the commission on this subject and upon all its phases.

Chairman WALSH. Thank you, Mr. Gompers, we will call on you later.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The chairman asked me to call attention to the fact that Mr. Manly, who has charge of our investigating bureau, has made a thorough investigation of the Chicago alleged graft, and that all the documents mentioned are in our possession and in our files.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 26, 1915.

TESTIMONY OF MR. DAVID CLARK

Chairman WALSH. What is your name, please?

Mr. CLARK. David Clark.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. CLARK. Charlotte, N. C.

Chairman WALSH. And I believe you wired the commission you desired to make a statement in regard to some statement that had already been offered in evidence?

Mr. CLARK. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And you came here for that purpose, Mr. Clark?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, in accordance with your suggestion, you would like to get away, we have put you on out of place, with the idea that you could present your statement in a very short space of time.

Mr. CLARK. I will be very brief. I want to read one statement and present the others into the record, if I can.

Chairman WALSH. Very well, we would be glad to have you do it.

Mr. CLARK. I am here for the purpose of answering testimony given by Dr. A. J. McKelway, May 10. I am glad he is in the room, because I don't like to talk about a man behind his back.

The testimony given by Dr. A. J. McKelway on May 10 was very largely false; and where not exactly false, much of it was so shaped as to carry a false impression.

He testified that a large number of employees in southern cotton mills, including 1,085 adults, were making less than $2 per week. Pressed by Chairman Walsh he dodged through four pages of testimony, and when finally cornered said to divide the $2 or less amount by six in order to get the daily wage. McKelway has lived in the South and knows that no wage schedule of 33½ cents per day has prevailed in the last 20 years. When McKelway made that statement he knew as I do that it was false. He could have taken data from the 1914 report of the Bureau of Labor, but he went back to the 1908 report, which was prepared under his friend, Labor Commissioner Neill, and it has been often said that Dr. McKelway had a considerable influence in the compilation of that report.

The 1908 report gives the wages of North Carolina mill operatives as varying from $3.87 to $6.56 per week, but there is in it a table of earnings for a specified week, and in summing up the earnings for the specified week it shows that in both northern and southern mills there were a number who, of course, working part time during that week, earned less than $2. In order that there might be no misunderstanding the report specifically stated that the summary is "for the week mentioned."

And it was from that page he got his figures and presented them here, and told you to divide them by six.

Chairman WALSH. I had better call your attention to the rule we have here, that while the witness may freely contradict any other witness by giving the facts, we have tried as far as possible to keep any witness from characterizing any other person, or the motives of any other person that appears before the commission, and if you will devote yourself to the giving of contrast statements as to the facts——

Mr. CLARK. I will do so as large as possible. This is just a continuation of Dr. McKelway's work, and we want some way of going into the record as contradicting it.

Chairman WALSH. Just give the contradiction of the testimony, as far as you can.

Mr. CLARK (reading):

"Dr. McKelway was not deceived when he went back seven years and obtained those figures. He thought that he would deceive you, and through your report deceive the people of the country. He thought he could get by without saying 'divide them by six,' but Chairman Walsh cornered him.

"In order to give you illiteracy figures he went back even farther and gave you the statistics of 1900, or 15 years ago, waving aside the 1910 statistics with the passing remark that they were slightly different. If he had given you the 1914 statistics he would have shown that 87 per cent of the mill operatives in North Carolina can read and write and that the per cent is higher in the other Southern States.

"Late statistics would not give you the false impression that he desired to create, and he therefore gave you ancient history.

"He complains in his evidence that the southern cotton manufacturers do not welcome the representatives of the National Child Labor Committee to their mills. In the first place, the cotton manufacturers regard the National Child Labor Committee as a band of parasites and grafters and, in the second place, experience has shown that they take advantage of every courtesy to misrepresent and falsify conditions.

"The only case I have ever known where a representative of the National Child Labor Committee told the whole truth was the reply of Homer Folk to an address which I delivered before the National Child Labor Conference on January 5 last, and in which he admitted that the National Child Labor Committee did misrepresent conditions.

"I do not know who pays Dr. McKelway and his associates. Some think that it is the Rockefeller Foundation. If such information could be obtained, it would be very interesting."

I would like to put in evidence the reply of Homer Folk—

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Harriman said she would like to hear Mr. Folk's reply.

Mr. CLARK. I made an address before the National Child Labor Conference at Washington, D. C., on December 5, 1911, and Homer Folk, vice president of the National Child Labor Committee replied to me as follows:

"Mr. Clark's plea for the southern mill owner was most interesting. It aroused a line of thought in my mind which has often occurred to me in the past. He complained of the ungracious statements made and asked for a square deal and that the facts should be dealt with always with strict accuracy. I wish I could encourage him to feel that the mill owners would get that sort of a square deal. But no such encouragement can be held out as a matter of fact. I would like to give warning that instead of getting more nearly a square deal in the sense of more nearly accurate statements, it is likely in the future to be less of a square deal, because that is the history of all active movements directed against serious evils."

I wish to file a statement showing the wages in the cotton mills in the South. These figures are taken from the books of the Exposition Cotton Mills at Atlanta, from 1894, 1904, and 1914. It also shows the income of a family of four or five workers, and I would like to file that.

(The statement referred to by the witness will be found among the exhibits at the end of this subject, marked "David Clark Exhibit No. 1.")

I wish also to file some statistics, which can be obtained from any of the State reports. It shows that 87 per cent of the cotton-mill operatives can read and write; in the woolen mills, 89 per cent; in the silk mills, 99.5 per cent; and in cordage mills, 98.3 per cent.

(See David Clark Exhibit No. 2.)

And I wish to say in North Carolina we don't feel that we have to apologize to the country for the education of our people. We are looking after the education of our people. After the Civil War we had a reconstruction period that we could not educate them, and we have some adults during that period that can not read and write, but outside of that we have no apology to make. We made the greatest increase between 1900 and 1910, and we don't apologize to anybody.

Now, Dr. McKelway made an attack on Mr. D. A. Tompkins, president of the High Shoals Co., sheeting and knitting yarns—he was president of that mill—and Dr. McKelway had a violent personal grudge against Mr. Tompkins, and for that reason attacked him.

I wish to file, to refute that evidence, a letter from the principal of the school, and also a letter from A. O. Kale, the superintendent.

(See David Clark Exhibit No. 3.)

I would like, if it is permissible, to file an address that I delivered before the National Child Labor Conference in Washington, D. C., January 6, 1915.

Chairman WALSH. Was that the one responded to by Mr. Folk?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. All right.

(The paper here referred to by the witness, entitled "A Demand for a Square Deal," by David Clark, editor of the Southern Textile Bulletin, Charlotte, N. C., was submitted in printed form.)

Mr. CLARK. I would like to file a copy of Our Monthly, a monthly magazine of Christian thought and work for the Lord. Dr. Jacobs, editor of this magazine, is recognized everywhere as one of the really great men in the church, and it is dealing with the question of child labor.

(The editorial referred to appears in Our Monthly, vol. 52, No. 4, Clinton, S. C., April, 1915. It has no caption.)

The day before I appeared in Washington, January 5, Mr. Hine, who was called their official photographer, came into the meeting and stated there were children 6 or 7 years old that were being employed in the North Carolina cotton mills, and that went out to the press that it was a general condition. We finally made him give us the names of the children referred to, and I wish to file the true facts. They have now admitted that they were 8 or 10 years old instead of 6 or 7.

Chairman WALSH. What was the legal age?

Mr. CLARK. Twelve years old. If you are interested in that, I could give you incidents.

(See David Clark Exhibit No. 4.)

I wish to file with you—Dr. McKelway had something to say about feudalism in the South, and I would like to read a statement giving the commission the real facts. It is very short and I will read it. It is on welfare work, and is an address delivered before the manufacturers' committee of the North Carolina Legislature by Mr. W. B. Lynch, manager of the department of welfare and health of Spray, N. C., a mill town [reads]:

"It has been our aim to encourage cooperative community activities; the people united in service for the common good of all. We feel convinced from our observation and study of the experience of others that no form of welfare effort will attain its highest purpose without a cordial sympathetic cooperation on the part of those most affected by such effort; that any appearance of paternalism, dictation, or condescension may be regarded as benevolent despotism and looked upon with suspicion and disfavor. We believe that the ultimate hope for a contented people lies in that fundamental inborn desire for independence. We may encourage and direct activities which will develop this spirit. All successful welfare work must aim at and encourage democracy and avoid any appearance of despotism."

That is the position of the cotton manufacturers in the South in welfare work. It is frequently the case, the statement made by the National Child Labor Committee, that they refer to children being hurt in the southern cotton mills. As a matter of fact, there are very few accidents in the southern cotton mills. The machinery is very harmless, and as a rule passes over their head. The people that pay for insurance naturally base their rate on the amount of accidents that have occurred, and I want to file with you the rates showing that they start with street car conductor, $4.08, down to 68 cents for farm laborers, and 49½ cents for cotton-mill workers. They regard labor on the farm more dangerous than in the cotton mills. I wish to file this statement.

(See David Clark Exhibit No. 5.)

I would like to file with you a statement taken from an interview published in the New York American—

Chairman WALSH. Whose conclusion is that, that makes the difference in rates, that the rate shows it is less dangerous?

Mr. CLARK. The companies that make up the rate.

Chairman WALSH. Did they say that themselves?

Mr. CLARK. They give you the rate.

I wish to file with you a statement made by one in regard to certain action of Mr. Folk in the collection of $180,000, and also an extract from the Thompson's reservation, giving the salary drawn by Mr. Folk.

(See David Clark Exhibit No. 6.)

I think that is all.

Chairman WALSH. I believe you are the editor of a paper?

Mr. CLARK. I am editor and sole owner of the Southern Textile Bulletin.

Chairman WALSH. We would perhaps like to ask you some questions, but inasmuch as you are in a hurry to get away we will excuse you.

Mr. CLARK. Thank you.

Mr. MCKELWAY. May I have an opportunity to reply to this attack?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARK. Will I be given a chance to reply to him?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir; it will be submitted to you.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

WASHINGTON, May 27, 1915.

TESTIMONY OF MR. THEODORE SCHROEDER.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, please.

Mr. SCHROEDER. Theodore Schroeder.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. SCHROEDER. New York City; lawyer without paying clients; attorney for the Free Speech League for the past 12 years. I have some familiarity, I think, with the problems of agitation in relation to freedom of speech and assemblage in general and especially with courts and the police in connection with the problems of free speech in New York City, Philadelphia, New Haven, and so forth.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You say you are a lawyer without paying clients. Do you mean that you do not practice law?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I do not practice in court. I am working at law problems all the time, but accept no pay for my work.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock says that we owe you an apology for keeping you so long here, and you have been very patient. I wish you would direct yourself to those points you think are the important points, and Mr. Manly, who is trying to order the time around and deal it out, says that if you could say what you have to say in 30 minutes with your direct statement we would be obliged, and Mr. Weinstock may have some questions to ask. I will not ask you any.

Mr. SCHROEDER. It is pretty hard to attempt the process of selecting. I think I am loaded for two days.

Chairman WALSH. Have you your material in such shape that you can give it to us?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I have already dictated to a stenographer at the office the concrete instances of invasion of free speech which seem to me to illustrate the larger proposition as related to the agitation for industrial improvement.

(The matter referred to will be found as an additional statement by Mr. Theodore Schroeder at the end of this subject.)

The larger propositions, so far as the courts are concerned, seem to me to be two—first, the absolute incapacity of any judge in the United States to understand what free speech means in the light of the historical controversy which resulted in the adoption of our free-speech clauses of the Constitution. Likewise, there is an utter incapacity on the part of the courts, except when dealing with problems of property, to understand what law and the due process of law clause of the Federal and State Constitutions means as indicated in the definition of what may be done or is prohibited.

By ignoring those two provisions of the Constitutions in relation to the freedom of speech and of the press we have gotten into a situation where, in my opinion, after studying the statutes and session laws of all of the States in the Union, after reading all of the reported decisions in the United States and some in England and in Canada, and consulting with people that know about other countries, such as Germany and Russia, it is my opinion that we have to-day, in spite of our Constitution, more varieties of penalized opinions than any other country in the world.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Explain what you mean by more varieties of penalized opinions.

Mr. SCHROEDER. I mean opinions that can be punished under the forms and letter of the law as criminal offenses. In other words, we have less conceded and protected freedom of speech and of the press in the United States than in any country in the world at any time in the history of the world.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Less than Russia?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I think so. In Russia and in Germany the penalties are more severe, but the ideas which are penalized for which you may receive a penalty are more numerous here.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Could you briefly enumerate the ones for which you can be penalized here for speaking?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Not briefly. I can indicate some things.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Please do so. Will you indicate them briefly, then?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I will give a few by way of sample. For instance, in some of the States of the Union it is a crime to say anything which tends to create disrespect for law, and the courts construe that to mean disrespect for one particular law and not law in general. That means that in such a State you are violating the penal law if you advocate the repeal of a law because there is no efficient advocacy for repealing a law except by creating disrespect for it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In what State is that?

Mr. SCHROEDER. In the progressive State of Washington I recall that kind of a statute.

In the State of New York we have a statute entitling a man to 10 years in jail and a fine of $5,000 if he advocates the overthrow of the Czar of Russia, or overthrow of any organized government by unlawful means, even though no lawful means are provided.

In the State of New Jersey they have a very interesting kind of treason. I thought I had it all here, but perhaps I have left it over in the office. A man was indicted for having that picture in his window [indicating picture], because it represents a man in the uniform of the Italian army, supposedly ridiculing the King of Italy. That, I must suppose tended to create a state of war as between the United States and Italy, and he was indicted for that offense, and put under two thousand bail bond, and kept in jail for some four or five months before he could furnish a bail bond. He has been out about a year and one-half since, without being able to get a trial. Of course he was an agitator.

This kind of laws, I might add, are never enforced except against radical agitators. This inequality in the application of the law increases the evil of repression.

Now, those are some of the laws which I consider particularly outrageous. There are other laws against agitators, of which I gave some illustration in my statement this morning; laws that provide for a penalty for sending anything through the mail on the outside of the wrapper of which there is anything exposing a man to ridicule and contempt, for instance, such as asking a legislator how much he expected to get for calling laboring men bums that did not want to work. This was during a time of an agitation for the legislative reduction of hours of labor from 12 to 10.

Then, of course, there is the injunction with which you are familiar, which is used not only in cases of industrial disturbances, but in cases of agitation when there is no industrial disturbance.

Our postal censorship in the case of obscenity has been used to oppress and punish labor champions for a very simple sort of statement on the relation of economic situations and sex problems.

Of course there are a lot of more or less foolish laws which say you must not say anything that casts contempt on the flag. Another evil is illustrated in the case of one man, under Army regulation, who was given five years in the guard-house for shaking hands and smiling at Emma Goldman, in spite of the fact that he had been through the Spanish War and had 15 years' good service.

If I were to elaborate on these things by concrete illustrations it would take pretty long. I have given a few illustrations, perhaps two, under several of the laws in my statement this morning.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Did you hear the statement of the preceding witness relative to free speech?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I did.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You remember he gave it as his opinion that no man ought to be prevented from expressing his ideas publicly, no matter what they were, but that he should be held responsible for them, and if they were vulgar or abusive or improper then he should be punished. Now, in how far do you agree with that witness?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Not at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Give us your conception of what constitutes free speech.

Mr. SCHROEDER. Free speech. That conception of free speech which he put over is the idea of free speech the English tyrants have had since 1696, after the repeal of the old censorship law. The new law provided for censorship after publication instead of before. This did not enlarge the liberty of free speech, but only to change the mode of suppression and punishment. If we are going to have free speech we ought to have it free. This means that no man should be punished for any expression of opinion on any subject so long as the consequences of that speech is nothing but the creation of a state of mind in some one else.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let us analyze that a bit: If a man should get up on the public street and denounce a prominent citizen as a thief and a liar and a scoundrel and did it maliciously; what, if anything, would you do with him?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Not one thing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would you allow a man to defame another maliciously without subjecting him to punishment for it?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Yes; he ought to have the same right other men now have to hire professional liars to glorify them beyond their merit.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And if anyone did that to you, would you do anything about it?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Nothing except to try to correct him.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How?

Mr. SCHROEDER. By making the same kind of speech in my defense.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would not call that slanderous or libelous?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I might call it slanderous or libelous, but not have it punishable by the State.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would have no punishment for slander?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Not at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Or for libel?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Not at all. The whole theory of the libel law was never designed to protect property in an other's state of mind. It was enacted in England for the purpose of protecting the rich in the enjoyment of their privileges and prerogatives; it applied only to the lords and earls, the clergy, the kings, and the courts. It was not applied in the beginning, and was not intended to be applied for the protection of the common citizen. It is one of those things that came into being for the benefit of those that have the big end of the stick.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then you are not a believer in the biblical injunction, "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor"?

Mr. SCHROEDER. As a matter of advice, yes; but not as a criminal law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would not punish a man that bears false witness against his neighbor?

Mr. SCHROEDER. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would you punish him for perjury?

Mr. SCHROEDER. That is a different proposition; that has nothing to do with free speech.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would give every man the right to go out in the public and defame his neighbor maliciously and willfully without punishment?

Mr. SCHROEDER. So far as the physiological effect is the only element involved, he should have the equal right to tell an untruth even maliciously and whether it affects one favorably or unfavorably.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Suppose the public statements on the part of the public speaker would lead to violence, what would you do in that event?

Mr. SCHROEDER. If the speech results in violence, then the person who delivers the speech that creates the violence may become an accessory before the fact, and the speaker is punishable for his participation in the violence, but not for the speech as such.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If a man got up in public—in a public thoroughfare—and endeavored maliciously and willfully to rob a woman of her good name, and accuse her of unchastity, would you punish him?

Mr. SCHROEDER. No; no more than I would a man for depriving me of my good name for chastity or unchastity; nor should such a one be punished so long as she is allowed to acquire a reputation for chastity which she did not deserve.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That would apply to the press also?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Absolutely; and that is the only interpretation of free speech which you can possibly get; if you examine the historical controversy which led up to the adoption of the free-speech clauses of our Constitution, and the evil of our judicial system is that we have persistently ignored those historical controversies, and have adopted definitions of free speech which Blackstone gave and which were only declaratory as a matter of practice, not at all intended to declare a principle. In his time there were no constitutional principles of free speech involved. Our courts have blindly followed Blackstone and have upheld something that the Constitution of the United States was intended to destroy.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If a man got up in public and called some prominent citizen a liar and a scoundrel maliciously and the victim should assault him for doing so, would you punish the victim for the assault?

Mr. SCHROEDER. If you are having any punishment for assault he should be punished, because he should not be allowed private vengeance. Really all vengeance both public and private should cease.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How would he get redress if he was not allowed to punish the offender and the speaker's utterances were not to be punished by law; what redress would he have?

Mr. SCHROEDER. So long as people believe in free speech he is not entitled to redress.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Simply take the stump against the other fellow and begin talking?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Call him another?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Any way he seemed to think was most efficient. I would recommend correcting the misstatements.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am sorry to confess this is a new doctrine to me.

Mr. SCHROEDER. You will find a lot more things that are new or are interesting if you will probe it further.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is what we have, the probe.

Mr. SCHROEDER. I have got——

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You have sort of thrown a monkey wrench into the gears here?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Now, I have got, and would be glad to leave with the commission some publications of mine for the free-speech league, in which I undertake to justify these things; justify them on the score of orthodox principles, of the established law. One is a thesis on "Free Speech for Radicals" and another is entitled "Methods of Constitutional Construction," which is one in which I go into the sympathetic method of interpretation.

There is another entitled "The Historical Interpretation of Unabridged Freedom of Speech," and another related to these on "Due Process of Law," in relation to statutory uncertainty and constructing offenses.

(The publications referred to by witness, entitled "The Historical Interpretation of Unabridged Freedom of Speech," by Theodore Schroeder, republished from Central Law Journal, March, 1910; "Free Speech for Radicals," by Theodore Schroeder, published by Free Speech League, in 1912; "Methods of Constitutional Construction," by Theodore Schroeder, published by Free Speech League, in New York City without date; and "Due Process of Law in Relation to Statutory Uncertainty, etc.," by Theodore Schroeder, published by Free Speech League, in New York City in 1908, were submitted in printed form.)

Mr. SCHROEDER. Let me show you a situation that arises out of your situation very logically.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What do you call my situation?

Mr. SCHROEDER. The one implied by your question, which is that the man ought to be punished for creating an undesirable state of mind. If a man is to be punished for creating an undesirable state of mind he ought to be punished for having one, and if he is punished for having one then we get back, to justify the precedents of Rome, where a man dreamed that he had killed the king, and the authorities said, and very logically, too, "You would not have dreamed this if you had not had the thought, and we will kill you."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How did the king know that he had the dream?

Mr. SCHROEDER. The dreamer had told neighbors.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He was punished for dreaming?

Mr. SCHROEDER. He had a state of mind, and would not have dreamed it unless he thought it in the daytime. I am opposed to punishing states of mind and free-speech defenders of unpopular states of mind.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are not in harmony with the story about that judge who sentenced a prisoner before him. He gave him a rather stiff sentence, and the prisoner said, "Is it a crime to think?" And the judge said, "No; it is not a crime to think." "Then," he said, "I want to tell you I think you are an infernal scoundrel." And he said, "I will give you five years more, not for thinking but for expressing your thought."

Mr. SCHROEDER. I would suspicion that the man was right, and ought not to have been punished for expressing what he believed to be the truth.

I have some propositions with reference to our courts which you might care to examine me about. I have vaguely formulated a view, very briefly, because I did not want to dogmatically state my conclusions. First, I would say that there is as much reason for the belief entertained by many that our courts are the most pernicious part of our political institutions; second, a stop should be put to the occasional practice and general possibility of packing the court according to economic predisposition, which usually are known only to the few who expect to benefit by them, and occasionally to the appointing or nominating power; third, rules of evidence in criminal cases, where insanity is not pleaded as a defense, absolutely preclude the possibility of a square deal in determining the degree of so-called "moral turpitude" involved in the crime, and thus what is miscalled "law" precludes the possibility of even approximating to justice; four, existing intellectual methods in the arguemnt and decision of legal questions involves the use of memory more than intelligence, and almost preclude any process toward more enlightened conceptions of justice; five, we should have the recall of all judges, and the recall of all judicial decisions on constitutional questions. It is of especial importance that this apply to the United States Supreme Court. If the people are credited with the right to make constitutions they should be allowed to say what they mean after being framed. Six, while in the act of legislating, no person should be allowed to serve interests conflicting with the public weal, because in such situation the private service is apt to be best rewarded by those seeking the greatest and most inequitable privileges.

All criminal-libel laws should be repealed. All postal censorship over ideas transmitted through the mails should be repealed, and especially such as prohibit information to adults as to the scientific sterilization of marriage. The equality of advantage should be secured to all in the use of postal facilities conducted at a public loss. Publishers should be compelled to accept all advertising at uniform rates.

We must quit sentimentalizing about living wage, and cease quibbling about such words as "martyrs" and "criminals," which quibblings obscure the real issue. We should soon begin a serious inquiry about the standards of judgment for determining relative approximations to a just wage.

No court or law should be too sacred to preclude any serious, pertinent, or efficient criticism. Our superstitious reverence for courts should be destroyed and the judges uncanonized. Contempt laws punishing criticism of courts, especially where the criticism is not made in the presence of the court, should be destroyed, and resistance to such power to punish for contempt should be made by force, if necessary, because courts persist in contempt of the people and their Constitution.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The question has been raised, What is your definition of force?

Mr. SCHROEDER. In that situation, remembering that our courts have said that it is unconstitutional for the legislatures to pass a law defending contempt, and saying that nobody shall be punished for contempt except such as is defined in that statute, I see no way of attacking or restraining the courts unless we follow the precedent in England, where, by an act of parliament, 40 judges were hung for their unrighteous judgment. I know no other remedy in a case of that kind, and can hardly consider this a remedy.

Furthermore, I have heard considerable talk here about responsibility as a country for the poor, especially as the same relates to labor organizations. I would like, if that doctrine is to be at all applied, to have it applied where there is more need for applying it, to wit, with reference to our courts, and also monopolists of the good things of the world.

Another thing: We have in New York State approximately 30,000 statutes. We have in New York City perhaps in the neighborhood of between 10,000 and 15,000 municipal ordinances. We have, in addition to that, I do not know how many thousand Federal statutes that are applicable. Every one of those statutes is enacted to defend property. We have constitutional guaranties of freedom of speech and freedom of press, but so far as I know there is not one law anywhere in the United States which even remotely squints at an attempt to protect by law that constitutional guaranty as to freedom of speech and press. If our Constitution and laws are going to be of any use at all, there ought to be some protection for these constitutional guaranties as well as the constitutional guaranty of property right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Did I understand you to say that you would wipe out all the prohibitory postal laws?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I would all censorial postal laws.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would wipe out the postal laws against mailing obscene literature?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Exactly. I have published a book of 250,000 words in defense of obscene literature, so called.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In defense of it, did I understand you to say?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, you do not think that anything ought to be put in the way of panderers whose purpose it is to gain through corrupt youths?

Mr. SCHROEDER. That involves the whole question of psychology which I have worked out very elaborately. I do not think that I can adequately condense it here, but it comes to this: You can not, by that literature, create a lascivious state of mind. You can bring to consciousness a thing that exists, and all of that legislation, in my judgment, is based upon psychological ignorance.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do not think we are largely creatures of temptation, and that many of us are kept decent and respectable and virtuous, not because we would be otherwise, but because simply we are not tempted?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I do not know of any great temptation that the printed page would open to anybody's virtue.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you not think obscene literature and obscene, indecent pictures tend to arouse passions that would otherwise lie dormant?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Not that otherwise would lie dormant. They may bring to consciousness some that already exist. Right in that connection I want to emphasize one thing—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). For example, if you were the teacher of a school, would you forbid bringing into your classroom indecent literature and indecent pictures, or would you encourage it?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I would not do either. I would not forbid it and I would not encourage it. I am not sure that we would at all agree on what is meant by indecent literature.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would not object to it if it was brought in?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Not especially, and I would not, if I had children of my own, object to it. I would undertake to so enlighten them that it could not possibly do any harm. The real evil in all that situation now is that we are denying, under our censorship, the enlightenment which would perhaps preclude any evil, if any evil can possibly come out of that kind of a situation. We are denying the crowd to have ordinary information about a subject that is really scientific. You can get at the theology of sex, but you can not talk sexual science through the mail.

There is one thing that has been emphasized by three witnesses already that I want to especially call to your attention.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Let me call your attention to the question of the mail being used for purposes of deception, schemes of all kinds.

Mr. SCHROEDER. There, something else besides the psychological effect, is involved—the getting of property. There a property right might be involved, and that would not necessarily come under my definition of freedom of press.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If you throw the mail open, if you throw the Postal Service open to anybody for any purpose they might desire, that deception could be practiced.

Mr. SCHROEDER. I would throw it open as against all censorship of opinion.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Where it would not affect property?

Mr. SCHROEDER. If property is affected, then a different situation arises, with which I am not dealing. Three witnesses since I have been waiting here have expressed some concern about the industrial problems being related to the largeness of families of the poor. I think sufficient attention has not been given to the responsibility of the Government for the existence of those large families. We now make it a crime in both State and Federal laws to disseminate any information on the sterilization of marriage. That information, in my judgment, in a city like New York ought to be gratuitously imparted by the board of health, especially to the poor. The others get it any way. I think that would go a very long way toward solving the labor problem so far as large families at least have anything to do with it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You mean they should be trained scientifically in prevention?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Yes, sir; that is, they should have the information, should have access to the information just as much as the rich has access to it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are dealing with the psychologic condition.

Mr. SCHROEDER. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. A condition of the mind?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I gathered from your attitude that throwing the post office open to everything ought to be brought about, that you would not even endeavor to restrain quack doctors from scattering their literature through the mail and imposing on the ignorance of people and getting them to imagine they are the victims of all kinds of diseases, and thus exploiting them.

Mr. SCHROEDER. If you gathered that from my remarks, you did not listen to what I said to Commissioner O'Connell a minute ago.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Perhaps I did not catch it.

Mr. SCHROEDER. I said where fraud was involved—that is, fraud for the purpose of getting possession of a man's money—it should not be done, because there is something besides the condition of a man's mind involved.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a limitation on quack doctors sending out all sorts of things?

Mr. SCHROEDER. There is a limitation on their sending out misstatements of fact or fraud, and there is a limitation—whatever it may mean I do not know—to prevent them from sending out preventives through the mail. If the diseases with which they deal are sexual, and they deal with them in such way that somebody might call them obscene, then they are prohibited.

Chairman WALSH. Are not these quack medical institutions advertised all over the country?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Yes, they are; but the advertising must not be obscene in character, whatever that may mean, and there must be no fraudulent misrepresentations made through the mail.

Chairman WALSH. That is, a man describes himself as one of the most wonderful doctors in the world and having the greatest skill—

Mr. SCHROEDER (interrupting). "The most wonderful" I suppose the courts would say was a matter of opinion and not a question of fact. We may not misstate the fact as to his attainments or achievements. He may not say "I am a graduate of 17 colleges," when he is not; that would be a misstatement of fact. To say "I am a wonderful man" is an expression of opinion which may be very honest.

I do not know whether you care to go into any of these separate matters that I have spoken of here with reference to the courts or not.

Chairman WALSH. It would be very interesting, I think, to state the result of your researches a little more particularly with reference to interpretation of laws affecting the right of free speech where the same are not specific and definite. For instance, there were charges made against Mr. Iglesias, who is here, to the effect that he incited the multitude.

Mr. SCHROEDER. We have many laws similar to that that are enforced here. The situation there is this: They have some vague law which says something about disturbing the peace. The court construes that, as they did in the case of Upton Sinclair's Silence League, that merely walking silently up and down in front of a building with crêpe on your arm tends, in the imagination of the judge, speculatively and prospectively to disturb the peace, because Mr. Rockefeller's friends might want to go down and assault Mr. Sinclair in consequence. In my judgment all of that class of laws should be declared unconstitutional, because the statute itself does not define the criteria of guilt in such way that a man, by reading the law, can tell in advance what he may or may not do under it. The courts when dealing with property rights, as, for instance, with railroad rates, very uniformly say that such was, because of their uncertainty, are unconstitutional in that they do not constitute due process of law. In order that there may be due process of law there must first be a law, and law means a definite regulation, a definite rule of conduct. In property rights the courts always concede that when a railroad company is involved; but when personal liberty is involved they never once have seen that uncertainty in criteria of guilt ought to result in declaring a statute unconstitutional.

Chairman WALSH. What has been the trend of decisions with reference to declaring laws unconstitutional that undertake to place a limitation upon the right of free speech?

Mr. SCHROEDER. No court, so far as I can recall, ever has declared any law unconstitutional upon that ground. There again judge's minds work in an entirely different manner when they are dealing with property regulations from what they do when they are dealing with problems of personal liberty or free speech. Sometimes a court has said, when the judge believed a particular utterance ought to be permitted, when the judge believed it ought to be permitted, "This particular utterance is protected by the free-speech clause of the Constitution," without undertaking to define what constitutional freedom meant. They only make a concrete dogma, but they never say that the law, of which this is a part, and which by its terms, would cover this language, is unconstitutional. When they are dealing with property rights as, for instance, in the employer's liability law, they take a different view. They say the statute includes something which is beyond the power of Congress as well as something which is within the power of Congress, and then the court will say it is not for the judge to separate the constitutional part from the rest, and "We will declare the whole law unconstitutional." They can always say that when they are dealing with property rights of corporations, but somehow or other they never can say that nor assume that attitude of mind when they are dealing with problems of free speech, with the right of assembly, the right to carry arms.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In private conversation, if I understood you correctly, you said you did not think this commission had as yet struck the fundamentals of the problem. Is this your conception of what constitutes the fundamentals—this absolute free speech and free press?

Mr. SCHROEDER. No; that is not what I meant.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Be good enough to give us your conception of what are the fundamentals.

Mr. SCHROEDER. The fundamentals of the economic question is the wage problem—of the wage problem—my thought at that time was this—I fear it will take some minutes to really get it over to you, to even approximate it, and I do not hope to succeed then.

The fundamental thing in the matter of the industrial problem, as I see it, is not to get a philanthropic attitude toward the laborer. The real thing is to find a general standard for determining justice of his wage and then to direct legislation up to attain a closer approximation to that ideal, assuming that possibly it can not be done. How are we going to get that kind of standard? Let me state to you a hypothetical situation, which seems to me involve all the aspects of the problem.

Suppose a man with an automobile has a wreck on a lonely road. He breaks his leg, and is thrown out, and is helpless. There comes along a man with another automobile, and the probabilities, we will assume for this hypothetical case, are that there is no other person likely to happen along that road in the next 48 hours, during which time blood poison may set in and the man may die. He appeals to the new man to take him to town to the hospital, and there a situation might arise where an inquiry is made as to what would be a just compensation for that service. Sentimentalism is to be barred.

One undertaking to decide the question presented might approach the problem first from the standpoint of the man who believes in scab labor, and he would say, "A just wage is what some neighboring farmer day after to-morrow, coming by here, will charge me to take me to town, $2."

Another man approaching the problem perhaps from the standpoint of the trade-unionist, who belongs to the Taxicab Drivers' Association, would say, "That is worth $5, because that is the union rate, and it ought to be $5."

But a man comes along with a new automobile, and he says, "But I am a professional man; I am an architect. If I take you to town to the hospital, I will lose an engagement over here, out of which I will earn $250; therefore I want $250. That is a just wage."

A fourth man comes along and says, "You are not worth $250 at the other job; you are robbing the other fellow; you are only worth $125; therefore you ought not to ask more than $125 as a just substitute for what you are losing."

Another man deciding that problem might find out that the injured man has a house and lot worth $1,000, and, believing in Jim Hill's theory, would say, "You must take what the traffic will bear; your life is worth more than your home. I want your house and lot or else you will die."

Which of these five standards are you going to consider as the just wage; and if none of them, how are you going to get at what is a just compensation in that situation? Manifestly justice is not to be achieved by adopting the personal view of the scab, the trade-unionist, the architect, or the equitist, or even Jim Hill. In that situation you have got to get, if possible, an impersonal standard, and in order to get an impersonal standard you have first of all got to rid your mind, so far as possible, of all the preconceptions which are founded upon personal interests or ambitions built upon present-day standards. With a view to aiding that state of mind, I want to read a short paragraph here from a very conservative man, Mr. Paley (?), who wrote over a century ago. Then I am going to lead up to a social standard for the solving of this problem:

"If you should see a flock of pigeons in a field of corn, and if, instead of each picking where and what it likes, taking so much as it wanted and no more, you should see 99 of them gathering all they could into a heap, reserving nothing for themselves but the chaff and refuse, keeping this heap for one, and that the weakest, perhaps the worst, pigeon in the flock, sitting around and looking on all the while whilst this one was devouring, throwing about, and wasting it. If a pigeon more hungry than the rest touch a grain in the hoard, all the others instantly fly down upon it and tear it to pieces. If you saw this, you would see nothing more than what is an everyday practice established among men."

Now, suppose you start to think about this problem from the attitude of mind of a pigeon society, and then seek a solution by the aid of the historical viewpoint. If you analyzed the demand in behind the words and seek the substance of justice, not getting lost in forms by which slavery was made effective, by such methods let us consider the peasants' wars, the abolition of feudal slavery, and the controversy over chattel slavery. As you get away from the forms and symbols and processes by which chattel slavery was affected and through which it was opposed, and so discover the real gist of the controversy, it must be this, that in behind the forms, behind which slavery was maintained, there was a half conscious desire that the laborer should get the full product of his labor. If we can not show this demand to be unjust, we should seek to satisfy it.

Now, as far as I can see, from the few days I have heard the inquiry of this commission, the inquiry has not been directed, as far as the questions are concerned, toward anything which would squint at the realization of that ideal or that urge in the laborer toward the demanding and securing the full product of his labor. That is a standard of social justice which ignores the personal viewpoint. Now, then, let's go back to our problem of the fellow with the broken leg and the automobile and see whether we can find a social standard for determining which, if any, of the five attitudes of mind should be the basis of his compensation for taking the injured man to the hospital, and we come to the conclusion that the rescuer is deprived only so much as during an equal length of time he would create in actual social values or accept of others what was necessary to the maintenance of life. Then we have abolished exploitation and gotten rid of the exploiter, and each receives what he really could produce of necessities of life during the same length of time that it would take to carry the afflicted one to the hospital.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You being the judge, how much would you reward the man?

Mr. SCHROEDER. If he was a good man at hoeing potatoes, I would try to estimate what share of his time—suppose it took him a half a day, what share he contributes toward the establishment of the value of foods which he creates.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And if he were an architect, making $250 a day?

Mr. SCHROEDER. My conception is that decent society would not pay him $250 a day; he gets that because he has a little special monopoly; he has an education that was denied others, and the estimate of his service is estimated on the value of his monopoly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And your idea would be to pay the architect the same, regardless of their ability?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Regardless of their efficiency. The social value of the product of his labor might take into consideration the value of his life to society.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How would you compensate him?

Mr. SCHROEDER. By giving him a living as good as others get.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Suppose you were an architect, and that I came to you, and you were busy, but I wanted you, and you said, "I have not the time," and I would ask you how much you are earning, and you would say $10 or $15 or $20 a day, and I would tell you that I would pay you twice that—

Mr. SCHROEDER. I have not gotten you away from your viewpoint. I tried to get you to the attitude of the pigeons, that were dividing that corn, according to their necessities, not according to greed. If I could get you to think in terms of our pigeon society, we could easily see a method of getting at the situation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let's take this concrete case. You are an architect?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Pigeons are architects; they gather corn and build it in piles.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I would rather confine it to yourself. You, we say, are an architect, and have your hands full, and I value your skill, and think that you can do my work better than any other architect, that nobody else can do my work, and I am willing to pay you a premium in order to have you take my work in preference to other people's work, that I am willing to give you double the fee, is it wrong for me to offer it and for you to take it?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Both propositions would be foolish, if we had the kind of personal standards of judgment that I described to you. You don't get away from these old modes of thinking. You must view the problem from the standpoint of the social value of the service.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In the place of you being an architect, say, you were a physician, and that I felt that the life of my wife or baby was in danger, and I had the greatest confidence in you, more than in anybody else, and I thought that you could save the life of my wife or child, and I had no confidence in the other physicians. You have your hands full, but I want you to come a great distance to perform the service, and I am ready to offer you a premium so you will not be a loser by so doing, is that wrong for me to offer it, and is it wrong for you to accept it?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Not under present conditions, but under decent society it is wrong for me to accept it, and impossible for you to offer it, because you would not be richer than the most. This woman that you assume can not pay me anything may be worth more to society than your wife, and this should determine my choice as to whom I will serve.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is true. Then, I take it, you condemn in toto the present method of compensation?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I say that it is not a just method at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is a just method?

Mr. SCHROEDER. The one that I have explained, that makes compensation depend on the social value of the service.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Who ought to be judge?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Society, when it gets civilized, will be.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What form will you have to determine? Society is a very indefinite thing.

Mr. SCHROEDER. It might be determined approximately; as I stated, an ideal never can be realized to the full. It might be determined approximately, if Bill Haywood's dream was realized, and all of the workmen got into one union. You could keep your paper title to the factories, all they wanted was the entire product of the factory, if they did the work. That would come nearer a solution of it than anything.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is there a name to your philosophy?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I don't know of anybody that believes it, as I do, and I have no name for it myself.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you call it Socialist?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I do not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Or I. W. W.?

Mr. SCHROEDER. No; I don't think so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It has not been christened yet?

Mr. SCHROEDER. It has not been christened, but I rather deplore a state of mind that fails to understand principles without familiar labels. Now, after all, it is a simple proposition we are trying to get at, namely, the social value of a man's service, and give him as near as we may the social value in return. It does not matter what labor is assigned to it, and perhaps I differ from other radicals only as to the most efficient methods for reaching this end.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. This commission has invited constructive suggestions, and that are practical in character, and that can be applied to the conditions by which we are surrounded. We are very grateful to you, as to others, if you can give us an idea, not under conditions as Haywood described—

Mr. SCHROEDER. There is no practical remedy for any of these things. There is only an evolutionary growth toward the ideal, and if we see the ideal clearly we shall gradually adjust ourselves to it. First of all there must be freedom of speech, for Haywood and the rest, to defend their dreams. We have not gotten to a stage where a man can advocate free speech. I have been twice suppressed by the police in New York City for attempting to advocate free speech. It is foolish to talk about any practical result. The Members of Congress don't want it, or they might do something like this: First, the land value, the tax, and the income tax which confiscates all above $5,000 a year for each family, and repeal all of the patent laws, by virtue of which a few men have a monopoly on all of the tools of a trade, that might help a little, and in order to protect ourselves against a lawless judiciary, and make it possible to have at least a little new thought getting into the judicial mind, and we ought to prohibit lawyers from reading judicial precedents in their arguments before the court, and the court from citing those other adjudications for their justification. Sir Edward Coke said that a man that knows no reason for the law knows no law. I quote from memory. And by that standard a great many judges would be disqualified for their position. If men were studying judicial decisions to discover the reasons for the law, and they come into a court to enlarge the understanding of the judge instead of trying to pile up dogmas, we might get a little reform. That is not as foolish as it may seem, because I am told that in France and Germany this method exists, and in one State or Territory in this Nation the reading of decisions were once prohibited by statute, but for different reasons, though—I refer to Utah.

Chairman WALSH. What do you think produces the two distinct mental attitudes of the judges, with reference to property right and free speech?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I think it is largely a trick of psychology that the judge is unconscious of. Certainly in any situation of that sort men naturally can be classified into two groups, the people with conflicting tendencies in their attitude of mind, one is that tendency which when it becomes conscious and expresses itself in definite formula means government from above the people. That is the theory of the aristocrats and royalists' thought. The other, if it becomes conscious and expresses itself, is a scheme of government from out of the people. Now, to judge by his habitual attitude toward things above him, by a consistent habit of harking back to ancient precedent, which always means to go back to England, where the decisions all are dominated practically without exception by those who believe in government from above the people, and that always means government by the rich and for the rich. Now, then, he distrusts instantly, without expressing it, and probably if questioned about it verbally would deny it, he distrusts the action of the common people, and those that come up out of the people, and he has an aversion to the criticism that comes from them that are down and out, and this attitude of aversion compels him to read into the Constitution things that never were intended to be there by men like Jefferson, and likewise it creates that attitude that predisposition to do the thing which promotes the interest of the rich. Psychologically he identifies himself emotionally with them and their rules of the game of life, unconscious as to the process naturally of this thing, abiding by it, not because it is there, but abiding by it because he is in an emotional state, and he gets sympathetic with others.

Now, take Tannebaum; he comes into court, heralded in advance as an anarchist or I. W. W. His hair is a bit long, he has a fluffy tie, he looks different from other people and talks different, and has not the pomp and scraping attitude to the judge, and asserts his indifference, and also asserts that he has not done anything wrong, but he is a dangerous citizen, and the judge takes the emotional attitude toward him that he would take toward a wild animal, a thing that is feared, because he didn't know what he was going to do, how he was going to act. There is no sympathetic understanding in that case. The judge that punished Tannenbaum was elected as a progressive, and to be a progressive in New York is itself a suspicious circumstance; and in view of that fact it is fair to infer, even though not conscious of the fact, or even if he was the emotional reaction would be the same, that if he showed any sympathy that he would be suspicioned as being unduly sympathetic with his theories, and as a sort of action in self-defense, against suspicion of such radicalism, he gives him the limit. I think I know more about psychology than he does himself, and that is the way those things work, and that is why all of this talk we hear of equality before the law is absolutely absurd. There is not now and never has been and, in my judgment there never will be what is called equality before the law, and it arises out of just this sort of a situation.

Again, in criminal cases, and, of course, these agitators get into court on criminal cases often, the laws almost preclude the possibility of justice, unless the plea of insanity is entered. Then, if that plea is made, you can introduce the state of mind that resulted in the crime, and if it is not, the judge refuses to take into account and the rules of evidence preclude those facts, and they can not introduce in evidence the state of mind that caused it. Now, I say that you can not even approximate justice as to these things, unless you get a sympathetic understanding of things, and unless you know the circumstances which induced the particular state of mind which resulted in the so-called criminal act, whether it is violence in a strike situation or what not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you had been the judge in both of those cases, what sentences would you have given; take, for instance, in the Tannebaum case?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I would not have given Tannebaum any sentence whatever, because he did no injury to anybody, and was simply exercising his right of free speech. He went to a church and asked permission to sleep there, along with others, and they offered to clean up the church afterwards, and he was told he would have to consult the pastor of the church.

Let me illustrate that in a particular concrete case. This is the kind of complaints I find are against the court. A young man by the name of Tannebaum in New York was found guilty of constructive breach of the peace. He was a little boy about 21 years old, who was conspicuous in the disemployment movement in New York. For his constructive offense he received a punishment of one year in jail with a fine of $500, which at the usual rate meant two years and five months in jail, because he had no money. The distinguished gentleman who is the employee of the Sugar Trust robbed the Government of $11,000,000 on import duties, etc., received two years in jail. Now, that is the kind of thing that sticks in their memory, and causes their criticism of courts. The judge who got these Sugar Trust fellows before him, and gave them two years in jail, had before him nice gentlemen, wearing good clothes; they were the kind of people that he meets in his clubs and social life; he could understand their ambition to serve well the corporations that can award high. Perhaps he had in his younger days an ambition to serve them himself. He acts as a sympathetic understanding of that man and judged the penalty accordingly.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Did he not go in during the services and make a disturbance?

Mr. SCHROEDER. No, ma'am.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Who was that?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Bouck White. Tannebaum came back, and there is a dispute whether he went in of his own volition, or whether the policeman coaxed him in, and he says they did coax him in, and when he got inside they said that everybody inside was under arrest, and for that he got two years and five months.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And the other man?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I don't know, I hate to judge anybody. I think I would probably rather discharge him. Certainly these men should not be punished so long as men like old man Havemeyer escaped the penalty. If anyone is to be punished, it should be the men higher up.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Mr. Schroeder, evidently you don't approve of people that are rich?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I don't approve of rich people that got rich by exploitation, and there are few that get rich any other way. I have no grudge against the people as people.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. I understand you to say that you are a lawyer and work without pay?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I am a parasite, about as far as the lawyer gets.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. But to the man who is down and out you are a rich man?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Certainly; I am a parasite and ought to be abolished.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Do you think that the man that is down and out ought to condemn you as a parasite?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I don't think anybody has a right to condemn anybody else.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. You would let him do it?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Certainly; they have done it.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Is he just as much justified as you in saying what you have about Mr. Havemeyer or anybody else?

Mr. SCHROEDER. Certainly; they have done it often.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have not denied it?

Mr. SCHROEDER. I have not; I plead guilty.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. I want to say it is only a question of comparison—

Mr. SCHROEDER. I don't think it is a question of what you happen to have, but how you get it, and the system that creates it for you. I think the present system that creates it for you ought not to be, and it seems to me that all our legislation ought to be shaped up to a point of its ultimate abolition, it can not be done at once, of course. It seems to me that the ideal toward which we should strive ought to be the one that gives the laborer the full product of his labor.

TESTIMONY OF MR. SAMUEL GOMPERS.

Chairman WALSH. You are Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, and you have appeared before our commission before. I am merely making that statement for the record. Now, I understand, Mr. Gompers, that you would like to make with reference to some matters that have gone in here, and supplemental to some others perhaps that you have already said. You may proceed in your own way, because I do not know exactly what it is.

Mr. GOMPERS. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed to make the statement that I had in mind to make, may I say that in connection with the question asked by Commissioner O'Connell of the witness representative of the Governor of Porto Rico, regarding the advice given by the Governor of Porto Rico to the cigar makers on strike, he advised them to return to work upon the conditions set forth by the employers. I was in Porto Rico at the time, after the governor had given that advice. I had two conferences with the governor and he repeated that advice to me. The cigar makers belonged to the same international organization of which I am a member and an office in addition to being president of the American Federation of Labor. In conference with the striking cigar makers, in public mass meeting, I advised them not to accept the governor's advice; that they could return to work on the employers' terms when they were more hungry than they were then.

They held out. The Cigar Makers' International Union came to their financial support, and as a result of their holding out they reached an agreement with their employers on much better terms and conditions.

A word with regard to the subject of free speech and free press. I have been, with a number of my associates, the victims of attempts of courts to interfere with my right—the exercise of my right as a citizen of the country—the exercise of the right of free speech and free press. Much has been made by witnesses before the commission, witnesses generally in the employ of the interests against labor, that I have defied the courts. I have had no desire to defy the courts, but I had a very great desire to exercise my constitutional guaranteed rights, when occasion required that I should so exercise these rights in the interest of my fellows. One was, for instance, when, in the bituminous coal strike of 1897, Judge Jackson issued his injunction forbidding public meetings in West Virginia and throughout his jurisdiction, and forbade the freedom of speech. I went to West Virginia and held meetings and spoke. It was then I declared, and I have adhered to it ever since—it was at Thurmond, W. Va.; my memory does not serve me as to the exact terms, but this is it in substance, that when any court shall undertake, by a writ of injunction, to deny me of the right of free speech and free press, as guaranteed to me by the Constitution of my country, I propose to exercise my constitutional rights, the injunction to the contrary notwithstanding.

During the contempt proceedings before Justice Wright of the District Supreme Court of the District of Columbia for alleged violation of the terms of the injunction issued by Judge Gould, his associate, in which I and my associates, and other numerous persons unnamed, were enjoined from discussing either orally or in print or in circular form, or in writing, or in any manner directly or indirectly, referring to the concern with which a large part of the organized workmen were in controversy, I proceeded to discuss that question, both in the American Federationist, the official journal of the American Federation of Labor, of which I was and am editor, through circulars, and upon the public platform.

In 1908, during the presidential campaign of that year, the Republican Party refused to take cognizance of any request which we had made in regard to incorporating in the platform of that party the relief which we asked. We then went to the Democratic Party, and the Democratic Party incorporated in its platform the declarations which we sought. As a result, not because we are Democrats—because, as a matter of fact, we are not, in a partisan sense—but, using the Democratic Party as one of the greatest instruments by which we had hoped to accomplish our purpose to relieve the situation and conditions which arise under such circumstances, to relieve it, first, by the declaration in the party platform, and, secondly, in the hope that if it was successful Congress would enact a law covering just such a complaint and securing the relief.

During that campaign I took the platform in advocacy of the defeat of the Republican candidate upon the platform which ignored the demands of labor and advocated the election of the candidate of the Democratic Party, because the platform of that party contained the declarations of relief which we asked. During my advocacy of the defeat of the one candidate and the election of the other, I used the state of facts as they existed in our controversy between us and that company—which I prefer for the record not to name, because we have come to an amicable agreement with the company, and we do not want to keep alive any feeling which at that time may have been engendered—but, as I say, in the course of my addresses upon the public platform during a political campaign, advocating the defeat of one candidate and the election of another candidate for the Presidency of the United States, I used the state of facts which existed in the then pending trial, and used it as an illustration for the necessity for the legislative relief promised in the platform of the Democratic Party. Because I used the state of facts, the argument I made upon the platform was used as evidence against me that I violated the terms of the injunction and therefore was guilty of contempt of court. I may say that in the decision which Judge Wright rendered in the first case he used the statement that the constitutional provision by which Congress is inhibited from curtailing the right of free speech, or abridging the right of a free press and free assemblage, was applicable to Congress and had no effect or influence as far as the courts are concerned.

I will say that the judge on that trial sentenced John Mitchell to 9 months in prison, and sentenced Frank Morrison to 6 months, and me to 12 months, because we dared to discuss the merits of a controversy between human rights and a stove. His decision was reversed, and upon another trial he again imposed the same sentences. The sentence was again reversed. We have not been in prison, and Mr. Wright is no longer judge.

Mr. Chairman, having had the opportunity of appearing before the commission on two occasions, I would not have asked to be heard again were it not for the fact that certain matters were introduced here and strenuously presented: First, in regard to the provision of the Clayton antitrust law, which became a law October 1, 1914; second, in regard to the culpability of myself and associates of mine in regard to the McNamara case; third, in regard to the question of the trades-unionists having themselves and their own selfish motives alone in mind and of the declared statements by attorneys for interests hostile to labor and from the mouth of a witness, whom I did not hear, but it was repeated by another in my presence and in hearing of the commission—the statement of “the uncompromising hostility of organized labor to non-unionists.”

I realize that you are not only crowded but really jammed for time, and I will try to just meet a few of these things as briefly as it is possible for me to do.

There are some men who, out of their “zeal and friendship for labor,” will have very little consideration of what labor really desires and aims to accomplish. I read and I was otherwise authoritatively informed that Mr. Daniel Davenport, the attorney for the so-called American Anti-Boycott Association, delivered himself of a philippic against the provisions of the Clayton antitrust law and declaring that under the same circumstances under which the Hatters' case arose a case would be maintained, and that the powers of the courts, in so far as curtailing the rights and liberties of America's workers, are greater now than before the Clayton antitrust law was enacted; and, further, I am informed that a lawyer by the name of Spelling, a supposed friend, in a carefully prepared paper took the same position—that many of the rights before the enactment of the law were now taken away by the enactment of the Clayton antitrust law.

I do not want to take up your time in arguing this proposition at this time, but I want to submit for the record this document, which I trust may appear if the record is printed in type, equally conspicuous with the type in which Mr. Davenport's statement or Mr. Spelling's paper may appear.

(The document referred to by the witness, entitled “Labor Legislation in the Clayton Act,” by Hon. George W. Wickersham, reprinted from the Alumni Register of the University of Pennsylvania, dated December, 1914, was submitted in printed form.)

It is a paper by the Hon. George W. Wickersham, former Attorney General of the United States, on “Labor legislation in the Clayton Act.” The copy which I have is a reprint from the Alumni Register of the University of Pennsylvania, December, 1914. I wish to read only a sentence taken from the pamphlet on page 132 of the reprint, as follows:

“The court dismissed the contention that the statute was not violated by those methods of coercion because physical obstruction was not alleged. Had the Clayton law been then in force, it seems clear that the defendants' acts would not have been illegal.”

I read the entire paragraph, but I want to read the last sentence by itself, where, speaking of the Hatters' case, he said:

“Had the Clayton Act been then in force, it seems clear that the defendants' acts would not have been illegal.”

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Whose opinion is that?

Mr. GOMPERS. Hon. George W. Wickersham, former Attorney General of the United States under President Taft.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And under what circumstances did he write that opinion?

Mr. GOMPERS. He wrote that as his opinion upon the effect of the labor provisions of the Clayton antitrust law of 1914 and its protective features, in so far as the associations of labor are concerned.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, he gave a public address in which he reviewed the law and its effect?

Mr. GOMPERS. This is a paper contributed to the Alumni Register of the University of Pennsylvania, and in this form it is a reprint from that Alumni Register.

I desire to make this personal expression of opinion, that no one has yet accused Mr. Wickersham of being overfriendly toward organized labor. As a matter of fact, in that opinion which I have just submitted, and from which I quoted that sentence, he takes me very severely to task and criticizes me severely. But I am less concerned for his adverse criticism of me than I am for his indorsement of my position and the position of the American Federation of Labor, that the labor provisions of the Clayton antitrust law do take the voluntary associations out of the Sherman antitrust law, where they were improperly placed by what we held and hold to be the misinterpretation of that law by the courts in our country; and I am willing that the opinion of Mr. Wickersham as a lawyer shall stand as against the opinion of either Mr. Spelling or Mr. Davenport.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Was Mr. Spelling employed by organized labor in connection with the Clayton Act?

Mr. GOMPERS. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He was not?

Mr. GOMPERS. He was not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I understood him to say while he was on the stand that he had been employed by organized labor. I do not recall in just what connection it was.

Mr. GOMPERS. He had been employed by organized labor, at his request, and to which we consented, and he represented us in several hearings—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). In connection with the Clayton Act?

Mr. GOMPERS. No, sir; in the amendment of the Sherman antitrust law, or the supplementary legislation which we sought and which was then known as the Pearre bill. But, in consequence of a statement made by him during one of the hearings before the Judiciary Committee of either the House or the Senate, we preferred that he would no longer represent us. I am not, nor do I wish to be understood, or wish it to be inferred from what I said, that I asperse the motives of Mr. Spelling, simply that he does not represent in the slightest degree the organized labor movement of America.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Up to this time, I take it, Mr. Gompers, the test has not been made in the court as to what the Clayton Act really stands for and really means?

Mr. GOMPERS. You are right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It has not been tested yet?

Mr. GOMPERS. It has not; and because of that, sir, I hold that a man who has proclaimed himself as a friend of labor's contention and who still insists that he is, ought not to apply adversely construction upon a law which he says he favors—at least until after the courts shall have adversely determined the question. I have here, Mr. Chairman, an article which I have written and published in the November, 1914, issue of the American Federationist, under the title of "The charter of industrial freedom—Labor provisions of the Clayton antitrust law." If I may have the privilege, I should like to submit that as part of the record.

(The document referred to by the witness, entitled "The charter of industrial freedom—Labor provisions of the Clayton antitrust law," by Samuel Gompers, published in Washington, D. C., in the American Federationist, November, 1914, was submitted in printed form.)

I want to call attention to the first sentence of section 6, of the Clayton antitrust law:

"That the labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce."

That declaration is now the law of the United States—

"The labor of a human being is not a commodity or article of commerce."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is that a new dictum? If I remember rightly, I have forgotten whether it was Mr. Davenport or Mr. Spelling, who, on the witness stand, claimed that that was not new; that that had always been the attitude of the courts not to treat labor as a commodity.

Mr. GOMPERS. The very opposite is the truth, Mr. Weinstock. The whole basis of judicial decisions is founded upon the concept that labor is a commodity, an article of commerce. Indeed, the courts, even in the hatters' case, speak of a free flow of labor between the States. The courts in Massachusetts, and elsewhere, too, but I refer to this particularly, as it comes to me in regard to Massachusetts, the injunctions have all been issued upon the concept that the employer is entitled to a free flow of labor. There can not be a free flow of labor unless labor is a commodity or an article of commerce. It is not like that you can have free flow of labor unless you can have the same free flow of laborers who have the labor power. You can not distinguish between labor and the laborer. It is not as if it were a ton of coal, or a side of pork. It is the first time that any legislative authority of equal power, or perhaps of any power in any country or any State, has made a declaration of this character, and quite apart from the other labor provisions and remedial provisions in so far as injunctions, etc., are concerned in the Clayton antitrust law, that declaration in itself justified me in declaring that it was a charter of industrial freedom, for no court can depart from that declaration.

May I submit, too, here, a report which the executive council of the American Federation of Labor presented to the Philadelphia convention of the federation in 1914, at Philadelphia, Pa., on the Clayton antitrust law, and its understanding of that law; and also a circular which I issued to the workers of the United States to dissipate the false impressions which Mr. Davenport and some of his conferees tried to create among the workers of our country as to what he declared to be the insufficiency of the law in so far as laborers were concerned, and that it was worse than the Sherman antitrust law itself in so far as the laborers were concerned.

(The document referred to by the witness entitled "Report of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor to the thirty-fourth annual convention of the American Federation of Labor, Philadelphia, Pa., November, 1914, upon the subject Clayton antitrust law," published by the American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C., 1914, was submitted in printed form.)

With that I will leave that subject.

It is stated that the trade-unionists are "uncompromisingly hostile to the nonunionists." If that statement is not correct, I would like to be corrected, as I understand that is a statement made by a witness before this commission.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Will you please repeat it?

Mr. GOMPERS. I say it has been asserted before this commission that the attitude of organized labor is one of "uncompromising hostility to non-unionists."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I think something to that effect was said, Mr. Gompers, but I do not recall the precise language.

Mr. GOMPERS. I heard it repeated, and it was not modified.

Chairman WALSH. I think that is substantially the statement.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I do not remember the exact words, but it was to that effect.

Mr. GOMPERS. The American Federation of Labor has been in existence since November 9, 1881. It has held conventions every year since. The objects of our federation have not been changed in phraseology, so far as my memory serves, from the first declaration at Pittsburgh in 1881. Article II of the constitution of the American Federation of Labor, setting forth its objects, reads as follows:

"SEC. 1. The object of this federation shall be the encouragement and formation of local trade and labor unions and the closer federation of such societies through the organization of central trade and labor unions in every city and the further combination of such bodies into State, Territorial, or provincial organizations to secure legislation in the interest of the working masses.

"SEC. 2. The establishment of national and international trade-unions, based upon a strict recognition of the autonomy of each trade, and the promotion and advancement of such bodies."

Section 3 is new; that is, about six or seven or eight years ago it was new.

"SEC. 3. The establishment of departments composed of national or international unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor of the same industry, and which departments shall be governed in conformity with the laws of the American Federation of Labor.

"Sec. 4. An American federation of all national and international trade-unions to aid and assist each other; to aid and encourage the sale of union-label goods; and to secure legislation in the interest of the working people and influence public opinion, by peaceful and legal methods, in favor of organized labor.

"Sec. 5. To aid and encourage the labor press of America."

In that work of organizing nonunion workers we publish, and have published since and including 1894, an official monthly magazine, called the American Federation, in which the wrongs inflicted upon working people are criticized and condemned and the rights to which the workers are entitled are earnestly and zealously advocated, legislation in the interest of the workers particularly argued and urged.

In so far as laws are concerned, we have a legislative committee, and have had such a committee from the first formation of our federation, attending the sessions of Congress, attending upon committees. In every State in the Union there is a State federation, with its legislative committee performing the same duty before State legislatures. In nearly every city of the country we have central labor unions performing that same duty within their localities.

Within the past few years we have published a Weekly News Letter containing the news garnered from the industrial and legislative field affecting the workers generally. We have published circulars and pamphlets urging workers to organize. One of them is a small four-page pamphlet entitled "Aims, Purposes, Declarations of American Federation of Labor."

(The pamphlet referred to, entitled "Aims, Purposes, Declarations of American Federation of Labor," by Samuel Gompers and Frank Morrison, published by the American Federation of Labor, without date, was submitted in printed form.)

Let me read just this from it: "From the inception of the American Federation of Labor it has taken the stand that while unions for the various trades and callings must each and all be left entirely free to govern themselves within their own borders, yet between the members of all these unions there should be a bond as great as that between the members of the same organization."

Then, omitting some parts not germane: "It seeks to organize the yet unorganized workers, the skilled and the unskilled, the permanently located and the migratory."

It further declares the purposes of a similar character.

Here is another four-page pamphlet, "Hints to Unions, Organizers."

(The pamphlet referred to, entitled "Hints to Unions, Organizers, and Others," by Samuel Gompers, issued by the American Federation of Labor, without date, was submitted in printed form.)

Paragraph 17 declares as follows: "The unions should make it easy for applicants to become members."

I have here a small leaflet, entitled "Why We Unite," upon the same purpose.

(The pamphlet referred to, entitled "Why We Unite," by the organizing bureau of the American Federation of Labor, press of the Trades Unionist, Washington, D. C., without date, was submitted in printed form.)

I have here another leaflet, entitled "How to Form a Trade-Union or Federal Labor Union."

(The leaflet referred to, entitled "How to Form a Trade-Union or Federal Labor Union," by Frank Morrison and Samuel Gompers, and published by the American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C., without date, was submitted in printed form.)

A Federal labor union, I might explain, is simply the organization in small localities, where there are not a sufficient number of workers in any one trade or calling to form a union, so that they may have an opportunity for united or associated action, unions called Federal labor unions having been encouraged by the American Federation of Labor and many of them organized by it.

Here is another pamphlet, entitled "Trade-Unions." It is very brief, and I would like to read it. Each of the statements occupies but a line:

"Foster education and uproot ignorance.

"Shorten hours and lengthen life.

"Raise wages and lower usury.

"Increase independence and decrease dependence.

"Develop manhood and balk tyranny.

"Establish fraternity and discourage selfishness.

"Reduce prejudice and induce liberality.

"Enlarge society and eliminate classes.

"Create rights and abolish wrongs.

"Lighten toil and brighten man.

"Cheer the home and fireside and make the world better.

"All wageworkers should be union men. Their progress is limited only by them who hold aloof. Get together, agitate, educate, and do.

"Don't wait until to-morrow; to-morrow never comes.

"Don't wait for some one else to start; start it yourself.

"Don't hearken to the indifferent; wake them up.

"Don't think it is impossible; 2,000,000 organized workers prove different.

"Don't weaken; persistence wins.

"Organizing bureau American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C."

I have here another leaflet, "Why Central Labor Unions Should be a Part of the American Federation of Labor," and then providing how it should be done, and then how to form a central body.

(The leaflet referred to, entitled "Why Central Labor Unions Should be a Part of the American Federation of Labor," by Frank Morrison and Samuel Gompers, published by the American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C., without date, was submitted in printed form.)

I have also a leaflet entitled "The American Federation of Labor," which is of a similar import.

(The leaflet referred to, entitled "The American Federation of Labor," by the Organizing Bureau of the American Federation of Labor, published without date, was submitted in printed form.)

Then I have a leaflet entitled "Labor Omnia Vincit, American Federation of Labor," addressed to all wage workers of America.

(The leaflet referred to entitled "Labor Omnia Vincit, American Federation of Labor," by Samuel Gompers and Frank Morrison, and published by the A. F. of L., at Washington, D. C., without date, was submitted in printed form.)

I will read the first paragraph only: "It is now generally admitted by all really educated and honest men that a thorough organization of the entire working class, to render employment and the means of subsistence less precarious by securing an equitable share of the fruits of their toil, is the most vital necessity of the present day."

And then it proceeds to urge organization all the way through—let me read this: "We unhesitatingly declare the organization of the working people by the working people for the working people—that is, the trade-unions."

I have here a leaflet entitled "American Federation of Labor endeavors to unite all classes of wage workers under one head through their several organizations to the end," etc., the ends being stated.

(The leaflet referred to entitled "The American Federation of Labor endeavors to unite all classes of wage workers under one head," etc., by Samuel Gompers and Frank Morrison, published by the A. F. of L., at Washington, D. C., without date, was submitted in printed form.)

Here I have another pamphlet which is entitled "Hail to Labor! Organize and Stand Together," a quotation from Wendell Phillips. "Wiseacre findings; candid thoughts of experienced men on the trade-union," and then a quotation on the title-page:

"Thank God we have a system of labor where there can be a strike. Whatever the pressure there is a point where the workingman may stop."

That being a quotation from President Lincoln in a speech at Hartford, Conn., in 1860, referring to the New England shoeworkers' great strike.

(The leaflet referred to entitled "Hail to Labor! Organize and Stand Together," published by the American Federation of Labor, at Washington, D. C., without date, was submitted in printed form.)

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If I may interject at this point, as I recall it—I really do not remember who the witness was—a witness raised the point that the attitude of the American Federation of Labor toward the nonunionist was—do you remember the words used, the quotation that you gave us a little while ago?

Mr. GOMPERS. A witness was asked, "What is the attitude of organized labor toward the nonunionists?" He was quoted by someone in my hearing before this commission as having answered, "One of uncompromising hostility."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The spirit in which I understood that to be, Mr. Gompers, was not that the American Federation of Labor, for example, did not make every possible effort to unionize; that that was not the attitude of the man who unionized, but I gathered from the tone and spirit in which it was said that he meant that that was the attitude of organized labor against the man who did not organize or would not organize. I did not understand him to bring a charge against the association that it was not making efforts to do missionary work, that it was not trying to increase its membership. This, of course, all goes on to show that the efforts of the American Federation of Labor are along the lines of doing missionary work and broadening its usefulness; but his criticism, as I understand it, was not along those lines.

Mr. GOMPERS. I may say that people do not undertake to bring others within their fold for whom they have an uncompromising hostility. If I may, I can conclude with this part in a few minutes and then take up that feature.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Very well.

Mr. GOMPERS. I have here in my hand a copy of the American Federation of Labor Weekly News Letter of Saturday, February 1, 1913, and another copy of the same publication of February 8, 1913. You will observe that they contain circulars issued by the American Federation of Labor officials and printed in English and about 10 other languages.

(The letters above referred to entitled "American Federation of Labor Weekly News Letter," by Samuel Gompers and Frank Morrison, published by the American Federation of Labor at Washington, D. C., and dated Feb. 1, 1913, and Feb. 8, 1913, respectively, were submitted in printed form.)

It is an effort to organize the employees of the United States Steel Corporation. I have here documents which are too long to read, in view of the very brief time that the commission has at its disposal, but they are letters sent to my office during the period of 1913, when we were undertaking to organize the working people, and I should say this, that we had made many efforts before and failed, but we had information from a few of the workers that the impositions and tyranny had become so irksome that the men wanted some opportunity to organize in order that they might protest in some way, and we sent our organizer in there. These documents, these letters, and some newspaper clippings disclose the work of the steel corporation, the United States Steel Corporation, of its own—its own men, gangsters, sluggers, detectives, strike breakers, in cahoots with the officers preventing the men having the opportunity to come to the meeting. That system of espionage, by which men that were known to come to the meeting were reported to the company and discharged, and in one instance simply brought about a strike or revolt of them. The halls in the towns were all of them hired by the corporation so that no meeting could be held, they could not meet in the open. The wives of some of the men who could not attend the meeting went to the meeting to inform their husbands, and the husbands were discharged because their wives went to the meeting. Men were slugged and beaten up, and one of them, J. T. Pierce, an organizer, who we sent in there to work and never violated a law in his life, was slugged and beaten by the corporation thug men to such an extent that he was taken to the hospital, and in about seven weeks died from the result of his injuries. In 1910, Mr. Ballard, an attorney of Gary, Ind., now of Chicago, and the former attorney general of Ohio, Frank Monett, we had the evidence obtained and collated of the depredation of the United States Steel Corporation, and presented it to the President of the United States, Mr. Taft, and the presentation is "Statement of evidence in support of petition and charges presented to President of the United States against the United States Steel Corporation by the American Federation of Labor." It was directly presented to the President and was presented by him to the Hon. George W. Wickersham, Attorney General, Washington, D. C., March 22, 1910. We were in hopes that the Department of Justice would begin proceedings upon the statement and the evidence, but it did not.

(Pamphlet with the foregoing title submitted in printed form.)

Realizing that the opportunity for the American workmen to protect even the standard of life now obtaining could only be maintained if there were some means by which the immigration which is practically unrestricted immigration would be a bit more restricted and regulated, and to afford the opportunity for the betterment of the men employed by the United States Steel Corporation and similar corporations, because they had been for years carrying on advertising and stimulating immigration—advertising for immigrants and sending their agents in concert with the shipping company—we met to secure a bill that would restrict and limit immigration. The bill was introduced and passed by Congress. This is the Weekly News Letter, containing the bill and speech by

Mr. Burnett, a discussion of the subject, the votes on the roll call of the House, and several other matters in connection with that subject.

(Witness submits American Federation of Labor Weekly News Letter of Feb. 13, 1915.)

Mr. GOMPERS. This is a copy of the American Federation of Labor Weekly News Letter of January 31, 1915, containing an exposé which I made of those who were really behind the opposition and who were financing the campaign for the defeat of that bill.

(Copy of the foregoing newspaper submitted by witness.)

And they showed that the shipping interests, the steel and mining corporations, were behind it and financed the opposition. This is a reprint of the document which I have in the office of the American Federation of Labor and which, if desired, can be submitted to the commission for verification. I have the correspondence with the president and other officers of the National Liberal Immigration League and the officers of the shipping companies and the payment of money by the shipping companies to finance the work of the National Liberal Immigration League, the contribution made by the United States Steel Corporation and other coal companies to defeat this legislation.

(Witness at this point submitted a copy of the American Federationist for July, 1912.)

Coming to the question of whether or not the trade-unionists have an uncompromising attitude toward nonunionists, which Commissioner Weinstock has suggested, as a matter of fact, there are no such creatures in the country. There are no such workers. When workers do not organize it is due either to their own ignorance of what the purpose we aim to accomplish is or what organization aims to accomplish, or they believe they can curry favor with the employer or foreman or are coerced against organization. If any one group of workers, employed anywhere and in any occupation at any time, manifest a disposition to make a protest against the conditions imposed upon them by their employers, they know where to come. They don't go to the employer's office, they don't go to the attorney for the National Erectors' Association, and they don't go to Davenport. They come to us. They know intuitively who are their friends. They come to us or they send for us, and we go to them, day or night—no night too dark or day too holy.

If you want proof of that, go to the miners in the bituminous regions, who now stand erect as men are and organized; who organized them, and who stood for them, and who fought for them, and who pleaded their cause while they were nonunionists, and they will tell you that it was the trade-unionists. Go to the sweatshop industries in and around New York and Boston and St. Louis—the unorganized sweatshop workers—and ask them whether or not the trade-unionists have manifested an attitude of uncompromising hostility toward them or any hostility at all. It is rather a recognition of the fundamental principle that it is the mission of the organized worker to see to it that the unorganized are organized.

Chairman WALSH. I am very sorry to limit your time, Mr. Gompers, but we were compelled to agree on an hour for adjournment, and it is about a half hour away.

Mr. GOMPERS. May I have five minutes more?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir. I let it run 15 minutes, and did not want to interrupt you, but now we have got to close up.

Mr. GOMPERS. I realize your condition, and I can not tell you, Mr. Chairman and Commissioners, how grateful I am for the opportunity.

Chairman WALSH. You may have five minutes to close.

Mr. GOMPERS. I just want to call your attention; I must hurry along. I have here the circular issued by the American Federation of Labor in regard to the McNamara fund. We believed those men innocent. So long as we believed them innocent, we believed that a grave outrage had been committed against them, and the rank and file took that view, and I venture to say eight or nine tenths of the American people believed that; but at the time when they pleaded guilty we had nothing to do, nothing else to do, but to believe them again, that they were guilty. We raised the funds, because the American workers and sympathizers contributed. Not only workingmen, but many others. And let me say, the American Federation of Labor, as such, did not collect that money. A conference was held at Indianapolis, to which I was called, to create a defense-fund committee, of which I, because I was president of the American Federation of Labor, or because they had some confidence in me, was made chairman, and Frank Morrison, because they had confidence in him, was made secretary of the defense-fund committee, and that defense-fund committee raised that fund, with the assistance of all others, and I may say this, that Mr. Morrison as secretary of the American Federation of Labor, was summoned to appear before the Federal grand jury in Indianapolis, and every book and scrap of paper that could be wanted, and some he had brought which was not asked for, every scrap of paper, every book, every memorandum, were brought there before the grand jury and subjected to investigation by expert accountants and the United States district attorney, and not a thing—not a thing was found that reflected upon organized labor; not a thing that reflected upon any one of us.

As a matter of fact, they publicly declared there was nothing that held us, that connected us in any way, though it is a fact that we raised this money. It was the second time in the history of the American Federation of Labor where we raised great amounts of money. One was during the anthracite coal strike, when we raised large sums of money, because the heart and conscience of the people had been touched, as well as of the union workers, members of the union, of the federation, and in the McNamara case. I did not believe, and those that were working with me did not believe, that it could be in the human heart to do and commit the crimes with which these men were charged, and the manner of their being taken away from their homes to California convinced every one of us—say that we were mistaken—but it convinced us at any rate for the time being that it was a crime of which this villainous detective Burns was guilty and the chief concocter. If you want to have any proof of this, together with his characteristics, read the letter of Attorney General Wickersham to President Taft, upon which President Taft pardoned the men who were convicted in Oregon for the so-called wood and land scandals. Read that letter. I have a copy of it here; I published it in the July, 1912, Federationist; here it is, July, 1912; page 537 of the July, 1912, American Federationist—"Detective Burns Unmasked." If publishing that letter from Attorney General Wickersham to President Taft was libelous, no doubt Mr. Burns would have prosecuted me, because he wanted me above any man in the country.

I have challenged him and defied him. There is nothing about this of which the organized-labor movement needs to have any apprehension.

Just one word, and I am through. I realize I have gone beyond the five minutes already. I just want to take cognizance of this one condition of Colorado. There have been considerable diverse views expressed as to conditions there.

I am not going into the merits of it at all, but I just want to call your attention to this fact, that in Colorado there was political democracy, but industrial servitude, and though we may have established democracy in religion as well as in the political affairs of our country, the industrial and economic dominates the political and the religious democracy.

What is needed is the exercise of the economic power of the working people that can compel religious tolerance and the enforcement of the fundamental principles of political democracy.

Until the working people exercise their economic power, so long will religious freedom and political equality be a mockery.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Thank you, Mr. Gompers.

Doctor McKelway, I understood you had some statement you desired to make.

TESTIMONY OF MR. A. J. M'KELWAY—Recalled.

Dr. McKELWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ordinarily would not take up the time of this commission to attempt to reply to Mr. Clark in his attack of yesterday, but I want this to be borne in mind, that our National Child Labor Commission is the only organization in this country that is solely organized for the purpose of securing legislation for the protection of working children, and any attack made upon the credibility of its employees or agents injures our work to that extent, and it is immediately quoted in papers hostile to our cause and finally does harm to the children, and that is my sole reason for taking up this matter at all.

Mr. Clark said I testified that a large number of employees in the southern cotton mills, including 1,085 adults, were making less than $2 per week. My testimony in regard to that matter is found at page 211 of my former testimony. Mr. Clark totally misapprehended the purpose of my statement about the wages. It was not to give the wages of adults, but to give a comparison between the wages of adults and the wages of children. I testified that 251 children under 12 years of age earned less than $2 per week; 731 children of 12 and 13 earned less than $2 per week; 1,700 workers from 14 to 20 years of age who earned less than $2 per week; and only 1,085 operatives 21 years of age and over who earned less than $2 per week. There were more girls from 18 to 20 years of age earning less than $2 per week than there were girls of from 14 to 15 earning less than $2 per week. There were 1,733 children under 16 who made from $2 to $3 per week, and almost an equal number, 1,712 workers, 16 and over, who earned the same wages.

The whole purpose of that was to show that child labor reduced wages to the child standard; but I started out by saying the wages of children in cotton mills was comparatively high. He said that I could have taken data from the 1914 report of the Bureau of Labor; I suppose he meant the bureau report of North Carolina.

Now, the wages are given out by the cotton manufacturers in a perfunctory way; the president of a company gets a request for a statement, and he asks one of his men—his superintendent or manager—to make it out. I do not regard that as good statistics.

He says I went back to the 1908 report. This 1908 report is the only one of the kind in existence where a comparison is made between the wages of children and the wages of adults. He says this report was prepared under my friend, Labor Commissioner Neill, and that it had been often said that I, Dr. McKelway, had a considerable influence in the compilation of that report. I suppose I ought to feel flattered that I could influence a Government official to do that. There are a good many hallucinations about my influence, but I never saw a line of the report when it was being prepared. Senator Beveridge showed me a copy of it in manuscript form, which I glanced at, but had nothing to do with the preparation of it.

I went back seven years and obtained those photographs, which will be good a thousand years from now. He says I went back 15 years to get illiteracy figures. The statistics for illiteracy as shown by the census of 1910 have not been published, but I called at the Census Office since I testified before and found they had not been given, and so those I gave were the last on the subject.

The 1913 statistics given in the report of the Bureau of Labor of North Carolina are not worth the paper they are written on. There is a careful analysis of it given by one of the professors in the university showing that is a fact, but the report shows some astonishing statistics as to illiteracy of the cotton mill people.

He said I complained in my evidence that the southern cotton manufacturers do not welcome the representatives of the National Child Labor Committee to their mills. I said the three large interests were hostile; and then he quotes from Homer Folks. He went on to say that child-labor exploiters might expect to be misrepresented, like some of his friends, and that many false statistics were published about that.

He put in another reference to Mr. Folks, and quoted a statement that he was a salaried agent of the National Child Labor Commission. Mr. Folks has never drawn one dollar from the commission, of course. He refers to us as a band of parasites and grafters, and that experience has shown that we take advantage of every courtesy to misrepresent and falsify conditions. I would like to put into the record just who the board of trustees are. The three honorary members are Woodrow Wilson, W. H. Taft, and Theodore Roosevelt. The board of trustees is composed of Felix Adler (chairman), Jane Addams, Mrs. Caroline B. Alexander, Francis G. Caffey, Edward T. Devine, Homer Folks, William E. Harmon, Mrs. Florence Kelley, Adolph Lewisohn, Samuel McCune Lindsay, V. Everit Macy, Charles P. Neill, Isaac N. Seligman, Lillian D. Wald, Paul M. Warburg, Stephen S. Wise, and John H. Wood. And I find among the names of our advisory committee that of Mr. John R. Commons, of this commission, and I hope you will advise him not to associate any more with these "grafters."

He says, "I do not know who pays Dr. McKelway and his associates; some think that it is the Rockefeller Foundation. If such information could be obtained, it would be very interesting."

It would be interesting. We have never received a dollar from the Rockefeller Foundation, though I think we could use it wisely. I think we would make 14 years the age limit for the employment of boys in the mines of Colorado, as some States have it.

I remember, a few years ago, when I went to New Mexico, soon after I got to Santa Fe there was a dust explosion in the mills of Trinidad in which 60 people were killed. A man from Trinidad told me that the cause of the explosion was a boy striking a match to light a cigarette, and he said they had been trying to get 16 years fixed as the age limit for boys that worked in the mines, because a boy under that age is a menace to the whole mass of miners.

Here is a little personal matter he refers to, which, I suppose, I ought to take up. He says I made an attack on Mr. D. A. Tompkins, president of the High Shoals Co., and he said that I had a violent personal grudge against Mr. Tompkins, and that was the reason I attacked him. This was entirely inexcusable on the part of Mr. Clark, because I did not mention Mr. Tompkins's name. I met Mr. Tompkins last summer in the mountains, and he asked me to come and see him at his house; and if I had known it was the last time I was going to see him I would have done so. Our relations were very pleasant.

I have a lot of photographs and will have to pass them up to the commission to decide how young those two smallest children in that group are.

The story about that is that these two children were said to be 6 and 7 years of age by the testimony of their grandmother. The manufacturer had quite a row about it and said the old lady was feeble-minded and did not know the facts; but when our agent took the matter up he found from the mother that they were 8 and 10 years of age. They were both at work in the mills, but only one of them was on the pay roll; we have affidavits to support our statements.

He quotes in his testimony from a statement of welfare work, in an address delivered before the manufacturers' committee of the North Carolina legislature by Mr. W. B. Lynch, manager of the department of welfare.

He also filed a statement taken from an interview published in the New York American, which I had forgotten about since last year.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to say that our organization is one of the most important in America of this kind.

I have here the annual report we filed last year, showing 73 donors giving $16,000 a year; 487 sustaining members who give over $25, and some contributing members who give $7,000, and associate members who are the largest contributors. Our budget is about $63,000 a year, and we have about 85,000 contributing members scattered through every State in the Union.

(Printed pamphlet submitted, entitled "Tenth Annual Report of the General Secretary of the National Child Labor Committee for the Fiscal Year Ending Sept. 30, 1914." National Child Labor Committee (Inc.), 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City.)

I want to put into the record some statistics prepared by Mr. Swift, showing the difference between school attendance.

(See McKelway Exhibit No. 5.)

And in answer to something put in the record yesterday I want to put in this address of Mr. Clark, "A Demand for a Square Deal."

(Printed pamphlet of the foregoing title, by David Clark, editor of the Southern Textile Bulletin, Charlotte, N. C., submitted by witness.)

Chairman WALSH. That is all, Doctor, you may be excused.

STATEMENT OF MR. H. E. HILLARD.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to read into the record, and I will do it now, some correspondence between this commission and the United States Coal Co.

The following inquiry was sent out:

UNITED STATES COAL CO.,

Citizens' Building, Cleveland, Ohio.

MAY 13, 1915.

GENTLEMEN: I am directed by the commission to forward to you the typewritten transcript of the testimony given before this commission at its public hearing on May 11, 1915, by Joseph Kobylak, of Dillonvale, Ohio, and to invite any statement you have to make by way of comment or reply thereto.

I am inclosing herewith the transcript of the testimony, which you will find in the inclosed booklet, starting at page 253.

Please let us have your reply within the next few days, acknowledging receipt of this communication and returning the inclosed typewritten transcript of testimony, stating any remarks you may desire to submit.

Very truly, yours,

REDMOND S. BRENNAN.

To which Mr. Brennan received the following reply:

THE UNITED STATES COAL CO.,
Cleveland, Ohio, May 25, 1915.

Mr. REDMOND S. BRENNAN,
United States Commission on Industrial Relations,
Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: In reply to yours of May 13, inclosing a transcript of testimony given by Joseph Kobylak, I have carefully read the testimony of Mr. Kobylak as given to the commission. I am unable to certify the statements of Mr. Kobylak, except the one that he has been arrested many times by the authorities of the State of Ohio. In the last few years Mr. Kobylak has been known to us as an agitator of the most vicious character, and was sometime past in the employ of our company. During the term of his employment our company was unable, most of the time, to operate its business where he was located. Mr. Kobylak became such a nuisance in the community that the authorities, in response to public sentiment, have had Mr. Kobylak in jail many times. As to his being arrested for treason, that was an act of the State of Ohio against Mr. Kobylak, and I know of no coal operator who had anything to do with it, or were called upon by the State to make any affidavits against him.

As a miner, Mr. Kobylak, to my mind, has not worked inside the mines or produced a pound of coal for some years, and has been able to support himself entirely by agitation, and gets his support by contributions from the men who did work.

I do not think that Mr. Kobylak represents the miners of the district in which our mines are located nor of the State of Ohio.

I am inclosing a copy of an editorial in the Steubenville (Ohio) Gazette, with reference to Kobylak being before your commission. Under separate cover I am returning to you the transcript sent me.

Yours, very truly,

H. E. HILLARD.

The following is the editorial:

"Kobylak, the Dillonvale I. W. W. anarchist who spent some time in Steubenville jail has been ventilating himself before the Industrial Relations Committee. If this pestiferous individual had his just 'rights' he would now be serving time in the Ohio Penitentiary for inciting to riot, or in a national penitentiary for treason. Meanwhile, according to the action of the mine workers on Wednesday, he will have to either get out of their union or cease to be an I. W. W., and maybe that will stop his power for disturbance in this part of the country.—Steubenville Gazette, Wednesday, May 12, 1915."

STATEMENT OF JUDGE R. M. WANAMAKER.

(Chairman WALSH. I now read into the record, by request, a letter from R. M. Wanamaker, justice of the Supreme Court of Ohio, as follows:

"To my mind the most serious blow that the working world has sustained for many a year is the recent decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Coppage v. The State of Kansas. We had the same question up in Ohio under an identical statute. The majority, of course, followed the Supreme Court, but I prepared a dissenting opinion, a copy of which I am forwarding you under separate cover. Along legal lines, you may also be interested in knowing that I prepared two articles for the Saturday Evening Post, published September 19 and 26, entitled 'The man on the bench.' It was my chief purpose in these articles to hold the 'man on the bench' entirely responsible for the kind of law administered and the manner in which it was administered, with all its delay, technicality, and expense.

"Permit me to call your especial attention to Article III, section 2, of the Constitution of the United States, defining the jurisdiction of the Federal Supreme Court:

"'In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those in which a State shall be a party, the Supreme Court shall have original jurisdiction. IN ALL THE OTHER CASES BEFORE MENTIONED THE SUPREME COURT SHALL HAVE APPELLATE JURISDICTION, BOTH AS TO LAW AND FACT, WITH SUCH EXCEPTIONS AND UNDER SUCH REGULATIONS AS THE CONGRESS SHALL MAKE.'

"The capitalized portion of this quotation suggests the question as to whether or not in passing upon the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of State and Federal statutes there should not be certain regulations imposed upon the Federal Supreme Court whereby a mere majority should not be allowed to declare State and Federal acts contrary to the Federal Constitution, as in the Coppage case. Courts universally hold that before any such statute may be declared unconstitutional it shall be clearly so, and the Supreme Court of the United States has again and again held that it must be unconstitutional beyond all reasonable doubt. Now, how can a statute be held to be clearly in conflict with the Federal Constitution when five or six judges hold that it is unconstitutional, and four or three, respectively, hold that it is not unconstitutional? We have a provision in our Ohio Constitution which, in certain cases, requires the concurrence of all the judges save one (we have seven judges) to hold an act unconstitutional.

"It seems to me that in this enlightened age, when, in the exertion of wholesome and progressive police power, State legislatures and Federal Congress are endeavoring to elevate the condition of men, provide additional safeguards for their health, their life and limb, etc., such legislation should be further protected by preventing supreme courts from nullifying the same with the reckless abandon heretofore indulged.

"The above section of the Federal Constitution unquestionably provides ample power for the Congress of the United States to place such limitation upon the Supreme Court, for all these questions arise under their appellate jurisdiction."

And I also read in evidence in connection with that letter the dissenting opinion of Judge R. M. Wanamaker and read this portion thereof:

"Too many judges know as men what they refuse to know as judges. It is a matter of common knowledge, of which all courts should take judicial notice, that there is constant conflict in some sections of the industrial world between capital and labor; no matter what the cause, whether it be bad leadership and advice on the part of labor, or bad leadership and advice on the part of capital, or both. Those conflicts are of such frequent occurrence and at times so serious in their nature as to shake the very foundations of popular government. We can not forget the Homestead strike of 1892, the Chicago railroad strike of 1894, the great anthracite coal strike of 1902, the Colorado fuel and iron strike of 1914, and many others might be named, as showing how the stability and security of the very foundations of government are seriously menaced.

"Can it be said that a State legislature having these industrial conditions in mind might not legislate in a manner to reduce or minimize the conflict between capital organized on the one side and labor organized on the other by denying to either the right to destroy the other? Indeed, what can be more important than domestic peace and safety?

"The Fathers so recognized it in the preamble of the Federal Constitution, in which they announced that one of the great purposes of government was 'to insure domestic tranquillity' and evidently the Legislature of Kansas, as well as Ohio, whose motives can not be questioned in the enactment of this legislation, may have their acts fairly reconciled with this high purpose of preserving domestic tranquillity by preventing the exercise of coercion by the employer upon the employee.

"Suppose the Legislature of Kansas, or of Ohio, had passed an act providing that 'no employer by himself or his agent shall coerce any of his employees into voting any ticket, or for any officer that he desires to vote for' or 'that no employer by himself or his agent shall coerce any employee into joining or attending any church or lodge' or providing that 'no employer by himself or his agent shall coerce any employee into buying at the company's store,' would it be seriously contended that such statutes were in violation of the liberty of contract, even as construed by those courts that have seemed more eager to protect property rights than personal rights?

"Again the opinion says:

"Can it be doubted that a labor organization—a voluntary association of workmen—has the inherent and constitutional right to deny membership to any man who will not agree that during such membership he will not accept or retain employment in company with nonunion men? Or that a union man has the constitutional right to decline proffered employment unless the employer will agree not to employ any nonunion men? (In all cases we refer, of course, to agreements made voluntarily, and without coercion or duress, as between the parties.)"

"Again we see the insidious and strained effort to get away from the 'coercion' of the statute.

"The illustration is not apropos or analogous. In order to be so you must add the element of coercion. You would then have an instance of where an employee was using coercion to induce a nonunion man to join the labor union or to quit the employment. You would then have the same coercion by employee as is prohibited by the statute to the employer. Coercion upon the part of one should be as unlawful as coercion upon the part of the other.

"This coercion is in the nature of a secondary boycott. Employers for years have sought, and finally obtained, the support of courts in enjoining what is known as the 'secondary boycott' upon business. In effect, this is a 'secondary boycott' upon labor for it is directed not against the individual employee but against the labor union.

"This opinion goes much further, and is much more drastic, than anything heretofore pronounced by a court, or even demanded by the National Association of Manufacturers, of which John Kirby, jr., is president, as appears from their fundamental principles touching labor unions. These planks are as follows:

"'1. Fair dealing is the fundamental and basic principle upon which relations between employees and employers should rest.

"'2. The National Association of Manufacturers is not opposed to organizations of labor as such, but it is unalterably opposed to boycotts, blacklists, and other illegal acts of interference with the personal liberty of employer or employee.

"'3. No person should be refused employment or in any way discriminated against on account of membership or nonmembership in any labor organization,' etc.

"There is a substantial and well-grounded public opinion that courts of last resort, and particularly the Federal courts, are too eager to nullify remedial and regulatory legislation enacted by State legislatures under their police power in the interest of the public peace, safety, life, limb, health, and morals. The law is not a mummy nor a straightjacket. It is presumably a live, elastic thing, adjusting itself to the changed and changing conditions of our social, political, industrial, and commercial life. It must of necessity, therefore, be a growth, an evolution, keeping pace with the advancement of our twentieth century civilization.

"This attitude of our courts toward the legislative exercise of police power by the States, in matters that are purely State affairs, has caused a substantial loss of public confidence in courts that is too patent to be denied. While courts are unanimous in holding that such statutes should not be declared unconstitutional unless there is an 'obvious repugnance' between the statute and the Constitution, or unless the statute is unconstitutional 'beyond all reasonable doubt'; yet an analysis of too many decisions of our courts would seem to indicate that the statute was declared unconstitutional, not upon such clear conflict, but upon some whim, caprice, or predilection of the court rather than by sound reason or the laws of logic.

"The decision in the Coppage case is peculiarly unfortunate, not only because it nullifies the Kansas statute and the Ohio statute, but in a large number of other States similar statutes that have been in force for years are also nullified.

"Millions of workingmen and working women, and even working children, not only those who are now members of some labor organization, local, State, or national, but those who may hereafter desire to become such, are all most intimately, seriously, and prejudicially affected by this decision.

"In the hope that the law made by the Supreme Court of the United States in this case may not become the fixed and settled policy of our courts, but that the same may in due course be reversed and labor be given its equal rights with capital, this dissenting opinion is respectfully submitted.

"It would be impossible to indorse too favorably the very able dissenting opinions of Justices Day, Holmes, and Hughes."

This case was the case of William H. Jackson, chief of police of Cincinnati, against Saul Berger; dissenting opinion by Judge R. M. Wanamaker.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENT OF MR. THEODORE SCHROEDER.

My name is Theodore Schroeder. I reside in New York City, and I am a lawyer without paying clients. For the greater part of the past 13 years I have devoted my time to the constitutional, legal, and social aspects of the problem of freedom of speech and of the press.

The purposes of the Free Speech League, as stated in its articles of incorporation, are:

"The principal object for which said corporation is formed is as follows, namely, by all lawful means to promote such judicial construction of the Constitution of the United States and of the several States and of the statutes passed in conformity therewith as will secure to every person the greatest liberty consistent with the equal liberty of all others and especially to preclude the punishment of any mere psychological offense, and to that end, by all lawful means to oppose every form of governmental censorship of any methods for the expression, communication, or transmission of ideas either by use of previous inhibition or subsequent punishment; and to promote such legislative enactments and constitutional amendments, State and national, as will secure these ends."

In addition to this I have had a great opportunity of knowing the sentiments of various classes of radical agitators with whom I have come in contact because of my work for freedom of speech, and also by frequent attendance as a lecturer and in the audience of radical clubs composed of Socialists, Anarchists, Single Taxers, settlement workers, and other social uplifters.

I assume that, primarily, I am to speak upon the problem of freedom of speech and assembly as these may relate to the agitator who concerns himself with economic and industrial problems. My immediate purpose will be to furnish illustrations of the various means by which the agitator is being suppressed and to give such information as I can as to the attitude of the agitator and workingman toward the courts, and to indicate how far judicial lawlessness, and under the forms of law, may contribute to the popular unrest and distrust of courts.

A CONSERVATIVE COMPLAINT AGAINST COURTS.

It may be worth while at the outset to quote some characteristic attitudes toward the courts. The first opinion which I will offer is a very brief one from James C. Carter, for many years the recognized leader of the New York bar. These words were uttered in a lecture delivered at the Harvard Law School and subsequently published in book form. Mr. Carter says:

"The written law is victorious on paper and powerless elsewhere. The Attorney General is sensible of the feebleness of the command resting upon him to enforce a law the enforcement of which would send a hundred of the most eminent citizens to jail and throw the country into confusion." (Law, Its Origin and Functions, p. 213.)

Next, I am going to offer some opinions from agitators. Those opinions are not so remarkable in themselves, but are important because of the circumstances under which they were uttered and because of the fact that they have been many times republished since and seem to respond to a popular demand.

The first of these opinions is one expressed by Jack Whyte before the court in San Diego, Cal., when he was called up for sentence resulting from his activities in the free-speech war which occurred in that city. Jack Whyte said:

"TO HELL WITH YOUR COURTS!"

"There are only a few words that I care to say, and this court will not mistake them for a legal argument, for I am not acquainted with the phraseology of the bar nor the language common to the court room.

"There are two points which I want to touch upon—the indictment itself and the misstatement of the prosecuting attorney. The indictment reads: 'The People of the State of California v. J. W. Whyte and others.' It's a hideous lie. The people in this court room know that it is a lie; the court itself knows that it is a lie. If the people of the State are to blame for this persecution, then the people are to blame for the murder of Michael Hoey and the assassination of Joseph Mikolasek. They are to blame and responsible for every bruise, every insult and injury inflicted upon the members of the working class by the vigilantes of this city. The people deny it, and have so emphatically denied it that Gov. Johnson sent Harris Weinstock down here to make an investigation and clear the reputation of the people of the State of California from the odor that you would attach to it. You cowards throw the blame upon the people, but I know who is to blame, and I name them; it is Spreckles and his partners in business, and this court is the lackey and lick-spittle of that class, defending the property of that class against the advancing horde of starving American workers.

"The prosecuting attorney in his plea to the jury accused me of saying on a public platform at a public meeting, 'To hell with the courts; we know what justice is.' He told a great truth when he lied, for if he had searched the innermost recesses of my mind he could have found that thought, never expressed by me before, but which I express now. 'To hell with your courts; I know what justice is,' for I have sat in your court room day after day and have seen members of my class pass before this, the so-called bar of justice. I have seen you, Judge Sloan, and others of your kind, send them to prison because they dared to infringe upon the sacred rights of property. You have become blind and deaf to the rights of man to pursue life and happiness, and you have crushed those rights so that the sacred rights of property should be preserved. Then you tell me to respect the law. I don't. I did violate the law, and I will violate every one of your laws and still come before you and say, 'To hell with the courts,' because I believe that my right to live is far more sacred than the sacred right of property that you and your kind so ably defend.

"I don't tell you this with the expectation of getting justice, but to show my contempt for the whole machinery of law and justice as represented by this and every other court. The prosecutor lied, but I will accept it as a truth and say again, so that you, Judge Sloan, may not be mistaken as to my attitude, 'To hell with your courts; I know what justice is.'"

The second opinion I wish to present is a speech made by Frank Tanenbaum before a court in the city of New York, where he was about to be sentenced for a constructive disorderly conduct arising out of his connection with the disemployment agitation in New York City, which took place a little over a year ago.

This speech was published from the court record in several radical periodicals. The following is the report which appeared in The Masses for May, 1914:

"FRANK TANENBAUM'S SPEECH.

"The CLERK. Frank Tanenbaum, what have you now to say why judgment should not be pronounced against you according to law?

"The DEFENDANT. I would like to make a statement, I think.

"The COURT. You are at liberty to make any statement you desire.

"The DEFENDANT. I suppose if I make a statement that the press to-morrow will say I wanted to make myself out a hero or a martyr. I don't know who it was who said—some well-known preacher—that society would forgive a man for murder, theft, rape, or almost any crime except that of preaching a new gospel. That is my crime. There are in reality three distinct things I am accused of.

"One is unlawful assembly. I don't know of any circumstance in the world's history where the struggles of the slave class have appeared either legal or respectable or religious in the eyes of the master class. I am a member of the slave class. I am a member of the working class, and I know that our struggles to overcome our present condition are illegal in the eyes of the master class and its representatives. Of course, it was unlawful. I don't doubt that.

"Another very serious objection against me was that I answered 'Yes' to the statement about bloodshed. Why make all this nonsense about bloodshed? Capital sheds more blood in one year than we would in five. We are being killed every day. We are being killed in the mines, in the buildings, killed everywhere—killed in the battlefield fighting the wars of the capital class. No wars in recent times have been fought in the interests of the workers, and yet everywhere it was the workers who died. We don't fear bloodshed. We have nothing to lose except our miserable lives.

"That district attorney hasn't got heart enough to be a dog catcher. He said I took graft, $25. That isn't true. I did not take $25. It wasn't turned over to me. I didn't want it. It was given to Mr. Martin, the sexton of the old Presbyterian Church, Eleventh Street and Fifth Avenue. He came along with us. It was a very miserable, windy night, the snow blowing and sleet, and we took the men—83 in number—homeless, shelterless, naked, and starving men—took them to a restaurant on the Bowery and fed them.

"How about religion and praying to God? Why, there is no more religious thing I have ever witnessed than that lot of homeless, half-fed, half-dressed, illy cled men sitting over a long table enjoying a clean, warm meal, laughing and talking. That is the most religious thing I ever saw. And this man, Mr. Martin, paid for that out of his own pocket, out of the $25 which he, and not I, held. Then we took these men to a Bowery hotel on Third Avenue and put them to bed, and there was 10 cents left after the men were put to bed, which I will turn over to the district attorney if he wants it.

"Another far more serious act upon my part—unlawful, illegal, unrespectable—was my attitude toward the priests. Now, I don't know of anyone I was ever impolite to. I am polite to everybody, even to my enemies, because I can afford to be. But I want to tell you that Dr. Schneider is supposed to represent the Gospel of Christ; he is supposed to preach and practice the Gospel of the Man who came down and who died on the cross because the poor, common people listened to Him. One of the indictments against Jesus Christ was that the common people listened to Him gladly. And I want to tell you that if He came down upon the earth now Father Schneider would be the first one to crucify Him.

"There are a few other things I want to say. When I was arrested that was the first time I had ever been in court, first time I had ever been in the police station, or had anything to do with the police. I was so ignorant of these things that when I was first called into the magistrate's court I saw the clerk, and I asked the lieutenant if that wasn't the judge. I didn't know then anything about courts and judges, which means the law, the present system, and from what I have learned now I have very little respect for them, I must admit, very little respect for them. I feel after having lived with those boys three weeks in the Tombs prison, every one of them, if they would have been able to go to school, if they had a decent place to live and a decent job, and if they had not been kicked about and driven from place to place, as most of them were, they would have been just as good as anybody else, just as good as anybody else, even the district attorney.

"I think now, your honor—and I am going to say what I think—that when the first man was convicted in this court, justice flew out the window and never returned and never will. You never know, and the law does not take into consideration, anything about human wants or the circumstances impelling a human being to so-called crime. They are not responsible for what they do, their drifting into crimes. You don't know their life. I believe from my impressions and associations with these boys that they are more normal and more spontaneous than others, and that is why they can not adapt themselves to this rotten society. They feel that as human beings for the sake of a piece of bread it is not worth while to work 12 long hours in a factory.

"There is little more I have to say. This trial for me was arranged by my friends in spite of my protest. I didn't want it. I knew what I was going to get, because I am not one of your class. But they prevailed upon me. They said, 'Give them a chance; they will not find you guilty, because you are not guilty of any crime. There is no damage done, no property destroyed.' There was no property destroyed and no injury, and I knew there was absolutely no violence, and they said 'You will be freed.' So I agreed to it. But, of course, I am convicted. It is not a surprise to me. I expected it.

"But I must say that although Lieut. Gegan treated me very nicely always, during the trial he lied absolutely when he said he didn't call me up the steps. That is an absolute lie. I was on those steps, and he told me to come in. He lied. When I took the stand I didn't have to plead my case; just tell the truth exactly as I knew it. I didn't want a trial, but I have got it. I will never, if arrested in labor troubles, submit to a trial again. No more trials for me. The members of the jury, while they may be fair-minded, are not workmen. They don't know the life of a workingman. There is no jury—you could not get a jury of 12 workmen, structural iron workers for instance, to convict me; absolutely no. These gentlemen are members of your class, in a way. They are capitalists. They would like to be. They would like to be rich. That's all right; but they are capitalists. Now, that is all I have to say. I consider my conviction absolutely unjust. You have tried to question the right of hungry men to get their bread. That is the crime, and I am willing to take the consequences, whatever they may be."

I next offer the speech of Fred Warren before the United States Circuit Court of Appeals at Minneapolis, where he had taken an appeal from his conviction for sending through the mails some papers, on the outside wrappers of which there appeared some "scurrilous and defamatory" matter:

FRED WARREN'S ST. PAUL SPEECH.

"I appear before this court in my own defense because my attorneys are unwilling to say what I think should be said. I desire to waive all that counsel for the defense has said with reference to the Government's inability.

to prove that this envelope was mailed from the office of the Appeal to Reason, of which I am editor. I wish to waive all the objections interposed by my attorneys and the arguments advanced by them why I should be given a new trial. I do not want a new trial. This case has cost the defense $20,000. A new trial, before a jury of my political opponents, selected by the district attorney's office from among Government employees, or those who hope to get a Federal job, before a judge prejudiced against my cause, could result only in another miscarriage of justice.

"In waiving the arguments of my attorneys on these points (and I wish to say here in justification of my course at this time that the theory on which this case was conducted in the lower court was over my vigorous protest) I do so to put the issue squarely before this court: Is the mailing of this envelope with its offer of a reward printed in red for the capture and return to Kentucky authorities of ex-Gov. William Taylor, under indictment at that time for murder, a violation of the Federal statutes? Stripped of all legal verbiage and technicality, that is the issue here, and no other.

"My attorneys argue in the brief submitted that the indictment is defective. I do not pretend to know about this. I will say, however, that I have no desire to have my sentence set aside on a mere technical defect in the indictment, and I would regret to see the issue involved disposed of in this unsatisfactory manner. It would still leave the question in doubt as to whether the mailing of a reward, printed in red, for the capture of a fugitive Republican politician is a violation of the Federal statutes.

"I call the attention of the court to the testimony introduced by the Government, showing that I submitted a draft of the alleged defamatory envelope to the postmaster at Girard and asked his opinion as to its mailability. The postmaster, the representative of the Government, informed me that in his judgment there was nothing in the postal laws that would prevent the mailing of this reward offer, as hundreds of similar cards and envelopes were mailed in the course of a year at the Girard post office. This certainly establishes my good faith. No man with criminal intent would voluntarily submit the evidence of his contemplated crime to the agent of the institution against which the crime was directed.

"In this connection I wish to call the court's attention to the statement made from the bench by the trial judge that, when this matter was first submitted to him, he himself was in doubt as to whether the mailing of this envelope was a violation of the Federal statutes. If the law is so indefinite that even the trial judge is unable to determine whether a crime has been committed, until after he "had consulted higher authority," how is the layman to determine what is lawful and what is not. In the lower court's decision on our demurrer Judge Pollock stated that the language was not scurrilous and threatening, as charged in the indictment, but that it was defamatory, inasmuch as it was calculated to impress the reader thereof with the thought that ex-Gov. W. S. Taylor was wanted in Kentucky by the authorities of that State for some alleged crime. Under this decision every offer of a reward for a man charged with crime, mailed by a private individual or a civil officer, is a violation of the Federal statute under which this indictment was returned against me. In order to prevent this construction and its far-reaching consequences, Judge Pollock, in his final summing up of the case, decided that it was not defamatory nor scurrilous but threatening. It is hard for the average man to follow such judicial reasoning, and I sincerely trust that this court's opinion will be written in such clear and unmistakable terms that there will be no question as to this law in the future.

"It will be argued by counsel for the Government that kidnapping is a crime, and, therefore, an offer of a reward to kidnap ex-Gov. Taylor is a threat against that gentleman. I will ask the counsel for the Government to cite the Federal law constituting kidnapping a crime. He can not do this. On the other hand, the United States Supreme Court, in an exhaustive opinion, handed down in the case of the three workmen who had been kidnapped in Colorado and taken to Idaho, plainly states that it is no violation of the Federal statutes to forcibly abduct a man and take him from one State to another. In its opinion the Supreme Court says:

"Looking first at what was alleged to have occurred in Colorado touching the arrest of the petitioner and his deportation from that State, we do not perceive that anything done there, however hastily or inconsiderately done, can be adjudged to be in violation of the Constitution or laws of the United States.

Even if it be true that the arrest and deportation of Pettibone, Moyer, and Haywood from Colorado was by fraud and connivance, to which the governor of Colorado was a party, this does not make out a case of violation of the rights of the appellants under the Constitution and laws of the United States.'"

"Under this decision I do not see what weight this court can give to the argument of the Government's counsel, that to offer a reward to do what the Supreme Court has explicitly declared is not a crime is in violation of the law.

"What I did, in fact, was to offer a reward to any one who would capture, forcibly abduct if you please, a man under indictment for murder and return him to the Kentucky authorities. To kidnap means not only forcible abduction, but hiding from friends and the proper authorities. Under this view how can it be maintained that it is unlawful to offer a reward for the capture of ex-Gov. William S. Taylor and his return to the authorities of Kentucky?

"Let me state a hypothetical case: Suppose the Socialists capture the political powers of Kansas, as we shall. We find that Mr. Armour is violating the antitrust laws of our State. He lives in Illinois. The governor of Illinois, being a Republican, refuses to grant a requisition. Suppose our Socialist State officials, who would be private citizens in Illinois, should quietly go at midnight, surround Mr. Armour's house in Chicago, capture him, carry him into Kansas, and there place him on trial before a Socialist judge and a Socialist jury. Would the men that kidnapped Armour violate any Federal statute? Would they not be immune from prosecution under the Supreme Court's ruling?

"The question involved in this case is whether there is one law for the workingman and another for the rich employer. The Supreme Court's decision in the famous kidnapping conspiracy in Colorado and the action of high Government and State officials in protecting a fugitive Republican politician charged with murder lends color to my contention that there is one interpretation of the law for the poor and another one for the rich. The action of the governor of New Jersey in refusing to issue requisition papers for Armour, the Chicago meat packer, who was charged by the New Jersey prosecutors with violating the antitrust laws of that State is a convincing argument that there is one law for the poor and none for the rich. The methods adopted by the Government's attorney in his prosecution of me and his refusal to take cognizance of similar acts on the part of bankers and others strengthens our argument that there are two wholly different kinds of law in this country; and your decision will, if that decision upholds the action of the lower court, add to this belief in the public mind.

"The Government's attorney emphasizes the fact that this reward offer is printed red. Out of curiosity I asked a number of the leading ink manufacturers in the United States for what color of printing ink they had the greatest demand, and they replied, without a single exception, that they sold more red ink than all others combined, save one—black. Black is the emblem of piracy and has been since long before the days of Capt. Kidd. Under its sable folds march the land thief, the predatory rich, the employer of little children, those who barter justice, the Wall-Street speculator, the petty gambler and grafter, and all those who plunder labor and oppress the poor. Black is the color of death. Red on the other hand is the color of life; it glows with vitality; it is the badge of universal kinship. It has been from the days of Spartacus, down through the ages, the emblem of revolt against tyranny. Under the crimson banner the revolutionary patriots of 1776 fought and won their battles against the English King. Longfellow's inspiring poem of Pulaski, the Polish patriot who gave his life for American independence, immortalizes the red banner:

"Where, before the altar, hung
The blood-red banner, that with prayer
Had been consecrated there—
Take thy banner—and if e'er
Thou shouldst press the soldier's bier,
And the muffled drum should beat
To the tread of mournful feet,
Then this crimson flag shall be
Martial cloak and shroud for thee.
The warrior took that banner proud,
And it was his martial cloak and shroud!"

"The original flag of the American Revolution was red. The stars and stripes were added later by our rebel forefathers to distinguish it from the national emblems of other countries. It is a significant historical fact that red predominates in the flags of all countries with one exception—Russia. It is not surprising, therefore, that the Government attorney who sails under the black flag should seek to cast aspersions on the red banner.

"If the liberties bought with the blood of our forefathers, who fought under the red flag, are to be preserved it will be done by the men who to-day march under the crimson banner.

"The theory of law that a man is presumed to be innocent until proven guilty was wholly overlooked in my trial at Fort Scott. I was convicted and sentenced before I entered the court room. I was not prosecuted as a presumable innocent man charged with an alleged violation of the law. I was prosecuted by partisan politicians, before a partisan judge, and on perjured testimony. But this is not the first time in the history of the world that this same farce has been enacted. When the ruling class of any epoch is forced to use such means to bring about the imprisonment of a man advocating revolutionary doctrines, it has always foreshadowed the dawn of a new era.

"Several million men and women in the United States to-day believe that I have been prosecuted in the Federal courts because of my political beliefs. It is true I am in revolt against the present capitalistic régime of graft and boodle, and I have dedicated my life to the Revolution of To-morrow. Our cause will triumph in America just as it is winning in Germany, France, and England. The Milwaukee Socialist victory is a prophecy of what will happen throughout the Nation at no distant day.

"By environment, training, and economic interests the judges who compose this court are opposed to me. You can no more impartially consider the questions involved in this case than could the judges appointed by the English King to consider impartially the questions which arose between that monarch and his American subjects.

"In all controversies that arose between the master and his slave prior to the revolution of 1860, the Federal courts made their decisions conform to the interests of the masters. It was from the slave owners that they derived their powers and held their positions. No man openly antagonistic to the slave power could hold a position on the Federal bench.

"An examination of the decisions of this court—and your decisions are similar to those of all other Federal courts—wherein the interests of the workingman conflict with the interests of the employers, is ample proof of the class character of the Federal judiciary. Dissenting from the opinion of this very court, in a case wherein a working girl was pitted against a great corporation, Judge Thayer said: 'I dissent from these doctrines which seem to have been formulated with an eye mainly to the protection of the employers and with too little regard for the situation and rights of the employees.'

"As a militant member of the working class I frankly confess that I expect nothing from this court. A court of justice, co-called, which turns away a mangled working child empty handed in defense of capitalist-class property against working-class life and limb, is not apt to look with favor upon one in revolt against such shocking inhumanity and the system responsible for it.

"I know that this is the settled policy of this court. I understand why its decisions are in the interest of the employer and against the workingman and working women.

"You are serving those to whom you are indebted for your position and responsible for your power. I am simply trying to show to the working class of the world which embraces a great majority of the population, the character of the Federal court to which must be submitted their liberties and their lives. The Federal court under capitalist misrule is essentially capitalistic in its sympathies, its interests, and decisions.

"In this important work of educating the working class as to the true character of the courts you are helping me. It was the Dred Scott decision that hastened the overthrow of chattel slavery, and, as history repeats itself, we may confidently expect that the decision of the Supreme Court in the now famous kidnapping conspiracy, backed by the Federal court's decisions in all other labor cases, will precipitate the downfall of wage slavery. When the toilers of the mill, factory, mine, and farm once understand the true situation, they will realize that there can be no relief from judicial despotism until they use the power latent in themselves to abolish the present iniquitous system, based upon the legalized robbery of the Nation's toilers and producers, in which the courts are mere creatures of capitalist-class rule and instruments of working-class subjection. These workmen will one day learn to choose their own judges, and while these judges may know little of the intricacies of law and the chicanery of technicality, they will have an inherent sense of justice and they may be depended upon to serve their brothers.

"Personally, it is a matter of no consequence to me what this court may decide in this case. If this court concludes to sanction the scandalous methods employed to secure my conviction and the outrageous sentence imposed upon me for the commission of what Judge Pollock termed 'a mere misdemeanor,' I shall consider it the proudest day of my life when I enter the jail at Fort Scott, imprisoned because of my defense of the poor and oppressed. You will by that act increase my power a thousandfold and carry my message to the tolling millions from sea to sea. Gladly will I make this small sacrifice in a cause to which I would willingly give my life."

LIMITING FREE SPEECH BY INJUNCTION.

This brings me to the matter of furnishing some illustrative cases in the suppression of freedom of speech and press as used by industrial agitators which seem to explain in part this hostility toward the courts, as far as agitators and workers are concerned.

The first case I wish to call your attention to is in the matter of the — Amusement Co. v. Millard, Price, et al., in which Judge John E. Humphries, of Seattle, Wash., issued a temporary restraining order against street agitators. There was at that time no question of strikes or lockouts involved. In the preliminary restraining order, the defendants are "prohibited from using in any way any language tending to incite the defendant's auditors, or the public, to lawlessness, or tending in any way to arouse the anger and incite the antagonism or wrath of the citizens; and also from using any violence or abusive language of any kind toward the United States Government, the State of Washington, or the city of Seattle, or its public officials, and from using language ridiculing the institutions of this country and holding them up to ridicule and scorn." Under this order some 18 persons were arrested for contempt of court and a great deal of agitation resulted. On the final hearing the restraining order was somewhat modified.

I entered into a newspaper controversy over this situation with the defendants of the judge, upon which it finally developed that the judge signed this preliminary order containing the quoted language without even having read it or knowing its contents. Let us assume that the situation was reversed and that Socialists, owning a hall, had sought an injunction against well-to-do citizens of Seattle to restrain them from employing persons who appeared before the Socialists' headquarters to make anti-Socialistic speeches. It is not thinkable that under such circumstances the wealthy citizens would have been thus restrained. The unconscious attitude of mind behind such conduct on the part of this judge, though never formulated, is of the kind which might be expressed in the words that the rich can do no wrong. It is these often unconscious attitudes which in part explain most of the evils of our courts.

Next I come to present the final order in the case of the American Manufacturing Co. v. Edward Lindgren et al., where I offer in evidence the following extract from the final decree:

"Ordered and adjudged, that the defendants and each of them, their agents and servants and that the Socialist Party and its members, and all persons, agents, employees, connected with or associated therewith be permanently prohibited and enjoined and restrained from causing, ordering, committing, participating, engaging in, inducing, or assisting in any of the aforesaid meetings and public and private nuisance in and upon the highways adjacent to the mills of the plaintiff or so as to interfere with the free and unobstructed passage and repassage by plaintiff, its agents and employees over the said highways on foot or with horses, wagons, or other vehicles, or so as to interfere with the free and unobstructed ingress to and egress from said premises and the buildings and structures thereon.

"And it is further adjudged and decreed that the plaintiff above named, American Manufacturing Company, have judgment against the defendants above named, Edward Lindgren, Harry Answald, Thomas A. Hopkins, Albert Pauly, T. N. Fall, John Lyons, William Hudson, H. B. Pratt, William Shapiro, A. J. Plitnik, Harry Slaven, J. C. Lippes, and Harry Pepper, individually, and as the executive committee of the Socialist Party in Kings County, New York, for the sum of one hundred and eighty one & 33/100 ($181.33) dollars, the costs and the disbursements of this action, to be taxed by the clerk of this court, and that it have execution therefor.

"Dated, July 11, 1913.

"GARRETT J. GARRETSON, J. S. C."

Here it is unthinkable again that, if the Democratic or Republican Party had been involved, a perpetual restraining order would have been issued to prohibit all members of such a party from using the public highways, especially when the political party as such was not a party to the action.

My next illustration is from the decision of the court in the case of the People of the State of New York v. Upton Sinclair, as published in the New York Law Journal of July 10, 1914, and which within the past couple of weeks has been affirmed, without an opinion, by the appellate division of the supreme court:

THE PEOPLE v. UPTON SINCLAIR.

"A merited rebuke may under some circumstances constitute insulting behavior. The defendant intended by his conduct in the presence of others on the occasion in question to rebuke and influence by rebuke the conduct of a Mr. Rockefeller. Where one has publicly announced that because of the alleged misconduct of another he is going to do a given thing with a view to rebuking and affecting the conduct of such other, and thereupon does the thing which he has previously announced that he will do, and does this thing in the presence of others, his behavior is, within the language of the statute, abusive or insulting—abusive because it is injurious and improper; insulting because it is derogatory to the one whose conduct is referred to; and the insult lies in part in the subject matter of the rebuke and in part in the publicity of its infliction.

"The defendant said by his conduct, as interpreted by his language of a named individual, 'I believe you have caused to be done certain abhorrent and criminal acts, and to stir your conscience and change your conduct I and those with me walk in processional form in front of an office building believing that the meaning of what we do having been explained will be understood by many.' Can it be seriously urged that his behavior is not insulting to the one upon whose conduct he thus animadverts?

"If it was abusive and insulting behavior within the meaning of the statute, did the defendant do what he did with intent to provoke a breach of the peace? One of the purposes of an insult is to provoke resentment, and the defendant is presumed to have intended the ordinary and natural consequences of his act. But even if the defendant did not intend to provoke a breach of the peace, it is sufficient, as we have seen, to bring him within the statute if his behavior was such that by it a breach of the peace might be occasioned. It endangered the peace in different ways. Those rightfully passing to and fro impeded by the crowd purposely brought there by the defendant were not unlikely to resent the defendant's conduct, while persons holding contrary views to those of the defendant respecting the conduct of the one who was being made the subject of the defendant's criticism, were not unlikely to resent what the defendant did. The defendant concedes that he anticipated the possibility, if not the probability, of trouble occurring from his behavior.

"A recital of the defendant's apprehensions shows that he realized that trouble might result from what he was about to do and subsequently did. His apologies and admissions form a considerable part of his alleged defense. He anticipated that some of his companions at least might lose their self-control. He anticipated that they might be subject to insults. He anticipated that they might be attacked. He anticipated that there might be interference by the police, and he proceeded to do that which brought about his arrest despite such anticipations. He was apprehensive of himself, of the feelings caused within himself by that which he says he heard at the Carnegie Hall meeting. He was apprehensive of his associates. He recognized the seriousness of the situation by which his address at the called meeting placed him, and he was apprehensive of the consequences of himself, his associates, and others from what he did, and he was justly apprehensive, both because of the wrongfulness and the danger of his conduct.

"The law applicable to the case at bar is that where, as in the present case, one occupying no relation toward another which gives him the right to reprobate the conduct of such other, does by public behavior reprobate the conduct of such other not for the purpose of the enforcement of a private right or the setting in motion of legal process against such other, or the enactment of legislation, and the one to be reprobated is in private and not in public life, and is so reprobated with respect to a matter of conduct in private life, and the reprobation consists in part of taunting conduct toward such other in a public place, and is therefore liable in such place to be resented by the one so reprobated or by others in sympathy with him or acting in his behalf, the behavior evidencing such reprobation is unlawful as tending to a breach of the peace, although the immediate acts done may intentionally be peaceable and the immediate deportment courteous to those in whose presence it takes place. In such a case the circumstance, if it exists, that the conduct reprobated was reprehensible, does not legalize the act. This view does not militate against the right of free speech or against the right of assembly; nor is it primarily for the protection of the one reprobated. Its sanction is the public interest in the enforcement of law and the preservation of order."

In this opinion are many remarkable assumptions. One is that the killing in the Battle of Ludlow, during the strike of the workers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., for which Sinclair thought Rockefeller to be morally responsible, was a purely private matter, as to which Mr. Rockefeller could not properly be rebuked. The opinion also holds "that a merited rebuke may under some circumstances constitute insulting behavior," and insulting behavior is disorderly conduct under the statutes of New York. Another vicious feature of the court's argument lies in this that it punishes Sinclair for silently walking on the public highways in front of the offices of Mr. Rockefeller upon the ground that such walking might provoke Rockefeller and his friends to a breach of the peace. It seems to me that the function of the Government, if it has any function in this connection, should be to suppress the impending breach of the peace and not the agitation, which in the mind of the judge bears only an imaginative prospective and problematical tendency toward such a breach of the peace by its influence in the mind of some future hypothetical person. In this class of cases and all those involving street speaking the unconscious assumption of courts and policemen always is that the purpose of their existence are the maintenance of peace at the expense of freedom of speech and press rather than the maintenance of peace in spite of such freedom. It might also be said that there is an equally plain, though often unconscious, assumption that we must have peace of mind for the beneficiaries of legalized injustice rather than to protect the constitutional right of their victims to complain of economic injustice.

CENSORSHIP OF POSTAL WRAPPERS.

The next class of invasions of speech which have been used against the agitator are those which arise under a Federal statute which prohibits the sending of anything through the mails on the outside wrapper of which there is anything which is scurrilous or defamatory.

Some years ago the New York Evening Sun contained this item:

"Col. Quigley's bill to make 10 hours a day's work on all surface and elevated railways in all cities of 75,000 inhabitants except New York came up in the senate. The majority of the senators showed no aversion to voting on the bill. Only 13 votes were cast, 12 for and 1 against the bill, and it was laid over. Senator McClelland said that the bill came from labor tramps who do not want to work. Senator Goggeshall said that 'bills like this would pass were it not that corporations can afford to pay their attorneys thousands of dollars while workingmen can not afford to pay anything.'"

A workingman by the name of William McNair pasted this clipping on a postal card and underneath it wrote these words:

"Senator McCLELLAND: Attached is a newspaper clipping of the 13th instant, and as an American citizen and honest workingman, which I can prove, permit me to ask you in reply whether you ever earned an honest dollar in your life by honest labor. If you have, you should be ashamed of yourself as a public servant to make use of such language against the unfortunate and honest New York employees whose interest is centered in this bill. May I ask how much the railroads promised you for this action? No doubt you will reply and say 'it is none of my business,' but later on it will be my business.

"WILLIAM MCNAIR."

This postal card was addressed to Senator McClelland and probably read by no one except himself. For this "crime" McNair was indicted, found guilty, sentenced to four months in jail, and to pay a fine of $500. The evil of this kind of legislation, like most of the other that I shall call attention to, is twofold. First, its invasion of freedom of the press, and, second, that this law, and most of the others to which I shall call attention, and which are destructive to intellectual freedom, are a violation of the guarantee of the "due-process law," which, among other things, I conceive to include a guarantee that the criteria of guilt shall be so certain that no man of ordinary intelligence can err as to what he may or may not do under the law.

THE WRAPPER OF THE MELTING POT.

A similar case is the case of the United States v. Tichenor and Wagoner, who conduct a Socialist magazine called the Melting Pot, published at St. Louis, Mo.

In its issue of August, 1914, on the front page, was a cartoon representing the evangelist, Billy Sunday, behind a pulpit, the altar cloth of which had a dollar sign upon the front of it, and out of the evangelist's pockets were sticking many dollar bills. Above he was represented as saying, "Charles Darwin is in hell. Everybody will go to hell that doesn't renounce their reason and believe in me. Souls saved at $500 apiece. Come on sinners." Underneath this and in the background was a person labeled "saved" and marked "Big biz," and a sack, as if of money, marked "swag."

Papers of this sort are sent out by the publishers in bundle lots, each bundle being addressed to the city for which it is designed. When it arrives at the post offices of its destination the outer wrapper is removed and the papers within them have each upon them the address of the person for whom it is designed.

In this case the contention of the Government was that when this outer wrapper was removed by the postmaster at the delivery office then the cartoon which was on the front page of this paper, became a wrapper. Since now this cartoon was on the wrapper of the papers sent through the mail, therefore these parties are guilty of violating the postal law. A compromise was reached by which they pleaded guilty and were fined a small sum for their offense. They might have received five years in jail and a fine besides for not knowing the meaning of a statute which fails to furnish decisive criteria of guilt.

While in the office of these gentlemen within the past few months I was shown numerous other publications, among them daily papers of prominence, which likewise had upon their front page cartoons that might as well be called scurrilous and defamatory of somebody. However, such papers and their publishers are never suppressed under these laws. By virtue of the uncertainty of this statute it lends itself for easy application to all radical persons against whom there is popular ill will, and they are never applied to those who support the present system.

SCURRILOUS WRAPPER OF THE APPEAL TO REASON.

Another illustration of this kind is the arrest of the editor of the Appeal to Reason, Fred Warren. After the kidnapping of Moyer, Haywood, and Pettibone he conceived the idea of proving to his readers that there was one law for the rich and another for the poor. In sending the Appeal to Reason he therefore put upon the outside wrapper an offer of a reward of $1,000 for the kidnapping of ex-Gov. Taylor and his return to Kentucky, where he had been indicted for murder. Current history indicated that Gov. Taylor was being protected in another State by the refusal of the governor of that other State to honor a request for extradition.

Mr. Warren made inquiry of the local postmaster for information as to whether or not such a wrapper would violate any postal regulation and was informed that it would not. Later he was arrested and convicted, and if my memory serves me, he was given a jail sentence of a year in addition to a fine. A tremendous agitation resulted from this, in consequence of which the Socialists were making great additions to their ranks. To put an end to this, President Taft pardoned Warren without Warren's request, consent, or approval and against his protest.

AGITATORS SUPPRESSED BY CRIMINAL LIBEL LAWS.

Another of the laws which are being used to suppress agitators is the criminal libel law. Here the situation is deplorable because of the uncertainty of the law as to the evidence, presumption, and burden of proof in relation to malice in the act of publication. This situation is described in the following language by the Supreme Court of Michigan:

"No question in modern times has perhaps given rise to a greater amount of judicial controversy. The conflict in the decision is absolutely appalling and the attempt to trace the line of mere authority through the maze of hostile decisions would be calculated only to confuse and lead the mind astray from the real principles of justice involved in it and could serve no useful end. A careful review of the decision would require volumes and I shall not attempt it." (Hudson v. Dale, 19 Mich., 17-28 to American Rept. 66.)

A similar opinion is expressed by the Hon. William J. Gaynor in 1904 in the case of Hume v. Kusche (43 Misc. Repts., N. Y. 414-417).

Not long ago the editors of a Socialist magazine known as The Masses were arrested for a criminal libel against the Associated Press. The libel consisted in a cartoon which represented a man, labeled as the Associated Press, pouring something from a bottle labeled "poison" into a spring labeled "the news." Underneath was this inscription: "Poisoning the news at its source." There was also an editorial charging the Associated Press with having misrepresented the facts in the Virginia coal strike.

Many other periodicals of various kinds had made similar accusations against the Associated Press, but none of these were ever indicted. A Socialist periodical without apparent financial resources and of not much importance was selected for the purpose of establishing the purity of the Associated Press and working vengeance upon the agitators. Much to the surprise of everyone there were found friends to finance the defense. The proposition was then made to them that if they would apologize the officers of the Associated Press would use their good influences to have the indictment dismissed. The editors refused to apologize, threatened to justify their publication, and expressed a willingness to go to jail if they could not do this. Thereupon a second indictment was found against them for the same libel, it being claimed that the picture of the man in the cartoon was a picture of Mr. Noyes, the president of the Associated Press.

The evident purpose of this second indictment was to exclude the possibility of a justification upon the theory that actual misrepresentation made by the Associated Press, even though intentional as to its inferiors, would be no justification of the libel against Noyes, unless it could be shown that he personally had directed the misrepresentation to be made.

The friends of the editors of The Masses now began a vigorous campaign of publicity both by public meetings and in such magazines as could be induced to accept criticisms of the Associated Press. Depositions were also taken to prove justification as to misrepresentations in the Associated Press news concerning the coal strike in Virginia and other matters. Recently the defendants have been allowed to go free on their own recognizance, bail bond was discharged, and in due time, no doubt, the case will be dismissed.

This again illustrates the vicious use of the laws gagging the press, as a means of persecuting agitators. It also shows the power of a free public opinion in producing a cessation of such persecution when it was found that it was going to be the means of publicity as to the truth of what the radicals were claiming.

OBSCENITY BY HON. FREEMAN KNOWLES.

Next I come to the use of the statutes against obscene and indecent literature as a means of harassing agitators. The first case is that of the United States against Freeman Knowles. Mr. Knowles had been a Populist Member of Congress and later had been a Socialist candidate for Congress in South Dakota. He was editor of a paper called the Lantern, which was devoted to Socialist propaganda and which had severely criticized President Roosevelt. Besides this, he was the source of a great deal of annoyance to the mining operators in the Black Hills. Knowles was arrested and convicted in the Federal court of 1908 for sending alleged obscene literature through the mails. After his conviction, in an issue of his paper dated March 28, 1908, he told his story. I quote from an article in that issue:

"I have it upon good authority that this is not the real article that gave offense to the Government, but some other articles which severely criticized President Roosevelt during the Moyer-Haywood trial. An agent of the Government was recently out here gathering up those articles on Teddy, and after consulting with the district attorney, they concluded they could not convict me on any of those, so hunted up this pretended obscene article.

"Under Roosevelt's administration the Federal courts, or that portion of them controlled by the administration, have been made a huge political machine to punish all protests against present social conditions. The recent indictment against Fred Warren of the Appeal to Reason is a case in point. In my case the hand of the Government at Washington was clearly apparent. The district attorney and his assistant had their parts committed to memory or read them from manuscript. They never do this unless they have been coached from the Department of Justice at Washington. The jury, drawn entirely from the eastern part of the State, were given an excursion to the Black Hills on an evident understanding that they were to support the Government in whatever suits were tried. The United States marshal, a personal friend of Roosevelt, has ways of 'fixing' juries not known to the public." * * *

Then he republishes the criminal article as follows:

"A good illustration of the beauties of our social system was recently given when society in Lead and Deadwood was convulsed by the news that a most sweet and amiable young woman had died at Denver from the effects of an operation performed upon her to hide what society calls 'her shame.' And what was this thing which society blasphemously brand as 'shame'? Why, simply that an unmarried girl, having disregarded the sanctions of some priest or magistrate had made the discovery that God had worked in her the wonderful miracle of motherhood. So this poor girl, having been taught from infancy that such a thing constituted 'shame' kills her unborn child and in so doing kills herself. That the father and mother of this murdered child were designated by nature for each other is proven by the fact that they could not resist their mutual attraction, even in the face of great social peril. Love had its way, and God blessed the union with the most stupendous fruit of the universe—a human child—and 'society' steps in and cries 'shame' and causes the mother to kill both herself and her child. It is a well-established fact in physics, as well as in history, that there are no children so likely to be healthy, robust, so mentally and bodily fit to survive as those very 'love children' who are killed in the wombs of foolish mothers, driven to do the fiendish deed by 'society' and public opinion. Since the dawn of history, the great army of genius has been largely recruited from the ranks of illegitimates. Love's offerings have filled the world with art, music, poetry, and wisdom, as if putting to shame those very ones who cry 'shame,' and as taunting them with their own inferiority. Society is as guilty of the murder of this girl as though she had been put to death by the public hangman."

The editor then thus comments on the offending article:

"Will some one point out what is lewd, obscene, or lascivious in that article? I am aware that few agree with me in my views of our social and marriage system, but I never wrote a more conscientious article in my life than the above. These are my honest and conscientious opinions, for the expression of which I am to be sent to the penitentiary."

For this offense Knowles was given sentence, if my memory serves me correctly, of one year in jail, and this was affirmed by the United States Court of Appeals. (See 170 Fed. Rep., 409-95; C. C. A., 579.)

THE CASE OF UP THE DIVIDE.

Next I call attention to the case of a little magazine called Up the Divide. It is devoted to socialism and published at Denver, Colo. Its issue of June, 1911, was arbitrarily suppressed by the Post Office Department, because of an article, beginning at page 326, and entitled "The Market of Women," and ending at page 337. The article is signed by James Lugg.

No prosecution ever resulted, but the magazine was denied carriage through the mails. I consider this article as one evidencing a very high degree of sympathetic understanding with the unfortunates of the world, and it seems to me that no one could find anything really obscene in it, except those who were really offended by that part of the article which charges responsibility for prostitution upon the rich. The article is as follows:

"THE MARKET OF WOMEN.

"Reflections from an original investigation.

"Sing of the maiden, thy sister, whom men, thy brothers, have sold,

"Cast on the merciless world, on the tide of the ravening years,

"Bought with a price in the market and paid with dishonor and gold,

"Court and loved and betrayed and deserted to desolate tears."

"GRANT ALLEN, in the Night Watches.

"In the heart of the great city of Denver is an ill-smelling district where thousands of Chinese are huddled in grimy, greasy tenement; mansions formerly or leading hotels and mercantile establishments, but now given over to decay—and the Orientals! These thrifty people have divided and subdivided the apartments into tiny rooms and cubby holes, creating two stories out of one, burrowed underground in the dark cellars, and herded more bodies in a single little reeking den than formerly occupied a suite in the old-time mansions.

"Shameless rows.—In this same district is located 'The Market of Women,' a thoroughfare which, from the number of men and young women passing, is evidently very popular.

"On each side of this street for several blocks are one, two, and even three-story houses, divided into little rooms. Each little room has one door and one window opening on the street or hallway, and each door has its number in large, staring numerals, also the first name (fictitious) of the occupant.

"These rooms are rented to girls and women at $2.50 to $10 per night. This must be paid in advance every 24 hours, otherwise they are made to vacate by having their belongings packed into the street.

"Inside woes.—The atmosphere is heavy with tobacco smoke; the walls echo to the unceasing tramp, tramp, tramp of the crowd and the slamming of doors, and occasionally a shrill laugh. For these numbered doors are continually being thrust open by the passing men, who pause, peer inside for a moment, slam the door, and pass on. As you glance into such an opened room you see a woman clad in a light wrapper of kimono. She smiles at all men alike as they look in, stare, leer, and slam the door in her face.

"The face may be a worn, tired one, with a smile that has become hard and glassy, with wrinkles which no enamel can fill and a pallor which no rouge and powder can enliven. In such case the door slams quickly back upon her, be she ever so wheedling with soft words. Or it may be the face of a young girl, not needing the dash of rouge which seems the fashion here. The eyes may be very bright and full of life, the expression may be vivacious or sometimes even girlish, almost maidenly, but the words with which she greets all comers are anything but a maiden's. On such a face the door is not so quickly slammed; men stand before her, four or five at a time, exchanging barroom jokes and profanity, commenting on her appearance, and puffing smoke in her face while she employs her primitive art method of seduction. Her words are honeyed; the draught that blows from her room is sickly warm and sickly sweet in odor.

"The mongrel customers.—At her door a man stops when the crowd has passed. He is an immigrant—an Italian. She has a smile for him—as for all—and a sweet or a saucy word. Her hand finds his; she urges; his slight resistance is overcome; the door closes upon him; her white, slender hand appears at the window and the shade is whisked down.

"She has a sweet face, like a girl I knew long ago—a good pure girl, now, thank God, happily married—safe. But this one wrecked!

"And thus these girls are bought and sold and hired in this Market of Women.

"There is no lack of customers, for along the street shuffles a crowd of men and youths from afternoon until early morning. Some are sober and some are drunk; some are dapper; some flashy; some dirty and careless in dress; some of good, clean parentage. Here, for instance, is one fresh from the plow, an easy victim. Others are spawned from the slums of the Old World cities, ill born, ill nourished, degenerate; but all are solicited alike by the girls at the doors and windows.

"Traces of better days.—And I am haunted by the resemblance of some of these girls to virtuous women I know; happy, sheltered, beloved wives of mothers living not many miles from this inferno, in God's good world outside. Almost enough alike to be sisters! And are they not sisters? Unloved, but longing for love. Poor relations, if you will—poor in virtue, but not devoid of all virtues. Ah, we who are "rich in virtue" do not know how much or how little of that wealth is ours, never having been sorely tempted. Yet we disclaim all relationship!

"One there was who received Mary Magdalene as a sister and yet if we would claim him as our brother can we disclaim her?

"Like flowers, crushed and bedraggled in the gutter, but still recognizable as violets, roses, or mignonette, I can see in each of these women some trace of her own peculiar girlish charm; the innocent coquetry, so dainty in a maiden, here becomes the gross, artificial spurring of desire; the boyish freedom with which a girl of many brothers faces the world here coarsens into brazen goodfellowship with thieves and thugs; here woman's passion has degenerated into mere bestiality, and woman's modesty is caricatured with downcast eyes under penciled brows.

"Displaying the merchandise.—Each girl strives to attract by means of her own formula of seduction. This one pretends to be desirous of each passer, showers him with love words, grasps his hand and strokes it; but if he, with an oath, wrenches himself free in the middle of a sentence, she finishes it in the face of his successor, declaring that he is the only man whoever attracted her.

"The girl at the next door affects absolute indifference. She reads a paper-covered novel, from which she will not raise her eyes, but her wrapper is cut in such a way as to display generously her dazzling shoulders. A third girl has an indecent gesture and a leer for every chance comer. Is it because she and her sort are a shade worse than the others? Who knows? Their jokes do not indicate humor, nor their laughter mirth; surely their obscenity does not indicate desire. And so the smile on some of these moon faces reminds me of nothing happy, but of that poor misshapen wretch in Hugo's tale who was so mutilated in the face as to stretch his mouth into a perpetual caricature of a smile. It was done for the pleasure of his master, who to make a buffoon marred a man. These women, too, serve a cruel master. The public demands that they submit themselves, no matter what their loathing—with a smile.

"A fourth girl is seated, not in the tiny receiving room, but far back in her bed chamber, and whenever the door opens she merely gazes at one with mournful brown eyes like those of a lost dog in a crowded street.

"Another, who sits with her feet against the doorpost and her chair tilted back, is dressed in bright scarlet. She is 'hail fellow well met' with everyone who opens her door. She puffs her cigarette smoke in every face and has a retort for every smutty witticism, knows the names of all the regular patrons, and addresses them as Harry or Gus and the strangers as 'Sport' or 'Pal' or 'Kiddo'; or if he be a partly bearded man as 'Papa.' Such is her devil-may-care pose, the typical 'scarlet woman' of the gay life; but she has been overheard to say: 'I'd like to be decent for once. I'm sick of being a sport. I'm sick of earning a living this way.' And some day when she is heartily sick of her life she will end it. But suicide in the underworld is such a frequent occurrence that it does not attract the attention of the public unless there happens to be something sensational about it. Perhaps to-night she will make her demise. Who knows? Perhaps in the morning gray when she is exhausted and alone, when there is no one to laugh about, when existence seems a stale, pointless, dirty joke, when she realizes more than ever that not one human being loves her. Meanwhile she laughs.

"The market keeper.—Sickening, is it not, the mere description of the lives these girls lead? Still more sickening is it to observe the creature, with the girth and facial expression of a swine, who is constantly to be seen in the street, not as a master, merely as overseer and profit taker in the market of women. He is only one of the many who fatten upon them, for they bring large profits. Each girl pays the landlord $15 to $30 a week rent. Aside from that, she orders meals from his chophouse, fancy drinks from his bar, cigarettes, candy, and notions from his store, and her laundry work passes through his commission. What wonder the swine thrives and waxes fat! His monthly income from this horrible traffic is several thousand dollars. He has become wealthy from the pitiful earnings of human debauchery. There are a number of influential men who own the land upon which these 'cribs' are built and who own the more stylish big houses in the underworld. They can see no other choice. This he brute lives in a palace in the best part of the city. Each brick in his magnificent home represents a lost soul, yet he and his household pass as respected members of society.

"Keeping the market up.—And it is for him and his kind that somebody's daughters, sisters—scores of them in his house alone—sell themselves time and again each night, smile into ruffianly faces, receive countless filthy insults, submit to outrage, loathsome disease, and early death. And these women have faces like those we know and love in the greater world.

"It is early when we leave—between 10 and 11 o'clock. Until 2 or 3 in the morning some of these girls will listen to the unceasing tramp of heavy feet in the streets, the slamming of doors, the heartless laughter, the old and obscene jest, and ever the unceasing tramp, tramp, tramp, through the long night until the noise of this great treadmill benumbs the brain.

"The bottom of the underworld.—At the bottom of this stratum can be found the lowest types of poverty and stricken humanity. It is composed of all shades, grades, and colors huddled together. Its lairs of iniquity are more base and undisguised. These hell holes catch all kinds of girls, the drift of untoward circumstances. They do not realize their fate until too late. Once in these dens they add thievery to shame. When money is scarce and customers few robbery is most frequent.

"The obscene show.—Men are always the proprietors of these shows, and the more vilely and unhumanely they are conducted the more profitable the business. The proprietors usually become rich, while the performers eke out a mere existence. These establishments are maintained by patronage from the well-to-do society world. The bon ton pay big admission fees to see sights too revolting to mention. Our 'best citizens' give as a reason for being there that they are 'curious to know how low a woman can descend.'

"The fashionable house.—Besides these lowest dens and common cribs, there are houses in which are seen, on both patrons and occupants, the glitter and the sparkle of diamonds. Grandeur of furnishings is the rule of these places, from exquisite dining room to remotest nook.

"Liveried servants answer the door, escort parties to separate rooms, and order the beer or wine, which is served on silver trays by colored maids.

"But here, too, the white slave pays the awful price. Surrounded by all this grandeur and beneath all its gaudy exterior her life is a tale of untold sorrow and misery.

"Before her arrival she imagines that her troubles will vanish when she becomes acquainted with the rich. But there is no class less generous than the rich man when he is sober. Besides, the girls are required to take part in the lowest debaucheries for his amusement.

"After a girl has been through one of these rich man's orgies there is nothing left of vice that is not familiar to her. She might live in some parts of the underworld for years and not have the knowledge or experience in vice that these girls have learned under the direction of one rich man in a week or a month of his pornographic revelry.

"Hundreds of rich men are entertained in this way daily in these houses. Men from the Christian world come to make the girls their slaves. They come to tell filthy stories and sing filthy songs and to require the daughters and sisters of other men to join in the chorus. They come to demand these daughters and sisters of other men to appear in richest, daring gowns or in the nude and to dance and jest as their tastes may demand.

"The libidinous language these girls hear from such men is revolting and degrading beyond description.

"When woman is so debased and hardened she is what men and conditions have made her.

"The source and the cause.—How did these girls get there, and why? Of their own choice? Very few. In the books Traffic in Girls, Soundings of Hell, The Queen of the Red Light, and The Underworld Sewer the snares, frauds, even forcible means, by which men bring good girls to this life are detailed. The facts seem incredible when read in these books. But the whole truth may not be read; it is unprintable.

"An eminent editor of a great reform paper recently wrote: 'Disinherited classes who earn wealth without getting it will have their daughters dragged into prostitution as victims so long as privileged classes, getting wealth without earning it, furnish sons to be seducers and brothel patrons. Privilege in power can not be deprived of its awful toll of woman's virtue any more than of its ghastly toll of human lives. As it is no respecter of "lower-class" age nor sex nor infancy in its industries, neither does it respect the virtue of "lower-class" women in its play.'

"They are called 'sporting women,' with about of much truth as caged pigeons which are shot to pieces by sportsmen at the opening of the doors might be called 'sporting pigeons.' 'Tis true they afford sport to those who have a fancy for such pleasures, but never imagine that it is sport for the caged pigeons or the white slaves.

"What can we do.—What are you going to do about it? Many remedies are suggested, ranging from the direct work of reclamation attempted by self-sacrificing rescue workers to the socialists' proposition that the whole social system must be reconstructed before the evil can be abolished. But let the facts be known. Let the diabolical male side of the evil be exposed. Then may parents protect their daughters and girls not fail through ignorance. In the first place, read the literature which treats of this evil and then circulate it. We can all warn some one whom no one else can reach.

"JAMES LUGG."

CENSORSHIP OF THE NEW YORK CALL.

Another instance, of much the same sort, occurred in relation to the New York Daily Call, a Socialist paper. The post-office censorship refused to carry that paper unless they would abstain from the further publication of a series of articles entitled "What a young woman should know." In consequence of this order one issue of the paper appeared with a blank column for which this article in question had been prepared. I can not reproduce the article, because I have not a copy of it, but this indicates duplication here of the Prussian method, where all matters are subjected to prior censorship and excluded if the censors disapprove of any sentiments expressed.

THE CASE OF THE SOCIAL DEMOCRAT.

Next I come to the case of the United States v. Coomer, the editor of a Socialist paper published in Oklahoma and called the Social Democrat. This paper in some issues during July, I think, 1912 or 1913, contained the following announcement:

"Free-love edition of Social Democrat, July 10. Order a bundle now. $2 per hundred. Advertisers get your copy in now. 5,000 copies of this edition will be circulated.

"The master class has always taught and paid their hireling teachers, preachers, authors (editors), and other able idiots to teach that woman is merely a multiplication table for the human species; that her only business on God's green footstool is to fry steak and onions and borning soldiers and politicians.

"The master class has even paid poets, and paid them well, to write that woman was nothing but a 'rag, a bone, and a hank of hair,' the 'weaker vessel,' etc. They never considered that woman had any rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. They never until recently allowed her to exercise anything but her sexual apparatus.

"The Socialists have made a great discovery. They have discovered that women are human beings. They are getting paid for this great discovery by having 'free love' and many other stupid hee-haws brayed in their ears.

"We are going to tell you in the free-love edition why the Socialists believe women are human beings. Watch for it, and read it when you get it."

For publishing this notice he was given a jail sentence, which was also affirmed by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals. (See 213 Fed. Rep., 1.)

I want to emphasize again that the evil of all this is not only in the suppression of the liberty of the press, but in the uncertainty in all of these statutes, none of which prescribe the criteria of guilt, and leave it to the whim and caprice of courts to determine guilt by post facto standards. (For further discussion of this point refer to my book on "Obscene Literature and Constitutional Law," and especially chapters 13 to 22.)

SEDITIONOUS LIBEL REVIVED.

Next I come to a discussion of the prosecution of the agitators for the crime of seditious libel. Here, again, the complaint of the workers arises out of discriminations to which they are subjected, not only under uncertain statutes but also under laws of judicial creation.

Before proceeding to the statement of the troubles of the agitator, I desire to call attention to a few things of a very similar character to that for which agitators are arrested, but coming from entirely orthodox sources, and which have never been made the basis of any prosecution or executive action. The first of these is a publication by Prof. George Gunton in the Bulletin of the New York Institute for Social Economics, I think, under date of March, 1903. I had slight acquaintance with Mr. Gunton and knew some of his intimate friends, and was told by them that his work in the field of economics was being subsidized by the Standard Oil interests. A few years ago—I think it was in the exposé made by Mr. Hearst through the publication of Mr. Archbold's letters—it appeared publicly that Prof. Gunton was subsidized by the Standard Oil interests. This particular bulletin of the Institute of Social Economics was devoted to justify the proposition that might was the only true arbiter of right. These bulletins were sent to debating societies connected with universities, Y. M. C. A.'s, and other literary associations and public libraries. No exception was ever publicly made to that publication or its transmission through the mails.

Another similar illustration is found in a paper called the Nativity Mentor in its issue of April, 1912. In that issue some clergyman became unduly excited about Socialists and published this: "The Socialist is busy; he follows his red flag and openly preaches his doctrines; his great point of attack is his imagination; his power is an actual menace in our city. There seems to be no law to suppress or control him. He is more dangerous than cholera or small-pox—yes; he is the mad dog of society and should be silenced, even if it be by a bullet." I am informed that effort was made to have this editor indicted by the Federal statutes, but that no action could be secured.

Still another illustration is an article in the Los Angeles Times, dated November 2, 1911. On page 4 is found a lengthy article entitled "The great combine." From that article I quote the following:

"And soon—it has begun to happen already—the plain citizen from every country will form a combine. Its object will be the suppression of sedition and anarchy in the persons of the professional agitators. Theirs will be a big, powerful, effective but very unostentatious revolt. It will work quickly, surely, silently. * * *

"The first thing the plain-citizen combine will accomplish will be the quiet removal of these gentlemen. They won't be blown up; they will just quietly disappear from human ken. There will be a little inquiry at first, but it will die down ever so quickly, for of all people in the world, the professional agitator depends entirely upon his presence and his glib tongue to maintain any sort of interest or influence in his followers. * * *

"The idea of the plain-citizen combine is not being mouthed abroad and it is not seeking members or subscriptions, but it is growing rapidly nevertheless, and it is a very real and tangible thing.

"With the itch removed, the great disease of unrest will soon be cured and the world will settle down for another half century."

In the omitted portion of that article the editor makes it plain that the kind of people he would have quietly killed are men like Mr. Kier Hardie, of England. Mr. Harrison Gray Otis, of the Los Angeles Times, was never arrested for such publications.

The Appeal to Reason has from time to time published other similar articles suggesting violation against Socialists. These articles, of course, come from entirely orthodox sources, and were never prosecuted.

I shall now call attention to the very different way in which radical agitators are treated when their enthusiasm exceeds the boundary of calm, dispassionate discussion. I will first call attention to the case of one Ludobico Commnita. Sometime during the close of President Roosevelt's administration this man was publishing a radical paper at Paterson, N. J. He is an anarchist in his social theories, and, of course, was much of a thorn in the flesh of the operators of silk mills in Paterson. At the time in question he published in his Italian paper an article which it was charged justified arson and murder. I have never seen the article nor a translation of it. At that time there was no statute prohibiting the sending of such matters by mail. The postmaster excluded it and referred the matter to Washington. The Attorney General furnished a written opinion to the President of the United States declaring that no statute justified the exclusion of that paper from the mail, but expressed the opinion that no court of equity would give the publisher any relief, even if his paper were excluded without warrant of law. Thereupon President Roosevelt concluded that he had both power and authority for excluding it, and it was excluded from the mail. Subsequently he asked and received from Congress legislation which would legalize such exclusion in the future. It was under this legislation that the Socialists have endeavored in vain to secure the prosecution of those who advocate violence against them.

Still later Mr. Commnita was arrested under a State statute for the publication of the article above referred to. I am not informed as to what the result of that prosecution has been. My impression is that it has not yet terminated. He was not arrested under that warrant until a couple of years after the occurrence. Another of Mr. Commnita's difficulties arose out of a picture which was exhibited in his shop widow and published by him. The indictment in that case was truly amusing, and I herewith present it in the record:

"Court of Oyer and Terminer in and for the county of Passaic. September term, A. D. nineteen hundred and twelve.

"Passaic County, to wit: The jurors of the State of New Jersey in and for the body of the county of Passaic, upon their oath, present, that Ludobico Commnita & Firmino Gallo, late of the city of Paterson, in the county of Passaic aforesaid, on the nineteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and twelve, with force and arms, at the city aforesaid, in the county aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of this court, being wicked, malicious, and evil-disposed persons, and contriving and intending the peace of the State to disturb and to bring the Government of the Kingdom of Italy into great hatred and contempt and to incite and move the citizens of this State into hostility and hatred toward the said Government of the Kingdom of Italy and the law and constitution thereof, did at the city aforesaid and county aforesaid, bring and introduce and exhibit in public and circulate and aid and assist in bringing, introducing, exhibiting, and circulating a certain sketch or picture on paper, whereon was drawn and delineated certain structures partly in the form of and suggesting a gallows, and hanging from the cross beams thereof the habiliments of soldiers of the Turkish Army of Tripoli, and having around the neck of each of said forms and figures a rope by which the said forms and figures were suspended from said cross beams projecting out at right angles from the tops of said structures in the posture of convicted men undergoing capital punishment for crime; and the foot of two of said structures suggesting the gallows is drawn and delineated a picture in the form of a woman bowed down with grief and sorrow; and that also thereon was drawn and sketched two certain other figures resembling and portraying a male and female, the male figure being in likeness similitude of the King of Italy, and the female figure having the dress and marks thereon of the Red Cross nurse, and said figures being represented in the attitude of friendliness and intimacy and joyfully promenading together about the field where the said forms of men were hanging from said structures wholly indifferent to the pain and suffering to which said men in the grief and sorrow that is suggested by the forms of the women weeping at the foot of the said two structures on either side of said picture or sketch, and that was also written on a paper attached to the said picture or sketch the words 'Civiltà Italiana in Tripolitania,' meaning 'Italian civility in Tripoli,' and meaning that the said forms of men that were exhibited as hanging from said structures were prisoners of war captured by the army of the Italian Government in the war with the Turkish Government in Tripoli, and indicating the cruel and inhuman treatment of the Italian Government toward soldiers of the enemy taken captive and held as prisoners of war, with intent to incite, promote, and encourage hostility and opposition and the destruction and extermination of the Government of the Kingdom of Italy, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace of their State of government and dignity of the same.

" MARSHALL DUNN,
" Prosecutor for the Pleas.

" Witness :

" CARLO IMPARATO."

For this offense Communita was required to furnish a bail bond of $2,000, in default of which he remained many months in jail. A speedy trial was then denied him unless he would waive a jury trial. Later a bail bond was furnished, and the last information I had upon the subject the case had not yet been brought to trial. Evidently this indictment and the other were designed only to drive him out of Paterson—at least that is the impression among his friends and others in that city. This last prosecution of Communita finds a seeming justification under the following statute:

" Laws of New Jersey, 1902 act, page 405, chapter 133.

"A supplement to an act entitled 'An act for the punishment of crimes' (revision of 1908), approved June fourteenth, one thousand and eight hundred and ninety-eight.

" Be it enacted by the senate and general assembly of the State of New Jersey: 1. Any person who shall, in public or private, by speech, writing, printing, or by any other mode or means advocate the subversion and destruction by force of any and all government, or attempt by speech, writing, printing, or in any other way whatsoever to incite or abet, promote, or encourage hostility or opposition to any and all government, shall be guilty of a high misdemeanor, and punished by a fine not exceeding two thousand dollars, or imprisonment at hard labor not exceeding fifteen years, or both."

Next I come to a case of seditious libel in which the Pennsylvania court held that, although no statute of Pennsylvania covered the case at issue, yet, in spite of the constitutional provisions guaranteeing freedom of speech and press, the old common-law crime of seditious libel was in force in the State of Pennsylvania. In this matter the court followed a precedent made in 1838 where a royalist was convicted for an extreme vituperative denunciation of the American form of government. The decision in that case is given in Republica v. Joseph Denny (4 Yeates, p. 267). This case has never been followed since 1808, and was resurrected only because of the case of the Steel Trust in Pennsylvania. Here I offer in evidence a copy of the indictment in the case of the Commonwealth v. McCarty and others, contained in a pamphlet called The Free-Press Persecution, and beginning at page 9 of that pamphlet and ending at page 24:

"Commonwealth of Pennsylvania v. C. H. McCarty, F. M. Hartman, Charles McKeever, Evan Evans, William J. White.

"COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,

"County of Lawrence, city of New Castle, ss:

"Before me, the subscriber, O. H. P. Green, alderman in said city and ex officio justice of the peace in said county, personally came Joseph Gilmore, chief of police of said city, who being duly sworn according to law on his oath says that on and continuously since the first day of July, A. D. 1909, and to the present time, a large number of former workmen and employees of the American Sheet and Tin Plate Company have been on strike in said county, and strike conditions have prevailed during such period of time in said county and in the vicinity of the mills and manufacturing plants of said company situate in said city of New Castle, in that among other things the said American Sheet and Tin Plate Company undertook and proceeded during said period to run and operate said mills and plants, and for that purpose hired, employed, and placed therein other employees and workmen, and many of the former employees and workmen of said company and their associates then on strike, by individual and organized action, undertook and proceeded to interfere with, obstruct, and prevent such operation of said mills and plants by intimidation, menaces, and personal violence to such new employees and workmen in said mills; so that in the vicinity of said mills and in the district and territory wherein said former employees frequented and resided, the personal safety of men and women was continuously imperiled and threatened, and the public peace and general tranquillity of the people was constantly threatened and often disturbed and broken; and during said time the men so on strike established picket stations at or near the entrance to the respective mills of said company and guarded and patrolled certain streets and sections of the city in the vicinity of said mills with intent and purpose to deter and prevent other persons from going to and from said mills and from accepting or continuing employment therein.

"That during the period aforesaid the persons continuing to work in said mills or plants, and going to work therein after such strike begun, were frequently shot, stabbed, beaten, assaulted, spat upon, and insulted on the streets and highways in said city and county, were followed to their dwelling houses by hooting, jeering mobs, and their dwelling houses were frequently struck by stones and other missiles by persons so on strike and their associates, aiders, abettors, and confederates, and by words, taunts, and jeers were incited to anger and resentment and to personal resistance and redress by the persons remaining on strike, their aiders, abettors, and confederates, to the great and imminent danger of riots, uprising, and general defiance of the law and breach of the peace, and to the large destruction of life and property.

"Wherefore it became and was necessary for the officers charged with the duty of maintaining and preserving peace and good order in the community and in the neighborhood and vicinity of said mills and plants to use unusual and extraordinary means and methods in discharging their duties, and necessary reinforcements were procured by the appointment of deputy sheriffs and special police officers and by the presence of members of the State police constabulary; and it further became and was necessary to procure an order from the court of common pleas of said county, dated October 6, 1909, restraining persons so on strike and their associates, aiders, abettors, and confederates from calling persons at work in said mills or seeking employment therein scabs and other vile and opprobrious names, from jeering, taunting, and insulting them, from carrying and exhibiting clubs, firearms, and knives; making demonstrations or doing any matter or thing tending to excite, scare, frighten, or intimidate persons employed or seeking employment in said mills and plants, and from otherwise interfering with or disturbing the peace and order of said community to the end that the rights of persons and property therein should be preserved and protected, which said injunction has been continued in force to this present date.

"That John W. Waddington was sheriff of the said county of Lawrence from the first day of July, 1909, to the 3rd day of January, 1910, when his term of office expired. Since the date last mentioned Robert H. Whaley has been and is the sheriff of said county.

"That Harry J. Lusk was mayor of said city of New Castle on the first day of July, 1909, and since that date has been and now is mayor of said city.

"That Joseph Gilmore was chief of police of said city of New Castle in said county on the first day of July, A. D. 1909, and since that date has been and now is chief of police of said city.

"That from the first day of July, 1909, it was and has continued to be the duty of the said several officers to preserve and maintain peace and good order within the said city and county and in the vicinity of said mills and plants and prevent and suppress the commission of crimes, violations of the law, breaches of the peace, and violations of the ordinances of said city, upon the streets, highways, and public places therein, and leading to and from the vicinity of said mills and plants, and in the discharge of said duty a large number of special police officers were duly appointed by the proper authorities and were present to assist therein, and it became and was the duty of all persons to whom said writ of injunction was directed to respect and obey the same, and the duty of all persons to respect and obey the authority of all said officers and their deputies engaged in keeping and maintaining public peace and good order in said community, and at all times to respect and obey the law and its duly constituted authorities, yet so it is that from July 1, 1909, continuously to the present time many persons in said city and county and particularly in the vicinity of said mills and plants have continued to disregard and violate the laws of this Commonwealth, the ordinances of said city of New Castle, and the injunction issued by our said court; that there have been frequent breaches of the peace, rioting, unlawful assemblage of the streets and highways, and open resistance to law of government as well as the courts.

"That C. H. McCarty, F. M. Hartman, Charles McKeever, Evan Evans, and William J. White, all of the county aforesaid, being wicked, malicious, seditious, and evil-disposed persons and greatly disaffected toward the Constitution and Government and laws of the United States and of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and the several officers hereinbefore named, who were and are charged with the administration and execution of the laws and the maintenance of the peace in said city and county and most unlawfully, wicked, and maliciously devising, designing, and intending, as much as in them lay, to bring our said Constitution and Government and the administration of the laws and the duly constituted officers thereof, employed in the enforcement and execution of said laws, into great public hatred and contempt among the residents and citizens thereof, and to alienate and withdraw from our said Government and its officials the love and affection, true and due obedience, fidelity and allegiance of the citizens thereof; deliberately designing to unloosen the sacred bond of union, to unhinge the minds of citizens, and to produce popular discontent with the exercise of power by the known constituted authorities; and wickedly and seditiously to disturb the peace and tranquillity of our said Government and this Commonwealth, to stir up and incite discontent and sedition among the citizens thereof, and to wickedly seduce and encourage the citizens of our said Commonwealth to resist and oppose the government thereof, the administration and execution of its laws, and the orders and decrees of its courts.

"At the city of New Castle in said county of Lawrence and State of Pennsylvania with force and arms unlawfully, falsely, wickedly, maliciously, and seditiously did write and publish and cause and procure to be written and published certain scandalous, false, malicious, inflammable, and seditious matter of and concerning the Constitution and laws of the United States and of this Commonwealth and of and concerning the duly constituted officers and agents of the government employed in the administration of said government and its laws, and engaged in an effort to preserve the peace and to enforce and execute the laws and the decrees of the court, in a certain paper entitled The Free Press, published and distributed in the city and county aforesaid, between the respective dates hereinafter set forth, according to the tenor and effect following; that is to say, to wit:

"On the 31st day of July, A. D. 1909, in a part of a certain article entitled 'Who are these scabs?' the following:

"'From this the working class should take a lesson. Here it is: Let us make our own laws. Make them right from the shop. Never mind whether or not they will conflict with the laws of the political State of to-day. If we are strong enough in the shop—in other words, if we are organized into one big union—we are able to defy all the capitalists' laws and paralyze the industry of the country to such an extent that they will not be able to send their armed men to shoot us down; moreover, until we are organized into that kind of an organization our condition will continue to become more and more intolerable.'

"And in a part of a certain article entitled 'Call out the independent mills,' the following:

"'But they may say that the contracts agreed upon at the last convention interferes. Contracts, hell! Is the "sacredness of contract" of more importance than the welfare of the tin workers and their wives and children? Must we remain out and starve, pitting our empty stomachs up against the millions of the mill owners, and perhaps go back defeated, as we have done time and again, because of a miserable agreement?

"'Damn the contracts! Contracts are no good, anyway. The capitalist class only stand by them when it is convenient to do so. They don't care for laws of any kind when laws interfere with their bloodthirsty hunger for profits.'

"On the 28th day of August, A. D. 1909, in a part of a certain article entitled 'Call 'em out,' the following:

"'Again the Free Press says: "Call out the independent (?) mills!" The chances of victory and the welfare of the tin workers and their families are of more concern than the honor (?) there is in keeping the most sacred agreement ever signed by commanders of two opposing forces.

"'Break the contract! Do as they have done in Sweden. Break any written instrument that interferes with the workers gaining a point of vantage for their class!

"'Listen, boys: "Any line of action that will advance the interests of the working class is right; and any line of action that will not advance the interests of the working class is wrong."

"'Read it again and think it over!

"'Therefore, break the contracts! Call out the independent(?) mills! Then your entreaties to the nonunion mills will not be in vain. They will then see the tremendous power of the workers and, being already imbued with discontent, they will heed the war cry for united action.

"'We must recognize that this is a class war between the class that owns the mills and the class that works in the mills, and the earlier we learn that the sooner we will become class conscious and act as our material interests direct.

"'Swing into battle all the reserve forces! Stop the entire sheet production of every mill! Make the buyers on one side of the employers clamor for their orders to be filled and the men on the other side of the employers, the workers, ready to work when they have an equal right to organize for their protection as well as the trust masters.'

"And in a part of a certain article entitled 'Conservative or radical? A wage slave's meditation,' the following:

"'With me it is a war—"war to the knife; knife to the hilt." I may go down, but what of it? Haven't millions whose blood was just as warm, whose flesh was just as pulsating, and whose instincts were just as acute as mine gone down in the struggle?

"'Yes; I believe in force. I believe that, under the present insane system, might is right and weakness the only wrong. I believe that this has been the case since my hairy ancestors left their dwellings in the trees and came out into the open field with club or rock in hand, or paw, to attack and struggle with and conquer the big beasts of the plains and prairies. I believe that the motor power of civilization has been that of force—blind, cruel, and barbaric force so far.'

"On the 11th day of September, A. D. 1909, in a part of a certain article entitled 'This is a big fight,' the following:

"'We notice, too, that several old independent mills that have been idle for years have started up. What does that mean? It means that they are going to make more tin. Union men are going there to work, too, and that will be all right, the heads of the organizations will say. Damn it! I often sit and wonder how the poor "work ox" can be so thickheaded.

"'This is a big fight, and every weapon at our disposal should be used. There is no mercy on the part of the masters. They will grind us down and are doing it. They believe in force, and they apply it at every turn.

"'We have the force, and we have the numbers. We are able to win this strike to-morrow if we would only get together in the right kind of an organization. Until we do that we will be at their mercy.'

"On the 25th day of September, A. D. 1909, in a part of a certain article entitled 'Obey the law,' the following:

"'Damn the laws that must be backed up by guns and clubs and thugs.

"'At any rate, law is the rope with which the working class has been tied by king, priest, and parasite down the centuries. Time was when the poor workingman was driven to his task with lash and club and forced to toil from sunrise until dark for a merciless master, and if they uttered their discontent they were tortured and damned. And this was law! The laborer was despised and spat upon by the very ones who fattened on his misery, and it was called law and must be sacredly obeyed.

"'Throughout the ages the owner of the bent back and the knotty hands has forced his weary way with one hope and one privilege, and that was that some day his burden would be lightened. So far it has been, but that is when he is under the dandelions.

"'The working class has had one privilege, however, and that is the privilege of reproducing their kind, and often that privilege has been violated by the lustful idle class in pursuit of pleasure, to the shame and degradation of the toiling mass of workers.

"'This, too, was law.

"'The working class has struggled to what little liberty it has against tremendous odds. It has always had the numbers and the power, but that power has been divided. Moreover, all that it has gained so far it has gained in contradiction to the law of the masters. And all laws are the masters' laws under the rulership of the political state.

"'Throughout the centuries the workers have been crying out to you who have had all the advantages of education to help them get a few of the good things that their own labor made possible. And you have always given them a ghoulish grin and the advice to obey the law—the master's law.

"'No laws were ever intended to protect labor and never will be so long as the workers are not the absolute dictators of them.

"'If the working class waits to win industrial freedom by obeying capitalists' laws they will be working twelve hours a day in hell a million years from now.'

"On the 18th day of December, A. D. 1909, in a certain article, entitled 'Unspeakable outrage—Strikers jailed for simply walking the streets,' the following:

"'Twenty-four of the most substantial and useful of the citizens of New Castle are lying in jail in default of a $25 fine because they wouldn't be ordered off the streets like dogs by the acting lackeys of the Steel Trust; that is, the police and the company bulls, including the unspeakable "Big Liz."

"'These men have lived here, some of them, nearly all their lives; they have built homes, some of them have reared families; they have paid taxes; they have built the very streets which they are ordered to keep off like so many slaves under a taskmaster's whip.

"'Now, they are in jail because they didn't jump when they were spoken to, and sneak away to their homes as though they were felons guilty of some crime for which they dare not stand erect or walk the streets of their home town in sight of all men.

"'Is liberty dead? Is America Russia? Have Bunker Hill and Gettysburg been fought in vain? Are we to be henceforth the bound and gagged slaves of the Steel Trust, driven at will like cattle off the public streets? Is life so dear or peace so sweet as to be purchased at the price of these insults and indignities? Are all the traditions of the English-speaking world to be flouted, spit upon, and dragged in the mire? If not, action, immediate action, direct action, drastic action, at once, is necessary.

"'The offense for which these 24 strikers were jailed by the unspeakable incubus who now infest the mayor's chair on Tuesday last was this: A number of them were walking on the street, not so far from the Shenango mill, where they had formerly worked. They were walking there, peaceably, talking quietly, minding their own business. Most natural thing in the world for striking workmen to drift toward the scene of their former employment. Any man naturally has a tendency when not otherwise engaged to revisit the place where he has formerly worked, or at least the neighborhood. The power of association and former habits naturally draw him. But these men weren't even trespassing. They weren't on the company's property. They were on the streets—the streets that had been built and improved with their own tax money.

"'Along came the police. "Move on. Get out of here. Shoo, fly. Strikers not allowed to stand on the streets. Sheriff's orders." Just as one might order a troublesome cat-or dog out of the way.

“‘Back of this action of the police are the orders of Waddington, and back of Waddington Mayor Lusk's court, and back of Mayor Lusk the legislature and judicial machinery of this capitalist-cursed Government, and back of it all the power of the gouty plutocracy who have thieved and continue to thieve the earnings of the common people.

“‘What rights has a workingman in law courts? Absolutely none. Why should he have any respect for them or any trust in them? Not a ghost of a reason for it. They talk about equality and justice and patriotism, and all that, but they exist for only one purpose, to help the robber class go through the pockets of the wage earner and make a cleaner and a better job of it. “The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau.”

“‘The working class must take matters into their own hands. In New Castle there is only one line of tactics that will save the day now, and that is the tactics that are now winning out in Spokane. Openly resist the despotic orders of this barbarous sheriff and go to jail not by the dozens merely, nor by the scores, but by the hundreds. Don't be cowards and pay fines or let others pay them for you. Be a man and go to jail. As fast as one batch are run in let another crew take their places. Fill the jails to overflowing. Make them improvise new jails. Make the ruling class feed you while you are on strike. Let the wives and children of the jailed strikers march in a body to the office of the poor commissioner and demand relief. Demand it in tones so loud as to be heard. See that you get it. Make the ruling class feed you.

“‘Don't hire lawyers. Damn them; they stink of blood money—the most of them. Don't bother about having witnesses called and going through the stupid and dreary formalities of examination and cross-examination, and all that truck. The power is in your own hands when you act. And the line of action just now is simply to line up, defy the sheriff's orders, go to jail, make the ruling class feed you till they're sick of it. Hit them in the pocketbook. That's where their heart lies.

“‘In such a fight as this it is no time to ask whether a man belongs to this labor organization or that. It is a working-class fight. For a workingman who has a drop of red blood in his veins there is only one place where he can be found, and that is standing shoulder to shoulder with the strikers in resisting as insolent, as autocratic, as despotic, as corrupt, as conscienceless a municipal despotism as ever cursed the earth.

“‘Come on; let's be men.’

“‘On the 1st day of January, A. D. 1910, in a certain article, entitled ‘Bishton in jail for debt—Revival of ancient custom,’ the following:

“‘At this very moment two workingmen, Edward Vaughn and John Bishton, are lying in jail for no offense whatever and with no charge against them but for being beaten up and assaulted by bulls and scabs.

“‘Civil wars have been fought and violent revolutions have been precipitated for a great deal less than this. It is difficult to write this matter up for the press. One's blood so boils at the mere recital of the facts. But here they are:

“‘Take the case of Edward Vaughn. He had been sick for six weeks during the latter part of the summer, and feeling a little better one Sunday in August strolled out with two companions to get a breath of fresh air, hoping it would do him good. While walking down Mahoning Avenue they were suddenly confronted by one Arthur Davis, one of the company's bulls, who drew two revolvers and ordered them back.

“‘One would naturally think there was some remedy at law for an outrage of this kind, and that was what Vaughn thought, too. Thought he was living in a free and civilized country. Thought the laws and Constitution of Pennsylvania and the United States were something more than a hollow lie. He found out differently. He brought action in law against the ruffian who ordered him off the street at the point of a drawn revolver, only to have his case thrown out by the grand jury and himself assessed $27.54 in costs, for default of which he is lying in jail now. His case wasn't even allowed to come before the judge, and he is slammed in jail for opening his mouth so much as to find fault. He can be kept there three months, and then it will require insolvent proceedings on his part to gain his freedom. If he has any property that can be seized to pay those costs even then after he has laid in jail.

“‘That's law. That's law courts. Is there anything for the workingman in either? Answer: Yes or no.

“‘The grand jury that threw Vaughn's case out of court was mainly composed of farmers, and it is farmer's sons and relatives (damn them) who to a great extent are scabbing at the mills. It would be interesting to know if the members of this grand jury had any relatives scabbing, and the Free Press intends to find out later on.

"The case of John Bishton is, if it were possible, more outrageous still. Bishton was assaulted on Long Avenue during the month of September by two company bulls, Pelton and Smith, and his head so badly beaten in that he had to be taken home in a buggy. This Smith is the same fellow who shot Theodore Otto in the breast, practically crippling him for life, and is now in jail himself for jumping his bail in the Bishton case. Bishton's brother brought action against these two ruffians, with result that the case went against him, of course. And the costs, over $74, were placed on John Bishton, the wounded man. He, too, is now lying in jail, and can be kept there for three months, or, for that matter, indefinitely, unless he institutes insolvency proceedings. So also his property can be distressed to pay the costs awarded against him because his brother complained in law courts on his behalf.

"The Vaughn case stands for the proposition that a workingman on strike dare not complain in law courts of any treatment that he receives at the hands of the bulls and thugs of the employing class. The Bishton case stands for the proposition that his relatives dare not open their mouths, either. In either case he can be slammed into jail and kept there indefinitely.

"Workingmen of New Castle! These are not things that are happening in Russia; they are happening here. Vaughn and Bishton are lying in jail up on the hill now. No relief is to be had from law courts or from any other of the institutions of the capitalist class. Labor must take power into its own hands.

"We are engaged in a class struggle bitter as death. It's war; war to the knife; knife to the hilt. We must have done with paltering and with compromises. The working class must get together in one big union that will take the whole wage-earning class and so be competent to give battle to the industrially organized employing class and the pliant tools of the law-making and law-executing officials from the President down. They are all our enemies—all of them. Their country is not our country; their laws are not our laws; their servants are our oppressors. Our hope is not in their institutions, but in the industrial organization of the working class, which we ourselves must build."

"On the 15th day of January, A. D. 1910, in a part of a certain article entitled 'Use the ballot,' the following:

"To the end of informing the workers of the position we take on this most vital of all questions to our professed constituency, let the Socialist Party definitely specify that its administrative officers wherever elected will use the police power in their control to do two things:

"Preserve order, prevent violence of all kinds, guaranteeing protection to the property involved by a thorough patrol of it inside and out.

"2. Arresting of all strike breakers and private police during any strike, and the prohibition of any person going upon a job to work while a strike is pending between an employer and his employees."

"On the 29th day of January, A. D. 1910, in a certain article entitled 'War on women,' the following:

"Our brave officials, having waged successful war on unoffending workingmen, are now showing their mettle by attacking women. Twenty-four wives, mothers, and sisters of strikers were served with writs to show cause why they should not be brought into court for violating the sacred injunction.

"The A. S. & T. P. Co. accuses the women of throwing epithets, snowballs, stones, bricks, and other missiles at the scabs employed by this company.

"Whether the women are guilty we can not say; but we know they ought to be. Women who stay in their "proper sphere" and maintain a ladylike demeanor while their helpmates are in the thick of a bitter fight for bread are unworthy the name of woman. Let those who will admire the females whose highest ambition is to ape the 'eminently respectable and conventionally proper' ladies of the ruling class; but we have much more respect for the class-conscious women who use every weapon in their power—even such feeble and ineffective weapons as snowballs and epithets—in defense of their class."

"In contempt of the Constitution and laws of the United States and this Commonwealth, and its institutions, agents, officers, and courts constituted, employed, or appointed for the administration of said Government to the evil example of all others and against the peace and dignity of this Commonwealth.

"Complainant therefore prays and desires that a warrant may issue and the aforesaid defendants, C. H. McCarty, F. M. Hartman, Charles McKeever, Evan Evans, William J. White, may be arrested and held to answer the charge of libel, and further deponent saith not.

"JOSEPH GILMORE,
"Chief of Police.

"Sworn to and subscribed before me this 5th day of March, A. D. 1910.

"O. H. P. GREEN, Alderman."

My recollection is that in that case there were several trials, in the first of which the jury disagreed. At the last trial the jury found the defendants not guilty, and penalized them to the extent of the cost of several prosecutions for being not guilty. It seems that such anomalous procedure by which an innocent man may be punished is justified in the statutes of Pennsylvania. In the meantime these defendants continued their criticism of the court, and in consequence were indicted for criminal contempt of court. Here again a precedent was made. This was the first prosecution of the kind that had ever occurred in the State of Pennsylvania—at least so it was claimed. On this indictment the defendants were fined. In the meantime their financial resources had been exhausted, and their agitation had resulted in carrying the election in New Castle, Pa., for the Socialist Party, and this they felt was a sufficient vindication. In the meantime, however, they made very bitter complaint over the fact that the New Castle Republican, one of their rival papers, had published an article entitled "A call to arms," which very plainly was designed to incite to violence against the Socialists, but no prosecution for that article was ever had either under the precedent establishing seditious libel or under the postal laws which penalized the advocacy of some crimes through the mails.

Another case of The United States v. Margaret H. Sanger. Margaret Sanger was the author of the articles in the New York Call, to which I have already referred, and which were excluded from the mails. After she became the editor of a little paper called the Woman Rebel, No Gods, No Masters, in its issue for July, 1914, she published an article entitled "A defense of assassination," by Herbert A. Thorpe. This article reads as follows:

"It is generally agreed that lower forms of life must give place to higher types, and when the pioneer of civilization makes his way into the forest, he must of necessity destroy the man-killing animals living therein. Exterminating warfare is also waged against the savage members of the human race wherever they oppose the establishment of conditions necessary for the development of the more highly organized types. Of course, where improvement by instruction and subsequent cooperation is possible, this extreme of annihilation need not be practiced, but unless it can be shown that there is room enough on earth for both savage and civilized, the savage must go.

"Having thus indicated the operation of the law of the survival of the fittest, it would seem that we should apply the same treatment accorded to wild animals and savages to those men in civilized countries whose natures still display traits characteristic of the tiger and wolf, and who, owing to the nature of our social fabric, are beyond the reach of correction.

"It is immaterial whether such men are conscious or unconscious of their true natures and the effect of their actions on others. If their position in modern life is an entirely false one, as in the case of the czar or king, this is their misfortune, but, like the savage or wild animal, they should not be permitted to live upon or block the march of the many toward better conditions.

"There is no different, ethically, between killing a man instantly or slowly, overworking or starving him to death, yet those are the conditions imposed upon millions of workers throughout the world to-day, owing to the brutality of the employing and official classes, and their ability to control large armies of ignorant police and soldiers to intimidate the workers whenever a clash occurs between capital and labor.

"Another weapon used by these undeveloped czars of industry, whose egoism runs riot, is to dictate to their legislative hirelings what laws shall be enacted, or, if any exist that balk their selfish desires, to coerce their judicial puppets so to interpret them as to nullify the beneficial effect sometimes intended.

"The point I wish to bring out is this: That since the great mass of people are by force of circumstances unable to use the same weapons employed by the better educated and privileged class they are justified in using whatever other means of defense may be at their disposal, such as the strikes, boycott, or assassination.

"The assassination of tyrants has been practiced throughout history in all parts of the world, and in regard to nihilism in Russia, Wendell Phillips has this to say: 'Nihilism is the righteous and honorable resistance of a people crushed under an iron rule. Nihilism is evidence of life. Nihilism is the last weapon of victims choked and manacled beyond all other means of making the oppressor tremble. God means that the unjust power shall be insecure—and every move of the giant prostrate in chains, whether it be to lift a single dagger or stir a city's revolts, is a lesson in justice. One might well tremble for the future of the race if such despotism could exist without provoking the bloodiest resistance. Honor nihilism, since it redeems human nature from the suspicion of being utterly vile, made up only of the heartless oppressors and contented slaves. Every line of our history, every interest of civilization bids us rejoice when the tyrant grows pale and the slave rebellious. We can not but pity the suffering of any human being, however, richly deserved, but such pity must not confuse our moral sense. Humanity gains!'

"The attention of our editors and judges called particularly to the following from the same speech:

"'I know what reform needs, and all it needs, in a land where discussion is free, the press untrammelled, and where public halls protect debate. In such a land he is doubly and trebly guilty, who, except in some most extreme cases, disturbs the sober rule of law and order.'

"History shows that individuals can be so highly organized and so sensitive to human suffering as to be irresistably impelled to seek relief by killing the person responsible, directly or indirectly, for the suffering imposed, and when the assassin merely obeys an uncontrollable natural impulse to eliminate destructive oppression, it seems to me that such killing is a high expression of the individual's outraged better nature.

"Governments, of course, exercise their power to restrain and punish common criminals by imprisonment and death, but since the average intelligence does not perceive that there are many more ways through which scores of less apparent and more insidious crimes go unpunished, stealing and murdering other than by pocket picking and throat cutting, and it is left to the more discerning to denounce the greedy commercial and official octopuses that prey upon society from behind legal barricades.

"There is no reason why those members of society possessing highly social and sympathetic qualities should not attempt to create an environment suitable to their natures, and if the removal of the tiger, the savage, the political or industrial tyrant, conduces to that end, such removal becomes a necessary duty.

"If assassination has failed to achieve very much in the way of reform, it may be not because the method is wrong, but because it has not been practiced persistently enough. Where physical force is employed, numbers mean strength; and while one may fail to produce substantial results, one hundred will succeed. The American Revolution is a case in point. If we concede the right to a group to resist tyranny or injustices by violence, we must also concede the same right to the individual.

"It must not be supposed from the foregoing that I have any scheme of wholesale slaughter in mind. My idea is that if during an industrial crisis, such as a strike or lockout, where sometimes the way to a settlement is blocked by the stubborn selfishness of a single man, it might prove a good lesson to the employing class if such an obstacle were promptly and effectively removed."

For this she was indicated under the Federal postal laws and her case is still pending. The argument in this article was not very unlike the article of Prof. Gunton on "Might in the true arbiter of right."

Another interesting case under a State statute which penalizes all publications tending to create disrespect for law is the case of the State of Washington v. Jay Fox. This man received a jail sentence for publishing the following editorial:

"THE NUDE AND THE PRUDES.

"Clothing was made to protect the body, not to hide it. The mind that associates impurity with the human body is itself impure. To the humanitarian, the idealist, the human body is divine, 'the dwelling place of the soul,' as the old poets sang.

"To the coarse, half-civilized barbarian, steeped in a mixture of superstition and sensualism, the sight of a nude body suggests no higher thoughts, no nobler feelings, than those which the sight of one animal of the lower order of creation produces in another.

"The vulgar mind sees its own reflection in everything it views. Pollution can not escape from pollution, and the polluted mind that sees its own reflection in the nude body of a fellow being, and arises in early morning to enjoy the vulgar feast, and then calls on the law to punish the innocent victims whose clean bodies aroused the savage instincts, is not fit company for civilized people and should be avoided.

"These reflections are based on an unfortunate occurrence that took place recently in Home.

"Home is a community of free spirits, who came out into the woods to escape the polluted atmosphere of priest-ridden, conventional society. One of the liberties enjoyed by homeites was the privilege to bathe in evening dress, or with merely the clothes nature gave them, just as those chose.

"No one went rubbernecking to see which suit a person wore who sought the purifying waters of the bay. Surely it was nobody's business. All were sufficiently pure minded to see no vulgarity, no suggestion of anything vile or indecent, in the thought or the sight of nature's masterpiece uncovered.

"But eventually a few prudes got into the community and proceeded in the brutal, unneighborly way of the outside world to suppress the people's freedom. They had four persons arrested on the charge of "indecent exposure." One woman, the mother of two small children, was sent to jail. The one man arrested will also serve a term in prison. And the perpetrators of this vile action wonder why they are being boycotted.

"The well-merited indignation of the people has been aroused. Their liberty has been attacked. The first step in the way of subjecting the community to all the persecution of the outside has been taken. If this was let go without resistance, the progress of the prudes would be easy.

"But the foolish people who came to live among us only because they found they could take advantage of our cooperation and buy goods cheaper here than elsewhere have found they got into a hornet's nest.

"Two of the stores have refused to trade with them, and the members avoid them in every way.

"To be sure, not all have been brought to see the importance of the situation. But the propaganda of those who do will go on, and the matter of avoiding these enemies in our midst will be pushed to the end.

"The lines will be drawn, and those who profess to believe in freedom will be put to the test of practice.

"There is no possible ground on which a libertarian can escape taking part in this effort to protect the freedom of home. There is no halfway. Those who refuse to aid the defense are aiding the other side. For those who want liberty and will not fight for it are parasites and do not deserve freedom. Those who are indifferent to the invasion, who can see an innocent woman torn from the side of her children and packed off to jail and are not moved to action, can not be counted among the rebels of authority. Their place is with the enemy.

"The boycott will be pushed until these invaders will come to see the brutal mistake of their action and so inform the people."

Other circumstances in which the forms of law are being used to suppress agitators are illustrated by the case of one Prashner. This man was in the free-speech fight at San Diego, Cal. While there with several others he was arrested for deportation, and was the only one who was to be deported from the port of New York. While there the matter came to the attention of Simon O. Pollock, the attorney for the Political Refugees' Defense League. He applied for a writ of habeas corpus, in spite of much discouragement from Federal authorities. Prashner's case had no evidence whatever to support a deportation; in fact, it was so devoid of evidence that the district attorney and the authorities at Washington flatly refused to advocate the deportation in court. Prashner was released under writ of habeas corpus.

Another kind of complaint which is made against the Federal courts is illustrated in the trial and conviction of a number of men for conspiracy to interfere with the carrying of the mails. These men, 18 in number, were drivers of mail wagons employed by private contractors who performed this work for the Government. They were all tried together and all convicted of the same offense. They were organized in a union. Four of the 18 were officers of the union. When sentence was passed these four officers, instead of being commended for their superior intelligence and class interest, were given an additional penalty, with a lecture from the judge to the effect that there was no place for labor unions in any work that might interfere with the performance of public functions.

I have now exhibited some of the ways in which our courts lawlessly invade freedom of speech and press when prompted by a desire to suppress an agitator. The penalties are not so severe as formerly, but the jail hazard of the occupation of being an agitator is much greater than ever. Our courts have held that the old intellectual crimes existing at the time of the American Revolution are still in force in spite of our guaranties of freedom of speech and of the press.

In addition to this, the judges have drawn upon their imagination to assert the existence at common law of the intellectual crime of "obscene libel." (See Obscene Literature and Constitutional Law, chap. 3.) In addition, there is an abundance of legislation in vast extensions of the common-law intellectual crimes. Besides all this, the uncertainty in the criteria of guilt has also been much increased by permitting unlimited speculations about psychologic tendencies.

Quite beyond all this we have the lawless police force, making unlimited arrests of agitators without even the pretense of an unconstitutional statute to support the act. In this wise, Emma Goldman has been arrested and had her meetings stopped about 100 times without pretense of having violated a law. The courts justify such interference solely upon the sensitiveness of a policeman's feverish imagination. (See Goldman, Reyborn, et al., 28 Penn. Dist. Repts., p. 883, and numerous other instances shown before U. S. Commission on Industrial Relations.) Sometimes this police and judicial lawlessness has almost assumed the proportions of an insurrection, when resistance has been offered by the friends of the agitator. Here I refer to the free-speech fights in Spokane and San Diego. The latter I have described with considerable detail in the New York Call, for March 15, 20, 29, and April 5, 1914.

This was sent to a former secretary of this commission. Slightly corrected, another copy will shortly be furnished from an enlarged edition of Free Speech for Radicals.

The Spokane free-speech fight assumed even greater proportions and greater violence than that at San Diego. Less important disturbances of similar character have taken place in Missoula, Duluth, Fresno, Aberdeen (Wash.), Kansas City, Los Angeles, Salt Lake City, Pallsade (Colo.), Grand Junction, Philadelphia, Minneapolis, Minot (N. Dak.), Tarrytown, New York City, and doubtless other places. In all these cases lawless violence was committed on the pretense of supporting law and order. In every case the police authorities more or less openly aided the lawless element in supporting "law and order" by physical violence directed against the agitator with unwelcome ideas.

In all such cases the courts have been either helplessly inactive or they have given the sanction of legal forms and judgment to the lawless proceedings. Of thousands of men who have thus been wrongfully deprived of their constitutional liberties I do not know of one who has ever secured any redress through the courts. Had there been one I believe I would have heard of it, because I have been watching many, if not most, of the sources of such information.

The official and judicial predisposition is always the same and always favors the suppression of new ideals and unpopular allegations of truth. First, it is falsely assumed that streets and parks can not be used so as to permit both public speaking and commercial traffic. Secondly, in the constructive conflict between the transmission of merchandise and the transmission of ideas, the latter always get the worst of it.

It has never yet occurred to a policeman or judge that the transporter of merchandise should be compelled to go around the block in order that public speaking might be uninterrupted. Complaining ideas must always be suppressed rather than have commerce even slightly inconvenienced. No official ever shows any respect for the constitutional guaranty for free speech. The complaining poor have no such right to voice their complaint, that a policeman must respect or which the courts will protect.

The poor are not even allowed to do their own begging. If they ignore the charity-organization monopoly, they are arrested. So sacred is business that even the business of the professional philanthropist must be protected for the sake of his rake-off, even though the hungry suffer while they wait. I am informed that some charitable organizations even insist that a striker's children shall starve unless the striker is willing to submit to the demands of his exploiter.

There is still another way in which this persistent and pernicious official and judicial bias always manifests itself in favor of the privileged ones.

In every incitation to a breach of the peace there are two parties, the person who, intentionally or otherwise, actually or constructively, incites another to a breach of the peace. In this situation if we ignore the guaranties of freedom of speech, the judge, under uncertain laws, may arbitrarily determine whether he will impose the criminal responsibility upon the agitator or upon the person who in consequence actually resorts to a breach of the peace.

If the agitator is a radical, then the police and courts always agree that the speaker is criminally liable for any speech which even, speculatively, and prospectively, may irritate any hypothetical future person to a breach of the peace, even though no crime or overt act actually results. Such a constructive breach of the peace exists only in an hysterical apprehension in the mind of the policeman or of the magistrate.

If, however, the speaker or publisher is defending the legalized injustices and vested wrongs by which our privileged classes prosper, then no matter how violent the language used against the radicals, or how much it tends to incite them to disorder, the speaker or publisher is never arrested. In such a situation if any radicals in the audience are provoked to a violent remonstrance, of course they will be arrested instead of the speaker. If the speaker is a radical and his conservative auditors are provoked to a violent resentment, then the speaker and not his excitable hearers are made the criminals.

Through personal observation and from the testimony of many others I have an extensive acquaintance with facts which justify this generalization. And so, in spite of our guaranties of liberty, a lawless police force, with the assistance of a lawless judiciary, succeeds quite thoroughly in making the criminal law a mere gambling device in which the other fellow can always say to the agitator with certainty, "Heads, I win; tails, you lose."

Whenever it can be made to appear that a choice exists between suppressing an agitator's freedom of speech and the suppression of a possible resultant disturbance of the peace, then it is always freedom of speech that is destroyed. It is as if peace of mind for the exploiting and privileged part of the community was the end and aim of government; peace of mind for them at any cost in empty stomachs for the exploited.

Again, when it is a conflict between the victims and beneficiaries of injustice, and it appears that the situation involves a choice between free speech for vigorous and protesting complaint against economic and industrial injustice on the one hand, and freedom from irritating acquaintance with unpleasant facts and disagreeable remedies, then the police and the courts quite uniformly decide against such freedom to demand justice for the afflicted, and act in favor of the emotionally undisturbed enjoyment of those who can indulge in ostentatious waste.

In the days of chattel slavery we made it a statutory crime to teach the negro to read or write, lest he should become discontented with his lot. Then, as always, the underlying unconscious assumption was that the exploiters of the poor have an inalienable property right in the slavish mental attitude of the exploited ones.

In our present wage slavery a lawless police force and a lawless judiciary accomplish approximately the same end by suppressing the agitator who is bent on intensifying or rationalizing the discontent with the view of promoting a better social order.

THE DISCUSSION OF REMEDIES.

The ordinary man of the street, if free from an obsessing reverence for the courts, will ascribe to graft nearly all judicial actions which he disapproves or fails to understand. Personally, I take no stock in such an explanation, but believe the situation even worse. In saying this I do not mean to pass a moral judgment on the judges. I am thinking only of the consequences. Even if our judges were inclined to be corrupt, the risks are such that the corrupt motive would be operative in only a very few cases. On the other hand, a persistent, conscientious bias will be unconsciously and automatically operative in every case.

The more intelligent workers explain the practical uniformity of judicial decisions in favor of the economically dominant class by attributing them to an unconscious economic determinism, controlling the judicial intelligence. This explanation also lacks adequate breadth. Those who are familiar with recent developments in genetic psychology will be more inclined to explain the judicial prejudices on the basis of infantile intellectual methods. According to this view the prejudices of a judge are largely controlled by emotional associations established during youth and transferred to new situations in which they have little or no application. Here the economic factor becomes one of many determining influences. As to the mental mechanism of these emotional transferences the judges usually are as ignorant as they are of the scientific method. The check of these infantile processes is, therefore, almost impossible for the average judge. Unfortunately these missing factors of intellectual maturity are quite indispensable to an intelligent and impartial judgment and can not be supplied by legislation.

Another group of radical agitators who see the root of all evil in our economic system and the inefficiency of mere voting, have reached the conclusion that the remedy for all our industrial ills lies in organizing the economic might of the workers through one big union. Such persons are already discussing the question of a "law strike," by which they expect to bring such economic pressure to bear upon the beneficiaries and masters of judicial action as will insure justice. Enough experience already exists to give apparent color to the claim that a lawless "judicial discretion" can be controlled through the purse strings of the employing class. In illustration of this "law strike" I quote the following from Syndicalist paper of recent date:

"THE LAW STRIKE.

"The law strike is crude, uncouth, and primitive. As a means to an end for stiffening the ranks of militant labor it has about run its course. What is the law strike? A law strike is a defense of labor in a capitalist court, a case wherein Labor has hired counsel to defend prisoners accused of labor 'crimes.' This is the labor strike in the law courts.

"We have been watching for several years a cool, calculating systematic plan of action on the part of Capital to drag Labor to death through Labor's pocketbook. The amount of money that Labor is enabled to accumulate is pathetically small compared to the enormous sums showered upon judiciary and jury by Capital. Though a case reach national importance, and whole industries and a swarm of friends contribute each according to the limit of its means, a mere handful of capitalists stack mountains of gold by the side of molehills of silver contributed by Labor. This merry game has been going on so long that Labor has become desperately tired with the cards stacked against him.

"The working class has been so thoroughly saturated with bourgeois conceptions of morality, theological conceptions of justice, legalisms, and veneration for law and 'order,' it believes that a question of mythical rights and wrongs can be thrashed out by the keenest and highest-priced lawyers. Each workingman who contributes his little piece of silver thrills with the joy of adding one more stone to batter the hide of Capital.

"So many labor cases have been dragged into the courts, so many calls have been made upon the pocketbooks of the proletaire, that the supply has begun to drip like the running stream drying up in the heat of the sun. Of late years Labor has supplemented the law strike by purely economic tactics. Later we shall see economic pressure also applied. As the law strike wages we shall hear Labor saying, 'Yes; I did it. To hell with justice! No longer, then, shall the militant man become suddenly nonresistant in the presence of the court.

"The law strike, like unto a craft-union strike, shall merge in an economic solidarity. Sabotage shall be applied on the industries, and pressure brought to bear upon fat pocketbooks of plutocracy. Labor shall but need to say, 'Come out of your cell, fellow worker. Not one of ours shall needlessly suffer.' When Labor shall have strongly organized on an industrial basis, free from parliamentary law, legal claptrap, judicial fakery, and capitalistic confidence methods there will be no need of hiring lawyers. That sort of tomfoolery and bourgeois luxury shall be consigned to limbo."

STATEMENT OF MRS. JOHN JEROME ROONEY.

[The Guildon Club, opposed to woman suffrage; founder and honorary president, Mrs. Rossiter Johnson. 45 East Thirty-fourth Street.]

NEW YORK, May 19, 1915.

HON. FRANK P. WALSH,

Chairman Industrial Commission, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: There are two objections to the suggestion of Mrs. Benedict, representing the Congressional Union, made to the Industrial Commission on Monday, May 17, that you make recommendation to Congress in favor of woman suffrage. The first is that this matter is not properly a national, congressional question; it belongs to the States.

Second. We hold that the argument is against woman suffrage on the merits. These merits should be thrashed out between the citizens, men and women, favorable to and opposed to woman suffrage.

The only forum in which this can be done practically and thoroughly is the States. Why should citizens of the States have woman suffrage forced upon them by Congress if a majority of the citizens in these States are opposed? Again, the way to settle that point is by election in the States.

The law, as a general rule, is the expression of the social consciousness at any given time. It may not be a perfect expression, but that means that it is only a human expression; a change of social conscience or sense inevitably works a change in the law, or, to the same effect, the law becomes obsolete and unenforceable.

Women are more effective as nonpartisans in forming this social sense, and also are more powerful as nonpartisans in framing it into law. Partisanship will weaken and divide this great social force of women. Instead of being divided into antagonistic political classes women should guard their nonpartisan attitude and work together on necessary social reform.

This is woman's best and most influential public function because it is the one in which all her forces are at the maximum. Fighting with man and her fellow woman in political division and recrimination places woman at the minimum of her strength for social betterment; at the worst, for her personal happiness and elevation of character. At the last it becomes a question of the conservation and direction of energy, the adoption of the best means to the highest ends.

Yours, sincerely,

MARIE COLLINS ROONEY,
President.

STATEMENT OF GEORGE W. ALGER.

[Law offices of Alger & Simpson, Lord's Court, 27 William Street.]

NEW YORK, May 26, 1915.

UNITED STATES COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Transportation Building, Chicago.

GENTLEMEN: I inclose herewith my answers to the questions which you submitted with yours of May 13. I am sorry I could not have attended to the matter sooner, but I was unable to do so.

I remain, yours, very truly,

GEO. W. ALGER.

1. Have you as an attorney, or as a student, devoted any considerable attention to the decisions of courts in what are commonly known as labor cases?

Answer. Yes. I have for 20 years been interested in such matters, more especially, however, with decisions involving construction of industrial statutes and the general economic rights of employees other than questions of strikes and boycotts, to which I have paid comparatively little attention.

2. Will you please outline for the commission as definitely as possible your opinion regarding prevalent attitude of courts in labor cases and the social and legal aspects of this attitude?

Answer. It is very difficult to answer this question with any definite statement. We find in the courts of one State advanced views and in another entirely reactionary views. A general statement covering the courts of the country as a whole would be necessarily inaccurate. I should state, however, generally, that the courts are slowly but surely for the most part accepting the necessity for greater legislative freedom to enable laws to be passed for the economic betterment of working people. The process is slow and uneven. Some States are still very primitive and follow precedents which, however applicable they may have been to an agricultural state of society, are largely out of date, due to changed conditions. We have numerous reactionary decisions, but I think the tendency on the whole is toward a more enlightened judicial opinion on (1) legislation on the hours of labor; (2) the physical condition of labor, sanitary requirements, etc.; (3) industrial accidents. This forward tendency seems greatest in States where economic pressure is greatest. In agricultural States, where economic and social legislation is less necessary, the courts seem more likely to follow old precedents instead of adapting themselves to changes going on in the courts in other States; in other words, not being conscious of changed conditions they keep to precedents of the past.

Fifteen or twenty years ago the courts were a dangerous handicap upon American industrial growth. They stood in the way of progress and of necessary legislation far more than at present. Public opinion and social necessity are both making themselves felt. The sharp criticism with which many decisions have been met which have hampered the development of industrial legislation has been felt keenly by the courts themselves. While the law is still behind our industrial evolution, it is not so far behind as it was only a few years ago.

Public investigating bodies like this commission, where they have in a scientific way investigated and assembled facts, have helped the enactment of social legislation, and still more have helped in the passage of these laws through the criticisms of the courts. An interesting example of this is two cases in the New York Court of Appeals involving the constitutionality of laws forbidding night work for women. The first case, People v. Williams (189 N. Y., 131), was couched in a somewhat supercilious tone, and, with even a show of indignation, declared such a law unconstitutional. The court says:

"When it is sought under the guise of a labor law arbitrarily, as here, to prevent an adult female citizen from working at any time of the day that suits her I think it is time to call a halt. It arbitrarily deprives citizens of their right to contract with each other. The tendency of legislation in the form of regulating measures to interfere with the lawful pursuits of citizens is becoming a marked one in this country, and it behooves the courts firmly and fearlessly to interpose barriers of their judgments when invoked to protect against legislative acts plainly transcending the powers conferred by the Constitution upon the legislative body."

It expressly declared that the statute could not be justified as police legislation for the health of women. Later on came the factory-investigation commission which collected facts. Then, with a very slight amendment, the condemned statute was reenacted, the amendment simply affirming that it was passed "to protect the health and morals of females employed in factories by providing an adequate period of rest at night." This statute was declared constitutional without a dissenting vote a few months ago (People v. Charles Schweinler Press, 214 N. Y., 395), just as the former statute, without a dissenting vote, had been declared void seven years before. The report of the factory investigating commission was largely responsible for this changed view. My general impression, therefore, is this: Whenever legislation has been preceded by investigation by commissions or public bodies and the necessity or propriety for such legislation has been shown by facts collected thereby, the courts are inclined to accept the legislation. The much-criticized Ives case in New York is, I think, an exception to this general tendency. The best work done in the way of investigating industrial accidents was done by the New York commission, whose report preceded the quite mild compensation law, which the court of appeals declared violative of both State and National Constitution. If there was any objection to the old law under the Federal Constitution, it still remains as against the new law. It is a curious fact that so generally satisfactory has been the much broader law passed in New York after her constitution was amended that no case has been made attacking its constitutionality until within the past two or three weeks. The law thus far has been a victor by default.

The general success of social legislation is largely due, I think, also to a new method of presentation of these cases in the courts. Mr. Brandeis and his very able assistant, Miss Josephine Goldmark, of the National Consumers' League, evolved in the Curt Muller v. Oregon case in the United States Supreme Court a new kind of brief. It contains about four pages of law precedents and a hundred or so pages of extracts from reports of investigating committees, factory reports, medical authorities, foreign statutes, and the like, on the effect of overwork on women. Its logical basis was simply a statement to the august court. "You may say that this Oregon law is not within the police power, but if you do you will find here the experience of the whole civilized world is against you on the facts." It is a new but highly desirable form of brief making in these cases. The courts are taking judicial notice of a good many things which they would not have taken judicial notice of 10 years ago. The body of social facts resulting from investigations has greatly increased, and the material which may be used in support of social legislation is much greater. It is very difficult for the courts to be blind when the legislature is able to see.

3. Do you consider it desirable that the courts in their consideration of labor cases should take into consideration the social and economic facts which have a bearing upon the case under consideration?

A. Most certainly; yes. It is not only the right but the duty of the courts in the great majority of these cases to consider social and economic facts. My line of reasoning is this: The police power is a branch of law which is not static. The police power is outside the Constitution. It is the reserve power of the State to meet necessity by law. A true police-power measure has to be tested by social facts and social necessities. A good part of our present social legislation might properly have been considered a hundred years ago as a series of gross outrages upon personal freedom. These measures, then, would not have social necessity to justify them. The thing which makes them proper and desirable now and which justifies the courts now in sustaining them is the existence of economic conditions new to our own time. If the courts do not consider these facts, they are not only obstructions to progress, but fail to perform the judicial function itself. There are, to be sure, some courts which render at times blind decisions, but the law does not require the judges to be blind. It is not part of the judicial function to refuse to see economic and social fact in decisions involving police-power statutes. Quite the contrary, is not only the rule of sense, but the rule of law.

4. Have you any suggestions in regard to methods by which the courts can be brought to take cognizance of such social and economic facts, or with regard to the machinery by which such facts can best be brought to the attention of the court?

A. I have no definite proposal to make except the following generality. The more study which is made of social conditions in America the better basis there is for legislation. The courts can not be expected to make such investigations. That properly falls upon the legislatures and Congress. The courts will be far less likely to hamper or frustrate legislation if they can be convinced that the lawmakers knew what they were about when they passed the law which is being attacked. No machinery is necessary, or should be necessary, to bring social facts before the courts. The machinery needed, and which is sadly lacking, is machinery adjunct to the law-making body. The labor departments of our State government are, for the most part, crude, inefficient, wasteful, and practically useless, and especially useless as investigating departments for social facts. They seem to exist mainly to afford temporary political jobs for "labor" hacks of one party or the other. These departments should be performing regularly, continuously, and relatively, inexpensively the work which commissions perform occasionally and expensively. It is the sheer lack of ability, coupled too often with lack of appropriation, which makes our labor departments useless when they should be vitally important. The labor departments of our American States ought to be far stronger than they are, especially on the investigating side. When they are adequately and intelligently equipped the difficulties with the courts will be very greatly reduced.

5. Have you in the course of your studies devoted any particular attention to the attitude of the court toward what are commonly known as personal rights? Such, for example, as the right to trial by jury, the right to a writ of habeas corpus, and the right of free speech.

A. I have given considerable attention in recent years to this question. The way in which West Virginia courts sustained their lawless governor in overthrowing their constitution in its plainest provisions against martial law, the way in which Colorado and New Jersey courts have in recent times permitted the Bill of Rights to be disregarded by police authorities, the way in which the writ of habeas corpus has been whittled down in some States so that it is a tombstone for a dead liberty and a hundred legal lawlessnesses in a dozen States, from Massachusetts to California, are disquieting and alarming. Whenever there comes a conflict between lawless workers and lawless employers the two acting together seem to generate lawless courts. I think the commission should do as much as it can to collect together the specific data on a series of these outrages, so that they may be presented in a concrete form to the people. These old liberties which the Bill of Rights guarantees can not exist for one class to the exclusion of another, and it is time we had public opinion thoroughly aroused on the subject.

Yet, after all, I do not believe that the reestablishment of the Bill of Rights, the restoration of free speech and habeas corpus and all the old individual rights will take us very far toward establishing industrial peace. When you get a condition of war at Lawrence, Paterson, or in the West Virginia or Colorado mine regions law seems to break down, passion on one side meets passion on the other, and the lawlessness of both side is met by the lawlessness of the authorities in an attempt to restore what is called order. Nothing is finally accomplished by order restored in this way. There is nothing fundamental finally accomplished by the restoration of all these individual liberties. The fundamental thing is this: The existence of conditions which beget disorder is largely due to the blindness of the State or Nation to responsibilities which it should have recognized long before discontent had reached the boiling point. Those who rely upon freedom of speech, the right to assemble, habeas corpus, and jury trial, to help greatly in producing social justice, are, I think, expecting too much. Not that I underestimate their value. I am more interested in industrial peace and how to obtain it than in industrial war and the rules or fragments of legal rules which are broken in waging it. The main thing which all law-abiding citizens are interested in is getting rid of industrial conditions which inevitably tend to produce war. This is a much more difficult, a much more important problem, requires legislative intelligence based upon legislative fact, and investigations of industrial conditions which will enable laws to be passed in advance of and to prevent industrial war. When we get this idea firmly fixed in our minds we will begin to make progress, and not until that time is reached.

6. What criticisms, if any, would you care to make with regard to the decisions of the courts in connection with these questions of social rights?

A. I have no detailed criticism of decisions of the courts with these questions of social rights. Doubtless your record is full of illustrations of lawlessness supported by the courts in various Mexicanized States, such as Colorado and West Virginia. These two States are only recently conspicuous in that regard. There are many other States where the same lawlessness has been perpetrated in years past. If your body will collect together, as I have suggested, the specific cases where the law has broken down on this subject, it should be an impressive and valuable contribution to the work for which the commission is organized, and this will have a good deal of effect upon the attitude of the courts.

7. Have you in mind any methods by which such personal rights can be enforced, or by which the attitude of the court can be modified to meet your idea?

A. My last answer covers this question as far as I am at present prepared to answer it.

8. Have you devoted any particular attention to the relative desirability of State and Federal action in the regulation of industrial conditions, and in connection with labor disputes?

A. I think both the State and the Federal Government have distinct spheres in which they have failed to take action to prevent industrial war or to obviate by appropriate legislation injustice to working people. I am not referring now to labor disputes. Take, for example, this: Your commission has been investigating the Pullman Co. Do you know that the Pullman companies and the express companies make their employees sign contracts exempting railroad corporations from any responsibility for negligence in case the Pullman employee or the express employee gets killed? Do you know that these contracts have been sustained by the United States Supreme Court? That we have this great body of outlaws in the sense that they have no rights traveling around thousands of miles on our American railroads? This, I take it, is obviously a matter for Federal legislation. It doesn't seem to be anybody's business to enact such legislation. The United States has the worst workmen's compensation act now in force in this country, purporting to cover Federal employees. Why does Congress fail to take action on this important subject? There has been an adequate law before Congress for several sessions, but it has failed to be enacted. What is the Federal Department of Labor doing about it? The notion that all industrial legislation can be left to private initiative I think is fundamentally unsound. To expect the labor unions to confer any lasting benefit upon the whole body of workers through legislation is to expect too much. Such legislation should not come from any one class. It should come from the public authorities interested in the well-being of the people as a whole. Such is not the case at present.

9. To what extent do you consider that it is socially desirable that the Federal Government should attempt to take action with regard to labor conditions?

Answer. I think it is time that the Federal Government passed a workmen's compensation act, for example, covering Federal employees. The trouble is that just now when we should be doing the most to organize industry, owing to war conditions, and what will inevitably follow from it, we are doing nothing. We have a conservative panic on us when we ought to be preparing ourselves for the future. The whole relation of the Federal Government to the immigration problem should be receiving close attention at this time. There is nothing I have seen as yet which indicates that this is being done. The Federal Government should be in a position to regulate the immigrant, determine where he shall be sent, prevent the congestion of immigrants in one section where they are not wanted. It should have a bureau of employment which should perform the function of spreading immigrants where they are wanted. Immigrants who come to this country should come under conditions which will make them desirable as citizens. They should come on our terms and not on theirs. We could readily afford as a Nation to spend five times as much money as we do in making an immigrant an asset instead of a liability. Now is the time to do it, when our immigration department is not paralyzed with the flood of newcomers.

10. From your knowledge of the past decisions of the Supreme Court, to what extent do you consider that they are likely to approve the extension of Federal action with regard to labor conditions?

Answer. The question is too general for a concrete answer. I think the Supreme Court has been very liberal in its construction of interstate commerce in bringing employees under Federal laws, where contrary decisions would be equally possible, placing large classes of employees outside the scope of Federal law. The interstate commerce clause is cutting a wider sweep every year. Through the decisions of the Supreme Court State lines on commerce are disappearing; State lines on labor as a part of commerce are nowhere as nearly as strictly drawn as was the case 15 years ago.

11. In your opinion, to what extent may the section of the Constitution which provides that Congress shall have "power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts, and provide for the common defense and welfare of the United States" to invoke as a basis for the extension of Federal control over labor conditions?

Answer. I think this clause has been absurdly misconstrued. All that Congress is given power to do under it is not in the wide sense to provide for the common defense and welfare of the United States, but simply to collect taxes, etc., which are necessary to pay the debts, and which taxes are necessary to provide for the common defense, etc. In other words, the common defense and welfare of the United States, as used in this section, are clearly limited to taxes imposed for that purpose. I can not see that the clause has any substantial basis for the extension of Federal control over labor conditions. The Federal Government has not been given authority except as otherwise expressly stated in the Constitution, to provide for the common defense and welfare of the United States. It is by this section simply authorized to collect such taxes as may be necessary to meet the obligations properly incurred by the Federal Government under powers elsewhere conferred in providing for the defense and welfare of the people.

12. To what extent do you consider that the Supreme Court is likely to uphold the extension of Federal action in labor matters under the interstate commerce clause?

Answer. As I have said before, I think the Supreme Court has been liberal in the extension of Federal action under the interstate commerce clause. I believe that it is prepared to go somewhat further. Whether it will go to the extent of supporting the bill which the National Child Labor Committee, for example, has been urging for many years with reference to interstate traffic in the products of child labor I am somewhat doubtful. I am so much in sympathy with the objects sought to be obtained by this bill that I would prefer not to express here any such doubts as I have on this matter. Personally I have always felt that the Federal tax power could be used much more than it has been to accomplish social reconstruction. I think Congress could properly tax, as a part of its internal-revenue law, products of child labor, for example, so as to substantially destroy the value of child labor when in competition with adult-made goods. It will be a simpler method of accomplishing the result desired than the only measure which has heretofore been considered by Congress. Congress now imposes a tax, for example, on the manufacturers of adulterated butter. It requires a license to manufacture adulterated butter, and so much a pound on each pound sold. The license and the tax are so high that the effect of the law is to prohibit the sale of such commodities. Why not apply the same principle to goods made by child labor? This is perhaps a digression, but the suggestion may be worth making at this time.

EXHIBITS.

WALTER CLARK EXHIBIT.

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT,
Raleigh, June 2, 1915.

SECRETARY COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

DEAR SIR: Your letter received. References to the decisions mentioned were made in the corrected copy of my evidence which, at your instance I returned to you, addressed to Chicago.

The two speeches on the Constitution were: (1) Before University of Pennsylvania, April 27, 1906, "Some Defects in the Constitution," reprinted as Senate Document No. 87, Sixty-second Congress, first session, and (2) "Government by Judges," at Cooper Union, January 27, 1914, reprinted as Senate Document No. 610, Sixty-third Congress, second session.

The other cases referred to are Nelson v. R. R., 167 N. C., dissenting opinion at p. 189-191; Penny v. R. R., 161 N. C., 530; Mott v. R. R., 164 N. C., 367; also Fitzgerald v. Furniture Co., 131 N. C., 636 to 644; and Ward v. Odell, 126 N. C., read pages 947 and 948; and same case, 123 N. C., 248.

Most truly, yours,

WALTER CLARK.

McKELWAY EXHIBIT NO. 1.

REPORT OF REV. A. E. SEDDON.

COVINGTON MILLS.

APRIL 29, 1908.

I had been recommended by Rev. R. E. Pendleton, Baptist minister at Covington, to seek an interview with Mr. N. S. Turner, president of the Covington Mills, with the assurance that I would be cordially received and helped; but this morning, quite early, Mr. Pendleton called at the hotel, being evidently somewhat disturbed in his mind, and urged me not to see Mr. Turner, nor to attempt to visit the Covington Mill. He had just spoken to Mr. Turner, who is a prominent member of his church, and found Mr. Turner so emphatically hostile to the child-labor committee that he feared harm, and not good, would result from the interview. Whilst thanking Mr. Pendleton for his interest and advice, I told him I felt it my duty to try, at any rate, to see both Mr. Turner and his mill.

The mill is situated outside the Covington city limits. I walked out and came first to the schoolhouse. I inquired if any others who were standing around knew anything of the boy or of P. H. Sommers or G. H. McCullum (alias and real name of Charlie's uncle). I next went to the schoolhouse close by and inquired there. Neither the teachers nor scholars knew anything about Charlie Knapp or his uncle. I then asked the teacher's permission to speak to the children. I told her that I represented the National Child Labor Committee and that I was visiting cotton mills in the South to study conditions with a view to securing adequate legislation. She was very glad to know such work was being done and said it was needed right there. I asked her if there were any children in the mills who ought to be in school. She replied, "Lots of them."

Miss Annie Corvan is the principal of the school and her sister Ruth assists her. She teaches the first and second grades whilst Miss Annie teaches the third, fourth, and fifth grades. Fifth grade is the highest taught in the school.

The Porterdale school has a nine months' term. The county pays for five months, the parents for two months, and the mill pays for two months.

With the teacher's consent I enquired if any of the children present had worked in the mill. I interview every one who held up the hand. None of them had worked in the mill since the beginning of the present year.

I have autographs of the following: Tom Speer, aged 11, fourth reader; Willie B. Mills, aged 11, fourth reader; Louis Burnham, aged 10, third reader; Tet Lummus, aged 10, fourth reader; Annie Smith, aged 10, third reader; Annie Brightwell, aged 10, third reader; Ophelia Kirkes, aged 13, third reader; Dora Lummus, aged 13, fifth reader; Emma Williams, aged 10, first reader (this child's writing is indecipherable; she began to learn only at the beginning of this year; John Williams, brother of the above, aged 12, now working in mill); May Alexander, aged 15, first reader.

The number on the school roll is 89; present at time of my visit, 35. The disparity was accounted for by the teacher as due to removals and sickness and, but to a very limited extent, to being at work in the mill.

[Part omitted was read by Mr. McKelway in his testimony given on May 11, 1915.]

McKELWAY EXHIBIT NO. 2.

[National Child Labor Committee, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City.]

MAY 12, 1915.

Mr. BASIL M. MANLY,

U. S. Commission on Industrial Relations, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. MANLY: I have looked over and edited the carbon copy of my testimony before the commission yesterday. You will note that I have eliminated the paragraph relating to a stockholder in the pencil factory in Atlanta in which Mary Phagan was murdered. I regret very much that I made an error about this. In the year 1908, I had a newspaper controversy, as the clippings which I handed in will show, with Mr. S. F. Parrott, a capitalist of Atlanta, interested in many enterprises. It is possible that he may have been a stockholder in the pencil factory, but I have no means of knowing this. This Mr. Parrott died about two years ago, I am informed. His brother, Mr. George Parrott, was a large stockholder in the pencil factory, and during the newspaper criticism of sanitary and moral conditions in this factory he issued a statement which I remembered, but did not look up before my testimony. I confounded him with the Mr. S. F. Parrott, his brother, with whom I had had the former controversy. Thinking about the matter yesterday afternoon, I went over to the Congressional Library and found in a copy of the Atlanta Constitution a letter from Mr. George W. Parrott instead of Mr. S. F. Parrott, as I had thought, defending the conditions of the pencil factory. So I ask that the whole reference to the stockholder in the pencil factory, together with the clipping containing Mr. S. F. Parrott's name, be eliminated from the record. The main point I wished to make was that if the people of Georgia had passed the child-labor law earlier, which they did enact in 1915, they would have been saved the whole trouble and expense of the Mary Phagan case.

On April 29, at a meeting of the Southern Sociological Congress in Atlanta, at which I presided, three days after the murder of Mary Phagan, I said, in closing the session of the congress:

"If social conditions in Atlanta were of the best, if conditions in factories were of the best, and lastly if children of such tender years were not forced to work, little Mary Phagan would probably never have been murdered."

* * * I find this in the Atlanta Constitution of April 30.

I am asking my secretary in my absence to bring you another copy of the arguments before the Georgia committee, at which representatives of the Western Union and Postal Telegraph Co.'s were present in opposition to a bill providing for the protection of telegraph messengers. The bill as finally passed made a 14-year age limit for day work and a 16-year age limit for night work. You will find that this information is to be inserted in the testimony. I am also sending you, as Mr. Walsh asked me to do, a table concerning the wages of some 81,00 operatives in southern cotton mills. Mr. Walsh raised the point as to how long a period these wages had been studied. You will find on pages 304 and 305 of volume 1 of the Federal Bureau of Labor Reports on Conditions of Woman and Child Wage Earners in the United States, the statement that the earnings of all these employees in a representative week with the average hours worked by the employees was taken. The average hours for all the Southern States were 50.6 a week, which is about 10 hours less than if they all had been employed for the whole time.

And I am sending you the table giving the number of these employees of different ages with different wage scales.

I am also sending you my correspondence with Mr. Belvidere Brooks. Hon. F. M. Hudson was a member of the Florida Senate.

Cordially, yours,

A. J. McKELWAY.

P. S.—I note that I referred to volume 6 regarding the history of child-labor legislation in the South in the same report on the Condition of Woman and Child Wage Earners in the United States. I have only one copy of this and so shall not be able to file it with the commission, but I suggest that the whole 19 volumes should be purchased and studied by some expert in making up the report.

A. J. McK.

Number of employees earning classified amounts in a representative week in southern cotton mills, by sex and age.

	Under 12 years.		12 and 13 years.		14 and 15 years.		16 and 17 years.		18 to 20 years.		21 years and over.		Total.
	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.	M.	F.
Under $2.....	145	106	368	363	394	361	159	283	177	326	483	602	1,726	2,041
$2 to $2.99 ...	133	80	395	341	383	401	143	285	113	322	297	552	1,464	1,981
$3 to $3.99....	129	53	580	354	706	604	268	458	155	498	419	799	2,257	2,766
$4 to $4.99....	52	34	380	254	647	560	334	574	257	698	541	965	2,211	3,085
$5 to $5.99....	5	14	64	111	265	374	242	528	242	657	743	1,063	1,559	2,747
$6 to $6.99....	5	1	25	51	146	223	193	336	271	491	884	981	1,524	2,083
$7 to $7.99....	1	7	15	44	74	74	129	214	250	791	704	1,130	1,173
$8 to $8.99....	1	1	1	19	23	33	48	119	114	663	422	835	609
$9 to $9.99....	2	5	7	26	17	80	61	584	250	695	337
$10 to $10.99	1	1	2	4	8	48	18	381	131	435	159
$11 to $11.99..	1	1	4	1	24	8	212	44	241	54
$12 and over...	1	1	15	7	245	23	261	81
Total...	470	290	1,820	1,492	2,609	2,630	1,481	2,668	1,715	3,450	6,243	6,536	14,338	17,066

CORRESPONDENCE WITH MR. BELVIDERE BROOKS.

[The Western Union Telegraph Co. Received at Tallahassee, Fla. 42-J F. 184 DH CO. 2 extra.]

NEW YORK, N. Y., April 29, 1913.

Hon. F. M. HUDSON, Tallahassee, Fla.:

I understand you have been informed that I read and approved your child-labor bill, No. 160. This is incorrect. I never saw the bill until in New York to-day. We are in sympathy with reasonable child-labor regulations and have cooperated in that direction and in cities of considerable size. Have no objection to limiting the age of messengers between certain hours of the night of 18 years. I do not think the hours of labor should be limited to 54 hours per week, particularly in small places where telegraph companies can only afford to employ one messenger who under our rules is required to be on duty from 8 a. m. to 8 p. m., less two hours for meals, and on Sunday two hours before noon and two hours after noon. The child-labor representatives informed me while in Tallahassee that the bill would provide that boys of 12 or 14 years of age could be employed in the smaller cities, and nothing was said about limiting the hours of labor to 50 hours per week.

B. BROOKS,
Vice President.

COPY OF TELEGRAM TO BELVIDERE BROOKS.

Mr. BELVIDERE BROOKS,
General Manager and Vice President
Western Union Telegraph Co., New York City:

Am astonished at contents of your telegram to Senator Hudson and of State Manager Maxwell's letter to legislators. Our general secretary, Mr. Lovejoy, told you in my presence that Florida child-labor bill regulated messenger service. You asked what the age limits were and were told 12 for day work, 18 for night work, whereupon you agreed not to oppose measure and said you would accept 14 for day work. You asked nothing about hours of labor for children under 16, and hours specified in bill are one more a day than are lawful for children in numerous occupations in New York and many other States and prescribed in uniform child-labor law indorsed by American Bar Association. Certainly, we did not dream that you wished to employ 12 or 14 year old boys 12 hours a day, as per your telegram, with four hours on Sunday. Nothing was said in our interview about employment in cities only. I understand Mr. Maxwell is denying facts of interview, and his letter to legislators advocates employment of boys under 14 even in school hours; opposes the only practicable plan for ascertaining ages of children so as to observe the law, misquotes its provisions and makes other incorrect statements. For example, I happen to know that your representative here was notified of senate committee hearing and was present at hearing. Age limit in Florida bill was reduced from 21 to 18 for night messenger service to avoid opposition from your company, which helped to defeat bill last session, and not because those acquainted with conditions of night messenger service do not wish all minors protected from well-known evils. I have just suggested to our agent in Georgia to pursue same course, and had expected to try that plan in other Southern States for the present; but if our understanding amounts to nothing, and State managers are not controlled by agreement of general manager, fight may as well begin here and everywhere for proper age limit. Have thus far avoided giving out reports of investigations made, with corroborative photographs, in Florida cities. Another bill has been favorably reported in house prohibiting minors from employment in pool rooms, whereas general child-labor bill prescribes 16 only. You are bound to know that night messenger service is more demoralizing. I await reply.

A. J. McKELWAY,
Secretary for Southern States, National Child Labor Committee.

A. J. McKELWAY,
% of L. J. Maxwell, Tallahassee, Fla.:

You are evidently laboring under a misapprehension as to the contents of my telegram to Senator Hudson. Would suggest that you read the telegram, and if it does not state exact facts advise me in what particular it does not do so. This company has issued positive instructions that its messenger boys should not be permitted to render service of any kind to disreputable house, and should be allowed to go to such places only for the purpose of delivering telegrams, which is under the law unavoidable. We are not seeking business from that class of people, and if you have information that the instructions above referred to are being violated, I would be very glad to advise you of specific instances, so that immediate steps may be taken as to remedy. As stated to Mr. Lovejoy and yourself, as well as Senator Hudson in my telegram, we are in absolute sympathy with your movement, but in small towns where there are (not) any bad influences which younger boys can come in contact with, we do not see the necessity or justice of your endeavoring to have such drastic laws passed as you propose. The work of a messenger boy in a small town is very different from any other employment, the actual labor performed in many cases amounting to very little. The proposition to limit the hours of labor to 54 a week would compel us in a great many small places in Florida to employ two messengers instead of one, or curtail the operating hours of such offices. The latter course would prove a hardship to the community, and we could not afford to go to the expense of employing an additional messenger to do practically nothing. I am not advised as to what action Mr. Maxwell is taking in regard to this bill, but I am quite sure that he will act entirely in line with my message to Senator Hudson and this message to you.

B. BROOKS.

[Night letter. The Western Union Telegraph Co.]

To BELVIDERE BROOKS,

General Manager Western Union Telegraph Co., New York City:

Yours received. I presume all the harm that Mr. Maxwell was capable of accomplishing has already been done. Am writing more fully, but meanwhile suggest that, as only his opposition is apparent here, best proof of good faith would be passage of bill unamended. Other matters can be settled afterwards.

A. J. MCKELWAY.

LEGISLATURE, STATE OF FLORIDA,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Tallahassee, May 5, 1913.

Mr. BELVIDERE BROOKS,

General Manager Western Union Telegraph Co., New York City.

DEAR MR. BROOKS: This is the first opportunity I have had of writing you in full concerning your telegram of May 1. It was not so much that the telegram to Senator Hudson misstated the facts as that, in connection with the letter of State Superintendent Maxwell, it made a thoroughly wrong impression. I am informed that State Superintendent Maxwell, after my leaving the city for Atlanta, with no one here as a witness to our interview at the Leon Hotel, went around denying the fact of an interview altogether, and, in fact, questioned my veracity so that some of my friends had to vouch for my character.

This letter to Senator Hudson, enclosing copies of his letter to President Drane and Speaker Farris, contains a good many errors of fact. I presume that you have a copy of this letter. He objects to section 4 of the bill, which provides that no child under 14 can be employed during school hours; to section 7, which requires the securing of an employment certificate in order that the age of the child may be ascertained; he mentions two subsections, which were written in to secure some proof as to age, as if there were no alternates, when one is the simple affidavit of the parent as to the age of the child; he objects to section 12 of the bill, requiring that the child appear personally before the officer issuing the certificate; he also objects to the nine-hour a day law section, the section prohibiting the employment of children under 18 after 10 o'clock at night, and to the penalty clause for the violation of the bill. I quote the following sentence:

"As stated, the bill starts our very fairly, but as it proceeds, by other limitations, the first portion is destroyed."

I feel sure that Superintendent Maxwell is too intelligent a man not to have recognized that the bill is consistent with itself; and as we have the endorsement of the American Bar Association for it, with the exception that we have minimized the age limit in some sections, I am not concerned about the destruction of the bill. The letter ends with the threat that it would be impossible for the company to give the service required if this bill becomes law.

Now, your telegram to Senator Hudson started out by saying: "I understand you have been informed that I read and approved your child-labor bill No. 160. This is incorrect. I never saw the bill until in New York to-day." This seemed to corroborate Superintendent Maxwell's unwarranted statements as to the facts of our interview. You are right in saying that the 54 hours a week was not mentioned to you. You did not ask concerning the hours of labor and we did not think of this, as they did not apply to messenger boys alone. You say further "the child-labor representatives informed me while in Tallahassee that the bill would provide that boys of 12 or 14 years of age could be employed in the smaller cities." I am sure that when you refresh your memory you will recall that nothing was said about the bill applying to the smaller cities only. What you agreed to was the 12-year age limit for day work, or 14, if we preferred, and 18-year age limit for night work.

As to your instructions in regard to delivery of messages in certain parts of cities: Our investigations have conclusively proved that such instructions are not followed; and, even though forbidden, this is inefficient, the only remedy being the prohibition of boys of certain age working certain hours at night. When the fight is over I shall be glad to give you facts I have in my possession, which can be sworn to by three reputable witnesses, as to the employment of boys in two Florida cities in violation of these instructions. But the fight is on here now with a view to securing a better child-labor bill for Florida, and the question is, "What are you going to do about it?"

As I wired you, Superintendent Maxwell has done about all the harm he is capable of. I am too old a man at this business not to recognize the echoes of his letters in my talks with the representatives. In his letter he has objected to everything that you agreed to, and in addition to this, as I am informed, he has denied that you ever made any agreement at all.

To my knowledge no one ever claimed that you agreed to the bill; it was only the sections concerning the employment of messenger service.

If the bill is defeated Mr. Maxwell and the Western Union will inevitably be held responsible for it, as they were in part two years ago; and, frankly speaking, with the sentiment of the people of Florida, now rather evident, it does not seem to me that the company can afford to carry the burden of that odium.

I shall not attempt at this late day to revise the bill by making the age limit for night messenger service 21 years instead of 18, unless I find that the bill is weakened by other amendments in line with those Mr. Maxwell has proposed. We can let our controversy as to other States rest until the matter is decided here.

Sincerely, yours,

A. J. McKELWAY.

[The Western Union Telegraph Co., 195 Broadway.]

NEW YORK, May 12, 1913.

Mr. A. J. McKELWAY,

Secretary for the Southern States,

204 Bond Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: This is to acknowledge receipt of your esteemed favor of the 5th instant. I hardly know what I can add to my conversation with you at Tallahassee and communication by telegraph. It was reported to me Senators Drane and Hudson had been informed by some one, I don't know who, that the child-labor bill introduced in the Florida Legislature had been inspected and approved by me. This, you know, was not the case, as I never saw the bill until my attention was called to this statement, and as it contained provisions which I was not aware of and did not discuss with Mr. Lovejoy or yourself, I could not have approved it.

I am perfectly sincere in the statements I have made that the Western Union Telegraph Co., as well as myself individually, is in sympathy with your movement, and I only regret that your people seem inclined to include in bills to be enacted into laws conditions that are unnecessarily burdensome and force us to resist instead of cooperate with you to secure their passage. I also regret that you evidently do not see your way clear to give me definite information as to points in Florida where our instructions regarding messenger service to disorderly or disreputable houses or persons are being violated. I have, however, directed that an investigation be made at once with a view to ascertaining the facts and correcting the matter if it exists in our service.

Yours, truly,

B. BROOKS, Vice President.

McKELWAY EXHIBIT NO. 3.

FIELD NOTES OF LEWIS W. HINE, CHILD-LABOR CONDITIONS IN TEXAS.

I. Visited the Denison Cotton Mills in Denison, Tex., in the afternoon of September 22 and during the noon hour September 23. Watched the workers coming and going and made careful inquiry among the school children and the school principal. Found no evidences of children under 15 years. The school principal told me the absences of children was due to the child-labor inspector, who is a good one. Principal said that the children are in school the required time and are not in the mill until the proper age.

II. Visited the Bonham Cotton Mills, Bonham, Tex., September 24 and found none under 15, but I did not see all that came out. Talking with the boys of the neighborhood, I could get no evidence of violation.

III. Visited the Sherman Manufacturing Co., Sherman, Tex., September 24. Spent the noon hour and went through the mill as work was resumed. Saw only two that might be under 15. They are building a small school, which is not yet finished. Housing conditions are average, but the outdoor toilets and surface drains are bad, and probably much worse in bad weather.

IV. Visited the Itasca Cotton Mills, Itasca, Tex., September 29. Went all through the mill; found none under 15 years of age except one boy, who seemed to be under, but the overseer says he has mother's affidavit that he is 15. The spinning-room overseer said that while it was better for the children to be kept out of the mills, as it is dangerous and hinders schooling, yet it is hard on the mills to get enough hands over 15 years of age.

V. Waco, Tex., September 30; visited the overall factory, mattress factory, and broom factory. Found none under 16 years. At the broom factory I was told that one schoolboy works outside of school hours, but his age was not given.

VI. Visited the Pittman Handle Factory, Denison, Tex., September 23 and 24. Found boy who said he was 15 running a dangerous machine which bores large holes in the spade handles. He said that another boy had half of his hand bored off a while ago. There is no doubt that it is a very dangerous machine for a boy to run.

VII. I talked with School Superintendent Hughes, Denison, Tex. He said the mill owners were living up to the law because they are conscientious men. There is no inspector that he knows of, and he has heard no talk about child labor. Had no copy of the child-labor law. He says compulsory education will be delayed in Texas on account of families who depend upon the cotton crop and need the children to pick. "I think I voice the feelings of school people all over the State when I say I wish the boll weevil or something would make the people raise other things. Cotton is a curse to these children."

VIII. Visited shaft 3 of the Thurber mines September 26 and 27. Found no boys. Talked with Superintendent Windle. He said he was sure some boys went into the mines at 16 (parents swearing that they were 17), but he did not believe that they went in much below 16. A worker in the mines, staying at the hotel, said they employed old men as "trappers" because a 17-year-old boy wants to earn more than $1.60 a day. The sisters in charge of the Catholic school said that none of their children went to the mines.

IX. Visited the Mount Marion mine at Strawn, Tex., September 17 and 18. Saw them all come out of the mine and saw none under 17, except one boy who was working on the tipple outside as check boy, who said he was 16 years; name, Lindsey; son of the engineer.

COTTON PICKING NEAR DENISON, SEPTEMBER 23.

I drove out to a number of the farms near Denison and found many very young white children working all day in the hot sun picking and dragging sacks of cotton. In one field the labor corps consisted of one woman and six children, one of them 5 years, one 6 years, one 7 years, one 9 years, and two about 11. The father was plowing. The 5 and 6 year olds worked all day as did the rest. The 7-year-old said he picked 50 pounds a day, and the 9-year-old 75 pounds. (A good picker averages several hundred a day.) School begins late on account of the cotton picking, but the children nearly all prefer school to the picking. Picking hours are long, hot, and deadly monotonous. While the very young children seem to enjoy it, very soon their distaste for it grows into all-absorbing hatred for all work.

Near Corsicana, cotton nearly all picked. Only 40 per cent of school children were at school. Other schools not opened yet on account of cotton picking.

COTTON PICKING ON FARMS NEAR HOUSTON AND NEAR M'KINNEY.

On most of the farms that I visited in these sections the high percentage of child labor was appalling. It was exceedingly difficult to get enough statistics on these visits on account of the weather and the fact that the farms are often widely separated; but wherever they were working in the cotton the children were nearly always in evidence.

The wages for cotton picking have recently gone up above $1 a hundred pounds, plus board—due to scarcity of pickers.

GUADALUPE VALLEY COTTON MILLS, CUERO, TEX., OCT. 10, 1918.

These mills were not running this week on account of the floods. I spent the morning around the homes getting acquainted with the children. Two boys took me around. They said they were only 14 years old, and that it was easy to get a job here. They were the only ones under age that I could find here.

THE LIGNITE MINES NEAR ROCKDALE.

I spent part of two days in this region—October 17 and 18, 1913—and drove out to the following shafts: The International Coal Co., employing 50 men; Big Square mine, 20 men; the Texas Coal Co., 75 men; Big Lumb Shaft No. 5, 150 men. While I did not see many miners, yet I talked with workers and bosses around the mines, with women and boys around the homes, and with men and boys in Rockdale. Everybody agreed that there were no boys at work now under 17. One boss said, "Sometimes they'll slip in, but we run them out. It's dangerous, and the law is strict." The workers are mostly Mexicans.

MISCELLANEOUS INDUSTRIES.

I. Walker Packing Co., Austin, Tex.—Went through the whole place, but saw no children. Only part of the force was working, however. Sanitary conditions in parts of it, however, were bad.

II. Model Laundry, Galveston, Tex.—I saw part of this place and found no children, October 11, 1913.

III. Miller & Brothers, overall factory, Dallas.—October 27, 1913, could find none under 29 years here.

IV. Broen Cracker & Candy Co., Dallas.—October 29, 1913, watched the workers coming out at 5.30 p. m. Counted ten girls any or all of whom might be from 12 to 15 years.

V. Hughes Brothers Mfg. Co. (candy makers), 1401 S. Ervey St., Dallas.—I counted five boys and girls coming and going at noon and night, October 27 and 28, 1913, all of them workers, and ages ranging, apparently, from 12 to 15 years. One girl told me that she is 13 years old, runs a chocolate machine, "But we have to tell 'em we're 15."

VI. Silvers Box Factory, Dallas, Tex.—October 27, 1913, made several trips through this place. There is plenty of dangerous machinery, but I found no boy under 20 years.

VII. According to the testimony of Mr. Sam Callaway, formerly county superintendent of schools at Fort Worth, the King Candy Co. managers are very particular about looking up school records to find actual ages of their workers. He said the Hub Furniture Co. may use a few children, not many.

VIII. The work of the elevator boys in the hotels of Texas will bear careful investigation. Boys from 16 to 20 years told me repeatedly that they put in 16 hours a day, and in rush times more. At such times the work is particularly fatiguing, physically and nervously, and such long hours are very harmful. Data are difficult to get from the boys, but the strain of the work can be easily overlooked. At the same time the safety of the passengers is to be considered.

IX. Lumber mills.—November 6 to 10, 1913, in the lumber mills at Doucette and Nacogdoches—Frost-Johnson Lumber Co. (large mills), and Millard Lumber Co. I found no young boys. Then I went through the following mills in Beaumont and found no young boys: Kirby Lumber Co., Neches Lumber Co., Beaumont Shingle & Lumber Co., Georges Lumber Co. I talked with the superintendent of the Beaumont Shingle & Lumber Co., who said, "We used to use some young boys in the shingle mill, but a Government inspector came along and said that, while he wouldn't do anything this time, he would advise us to get those boys out of the mill just as fast as we could. It cost us a hundred dollars a day, I think. Boys don't pay around this work anyway."

After finding all these good conditions I was greatly surprised to find three violations of the law in the Miller & Vidor Lumber Co., one of 12 years, and two of 14 years, all working more or less around dangerous machinery. This mill is located some distance from town, and that may account for the liberties they take with the law.

At Orange I found one boy who said he was 13, and one boy who appeared to be 14, working in the Miller-Link Lumber Co., and a 14-year old boy at the Lutchter, Moore Lumber Co., and several who might be under 15.

In other mills more remotely situated there are surely other violations of the law to be found. Fifteen years is too young for such boys to be working near and at dangerous machinery. Age should be raised.

DEPARTMENT STORES.

I. In Houston investigated the following October 13 to 16:

(1) Munn Dry Goods Co., and also their Men & Boys' Store.—Found only one youngster, a wrapper about 13 years.

(2) Levy Brothers Dry Goods Co.—Found one girl bundle carrier who said she is 11 years old and gets $2.50 a week. Her sister, 13 years, works too. Counted half a dozen others that are probably 11 or 12.

(3) Kiams and Mistrot—Curtis Stores.—Found none under 15.

(4) Alkemeyer Department Store.—One cash boy said 10 years old, $2.50 a week, works 9 hours a day, 13 hours on Saturday. Another cash boy said 11 years old. Saw several others apparently 11 or 12 years.

(5) Foleys.—Saw several about 11 or 12 years old.

(6) Columbia Dry Goods Store.—None under 15.

II. Found no children under 15 years, but stores were closed, many of them.

III. Dallas. Investigated the following:

(1) Sanger Brothers.—I saw and talked with several cash boys who said they are 11 and 12 years old. Saw others about the same age. The boys seem to get good treatment here, but this is too young to begin such work.

(2) A. Harris Department Store.—Found only one girl, about 10 years old. They are said to employ many youngsters.

(3) Tiche-Goettinger Co.—Saw none under 15, but others have told me that they do employ some very young.

(4) W. A. Green Department Store.—Saw none under 15.

IV. Waco, November 3, 1913:

(1) Sanger Brothers.—Saw seven boys and girls working here whose ages ranged from 10 years of age (one said he was) to about 12 years.

(2) Goldstein-Migel Co.—Counted twelve whose ages were apparently from 10 to 13 years. One said 11 years old; one said 12.

V. Fort Worth, November 5, 1913. I went all through the two largest department stores here, Stripling's and Monnings, and saw no children who seemed to be under 14 years.

ORIENTAL TEXTILE MILLS, HOUSTON, TEX.

This is a small mill, but it has been the center of a great deal of discussion, pro and con, relative to child-labor and other conditions. When I visited it the mill was running only a small part of the force, and I saw no indications of their using children. However, I did not get into the mill. I can not give any real evidence either way. From the evidence of various persons, from those in the labor department, to friends and enemies of the corporation, I think that in the past they probably have been too independent in the matter of running their mill to suit themselves. October 13, 1913.

DALLAS COTTON MILL, DALLAS, TEX., OCTOBER 20, 1913.

I spent the noon hour at the mill, and found the average age of the workers rather high, but found one boy of 12 years, who said: "I can't get a steady job in the mill, but I can help my sister all I want to." He helps his 15-year-old sister on Saturdays and out of school hours.

WAXAHACHIE COTTON MILL, WAXAHACHIE, TEX., OCTOBER 21, 1913.

Spent the noon hour here, and found only one boy that seemed to be under 15 years, and he refused to tell his age.

TEXAS COTTON MILLS, M'KINNEY, TEX., OCTOBER 27, 1913.

I photographed one typical group coming out at noon, but saw none under 15. The housing conditions here are exceptionally good.

CORSICANA COTTON MILLS, CORSICANA, TEX., OCTOBER 31, 1913.

I met Frank Crow near the mill. He said he is 13 years old now, and that he spent about three months last summer doffing in these mills. "They let me work because my mother is a widow and only one of my sisters to work beside my mother." He took me all through the mill at 4. I saw one doffer who appeared to be 12 years old.

THE NEWSBOYS OF TEXAS.

In all the larger cities of the State the little newsies abound. Their ages range from 5 to 6 years and upward, and many of the little ones start out at 4 and 5 every morning. I want to appeal for strong efforts to raise the age limit, as they are doing in other large cities, notably New Orleans, and at the same time these youngsters must have competent and persistent supervision. In Houston these efforts are being made, and the work of the probation officers, under the direction of Judge Ward, juvenile court, deserves special mention.

The street trades, after they have been divested of the false sentimentalism that has surrounded them for so long, stand before us as dangerous occupations if the boys are not properly supervised and directed in their work.

THE MESSENGER AND DELIVERY BOYS.

By far the most dangerous phase of the work of the street traders is that which sends the boys at all hours of the day and night into the red-light districts of our cities. The popular excuse that the boys are sent to the door of the house only fails when one finds that the boys do not stop there, or, if they do, their information about the life of the underworld, gained at first hand and from the tales of the other boys, gets a start that often ends in their own moral downfall. Judge Ward, of juvenile court, Houston, told me that 20 per cent of juvenile arrests are messenger or delivery boys at the time of the arrest. I examined 50 cases (for the month just passed), 9 of them were messenger and delivery boys (from 14 to 16 years of age); 3 were newsboys; 5 were shine boys. Mr. Ingraham, probation officer at Waco, said that a large percentage of delinquency of boys was due to the influences of the street, and especially of the red-light district. Mr. Sam Callaway, probation officer at Fort Worth, was very vehement over the bad influences of "The Acre" (red light), especially those whose business sends them into that district.

Dr. W. C. Rountree, a specialist, who has a sanitarium for those who are addicted to the use of narcotics, told me he has found a number of children at Fort Worth who use cocaine. Cited the case of a 15-year-old messenger, Chester Robinson, who, while delivering messages to The Acre and working nights and with bad associates, acquired the cocaine habit. The doctor cured him, and he is now on a farm, in good shape. His wreck was due to his work and associations with the red light.

Dr. Smith, house physician in a house of refuge for young girls, has had occasion to investigate the reservation in Dallas. While there she found many cases of harm that came to young messenger and delivery boys through their work in that district. She found a 13-year-old drug messenger this year in a notorious resort so much under the influence of morphine that he couldn't remember his name. Found a 15-year-old messenger on the second floor of a mulatto resort there. Saw delivery boys for department stores going into the rooms of various women in these resorts.

McKELWAY EXHIBIT NO. 4.

SENATE BILL No. —. By WILLIAMS.

A BILL Entitled, "An act to provide for compulsory school attendance, the appointment of truant officers and prescribing their duties; to require school officers and teachers to make such reports as may be required by the county superintendent; to provide for the furnishing of necessary books for children and issuing scholarships to children of dependent parents; and to prescribe penalties for violations of this act and declaring an emergency."

Be it enacted by the people of the State of Oklahoma: SEC. 1. That every parent, guardian, or other person in the State of Oklahoma, having control or charge of any child or children between the ages of eight (8) and sixteen (16) years, inclusive, shall be required to send such child or children to a public, or other school, each year, for a term or period not less than that of the public schools of the school district where the child or children reside.

SEC. 2. The county superintendent of public instruction of each county shall appoint at least one truant officer in each county upon the passage and approval of this act, or as soon thereafter as he may deem advisable in order to carry out the purposes of this act, who shall hold office for the term of one year unless sooner removed for cause. The truant officer shall see that the provisions of this act are complied with, and it shall be his duty to visit all establishments where children under sixteen (16) years are employed to ascertain whether the provisions of this act are complied with, and when, from personal knowledge or by report or complaint from any resident or teacher of the township under his supervision, he believes that any child subject to the provisions of this act is habitually tardy or absent from school, he shall immediately give written notice to the parent, guardian, or custodian of such child that the attendance of such child at school is required, and if within five (5) days such parent, guardian, or custodian of said child does not comply with the provisions of this section, then such truant officer shall make complaint against such parent, guardian, or custodian of such child in any county court for violation of the provisions of this act: Provided, That only one notice shall be required for any child in any one year. Any such parent, guardian, or custodian of child who shall violate the provisions of this act shall be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not less than five dollars ($5) nor more than twenty-five ($25), to which may be added, in the discretion of the court, imprisonment in the county jail not less than two nor more than thirty days.

All funds collected as aforesaid shall be deposited in the county treasury and be designated the "Truancy fund," and shall only be used in carrying out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. The truant officers provided for in this act, except county officers acting ex officio as truant officers, shall receive from the truancy fund of the county treasury not exceeding two dollars ($2) for each day of actual service, to be paid by the county treasurer upon warrant signed by the county superintendent of public instruction: Provided, That no warrant shall be issued on the county treasury for such services until the truant officer shall have filed an itemized statement of time employed in such service, and such statement shall have been certified to by the superintendent of public instruction of the county in which such truant officer is employed and such claim shall have been allowed by the board of county commissioners: Provided further, That no truant officer shall receive pay for more days than the average length of school term in the county, cities, or towns under his supervision.

SEC. 4. All school officers and teachers are hereby required to make and furnish all reports that may be required by the county superintendent of public instructions or the truant officer, with reference to the workings of this act.

SEC. 5. If any parent, guardian, or custodian of any child or children is too poor to furnish such child or children with the necessary books with which to attend school, then the county superintendent of public instruction of the county where such parent, guardian, or custodian resides shall furnish temporary aid for such purpose to such child or children, which aid shall be allowed and paid upon the certificate of such officer by the board of county commissioners of said county.

SEC. 5. If any widowed mother or disabled father shall make affidavit to the effect that the wages of his or her child or children under sixteen years of age are necessary to the support of such widowed mother or disabled father, then the county superintendent of public instruction may, after careful investigation, in his discretion furnish such child or children a certificate called a "scholarship," stating the amount of the wages such child or children are receiving, or so much of such wages as shall be deemed necessary to the support of such widowed mother or disabled father, so long as such child or children shall attend the public school in accordance with the provisions of this statute, which aid shall be allowed and paid upon the certificate of such county superintendent of public instruction to the child or children holding such scholarship by the board of county commissioners of the county in which such child or children reside.

SEC. 7. Any child who absents itself from school habitually may be adjudged a confirmed truant by the truant officer, the county superintendent of public instruction, and the superintendent of the schools of the city. Such confirmed truant shall be brought before the judge of the county court for such disposition as may be deemed best, in his discretion, and may be turned over to the probation officer of the juvenile court or be sentenced to such reformatory institution as may be designated.

SEC. 8. In order that the provisions of this act may be more definitely enforced it is hereby provided that the enumerators of school children, in taking the school census, shall ascertain and record the place and date of birth of every child enumerated, and the parent, guardian, or custodian of such child shall subscribe and take oath or affirmation that such record is true. The enumerator is hereby empowered to administer such oath or affirmation, and any parent, guardian, or custodian, or any child who shall refuse to take such oath or affirmation shall be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined any sum not less than one dollar ($1).

Sec. 9. On the first day of school the trustees, boards of trustees, or commissioners of school corporations shall furnish the truant officer with the names of the children of compulsory age who are enumerated on the regular enumeration lists. These names shall be alphabetically arranged and shall give all the information contained in the regular enumeration returns. The county commissioners shall provide necessary postage and such blanks as may be required by the State superintendent of public instruction.

Sec. 10. It shall be the duty of truant officers, in visiting factories and other establishments where children under sixteen years of age are employed, to report to the commissioner of labor any cases they may discover of the violation of the laws relating to the employment of children.

Sec. 11. All laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

Sec. 12. For the preservation of the public health and safety an emergency is hereby declared, by reason whereof this act shall take effect and be in force from and after its passage and approval.

McKELWAY EXHIBIT NO. 5.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR READING REPORTS HEREUNTO ATTACHED.

This report contains the census of the school districts, the enrollment, and the attendance.

The percentage of enrollment and attendance is obtained by deducting the census for the actual enrollment average attendance; the same is true when a number of districts are added up at the end of each report.

Here is an example for comparison of mill districts with rural districts and like, whereas a report for the year 1911 and 1912 for the entire rural school population.

The State reports for 1912-13 are not available.

School reports 1912-13—White.

CALDWELL COUNTY, N. C.

	Census.	Enroll.	Attend.	Per c. en.	Per c. at.
4 cotton mill districts.
Whitnel Mills, Lenoir, 6.....	250	165	62	66	24
Hudson Mills, Hudson, 1.....	242	187	152	77	62
Dudley Shoals Mill, Little River, 6.....	181	83	47	45	25
Valmeade, Moore Mills, Lower Creek, 4.....	196	127	52	64	26
Average per cent of en. and at., 4 cotton mill dist.....	869	562	313	64	36
8 rural districts.
Lovelady, 8.....	64	60	58	93	82
Lower Creek, 1.....	78	68	38	87	48
Lower Creek, 2.....	67	58	38	86	56
Globe, 4.....	46	28	24	60	52
Little River, 1.....	41	40	22	97	53
Patterson, 4.....	44	41	26	93	59
Yadkin Valley, 1.....	48	46	23	96	47
Wilsons Creek.....	27	27	23	100	85
Average per c. of en. and at., 8 rural dists.....	415	368	247	88	59
SUMMARY.
Mill districts.
Average, 4 mill districts.....	869	562	313	64	36
Rural districts.
Average for 8 rural districts.....	415	368	247	88	59
Rural report, Caldwell County, State Reports, 1911-12.....	4,821	3,210	2,148	66	44

At none of the four mills has any schoolhouse been built by the mill.

At Whitnel the mill contributed $140 to pay teachers. I learned that the mill owners had helped to defeat a school tax.

School reports 1912-13—White—Continued.

CATAWBA COUNTY, N. C.

	Census.	Enrol.	Attend.	Per cent of en.	Perc. of att.
4 cotton mill districts, Hickory Township.
Ivey Mills, Hickory, 14	96	57	31	59	33
Shuford Mills, Hickory, 17.....	225	144	100	64	44
Brookford Mills, Hickory, 15.....	248	127	78	51	31
Ivey Mills, Hickory, 16.....	265	190	112	71	42
Average per of en. and at. 4 cotton mill districts	834	518	321	62	33
12 rural districts, Hickory Township.
Hickory, 11.....	50	33	20	66	40
Hickory, 12.....	79	55	35	69	44
Hickory, 6.....	79	70	55	88	69
Hickory, 5.....	72	54	34	75	47
Hickory, 4.....	108	76	55	70	50
Hickory, 2.....	67	57	36	85	53
Hickory, 3.....	75	58	41	76	54
Hickory, 13.....	131	93	58	70	44
Hickory, 1.....	46	40	25	86	54
Hickory, 19.....	49	45	30	90	61
Hickory, 7 (part mill P).....	150	103	60	68	40
Hickory, 9.....	76	65	48	85	63
Av. per of en. and at., 12 rural districts.....	982	749	497	76	50
Cotton mill districts.
Long Island Mill, Catawba district, 4.....	190	156	113	82	59
Providence and Maiden Mills, Newton district, 4 and 6.....	299	178	139	59	46
Town of Newton, State report 1911-12 (Newton is a mill town).....	828	458	311	55	37
Average per mill district above.....	1,317	794	563	60	42
6 rural districts.
3 rural districts, Catawba Township:
Catawba, 3.....	51	48	36	94	70
Catawba, 8.....	58	52	37	89	63
Catawba, 1.....	64	54	43	84	67
3 rural districts, Newton Township:
Newton, 3.....	64	61	52	95	81
Newton, 8.....	79	66	50	83	63
Newton, 11.....	88	62	46	70	52
Average 6 rural districts.....	404	343	264	84	65
SUMMARY.
Mill districts.
Average for 7 mill districts, including Newton.....	2,151	1,312	884	60	41
Rural districts.
Average, 18 rural districts, Catawba County.....	1,386	1,092	761	79	55
Rural report, Catawba County, State report, 1911-12.....	7,237	4,983	3,651	68	54

Ivey Mill population lives in two districts.

Brookford Mill contributed $1,600 in schoolhouses.

GUILFORD COUNTY, N. C.

	Census.	Enroll.	Attend.	Perc. of en.	Perc. of att.
Mill districts.
White Oak.....	920	354	218	38	23
Proximity.....	576	188	158	32	27
Revolution.....	305	159	89	52	29
Average, 3 mills.....	1,801	701	465	38	25
Gibsonville District:
2 mills, pt. rural.....	390	275	190	70	43
Pomona Mills.....	119	55	26	46	21
Average, 5 mill districts.....	2,310	1,031	681	44	29

School reports 1912-13—White—Continued.

GUILFORD COUNTY, N. C.—Continued.

	Census.	Enroll.	Attend.	Perc. of en.	Perc. of att.
11 rural districts.
South Buffalo.....	131	117	85	89	64
Bessemere.....	158	155	102	97	64
McAdoo Heights (fact. mill pop.).....	105	67	43	63	40
Tucker.....	47	31	24	66	51
Gethsemane.....	67	47	40	70	59
McIver.....	124	80	57	64	45
Deep River.....	74	43	30	58	32
Oak Ridge.....	130	122	69	93	53
Friendship.....	71	44	30	62	42
Whitsett.....	81	66	54	81	66
McLeansville.....	116	95	71	81	61
Average for 11 rural districts.....	1,104	867	605	78	54
10 rural townships.
Madison Township.....	226	197	130
Jefferson Township.....	374	296	226
Monroe Township.....	323	226	140
Morehead Township.....	934	775	505
Sumner Township.....	362	272	168
Bruce Township.....	364	277	162
Oak Ridge Township.....	410	373	250
Friendship Township.....	477	386	246
High Point Township.....	1,072	792	483
	4,542	3,594	2,310	79	50
SUMMARY.
5 mill districts.....	2,310	1,081	681	44	29
3 leading mills—White Oak, Revolution, Proximity.....	1,801	701	465	38	25
11 rural districts.....	1,104	867	605	78	54
9 rural townships.....	4,542	3,594	2,310	79	50
Rural report, Guilford County, 1911-12.....	9,702	6,818	4,492	67	46

Found report for only two months for Proximity.
Gibsonville is in part rural.
Four good county high schools, but none at mills.

DAVIDSON COUNTY, N. C.

	Census.	Enroll- ment.	Attend.	Per cent of en.	Per cent of attend.
2 cotton mill districts, Lexington Township.
Nokomis Mill, Lexington, 1.....	156	125	58	80	37
Dokatok Mill, Lexington, 3.....	155	103	52	66	33
Total for 2 mill districts.....	311	228	110	73	35
9 rural districts.
Lexington, 2.....	72	51	35
Lexington, 4.....	97	90	74
Lexington, 5.....	92	80	52
Lexington, 6.....	101	83	55
Lexington, 7.....	96	92	61
Lexington, 8.....	63	55	31
Lexington, 9.....	80	63	40
Lexington, 10.....	15	11	9
Lexington, 11.....	40	36	27
Total.....	656	561	384	85	58
Rural report for entire county, including mill districts, 1912-13.....	7,087	5,271	3,753	74	52
Report for Thomasville, Davidson County, 1912-13: Thomasville has 2 cotton mills.
Johnsonville.....	907	528	417	58	45
Johnsonville (Negro).....	268	161	100	60	37

NOTE.—Per cent of enrollment, rural districts better by 12; per cent of attendance, rural districts better by 23; in rural districts enrollment better than in Thomasville two mills by 27; in rural districts attendance better than in Thomasville two mills by 13.
Negro enrollment and attendance nearly as good as for white children in Thomasville.
Entire county rural, including mill districts, better in both enrollment and attendance than mill districts.

WOODS EXHIBIT.

[City of New York police department. Office of the commissioner.]

MAY 28, 1915.

INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: In compliance with your request I send you the following information.

1. Names of private detective agencies which have been used in connection with industrial disturbances: William J. Burns; Pinkerton National Detective Agency; Dougherty Military Police and Detective Agency; Berger Bros.; Empire Secret Service Bureau (Fitzpatrick and Baum); Luxemburg Agency; Schmittberger Agency; Long Acre Agency; United Secret Service Agency (Max Schlansky and Louis Schultz); Ike Silverman (Fidelity Secret Service Bureau); Kelly Agency (formerly known as the Jackson Agency); Kenmore Detective Agency; and Waddell-Mahon Agency.

2. Names of persons or agencies by whom gangsters were sent to other cities: Max Sigmund, Abe Mitchell, Max Schlansky, and Lawrence Agency.

As to whether or not guards, strike breakers, or other people were sent from New York to Calumet and West Virginia, I am unable to say. There is at the present time no available evidence upon which I could predicate an answer.

Yours, very truly,

ARTHUR WOODS,
Police CommissionerCYPHERS EXHIBIT.

Slav. Commonwealth v. Thomas Stevenic and Frank Haska. Denied charge. Riot. 530. Rock in pocket. Throwing stones. Mechanics. Bail, $1,000. Arrested in house. John Gallagher and Chas. Rose.

Commonwealth v. John Collins. Charge, riot. $1,000. Trenton, N. J.

Commonwealth v. John Sesminski. Riot. Bail, $1,000. Throwing stones. No. 666 Oak Street. Father and mother. Poplars Crossing.

John Misko. Riot. Throwing stone. 411 6th. 4 years. Throwing stones. Bail, $1,000.

Andrew Kunack. Riot. Calling scab. Work, blast furnace. 540 Thomas St. 4 years. Bail, $1,000. Steven Tomas. Chas. Gould, witness. Did not see.

Lorence Gesesto. 3d. Discharged. Carrying knife. 937 5th. 4 years. Bail, $500. Knife open up arm sleeve.

Geo. Nogs. Arrest. Threw stone. Knife opened. 1. Riot, $1,000. 2. Carrying knife. Chapman's quarries. Paul Tonshist. Worked stone quarry.

Steve Dun. Riot. Thomas St., No. 524. Steel wire. 3 years. $1,000. Saw him throw stones. Arrest in house.

John Gardner. Throwing stone. Riot. $1,000. Had stones in hands. 817 Laufer Ave. Jos. Mayer, R. R. Jos. Gardner, Passaic.

John Tuks. Throwing stones. Riot. $1,000. No. 616 School Alley. Many Conell. Brother lives 738 Butternut. One stone in pocket. $1,000.

Lewis Kalman. Throwing stones. Riot. 748 School Alley. Mille Railr. $1,000. Wife 3 children. Rock in hand. Knocked off helmet.

Stanley Bromkosky. Throwing stones. Revolver. 808 Center St.

Albert Border. Old mill. $500. Poplar and 4th St. Big revolver.

Frank Fakas. Riot. Chapman's quarries. Paul ———, Hungarian. Bail, $1,000. 1 mo. 3 years. Got 3d St. barber shop. Saw him throw stone that broke picture frame at John Kiss.

Tony Connoll. No. 7 School Alley. Wife and 5 children. Zeigenfus. A. L. Cope.

Sunch & Steven. 3d St. To-day, Feby. 28, 1910. Forenoon.

Swore. John Shievley. Monroe Hieght. 2d Poplar St. Disorderly conduct.

Jos. Pass. 208 Birch St. Puddle mill. 7 mo. Kleige. Came Hazzard.

Suits: Commonwealth v. John.

JONES EXHIBIT.

Sketch of life of O. L. Maxwell, better known as "Gunplay" Maxwell, outlaw, ex-convict, deputy sheriff, and mine guard for Utah Fuel Co. Killed at Price, Utah, August 25, 1909.

In June, 1900, Maxwell and two of his gang held up and robbed the bank at Springville, Utah, killing the cashier. In the pursuit that followed one of the bank robbers was killed, and Maxwell and a companion named Warner were captured. They were sentenced to a term in prison at Salt Lake City.

Maxwell, being of good address and having a good education, soon gained the confidence and good will of the warden, who gave Maxwell unusual liberties.

On account of the liberties afforded him Maxwell had opportunities to communicate with other prisoners, and he planned to break jail and take a number of the most desperate ones with him, among them being Warner, his pal. The governor of Utah and the prison trustees had arranged to visit the prison on a tour of inspection, and Maxwell, knowing this, planned the break for that day. Now, here is where Maxwell's true character is shown. He went to the warden of the prison and told him that the prisoners were plotting to escape, and that his old pal, Warner, was the leader of the gang. After giving the warden the details of the plot as he had planned it, the warden concluded to let the plan go on, as if he was not aware of it, but he took extra precaution to prevent the plan from succeeding.

The governor and the board arrived as per their program, and when Warner and the others made their break for freedom they were promptly overpowered. Maxwell was brought before the governor, and for his loyalty and good conduct in exposing the plot he was pardoned. Maxwell then went to Helper, where he engaged in gambling, and being a bad man in general, in 1903 and 1904 he was hired by the Utah Fuel Co. as a mine guard and held a commission as a deputy sheriff for some time.

In 1907 he shot L. C. Reidel, a coal miner, at Helper. He was never prosecuted for this.

In 1906 Tom Kelter, a conductor on the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad, was elected sheriff of Carbon County, and he made up his mind to get rid of "Gunplay" Maxwell. Maxwell had organized a gang and was hanging around Helper. Sheriff Kelter learned of a plan of Maxwell's to rob the bank at Green River on July 9, and work on his counterplot began at once. He came to Salt Lake and engaged Ed Johnson as deputy, and also engaged John MacQuarrie, another deputy, of unquestioned courage and skillful with a gun.

In his plan to rob the bank Maxwell had enlisted the aid of five men, four of whom were known to the officers.

The plans of Sheriff Kelter and his deputies to capture the gang were spoiled by an accomplice of Maxwell's now living in Green River, who warned Maxwell that a close watch was being kept, and that their plans were probably known.

Maxwell left for Ogden, where he remained with his second wife, Mrs. W. H. Seman, as she calls herself. Funds were apparently low, as Maxwell pawned the woman's jewels, on which he realized nearly $400, before starting for Carbon County again. This time he planned to hold up the paymaster of the Kenilworth mine.

On Saturday afternoon, when the paymaster rode through Spring Glen on his way to Kenilworth, he was accompanied by a strong guard under the leadership of MacQuarrie and Johnson. Maxwell and a partner were provided with horses and hidden behind a shack along the road near the water tank halfway to Kenilworth when the paymaster and his guards passed. They sized up the party and evidently concluded that it was too big for them, allowing the men to pass, believing they had not been seen. Maxwell's partner on this occasion was a heavy built man who is not known in the vicinity of Price.

About ten days ago C. E. Davies, who has been implicated with Maxwell in a number of "expeditions," and who was ordered to leave the country for his connection with Maxwell when the bandit shot L. C. Reidel at Helper two years ago, appeared at Price and began making inquiries concerning Sheriff Kelter and his "gunmen" deputies, naming MacQuarrie and Johnson. Davies remarked that he had heard that both MacQuarrie and Johnson were bad men with guns, but that Maxwell would be in Price on Thursday and make short work of Kelter and his gunmen.

On Monday morning, the day he met his death, Maxwell appeared in Price, saying he had walked in from a sheep camp. He immediately began to load up on Price whisky, telling what a bad man he was with a gun. To demonstrate his fierceness, he accosted two traveling men, and at the point of his revolver he compelled them to enter a saloon and buy drinks. Sheriff Kelter ordered his deputies to arrest Maxwell, and when the deputies approached him Maxwell said to Johnson: "You are the ——— I'm after," at the same time pulling his gun.

Johnson and MacQuarrie fired at the same time, the balls from their guns entering Maxwell's breast and going clear through his body. The ball from Maxwell's gun went through the lapel of Johnson's coat. Men who were watching the affair from across the railroad track saw the dust fly from his coat and saw the tear in his back as the bullets passed through his body, and also the spatter of dust as the spent balls were embedded in the ground.

DREW EXHIBIT NO. 1.

ADDRESS BY JOHN A. MOFFITT, COMMISSIONER OF CONCILIATION, UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, BEFORE THE AMERICAN ERECTORS' ASSOCIATION, AT PITTSBURGH, PA., ON MARCH 9, 1915.

MR. CHAIRMAN AND MEMBERS OF THE AMERICAN ERECTORS' ASSOCIATION:

As my card would indicate, I am representing the United States Department of Labor. On or about the 27th day of February, Mr. Secretary Wilson of the department was advised that a strike in the oil fields of Oklahoma and Texas, involving approximately 1,000 men, was in vogue, and he was petitioned by the officials of the Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders, requesting that he use the good offices of his department to bring about an adjustment, if possible, of the strike.

The Secretary was advised that the members of the American Erectors' Association met frequently in the city of Pittsburgh, at the Fort Pitt Hotel, and he directed me to come here and take this matter up with you gentlemen, to see if something could not be done; and if there was not some general grounds upon which you could meet the representatives of the boiler makers, looking toward an amicable adjustment of this strike.

I may say in passing, that upon my arrival here I discovered that no such an association was meeting at the Fort Pitt Hotel, and then I ferreted out one of the local representatives of the boiler makers, and requested that he furnish me with a list of the names of the members of the association. Among others, he gave me the name of Mr. Hughes, of Warren City. I think it fair to Mr. Hughes to state that I wired him on last Friday. The contents of the telegram, as near as I can remember, was where and when, at the convenience of Mr. Hughes, I could converse with him on matters in connection with this strike. Having received no reply from Mr. Hughes, I called him by phone. Mr. Hughes informed me over the phone that he had received my telegram, but was rather embarrassed upon its receipt, because there was an understanding with the members of your organization that matters pertaining to the strike of the boiler makers could be taken up only by the general membership of your organization and not by an individual member; and in order to live up to the understanding of the organization he did not care to discuss with me the merits or demerits of the case. I told Mr. Hughes that I appreciated his position, and that he was justified in the position he was taking. He gave me the names of the officers of the organization, and I went to the Petroleum Iron Works and met Mr. Todd. Mr. Todd advised me of this meeting to-day.

I do not know that I have anything to say other than that the general officers of the boiler makers have informed Secretary Wilson, and the Secretary has so informed me, that they are willing to make any honorable settlement that will be beneficial to both sides, if a conference can be brought about between representatives of your organization and a committee of their organization.

I understand that the members of your organization made contracts with their men who work in the field, and they agree that these contracts from time to time are violated, and by their men. They said that the only way they could obviate difficulties of that kind in the future would be to have an agreement with your association and their national organization, instead of with the men in the field; they had in mind when they made this suggestion that in the past they had agreements with the members of your organization and that the agreements had been violated, and by the men that made the agreements; that is, their own men; they admit that they are guilty of violating these agreements, but they said that the only way that such violations could be obviated in the future would be to have an agreement with your organization and their organization, and not with the men in the field at all; they said that in making an agreement with their organization that would be mutually beneficial, in the event of men in the field violating any of the provisions of such agreement, they would, by their own act, deprive themselves of membership in their organization. These were some of the suggestions they made to get a conference.

They further agreed that a man in New York by the name of McCarthy, business agent of the boiler makers, raised considerable trouble between the boiler makers and their employers, and did many nasty things that were very displeasing to the manufacturers, and that the manufacturers were right in being displeased with the attitude of this McCarthy; that this McCarthy has been disciplined to the extent of putting him out of their organization altogether. Other matters, minor in detail, were spoken of in connection with the system that was in vogue in the oil fields of Oklahoma, some of which the Department of Labor did not approve of, because they believed them to be against public policy, such as to tax a man for the privilege of working, commonly known as permits. I questioned the men to some extent on this proposition, and they agreed that I was perfectly right about this, and if they can have an agreement with your organization instead of the men in the field, that this system will be entirely eliminated.

In a general way this is their proposition, made to the Secretary, and the Secretary directed me to come here and repeat it, and see if something could not be done to bring about a settlement of the strike in the oil fields, which must be distressing to women and children.

In talking with Mr. Todd, he has his grievance, and justly so, I believe. I want to tell you, gentlemen, that I met some of the boiler makers last night, and I went over some of the matters Mr. Todd discussed with me, and they plead guilty. There is no argument they could advance to justify them in the matter.

I learned that they have somebody furnishing them with what they call "bootleg whisky" in the camps. This proposition, it seems to me, would be a means of inciting the minds of the very best-balanced men, if the character of the stuff is as it was described to me. An elimination of this "bootleg whisky," as they call it, I think would bring about peace in the family of manufacturers and boiler makers.

But these are all matters that, if you can see your way clear to meet a committee of the boiler makers, can be taken up and satisfactorily adjusted. They did not volunteer all this information; it was brought out by questioning them. This, gentlemen in summary, is my purpose here. If there are any questions you desire to ask, I am here to answer.

DREW EXHIBIT NO. 2.

[National Erectors' Association, 286 Fifth Avenue, New York.]

NEW YORK CITY, May 20, 1915.

Mr. HARRIS WEINSTOCK,

United States Commission on Industrial Relations,

Shoreham Hotel, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. WEINSTOCK: I inclose you page 343¹ of the Bridgemen's Magazine for May, 1915. The article entitled "Unionist compares wages" contains a comparative statement of wages in the different building trades in the year 1898 and in the year 1915. It is interesting in connection with the statement of Mr. Johannsen that the wages of the ironworker before the union was organized was only $2.50 a day and that the union had brought about the subsequent increases, the inference being that the $2.50 rate, being under open-shop conditions, was unduly low.

This statement shows that Mr. Johannsen was correct in saying that the rate in the early days was $2.50 a day (or $15 a week). It also shows, however, that this rate of $15 was equal to the wage paid in 1898 to the carpenter, the hoisting engineer, the lather, and the electrician, and was in excess of the wage paid the building excavator, the hod carrier, the cement worker, the elevator worker, and the painter. Nearly all of these were, of course, strongly organized long previous to that time.

It thus appears that the open-shop ironworker in that early day was receiving a wage equal to the union man in other building trades, and that his wages of to-day, after eight years of the open shop, have, as stated in the article ($27.50 a week) maintained the same proportion of increase as the rates in the trades that have been upon a continuous closed-shop basis. As this statement is published in the last issue of the official organ of the ironworkers' union, I consider it fair evidence.

¹ Submitted in printed form.

Yours, truly,

WALTER DREW, Counsel.

WILSON EXHIBIT.

[Department of Labor. Office of the Secretary. Washington.]

PRELIMINARY REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF CONCILIATION.

MARCH 12, 1915.

Re Boiler Makers v. American Erectors' Association. Mediation requested by boiler makers. Commissioner, John A. Moffitt. Date of assignment, March 2, 1915.

To the honorable the Secretary of Labor:

For your information I have the honor herewith to submit a preliminary report of my efforts as commissioner of conciliation in the strike affecting one thousand (1,000) boiler makers in the oil fields of Oklahoma and Texas.

Questions involved: American Erectors' Association declared for the "open shop" January 18, 1915.

Number of employees directly affected, one thousand (1,000).

Status of negotiations prior to arrival: Officers of Brotherhood of Boiler Makers requested a conference with American Erectors' Association, which was refused.

Conferences held at Pittsburgh, Pa.; Youngstown, Ohio.; Sharon, Pa., with Joe Franklin, representing boiler makers, March 3, 4, 7, 1915; James Sause, representing boiler makers, March 3, 4, 7, 1915; Mr. Todd, representing American Erectors' Association, March 5, 6, 7, 1915; Mr. Hughes, representing American Erectors' Association, March 5, 6, 7, 1915; and meeting of erectors' association at Pittsburgh March 7, 1915.

Status of conciliatory efforts, briefly stated: Erectors' association will employ the men on strike if they wish to return to work and under the same conditions that prevailed anterior to the strike; i. e., union wages and hours, and will not question their trade-union affiliations.

Remarks: Your representative recommended the acceptance of the above to the officers of the union, and the same was taken under advisement by them.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN A. MOFFITT,
Commissioner of Conciliation.

[The Reeves Brothers Co.]

ALLIANCE, OHIO, March 20, 1915.

Hon. W. B. WILSON,
Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We inclose herewith a letter from Mr. Walter Drew, counsel for the American Erectors' Association, of which we are a member. We indorse what Mr. Drew says as covering the situation quite fully.

Yours, very truly,

THE REEVES BROTHERS CO.
By GEORGE REEVES,
President

[National Erectors' Association.]

286 FIFTH AVENUE,
New York City, March 16, 1915.

To the members of the American Erectors' Association.

GENTLEMEN: I have received a copy of the remarks of Mr. John A. Moffitt, of the United States Department of Labor, made to the association members on March 9. It is my judgment that Mr. Moffitt has greatly strengthened your position, and in fact made it practically indefensible. He states that he has investigated the situation personally, has heard the union's side from its own members, and that the charges made against the conduct of the union are admittedly true. He points out no grievance arising out of wages, hours, or other labor conditions which require adjustment or any mediation or conciliation. His sole purpose as the representative of the Department of Labor is to induce you to enter into contract relations upon a closed-shop basis with an organization which has proved itself unfit to be a party to a collective bargain. I do not believe that in making such an effort the Department of Labor is exercising its proper functions. It might well interject itself into any situation where serious grievances and unfair conditions existed. Lacking even the claim of anything that is unjust or unfair, it does not seem the proper function of an impartial Government to endeavor to force any citizen or group of citizens into entering into contract relations with any particular organization, especially when the organization demands that the agreement shall constitute practically a monopoly in its favor.

A large percentage of the men now employed by your people held permits from this same union before the open shop was established, and no objection, therefore, could lie to them from the standpoint of the union. The vicious permit system, with its levy of 10 per cent of the wages of the permit men for the benefit of the union treasury, was made possible by the refusal of the union to admit these men to membership. To enter into an agreement with the union at this time would mean the discharge of these men or their compulsory membership in the union, if the agreement were not upon an open-shop basis. If the union is willing to permit its members to work open-shop, no agreement is necessary at this time and the work is open to them. There are no grievances to be redressed and nothing in the actual labor conditions themselves to be discussed or mediated. Should such conditions later develop, there will then be something of which it will be proper for the Department of Labor to take cognizance.

In conclusion, it seems too clear for argument that the present employees of your people are entitled to the consideration and protection of the Department of Labor just as much as are the members of the union, if the functions of a democratic government are to be equally and impartially administered. They are working under conditions admittedly fair from the union standpoint. They are working, not as strike breakers, but as regular and permanent employees. Members of the union have worked side by side with many of them when they held cards as permit men. That they could not work as members of the union was due to the act of the union and not to their own inclination. That they should continue to surrender 10 per cent of their wages to the union treasury for the privilege of working, nobody now justifies. If the union had no objection to its members working side by side with nonmembers, so long as such nonmembers could be taxed, it certainly should raise no objection now to its members continuing to work side by side with nonmembers when such tax, admittedly iniquitous, has been removed. But aside from this, should not the Department of Labor exercise its influence to protect these present employees rather than to lend itself to the effort of the organization which has exploited them to restore itself to a position of power and control over them?

I can only say again that the remarks of Mr. Moffitt have not only strengthened your position, but they should strengthen your determination to continue your present policy. If collective agreements are to be entered into, they should have two responsible contracting parties who have shown some respect for the obligation of contracts and who can give proper guarantees for full and faithful performance. The time is fast passing when irresponsible organizations, under reckless and sometimes corrupt leadership, can command the support of public opinion in forcing closed-shop agreements upon employers. Mere promises to reform and do better—and even such promises are made only in case of defeat—are no longer sufficient. A trade agreement is a business contract and the unions must shape themselves into such responsible and businesslike form that they can make agreements upon the same basis of integrity and responsibility as other business contracts are made.

It may be again remarked that for any of the forces of Government to be employed to compel or influence collective bargaining upon any other basis is a partisan and perverted misuse of the functions of government, which will in the end react to the detriment of the class who seek thus to misuse government for its own ends.

Yours, truly,

WALTER DREW,
Counsel, American Erectors' Association.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 26, 1915.

Mr. GEORGE REEVES,
President Reeves Brothers Co., Alliance, Ohio.

DEAR SIR: I have your favor of the 20th instant, inclosing letter from Mr. Walter Drew, counsel of the American Erectors' Association, relative to the remarks of Mr. John A. Moffitt, of the United States Department of Labor, made to your association members on March 9, while he was endeavoring to adjust a labor dispute existing between you and your employees.

I have no desire to enter into any discussion of the merits or demerits of the controversy with Mr. Drew, but when he asserts that "his (Moffitt's) sole purpose as a representative of the Department of Labor is to induce you to enter into contract on a closed-shop basis with an organization which has proven itself unfit to be a party to a collective bargain" he completely fails to grasp the purposes and policies of this department. Mr. Moffitt's sole purpose was to find, if possible, a common ground that would be acceptable to both parties as a basis of settlement of the dispute. In this particular case our representative found that the dispute centered around a question of the so-called "open" or "closed" shop. That, then, became the important question he had to deal with. If in handling it he found it advisable to suggest to the employers a so-called "closed-shop" arrangement, or to suggest to the workmen a so-called "open-shop" arrangement, it did not and could not mean his indorsement of either policy. Its sole significance was that he was seeking a common ground that would be acceptable to both. The right to accept or reject remained with the parties to whom the suggestions were made, and the statement of Mr. Drew that such a process is an "endeavor to force any citizen or group of citizens into entering into contract relations with any particular organization" is, therefore, unfounded.

I may add that in dealing with these problems the question with the department is not "Are the workmen organized or unorganized"? The question is "Does a labor dispute exist, and can we be of any assistance in adjusting it"?

I trust that this brief statement may result in clarifying the situation so far as the policy and purpose of this department is concerned.

Respectfully, yours,

W. B. WILSON, Secretary.

DAVID CLARK EXHIBIT NO. 1.

COTTON-MILL WAGES.

On May 11 Dr. McKelway gave evidence to the effect that 1,085 adults and a large number of children in southern cotton mills earn less than $2 per week, and after floundering through four pages of testimony he was finally cornered and told you to divide the $2 by six in order to obtain the daily average of 33½ cents.

Questioned still further by Mr. Walsh he stated that a fair study of the subject had been made, and that 33½ cents was the correct figure.

Through that testimony Dr. McKelway has been able to create over this country the false impression that many adults and children in southern cotton mills receive 33½ cents per day.

Dr. McKelway has lived in the South and knows absolutely that no such scale of wages has existed during the last 20 years.

It is his custom to quote antiquated figures wherever they will answer his purpose, and in this case he gave you figures compiled in 1908 or seven years ago.

These figures were compiled under a labor commissioner whose name, I think, was Niell; and it was openly charged at the time that Mr. Niell was unduly influenced by Dr. McKelway, and that the forms of reports and instructions to field agents were doctored to suit McKelway's wishes.

In the 1908 report is a table of earnings for one special week, and it specifically states that the figures for those earning less than $2 are for that specified week and are for those who worked less than full time.

Dr. McKelway is an intelligent man, and he knows these facts as well as I do, but it is a fixed policy of the National Child Labor Committee, and admitted by their vice chairman, Homer Folks, to misrepresent facts wherever it suits their purpose.

The December, 1914, report of M. L. Shipman, commissioner of labor for North Carolina, gives the wages paid in North Carolina cotton mills as follows: High average daily wage for males, $2.80; low average, 97 cents. High average daily wage for females, $1.48; low average, 82 cents. The report does not distinguish between children and adults.

The report of the United States Department of Commerce, issued under date of May 11, 1914, gives in detail the wages paid in southern cotton mills, and I take the following figures for North Carolina from same:

Per day.
Spinners.....	$0.95	Speeder hands.....	1.50
Slasher tenders.....	1.50	Loom fixers.....	1.68
Drawing-frame hands.....	.99	Weavers.....	1.46
Card hands.....	1.17

The report of the tariff board, issued in 1912, gives the average wages of operatives in the southern cotton mills, from which they compiled data, as follows (see p. 647):

Per day.
Picker hands.....	$0.993	Spinners.....	1.04
Card hands.....	1.028	Doffers (time workers).....	.836
Drawing-frame hands.....	.925	Doffers (pieceworkers).....	1.159
Slubber tenders.....	1.374	Weavers.....	1.469
Speeder tenders.....	1.38	Loom fixers.....	1.692

The Exposition Cotton Mills, Atlanta, Ga., have furnished me a comparison of the actual weekly earning of operatives that worked full time in 1894, 1904, and 1914. It is a table of much value, as it shows that mill operatives' wages have more than doubled in the last 20 years.

Comparative wages and percentages for the first week in May, 1894, 1904, and 1914, as shown by pay roll of Exposition Cotton Mill.

Operation.	1894	1904	1914	Percentage of increase from—
				1894 to 1904	1904 to 1914	1894 to 1914
CARDING.
Overseer.....	$15.00	$24.00	$30.00	60	25	100
Second hand.....	6.60	9.60	13.50	45	40	106
Grinders.....	6.00	7.50	10.50	25	40	75
Card hands.....	2.40	4.50	7.50	87	66	213
Drawing.....	2.40	3.00	6.00	25	100	150
Slubbers.....	5.10	6.00	8.10	17	25	59
Speeders.....	4.45	6.00	9.90	34	65	122
Picker hands.....	3.30	4.80	7.50	45	57	127
Strippers.....	3.20	4.50	7.50	36	66	127
SPINNING.
Overseer.....	15.00	18.00	30.00	20	66	100
Second hand.....	9.00	9.00	13.50	00	50	50
Spinners.....	1.80	2.40	6.80	83	183	277
Doffers.....	1.80	3.00	9.00	66	200	433
Sweepers.....	1.20	3.00	5.25	150	75	337
Section hands.....	6.00	7.50	10.50	25	40	75
WEAVING.
Overseer.....	15.00	21.00	26.00	40	71	140
Second hand.....	9.00	10.50	15.00	16	43	66
Loom fixers.....	9.00	9.00	12.00	00	33	33
Piece weavers.....	4.30	6.40	12.00	49	87	179
Day weavers.....	3.60	5.10	9.00	41	76	150
Yard hands.....	3.30	6.00	7.50	92	25	127
Average.....				34	57	109

FAMILY WAGES.

Realizing that the total income of mill families would have a considerable bearing on the wage question, I went on last Saturday to the Chadwick-Hoskins Mills, near Charlotte, N. C., and obtained data relative to several of their best families. I secured the wage figures from the pay roll of the previous week.

MINGER FAMILY (FOUR WORKERS).

Three boys between ages of 14 and 22; one girl of 17. Father runs a truck garden. Mother keeps house. Boys work in weaving and slashing rooms and make $1, $2, and $2.50 per day, respectively. Girl works in the spinning room and makes $1.63 per day. Total weekly income of family, not including profit of father's truck garden, which also helps to feed them, is $42.78.

DELLINGER FAMILY (FIVE WORKERS.)

Four girls between the ages of 14 and 20 and one doffer boy. Father works as roving hauler. Mother does not work. Three of the girls work in the spinning room, and two of them make $1.50 per day, while the other makes $1.46 per day. The other girl in the spooler room makes $1.63 per day. Doffer boy makes 90 cents and the father $1 per day. Total weekly family income, $47.94.

PADGETT FAMILY (FOUR WORKERS).

Two girls between 14 and 19 years of age, a boy 17, and the father. Mother does not work. The three children are weavers paid by piecework and average slightly over $10 per week each. The father is a loom fixer and makes $10.50. Total weekly family income, $40.50.

These are what might be called "top-notch" incomes, but there are many families making the same, and they are in reach of most of the other families of equal size, as wages are largely based on piecework.

A Georgia mill has taken from their pay roll the earnings of families of three workers only and find the average to be $25.50 per week. This is more than $100 per month for small families and is better than in most of the other lines of work.

DAVID CLARK EXHIBIT NO. 2.ILLITERACY.

The 1910 census gives the illiteracy among the white population of North Carolina as 12.3 per cent, as compared with 19.5 per cent as in 1900, and shows that North Carolina made the greatest decrease during the decade of any State in the Union.

It can not be denied that this increase was to a considerable extent due to the educational work of the cotton mills and to the schools that they have established and maintained. For years the cotton manufacturers have led the fight for compulsory education.

The report of M. L. Shipman, commissioner of labor for North Carolina, issued on December 1, 1914, shows that 87 per cent of the cotton-mill operatives can read and write. In the woolen mills 89 per cent, silk mills 99.5 per cent, and cordage mills 98.3 per cent.

Dr. McKelway, as is typical of his efforts, gave you statistics of 1900, or 15 years ago, and endeavored to create the impression of extreme illiteracy.

In considering illiteracy figures it is unfair to North Carolina not to take into account the fact that we have a large crop of adult illiterates as an inheritance of the Civil War and the period of poverty and desolation that followed same. It should also be taken into account that we have a large mountain section and that it is extremely difficult to furnish schools for people living in the isolated sections. Our education is a matter that concerns North Carolina alone, and we fail to see why it is so great a concern to people of other States.

The 1913 report of the State superintendent of schools for Georgia shows only 3.6 per cent illiterate white, and yet Dr. McKelway's figures for 1900 show 44

DAVID CLARK EXHIBIT NO. 3.

[High Shoals Co. Sheetings and knitting yarns. Factory: High Shoals, N. C.]

HIGH SHOALS, N. C., May 15, 1915.

This is to certify that I have been principal of the High Shoals school for the last 10 or 11 years.

About the year of 1908 Miss Lillian Charles was secured as assistant teacher in our school. I am mighty sorry to say that Miss Charles was the most disagreeable assistant that I have ever worked with. She not only gave me trouble at High Shoals, but I have learned that she gave trouble at Cherryville, N. C., and at Greensboro, N. C., and some other places that I do not remember just now. She got to the point where we could not agree on anything, and it was almost impossible for our school to succeed in the face of so many difficulties such as she was continuously bringing up. I went so far as to make application for another job as teacher of the school at Lucia, Gaston County, N. C. When I went to put in my resignation, or talking the matter over, the committee advised me to stay. And the committee and all of us agreed that we would do everything possible to get Miss Charles to settle down to business and keep out of any disagreement, but later we found that we were not able to continue her service as assistant teacher. Therefore her resignation was called for. Miss Charles came to the school after this and wanted me to tell her that our relations had been entirely agreeable in every respect. I explained to her that some of our work was satisfactory, but on the whole it had been unsatisfactory.

W. R. RHYNE,
Principal High Shoals School.

[High Shoals Co. Sheetings and knitting yarns. Factory: High Shoals, N. C.]

HIGH SHOALS, N. C., May 15, 1915.

Mr. DAVID CLARK,
Charlotte, N. C.

MY DEAR SIR: A copy of Mr. McKelway's report received.

I am mighty sorry that such a report has ever been made. I can safely say that I do not know of a single instance in this report which I can say is true.

In regard to Miss Lillian Charles, we hired Miss Charles as assistant teacher in our schools at High Shoals. At this time we only had two teachers. Mr. W. R. Rhyne was principal and Miss Charles was employed as assistant. We also paid Miss Charles something extra on her salary to do visiting around the village, and to keep us posted as to the condition of the ladies and girls of this place. We also explained to her that we wanted to build up our young girls and women, and if there was anything that she could help us do we would be glad to cooperate with her. Everything went well, and Miss Charles made golden reports to us about what a nice village we had and how well the people fared, and she often explained to us that we had a grand and noble set of operatives. The first thing that we knew she took up with our school committee, A. Q. Kale, J. C. McBrayer, and D. A. Medlin, and impressed upon us that Mr. W. R. Rhyne, the principal, was an old foggy and a man wholly incompetent to be principal of a school of this kind. And the second or third time she came to us making complaints and reports on Mr. Rhyne we told her that we thought it was our duty to stand by Mr. Rhyne as he had been teaching for us some time and had always been satisfactory and had always been satisfactory to the superintendent of public schools, Mr. F. P. Hall.

We learned after Miss Charles got into trouble with Mr. Rhyne that she had had trouble with the principal at Cherryville; also that she had trouble at two or three other places. I think we could possibly locate the places where she had this trouble if it should be necessary.

After Miss Charles had the little trouble with Mr. Rhyne, our principal, she secured a place as teacher in a shorthand school somewhere in Georgia. She explained to Mrs. Henderson, the lady who kept the hotel at that time, that she had secured this position in Georgia and had packed her trunk when she left High Shoals for her Christmas vacation, and made arrangements with Mrs. Henderson to forward her trunk on receipt of a letter which she would write Mrs. Henderson when she got home. She also notified our school committee (by letter) that she had accepted this place and was sorry that she was not able to give us a longer notice. On the face of this letter we employed another teacher, but in the meantime she was notified by the people in Georgia that they could not employ her. So she was back here when the school started after the Christmas vacation. The committee explained to her that we had received her resignation and had also hired a teacher to fill her place. But she prevailed on us that she was a poor working girl and that it would be a hardship on her to be without a job, and we went ahead and discharged the new teacher we had employed and put Miss Charles back to work. She continued to give Mr. Rhyne trouble and we did ask her to resign.

In regard to Mr. Hines' report about the pictures: Mr. Hines came to High Shoals one day and explained to me that he had lung trouble and was using his camera trying to make his expenses from some point in the North to some place in the West where consumptive people were treated. He asked me to have our people lined up by the mill, so he could make a photograph of the operatives to sell and help pay his way to some tuberculosis camp in the West. We explained to him that our girls and boys were becoming very sensitive about having their pictures made in their everyday clothes. Mr. Hine left me at the end of this conversation and went to the schoolhouse and told the principal, Mr. Rhyne, that I had sent him up there to make a photograph of the school. Mr. Rhyne explained to him that the children were not dressed for a picture and would rather not have it made at that time, but he told Mr. Rhyne about the condition of his health and Mr. Rhyne consented to having the pictures made. We have not been able to see one of these pictures or any report which Mr. Hine made.

I want to tell you very frankly that we had no disagreement with Mr. Hine and our meeting and talk was very agreeable in every respect. Mr. Hine left the High Shoals Hotel about 9 o'clock in the night, secured a team from the High Shoals liveryman, and drove to Cherryville, N. C., a distance of 12 miles.

Yours, very truly,

A. O. KALE, Superintendent High Shoals Co.

DAVID CLARK EXHIBIT NO. 4.

THE LUMBERTON INCIDENT.

Frank Britt, a tenant farmer of Columbus County, N. C., hurt his foot while plowing and a bad case of blood poisoning was the result. Being absolutely without means and having a wife, three children, and a feeble-minded mother-in-law to support, he had to appeal to his two brothers, one of whom, Oliver Britt, was employed at the Lumberton Cotton Mills, Lumberton, N. C. Neither of his brothers were in good financial condition, but they did the best they could and contributed a considerable amount for doctor's bills and for having his leg amputated. The Lumberton Cotton Mills had some vacant houses at that time and at the request of Oliver Britt and as an act of charity they allowed the sick man and his family to be moved from his farm into one of the mill houses and to use the same without paying any rent.

Also as an act of charity, for Mrs. Frank Britt was a green hand and skilled hands were plentiful, they gave her work in the mill. Mrs. Britt could not make enough to feed the family and brought her oldest daughter, Lonie Britt, to the mill and, alleging that she was 12 years of age, secured work for her.

The superintendent, seeing her in the mill and noting her size, ordered that she be sent out; but the overseer, realizing the desperate straits of the family, allowed Mrs. Britt to persuade him Lonie was 12 years of age and she worked in the mill for 25 days. The second daughter, Flossie Britt, said by her mother to be 9 years old, never worked in the mill a single day.

The condition of Frank Britt, in spite of the amputation of his foot, became rapidly worse and he finally died. The wife, three children, and mother-in-law immediately left the mill, as the women's labor alone could not support the family, and moved back to the country where it is legal for even a boy of 7 to toil from sunrise to sunset and under the heat of noontime sun. They are now living there in a miserable hut and in almost destitute circumstances and were recently seen by a person who has been investigating this incident. The mill records show that Flossie Britt never worked a single day. They show that Lonie Britt worked in the mill for only 25 days. Her mother has now filed a statement to the effect that she was born on March 6, 1902, and her uncle, Oliver Britt, a very intelligent man, says that she is about 12 years of age.

The day before Frank Britt died, and while he was suffering agony from his blood poisoning, Photographer Hine, of the National Child Labor Committee, sneaking around among the cotton mills, came upon the scene. He did not do anything to relieve the suffering of the dying man or give money or aid to his wife or children. All he did was to back the two little girls up against the house and take their photograph, get a statement from the half-witted mother-in-law, and go his way.

He presented the photograph at the National Child Labor Conference on January 4, as girls of 6 and 7 years of age who were working regularly in a cotton mill. Since that time the National Child Labor Committee have been repeating the story over the country. I heard Owen Lovejoy tell a Boston audience of the photograph and intimate that it was one of a large number that he had.

The Lumberton incident is typical of the work of the National Child Labor Committee.

They have referred in some of their papers to a mill boy who had all of his fingers cut off as an illustration of the brutality of cotton mill work. As a matter of fact, the boy to whom they refer had his fingers cut off in some farm machinery while visiting his grandfather on his farm. They were about as near the truth as usual.

DAVID CLARK EXHIBIT NO. 5.

ACCIDENTS IN THE COTTON MILLS.

For several years there has been a persistent and studied effort on the part of the National Child Labor Committee to create the impression that work in southern cotton mills was dangerous and that children were almost daily being killed or maimed.

As a matter of fact very few people are hurt in cotton mills, and the machinery in the departments where women and children work is entirely harmless, and except through extreme carelessness it is almost impossible for anyone to be injured.

Companies that write employment liabilities naturally base their rates upon liability of accidents as found from the records of the past.

The following are the rates charged in North Carolina for a policy covering $5,000 for injury to one person, or $10,000 to several injured at the same time. The rate includes first medical aid and is the price charged per $100 of pay roll: Street car conductors, $4.08; planing mill, $2.47½; foundry and machine shops, $1.36; laundry work, $1.22; furniture factories, $1.09; farm laborers, $0.68; and cotton mills, $0.49½.

The evidence, therefore, of the people that pay money for accidents is that there are fewer accidents and less risks in cotton mills than in any other line of work. They show the remarkable fact that there is more risk in working on a farm than there is in a cotton mill.

DAVID CLARK EXHIBIT NO. 6.

CHARITY TRUST.

Republican Leader Hinman, of the New York Legislature, said in an interview published in the New York American of about March 10, 1915:

"I have been informed that Mr. Folks or his fellow officers collected about $180,000 last year, and that a large percentage was not disbursed for charitable purposes. Inasmuch as the Charities Aid Society owes its existence to the State, the State should know to a cent just how this large sum of money has been expended.

"Mr. Folks recently requested me to advocate a bill to make him the head of the State Charities Board. As such he would be compelled to make an accounting to the people for all moneys appropriated and disbursed. I assume, of course, he will be willing to furnish us with an account of his stewardship as an officer of the Charities Aid Society.

"I am told a bill has been introduced already compelling all private organizations to report annually to the secretary of state. It seems to me, however, that the legislature should know directly all about their financial dealings; hence my bill."

It was brought out at a hearing on the Thompson-Maier resolutions at Albany, N. Y., in February that Homer Folks draws a salary of $100 per day and expenses when acting as a member of the New York Public Health Council, and in addition receives a salary of $8,000 a year from the State Charities Aid Association. It is also said that he receives salaries from five other so-called charity organizations, including the National Child Labor Committee.

PENNSYLVANIA STATE POLICE.

(For exhibits under this subject see pages 11001 to 11025.)

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 6, 1915.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JAMES H. MAURER.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name, your residence, and your occupation.

Mr. MAURER. My name is James H. Maurer, occupation, machinist; at the present time president of the Pennsylvania State Federation of Labor.

Chairman WALSH. Have you made a special study of the Pennsylvania State police, Mr. Maurer?

Mr. MAURER. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. When was that department of the State police of Pennsylvania created?

Mr. MAURER. In 1905.

Chairman WALSH. How many men composed the constabulary, and how are they divided?

Mr. MAURER. The entire force consists of 232 men, four of whom—one the superintendent of police, and deputy superintendent, clerk, and stenographer—the rest are officers and men.

Chairman WALSH. Prior to the institution of the constabulary, what sort of a State police force was there in Pennsylvania?

Mr. MAURER. Why, the police we had prior to that time were known as coal and iron police—deputy sheriffs before the creation of the State police.

Chairman WALSH. Were those police in the employment of private corporations?

Mr. MAURER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. They were not officers of the State?

Mr. MAURER. Only to the extent that they received their authority—their right to be police—from the governor.

Chairman WALSH. And they were paid by whom?

Mr. MAURER. By the corporations whom they served.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate how many State police officers there were on duty at the time of the passage of this State constabulary law?

Mr. MAURER. No. Each corporation of any importance had a great many of these coal and iron police and private detectives.

Chairman WALSH. Well, now, were those laws repealed when the State constabulary was instituted?

Mr. MAURER. They promised—the general agitation in the assembly at the time, at the time they tried to pass or did pass the constabulary law, was that they were to take the place of the coal and iron police, and the bill itself, which I have here, creating the department made that provision, or made no such provision; but it did provide what it was to be used for. I notice here in one part it says, defining their duties, and says they are intended, so far as possible, to take the place of the police now appointed at the behest of various corporations. This is part of the act creating the department of State police in 1905, when Samuel W. Pennypacker was governor, and to answer your question, the law creating the department—the coal and iron department—this is a copy of the act creating that department, and this act was passed in 1865, and was supplemented by an act in 1866. The supplement provides that any corporation can have the same power that railroad corporations have. And I will offer these in evidence [handing same to the reporter].

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

(The papers referred to are copies from the "Laws of Pennsylvania," entitled "An act empowering railroad companies to employ police force," dated February 27, 1865 (p. 225) and "a supplement to an act approved the 27th day of February, anno Domini 1865, entitled "An act empowering railroad companies to employ police force," dated April 11, 1866 (p. 99); also a copy of a law of the State of Pennsylvania, entitled "An act creating the department of State police, etc.," approved May 2, 1905, which was submitted in printed form.)

Chairman WALSH. Now, as a matter of fact, were the coal and iron police dropped on the institution of the State constabulary?

Mr. MAURER. No, they were not. We still have the coal and iron police as we had before the institution of the State constabulary.

Chairman WALSH. From what forces are the State constabulary recruited—from the police force of the State or——

Mr. MAURER. No. The men are recruited from the ranks of ex-United States soldiers, and again many of them are recruited from the ranks or from the degenerate descendants of the middle classes, young men who are educated, but never amount to anything and no good for anything and generally hunt a job in the State police force.

Chairman WALSH. How many men altogether do you say? What is the total force.

Mr. MAURER. Forty-two.

Chairman WALSH. Have there been any labor disturbances in which the State police were called since the institution of this force?

Mr. MAURER. Oh, yes; a great many.

Chairman WALSH. Could you briefly state what they were, and the use and operation of the State police?

Mr. MAURER. Yes. They are used in various ways. It depends entirely on the nature of the trouble. If the strike is a very large one, say like we had in Westmoreland County, or in a big coal center, then they are used differently than they would be in a local situation, such as a trolley strike where the street car men go on a strike, or perhaps differently from what they would be on a railroad. I will have to recite—I will give you perhaps two illustrations.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Could you give the Bethlehem Steel Co., for instance; they were in that?

Mr. MAURER. I will give that; I can touch on that, too, but there is another witness here whom I believe will go into that more in detail. Take the Westmoreland coal strike as an example of a large strike. Then in a situation of that kind the deputy sheriffs provide thugs imported there from wherever they can get them, usually from the slums of the great cities, not natives; in very few cases are they natives. These men are clothed with the power and authority of deputies, and are therefore armed, with the right to arrest. Now, the coal and iron police are a little different. He is really more like a detective. He is a gum-shoe man, as it were, in the situation. And word may come to picket men saying that a train is bringing a carload of strike breakers in, to meet at a certain time at the station, and the thugs will gather, and when the train unloads its passengers, these pickets call out to them and say, "There is a strike on." "Don't go out, don't take our jobs." And sometimes they reach them—sometimes they get in close communication with them and sometimes not. That is when the imported thug comes in. He starts something. The coal and iron police, most of the time, are on the scene, and when they start something it is because the thugs and the coal and iron police are armed and the strikers are not armed, and are not permitted to be armed; and they are beaten up by the thugs, and that is about the time the constabulary appear on the scene, and they come around, mounted like cavalry, and they come around and see the disturbance, and they always take good care to arrest only the strikers. That is the part they play in that, and when they had this Westmoreland strike, which extended over a very considerable time in Westmoreland County, and not in one instance did we get any aid from the constabulary. We had men who wished to go home, and tried to go home, and the thugs would waylay them and would beat them up, and the constabulary—we telephoned and asked for protection and never got it.

I have a letter here from one man which was just received day before yesterday, and if you will pardon me I will read it, as it will enlighten you on the various subjects I am speaking about. He says:

"In 1906 I had occasion to visit Sagamore. While walking on the township road with others, two Italians came from the shanty, erected for the convenience of the coal company near the mines, in Sagamore, and came over to the road, pointed their guns at me, and ordered me off of the township road. I refused to go, and those Italians turned and went to the shanty, which was about 100 feet from the township road, and two members of the State constabulary came along. I stopped them, told them what those fellows had done, and requested them to arrest them. They refused and said they would take it up with the superintendent.

"I am not sure whether those men were disarmed or not, but I was never called to appear against them in court.

"JAMES PURCELL."

This Mr. Purcell is president of District 2 of the United Mine Workers, and I merely mention that to illustrate the method by which they protect; they protect the company and not the strikers. They are strictly partial in their conduct, and never yet have I had one case reported to me or come to my knowledge where they protected the strikers. I can cite you other cases in the trolley or small strikes where no private gunmen were employed; then they played the dual rôle of secret-service men, as it were, or thugs, and mingling with crowds in citizens' clothes and trying to create disorder or incite the men to violence, and then after the men beat up others, had them arrested, and the press came out in glaring headlines and said what an efficient force it was.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever made charges against the constabulary to the superiors?

Mr. MAURER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. When?

Mr. MAURER. Last year we had a strike of the trolley men at Hazleton which lasted three months, and the company did not operate a car during the three months. When April came the weather opened, and they commenced operating cars with strike breakers, but no one rode on the cars; therefore the strike was very orderly and well conducted, and the strike lasted only three months. While, of course, it was a losing proposition to operate cars without people riding on them, they got busses and jitneys and one thing or another and commenced to handle the passengers in that way, and finally word came to me at Harrisburg that I should come to Hazleton, that there was trouble brewing, and I went there and investigated the situation, and I found only one trooper in my first two days in Hazleton in uniform; the rest of them, I had learned through other agencies, and I found they were operating in citizens' clothes. The method by which they worked was to mingle in crowds on the street corners where the trolley cars came in and then incite the men by calling the strike breakers vile names and cursing, and so forth. The local police, however, were instructed by the mayor to disperse all crowds.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Maurer, you say the State constabulary did that themselves?

Mr. MAURER. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have the names of them?

Mr. MAURER. Yes; we can prove all of that. I have that in this book here [indicating]. That was proven.

I want to answer the question you asked me. The local police finally tried to disperse the crowd, and that is how we discovered who they were. We did not know who these men were, and the crowd would be dispersed. They did not obey the instructions of the officer and moved, but the State policeman refused to move several times and finally admitted to the officer that they were State policemen, and that is how we discovered who they were. The local police, however, said they did not care whether they were State police or not; that they had to move just the same; and they did move, and we in that way prevented the plan that was carried out before to incite the men to violence.

We found in a place named McAdoo, a few miles west of Hazleton, a suburb of Hazleton, where strike breakers used vile and indecent language toward citizens, and the burgess was there and ordered the chief of police to arrest the man that used such language. Four State troopers were in the crowd and heard all this indecent talk on the part of the strike breaker, but made no attempt to arrest him. A burgess then arrested the strike breaker, and he was found guilty and given the option of serving 24 hours or paying a $10 fine, and that is when the State police came forward and offered to pay the fine for the strike breaker, and did pay it.

Another case where a strike breaker shot into a crowd of boys and shot three of them the local police arrested the strike breaker, and at a hearing the State police were there acting as attorney in defense of the strike breaker. The State police also made the offices of the Lehigh Coal or Traction Co. their headquarters. After we gathered that evidence and other evidence I went to Harrisburg and went to see Gov. Tener and presented the charges, much in the order I have explained to you, to the governor. The governor was highly indignant and refused to believe anything I said about the constabulary, saying that they were not partial, were strictly impartial, and refused to believe it and questioned that I had truthfully laid the matter before him. I told him that I was sorry that he said that and to give me a chance to prove that what I had told him was the truth and to investigate the charges, and they then called into his office a deputy, and I repeated the charges as I had told them to the governor, and the governor instructed him to investigate, and three days after that the deputy and I went to Hazleton, and with the aid of the district miners' officials we gathered our witnesses, and the witnesses were kept in the hotel lobby while we were in the parlor, and we had a notary public there, and no witness knew what the other had testified to before he testified. We had about 15 witnesses and about 30 more waiting to be called within the burgess of McAdoo—the chief of police and attorneys and other citizens—in fact, the best citizens of Hazleton and vicinity—and every charge I made was proven at this hearing, and other evidence submitted that I had not charged. One of them was drunkenness and disorderly conduct.

Chairman WALSH. Before whom was this held?

Mr. MAURER. Before the superintendent (Groomes) of the State police. The State police had a stenographer there, and we had one there, and State policemen were there, and we had a stenographic record of the proceedings, which are in my possession and the governor's at the present time. In this book I published just abstracts of that hearing.

Chairman WALSH. What is that?

Mr. MAURER. The American Cossack. You can have it. It is a book that I compiled myself. So that proved that they were used; that they were partial in their conduct and used to break strikes, and used by the Lehigh Traction Co. as guards, and as attorneys for the strike breakers; paid strike breakers' fines and arrested men on trumped-up charges, and railroaded them from Hazleton to Pottsville, a distance of 28 miles, and would not give them a hearing, notwithstanding there were justices and courts there, in order to railroad them to jail. All of this is a fact, and all of this we have proven, not by one witness but by a number of witnesses.

The governor has that report, and he took no action other than some of the State policemen, one of them I know sure, and two that I think have been relieved from duty; one man's name was Haney, the man that we proved to have been beastly drunk and very officious in his conduct. As to the strike situation in Bethlehem, I was there during part of the strike, and I can say this, at no time was there any necessity for calling out the constabulary. The men there were peaceful in every way. A committee of strangers went to see the governor and the President of the United States, and asked them to use their good offices to settle the strike, and the governor and President both regarded that the law did not give them such power; but as soon as Mr. Schwab called for the constabulary, they had the power to act. There was hardly any disorder, and within one hour after the constabulary arrived there was bloodshed and riot and disorder. They invaded the homes of foreigners and searched their homes under the pretext of looking for firearms; and I was informed and believed my informant that they robbed some of these people under the pretense of looking for firearms. They arrested them and took them to the steel company's property and locked them up and held their court there. They paraded the streets, beat men right and left, trampled old people down, and rode to the Majestic Hotel and shot through the door, and shot one man to death and other men down, and trampled people down with their horses, and did everything possible to incite and create a reign of terror and fear, and thereby break the strike.

I am sorry, Mr. Commissioner, that the time does not permit me to go into detail and work out my evidence more logically and at greater length, but as I have only a very short time to stay, I have to speak against time, and perhaps it doesn't make as good sense as it would if we could work out what I have to say in proper order.

I might add that so unpopular has this department become in the State that, notwithstanding the fact that the press of other States have been trying to laud it and eulogize this department to the extent that the other States would adopt it, to show you that it is not as popular as the press would have you believe, for the past four years they have tried to increase this department, and I happened to be a member of the Pennsylvania Legislature for the past three sessions myself, and know whereof I speak.

Here is the legislative journal of this month, on the two days when the constabulary question was before the legislature of Pennsylvania. They proposed in this session, as in the last session and previous sessions, to increase it by adding 116 more men to it, and increase the salary of the different officers, and proposed increase of salary of Capt. Groomes from $3,000 to $6,000 a year. Now, Capt. Groomes is only a figurehead; he is in the liquor business in Philadelphia, and his salary is merely a plumb. All he has to do is to draw his breath and salary. Capt. "Loon" is the head of the department, not Groomes. They proposed increasing the salaries of all of the troopers from $3 to $5; they get now $900 a year. We fought that bill, and lost part of it four years ago, and two years ago we fought it and won all of it. I led the fight against it this time, and this time we defeated that constabulary bill 2 to 1. They only got 61 votes out of the lower house and 125 against it. Now, if the department of State police is such a fine institution, I think that the people in Pennsylvania should know it. Gentlemen, there is a few minutes still left me, and I want to say this:

To-morrow you will have a witness from Allentown, Mr. Williams, and when you hear him he will give you the Bethlehem strike situation in detail, and what is true in Bethlehem is true in every other part of the State they went to, with the exception of one, and that one is the Westinghouse Air Brake strike. They were very gentlemanly there, and I attributed that to the fact that it was close to a legislative session, and they knew to make any break there would threaten this particular legislation that I just spoke about. But I have been with them in practically every city that they have operated in, and one I remember in Erie, when they were there. I interviewed the people who suffered through their brutality. I saw a case where they struck down an old man, and he don't know yet whether he was struck down or they dragged him along from the horn of the saddle, and those are facts. Why they do such things to an old man I don't know, unless it is to create a reign of awe and terror wherever they are present that will strike awe and terror into the hearts of the strikers and their families.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What are they doing when not engaged in the strike business?

Mr. MAURER. I am very glad, indeed, that you asked that question. They are patrolling the rural districts in the immediate vicinity of the barracks. It leads the farmer to believe that he has police protection. They see this mounted officer. Those of you who never saw him, I wish to state, gentlemen, Capt. Groomes, you will pardon the question, but you will appreciate the answer, but when he was appointed as chief of this department he went to Europe to study the police there, he went to Russia and studied the Cossacks, and through Germany and Europe—this is also part of the record in here—and then to Ireland and studied it there, and came back and recommended that the constabulary of Pennsylvania pattern after the Irish constabulary, and they look for all the world, not exactly like the Irish constabulary, they are a cross between the Russian Cossacks and Irish constabulary. Its duties between strikes is to patrol the rural districts. It is remarkable the work they do. They have maps of every little locality. You can go through the rural districts within 50 miles of the barracks, and you find at every crossroad a mark on the post, and on every bridge, it will be 1-2-0 and x or v or w, any old letter on the bridge, every bridge you pass you will find that mark. They are all laid out on the map, they can tell in a minute, when trouble occurs, and they call for help, they can locate all these byways and highways. That is what they are doing, familiarizing themselves with that part of the State, and after those troopers have been there for a while they move them and bring them on down to the other part, so that the troopers are familiar with both ends of the State. They are located two at the western end and two at the eastern end, but not in the farmers' district where they are used for protection of the farmer.

Chairman WALSH. Do they make arrests at these other times of trespassers or thieves that prey upon the inhabitants?

Mr. MAURER. Oh, yes; when there is no strike duty to perform, they do arrest and apprehend real criminals, but not as many. Here is Capt. Groomes's report for 1912; he doesn't give any report this time. This will give an idea of how many he made, but if you look over it very carefully, you will find most of the arrests were made on vagrancy, drunkenness, and disorderly conduct charges, which are usually the charges lodge against a man on strike.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is the procedure, or who is authorized to call upon the governor for the services of these troops?

Mr. MAURER. The sheriff. The sheriff has the power. If anyone wants them, they apply to the sheriff and he calls on the governor. I wish to state here that the State constabulary of Pennsylvania has absolute power when they enter a strike zone, martial law exists not by official declaration but by the very nature of things for every purpose martial law does exist. Then they override the civil authority; they take charge of the situation and arrest without warrant, invade your home without warrant; they are the greatest power in the State, greater than any civil power, the only power greater is the legislature when it is in session or the governor when it is not in session.

Commissioner AISHTON. Mr. Maurer, what is the membership of the State constabulary?

Mr. MAURER. Two hundred and thirty-two, including the office force of two men.

Commissioner AISHTON. You have a knowledge of their membership; you are a State officer and member of the legislature, and you have a general knowledge of the composition of that force?

Mr. MAURER. Oh, yes, sir.

Commissioner AISHTON. You stated, I believe, that they were made up from two classes of men?

Mr. MAURER. In the main, I qualified it.

Commissioner AISHTON. I did not understand it was qualified. I would like to have the record show that qualification, however.

Mr. MAURER. Oh, yes; I hope it will be; I did not want it otherwise.

Commissioner AISHTON. I did not assume that you wanted to intimate to this commission that ex-soldiers and the degenerate sons of the middle class—

Mr. MAURER. No; not sons. They don't amount to anything; sons the old man is glad to unload, and he will unload them into the constabulary.

Commissioner AISHTON. How many do you imagine the constabulary holds of that class?

Mr. MAURER. The greater part of it.

Commissioner AISHTON. Are degenerates?

Mr. MAURER. Oh, no; I would not say it so broad as that.

Commissioner AISHTON. Will you please correct the record; I think it so states.

Mr. MAURER. They are ex-United States soldiers that find it more profitable to be in the State constabulary than in the Army, the Army don't pay the wages they do in Pennsylvania. And then there are men that are no account, could not make their own living, but were educated, some of them with a college education, and were simply incompetent, and sort of a nuisance around the town. The whole community breathed easy when they found something to do, even if it was cracking men's heads.

Commissioner AISHTON. If the record will state as you read it, I don't know that any further questions are necessary, but you dwelt upon the fact that they were degenerate, as sons of the middle class. I wrote that down and didn't quite understand it.

Mr. MAURER. I thank you for the correction.

Commissioner AISHTON. I don't want to take up the time, and will ask one question: There has a good deal been said about legislation and fighting legislation and you used the term that you fought two years in the legislature and got a certain result, and this year you fought it again and beat it altogether.

Mr. MAURER. This year I led the fight. The organization which I have the honor to represent, the State Federation of Labor, has always been opposed to the constabulary.

Commissioner AISHTON. On the basis you mention?

Mr. MAURER. On the floor of the house, as a member of the house.

Commissioner AISHTON. The record will be safe in saying, in your capacity as an officer of the Pennsylvania State Federation of Labor, you fought it?

Mr. MAURER. In the dual position, as an official, and I carried out the orders of my organization.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. What I would like to know, would you approve of this State constabulary if it was a different character from the Pennsylvania constabulary or would you disapprove of any under any condition?

Mr. MAURER. I myself introduced a bill four years ago to abolish the State constabulary. That bill never got out of the committee. Two years ago the Pennsylvania State Federation of Labor, realizing that we could not hope to abolish it, had a bill introduced defining the duties of the State constabulary, and we provided that they should be used as fire wardens and fish wardens, and be used in time of floods to save and protect life and property, and to apprehend real criminals, etc. The bill is in that book; there is a copy of it, but under no circumstances, at least, as the last section says, shall they be used in strikes or lockouts or in any disputes between employer and employees. We introduced that, and was quite anxious to have it enacted into a law, but it never got beyond second reading in the lower house, and this year we realized that that could not be enacted into a law, and we tried to prevent it from growing anyway.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. If you could do away with it, what would you put in its place?

Mr. MAURER. I don't think we need anything. I think the mayor from Altoona gave us a good lesson here. He had the strike situation at Altoona under control, there was no need for cracking heads. A little story is told about the men on the bridge. I was just thinking when I heard him explain that story how his two officers went in there and made a few arrests, and that was all there was to it. There was an accident, I believe, a rail broke away, and some men were hurt. If the State police had been there there would have been a different story to tell; they would have rode in and cracked skulls and beat them up and dragged them around. That is their method. There is the difference. The employers of labor when they go in a strike situation and know that the State is going to defend them and help them, they are more arrogant and less considerate of the demands of their employees. If we take away that kind of a system, then we will commence to reason logically and intelligently and cease to use that arrogant, overbearing method that they do resort to when they know they have us by the throat by using the State and Commonwealth against us, and they would then commence to talk sensibly, and reason it out sensibly, instead of having them beaten and murdered and robbed and assaulted. I hold that the State has no right to take part in the interests of the employer any more than it has a right to take part in the interests of the employee.

We are quite willing, and at the last convention of the federation I recommended, and I shall insist in the convention next week again, that we learn the art, or we become trained in the science of militaryism ourselves. I am sick and tired of having our men constantly stand up to be shot at. If we must fight, I would rather fight intelligently than empty handed, than always being the fellow without any protection whatever. They have to stop this method of fighting, or there will be more trouble. We will not stand for it much longer. We got along for a century in Pennsylvania without this police. It is military despotism. Every State in the Union has been talking about establishing them. This book has been sent out by the thousands, and every word is true. Here is a book that Col. Groome wrote in answer to that book, and it is lame and flabby and untruthful, and shows the character of the man himself who is at the head of these police. Then the book follows with 11 letters written to James H. Maurer, at his request, in 1910 and 1911, just after he had been elected to the State legislature on the Socialist ticket. Although these rambling letter contain unsubstantiated and absurd charges against the State-police force, they are signed by such well-known American citizens as F. Fagan, and some other foreign names that are hard to pronounce, and show that he is prejudiced against foreigners, because the book is full of other names of congressmen and legislators and American names, Irish names, and he don't mention any of them, but he picks these few, these names who are all foreigners. There is nothing else written there. Those are the poor fellows that are brought in by the coal company to undermine the German and Irish and Americans, and casts that kind of a reflection upon them. He says:

"I presume when the author of The American Cossack wishes Pennsylvania may return to the old peaceful conditions he is referring to the Molly Maguire reign of terror in the seventies."

It is very evident he doesn't understand the history of Molly Maguire.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You said, Mr. Maurer, that the State police received $75 a month?

Mr. MAURER. It is probable; yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Does that include his uniform and his living, or must that all come out?

Mr. MAURER. He gets his uniform and he has a horse and horse feed, his equipment complete, but he has to furnish his own food.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know whether many of them are married men?

Mr. MAURER. At the present time not; they have discriminated against the married men, but there was a bill in the senate, introduced by Senator Snyder; the Senate passed it, and it was in the house, providing there shall be no discrimination against a trooper as far as a married man applying for a job.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You say that you and the State federation of labor are opposed to the State constabulary?

Mr. MAURER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are you also opposed to the National Guards?

Mr. MAURER. Well, to tell you the truth, all organized labor is opposed to the National Guards in the past. It has been opposed.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, are we to understand that as you know the situation that if organized labor had its way it would wipe out the National Guards?

Mr. MAURER. There is not much to wipe out any more—poor little tin soldiers that they are—I can not help but pity them when I look at them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May I ask you to answer my question?

Mr. MAURER. Yes, sir; if I had my way about it, my dear sir, there would not be a soldier on earth. I think it is a disgrace to our twentieth century civilization that we are still at each others throats murdering each other.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How would you protect life and property from the lawless?

Mr. MAURER. Quit pursuing people and they will be peaceful. People that are not robbed never revolt.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then you don't believe there are such things as criminals?

Mr. MAURER. Oh, yes; sure.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How would you protect yourself against the criminal?

Mr. MAURER. Oh, the criminal? The criminal that we don't find is all right; we can not bother with him because we can not catch him; but the fellow we catch he is too dumb to be a criminal, and that is why we catch him; he don't have the qualifications of a criminal.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I don't suppose you profess ignorance of the fact that in labor troubles labor representatives do violate law and resort to crime and blow up houses and bridges, and how would you protect the employer and his property against conditions of that sort?

Mr. MAURER. You have reference to the structural iron workers?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAURER. That is a condition entirely. The one responsible for that condition was the employer or those who exploit labor themselves. They advocate to-day—we heard it here, we always hear it—no organization; that they believe in dealing with the individual, and they teach people that way; that is the theory of the individual—that he can work out his own destiny. The McNamaras were strict individualists, in as far as they believed in individualism, but not in political action, and they believed they could do as they pleased. The power was used against them and they used the same weapons.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you were an employer, how would you protect yourself against the McNamaras?

Mr. MAURER. If I was an employer, I would be like any other if I expected to succeed in business.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Please answer my question. If you were an employer, how would you protect yourself against the McNamaras?

Mr. MAURER. I told you I would be like most any other employer.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How would you protect yourself if they come and blew up your property?

Mr. MAURER. They would blow it up; I couldn't stop it. I don't know that I would do anything else than what the other men are doing now; I would try to protect my own interests. The individual is not to be blamed, you must get the system and not the individual.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you were an employer, and you had a dispute with your workers and you would not agree with them and they blew up your premises and killed a lot of innocent people, or try to prevent a repetition of those circumstances?

Mr. MAURER. I might answer you if I cared to be untruthful that if I was an employer I would not have such conditions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Suppose the workers asked what you felt was an unjust demand, and a thing that you could not meet at all; you know that workers are sometimes human and are made out of the same sort of clay as the rest of us, and they are as likely to be unreasonable as employers; suppose the employee asked what you thought was an impossibility, an unfair and unjust position, would you submit or not?

Mr. MAURER. If I thought it was impossible, I would not do it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You could not agree with your worker then?

Mr. MAURER. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Suppose they resorted to violence?

Mr. MAURER. I never knew of one yet that did, unless they were goaded on by the men that wanted them to do violence.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You yourself cited the McNamara case.

Mr. MAURER. I am not satisfied yet, and no one can convince me but what there is a story yet to be told in that case.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If the story is yet to be told, then all the facts brought out in the court, that these men were trying to establish the closed shop, and failing to do it they resorted to violence?

Mr. MAURER. If you belonged to any organization long enough you would know what you had to contend with. There is not a union organized without spies of the employer of some kind, to spy on them. You were told how they got their spies and Pinkertons, with their pay roll, as they told you that. What do you think they are doing, sitting around hotels? They are in our unions, doing what you are charging against the McNamaras.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Blowing up houses and killing innocent people?

Mr. MAURER. Just as I told you, that they were over at Hazleton trying to incite men to riot. The strikers themselves, or no labor union I ever knew, tried to incite men to violence or disorder, because that is just what we do not want to do. We want order; therein lies our strength.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Your position is that labor never resorts to violence?

Mr. MAURER. No, sir; I do not say never—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Perhaps I misunderstood you. I wish you would read the last question.

[Question read by reporter.]

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You take the position that they do not resort to violence, or do not incite violence?

Mr. MAURER. I did not say never. I mean, we do not. I did not say we never do. That is, to incite men to violence; that is the aggressive side of it. Assuming that we were situated like out in Colorado, where they shot down families and burned down our homes and smothered our women and babies, would I recommend that they fight? I guess I would, fight to the last ditch; indeed, I would. And I would feel inclined to shoot all men that would not fight; that is my idea, and you have my idea exactly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, in summing up your position, then it is substantially this, that speaking, as I take it you do speak, for organized labor in your State, you would be opposed to the State constabulary, you would be opposed to the State militia; you would afford the employer practically no protection against violence on the part of strikers, and you would simply force him to work out his own destiny in his own way?

Mr. MAURER. I would force him to be decent. In New York they don't have the constabulary, or in Jersey.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. They are trying to get it.

Mr. MAURER. I know they are, and in Virginia they want it, and in every other State. Why? Because they have more violence in those States or more disorder or bloodshed? No; they have less.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is your attitude when the Federal troops are called into a situation like in Colorado?

Mr. MAURER. We had them in Reading one time, in '87, the Federal troops are a different proposition in our case. They simply come and maintain law and order, and that is all there was to it; we have no objection to that; that is what we want, law and order.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They were not used as strike breakers?

Mr. MAURER. No, sir; in 1902 in our coal strike the State militia was there, and that was the last time they served on strike duty. The greater part of the State militia were composed of workingmen, who when it was over had to go back to the factories and to their work again. The strike lasted six months; it was too long, and the militia was there by the thousands, and there was no one shot or killed or beaten. That was the trouble. The militia and the strikers got on good terms and played ball together and cards together in the park under the shade trees. I have, myself, gone out early in the morning to the picket. The soldiers were complaining they were starving and could get nothing to eat, and the folks at home were reading the newspapers and noticed where their boys were starving and packed up big cases of angel food and sent it to the soldiers at the front; and the soldiers packed up their other rations, that the State paid for, and put it in boxes, and then ate the good food; and if there was any left over they put it in the box, and in the morning you could see the miners and their wives and children going to the soldiers' camp, and the men would stay outside for fear some officer might catch them; and the women and children would go in there, thinking they would be more lenient if they caught the women and children, and they would come out with these boxes and food, and they found out that the soldiers were feeding the strikers, and that was an awful way to break a strike. There was not any disorder, and we had no fault to find with them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. They were National Guard men?

Mr. MAURER. They were State guards. That was the first time they behaved that way. The organized unions have for years in Pennsylvania not allowed a member of a National Guard to join, but the criticism that was heaped upon them has had its effect in time, and they have become decent. We don't object to order, and no organized working force does. That is what instilled the idea of the constabulary into the minds of the operators, and the next legislature following that they came in with this bill that I just gave you. They wanted a militia that could be used the way they wanted it used. This constabulary does that work. They don't know our sufferings and our ills and ailments like the State troopers do. They are excellent shots and horsemen; they can ride the wildest kind of horses; they are splendid horsemen, and physically I dare say they are the best men we have in the country. They are the choice of the country, physically, and many are mentally splendid fellows, and we have nothing against them personally; but some are renegades of the worst type also; but I don't hold that against them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The question has been suggested, How do you reconcile your last statement with your first statement that they were sons of degenerates?

Mr. MAURER. I didn't say sons of degenerates; but they are degenerates in a great measure, in their drinking and carousing and their low-down character, foul-mouthed; they are the kind of men that you would not want to associate with, and neither would I.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is the constabulary looked upon in the State as being an organization for breaking strikes?

Mr. MAURER. They don't admit that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is that the general impression in the State?

Mr. MAURER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is it not the opinion of these men that they are employed for that purpose, and that this country patrolling that they do, or policing that they do, is merely incidental to their employment?

Mr. MAURER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That they are only in active service when on a strike?

Mr. MAURER. That is practically correct, but they really do patrolling duty in rural districts. They get acquainted with the immediate country surrounding the barracks at an industrial center.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is incidental to what they imagine they are when they are in the regular service?

Mr. MAURER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Their real active work is breaking strikes?

Mr. MAURER. I was in the barracks one day and they were practicing; they came down a company front, about 40 horsemen, and they would stop suddenly and the horses would rear up, and I asked what was the nature of that drill and they said "that is to stampede a mob." I said, "What do you mean by a mob?" and they said, "A riot of men assembled or a strike," and that they would want to come down all at once and scare them and they would run away, and I said they might run into them, and they said, "What of that?"

Commissioner GARRETSON. You expressed part of an opinion a while ago, and I would like to have the rest of it. It was put up to you as a deadly sin to dynamite a house or destroy it. Do you believe it is a more deadly sin to destroy a house than to destroy a man's future?

Mr. MAURER. I would rather destroy a good many houses before I destroy a man's future. With me life come first and property second.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It has been suggested that in destroying houses you might destroy innocent people; in destroying a future, don't you destroy other innocent lives that are connected with that life—blight the future of other lives?

Mr. MAURER. I can't say that I just grasp your meaning.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Can you destroy a man without destroying those dependent upon him to a large degree?

Mr. MAURER. You can destroy the man without destroying—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). I mean the future of a man. I am talking about in the moral sense. Is it a moral crime to blight a man's future?

Mr. MAURER. Well, I should think it was.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And at the same time would you not blight unfortunate innocent people that were dependent upon him to a certain degree?

Mr. MAURER. You would.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You stated that you believed, and organized labor likewise believed, in law and order?

Mr. MAURER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you and I understand what that means alike, I wonder? My conception of being and desiring law and order is, first of all, to be a law-abiding citizen. Have you the same conception of what law and order stands for?

Mr. MAURER. Law-abiding? If you can see the laws that we are making in Pennsylvania you would not know when you were law-abiding.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What do you mean by law and order, then? Please explain to us what you mean by desiring law and order?

Mr. MAURER. Law and order is—the general understanding is what a man knows of law without requiring a statute book to tell him. The moral law, as the average man understands it—and when I say man I mean men and women—is to do right toward a fellow man; is to do unto the other fellow as you feel he should do to you; to do no one harm; to do no wrong; to do otherwise would be unlawful.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would you consider me a law-abiding citizen if I was guided by my own interpretation of the law and would do what I thought was right, regardless of the law?

Mr. MAURER. Yes, sir; provided you did not work an injury to anyone else.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Supposing it did work an injury to some one else?

Mr. MAURER. Then you would be breaking a moral law by taking advantage of another man's right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then I gather that the proper machinery to determine whether or not I am invading some other man's right are our courts—the machinery established by you and me and the rest of us to determine those points?

Mr. MAURER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If I take that law into my own hands and say I propose to be the sole judge of what is right and wrong to my fellows I become a lawbreaker?

Mr. MAURER. You certainly do.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In answer to Mr. Garretson's question as to whether you considered a house of more value than a man's future, and you said, I think correctly, that you considered a man's future as of more value than the house; but if that house contained a lot of innocent people—

Mr. MAURER. That is a different kind of a house now.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that is the kind of a house I had in mind. If I then saw fit, acting on my own judgment, and doing what I thought was right, regardless of the law, and blew up the house, I would not longer be a law-abiding citizen?

Mr. MAURER. You certainly would not, but you have taken a right that belonged to another, which would not be right.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was one G. Washington in 1776 a law-abiding citizen?

Mr. MAURER. George Washington? The only way to explain that—if the Revolution was a success, he was strictly a law-abiding citizen; but if it was a failure, he would not be.

Commissioner GARRETSON. He abided by law that did not exist and broke a law that did exist?

Mr. MAURER. Yes, sir.

(The two pamphlets referred to by the witness entitled "The American Cossack," published by the Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, 1914, and "A Reply to 'The American Cossack,'" by John C. Groome, superintendent of Pennsylvania State police, 1914, were submitted in printed form.)

Chairman WALSH. We will now adjourn until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 4.30 p. m. Thursday, May 6, 1915, these proceedings were adjourned until the following Friday, May 7, 1915, at 10 a. m.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., Saturday, May 8, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Harriman, Garretson, Lennon, and Weinstock.

Chairman WALSH. We will please be in order.

Mr. Williams, please take the stand.

TESTIMONY OF MR. DAVID WILLIAMS.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name.

Mr. WILLIAMS. David Williams.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am now editor and manager of the Allentown Labor Herald.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. WILLIAMS. At Allentown, Pa.

Chairman WALSH. What was your business prior to going into the publishing business?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was a machinist in the steel works from the fall of 1907, until the strike started, February 4, 1910. I am a machinist by trade.

Chairman WALSH. You have some matter, I believe, on the question of the department of State police of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. They were used against us in the strike.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you first, how was the department of the State Police of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania organized?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was organized in 1905 by an act of the legislature; it is the act of May 2, 1905, and the act was amended June 1, 1911.

Chairman WALSH. What was the June 1, 1911, amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS. To raise the pay.

Chairman WALSH. Anything else?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, that I—the only part I took out of that amendment, and the only part that we fought in 1911, was the raising of the pay. It not only raised the pay but increased the officers, and it was a graduated proposition; it increased the pay from $60 to $75 a month, and it also had a provision providing that a man should get an extra $5 for his second enlistment and an extra $5 for his third enlistment, making a total of $85 a month he could get. And they were used against us in the strike, and naturally we have tried to kill them off ever since.

Chairman WALSH. How is the force controlled and distributed over the State under ordinary conditions?

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand, they have barracks in different towns.

Chairman WALSH. For what term are the men enlisted?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know, but I believe it is two years; I am not familiar with that part of it.

Chairman WALSH. Just state, if you know, how the force is controlled and distributed over the State, under ordinary conditions?

Mr. WILLIAMS. As I understand, there are barracks at Pottsville, Wyoming Falls, and Greensburg. I used to go up there quite often; I lived for a couple of months at West Pitson, and I had a chance to watch them closely. I would not say anything against the State police at any time only during strikes. I would not say anything against them being used to run down criminals; I believe they are a very good thing at times, in running down criminals; but our kick is when they are being used as strike breakers.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would just go ahead, in your own way, Mr. Williams, and describe your experience with the State police force and the grounds you have for objecting to them.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This is all. I believe the members of the commission are familiar with the way the strike was called in the Bethlehem steel works.

Chairman WALSH. If you can state it briefly, I wish you would do so.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There was no organization in the Bethlehem steel works of any kind, the men were compelled to work Saturday, Saturday afternoon, and Sunday, and until 8.30 at night during the week in the shops that went on strike. These men were working on Government work, and they were compelled to have their work done almost perfect, and naturally that work was very expensive and very straining, and time after time those men would try to get off on Sunday, and they were told if they did not work on Sunday they could not work on Monday. Then the crisis came when one man laid off Saturday, and when he came back he was discharged, and the men called a committee together and sent him to the superintendent to have him reinstated.

Chairman WALSH. Were you in the shops at that time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; and had worked in that shop from the fall of 1907 to 1910. I had a position that took me all over the shops. This committee went to the superintendent on Monday morning, and on Thursday afternoon the committee was discharged by the superintendent.

Chairman WALSH. How many men were on the committee?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Three; and those men on that floor stopped working that night from 4.30 to 5 o'clock; they didn't leave the plant, they stayed right there, but they stopped working and stayed there.

Chairman WALSH. Had there been any organizer in the field trying to organize them prior to that time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No organizer of any kind at all. The next morning the men came to work again, and came in the shop and went to their positions but didn't do any work, but just stayed there. The general superintendent, Mr. Herbeck, came into the shop and went to one of the departments where he knew some of the men quite well and asked some of them to start to work, and at that time I came down from the upper floor, my line of work put me in touch with the superintendent quite often, and I said "If you want to stop a strike you had better take those three men back," and he said, "Williams, the company don't want those three men," and I said, "You will have to submit to have them come back," because I don't believe the officers realized the feeling of the men due to the oppression they had to submit to. The wages had been cut, and time and a half had been taken off for overtime, and the restaurant in the shops, where we could get five meals for a dollar, had been closed and a restaurant opened up for the officers in the company's office, and the men were being crushed continually.

When Mr. Herbeck said that the company would not take them back, the men commenced to leave the works, and it spread from one shop to another, and the first thing we knew 4 and 6 shops were on strike, probably 800 men were on strike. The general superintendent came along and said, "Williams, get back to work, the three men can go back to work," and I said, "It is too late now, you have started something," and he said that all that the men needed was a leader, and I said, "You be the leader." I didn't want to take any chance after he had forced them out on strike, and afterwards the men held a meeting in a big field outside of the plant, and they sent a committee to Mr. Schwab, he had just come back from Washington that day, and he would not listen to them. There is a big hall there, I think it is called the municipal hall, something like the market here, but there was no market there at that time, and the men held a meeting there to see what they could do. There was no preparation, the strike came like a flash, and my position around the plant—I was known to everybody, I was also known to take an active part in civil affairs in the city—that is, Allentown. I never lived in South Bethlehem. There is a work train of 10 or 12 cars goes from Allentown down to South Bethlehem, 6 miles, every morning.

Somebody asked me to address the fellows, and I told them what they had come out for, and said, you fellows stick to it, and if I could get a committee to come along, I would go to see Mr. Schwab. We got that committee, one of the men that was discharged, and one from South Bethlehem, and one from a little town above Allentown, and we went to see Mr. Schwab, and the colored servant said he would not see us, and I told him to tell Mr. Schwab that we would plant right there until he did see us, and pretty soon he came out and saw us, and we had about an hour and forty-five minutes with him, and I asked him to come out to the meeting in the afternoon and explain his position to the men. He talked very nice, and I told him that the men could not work on close work like we had and work the way we had to, 10 hours and 25 minutes was the regular working day, and at 5.30 they would order us to work until 8.30, and Saturday at noon they would say to work this afternoon, and then in the evening they would tell us to come back on Sunday. That was the way the men were treated.

Chairman WALSH. Well, had there been any agitation prior to this time about working on Sunday?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Only in that agitation; that is, the men did not want to work themselves; that is, there was no organization at all. When the organizations came later, we finally found two or three men in the machine shops working under cover. I myself was not in good standing with the machinists' union at that time, although I had been a member a good many years before.

Well, Schwab positively refused to come to the meeting of the men, to me, although that was the last thing I said coming out of the office. I begged the committee not to say anything what he had said, because I believed in my heart he would come anyhow. My wife was confined at the time, and I had to go home; and I got back to the meeting in the afternoon about half past 2, and Schwab was there before I got in; but he couldn't do anything with the men. The rumor had gone out that he would not deal with the men, and they would not come back. They could not trust him; that was the trouble. Had they known Schwab was on the level they would have gone back. But right at this time—this was on Friday—we were working to settle that strike on overtime. You know no strike can exist unless the men are prepared—very, very seldom, unless you can keep the men all out and take a chance.

Then we holds another meeting Sunday, and right here is where I want to follow through my different newspaper accounts. I don't want to give you my opinion; what I am going to quote you is from the Allentown Morning Call, the Allentown Democrat, and the South Bethlehem Globe, from day to day, showing the kind of a peaceful strike it was, and the advice given to the men, and the way we handled it up until the time the State police were brought there. Then I am going to read you the statements of Mr. Kelly, chief of police, and also Mr. Lynch, who was elected chief of police when Mr. Kelly resigned.

At a meeting of the strikers held Sunday, February 6, two days after the strike started, the chairman of the strikers advised the men in this manner, quoting from the Allentown Democrat of February 7, 1910:

"You have now started a serious proposition, and whatever you do be orderly. Stop all you can from going to work but harm no one. Show Mr. Schwab we are orderly citizens. We are now on strike and will be until we accomplish our object."

Quoting from the same issue of the Democrat we find Mr. Edward Keenan, business agent of the machinists' union, of Philadelphia, advising the men in this manner:

"Keep within the bounds of the law. Violence don't pay. You can conduct this fight legally and successfully. Any disorder injures your chances of winning."

The committee appointed from the different machine shops on strike submitted the following list of "don'ts" to the strikers at the same meeting, which are taken from the Allentown Morning Call of February 7:

"Acting under advice we submit the following list of 'don'ts':

"Don't congregate in groups on the street corners, to the disadvantage of the general public.

"Don't enter discussion which will bring you within the pale of the law.

"Don't participate in any fight or any acts of rowdyism; remain law-abiding.

"Don't congregate in saloons and discuss your grievances. Keep sober. Above all, keep faith with your committee and render them every possible assistance.

"Assuring you we are working in your interests, we subscribe ourselves,

"Respectfully,

"THE COMMITTEE."

That was a list of "don'ts" that we filed and gave to the men to follow out carefully.

How easily the strike could have been settled at this time can be judged from the following letter presented to Mr. Schwab by the committee.

I wish you would pay particular notice to this communication sent to Mr. Schwab at that time:

Mr. SCHWAB,

President of the Bethlehem Steel Co.

DEAR SIR: The striking employees of your plant submit for your kind consideration terms under which we shall be pleased to return to work.

The overtime feature of employment having been a detriment to our health, our homes, and families, we ask for its abolition. If it must be a feature of future employment, we ask for an additional compensation in the plant of time and one-half for overtime, so as we may procure additional nutriment to give strength to our bodies to perform our tasks. We request that discharged employees, who acted as a committee to present our grievances, be reinstated and apprentices be taken back without the loss of time or hours. To this end we respectfully request that you treat with our committee representing Nos. 2, 4, and 6 shops.

Respectfully, yours,

WM. DUFFY,
Chairman of Committee.

This letter is taken from the Allentown Call of February 7, and shows how the men were only fighting for better working conditions, and that there was no attempt at this time to force the company to raise wages or recognize the unions.

A meeting of the strikers was held on February 7, at which time the men were advised by Business Agent Keenan of the machinists in this manner, quoting from the Allentown Democrat of February 8:

"I want to warn you against some people who may join your ranks, and who advise you to do violence, be careful, I plead with you, be careful, be orderly, and disregard all advice tending to violence and disorder. Your success depends upon this. Act the gentleman, and you will win.

"I have had a great deal of experience in strikes, and I know that corporations hire men to advocate violence. These hirelings escape. Remember this; but the men whom they have deluded into committing violence suffer and often go to prison.

"Men avoid drunkenness. Your strike is in excellent shape. The officers of the steel company will only be too glad if you do not keep within the law, in order that they may appeal to the public for their support. Be careful; this support and confidence of the public is of vital importance to your cause."

Chairman WALSH. What was the date of that letter?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is not a letter; but that is part of—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). The letter that you read before that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is published in the Allentown Morning Call of February 7.

Chairman WALSH. And what was the date of the calling of the strike?

Mr. WILLIAMS. February 4.

Chairman WALSH. February 4, and that was February 7?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This very article was issued on the 6th.

Chairman WALSH. Who made that last statement that you read?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Business Agent Keenan, of the machinists of Philadelphia. He made it very likely on the 6th, and we quoted it in the paper on the 7th. The 6th was on Sunday.

This policy of suppressing all tendency toward violence was followed rigidly by the executive committee of which I was chairman. Notice was served on the men by the chairman that if necessary he would appoint police to make them preserve order.

Time and again I told the men if we caught any of them breaking the law or fighting we would handle them ourselves. We had plenty of big men on the committee and would have done it.

On February 11, one week after the strike started, the Allentown Democrat came out with this statement:

"Without showing any signs of abating, and with men joining the ranks of the strikers each hour, the strike of the Bethlehem Steel Co. is being marked as one of the largest and most orderly labor struggles in the history of the country."

In referring to a malicious lie printed about the strike in the Philadelphia Record the chairman said:

"You have behaved well, men, but there is a man in South Bethlehem who is trying to make trouble. Never in the history of organized labor has there been such a peaceful demonstration as this one."

The reporter for the Philadelphia Record had sent in a report which misrepresented the men.

On February 14, the tenth day of the strike, the Allentown Democrat printed an open letter to Charles M. Schwab, from which we take the following:

"You are aware of certain facts, one of these is that the strike began among unorganized, not organized, men. They had no hope of either leadership, or direction, of financial support when they walked out. That is the usual practice when strikes occur, you will admit. You are also aware that a large part of your men consist of molders and machinists, a high class of workmen—men of brains, or they would not be members of their respective trades. It is not a set of huddums who have struck, but men who have brains and used them in their present needs. Still another fact is that they did not, in the first instance, strike for higher wages but for payment for the time they were employed. That is the second characteristic of this strike. And a third one is that it is one of the most orderly in the history of labor troubles as far as it has come, for the men are guilty of no acts of violence or disorder of any kind whatever. It is a peaceful battle for right and justice. It is unfortunate, indeed, that you called in the State constabulary. That is an inflammatory provocation. It was not necessary, but we are sure the occasion will be used by the men only to emphasize their own personal worth and the burdens against which they are contending. They will shine all the more because of the implied reflection you have cast upon them by calling in the guardians of the peace without cause. Nor can it escape your notice that the community sympathizes very generally with your men. In truth, everyone does who knows the facts in the case."

I am quoting freely from the newspaper articles in order to show beyond any doubt that the tactics we were using were peaceful and that the State police were really the cause of the trouble which came later.

Immediately upon the publishing of that letter the officials of the steel company got busy.

The officials of the steel company made an effort to influence the policy of the Allentown Democrat in putting things as they really existed in the columns of that paper, and this brought the following editorial in the Democrat on February 16:

"TIMES HAVE CHANGED.

"The officials of the Bethlehem Steel Co. and their friends are mystified because they have found it impossible to whip this newspaper into supporting the company against the men who are out on strike. They simply can't understand it. It is so unusual to find a newspaper, especially in a small city, that can't be made to see things as the trust sees them.

"It has always been such an easy matter to make the newspapers do this, particularly in Allentown, which, until the rejuvenation of the Democrat, was notorious for the spineless daily newspapers. When the strike at the South Bethlehem plant was inaugurated the officials of the company naturally imagined that the newspapers of the Lehigh Valley, particularly those published in the Bethlehems and Allentown, would take sides with the company and thus end the strike before it could gain much headway. All the local papers did this with the exception of the Democrat.

"This newspaper could not take such a position after it became familiar with conditions at the steel mills and learned of the unfair treatment the workers were subjected to. It gave the strikers its cordial support and consequently, it has been a thorn in the side of the steel trust—a thorn which Mr. Schwab has made desperate efforts to remove, but to no avail. The emissaries he or other officials sent came with an air of self-assurance and departed with the knowledge that there is at least one newspaper in Allentown that is not craven and which will not recede from a position once taken when it is satisfied that said position is right."

The strike continued in a peaceful manner until February 20, when a meeting under the auspices of the Industrial Workers of the World was held in the Municipal hall and addressed by Joseph Ettor and Joseph Schmidt. The hall was given to these speakers with the understanding that they would follow the policy of the other organizations interested and not agitate to violence. Statements and remarks made by Ettor forced the executive committee to take means to stop further meeting of this kind, which we did and which is quoted in the South Bethlehem Globe of February 21 as follows:

"NOT ALLOWED TO SPEAK.

"The Industrial Workers of the World organizers to-day were refused the privilege of addressing audiences in Municipal Hall, because of objections to their aims and ideas by Chief of Police Kelly, who fears the necessity of arresting the leaders and those who may be affected by their speeches. Chief Kelly states that the strike of the Bethlehem Steel Works' employees has been without any disorder or destruction of property so far, and intends that no person or persons shall remain long in South Bethlehem to incite anyone to disregard the law or riot. Two of the disciples of the Workers have arranged for a meeting to-night in Strauss's Hall."

I might say, in explanation, also, that while our strike for over two weeks had been very peaceful, still we had active committees at work in the various shops awaiting the signal to all come out in a body.

We were following out a well defined plan and the tactics proposed by the representatives of the I. W. W. would have disrupted everything we had planned, consequently we were forced to object to their coming on the ground when the strike was about three weeks old and killing what chances we had of winning.

So the entire plant closed up. They ran it from 800 men in the first lap to over 9,000 men in three weeks without a single arrest.

Our plans called for a parade of the strikers on Wednesday, February 23. We changed this date to Thursday, 24, and this is what the South Bethlehem Globe of the 25th said of the parade:

"The parade formed on Birch Street and proceeded to Fourth Street, and thence over the principal thoroughfares of the borough, back to Third Street again, moving eastward to and beyond the steel works' offices at Third and Poplar Streets, with a countermarch in front of the office building, to which place many workmen from the mills shops and furnaces, after a hard day's toil, hurried to secure a good view of the strikers' ranks, which extended the length of four blocks. At Third and Poplar Streets Chief of Police Kelly, with a large squad of policemen, were stationed to see that no clash should ensue between the strikers and the men who have remained at work. There was no attempt at disorder. The parade was headed by a striker carrying aloft a large United States flag, and was followed by the First Hungarian Band, which played a repertoire of airs."

This parade was the climax of a successful campaign, and the next morning, Friday, just three weeks from the time the first men went out, saw the entire plant closed up. This is the reason the steel company immediately called Sheriff Person into consultation and asked him to send for the State police. The governor refused to send the State police upon receipt of the first telegram; asked that he be advised what the sheriff had done in the way of exercising his powers in preserving the peace, and saying that the information before him did not show that the situation could not be controlled without the State police.

The governor refused to send the State police. Now, I want you to get this carefully: To this telegram the sheriff replied:

"It is impossible for me to handle and control the situation in South Bethlehem. It is impossible to get sufficient deputies from this community to act should serious riot and bloodshed and shooting occur. It is absolutely impossible for me to protect men desiring to work, and further riot and bloodshed is imminent with morning."

That statement is not correct, because it would lead you to believe that they had bloodshed.

Chairman WALSH. Is that the sheriff?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. [Reading:] "The whole town is in a lawless state, and I must have help to preserve the peace, since I have exhausted all my resources. Have personally been in the works several hours this afternoon and found it impossible, on account of mobs, to get out. I am supported in the foregoing by the burgess and chief of police of South Bethlehem."

This telegram to the governor brought a troop of about 25 State police to South Bethlehem on February 26. The sheriff of the county had already established headquarters in the office of the Bethlehem Steel Co. The State police began to start trouble as soon as they arrived in the town. Let me read you the account of their brutality from the Democrat of February 28.

"As the result of bringing in 95 members of the State constabulary into South Bethlehem Saturday, conditions have been just reversed, and that little town is now in the midst of a reign of terror."

There were 25 came Saturday morning, and more in the afternoon, and probably by Saturday night there were 95 there as a result of bringing them in.

Their presence was not entirely known in the town until they had killed one man and seriously shot another one through the face, while dozens are nursing battered heads as the result of the cruel wielding of the troopers long riot clubs.

It was shortly before 9 o'clock when the first real trouble came, and a sad incident occurred which will be a blot on the history of South Bethlehem for years to come.

A crowd of about 200 Americans and foreigners had congregated about the front of the Majestic Hotel, corner Third and Linden Streets. The troopers were trying to disperse the crowd, which, owing to its large numbers, could not give way very fast. While the troopers were prodding the men with their riot sticks and driving them off the pavement some one in the mob on the opposite corner flung a large piece of ice, which struck Trooper McGarry in the mouth and ear, partly stunning him. Without waiting to see where the missile had come from one of the troopers charged the crowd, which was rapidly backing into the barroom of the hotel, and drawing his revolver fired two shots into the mass of humanity going through the door.

The first shot struck John Zambo, of 875 Sixth Street, who was drinking a glass of beer at the bar. He fell to the floor with a bullet through his brain, while the second shot struck Tony Costovas, a baker, of 631 Fifth Street, who was also in the barroom. He had a miraculous escape from death, the heavy bullet passing in the left side of his jaw and out the other without striking his teeth.

After the shooting the trooper jumped from his horse and rushing in grabbed Costovas, from whom the blood was flowing in streams, and dragging him over the prostrate form of Zambo, whose brains were oozing out on the floor, pulled him out to the corner and turned him loose.

Why did they not arrest him?

Costovas was then taken in charge by several of his fellow countrymen and taken to the office of Dr. Boyle, where the injury was dressed.

Zambo, whose life blood was fast ebbing away, was picked up and the ambulance called. He was placed in it, and on the way to the hospital Father J. F. X. Walsh administered the last rites of the Catholic Church to the dying man. He died soon after being brought to the hospital, without recovering consciousness.

Following the shooting the bar of the Majestic was immediately closed. The shooting was entirely unprovoked and caused great indignation throughout the town, while groups of foreigners gathered on the corners and muttered ominously in their native tongues.

Two things I wish to bring to your attention from this shooting. The first is that the Majestic Hotel, which was shot into, was the headquarters of the organizers of the American Federation of Labor, and we believe was singled out for this shooting to intimidate the men in charge of the strike. The other is that no attempt was made to arrest anyone for breaking the peace. Even the man who was shot through the face was turned loose.

Quoting further from the same paper [reading]:

"The most serious act of the troopers occurred shortly before noon, when one struck George Kosvas, of 921 Fifth Street, on the head a number of times with his riot stick, inflicting serious injury. Kosvas alleged that he was waiting for a car to get a doctor for his wife, who is in confinement, when the trooper came along and ordered him to move. His injuries required a number of stitches and were dressed by Dr. A. S. Bender."

Here is a photograph of this [indicating]. You can see he was not arrested, and there was no crowd or riot.

I had a number of photographs of the State police sitting in front of the steel works office, making it their headquarters, and recently when there was a movement on foot in New York and New Jersey to establish State police I made a trip to the office of the New York Call, and there are several photographs which I loaned to the State Federation of Labor to get out a special Cossack edition. They used those photographs with the understanding that they were to be returned, but unfortunately they were lost, and all I have is the front page of the sections. You can see the State police sitting in front of the steel works office.

I also have a collection here which shows the State police in action during the strike at different times. It shows the military feature of them and shows them quartered in front of the steel works office.

I have a photo of this man immediately after he was clubbed, and also several postal cards which we distributed at that time. Please keep in mind that he was not arrested and that the policy of the State police was not to arrest men who were breaking the peace, but to club men who refused to be bullied by them. The State police also were quartered in the steel works office, keeping their horses in the barns of the Bethlehem Steel Co.

About 9 o'clock on the same day of the shooting this incident occurred [reading]:

"Another incident which brought mutterings from the crowd was when one of the troopers ordered a man with a baby to move. The man started to walk, but the trooper thought he was not walking fast enough and struck him with his club, almost knocking him down. * * *

"Upon being questioned by a reporter, one of the troopers stated that their motto was 'There is no innocent bystander,' and when the order comes 'Get your man,' you pick anybody. * * *

These quotations are also from the Allentown Democrat, which stated the conditions of the dead man's family in this way.

You may think I am making a lot of this up, but I have the newspaper clippings of every day of the strike, and I will leave them with the commission, and you can verify everything I say. I took the precaution to get that so that you would not say I had made up the statement; I have the newspaper clippings right here; I will turn them over to the commission.

Mr. WILLIAMS (reading). "The wife of the dead man is in a serious condition. She is about to become a mother, and this together with her grief-stricken condition has made her seriously ill. The family, which consists of the mother and one boy, 6 years of age, is sorely in need of food and clothing."

The Allentown Morning Call gives us additional accounts of the brutality of the State police in this manner: "One foreigner, it is said, was rolling a cigarette when he heard the regulation 'move on.' The man replied, 'I will when I roll my cigarette'; whereupon he was knocked down, one of the troopers planting his heels in the pit of the man's stomach.

"In several skirmishes, a lot of women and children were trampled into the mud and their clothing torn. Among these was Chief of Police Kelly's wife. Frank Fitzpatrick received a badly lacerated scalp.

"A constable of South Bethlehem, elected by the citizens, James Cullen by name, was attempting to protect the residents against the attack of the State police, and he was arrested by Capt. Robinson and five men for 'calling names' and threatening to shoot, as the troopers claimed."

This is recorded in the Democrat of February 26.

On March 1 the Allentown Call contained this article:

"The South Bethlehem police hold a warrant against Andrew Sheltar, one of the troopers, for stealing brass from the Bethlehem Steel Co. more than two years ago. The warrant has gone beyond the time limit. His home is on Second Street, South Bethlehem."

Here we find a fugitive from justice being brought back to South Bethlehem in the person of a State policeman to club and abuse the decent citizens of the borough. Several men had been arrested by the State police during the first two or three days of their visit to South Bethlehem, and this is the way the men were treated: They were taken to the property of the Bethlehem Steel Co. and locked up in one of the buildings of the steel company. Please keep in mind that the headquarters of the State police were in the main office of the steel company and that the sheriff of the county had also made this office his headquarters. The company appeared to have become the dictator as to what was to be done to the men arrested. See where the hearings were held. I am now quoting from the Allentown Morning Call of March 1, 1910.

This will bear out what was said the other day, that there were members of the State police fugitives from justice, or undesirable characters. I would suggest that the commission get a copy of the legislative record of April 20, which has some more accounts of the troopers being arrested from a little town of Hamburg. [Reading:]

"The hearings of the men who were arrested by the State constabulary in the riots at South Bethlehem Steel Works Saturday and Saturday night were held yesterday in the offices of General Manager Grace at the steel plant. With one or two exceptions the men were not strikers but sympathizers who came to South Bethlehem and resented the Cossack invasion.

"While the testimony against some of the men was damaging, the majority of them appeared not to comprehend what they had done.

"While the warrants were being made out, Charles M. Schwab, president of the steel company, appeared. He remained only a minute, going out of the door with the remark that 'this was a very unpleasant duty to perform.' Justice J. M. Enright conducted the hearings, and most of the men were held under $1,000 bail for court. They will be taken to the Easton jail by Detective Dorne."

This to us was a travesty on justice. The State police were brought to South Bethlehem to protect the property of the steel company. Men were arrested in all parts of the town and then taken to the steel company's property.

I want you to get this, too. They arrested men out of town, and they were taken to the property of the Bethlehem Steel Co., "tried in the office of the steel company, and taunted by the president, Charles M. Schwab, while they were being tried."

The inquest in the death of Zambo, killed by the State police, was held at McGettigan's Hotel, Fountain Hill, on March 1. Through some neglect no post mortem examination of the body had been held, so this is what happened at the inquest, quoting from the Allentown Call of March 2:

"The inquest into the death of Joseph Zambo, the striker who was shot and killed by Trooper Moughan, was held last evening at McGettigan's Hotel, on Fountain Hill. It was suddenly discovered, while Dr. Marker, a physician at St. Luke's Hospital was testifying, that no post mortem had been held. This immediately put a stop to the proceedings.

"After some discussion it was decided to take the body out of the casket and convey it to St. Luke's Hospital, where a post mortem will be made. Undertaker Kinney removed the body to the institution at midnight last night, where the post mortem was made by Dr. S. A. Brunner, the senior surgeon of pathology at the hospital. The body was again removed to the man's home and the inquest will be continued this evening."

I want to add the grief of this man's widow, about to become a mother, was something terrible to witness as these men took the body from the casket at midnight, she not realizing what it all meant. The men on strike decided to turn out in a body at the funeral of this man. A committee of which I was a member tried to interview the sheriff so that arrangements could be made to bury our dead peacefully and with no invitation to fight by the State police. In order to get to the office of the sheriff I had to go to the office of the steel company, get permission to go inside from a State policeman, and there I found a deputy sheriff in charge who would give us no satisfaction as to what attitude would be taken if we attempted to parade at Zambo's funeral.

I finally got to the point where I met determined opposition with the same kind of medicine and served notice on the deputy sheriff that we were going to bury Zambo the next day and to keep the State police entirely off the streets of the town. I also told him I had did all I could to control the men when they wanted to clean up the first lot of State police the Saturday before, but if the State police insisted on looking for trouble, there was no alternative open to us but fight, and it would be fight to a finish. I left him with that ultimatum and that afternoon received word from the sheriff's office that we should go on with the funeral and there would be no State police on the streets that day. We held a peaceful funeral and there was not a policeman in sight.

The inquest into the death of this man was held the evening following the post mortem and resulted in this verdict:

"We, the jury appointed to sit on this case, do say that Joseph Zambo came to his death at St. Luke's Hospital, Fountain Hill, Saturday, February 26, 1910, and that the cause of his death was a bullet wound in the left side of his head inflicted by a Pennsylvania State constable by the name of John Moughan at the southeast corner of East Third and Linden Streets on Saturday, February 26."

The troopers continued to bulldoze everyone and continually tried to get the men to return to work.

The Democrat of March 4 reports this:

"It was reported on good authority that late last night squads of the State police were entering the houses of the foreigners near the works and dragging them to work in the mills. One man reports seeing two troopers dragging a Hungarian along the street late last night. The man was struggling wildly and exclaiming, 'Me no want to work; me a striker.' Such actions on the part of these 'guardians of the peace' will be investigated by the committee, and if found true the guilty ones will be punished."

The Democrat of March 5 reports this:

"Boasting that he would show the authorities of South Bethlehem how to run things, John Eastburn, a brother of State Trooper William Eastburn, was arrested yesterday morning at 3 o'clock by Officer Lynch, charged with disorderly conduct. Later on four troopers, including the prisoner's brother, and Attorney James Scarlet, it is asserted, appeared and, after trying to intimidate the chief, offered bail, but the chief refused to grant his release, and after a hearing yesterday afternoon he paid a fine and costs."

The State constabulary continuing to do picket duty for the steel company, the men were warned continually at the various meetings to be on the watch for them. J. J. Keppler, vice president of the machinists union, finally was forced to issue this advice to the men, as reported in the Democrat of March 8:

"Great excitement was created yesterday at the meeting of the strikers by the announcement of a warning by J. J. Keppler, vice president of the machinists"——

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Who said that?

Mr. WILLIAMS. J. J. Keppler, vice president of the machinists. I want you to get it correct. [Continues reading:]

"Telling the men to arm themselves and shoot to kill on the occasion of forcible entry into their houses by any of the State police."

It was a matter of defense. [Reading:]

"The statement was the outcome of the action of the troopers in pulling Jack Ringhoffer, a young German, out of bed at 5 o'clock yesterday morning and arresting him, charging him with enjoining men from going to work. It is said the trooper gave him the alternative of either returning to work or submitting to arrest. He took the latter. This action on the part of the State troopers caused much indignation among the men, and the words of Mr. Keppler were received with loud cheers."

The actions of the State police also forced the executive committee of the strikers to send the following appeal to Gov. Stuart, of Pennsylvania, which was dated March 4, 1910:

"My country, 'tis of thee, sweet land of liberty."

APPEAL TO HIS EXCELLENCY, THE GOVERNOR OF PENNSYLVANIA, IN BEHALF OF THE WORKINGMEN EMPLOYED AT THE BETHLEHEM STEEL WORKS, SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA.

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA., March 4, 1910.

To His Excellency, the Governor of Pennsylvania.

DEAR SIR: The borough of South Bethlehem, Pa., has been forced into a most deplorable situation through your assistance in complying with the request of Sheriff Robert Person, of Easton, Pa., in sending the State constabulary into this borough, based upon information wired to you by him on February 25 or 26 (as per newspaper reports).

These statements are positively false, practically untrue and misleading in every respect, and have forced a libel against good citizens of this borough; and regardless of the consequences which the State may suffer in the matter of suits for indemnity, resulting from assaults committed, false arrests and imprisonment, and murder, you should thoroughly investigate the conduct of the sheriff and the State law permitting removal from the office which he has disgraced and prostituted should be applied.

A cold-blooded murder has been committed by those thugs for which the State and county is held responsible; residents have been brutally assaulted and denied their liberty, for which the sheriff of this county is directly responsible, and you, as governor, indirectly for complying with his request, without thoroughly investigating the necessity of sending the State constabulary to this city, before taking action.

The borough of South Bethlehem has been terrorized, its citizens driven to despair, and in fear of murder, arrest, and riot, people were compelled to arm themselves, not against a mob or an organized body of men who had made threats or had done illegal or unlawful acts, but to protect their lives, their homes, and their children against the State constabulary, which you caused to be brought here in a community where peace reigned and not a single overt act had been committed and not over a complaint received from any citizens during the three weeks in which a large number of men were idle, due to a cessation of work.

No overt act had been committed or the peace disturbed, until the hired strike breakers, known as the State constabulary, appeared on the scene and immediately upon their arrival began a campaign of slugging, arrests, murder, assault, and riot with cause. The viciousness and brutality of which beggars description, and that under the authority of this great Commonwealth, done by your subordinates.

So terror stricken have become the citizens that borough officials and aldermen congregated in the office of the chief of police giving voice to their indignation and condemnation, demanding and persisting that these men known as the State constabulary committing these riotous acts in the name of the State of Pennsylvania be immediately ordered to cease their campaign of terrorism, which the civil borough authorities, out of fear for their lives, were unable or unwilling to comply with. Police officers of the borough came to the office of the chief of police surrendering their badge, uniforms, and other regalia, resigning their commissions rather than serve this borough as officers of the peace under such humiliating and most revolting conditions, forced upon this community by false statements of the sheriff and assistance rendered by you as governor. And what can be the purpose of all this? The answer is easy. To stampede the men back to work, to break a peaceful and orderly strike and compel men to accept the present wages and conditions, thereby assisting the Bethlehem Steel Co., regardless of the most damnable outrageous falsehood told by Sheriff Person, of Northampton County, and the bringing of the official strike breakers, known as the State constabulary, by you as governor of this State, presumably in the interest of Mr. C. M. Schwab, they riding rough shod over peaceful citizens, terrorizing the entire population, murdering and assaulting innocent men, and imprisoning a number of them, the men remained loyal and did not stampede back to work and are still out, no one knowing who may next be assaulted or murdered.

Through your assistance and the false information furnished you by the sheriff of Northampton County, 17 men were arrested upon charges made by these men, the State constabulary, one of whom is already charged with manslaughter.

Seventeen men are held as prisoners upon what we believe to be trumped-up charges by the constabulary, for the purpose of covering up their disgraceful acts, their misconduct, their terrorism, which, as herein stated, resulted in murder, murderous assault, and false imprisonment.

Incarcerated upon the steel company property, denied the right of counsel, finally tried under the direct supervision of Mr. C. M. Schwab's agents, these men were finally held under excessive bail, and removed to the county prison at Easton, and all this in the year 1910, in the State of Pennsylvania.

Respectfully submitted,

David Williams, chairman, Arthur Mellin, Peter Coyle, J. C. McIntyre, W. F. Smith, Walter Edgar, Thomas Doyle, John Coulter, Theodore Kepper, C. H. Steven, F. J. Gillisple, John F. Forging, Peter Form, L. J. Thomas, John Maley, Elmer Werkheiser, John Boyle, Thomas Bender, Patrick Courtney, George Benker, Charles Watts, Allen Steager, Eugene Doyle, George Sheets, Ed. P. Lucas, Williams C. Duffy, George Becker, James Bellow, Thomas McGunness, Aug. Sheetz, Oscar Victor DeGaigne, Carl Ehrgott, Hamilton Harrison.

ROOM 8, MUNICIPAL BUILDING, SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA.

The most brutal act committed by the State police which was witnessed by myself occurred on March 17 (St. Patrick's Day.) The Allentown Democrat of March 18 gives the details as follows:

"One of the most brutal scenes since the memorable bloody Saturday was enacted last evening at 5 o'clock at Third and Elm Streets, when James Gallagher, of Fifth and Locust Streets, a 70-year-old man, who refused to move on, was beaten into insensibility while the blood streamed from his head to the pavement.

"According to bystanders Gallagher was standing on the corner, when one of the troopers, whose name is known, ordered the old man to move on. He refused, saying: 'I am an American citizen and a taxpayer and a citizen here for over 50 years, and I don't see why I should move on. I'm not doing anything.'

"Without waiting for anything further the trooper spurred his horse forward, and, seizing Gallagher, beat him so badly with a long riot stick that he had to be taken to a doctor. A large crowd witnessed this act, and they snarled and ground their teeth in rage at the action."

I was 30 years of age when this occurred, and never before had a thought enter my brain to desire to kill anyone, but when I saw this brutal beating up of Gallagher I want to say the only thing that stopped the killing of a State policeman was that we were not prepared.

There is a breaking point between conservatism and radicalism.

If the State of Pennsylvania continues to send men out to club citizens, and old men at that, there will finally have to come the preparation for defense by the working class. When we held our next meeting after the clubbing of this man we advised all men who had guns to strap them on their backs, a right guaranteed them under the Constitution of both the United States and also the State of Pennsylvania.

In fact, in Pennsylvania we have come to the conclusion that since this organization known as the State police are housed, wine, dined, and controlled by the corporations, we must prepare to protect ourselves from their brutality in times of labor troubles. We had a peaceful strike in South Bethlehem until these men came. Let me read you the statement of Chief of Police Kelly, which is taken from Senate Document 521, Sixty-first Congress, second session.

This statement from Chief Kelly shows beyond any doubt the manner in which the corporations control these men. This same Senate document, which is a report of an investigation made of the working conditions in the plant, as a result of a request made by the committee and signed by myself, shows the working conditions under which the men on strike were forced to submit were deplorable, and that during 1909, 10 per cent of all the men employed had met with some kind of an accident which placed them upon the relief association of the company, as high as 2 per cent of the men employed in two different departments being injured.

The committee investigating the conditions in the steel mill were furnished with statements of working conditions by me and signed by men from the different departments, but all statements from the men, except the general statement covering the cause of the strike, was suppressed from the report by the Department of Commerce and Labor. I have copies of the statements suppressed, if the commission desires to hear them, as two of them in particular deal with some interesting subjects.

I might say a little more in detail that this is a report of the Bethlehem strike gotten out by the Department of Commerce and Labor, for which I sent a telegram, signed by myself and Attorney Cyphers, for the men, who is not here, but will be here next week. I want to say in connection with that that the next important statement furnished the Government in permitting the steel company in frauds affecting the United States Government and the railroad companies, were kept out of that report. I furnished the committee with statements from men in different parts of the plant. I furnished the committee of the Department of Commerce and Labor the statements, with this understanding "I will give you these statements, signed by the men, providing you give me copies. I do not believe you will ever use them. I believe the steel company is too powerful to permit you to use these statements."

Mr. Stewart and Mr. Sullivan said, "Oh, yes; we will use them." But before I gave them to the committee I made copies, to be sure I had copies. They did not use them in the report and I could not get copies of them from the department until I finally notified Mr. Neill that if he did not give me copies I would publish the copies I had made from the original. Then I got copies from Mr. Neill, which I furnished to Congressman Rainey. The copies which Congressman Rainey used came from me.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Who is Mr. Neill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Neill at that time was the Commissioner of Labor, under Secretary Nagle.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Dr. Neill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Dr. Neill, and there was another statement furnished.

Chairman WALSH. Are those statements in that report which you hold in your hand?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; they were repressed in this.

Chairman WALSH. Let me see that report. What was the general tenor of those statements?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, one of them was a statement from a man who was supposed to put good test pieces with rotten rails so the inspector would pass them, and the railroad company would think they were buying good rails when they were buying rotten rails; and an accident occurred up in New York State a couple of years ago which killed 17 old soldiers because of the bursting of a Bethlehem steel rail. That shows the danger.

Chairman WALSH. Was there only one affidavit to that effect?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. It was his job to put the good test pieces with the rotten rails. It was not an affidavit, it was a signed statement. I have an affidavit here, one by myself, and one by a man in the treating room, as to how they used to doctor the propeller shafts and one thing and another. That is a sworn statement.

Chairman WALSH. What do you mean by "doctoring propeller shafts"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. For instance, you take a shaft; it might have to be of a certain degree of hardness—temper, we call it—and if it was that hard it would be very difficult to machine; and the steel company, of course, could not machine it in a very short time and would not make much money in machining it; that is, would not save much money in doing it. So, of course, at night when this inspector was at home they would stick it there in some—put it through a heating process which would make it softer, and allow them to machine it quicker, after the inspector had passed it at a certain degree of temperature, or, rather, a certain degree of hardness. That is what I mean by being "doctored." I will read an affidavit after while, and it will explain that.

I want to say that when we furnished Mr. Rainey these statements, which have been suppressed by the Department of Commerce and Labor, Mr. Rainey wanted something further; but some of these men had been driven out of town, and some we did not want to ask them to sign anything or swear to anything, because they have large families, and to do so it was practically a starvation proposition if we would get them to swear to statements. But they had thrown their books into me, and they couldn't do any more; so I was absolutely frank with what I knew, and gave them a list of witnesses to call; and the three statements which we added to those already in the Department of Commerce and Labor were sworn to. Now, I don't want to get away from this Kelly proposition for awhile. We are on the State police. If we would get into this detective-work proposition it might get us off of what I want to prove against the State police.

This is from Mr. Hugh Kelly, chief of police. This is a statement which he furnished the Government, and I want you to take particular notice to what Mr. Kelly said. [Reading:]

"When the constabulary arrived here, February 26, within two blocks of the point where they got off the cars, without any notice to the burgess or chief of police of their presence in the town, but in charge of the sheriff, about two blocks, as I say, from where they got off the cars—at Third and New Streets—one of the troopers jumped off his horse, caught a man by the throat, pulled his collar and tie off, without any reason, as I have been told, and he turned him over as a prisoner to one of the police officers who had been doing night duty, and had him locked up in our station house. No charge has been preferred against this man up to this date (Mar. 24). I kept this man until afternoon and released him on a cash ball of $25 to appear when wanted.

"On their way down to the steel company's office they assaulted a number of other people standing on the corners of the streets. In one instance, one of the local police officers who witnessed this assault protested against it, but he had no weight whatever; and between Third and Linden Streets, going to the office, they beat people standing peaceably on the street. Men were arrested, taken to the plant of the steel company, and there confined. They gave them a hearing on Monday.

"I was very indignant at the manner in which the sheriff handled the troopers, in view of the fact that the burgess, myself, and the chairman of the police committee and officials of the steel company were parties to the bringing of the constabulary here for the preservation of the peace and the protection of the steel company's plant. Had the sheriff notified our burgess and chief of police that the constabulary were here, and my claim is we should have been so notified, the riot that occurred afterwards, I believe, never would have occurred."

I want you to get that. It says if they had been notified the riot never would have occurred. [Continues reading:]

"I claim that the sheriff and captain of troopers should have notified our burgess that they were here on the ground ready to give whatever assistance was required by the local authorities. The burgess was never notified officially that the troopers were on the ground by the sheriff. The sheriff took the men to the steel company's plant, and makes his headquarters at the steel company's plant. He has never notified the chief of police that those men were here, nor consulted with him as to what should be done.

"They start out on our streets, beat down our people without any reason whatever, and they shot down an innocent man—Joseph Szambo—who was not on the street, but who was in the Majestic Hotel, when one of the troopers rode up on the pavement at the hotel door and fired two shots into the barroom, shooting one man through the mouth, another (Szambo) through the head, who died that afternoon in the hospital.

"The name of the trooper who shot Szambo is said to be Moughan. Moughan has been delivered up to the office of the district attorney by Capt. Robinson. The district attorney has preferred a charge of manslaughter against Moughan and he is held in $5,000 bond to the next term of court, which will be held April 11. From all the information I gather there was no warrant for this murder. There was no disturbance of any kind at this hotel. No reason whatever for him to shoot into this hotel. To an outsider it would appear that it was premeditated; the Majestic being the headquarters of the leaders that were conducting the strike. There is no other known reason for it. While this may not be so, it looks so to me, and to many with whom I have talked. It is one of the best hotels in the town and one of the most peaceable. The bartender might just as well have been killed as this man Szambo, as one of the shots was directly over his head, about 6 inches.

"Deputy sheriffs, the number I do not know, appointed by the sheriff to preserve the peace of the borough against mob, riot, and violence have been kept in the plant of the steel company. The troopers he sent out through the town, and whatever riot or troubles have occurred in our town since their arrival is due entirely to their high-handed and cowardly attacks upon innocent people.

"We had 18 special borough police appointed as a result of the strike. The borough authorities on the 15th of March released from duty all but nine of these. There are nine specials on duty now.

"We can point to the fact that notwithstanding the number of citizens who have been cruelly beaten and others thrown into jail, the citizens of our town have not committed any outrage on the State constabulary. If they were not a peaceful and law-abiding community there would be some other tales to tell. Troopers went into the houses of people without warrant and searched the inmates; drove people from their own doorsteps. They beat an old man at least 60 years old, and I believe he is older—a peaceable old fellow named Joseph ———."

He has the last name taken out of the report here. [Continues reading:]

"He was hauled before Justice Bloom. The complaint of the trooper was that the old man was drunk and had made some sarcastic remark to him while on his horse. He struck him with his riot stick, knocked him down on the street, and left him in a very bad condition. The justice made the old man pay the costs of the case and assessed no fine.

"This is only one of a dozen similar cases. Another case was called to my attention by the brother of the man arrested. He came here and made complaint to me that his brother, while on the way to the station with his mother to take a train to New York, was struck down by one of the troopers and thrown into prison. His brother is in prison yet, so far as I know.

"I don't know as you care for a report of a conversation over the telephone, but after the constabulary had been here several days Mr. R. S. Taylor, attorney for the steel company, called me up on the phone, wanting to know before what justice the prisoners arrested by the troopers would be tried. I answered Mr. Taylor that the constabulary had made these arrests; confined these men in the plant of the steel company without notifying the burgess or myself; that I did not care a ——— what justice he had them brought before; that there were four justices in the town. About a minute afterwards Capt. Robinson called me over the phone, introducing himself and asked why I felt so indignant about the arrests. I then called his attention to the high-handed manner in which his troopers beat down our citizens without any just cause, as I understood it. I called his attention to the arrest of a man at Third and New Streets that was assaulted by one of the troopers without any reason, as shown by the information given to me by people who were eyewitnesses. I asked Capt. Robinson what were the powers of the troopers in regard to arrests. He answered, The same as any constable or police officer—the only difference being that their authority was State wide while the local police and local constable was confined to your county or borough, that he was answerable to the sheriff.

"Only one arrest was made by borough authorities, that of Harman Garabrandt, made on complaint of some of his neighbors, to the effect that he carried a revolver. He was reported as having been shooting at targets around in his yard and as having made remarks that anyone trying to stop him from going to work would find out that he could take care of himself. The man was working. When arrested and searched, a loaded revolver was found. He was held to $500 bail to appear before the court (April 11) on a charge of carrying concealed weapons."

Chairman WALSH. I don't want to interrupt you, but in line of our talk before the session, and the time being a little limited, I have thought perhaps that the matter that you have printed in detail might be submitted in our record, and taken up by the whole commission.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, if you will touch upon what might be called the larger phases of your complaint, why, we will take every bit of that into consideration.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I am practically through.

Chairman WALSH. I know; but when you get to reading that way you run past your time; and we have been on it now quite a little over the estimated time. If you could finish up briefly, I want to ask you some questions.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; I can finish this in two minutes. I should just like to finish this, because it is a very important part and is just a very brief statement that is included. This is what Kelly said, finishing up his statement. [Reading:]

"I have been chief of police here nine years, but refused to be a candidate after March 14, partly on account of the manner of treatment accorded the burgess and myself by the sheriff and the constabulary."

Now, here is a short statement by Michael Lynch, chief of police: "Chief Lynch stated that he had been chief only since March 15, 1910; that on the 15th of March 9 of the 18 special policemen had been relieved of duty; that the force now consists of the chief, nine regular and nine special officers.

"Chief Lynch was present throughout the interview with ex-Chief Hugh Kelly. When asked if he had any report to make as to what had happened since March 15, Chief Lynch said:

"March 22 two troopers, names unknown, at Fourth Street and Linden, rode up to and one of them struck Peter ——— with a riot stick and knocked him down; they rode their horses onto him, and then these two troopers rode off and let the man lay there. Afterwards two other troopers rode up and picked Martin up and carried him to the office of Dr. Leibert and had his wounds dressed, and then let him go home. I sent a patrolman up there to look after Martin. He found him in a dazed condition; the doctor said the worst hurt was over his eye and looked like the print of a horse's shoe."

It says there, print of the horse's shoe. The man had run on him.

"On Tuesday evening, March 22, the men out on strike were walking on the sidewalk up near the company's offices, but on the opposite side of the street—"

I want to read this to show the way they got in amongst our men and started the trouble themselves—

"at the time the troopers rode out of the company's yards onto the street. There were troopers dressed in plain clothes walking in this parade—or whatever it could be called—walking with and among these men on the sidewalk. As near as I can find out it was one of these plain-clothes men who called out 'scab' to the troopers as they rode out on the street, although it is claimed that a foreigner called 'scab.' Anyway, the plain-clothes man struck a man with his blackjack and troopers rode into the crowd and arrested three men. Business men were ordered off their own doorsteps. Troopers rode for half a block on the sidewalks swinging their clubs and ordering people off their own doorsteps. They followed one young fellow into a store. Citizens told me that he had done nothing; that he ran into the store to get out of the way of the troopers. A trooper got off his horse, followed him into the store and arrested him."

I have got a photograph of that. This practically concludes what I have to say; that is, in regard to the direct action of the State police.

Chairman WALSH. Were you here yesterday, Mr. Williams?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was part of the time.

Chairman WALSH. Did you hear the testimony on both sides with reference to the attempt, through the business men of the city and the chamber of commerce, to create the public sentiment and the denial of that fact? You heard that issue discussed here, did you?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What was the situation in regard to that at Bethlehem? What part did the citizens and business men generally take in the matter?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, for the first two months—I will say up until about the 1st of April—we had the business men with us.

Chairman WALSH. Until the 1st of April?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; about that time. I can verify that. I will say about the 1st of April. Mr. Schwab called the business men into his office, and he was wild. We had got his goat by sending statements around the country to different architects and different firms that bought material, telling them it would be advisable for them to get their work, and we told them how their work was being done; and he got considerably up in the air because he could not break the strike. And he called the business men in and gave them to understand that he would move his plant out of South Bethlehem if they did not come across and line up with him.

They appointed a committee. They had arranged a meeting there at the chamber of commerce the next night, and they appointed a committee of business men to come down to Washington and get Congressman Palmer, who represented our district, to come to this meeting and deliver a speech. We found out that this committee had arranged to meet Congressman Palmer at half past 7 in the evening, and we immediately got in touch with the Congressman and asked him not to meet the committee until our committee came down. And I was one of the committee that came here, and we met in the office of Congressman Palmer, the committee of business men from South Bethlehem, and they pleaded the cause of the company to Congressman Palmer, and we pleaded the cause of the men, and Congressman Palmer refused to attend that meeting, and he did not go up.

They held the meeting and talked resolutions, denouncing the representatives of organized labor and calling for their dismissal from the town, all at the request of Mr. Schwab, who was there and made a short speech.

I have a copy of the resolution here with me and the names of the men who signed it. And from that time on we had to fight the business men as hard as we had to fight Schwab.

Our men were ordered out of the steel company's houses; they tried to order them out on five days' notice, and we got an opinion from our attorney to pay no attention to the company's threats, or bluffs; no tenant can be put out of a house in less than 55 days. They gave us an opinion on the law, and that was passed among the strikers so they would not be scared out of their houses. But the business men refused men credit who had dealt with them for years, and they made the struggle to obtain something to eat and to obtain an existence so much more keen. We could not feed all the men; we had 9,000 out at one time. We were not organized, and in the whole strike of 104 days we got only $6,700, which was not equal to one dollar a month a man, and we kept the strike on for 104 days before it was finally called off.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What was the end of the strike?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The 18th of May.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I mean, how did it end?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The strike was called off by a committee of nine; it was called off when the chairman of the strikers, myself, was in Washington, and the representative of the American Federation of Labor was with me. We were in Mr. Neill's office fighting for arbitration for the men, and the company went to the committee and told them—promised them their jobs back if they would call the strike off, and they did, and they gave them their jobs back for a few days and then fired them, and that was just what they deserved.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How many were taken back?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Just whoever the company wished.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How many were there?

Mr. WILLIAMS. There were 500 men discriminated against. No man that had taken an active part in the strike was taken back, with the exception of four men that had issued suits against four of the State police for faulty arrest, and just about the time the case was to come up in the court at Easton, one of these men came to our attorney and said, "I have been offered my job back in the steel works if I drop this case against the State police; what would you do about it?" Our attorney said, "Suit yourself, you have to support your family and if the case goes like the case of the trooper, you would not get anything."

Chairman WALSH. How did that case go?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They would not let our attorney have anything to do with it—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). What was the result of the trial?

Mr. WILLIAMS. He was acquitted, because they could not identify him.

Chairman WALSH. How are juries chosen?

Mr. WILLIAMS. We have jury commissioners, and they take the names of citizens and put them in a large wheel.

Chairman WALSH. How many are put in the wheel?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That I do not know, but they are taken from all the members of the community. But when they come to select a jury it is like every other place; they are very careful to get a jury not unfavorable to them.

Chairman WALSH. But if a sufficient number of names are put in the wheel how could they get a favorable jury?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If a man's name was pulled out who was a member of organized labor they would disqualify him because of the fact that he was biased.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any complaint made about the personnel of this jury?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know; at that time I was moving from town to town, looking for a job. I suggest you take the incidents of that trial up with Mr. Cypher, who will be here.

Chairman WALSH. You say part of the objection was to working on Sundays?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did the church people take part in that and undertake to straighten it out in some way, or did they take any action on it?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; about the second or third Sunday several priests in the town and a couple of ministers notified the men to go back to work, and there is a statement from the chairman representing the American Federation of Labor there, in which he condemned the clergy in very harsh tones for standing for and lining up with the steel company, and he addressed the statement to Mr. Charles Spelzy.

Chairman WALSH. On that particular point I was trying to inquire—on the point of working on Sunday, outside of the general proposition.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is what I want to lead up to. When we assailed the ministers for not taking the part of the men, because these men had been forced to work on Sunday, some of them got busy. A committee of ministers—Protestant ministers—came to us and they said they had been to Mr. Schwab. They said Mr. Schwab was an awful man. Of course, I said, "If you think we are going to submit to Mr. Schwab, or surrender to Mr. Schwab because he is an awful man, you are going to get fooled." And I, of course, went for the ministers, because I believed it was their solemn duty to protect the man who was trying to evade Sunday work. The Rev. Father Fretz, of the German Catholic Church, came to one of our meetings, and he said he knew it was a human slaughterhouse. And, of course, he went after the steel company very harshly. We heard that Mr. Schwab sent for him and said to the Rev. Father Fretz, who was at that time president of the Catholic society in that valley which fights socialism—the socialistic movement very keenly—he said to Fretz, "Do you know that is a Socialist strike up there and this man Simon is a Hungarian Socialist and that others are Socialists?" And the Father said, "No." Schwab said, "They are, and you have been helping this Socialist movement."

This statement was given to me by a reporter who got it from the company, and the only thing I can verify it by is what Father Fretz says. He said to me, "What shall I do?" I said, "Keep your mouth shut and let them alone." But he came back again and wanted to make another statement before the men; he came to me as chairman and told me what he was going to do, and I said to him, "We have out there Republicans, Democrats, and Socialists; and we have Catholics and Protestants, and some men that do not go to church at all; and we are trying to weld them into one labor union generally; so don't go out there and try to divide them along political or religious lines"; but he went out, and we gave him permission to speak, and all he did was to slam the Socialist movement. As quick as he got done I, as chairman, had to smooth it over by trying to defend the Socialist movement, and he took his coat and went out.

But I will say this for him, that while the other Catholic churches had collected the men's church dues through the steel company's office, he never did. It was a common practice, if you were a member of a Catholic church there and gave a dollar to the church, they gave, you did not give; it was taken off your pay; if you only worked a day it was taken off, and the steel company paid the clerks.

Chairman WALSH. Were there any other deductions taken from the pay roll, like hospital dues, or for dues for labor unions?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not for a labor union, but for their own steel company relief. I don't know of anything else.

Chairman WALSH. Were orders given to do this, or was it on the same plan as what is called the check-off system?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; I believed so. I believe it is the same as used in the mining districts, where they have to check off dues. It was not compulsory on the part of the men, but you know how it is, if a priest or a preacher comes and say, we will take this off your pay at the end of the month, that is the way it is worked.

Chairman WALSH. Now, getting back to the ministers——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; along about the middle of April the ministers' association of South Bethlehem issued a public statement, in which they said that a committee from the Department of Commerce and Labor had come to them and asked them for information about Sunday work, and in that public statement they said this, that before they gave them any statement they went and saw the honorable president of the Bethlehem Steel Co., and he assured them it was only necessary work accomplished on Sunday, and it was quite a lengthy statement and ended up like this, that they believed that we should work in harmony with the business interests and officers of the steel company in order that business might prevail. I have a copy of that, if you wish it.

Chairman WALSH. How frequently was this Sunday work done up to the time of the strike; how many Sundays did they work?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In the neighborhood of 25 or 30 per cent worked every Sunday.

Chairman WALSH. For how long a period of time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. All the time.

Chairman WALSH. Extending back for what period, a year?

Mr. WILLIAMS. As long as they have been there. It run about 43 per cent.

Chairman WALSH. After the strike, did they quit working on Sundays?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, no, sir; they are working every Sunday; and if they don't work on Sunday to make shells to kill off the Germans, they can't work there.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any protest against working on Sunday?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Individual protests; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I will have to bring this down to a close, Mr. Williams. Now, you have passed a very severe criticism on the State police, are you likewise opposed to the State militia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not. I just want to show you what our State federation of labor did last year in a resolution. I have this with me.

Chairman WALSH. Has the State federation publicly taken official action about the State police?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; this resolution was introduced last year——

Chairman WALSH. Is that what you are going to read now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; this was passed officially in our State federation convention last year. Resolution No. 1, introduced by R. W. Tillotson, representing the metal polishers——

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Is it very long? If it is, just give the gist of it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, it is not long, and I would like to read it, because I took the floor against it and opposed it, and a substitute was finally passed.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Why not read the substitute?

Chairman WALSH. I think we will get a better understanding if you will state the substance of the resolution planned, then the substitute, all together.

Mr. WILLIAMS. This one goes into the question elaborately with the militia, constabulary, and national organizations of the Army and Navy; that they are used by one side of the working class to shoot down the other, and they condemn the whole business. It was an attack on our Regular Army. We took the stand differently; it was right at that time that out in Colorado they were shooting the women and children down, and we were beginning to realize we had to meet force with force, and it was a question in our minds whether we would not send our members of the labor unions into the militia of Pennsylvania, so so when the State constabulary shot down our men that we would be armed to protect our homes, which is guaranteed us under the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of Pennsylvania. The Constitution of the United States is here, also the constitution of the State of Pennsylvania, and section 1 of article 1 is the section I refer to. The question in our minds was how to get these arms, and get them legally, when we were put up against a war, to fight. This was offered as a substitute.

Chairman WALSH. Now, in case both of them were abolished, Mr. Williams, would you have any effective force to maintain law and order in the State?

Mr. WILLIAMS. We provided for that with this resolution—resolution No. 4. I have three here; this is one of them, and it will answer your question. It is introduced by Thomas Kennedy, representing the United Mine Workers:

I might state there was another resolution passed that the executive council investigate the matter of forming semimilitary organizations within the labor unions. Did you get that? That is, that the executive council of the State Federation of Labor were instructed to investigate the forming of a semi-military organization for the purpose of protecting ourselves at a time when the State constabulary came in, and the executive council will report on that at the convention held next week. We are not going to see our people shot down by these official strikebreakers and remain helpless. We want peace, but if it comes to fighting, we won't go against a machine gun with a brick.

Chairman WALSH. I don't exactly get your meaning.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What I mean is this: When the time comes that we find out that the State only exists for us theoretically and hypocritically—in the Bethlehem Steel Works, in 1909, out of 9,000 working, 927 had been killed or injured in 1909. In 1910 the United States Steel Corporation reports show that 246 out of 1,000 were injured in the plant in one year, and in one mill 500 men out of 1,000 were injured in that plant. Now, men that are forced to work under conditions like that some time are going to revolt. We try every peaceable means we can to remedy these conditions, and certainly if we are forced to the point where we must fight, nobody is to blame. If that man that has had his leg broke or his father has had his back broke in the steel mill and he is forced into a state of militarism, he is not to blame; it is not his fault; it is the man who sits in New York and allows women and children to be burned; it is his fault. We whose ancestors fought in the Civil War, and some of us have ancestors who fought in the Revolutionary War, it is not the spirit of anarchy that wants us to educate our children; but it is the same spirit that forced the men in 1776 to struggle for liberty, and if we fight for it and get it, we will make history to teach our children that John D. Rockefeller and those men were oppressive, and the men that led the move to throw them off were patriots. We will teach them just that, as our forefathers were the men that threw off the yoke of England in 1776 were patriots. If we are beaten, we will be put down as rebels, and for that reason we are going to connect education and intelligence with the struggle and be prepared when it comes. I believe in political action, backed up by an economic organization. Political action without the backing of an economic organization don't amount to that. Two years ago we got an act, although the railroads running 75 cars where they used to run 30, we have a law which compels them to put on an extra man on over 29—

Chairman WALSH. I don't want to bring that subject in, and I feel that my question has been fully answered.

Commissioner Weinstock wishes to ask you some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You were comparing, Mr. Williams, the present industrial situation, and you are justifying the strikers in a labor trouble for arming themselves by calling attention to the American Revolution?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are the cases parallel? Is it not a fact that at the time of the American Revolution the cry was "taxation without representation"?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is it not a fact that to-day you and I and the rest of us have representation? Is it not a fact that you and I can elect to our legislative bodies the men who represent our ideas? Doesn't organized labor have in our legislative halls their representatives who can voice their sentiments and do what they can do to secure such legislation as the workers desire? In the face of that, with the ballot in the hands of the workers, and the workers in the majority in every State in the Union, what justification is there to talk as you talk about arming the men and defying the law?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This justification: Only a small per cent of the male population of the United States have a right to vote. None of the women have it in our State. In a few States the women have the right of ballot, and female labor and child labor is fast taking the place of male labor. Over in New York City, where there is something like 150,000 to 175,000 population in one congressional district, that only voted about 15,000 men and elected Meyer London, a Socialist Congressman.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is it or not a fact that wage earners in Pennsylvania, in common with the rest of the States, are largely in the majority?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; the wageworkers, but not the voters.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The wage earners are in the majority of voters, are they not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; the wage earners.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let me make it clear. If you could take an analysis of the voters of Pennsylvania, is it not a fact that a majority of them are wage earners, or those that sympathize with wage earners?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The majority of them, we will say, work for wages, because they are all in some line of industry.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, the majority rules, doesn't it, in Pennsylvania the same as in every other State in the union?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If the majority of these wage earners wanted the women to vote, can not they by their ballot give them the right by voting for woman suffrage?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; but the women that want to vote won't get it until the men say they can have it. It is the ones that don't get it that are entitled to it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. All right. If the majority of the wage earners of the State of Pennsylvania believe it is to the economic and political interest to have the women vote, they can have them vote? The power is absolutely within their own political hands? What need they to rise up in arms against the authorities?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Your actions are judged by the conditions you are forced to submit to. It is all very well for the manufacturer who has been getting a large amount of the wealth that has been produced to say protect my property. This is only a proof of the doctrine of economic determination. The way he gets his living determines his attitude and action. If he was bound by the present system of production and distribution you are satisfied with, but when it makes one Star of Bethlehem, like we have Charles Schwab, then I say the system ought to be changed.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How many men work at Bethlehem?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Nine thousand.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. There were 9,000 men against one Schwab?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Nine thousand possible votes against one vote?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; and we beat his man for Congress.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What greater power can you put into the hands of the worker than the ballot?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will show you how it works now. He had a candidate, J. Davis, and we defeated him, but when Judge Scott died the Republican governor made this fellow judge in our county that we had defeated.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Very well, if that did not suit the wishes of the workers at the next election they could show their displeasure?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; and we will do it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then you have all the remedy that any reasonable man could ask for when it is placed in your own hands?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; but there is the stump. The railroad unions in our State last year, or two years ago, I guess it was last year, worked for certain men for the legislature, believing they stood for our interests, and when they got them there you don't see the money pass, but they pass corrupt legislation against the workers that sent them there. They serve the interests of these men who live off of the toil of the working man.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are all workers bribe takers?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I didn't say that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then it is the duty of the workers that have the power in their community to elect representatives that are proof against bribe taking?

Mr. WILLIAMS. How are you going to get the proof? We have been thinking of that for a long time until finally we have a certain number of them in our political labor organizations.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then you can't blame anybody else.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We have never had a working class party in control in any State or in control in the United States. We have parties in control that pass one set, and they do something that the other side doesn't like, and the people throw them out, and we get another bunch in, and they will sit down there and pass something that they don't like, and there is a change again. While there are changes going on all the time the people are getting the same thing all the time with the high cost of living and wages dropping down. The introduction of automatic and semiautomatic machinery by the manufacturer is proving something that will make a change in the methods of production and distribution of our commodities.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are drifting away from my question. What justification is there for you to incite men to arms, for you to incite men to go against your own government when you and the rest of your fellow workers have the power absolutely in your hands by the ballot?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The justification of carrying on peaceful strikes, of having control of the situation, and the State sending in a bunch of men that spill our life-blood out in the street. The State don't exist for us only theoretically and hypocritically.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, because the men that you have elected to office have not carried out what you believe is the proper course for them to pursue, you propose to start an open rebellion?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I didn't say that; I said in defense of our homes at any time that it means annihilation or fight. I am known in my own town as a man that is one of the yellowist, a fellow that don't go out and want to fight, you can take this book at your convenience and go through here and see where on every page I advocated peace, but I want to tell you that when men have to submit to certain conditions, it is a study of psychology. You can sit in your office and philosophize on the conditions of the working class. When I was a young fellow I stood at a mine where 59 had been killed, and heard the women moaning and crying. Somebody else read that in the newspapers and didn't sympathize with the poor women and children like I did. If that mine owner was satisfied with less profit, we would have had 59 more fathers and brothers, but in order to make profit he took those fellows' lives. That is why the men get that idea. It is not profit with us, it is life and death. We want peace, and the manufacturer brings in the State police and says, you will submit or we will starve you, or you will be clubbed and shot. It is the spirit of your forefathers that makes you fight. I want to tell you now, force to-day is the most respected thing there is in this world.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are an advocate of force, are you?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, no; I am not an advocate of force. I am against militarism, but what have you got going on in Europe? And to-day the United States Government insists on furnishing shells to blow the Germans to pieces.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are we to understand from the expressions you have given here that you are giving expression to your own views or those of your fellow workers?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; they are my individual views which have come to me from close study of the labor movement; but I know they are held by the most conservative members of labor organizations in our State and as a result of what the State police have been doing to the men who try to be peaceable.

Commissioner LENNON. I just want to ask you, to see whether I understood your reply to the basis of all Mr. Weinstock's questions: Do you believe that the voting wagedworkers of Pennsylvania—and it is the greatest industrial State proportionally in the Union—that the wagedworkers have a majority in the State of Pennsylvania?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, they have not got a majority of the working class.

Commissioner LENNON. Oh, of all the people in the State.

Mr. WILLIAMS. No, no; not the voter.

Commissioner LENNON. Do the voters that work for wages constitute a majority in the State of Pennsylvania, Mr. Williams?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Not the voters; no; not by far.

Commissioner LENNON. Have they a majority in the United States?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I don't believe so. Why, pretty near half the people in Pennsylvania are foreigners or of foreign descent—or most one-half—according to the last document issued. They have no vote, and those that have no vote are the ones that have to work under the worst conditions. Those are the 12½-cents-an-hour men.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Garretson has a question he would like to ask you.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, you made the statement that your view was that the man should arm himself for the purpose of protecting himself against the invasion of his own home?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What is the difference morally between the man protecting his own home with arms and a corporation hiring a body of thugs to protect its property—legal rights?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I should say a man has more right to protect his home than a corporation has to protect its property.

Commissioner GARRETSON. He would have at least as much, anyway, wouldn't he?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. To risk his own skin instead of hiring skin?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir; I want to say in regard to that statement made by Keppler, I had occasion to go to one justice's office with a man who was arrested and was quite severely called to account for that statement by Sergt. Smith, I think the name was; and I asked him then, "Have you got a right to come into my house without a warrant and arrest me," and he says, "No." I says, that is the reason we made that statement. You get a warrant and you can arrest any of us. But we did not want anybody coming in there nights without a warrant and taking us.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you. That matter that you have there, that I interrupted you in reading, if you will just submit that we will consider it with the balance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What matter do you mean?

Chairman WALSH. You had some material—a report made, in which the testimony of Mr. Kelly appeared, or from which the testimony of Mr. Kelly was read—the chief of police?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And you had some other documents you said you wanted to offer in evidence?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is on defective work and one thing another?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Commissioner LENNON. Have you a copy of the report made by the Federal Council of Churches?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. Will you file that with the commission?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Can you give us the substance of what they say about Sunday work?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It begins and gives you a tabulation of how many men worked on Sunday—the percentage that work on Sunday, and——

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Did they take a position against it or make any request to the company or the men not to do it, or what did they do?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, the suggestion is made by the ministers to the—they made a suggestion to the ministers——

Chairman WALSH. The part I want to get at is that would seem to be a strict conflict now between economics and the moral law. What did they do? Did they tell the men, "Don't work on Sunday; it is against divine law?" Or what did they say?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, they suggested certain recommendations. They go on to try to defend the ministers first; but they make the same recommendations——

Chairman WALSH. Well, just submit it. I guess it is a little too long to read.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, it is a long proposition to read. Do you want these photographs?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Leave those photographs. I understood all these documents were submitted here, including this scrapbook that you offered.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I would like to get this all back again, after you are through with them.

Chairman WALSH. All right; just put that in the record here, that you can have all of it after temporary use. There was one question I omitted to ask you. You say that this trooper was tried and acquitted. Now, was the trooper that assaulted Mr. Gallagher tried?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; I don't believe so. I don't believe he was ever brought to trial.

Chairman WALSH. Well, was any effort made to prosecute him, that you know of?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why, in one of my newspaper accounts there it said a warrant had been issued for him; but I don't believe it was ever served. I tell you it was impossible—we used to think we had it on them, and we would recognize the man and would do something——

Chairman WALSH. Well, so far as you are concerned, you did not?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No. They would change the numbers on the men, and the numbers they had would not correspond with the features of the men, and then you could not get after them.

Chairman WALSH. Maj. Groome.

STATEMENT OF MR. J. E. B. CUNNINGHAM.

Mr. J. E. B. CUNNINGHAM (arising from the audience and addressing the commission). Mr. Chairman and Members of the Commission, I desire to present and file at this stage of the proceedings, with your honorable body, my credentials as special deputy attorney general representing the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and to have my appearance noted as appearing for the Commonwealth. And I am directed, Mr. Chairmen and Members of this Commission, by the governor and by the attorney general of Pennsylvania to say to you that although they naturally have some question as to the power of this commission, or of any similar commission, to compel the attendance and testimony of officers of the executive department of a State, at the same time they are too proud of the character of the State police of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and of the fact that in every instance of industrial disturbance the Commonwealth and its officers have endeavored to maintain, and we think have succeeded in maintaining, a position of strictest neutrality, and because we want to assist you in every way in the performance of your duty, they have directed the superintendent of the department of State police and the special deputy attorney general to come here and give you every fact within their knowledge, and if you want it, a certified copy of every record within their possession.

Now, at the same time, Mr. Chairman, in order that this action on the part of our State authorities may not be treated as a precedent, I desire merely to file with the stenographer a formal protest with reference to the jurisdiction of the commission to compel these things in order that the record may protect us from ever being used as a precedent in case we should at some future time refuse to obey subpoenas by congressional committees.

With your permission, then, I will just submit these for the record and ask you to proceed with your investigation as you may wish.

Chairman WALSH. Very good; and we also appreciate the courtesy of the governor and of the State government and of yourself in attendance here.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. We are very anxious to give you any facts within our knowledge.

(For documents submitted by witness see Cunningham Exhibits Nos. 1 and 2 at end of this subject.)

STATEMENT OF MR. S. C. LONG.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I have been requested by the commission to read publicly into the record a communication from Mr. S. C. Long, general manager of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., addressed to the chairman of this commission (reading):

"DEAR SIR: Referring to the statement made to-day before your body by Mr. W. H. Pierce, that Mr. J. C. Johnson, superintendent of telegraph of the Pennsylvania Railroad had paid $300 to certain men connected with the train organizations of the Pennsylvania Railroad, we desire to submit the following so there shall be no misunderstanding in this matter:

"When the strike was called at Pittsburgh in May, 1911, the company was fearful that some of the members of the transportation brotherhood might join the strikers. Accordingly the general chairman of each of the four brotherhoods, Messrs. A. I. Kaufman, general chairman of the B. L. F. & E.; William Park, general chairman of the B. of L. E.; John B. Hendricks, general chairman of the O. R. C.; and E. V. Kapp, general chairman of the B. of R. T., were requested by the general manager to go to Pittsburgh and see that the members of their brotherhoods lived up to the agreements they had with the company and remained at work, with the distinct understanding that they should not be asked to do any work other than that they always had performed in the positions they held.

"These men did this, and their efforts were successful in preventing any of the members of their organizations from leaving the service of the railroad company. After the strike was over, as each of these general chairman had occasion to come to the office of Mr. Johnson, who was chairman of the labor board, in the performance of their duties as general chairman, he thanked them for the very efficient services they had rendered the company, and the organizations, and told them that the company desired to show some appreciation of their work, and accordingly they were each given $300, which they were told could be used toward defraying their expenses or any other purpose that they might choose. Nothing was asked of these men in return. What was done was entirely in keeping with the action of the company toward a large number of other employees, as set forth on page 14 of the History of Labor Troubles on the Pennsylvania Railroad, a copy of which has been filed with your commission.

"Yours, very truly,

"S. C. LONG,
General Manager, Pennsylvania Railroad Co."

TESTIMONY OF MAJ. JOHN C. GROOME.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state your name?

Maj. GROOME. John C. Groome.

Chairman WALSH. Are you connected with the Pennsylvania State Police? If so, what is your position?

Maj. GROOME. Superintendent.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any profession or business aside from that?

Maj. GROOME. Member of the firm of Groome & Co., importers and wine merchants.

Chairman WALSH. And have you taken any interest in that firm for the last four or five years?

Maj. GROOME. I have been unable to take any active interest in the firm on account of police duty.

Chairman WALSH. Is that a corporation or a partnership?

Maj. GROOME. A partnership.

Chairman WALSH. Engaged in mercantile business?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And not manufacturers?

Maj. GROOME. Not at all.

Chairman WALSH. And you are a member of the organization?

Maj. GROOME. I am.

Chairman WALSH. And what is your title, may I ask. You are referred to here as "Maj. Groome." I believe that comes from another militia title?

Maj. GROOME. That comes from the highest rank I had in the National Guard, and as a member of which I served in Porto Rico during the Spanish War. I was in Porto Rico with a squadron of cavalry. I had been in the National Guard for many years.

Chairman WALSH. When was the State Police of Pennsylvania organized?

Maj. GROOME. In May, 1905.

Chairman WALSH. How many members has it?

Maj. GROOME. Two hundred and twenty-eight.

Chairman WALSH. Kindly state their rank, so far as their duty is concerned.

Maj. GROOME. Well, according to the act, there is a department of State police, which consists of a superintendent, deputy, and two clerks. Then there is the police force which consists of 228 officers and men. According to the act, it is divided into four troops, a captain, lieutenant, four sergeants, four corporals, and the balance are privates.

Chairman WALSH. What is the provision of the law with reference to increasing or diminishing your forces, Major?

Maj. GROOME. There is no provision whatever. It can be increased only by act of the legislature, and likewise it could not be decreased except by act; that is, the number is fixed by law, and the act which originally created the forces has never been changed. It has been amended to increase the salaries and make some noncommissioned officers of privates, but the original number of 228 has never been changed since the force was first organized; can not be changed except by act of the legislature.

Chairman WALSH. Please indicate where the force is quartered, and in what manner.

Maj. GROOME. Well, the force is divided, as I say, into 4 troops, 2 officers, and 55 noncommissioned officers and men. They are designated as Troops A, B, C, and D. They are in barracks. A troop is located at Pottsville, a troop at Wyoming, in the eastern part of the State, a troop at Greensburg, and a troop at Butler, in the western part of the State.

Chairman WALSH. Is the location made with reference to industrial centers, or agricultural centers, or how? Or is there any design in the location?

Maj. GROOME. Well, I don't wish to take up any more of your time than necessary, and not as much as some of your recent witnesses have, but I would like to explain, if you have the time, the way the force is organized and distributed.

Chairman WALSH. Major, if you prefer to make a statement in a general way prior to being asked any questions, we will be very glad to have you do so, and it may do away with the necessity of asking many questions. You know the subject.

Maj. GROOME. I think I can save your time.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. We will be glad to do it.

Maj. GROOME. When the act was passed creating this department—a State police force—of course it was a new departure. There was nothing like it in this country, and no precedent and nothing to pattern it after and go on. If you have seen the act it is very short and simply provides the number of men and the amount of their salary, their duties as far as cooperating with the local police, and leaves everything else to the superintendent; that is, it spares the distribution of the troops, the rules and regulations controlling the affairs, whether they shall be married or not, their uniforms, and how they shall be armed—everything is left to the superintendent, in the original act. After I accepted this position I went very carefully—it was absolutely new to me, as well as everyone else. I went over the records, the records of crime and disturbances throughout the State and consulted officials living in the various parts of the State, and found that in four districts where the troops were established, were the districts in which there had been the most disorder in the 5 or 10 years prior to 1905; and with the approval of the government I established a troop in each of these localities.

Now, there is some reference to the selection of men, and a few other comments. I should like to say that the greatest care has always been exercised in the selection of the men as to their past records, their moral character, and their physical condition. When the force was first organized I had 1,010 applications for the 228 positions; men that I had never seen or never had heard of. Every one of those men was examined according to the civil-service rules, some at Pittsburgh and some at Philadelphia. The law prescribes that a man shall be between the ages of 21 and 45, a citizen of the United States, of good moral character, and able to read. Those are the only restrictions. From the list of applicants who were examined mentally I may say I selected about 300 of those men who were examined physically, and subjected to a physical examination which was more strict than the Army—the present United States Army—examination; more strict in the eyesight test; and much more strict in some other respects. That was the starting point; and the men who passed those examinations were then appointed on the State police force. Of course, there were no rules, no regulations, and nothing to go by; and these men were divided into four troops. They were sent to the barracks. I designed the uniforms, decided how they should be armed, and decided that it would be necessary for each man to be mounted, and purchased the horses and drilled the men and gave them as much instruction—

Chairman WALSH. Did you make those regulations and instructions yourself?

Maj. GROOME. Absolutely. Nobody else could.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have any prototype in the country on which you planned that?

Maj. GROOME. I have the reports of the Texas Rangers, which was the only organization of any sort in the country, and also I got the reports of the operations of members of the police forces throughout the civilized world. I got the Italians, the Germans, the Royal Northwestern Police, and the Irish police; and from going over their reports and the duties which they performed I came to the conclusion that the conditions in Ireland were more similar to those in Pennsylvania, so far as the industrial and agricultural conditions and the character of the population was concerned.

Chairman WALSH. Did you make any personal investigation of European countries?

Maj. GROOME. Yes; I went to Ireland with a letter from our secretary of state, and spent three weeks in the barracks studying their methods, organization, and rules and regulations of their constabulary.

Chairman WALSH. What are they called?

Maj. GROOME. The Royal Irish Constabulary.

Chairman WALSH. How is that organized? Is there a superintendent, a local superintendent in Ireland in charge?

Maj. GROOME. Yes; he is appointed by the Crown. They have 10,000 men in Ireland.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a superior officer—has he a superior officer in England?

Maj. GROOME. No, sir; he is at the head of it.

Chairman WALSH. The man on the ground in Ireland is the absolute head of the organization?

Maj. GROOME. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Under the law has he like authority with you say to saying how many there shall be, and the location of the barracks, and the movement of the men from time to time?

Maj. GROOME. I do not think he has at the present time, for the Irish Constabulary has been in existence over 25 years. I imagine the original superintendent must have had that authority. Ireland, as you know, is about the same size as the State of Pennsylvania with 45,000 square miles; and they have 10,000.

Chairman WALSH. How does Ireland compare with the State of Pennsylvania as to population?

Maj. GROOME. It is not so large; I am not familiar with the exact population of Ireland.

Chairman WALSH. Does the constabulary in Ireland have authority in the large cities like Glasgow and Dublin?

Maj. GROOME. They police all of the cities except Dublin.

Chairman WALSH. Does Dublin have a separate arrangement?

Maj. GROOME. They have a municipal force; the balance of the cities are under the constabulary.

Chairman WALSH. You spent, you say, three weeks at the barracks?

Maj. GROOME. Yes; and got their ideas and their rules and regulations.

Chairman WALSH. Did you get a copy of the printed rules and regulations?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir. They are very elaborate and not at all useful to us; there are conditions there which we can not touch.

Now, when there is a vacancy on the force at the present time, in order to show you the character of the selection of the men, a man makes his application and it is placed on file, and in his application he states his past experience and recommendations. When his turn is reached his past record is very carefully looked into, and if it is not good he is not considered. If his past record and recommendations are sufficient he comes to Harrisburg or Philadelphia and is put through a strict physical examination by the man who performs the duty of looking them over when they are presented.

Chairman WALSH. Who does that?

Maj. GROOME. The deputy does at Harrisburg, and I should say 50 per cent of the men stop in Harrisburg or Philadelphia, and either the deputy or myself sees them.

Chairman WALSH. Under the Pennsylvania law, with which I am not familiar, if a man is rejected for any reason then you go back to the list for another man, do you?

Maj. GROOME. Yes; take another man.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any limitation upon the continuance of that; that is, can you call for as many as you please until you get the proper one?

Maj. GROOME. We have a list of over a hundred men who have seen service in the Regular Army waiting for positions, and we have hundreds of others besides. I can take the last man on the list if I think it is fair, but we usually take them in turn.

After they pass a physical examination they have a mental examination, written, to show their ability to make reports and keep a proper account of things.

If the applicant is found satisfactory the man is enlisted and sent to the training barracks at Pottsville, where he spends four months in probationary service. He is not allowed to go on duty or go on the road or make arrests until he has been in the service four months. Then during that four months they have daily schooling in the criminal, forestry, and game laws of the State of Pennsylvania and have mounted drills and dismounted drills, and are taught the care of horses and their arms and equipment and the different duties of the police.

At the end of the four months if the man is satisfactory to the officer in charge of the recruiting barracks he is then assigned to one of the four troops and is put on regular patrol duty. That is the way we get our men.

The promotions in the force are all made from the ranks. I have not got a captain to-day who was a captain when the force started. When the force first started it was necessary to select what I considered the best-trained men who came before me. Those men in the course of time did not prove all I wanted of them; they were not able to handle the position of a captain or lieutenant, and promotions were made from men in the ranks. I have never started a man on the force in any other position than as a private.

If vacancies occur, through resignation or discharge by summary court, promotions are made from the ranks.

The punishment is entirely by summary court, or what is known as court-martial. The punishment is ordinarily fine, or, if the offense is serious enough, dismissal. I have never punished a man to the extent of a fine of 25 cents since the force was organized without a fair and impartial trial before a summary court, conducted by his officer, at which this man can produce his witnesses to prove his innocence, if possible. If he proves that the charge is not correct the man is excused and no record is made of it; if he is found guilty of the charge the evidence and the sentence of the summary court is submitted to me. If I approve of it the man is fined, and the man is discharged. There has never been a punishment without that since the force was organized. The men know that; they know that if they behave properly they can remain on the force, and if they do not behave they will be fined or dismissed, and they know that if once they are dismissed from the force no power on earth can get them back again, and they know that if they behave themselves and do their duty no power can get them off. That has established the esprit de corps necessary for so small a force of men to maintain law and order in such a large State as Pennsylvania, with between 7,000,000 and 8,000,000 of inhabitants; and I think I have got that result.

One of the reasons—well, I may say the force is regulated or controlled by general orders. We have no printed manual. As I say, when the force was organized it was an experiment, and I considered it was a mistake to make rules and regulations; but I saw what was necessary, and as circumstances arose I issued what is known in the service as "general orders," and I suppose there are probably 300 or 400 general orders, some not necessary now, but that number have been issued to guide the men, and my rules and regulations have governed the force.

I have been accused of being influenced by politics in making appointments, and, of course, you can see from what I tell you, that politics do not enter into the appointment of the men in any way.

Of the 230 officers and men on the force to-day, 225 have seen service in the Regular Army. I have got but five men who have not been in the United States service and who came to me with honorable discharges, and the majority of them have character "excellent" on their discharge. If you are familiar with a discharge from the United States Army you will know that there are four grades of character; there is fair, good, very good, and excellent. Excellent is the highest character that a discharged soldier can get; and when I tell you that 225 of my 230 men that have been in the service all have an honorable discharge, and over 50 per cent of them with excellent character, you can recognize that they are not the degenerate sons of the degenerate middle class that some of our friends have claimed. You can also readily understand that the recommendation or record of a discharged soldier is much more complete than any recommendation made by a civilian. If you should send me a clerk from your office, for instance, or a young man from the farm, you could probably vouch for him during the hours of from 9 o'clock in the morning until 5 o'clock at night, but what he does between 5 o'clock in the evening and 9 o'clock the next morning you have no means of knowing, and those are usually the hours that some of those young men get into mischief; but when you get the discharge of a man from an officer of a troop in which that man has served for three or six or nine years, as some of our men have, that officer has seen and knows what that man's conduct has been for every hour of the day and for every day of the year; he can give you a recommendation for that man covering his time from 6 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock the following morning, and I consider from experience that the recommendation of an honorably discharged soldier from the United States Army with excellent character is the strongest recommendation and guaranty of a man that you can get in this country; and when we take the greatest possible pains and get men with the best of records and whom we find are fit physically, and then instruct them, we have done all that is possible for human nature to do to provide against mistakes. We can not guarantee the future of the individual, and while we select men with the greatest possible care, some of our men out of the 225 in the last 10 years have turned out badly. When that occurs we get rid of them, but I think our system of taking the greatest possible care to select the proper kind of men is about the best that can be devised.

Now, after the men are sent to their barracks and have had this four months' schooling at Pottsville, their training does not stop there, but there is a school held once a week in every one of the barracks, and it does not make any difference whether a man has been on the force 10 years, he attends that school, where they are instructed in the advance work of police. There is not a man on the force, I do not think, who has been on over a year, who is not thoroughly familiar with all of the game laws of the State—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Is that what is meant by advance work, the study of those laws?

Maj. GROOME. Yes; the game laws of the State and forestry laws and detective work is taken up, and criminal laws. I will say that we have not a man on the force who has been on for two years that can not present a case before a justice of the peace and present the proper evidence, and for that reason our total number of convictions in proportion to the total number of arrests is very large; we have averaged about 80 or 90 per cent of convictions to the arrests made, and that is only made possible by the men knowing when to make arrests, when they have a right to make arrests, and when a crime has been committed, and to have the proper evidence when they bring the case before the justice.

Chairman WALSH. In the inferior courts in Pennsylvania is it usual for the police officer to present the case?

Maj. GROOME. It is, if the police officer has intelligence enough to get it; some police officers have not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the training school, do you train the men as to their duties in connection with strikes and labor disputes? Do you train them as to the rights of citizens?

Maj. GROOME. Certainly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How do you train them in connection with labor disputes, for instance, if they are sent to a place like at Bethlehem?

Maj. GROOME. Officially we know nothing about labor disputes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is one of your duties, is it not, to call them out in such times?

Maj. GROOME. We are called out by the sheriff or the local peace officer, and never respond to a request without finding out why we are called. Say, the disturbance is like it was at Bethlehem, where a great many men were collecting, and the sheriff at Bethlehem should telegraph me and telegraph the governor, and his statement to me was that there were from nine to fifteen thousand men in a mob that had done a certain amount of damage and were likely to do more, I would not recognize that as a labor disturbance, because I have no knowledge of the conditions. I don't know to-day and didn't know at the time why there was a strike, nor is it possible for us to tell a so-called striker from the tough or hired thug or anything else.

When we respond to the request from the local authorities to assist them in obtaining law and order, which is provided in the act and which says it shall be our duty, if I go myself, and I go when the entire squad goes out, and if not I send a detachment under an officer who goes, he goes with simply an order to maintain law and order. Those are his only instructions in the case.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And when is he relieved?

Maj. GROOME. When the sheriff or local authorities who asked for our assistance informs me that the situation has ceased to be serious and he can handle the case himself.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you do personal service at Bethlehem?

Maj. GROOME. No; there was only a troop and one-half there.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you ever done any personal service in labor troubles such as that?

Maj. GROOME. I was out at one time—the men were sent to Bethlehem and were on duty at Philadelphia six days and nights when the call came from the sheriff at Bethlehem.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. O'Connell, will you please let Mr. Groome finish his statement without interruption and then we will take up the question you are asking about?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I was just asking him about this while he was on the subject of instruction in the school.

Maj. GROOME. I was just saying that never since the force has been in existence have we sent assistance to any locality at the request of any organization or corporation or private citizen. We have sent detached men, one or two, to a district attorney or to a mayor or to a justice of the peace; but we have never sent a large detail where there is rioting without a written or telegraphic request therefor on the part of the local authorities, and frequently we have refused to send assistance on that request because on investigation I found that it was not necessary and that the sheriff was laying down on his job and wanted someone else to do his work. And in my answer to your question—written answer—I gave the number of riots in which we have been called on and the sheriff's name, and we have the telegrams or written letters from them showing it was after their urgent request that we sent men at all, but never sent them without a request from the local authorities or the sheriff.

I may say during the 10 years we have been in existence we have had 9 men killed by rioters in the line of duty and 17 men hopelessly crippled for life. We have never yet killed a man; it has never been proven that we have killed a man illegally or unlawfully. We have killed murderers, committing murder when we have seen the murder committed; we have killed men attacking a hall, as the Italians did at New Florence when they attacked a house, but on mob duty it has never yet been proven that we have killed a man.

I would suggest, as it was intimated to me in a letter from your commission, that it is my humble opinion the effect and result of the State police force of Pennsylvania is very excellent, both in apprehending criminals and in the prevention of crime. Now, the statement which has been made, that the State police force is essentially a strike-breaking organization, and when not engaged in strikes they may make arrests or do a little patrolling is very easily contradicted by the fact that each year since the force has been organized the 200 men—it is possible for more than 200 men to be used, but I practically have a working force of 200 men—these 200 men have patrolled over 500,000 miles each year since the force was organized. Last year they visited 2,364 towns in 66 counties during their patrolling; they made 2,198 arrests for 75 different crimes, and of those arrests 80 per cent resulted in conviction. And on that line I would like to say from the records which I have submitted to you, and which you can verify, in reference to being a strike-breaking organization the average time that each man on the force has spent in riot duty since the force was organized has been one day per year per man; the other 364 days in the year this strike-breaking organization is patrolling the State of Pennsylvania, covering over 500,000 miles and making two to three thousand arrests a year. We have made in 10 years over 24,000 arrests, of which I am sure 90 per cent would not have been made if it had not been for the force, because the sheriffs would be rather indifferent about pursuing them after they had gone beyond their jurisdiction. We have gone as far as South Carolina and over into Virginia and other places and brought back criminals who we have pursued. Three hundred and sixty-four days in the year they are patrolling the State and protecting the lives and property of the citizens, and one day each year they are on riot duty; some of it is not due to labor disturbances and some of it is.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until 2 o'clock, and you will kindly resume the stand at that time.

(Whereupon, at 12.30 p. m., on Saturday, May 8, 1915, an adjournment was taken until 2 p. m.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed now, Major.

Maj. GROOME. Mr. Chairman, I was not exactly sure of the information that the commission might require, so I did not prepare a written brief, I simply made notes, and am trying to give you as best I can a history of the organization, and anything that I omit, I would be glad to have my attention called to it.

Chairman WALSH. It has its advantages, Major, not to have done so.

Maj. GROOME. I saw that. With reference to the number of miles covered and arrests made during the year I may say during the nine years the force has been in active duty the members have patrolled 3,813,512 miles of territory and made 24,633 arrests. A great many of these arrests have been made after rendering assistance to the district attorneys, judges, chiefs of police, or mayors at their request, and to give you an idea of the number of these requests, I may say in the last five years I have received 17,486 requests for assistance from judges, district attorneys, sheriffs, chiefs of police, mayors, and private citizens. That would be 10 requests a day, every day in the year for five years, which gives you an idea of the general scope of the work and the demand there is from the State officers and the law-abiding citizens of Pennsylvania for this force. Now, referring again to the charge of strike breaking—or before I get to that I will say, as you probably know, we are authorized under the act to act as game, fire, and fish wardens, to give them every assistance in our power, and in the past we have rendered valuable assistance to the game warden in enforcing the game laws, and to the fire warden in suppressing forest fires and saving millions of dollars in property which would have been destroyed if the fires had continued, and valuable assistance to the department of health, which is incorporated in their annual report, in villages during contagious diseases, where the local authorities are unable to confine the ignorant or foreign classes in their localities where the disease occurred. We have been of great assistance to the State live-stock sanitary board in keeping them quarantined in the foot-and-mouth disease and destroying cattle under their order.

During the Austin flood, which you will remember was serious, and a great many lives lost and property destroyed, that situation was taken charge of by the department of health, and after they had been there 24 hours we sent a detail there at their request, and they found that their organization was unable to handle the feeding, housing, and policing of the homeless citizens, and that department entirely was turned over to Capt. Robinson, who was there in charge of the detail. We fed and housed and kept criminals out of that district for 10 days or 2 weeks. The Sharon flood, we also rendered the same service, at the instance of the department of health. I have given you the number of miles, they run about the same, the number of arrests are about the same. For instance, the arrests in 1911 were 2,425, and the convictions 1,799. The arrests in 1913 were 1,960, convictions 1,744. That is to say, 90 per cent of convictions, and in addition to that there were 128 awaiting trial, taking only those that were convicted it is nearly 90 per cent of the arrests that resulted in convictions. In 1914 we made 2,098 arrests with 1,586 convictions. Those arrests were made and were tabulated in my annual report under various headings.

Chairman WALSH. You have submitted two annual reports, have you, 1913 and 1914?

Maj. GROOME. 1914 has not been printed. The report has been made to the governor, and for economic purposes we thought it was better that the report would be coterminous with the legislative term which is from June 1, 1913, to 1915, the data and statistics of the report are here, but have not been published. I can give you a carbon copy of that.

Chairman WALSH. Have you a typewritten carbon copy?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir; a typewritten carbon copy. Now, to give you an idea of the arrests, and a few of the headings under which the arrests are classified, I will take 1914. There were 218 arrests for assault and battery; 157 convictions; there were 311 for drinking and disorderly conduct, with 296 convictions; 40 for murder and 13 convictions. Since the force has been organized we have convicted 109 murderers. We have arrested, I imagine, 140 or 150, but we have convictions of 109, the majority of them in the first degree and the men have been executed. In 1914 there were 22 arrests for rape made, 19 for highway robbery, 43 for robbery, 109 for a violation of the fish-and-game laws. In the eight years and in 1914 there were 19 for rioting. In nine years that the force has been in existence we have made 353 arrests for murder, we have made 167 for rape, we have 121 for highway robbery, 270 for robbery, and 873 for violations of the game law. Those are a few. They are all in the reports, but here are a few of the headings that I have picked out that I thought might interest the commissoin.

Now, in addition to this duty of patrolling the State each year, we have to secure evidence and locate criminals who have escaped from the State of Pennsylvania, and nine times out of ten those criminals would be allowed to remain at large if it was dependent upon the local or county authorities. As, for example, in 1912 a man by the name of John Johnson, wanted for burglary in Chester County in May, 1911, was arrested in New Jersey and tried, and he was convicted and sentenced to 30 years in the Eastern Penitentiary.

A man by the name of Barosa, wanted for murder November 24, 1908, was arrested in New York December 1, 1912, and he was brought back and tried and convicted.

A man by the name of ———, wanted for murder in 1910, was arrested November 17, 1910, in Birmingham, Ala., and was brought back and was sentenced to 20 years in the Western Penitentiary.

A man by the name of Seeny, wanted for murder in Snyderstown, committed December 5, 1910, was arrested February 15, 1911, at La Salle, Ill., and tried and found guilty of manslaughter and sentenced to six years in the Western Penitentiary.

A man by the name of Mandenor, wanted for murder July 9, 1912, in Vandergriff, was arrested November 30, 1913, in Syracuse.

Those are only a few to which I have just referred, but I think they will give you some idea of the work that was done by the force.

I don't know that there is anything further in my statement, except I should like to refer to a statement made by Mr. Maurer the other day when I was not here. I understand he presented you with a copy of a book of his, in which he said every statement in it was true and had been verified. I simply want to call attention to two statements in that book. This is in quotation marks from Mr. Maurer's book. It is headed "Judge Sadler's opinion."

"Taken from the evidence produced in Judge Sadler, of Cumberland County, Pa., impeachment proceedings:

"Affidavit No. 3, page 2.

"In the matter of asking the court for a State police he (Judge Sadler) replied that the State constabulary was all right in case of a riot, but that they could not do detective work; that their epaulettes and their regalia savored too much of display of authority to enable them to ferret out a crime. Then I, deponent, George M. Miller, suggested a man locally who I thought could do the work, but I remarked he was an ex-convict. To this his honor replied that it was no different in that way, as the State police were made up of ex-convicts. I said it was my information they were ex-United States soldiers. Again the court replied: 'More than half of them are ex-convicts.'"

I wrote to Judge Sadler and inclosed this and asked him if the statement quoted him right, and this is his reply:

"JUDGES' CHAMBERS, NINTH DISTRICT, CARLISLE, PA.

"MY DEAR SIR: The statement attributed to me as having been made to George M. Miller, that it was no difference in that way, as the State police were made up of ex-convicts, or that more than half of them are ex-convicts, is utterly false.

"Yours, truly,

"W. T. SADLER."

That is one of the numerous statements in Mr. Maurer's book which are not true.

Chairman WALSH. Does the roll of membership give the previous employment of these men?

Maj. GROOME. No; the roll does not give that. The roll simply shows their military record.

Chairman WALSH. Does the roll show some place that there was a civil-service examination?

Maj. GROOME. All their examinations are on file at Harrisburg. The civil-service examination is not very strict. Personally I do not think very much of the civil-service examination.

Chairman WALSH. That gives the antecedent of the men and their previous occupation and the like of that?

Maj. GROOME. The Army discharge gives their occupation before they joined the Army. My record is the Army discharge.

Chairman WALSH. To your knowledge, has anyone of the men on the force had any criminal record?

Maj. GROOME. Certainly not.

Chairman WALSH. So far as your record goes, then, there is no truth in the statement to that effect?

Maj. GROOME. No; none whatever. I would be glad if some of the men who make these statements would give the names and dates. Anybody can make suggestions or accusations, and I notice that in giving their so-called testimony here no names are submitted, with very few exceptions. If they will give the names of the men or the dates, we can answer, and there is no excuse at any time for any citizen, or anybody else, to claim that he can not tell who the State police officer was he preferred charges against. Every officer has on his collar a seven-eighths inch nickel letter designating his troop. He also has his personal number, not his troop number, but his personal number, in nickel-plate seven-eighths inch long in figures. This method of identifying the numbers of the force is an idea of mine.

Chairman WALSH. Is the number on the other side of his collar?

Maj. GROOME. It is on both sides, one-quarter of an inch from the number of the troop on either side. These numbers are not pinned on, but riveted on by the tailor, and it is impossible for a State police officer to change the number on his collar without destroying his coat. Those letters can be read 70 or 80 yards away, as I know by tests. The number of every man is recorded in his troop and in my office at Harrisburg, and there is no excuse on the part of anyone for not identifying them.

Chairman WALSH. I would be very glad if you would make what comment you wish to make on the affair in the State legislature referred to, by Mr. Maurer, the attempt to amend the law in regard to salary, as to how it was conducted; who favored it and who objected to it. The inference from Mr. Maurer's remarks was that the manufacturing associations and the large industrial establishments favored and the labor unions almost to a man opposed it.

Maj. GROOME. Well, I am not a politician, and I do not think in the 10 years I have been in command of this force in Harrisburg I have been on the floor of the legislature three times, so I am not qualified. I have heard the remarks, but it is impossible for me to say absolutely the reason. I would say offhand that it was a combination of ignorance and want of courage of their own convictions that caused the legislature to pass this. I have had men in the senate and in the house—speakers of one of these bodies, come to me recently when my bill was up and say they considered my force was a fine one, the finest one, not only in Pennsylvania, but in the United States, and one of the most important things in the State; that "I am strongly in favor of it and have seen it operate in my district, and I am in favor of it, but I am going to vote against it because my constituents demand it."

Chairman WALSH. I believe you said you had a great deal of experience prior to the formation of this organization?

Maj. GROOME. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What advantage do you claim there is, so far as maintaining law and order is concerned, with your present organization as against the old-style military organization?

Maj. GROOME. You are referring to the National Guard?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Maj. GROOME. The principal advantage is their experience and training; I have had experience in both. Experience and training is very essential. I had the honor to be in command of the First Troop of Philadelphia City Cavalry, which is a fairly well-known organization, having been in existence 140 years, and is composed entirely of your friends, that class of men who can afford it, and who are absolutely fearless and willing. I commanded it for 16 years, so I think I had their confidence, and I am convinced that those men, in case of trouble, would have gone anywhere I told them; they would have gone anywhere I went. I have been out in command of squads with those troops, and when you take a man of that sort, no matter how able they are physically and mentally and morally, into a town where there are six or eight thousand people in a mob, a lawless mob, it is not only impossible for them to know just what to do, but almost impossible for an officer in the National Guard to know just what to do. It takes a certain amount of experience to show how many bricks to let a man throw before you attempt to defend yourself, just how many shots to fire, and just how much abuse you will stand before you make a move.

The National Guard have had very little experience in that respect even, and the State police had little; they would be out on strike duty, but since that time they have had no experience. The men I have, 154 of them have been on the force from 3 to 5 years, or 10 years some of them, and they have had training, and they are men trained to self-restraint before they came to my force by their military training in the service; they are trained to obey orders, and are fearless and do not lose their heads, and they have had enough experience to know that if four or five men out of a crowd of one or two thousand start to throw bricks they are not going to be killed, that they do not have to shoot them; that one man can ride in and arrest three or four and take them out of the crowd, as we have done many times.

Chairman WALSH. What was the situation at the hotel where the man was killed, and the trooper tried for it and acquitted?

Maj. GROOME. I was not at South Bethlehem.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any investigation made of it by you?

Maj. GROOME. Yes; a thorough investigation. At that time the entire squadron had been ordered to Philadelphia by the governor. You may remember there was a street-car strike in Philadelphia and considerable disorder, and it had been going on for four or five weeks, and they had not been able to run cars; and they have 3,800 policemen in Philadelphia, but they apparently did not know how to handle the situation, and the director of public safety and the superintendent of police called on Gov. Stuart for the National Guard, and he refused to send it, but offered the State police. They naturally, having 3,800 of their own police, did not think much of getting 178 men of another police force, and the governor refused to send the National Guard, saying it was expensive and unnecessary, and finally they asked for our assistance. I went there with four troops, 178 men, And we were assigned to the troublesome district of Kensington.

Chairman WALSH. Did you take charge yourself?

Maj. GROOME. Yes; I took charge myself, and I had headquarters in the car barns. They did not run any cars until we arrived there. The men went on at 5 in the morning and the last car came in at 12.30. After we had been there three or four days telegrams commenced to come from the sheriff of Northampton County with reference to the matter.

Chairman WALSH. Did you keep the street cars running in Philadelphia?

Maj. GROOME. We got them running the next day after we got there, and they continued to run, we didn't fire a shot during that time, and we made numerous arrests for throwing cobblestones and bricks, not through the cars, but we were telling the crowd that all we wanted was law and order and preventing them from creating any, and mobs forming; and after we had been there five days the director of public safety had enlisted 200 or 300 extra policemen and had mounts for them and saw how to handle the crowd. That is another point, the State police have no experience in handling mobs, and they are about as helpless as the National Guards. The sheriff had telephoned and was telephoning that the conditions in South Bethlehem were beyond his control, and trouble had occurred and would occur, and I consulted with the governor and told the sheriff the first three times that it was impossible to send him assistance, that my men had been on duty for 5 or 6 days for 18 hours a day, and I have seen them so tired when they came into the barn that they just threw themselves down out of the saddle, and I thought they could spare them better from Philadelphia than from South Bethlehem, and after repeated appeals and being confident that the men were needed, I sent 24 men. I let Capt. Robinson go with the detail, and he slept until 3 o'clock Saturday morning, when I awoke him and the other men and sent them on a special train to South Bethlehem, and they got there at 6 o'clock, and at the request of the sheriff, written and telephoned. Robinson called me, after I told him to report the condition, at about 8 o'clock and told me it was one of the most serious troubles he had been in. A large crowd of excited people were on the street, the State police had been shot at, bricks had been thrown, and there were 9,000 men out, according to the statement, out of the mill, and how many more men from the surrounding country I don't know. At 12 o'clock that day I sent 24 more men. We had 48 men at Bethlehem to keep a mob of ten or fifteen thousand men in order, and the next day, or the day after, I sent him 40 more men. We had all told about 80 men that were there for 4 or 5 weeks, and the number of men in the crowd was anywhere from eight to ten thousand.

Up to the time of that shooting, as I said, I was not there, but I got a detailed report from each troop; I get a detailed report from each troop whether they are out on duty, riot duty, or anything else. The report from Capt. Robinson show that these men, my men, were mounted and in the streets, I am not sure of the width of the street, but it came out in the trial, I think it was an ordinarily wide street, and they were being shot at from both sides of the street by the rioters. Two of our horses was badly shot, two or three men were hit with bricks, but at that time our men had not replied. They had orders from Robinson not to fire. When this man was killed he was in this hotel across the street, he was killed by a shot, as I remember, which went through the window or door. There were several, nine shots in the side of the hotel across the street, and several in the side of a house on the opposite side of the street. The mob were firing from both sides of the street, and why more of our men were not killed I don't know, unless they were very bad shots. As a result of this Private Moughan was arrested and held for murder and tried and acquitted, and it was proved that our men had .38-caliber Colts revolvers, and he was killed with a shot from a .45 caliber.

Chairman WALSH. It was a dispute that any trooper shot the man at all?

Maj. GROOME. It was disputed until it got to the court, and then it was decided that he could not have done it, because it was not a bullet that he had, and he was acquitted.

I would suggest in that connection, if you will allow me to, not having been there, I have the records in our office and it was impossible to bring all of the records, but if the commission is interested I would be very glad——

Chairman WALSH. We are interested, but I know I speak for the commission when I say that we would not care to retry the matter. The man was charged with murder and pleaded not guilty, and was tried before a court and jury and was acquitted?

Maj. GROOME. But this charge of brutality and other things, that they were quiet and peaceable when we arrived there, you have my oath and the deputy superintendent, but if you will subpoena the captain that was on duty and knows what the conditions are, and that spent his time there, and two or three of the sergeants there, they can tell you exactly the conditions.

Chairman WALSH. What was the captain?

Maj. GROOME. John F. Robinson.

Chairman WALSH. Where is he?

Maj. GROOME. He has resigned and accepted a position as editor of some paper in Chicago.

Chairman WALSH. We can probably get a statement from him.

Maj. GROOME. And from the men that were on duty there with him.

Chairman WALSH. Anything else you care to submit, yourself, Major?

Maj. GROOME. I don't think of anything else, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The investigation you made into the killing of Mr. Zambo, what was the result of that?

Maj. GROOME. That was the man that was shot.

Chairman WALSH. But you say you made an investigation independent of the court proceedings?

Maj. GROOME. The statement of Robinson was at that time we had not fired any shots, it was a criss-cross fire that went through the window and killed this man.

Chairman WALSH. You were satisfied from this investigation that your trooper did not shoot him, or any other trooper?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir. I would like to read one letter; it is very short.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Maj. GROOME. It is an incident that was spoken of in Maurer's book, in which he said everything was true. I have given you Judge Sadler's letter, and this is from a man named Panizzi, who has signed a letter in Maurer's book, as I saw the letter published on page 18:

GREENSBURG, PA., March 22, 1915.

Maj. JOHN C. GROOME,
Philadelphia, Pa.

DEAR SIR: I saw a letter published on page 18 of a certain book entitled, "The American Cossack," which said letter is dated, Latrobe, February 13, 1911, and purports to have been signed by me and others. I wish to say that I never signed such a letter, and never signed any letter attacking or criticising the State constabulary.

As a matter of fact, I do not know anything about the conditions upon the arrival of the State constabulary at Bradenville on the morning of April 22, 1910. I do know that there was trouble in and about Superior and Bradenville before their arrival, and at this date I do not know whether there was any lives lost prior to their arrival or not.

As to the reference to certain lives that were lost, set forth in this letter under "Question No. 4," I wish to say that I have no knowledge of the conditions in relation thereto, but understand that the State constabulary were not responsible in any manner for any of the lives that were lost, as referred to therein.

If the letter had been submitted to me at the time, I would have refused to sign it, and wish to say that I did not sign it and have no knowledge of the things referred to therein.

I wish to say further that I saw the constabulary almost daily during the period referred to in said letter and during the time of the strike at Bradenville and Superior and know that they acted in a quiet and lawful manner and conducted themselves as gentlemen, and the only times that persons were ordered from the streets were for the purpose of breaking up unlawful assemblies and maintaining order. I had no knowledge that my name had been used in such a connection prior to this date and never saw the letter referred to until to-day, or I would have written you sooner.

Very truly, yours,

NOE PANIZZI.

That book of his is so ridiculous it is hardly worth while to go into it in detail, but I wanted to call your attention to two things that happened to catch my eyes that were not quite as accurate as the rest. I don't know of any other information I can give you further than this.

Chairman WALSH. Did you answer the question that your troop has never been detailed except at the request of the man in authority, where they were requested?

Maj. GROOME. No, sir; never. Even after the request, I don't send a detail until I have sent one of my own officers to investigate the condition. I have refused many requests of sheriffs because my men were not necessary.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just a moment ago you spoke of the possibility of the officers changing their numbers in order to avoid, as was charged, being known. Would it be possible for them to change coats with each other?

Maj. GROOME. I don't suppose it would.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That could be readily done, could it?

Maj. GROOME. It probably could be done in the morning when they started to dress; it could not very well be done without taking off their belts and revolvers, and certainly it could not be done in a hurry as you and I would change our coats.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It could be done, however?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir; if they saw fit.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, where did I understand you to say their camps are located?

Maj. GROOME. They are not camps, but are barracks. They accommodate 55 men and stable 55 horses. One is at Pottsville, one at Wyoming, one at Greensburg, and one is at Butler. They are all published on the first page of that report.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, you say those locations were not particularly selected because of the industrial situation of the State?

Maj. GROOME. They were selected because I got them from the records, as there was more disturbance, more murders, more robberies, more lawlessness in those localities than in the center or southern part of the State. They were also selected because it divided the State into four districts. It was necessary to locate them at four different localities, and I thought the logical distribution would be two in the eastern and two in the western. You will find they are about centrally located north and south in both places and about the center part of the eastern and western division of the State. The center of our State is a large farming district with such a small population that hardly necessitated locating them there. In addition to that location each year I establish what we call substations, from 30 to 40 or up to 60, depending on the amount of the appropriation of the legislature. They consist of three men. They get lodging at a farm house or a small hotel, and are scattered through 30 or 40 counties. There is a sufficient number of men, and two men from each substation patrol each day, and the other man remains in the station for any call that might come in. In that way there is a network of substations throughout the State that constantly patrol it within 25 or 30 miles. If the appropriation was large enough these substations would be out all of the year round, and I would have about 40 substations throughout the State and keep about 10 or 12 men in the barracks for an emergency, and it would give me a substation connected by telephone with the barracks and we could maintain law and order in the rural districts and help to prevent the escape of criminals. I carry that plan out as long as the money lasts, as long as the appropriation holds out.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It seems that from the location they are largely situated with large industrial centers of the State. Pottsville—that is a coal center and near Philadelphia—that is a large industrial center. Now, Butler, that is near Pittsburgh, and that is one of the great industrial centers, and in the center of the State in Westmoreland, there are coal fields there. Assuming that the coal territory of Westmoreland field, there had been many strikes there, and in the last year I think it has been a continual run of strikes; there is one located in that field. Whether the location of these may seem to be divided into portions of the State, it would seem that they are in close proximity to the real industrial centers of the State?

Maj. GROOME. Because the real industrial centers of the State is where the large number of foreigners, who I think are the most lawless element we have, are located.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You would not call the Butler section a farmer's section?

Maj. GROOME. No; foreigners, I said.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I beg your pardon.

Maj. GROOME. No; the farmers are pretty tame.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In Butler proper, it is not an industrial section. There are no large number of foreigners in there?

Maj. GROOME. There are car shops there.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes, sir; but they are small car shops; I know Butler very well.

Maj. GROOME. The location is somewhat influenced by accommodations; that particular Butler troop used to be at Punxsutawney for a number of years. They were located in the exhibition building at the old world's fair ground, and were sleeping on the first floor with the rain leaking through the roof, and it was impossible to get a building at Punxsutawney and I was compelled to go to Butler to accommodate them. I was rather limited in my appropriation and was not allowed to buy property, but was compelled to rent, and in small towns it is a rather difficult proposition to rent a house that will hold 55 men and also stable 55 horses.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Any examinations that are given the applicant for a position on the force, are they allowed any marks as to previous military experience?

Maj. GROOME. As to their character?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What number of marks?

Maj. GROOME. It is not divided on marks.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Per cent on the 100?

Maj. GROOME. No, sir; it is divided into three examinations—moral, physical, and mental. If their moral character is vouched for by an excellent discharge by an officer we are very glad to get them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would their discharge card from the United States Army be taken as a better per cent, perhaps because of their military experience, than private citizens who would have a recommendation of high moral character from other sources?

Maj. GROOME. Their moral character would not be considered better, but they would be more desirable because they had the training in riding and self-restraint and discipline, which the private citizen can not get, and in getting the force we have found that private citizens do not like the life, and like to get up at 6 o'clock and clean their horse and be required to go to bed at 10 o'clock at night.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They would be granted the preference because of their military experience?

Maj. GROOME. It is more desirable and saves time and money to the State in training them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And probably having been subject to a better discipline, and they have all had training in carrying out orders regardless of what they might be? It is charged that these companies when they are in localities where strikes are in existence, as for instance at Bethlehem, that their headquarters are made in the plant of the offices of the corporation. Is that the policy followed?

Maj. GROOME. No, sir; it is not followed; and in certain instances it is impossible to get accommodations for them anywhere else. At Bethlehem the hotels and lodging houses expressly refused to accommodate them, and at the instructions of the sheriff the men were housed, and the horses on the property of the Bethlehem steel plant, because there was no other accommodations for them. I may say during that time orders were issued, and which are distinctly understood, that the men were not watchmen for the Bethlehem Steel Co. and were not allowed to patrol or to protect inside of the property of the steel company, to let their own railroad officers do that, that we were not watchmen for the corporation, and the sheriff understood that and understood that we were to patrol the street and keep law and order on the streets.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are the policemen required to wear their uniforms at all times?

Maj. GROOME. Except when they are in—they get 14 days a year vacation.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. For instance, as in the case of Bethlehem, it is charged that they were circulating among the rioters, as you call them, and strikers I will call them, in civilian clothing?

Maj. GROOME. That I am not positive of.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. That was at Hazelton.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The same charge was made in Bethlehem.

Maj. GROOME. We have found that there was a great demand from district attorneys and judges for men to operate in plain clothes, and at the present time the district attorneys have not the authority to hire a detective, but they have one detective in the county who is probably an intimate friend of everybody else in the county, and we have had so many calls for assistance of men in plain clothes for murders and similar crimes by the district attorneys that we have used plain-clothes men very frequently in the last six or seven years, and I think we had developed probably five or six men who are very excellent detectives. Beyond that, if we get a complaint from a locality that there have been chicken houses robbed four or five nights in succession, and the police is known, we will send a man around in plain clothes to investigate.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The ordinary method of catching a thief?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But in the matter of charging a riot is going on, and the streets are crowded in a city where these places are located, are they permitted there to don citizens' uniforms and go in among the crowd to gather information?

Maj. GROOME. They might be permitted; I don't think it is ordered. At Hazelton we had one man in plain clothes who was sent there. I sent him there probably two weeks before the detail was asked to find out for me whether the force was needed or whether the chief of police and burgesses were lying down on their jobs. He was there for two weeks and remained in plain clothes for some time after the detail arrived, and at the same time the railroad company had 20 Pinkerton detectives there in plain clothes. I know that; I have seen the report and know the men were there; the Pinkerton detective is something I know nothing about.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you make an investigation or have one made when the request came in to send the troop to Bethlehem before they were sent?

Maj. GROOME. I could not make one, the telegrams started coming in Thursday morning and continued about the serious conditions, and they kept up until Friday night, and I was tired out, and so was every available man I had, keeping the city of Philadelphia quiet.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I thought you said in all cases before they were sent you had an investigation made?

Maj. GROOME. I do when it is possible.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But in this case at Bethlehem?

Maj. GROOME. I did not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was there any request made to you from any other officer of the law in that vicinity except the sheriff, such as the mayor?

Maj. GROOME. The sheriff and the mayor, if I recall correctly. The only record I have here is the sheriff of Northampton County. Some local authority had taken the matter up with the governor, and I think Mr. Cunningham, who is present here now, in conference with the governor went so far as to take it up with the adjutant general to see if they would order out the National Guard. I was not present, but Mr. Cunningham was there and was present, and he knows about the trouble and the personal requests from the local authorities, and my information was from him, and my request.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is the organization now, as you have perfected it, keeping up with the requirements of that special police service in the State? Is it filling all the requirements of the case? Is it sufficiently large to cover all the requirements of the State?

Maj. GROOME. No; it can not be when we have 10 requests a day and can only reply to about 1.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is that the reason you asked the legislature to increase the number?

Maj. GROOME. And give us a sufficient number of men. We have 200 men and 45,000 square miles of territory.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What was the increase asked for?

Maj. GROOME. One hundred and ten men—25 or 30 men added to each troop. It would have given us about 310 men.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How many cases in 1913 and 1914 were you called upon to look after, what you call riots, and what I call strikes, industrial disputes?

Maj. GROOME. I think I have a copy of that with me.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You have that.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I just want to refresh his recollection of where he can find it in his original report.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. We have that then in the report. Now, what proportion of arrests made of the total number of arrests made that you gave us there were arrests made during times when labor disputes were in existence?

Maj. GROOME. Well, that is very hard to arrive at, but out of the total number of 24,000 there were 530 for rioting itself.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that would be where there was no other rioting except in a case where you term it a strike?

Maj. GROOME. Oh, yes. I am not familiar with that particular fact; there are several different riots, but that is for rioting where a number of men gather together and are violating the law.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I asked you a while ago when another point was up and the chairman asked to discontinue at that time, whether at this school where you train these policemen that you taught them the rights of citizenship. Do you teach them what the laws of the State are? Do you drill into a man, for instance, what a violation of a law is and what the laws are? Now, do you teach them what the rights of a citizen is in a conservative way, advise them how to act. A man standing on a street corner might be a violation of a city ordinance. I think in the District of Columbia, where we are now, one standing on a street corner or crossing in the middle of the street is a violation of the city ordinance—that we should cross where the crossings are. Taking the laws as a man should carry them out, are they instructed to overlook some things that are real and technical violations of the law?

Maj. GROOME. I don't know that they are, but they are instructed as to how to treat all of the citizens. They know the law, they know what a man can not do, and what is legal without having to be taught. I remember telling them originally, when the force was first organized, that I considered a man should be a gentleman as well as a policeman, and I expected them to treat elderly people and women and children with the greatest consideration at all times. I think they took that to heart, and I am perfectly free to say that I think my men are nearer gentlemen in their conduct than any police force in this country. We have never had a complaint from a law-abiding citizen as to their conduct. I think I had one about a man when a Congressman was arrested for speeding his automobile, and he thought he had special privileges, and aside from that I can not remember a complaint from a law-abiding citizen as to any infringement of their rights. The other members of the community, if they do infringe their rights, let us know by having our men arrested and held without warrant for assault and battery and various things, but we have never yet had a man complain of a man convicted on a trumped-up charge preferred against the force.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you had any occasions in which you have had to bring the members of your force before your own board or court, as you call it?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir; I have dismissed 155 men, I think, in the 10 years, for violations of orders—156. No; 166, I have discharged in 10 years.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. For violation of your orders?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have there been any of them dismissed for impositions upon citizens? Have any of them been convicted in the courts for breaking of the laws in the way of taking it into their own hands?

Maj. GROOME. No, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Were any of these cases of discharge where they beat old men and knocked them down in the streets, with their police clubs; were any of them investigated by you?

Maj. GROOME. It was investigated by me in so far—well, where the charge was pressed and the men were arrested they were investigated, and where it was probed; it was reported in the morning report from our commanding officer. I see those reports, and the length of them depends on the activity. They are six or eight pages long, and I get one every day from each commanding officer.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The troops that were camped in the Bethlehem yards during their stay there, they were fed in the yards of the shop of the company or the shop of company?

Maj. GROOME. In the company's building.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did the State pay for their feeding?

Maj. GROOME. No, sir; the men pay for it themselves.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Who did they pay for it?

Maj. GROOME. I think they had a commissary there, and that was the way it was done.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was that paid through the Bethlehem Steel Co.?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does your record show how that was managed and straightened out?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir. The act provides that the men shall board and lodge themselves. The men have a mess committee to buy their food. They can make their meals cost what they want—$65 or $70 a month or less. It figures out the way they have it about 55 cents a day. At the end of the month they may pay 55 cents a day to the troop treasurer, who pays their meat bills or bread bills or whatever it may be. That is the way they pay it. When they are in the substation work or detached work they still pay 55 cents a day to the troop treasurer, and the bills for their food is sent to the treasurer and he pays it. I think at the Bethlehem they came from the Bethlehem commissary, but it is all on record as to who paid it and what was done.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Major, a moment ago you said that no law-abiding citizen had filed a complaint against members of the constabulary, but that others did.

Maj. GROOME. No, sir; I didn't say that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How was it, or had them arrested?

Maj. GROOME. I said that they had been arrested, but to my personal knowledge there had been no complaints, not to me personally.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is that your test for a law-abiding citizen, whether or not he has filed charges against the constabulary?

Maj. GROOME. No, sir; and I didn't say so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I want to know whether it was or not?

Maj. GROOME. Certainly not.

Commissioner GROOME. You said no law-abiding citizen had done it?

Maj. GROOME. I can qualify that by saying no citizen has complained to me about their conduct. Naturally they complained, if some man in a small town had a man arrested, but that is not made to me, or comes to me. They might say this man is beating my dog or horse or something of that kind and have him arrested.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But you created the distinction between these men. You distinguished between a man that had him arrested as a nonlaw-abiding citizen, because you put him in the other class.

Maj. GROOME. That was not my meaning of the word. It was only to separate those people from some of the charges made in the mob at Bethlehem, which were proved in court to be absolutely untrue. Those men are considered not law abiding when they perjured themselves.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then you will admit that it is possible that some of the law-abiding citizens had them arrested?

Maj. GROOME. It is quite possible.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, you used the statement earlier on, or the language early in your statement, that it was difficult to distinguish between a striker, a rough, and a thug. From the standpoint of the State constabulary does a striker or a workingman, a thug and a rough, bear a marked comparison to each other?

Maj. GROOME. No, sir; I might go on and say that it is not possible in a mob to distinguish between a banker, a lawyer, a judge, an ironworker, a millionaire, or a professional gambler.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You might have, but you did not.

Maj. GROOME. I didn't want to take up so much time. I would like to correct my statement that in a crowd of eight or nine thousand people it is impossible for the State police to tell a man's profession by looking at him.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you ever had any difficulty with your men injuring any of these classes that you have named—I mean that you have added on?

Maj. GROOME. I am not sure whether we have or not. I am not familiar with the professions of the 25,000 men that have been arrested by the State police, although we have the records at Harrisburg.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I notice that you stated that your headquarters were in the car barns in Philadelphia.

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It has been asserted that the headquarters of the constabulary at Bethlehem was inside the steel works?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And has the constabulary ever made its headquarters at strike headquarters.

Maj. GROOME. It has never been invited, and I don't think they could accommodate the men; they are not large enough.

Commissioner GARRETSON. When you make your headquarters, as they are accused, you make your headquarters in the domicile of one part of the contestants; is that method calculated to breed belief in your impartiality?

Maj. GROOME. That it is impossible for me to say, what it breeds. The only time the State police are housed, or the constabulary, on the property of a corporation has been occasions when it was impossible to get accommodations anywhere else. In Philadelphia the director of public safety, who I think thought we needed a little work, assigned me to the Kensington district and gave me a territory about 8 squares square, and took all of his police away and said that he would leave it to my force to maintain law and order in this territory and keep the cars moving. In that territory there were no buildings of any kind or character or description to put 178 men and horses in except the car barns. We went over there, much to the annoyance of the car officials, and made them take their cars out of there—they had something like 200 there—and we put up posts to tie the horses to and put hay on the floor, and I slept in the loft myself, because there was no other place for me to sleep.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was that practice regularly followed?

Maj. GROOME. Not necessarily.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe it would have a good effect?

Maj. GROOME. What would you do, where would you stay if there was not any fitting accommodations there? Where would you put them?

Commissioner GARRETSON. I would not like to tell you, because I am not under examination. If there was any question, I certainly would not put them in the headquarters of either party in the contention.

Maj. GROOME. You have never been in command, and responsible for the lives of 200 men and horses.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I have been in command and responsible for the lives and welfare of a good many men under just such conditions.

Maj. GROOME. I will repeat, that it was not from choice that the few occasions in which the force has been in the buildings of corporations, but it is purely from necessity.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It is just then from the necessity that they permit a condition to arise that is calculated to build prejudice. Can it be fraud, that is the question?

Maj. GROOME. I don't know whether it can be or not. I think if you will take the activities of the force for 10 years, the disturbances there have been the number of arrests they have made, and the order they have maintained, you will find that upon only two occasions in all of their toll of duty they have been housed on the property of corporations, and upon those two occasions it was a question of necessity, and I don't think they could be accused of creating bad feeling or sentiment on either side.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you ever looked up the record of the Northwestern Mounted Police in matters of that kind?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you know what their policy is?

Maj. GROOME. They don't have barracks.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And they don't live in corporation quarters, either?

Maj. GROOME. They don't have to; they send out two men at a time. We have never quartered a paid policeman on corporation property where we had less than 10 or 15 men in the detail. When we have had 100 or 200 it was necessary once or twice.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have the strikers ever won a case where the constabulary was called in in Pennsylvania?

Maj. GROOME. What kind of a strike?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Regardless of whether the merits are good, bad, or indifferent, have they ever won a strike when the constabulary was called in?

Maj. GROOME. I have no means of knowing.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What are the purposes underlying the formation of the Royal Irish Constabulary?

Maj. GROOME. I have no means of knowing.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was it not purely political oppression?

Maj. GROOME. That was long before I was born.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You have not taken the trouble to read up? It would be very interesting to learn that they are similar not only in formation but in object.

Maj. GROOME. It probably would be, but I did not create the Royal Irish Constabulary. My only job is to try and maintain law and order, and I have not gone into the organization of the police forces throughout the world.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe that law and order cease to exist because there is a strike?

Maj. GROOME. I don't know anything about it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Maj. GROOME. May I read one letter. There seems to be a great deal of emphasis put on the strike. I happened to bring one of the morning reports, during the riot, from the commanding officer who was sent to East Pittsburgh at the request of the sheriff. You asked some time ago what orders were given. The only orders given to an officer taking a detail out is to maintain law and order, and he issues such orders as the circumstances necessitate when he arrives on the spot. This is the report, the first report from Capt. Adams [reading]:

JUNE 30, 1914.

THE SUPERINTENDENT, DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE,
Harrisburg, Pa.

SIR: I have the honor to report conditions at East Pittsburgh and vicinity in connection with the strike of employees of the Westinghouse Industries, which are comprised of the Westinghouse Electric, the Westinghouse Machine, the Westinghouse Air Brake, and the Westinghouse Meter Cos.; also the Union Switch & Signal Co. With the exception of the Westinghouse Air Brake Co. at Wilmerding and the Westinghouse Foundries at Trafford City the employees to the amount of about 90 per cent have been on strike for nearly a month. Up until yesterday it was reported that the strikers conducted themselves in an orderly manner, but on Monday morning a large crowd, amounting to about 2,500 people, massed about the electric and machine plants preventing a number of the office force and others employed about the plant from entering, compelling passengers on street cars to alight and to travel in directions opposite to that of the plants. No one was injured.

According to your instructions, upon receipt of a telegram from the sheriff of Allegheny County, which I herewith inclose, I proceeded to East Pittsburgh with 30 enlisted men, where I was later joined by Lieut. Marsh and 2 additional enlisted men. Upon arrival at East Pittsburgh at about 5.30 p. m. we were met by a large crowd of citizens from Turtle Creek, East Pittsburgh, and other surrounding small boroughs numbering, I should say, between 2,000 and 3,000. This crowd showed no disposition toward violence other than cheers mixed with hoots, jeers, and hisses. I proceeded to the Borough Building where I met the chief of police of East Pittsburgh, who expressed satisfaction at our arrival in the borough and promised the cooperation of his force. I then proceeded to the headquarters of the striking employees of the Westinghouse interests, where I met the members of the strike committee, and on which occasion I made plain to them that it would be absolutely necessary for them to maintain peace and good order in and about the streets surrounding the affected plants; that it would be necessary for their pickets to abstain from hoots, jeers, hisses, or laying their hands upon persons passing along the streets. This they promised to do.

At 5.45 this morning I posted the entire force along the streets which bound the Westinghouse plants, in such a manner that they could easily cooperate with each other. There were at least 3,000 persons on the streets in this vicinity at 6.30 a. m. and remained during the time that the employees, who have remained at work, assembled at the plant. It was not necessary for our men to make arrests except in one occasion in which a man slightly under the influence of liquor and inclined to be boisterous was detained for half an hour until his friends came and promised to conduct him to his home and vouched for his future good behavior when he was released. The men remained upon the streets until 9.30 a. m., and were again posted on the streets at 11.45 a. m. where they remained until 1.30 p. m.

The men and horses are quartered in a building, the property of the Westinghouse Electric Co., this being necessary because hotels capable of accommodating our men refused to grant us accommodations. In connection with this incident I wish to state that a hotel keeper arranged with me and showed me rooms sufficient to accommodate 26 men and offered me a rate of $1.50 per day per man. Later in the day, however, he became alarmed on account of the fear of boycott and decided that he would not accommodate us. The men are being fed in the restaurant provided for the female employees of the Westinghouse Electric Co. previous to the strike.

I met the strike committee at noon to-day and told them that it would be necessary for them to reduce the number of pickets on a foot bridge which crosses the Westinghouse properties from the main thoroughfare of East Pittsburgh to the Pennsylvania Railroad, as during the morning there was a continuous parade of strikers, amounting to about 200, across this bridge, which is nearly 150 yards long, making it difficult for the large number of employees of the Westinghouse Co. to cross the same to their work. This they readily consented to do, and promised to send but 20 men to this bridge in the morning, and each was to bear a badge designating his authority from the union. They further promised that these men would be composed of their most reputable members, for whom they could vouch would do everything in their power to maintain peace and good order.

While there is a large number of employees involved in this strike and are made up of various classes of citizens, some of those of which are high-salaried workmen of the Westinghouse plants and others of the ordinary labor type of foreigner, I do not anticipate any trouble handling the situation so long as the present committee is in control.

There are, however, a few members of the I. W. W. who are circulating among the foreign element and counsel violence. At present, however, they have received scant attention. I believe that the presence of our men is quite likely to prevent serious disorder at this place.

There was a long conference between the strike committee and the authorities of the Westinghouse interests this afternoon, and considerable progress was made toward a settlement.

Very respectfully,

LYNN G. ADAMS,
Captain, State Police, Commanding Troop A.

Copy furnished Supt. Groome at Philadelphia.

That is simply to show you that in case of a strike, where the riot which is caused by the strike of laboring men, that they consult with them and arrange to maintain law and order, and that ordinarily it is very easy to do. This shows that the labor unions conferred and agreed with Capt. Adams as to the number of pickets they should have, and that they would put badges on them so that they could be easily picked out and not be mistaken for others, and in that way there was not a particle of trouble.

Commissioner LENNON. That is another case where they were taken care of in the company's property?

Maj. GROOME. That is a case where the horses were in the company's—

Chairman WALSH. Where was that?

Maj. GROOME. East Pittsburgh.

Commissioner LENNON. Would you kindly furnish us from your record—not now, but when you have the opportunity, and send it to headquarters—the record of the number of times the troop has been called to serve in strikes and the number of times the men or horses or provisions have been provided in or by the corporations or by the employers?

Maj. GROOME. Yes, sir. You have that information as to the number of strikes in the letter I sent in answer to the questions you gave me two weeks ago; and there are a number of other things that I will get for you.

(See Groome Exhibit at the end of this subject.)

Chairman WALSH. Where were the constabulary housed during the strike at New Castle during 1909 and 1910?

Maj. GROOME. I have not the 1909 and 1910 report. I will have to give you that. It is six or seven years ago, and I have not got all these details in my head as I would like to have. I will probably have to look through these annual reports a moment—

Chairman WALSH. Perhaps Mr. Cunningham or Capt. Longly can get it.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. We will procure that.

Chairman WALSH. Were you present at the molders' strike, in 1912, at Erie?

Maj. GROOME. No, sir; I only take command when the entire force or squadron is out. When one troop or portion of troop is out the commanding officer of that troop is with them; when all are out then I take command as the senior officer; but I do not interfere with them in their——

Chairman WALSH. That is all, then, Major; thank you.

Mr. J. G. Sebald.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. There is the deputy superintendent, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Yes, thank you; I thought I would put Mr. Sebald on first, because I thought my question there might be something that you might wish to answer.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Very glad to have you do so, thank you. I was only afraid you might overlook——

Chairman WALSH. Very well. I will try to keep it in mind.

Mr. Sebald.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN G. SEBALD.

Chairman WALSH. State your name.

Mr. SEBALD. John G. Sebald.

Chairman WALSH. Where is your residence?

Mr. SEBALD. Nine forty-five West Sixteenth Street, Erie, Pa.

Chairman WALSH. What is your occupation?

Mr. SEBALD. Cement worker and contractor.

Chairman WALSH. Were you in Erie during the molders' strike in 1912?

Mr. SEBALD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Why was the strike called?

Mr. SEBALD. The strike was called for better conditions, more wages, and shorter hours.

Chairman WALSH. What were the hours and wages at the time the strike was called? What number of men were engaged in the strike, and what were their demands?

Mr. SEBALD. The demands were $3.25 a day; and in respect to the wages and rates involved—I did not come here prepared with my attorney or with any papers. I will have to speak just from my own knowledge. I was called away on short notice. I received—my work, I worked at the Erie foundry more than 15 years. The highest wages were $3, and three months before the strike I had to go to Walker's in order to get the $3. I was getting the highest wages—I was what they called an all-around man, what they called a skin-the-cat man, and could do anything—when any man laid off I would take his place. The lowest paid man was getting $1.60 a day, and we demanded nine hours' work. They worked at the Erie foundry until 9 o'clock without receiving any overtime. When we demanded overtime we did not demand time and a half or time and a quarter, but we demanded time. And the foreman told us if we don't like this job, git. There are a lot of men around Erie we can get.

Chairman WALSH. How many men were on the strike?

Mr. SEBALD. On the strike there were 856 men; that is, 800 with the molders and the machine operators, and 56 or 65 apprentice boys, if I am not mistaken.

Chairman WALSH. How long did the strike last?

Mr. SEBALD. The strike lasted—the first shop was taken out on the 25th or 27th of November, 1912, and it lasted up until some time in March, 1914.

Chairman WALSH. Now, was the strike a peaceable one or was there violence?

Mr. SEBALD. There was no violence in the strike whatever.

Chairman WALSH. How did the local authorities treat the strikers, and how did the strikers treat the local authorities?

Mr. SEBALD. As far as the local authorities treating the strikers, they treated them rotten—very rotten; because I know I went through the strike and took care of the men, and was instructed from the mayor and his office. He telephoned down to the police court, and the chief told them fellows not to lay their hands on "Baldy"—that is my nickname—and he wanted to give me special police paper to go out and take care of the men; and I told him I refused to take special police papers because the boys would think I was standing in with them, but I would go out and take care of the boys, and any man who got drunk on the line or around the street I would take care of him and see that he gets home safe and sound, and did not allow no man to carry no weapons, not even a pocketknife with a blade more than 2 inches long.

We had two Italians on the strike. I took their pocketknives away from them, and on the strike we did not carry knives, but I found that the men on the other side had the privilege of carrying knives and actually did, and slingshots were taken into police court from Hayes, so that they could not use it on us, and they told me I was running great chances in going from Eighth and State Streets to Seventh and Pearl with that thing in my pocket, and yet the other fellow that I took it away from and induced to come over to us had been walking around with it three weeks and was not bothered, and the chief of police himself told me I was running a big chance. Now, I don't see where the city of Erie has any ordinance that a man can't stand on a street corner for any reason. They say that two is a couple and three a crowd, and four on the sidewalk, that's never allowed; but we did not dare to walk in pairs. We had to walk single file. Now picture yourself, if you go away with your wife, but you don't have to wait until after 7 o'clock or after supper to go, but my wife and I, when we would go away, we never was stopped, but I have seen a case where they stopped a fellow with girls coming home, and would make them walk single file, and the man refused and they took him down to police court and charged him with disorderly conduct. Now, I was in police court 54 separate times, and the mayor called me up and he says, "John, you will have to cut that out or I will have to put you back of the bars," and I told him I had as much right to be in the police court and as much right as he or the chief of police or anybody else, because I am a taxpayer. What business had the police to stop me from going there? I offered to watch our men, and I tried to avoid any disorder, and if a man was drunk I would see that he was taken care of and see that they did not land him in jail. I did that of my own personal wish.

Chairman WALSH. Now, Mr. Sebald, were the State constabulary called into that strike?

Mr. SEBALD. They were called in there. They were called in by the sheriff at request of the mayor.

Chairman WALSH. Now, had there been violence before they were called in?

Mr. SEBALD. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Had there been fights or rock throwing or anything of that sort?

Mr. SEBALD. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Well, were there charges for such—were men arrested for that?

Mr. SEBALD. Well, one charge was over in the Polish settlement. They upturned a van with the strike breakers in it. The strike breakers caused the trouble. They called one of the men—I don't want to use the words in the presence of the women here, and it was the men that started it, but the women folks in the neighborhood got so mad they went to work and helped turn up the van.

Chairman WALSH. Now, did you have criticism as to the way the constabulary acted after their arrival?

Mr. SEBALD. Did I?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. How did the constabulary act, Mr. Sebald?

Mr. SEBALD. Well, I had my own experiences. I had no time, as I said before, to write this out, but I will state my case as to the State constabulary. They arrived—they were all—the first day they arrived they were all gentlemen, they were nice. Every one of them that met me addressed me as "Good morning, Baldy." I never met the men before, never saw them before, but it had been tipped off to them by the manufacturers' association, "That is the big guy. That is the guy you want to get." So we didn't pay any more attention to it, and I answered the men until about—well, the second—or that night. They came in in the morning, I judge about 5 o'clock, over the Bessemer Road. That night they went to work and went over in this Polish settlement, and one of the Cossacks—which I was not over there, but by the experience of the men that told me—the Cossack insulted a woman and a child; and some old man about 60 years old was coming along home with a shovel—a long-handled shovel—and he heard the remarks, and he told the Cossack, "If I was as young as you are, I would smash your head," and the Cossack said, "It is not up to you to say anything, and if you do I will knock your block off." And the old fellow forgot himself and he landed with the shovel on the Cossack. And Mr. Cossack—we called them Cossacks. He was a member of the State constabulary, and he went to charge and ride at the old man, and the old man got into a saloon, and he takes his horse and rides into the saloon and gets off his mount and strikes the man and knocks him down, and his horse walks out back to the curb. Now, that is the first trouble we had in Erie. It was the first night the Cossacks arrived there. There wasn't any bloodshed at all outside of that. There was no trouble at all when I was there. We were called out on the 13th day of December and we went through the strike peaceably and behaved; and also I have a recommendation that I am a peaceful citizen.

Chairman WALSH. How long were the constabulary there, Mr. Sebald?

Mr. SEBALD. Well, I have no diary of it, but I should judge they came there, if I am not mistaken, in April and left some time in March, 1914. I don't know which day.

Chairman WALSH. Please proceed and give us as concisely as possible your personal experiences.

Mr. SEBALD. There are no dates now.

Chairman WALSH. Never mind the dates.

Mr. SEBALD. And I can't give the number of the men, because they would have their hats turned around or would hide their number so we could not see it.

I was going up Walnut Street, from Twelfth to Sixteenth, over the Lake Shore tracks, when—near Walker's, between the Lake Shore track and Huron, and a foreman of the shop said to me, "John, you are getting pretty fat. Let's get a drink." And I was not drinking at the time, but he didn't know that. He said, "You are smoking cigarettes and the organizers are smoking 10-cent cigars." And I said that it was none of his business, and if he wanted a 10-cent cigar I would buy him one. There was an injunction hanging over my head. He asked me to go down as far as Twelfth Street, and I fell for it. That is two squares, and when I got there he walked over and said something to a constabulary, and the constabulary came up to me, and I said, "If you are looking for trouble, I will give it to you." And he used words something that I would not stand for my mother to call me. But he worked for the government, and I was scared of him, big as I am. He said to me that I would either have to move on or he would beat the head off of my shoulders, and I said, "Now, Jack, that is nothing to brag about; anybody can do that." And he said, "Never mind; you go about and mind your own business." And I was a peaceable man, and so I left.

I walked up as far as Huron Street, thinking this man had forgotten me. I walked up Walnut and he went up Cherry, and when I got up as far as Huron and Walnut, as far as the restaurant, there were five Italians there, and I asked one of them for a match; and he was looking for a match through his pockets when this constabulary came around Sixteenth Street, and when these boys saw that they beat it, and I said to them, "Come on back and give me a match." I said it in fun, and two of them came back, and one of them gave me a match. And I was standing on the sidewalk, and it was about 12 feet wide, and I was in the center, and this constabulary came down and reared his horse up on the sidewalk right at me. I knew I was up against it, and he said, "You are going to incite a riot, and I will riot. I will take that German block of yours and knock it off your shoulders." And I said, "If that is the case, I suppose my case is to beat it," and he said, "You beat it." So I beat it two squares up to Seventeenth Street and went into a saloon and restaurant there. This occurred about half past 4, and he kept me in there until about 6 o'clock, and I dared not come out until 6 o'clock to go over to my mother's. That is one of the incidents.

Another incident: I was down in the registry of my precinct, and I had worked around the house all day, and at about 2 o'clock I went to the precinct to register; I will say about half past 3 it was, and coming back from registering I crossed the subway at Liberty under the Lake Shore and the Pennsylvania tracks; and there is an old man there to flag the trains, and when I saw him he remarked to me—he said, "Baldy, are you next?" and I said, "What do you mean?" And he said, "Don't you see the Cossacks watching you?" And I said that I saw them but that I wasn't bothering them and I hoped they wouldn't bother me. And they were standing on Twelfth Street, three of them, facing me. And I stood there a few minutes and then went to Plum Street, three squares away, and I was talking to a conductor and brakeman there, and we talked about the labor trouble, and they asked me how things were, and I said, "Fine"; and I looked and I saw helmets coming up the street, and I said, "It is time for me to beat it; I see them coming and they will get me"; and the brakeman said, "You stick, Baldy, and we will show fight; there are four of us and you make a fifth, and we will clean them up." I said, "Nothing doing, for they have got guns 4 feet, or 2 feet long, and clubs 4 feet long, and there is nothing doing." I said, "Don't do anything; I will walk away peaceably, and give them no show, and I walked up as far as Sixteenth Street. I was on the east side of the road; I lived on Sixteenth between Plum and Cascade, and I had to cross Sixteenth Street to get home.

I was fixing my lawn and had to go up that way, and when the three came along I was standing there, and the little one in the center, I don't know his name or number, but he was an Italian, he reared his horse up and threw him over in front of me within a few inches of me, and the horse's jaw cut my face; and I didn't say, "What is the matter?" and I didn't care; to tell the truth, I was scared; I thought I didn't want to die; I am pretty young for that. He said to me, "Where are you going?" And I said I was going home, and he used vile language again and said, "We are onto you, now you go home and we are going to watch you." And I thought to myself, "If you watch me, all right." I knew I was going home, and I went.

And it was only three quarters of a square to my house, and there is a side entrance, and a side porch, and I went into the kitchen and my wife said, "What is the matter; you are pale; you look scared?" And I told her to look outside and she would see enough to scare a horse, and when she went and looked out there were those three Cossacks standing along the curb, and the three of them gave her the "ha ha"; what do you know about that? And I am afraid to say anything.

There is another incident, and I am only giving instances in my own experience, nothing I heard but my own experience. A woman lives next door to me, Mrs. Bennett, a French women, who married an Italian, and she has four boys, the smallest one 3 or 4 years old, and this State constabulary having their barn about 150 feet from my place, they had horses housed in the manufacturers' association foundry, and they used to come down there and throw down lumps of sugar and the horse would get down on his knees and pick up the lumps of sugar, and they thought that was cute—see? And these little boys took stones and threw the stones down in front of them, thinking the horse would fall for the stones, see? And the constabulary he gets off and walks into that house—he jumps off his horse and walks in, and told this woman, and the language he used was a shame, he says to her—I won't use the language, but he says to her, "If you can't train your children, we will train you and your old man as you were never trained before," and the woman was standing there trembling, and me as a citizen and taxpayer didn't dare to say anything. Why? Because if I had they would have lit into me for starting a disturbance, and they would have had me indicted for it. That is where the whole thing comes up.

There was another incident at my mother's place on Seventeenth Street, between Walnut and Cherry. I was called down to my mother's, my father is dead, and two brothers of mine dead, and I am the oldest boy and take care of my mother's repairing, and I went over there to fix up her gas stove, the bottom was rusted away, and I had done carpenter work on the side.

Getting through with the job, I judge about a quarter to 4, I walked out of the gate and as I walked out of the gate, a Cossack came up and asked me where I was going. I told him I was going home, and he said "You better stay where you are"; that is the proposition I was up against. I had to go back into my mother's and stay there from a quarter to 4 until 6 o'clock, until I saw him go away, at 6 o'clock he went away; they go back to their headquarters at Sixteenth and Cascade to the National Foundry; it is a foundry that has not been used for years, and they put their horses in there free gratis, I suppose, because they would have to pay to keep them at a livery stable, and that would cost too much.

Chairman WALSH. Have you other instances you complain of, of your own treatment?

Mr. SEBALD. That is about all of my own.

Chairman WALSH. Did the striking molders—

Mr. SEBALD (interrupting). Just a moment. I want to tell about one more incident. I don't want to forget this. It happened on Eighteenth near Liberty. I lived two and a half squares from there, and I was coming down Eighteenth Street at about 4 o'clock, and I met the president of the molders' union and the president of the C. L. U. getting donations for the liberty day celebration, and I met them between Liberty and Poplar going down Eighteenth Street, and they asked me to come back and have a drink, and I said: "No; I wasn't drinking," and they said to come back and have a cigar, and I said: "No; they won't let me go but one way, and if I go back they will pinch me," and I told the president of the molders' union, "There is no use throwing a red flag in a bull's face; they are waiting for me." And he said: "You imagine they are looking for you." And I said: "To show you, I will go back." And I went back to Spatt's saloon and restaurant across from the fire house to accommodate my friends, and I proved to those fellows I had to go out of the back door to prevent being arrested.

Chairman WALSH. Can you give us the names or numbers of the troopers referred to by you?

Mr. SEBALD. That is something I can't do, because I never kept a diary of it, and there was a lot of times they put charges against troopers and you could not get their numbers. They put charges against them lots of times with the numbers, and when they were brought into the police court it seems they would have the same number and a different face. They could change the numbers, but they couldn't change their faces.

Chairman WALSH. Did the striking molders in Erie have any communication with Supt. Groome or any of the officers before the constabulary was sent into Erie?

Mr. SEBALD. That is a thing I would like to have corrected. We sent Dan Sholcalt to Harrisburg to Gov. Tener, but he had gone away somewhere—I think to Virginia—and the deputy sent a telegram to him, and he sent an answer and said the constabulary would not be in Erie until Gov. Tener returned. As I understand Maj. Groome, he said he was not in Erie, but I am pretty sure I saw him there. I don't think I am mistaken in the man's face. He promised Dan Sholcalt he would not send the State constabulary to Erie until the governor returned, but the next morning at 5 o'clock they were in Erie, and Shocalt got in at 8 o'clock and they were there then.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any other statement you want to make not covered by my questions?

Mr. SEBALD. There are some statements, if I don't take up too much of your time.

Chairman WALSH. We are trying to hurry through.

Mr. SEBALD. I would like, if Mr. Groome comes back on the stand, to ask him whether or not the citizens are paying the State constabulary to have benefit entertainments and dress the men up as women and do bareback riding. That is what I want to find out.

He was asked to come up to the C. L. U. Hall at seven hundred something State Street, and we waited there for him until 11 o'clock, and he never showed up. I might be mistaken, but I doubt it. Mr. Groome said he was not in Erie, but I saw him there. We waited for him until 11 o'clock to take this matter up with him. We didn't need the State constabulary, but they were brought in there. Mayor Stern—his finances were running low, and he wanted to make a showing, and I said to keep the constabulary out. I went to the police station and asked the mayor whether I could not get a police license, and the mayor said to me: "I offered you one and you would not take it." And I said: "Why not give me one now?" And he said: "No; you have 15 injunctions over your head." Every man working in the Erie shops as a strike breaker was sworn in as a special police, and before that came up Sheriff Mooney swore in every man as a deputy, and one man was arrested for pointing a gun at a man in a street car, and the man was never sent up or anything.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you, Mr. Sebald.

Mr. LUMB. Mr. Chairman, Maj. Groome has just stepped out of the room, and I would be glad, when he comes back, to ask him to make any statement in reply to the witness.

Mr. SEBALD. I want to make some statement about the Burns men.

Chairman WALSH. Make it brief.

Mr. SEBALD. Those Burns men were brought in there. I want to show you that we didn't come here to frame anything up.

A few days after we got into the scab house, or Waldorf Astoria, a man by the name of McCann, an ex-saloon keeper, came to me and asked me where to buy union tobacco, and I said: "You are the boy; come with me." It was a bluff, but I was on, and he said to me: "You look honest." And I said: "You are the boy; go ahead." And he said: "If you want to fire a scab house you can get gasoline and a quart of oil." And I let him go on a few minutes, and after he got through I told him what I had to say, and it was a-plenty. He was trying to get me in wrong.

Another instance: A man came up to me at First and State—a man by the name of Berry—a stool pigeon for the Burns men. There was a man caught one night in a rooming house with another man's wife, and he was turned out—MacLeese—and they got Farrell in his place.

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). You said you wanted to make some statement about the Burns people.

Mr. SEBALD. That is how McLeese came in. On First and State I received a note. This man came to me and asked me to come into a restaurant and said, "I want to show something to you," and he showed me a note as follows: "We hereby agree to pay you $100 cash, or $100 a month, if you will leave town; if not, we will get you soon. Farrell." That is the Burns man.

Another instance, across the road in an arcade, Wilson, an organizer, sent me in there to see what they wanted. I went in there and they offered me the same thing, $100 cash or $100 a month to go down to New York State and work on divorce cases. I want to say this, that if men are dirty enough to lead a man to such things, such as this scab-house fire, they are pretty dirty.

I could furnish you testimony that would take two days to give it all. I am furnishing this from my own personal knowledge. Groome was here and he left, but I will wait until he comes back, and anything he wants to ask me, I will answer it.

Chairman WALSH. We do not permit any questions to be asked, except by the commission. You will be excused. We are obliged to you.

Mr. Lumb.

TESTIMONY OF MR. GEORGE F. LUMB.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, please.

Mr. LUMB. George F. Lumb.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. LUMB. I am the deputy superintendent of the department of State police of Pennsylvania.

Chairman WALSH. Where is your place of residence?

Mr. LUMB. Harrisburg, Pa.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you been connected with the Pennsylvania State Constabulary?

Mr. LUMB. It is the State police. Since its organization—if you will permit me, I would like to make a correction as to the use of the word "constabulary." That word has been used throughout the examination of the witnesses, but its proper name under the statutes of the State of Pennsylvania is the "State Police."

Chairman WALSH. Is it usually referred to as "State constabulary"?

Mr. LUMB. The newspapers adopted that name at the time of its organization for convenience, and that has been generally adhered to, but to make your record straight I make that suggestion. It is, however, generally referred to almost without exception as the State constabulary for the purpose of distinguishing it on the different police forces.

Chairman WALSH. What are your duties as assistant superintendent?

Mr. LUMB. My duties are mostly of a routine nature. The superintendent is the executive head of the department, and I prepare, with the assistance of two clerks, condensed reports from the four troops; I look after the preparation of vouchers for the expenditures of the various troops, coming through my hands, but they go up to the superintendent for final examination and for his signature, and he makes out checks for the disbursement of the funds.

I have charge of making of morning reports, showing the location of the force and the number of men on duty in the barracks, or on detached service; the location of the substations, and the whereabouts of the horses; the number of men sick in quarters, the number absent on leave; and any other matters pertaining to the men and the personnel of the troops. Those morning reports are accompanied by daily reports of operations which cover the route covered by the various patrols sent out from the barracks on special circumstances. It is also accompanied by special reports of men; for instance, a private is detailed to investigate a murder. On his return he writes out that report over his own signature, telling the time he left the barracks, the district attorney to whom he reported, or the county detective as the case may be, the name of the person murdered, the man suspected, and all of the result of his investigation in detail. That is signed by him, and after being read by the troop commander and a copy of it filed a copy is sent to headquarters where they are consolidated and then go to the superintendent. I am a sort of routine point for the four troops to get together and submit matters in orderly form to Maj. Groome.

I also have prepared monthly reports, and the monthly pay roll, and also the monthly deduction sheet showing deductions made from the pay of the men for any lost property or any leaves granted them without pay. If a man, for instance, has had his limit of allowance for absence, 14 days, in a year, and an emergency arises, for instance some family circumstance, a wedding, or a funeral or sickness, and it is necessary for him to go home, then, under the regulations, he may have a leave of absence without pay, having already exhausted his allowance of 14 days for vacation purposes.

All those details I look after, but Maj. Groome has the entire matter in his hands.

I would like to take opportunity to say, at this point, with reference to Mr. Maurer's assertion that Maj. Groome is only a figurehead superintendent, that Mr. Maurer is either grossly ignorant of the operations of one of the executive departments of the State of Pennsylvania or that he has deliberately falsified his statements to this commission, and I am inclined to think that, inasmuch as he said he had spent a number of years practically studying this department, that the latter proposition is true. Maj. Groome, and I am not saying this because I am his immediate subordinate and have been since January 1, 1908, and it is not necessary for me at this stage to flatter him, but Maj. Groome is a man of great executive ability. He has a grasp of details which enables him to do in a short period of time much more than men of different temperament would be able to accomplish. In addition to that, his knowledge of military affairs and his knowledge of this organization from having been at the head of it since its organization peculiarly fit him for the position he has, and his work is done without much noise. Men who know nothing about the workings of the department, come to Harrisburg for information, and they are naturally referred to me for matters of detail, and they naturally get the idea that I am running the whole show, and while it is complimentary, I must admit it is not true.

Chairman WALSH. You have followed, I suppose, Captain, as I have noticed you here, the statements made by Mr. Maurer and Mr. Williams, in particular in regard to the State police force?

Mr. LUMB. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Please, in your own way, take up any of those matters you desire to and make your own comment on them. I understand you have made some personal investigation as to some of these points there were complaints about.

Mr. LUMB. Yes; and I would like to first bring the attention of the commission to a state of affairs in Pennsylvania which will eliminate any question of veracity between Mr. Maurer and myself, and resolve itself into a proposition to be decided by your own reasoning, and it is this: Maurer, in his charges against the State police force, an organization that has been in existence now for 10 years, has indirectly indicted the members of the legislature, and the district attorneys, and the grand juries, and the county detectives of every county in Pennsylvania in which the State police have operated, of either gross or criminal negligence, because if there is a band of renegades or degenerates going through the State, riding men and women down, beating old gray-headed men over the head with shovels, and other acts he has referred to, those people are all grossly negligent and unmindful of their duty, because we are under their supervision and control.

The district attorney in Pennsylvania is the prosecuting criminal officer of his county, elected by the people, and his future legal career as a lawyer depends on the manner in which he conducts that office. Now, for anyone to presume for a moment that a detachment of State police could go out of Westmoreland County, or any other, into another county, where the district attorney is, and a grand jury sits, and do the overt acts referred to, you can plainly see that we are not to blame, but that the whole system of our government is at fault. It is not an attack on the State police, but it is an attack on the very fundamental principles of the government of the State, as it appears to us in Pennsylvania.

Various governors—Pennypacker, Stuart, Tener, and Brumbaugh—have seen fit to retain in office the present superintendent in spite of the bitter personal attacks upon the acts of the force.

In Pennsylvania we have the grand-jury system, whereby a citizen who thinks any wrong has been done in his community, of any magnitude, has three remedies; he can either himself personally make information and have the man arrested on warrant, or he can go to the district attorney and make his complaint, or he can appear before the grand jury and have a presentment made and have the man indicted through the grand jury. All of these remedies are open to the people who have made these hearsay statements and charges against members of the State police, but who have never been apparently specifically identified.

One of my duties is that of going through the State at various times and inspecting our substations, the substations operated in rural communities; and with reference to the statement of Mr. Maurer that the men only patrolled the immediate vicinity of the barracks, that is another of his errors. The substations at the present time—I have a morning report here, if you care to have it submitted or refer to it, showing the location of men in Sullivan County, and others where there are a large number engaged in agricultural pursuits. In my duties I am personally responsible to the superintendent for the discipline of those substations to this extent: If complaints come in to Maj. Groome that those men were not properly performing their duty, it would reflect on me in not having discovered it at the time of my inspection when I called on the officer interested.

Now, the State Grange of Pennsylvania, at its last meeting, a few months ago, unanimously and without any move on our part, and entirely unexpected as far as we were concerned, passed a resolution asking the State legislature to increase the State police force and increase the appropriation for the benefit of the rural communities that had no protection from other sources of the police except the local township constable, who is usually a G. A. R., who has the confidence of the people, but who is seldom effective or aggressive. This is not intended as a reflection on the constable, but intended to show there is no organized police force to give the rural communities protection—adequate protection. A copy of that resolution, I am informed, was sent by the State Grange and at their expense to each member of the legislature. When the bill was brought up for consideration there were at least 50 labor organizers back of the rail separating the audience part of the house of representatives from the seats of the members of the legislature. Notes and pages were sent down to the different members at the last moment in order to influence them. That, of course, only indicates that the framers of the resolution, while it might have been effective at the time it was received, was later supplemented by these personal approaches.

Now, in addition to the State Grange, we have been very effective in cooperating with various departments of the Commonwealth. It frequently occurs in Pennsylvania that a smallpox epidemic break out in the community where the majority of the residents are foreigners or people of foreign birth. Dr. Dixon's State health department having met with violence and a great deal of resistance in enforcing the quarantine laws for the health of the community, by insisting on people in infected houses remaining within the limit prescribed by law. Dr. Dixon frequently has called on Supt. Groome for a detail of our men to present themselves in the community under his health officers to enforce the quarantine laws, and they assure us that it has resulted in the prevention of a great deal of disease.

With reference to the State game commission, I want to refer to our annual report of 1908, page 5, in which we have a quotation from the annual report of the secretary of the State game commission, for the same year, a part of which I will read into the record. [Reads:]

"The greatest assistance I had in enforcing the law came from the State constabulary. Every request from this office for help has been promptly met. In my report of last year I cited the fact that during the year 1906, 14 of our men were shot at, 7 shot, and 4 killed by foreigners, with not one of the perpetrators arrested. I do not know at this time of the wounding of one of our officers during the past year. This change in condition, in my opinion, is due to the creation of our State constabulary and the unhesitating, determined, and persistent pursuits of wrongdoers of all classes by members of that force."

There has been a good deal said here, Mr. Chairman, with reference to the men going upon company property at the time of strikes. In 1906, shortly after the force was organized, I was sent with a detachment of men to a place called Eleanor, in Jefferson County, where it was stated that about 2,000 men were threatening the destruction of the tipples and the company property, and they were threatening violence on every hand. Sheriff Shefander of Jefferson County had about 40 deputies, at that little place, and our detachment of about 16 men were met about a half mile down the road from the settlement by 2 men who said they represented the strikers and that we had better turn back, because they were laying for us and they would give us all we were looking for. We said we were sorry and that we were not looking for trouble, but had come to enforce the law and order, under the direction of the sheriff, and if they met us half way they would find us as human as they.

Shortly after we arrived in the town we attempted to find accommodations at the hotel, the only one in the place. The girls, at the persuasion of the men in the strike, vacated the building, the waitresses and cooks, and declined to serve us or make up the beds or anything of that kind; and I suggested to the proprietor that the men were hungry, and if he would permit us access to the kitchen we would detail a couple of men to cook and prepare something to eat until some other arrangements could be made; and when the girls saw that our men were proceeding to cook they decided to come back and do the cooking themselves.

We were there a week when the superintendent of the mine came to me and said the men were going down to a spring on the company's property to get water, which was the only place to get drinking water, and he said he wanted our men to stop them. I said to the superintendent that I understood the rural delivery carrier went down over that road, and that it was a public highway, and, although it ran over the company's property, he had no right to close it to the public. He resented that a little, and I saw from that time on these people went unmolested, and I advised the sheriff not to cut off their drinking-water supply.

They had notified previously a number of residents of the company's houses that if they refused to work they could vacate the houses or they would evict them.

When the proper time arrived Sheriff Shefander asked my aid in vacating those buildings. My orders from Supt. Groome was that there was to be absolutely no civil process, such as landlord-and-tenant issue served by our men, and we were not to go on the company property unless there was actual evidence of violence that it was necessary to suppress, and I said, "We can not assist you in evicting those people." And the sheriff had to get some additional men, either company employees or deputies, I can't say which; and those people were evicted; and I was very careful to see that our men remained the proper distance away, at least four or five hundred yards, at all times, even in making their patrols. The result of it was that in another week or so some of the younger men on the strike came up and invited the men to play baseball with them. And I felt that I could not allow that, because we were up there to keep the men on this patrol, and we were on duty, and the men could not be spared. I cite that early instance in 1906 to show the attitude under which we started out and to show you the opposition that we met with from the start. But we have been as careful—I say this without any reservation—to safeguard the interests and the rights of those men who are on strike as of the owners of the property whom they were striking against. Our issue has been the man that throws the brick, fires the gun, or burns the tippie. You referred to the Hazleton situation. I was sent up there by Gov. Tener to investigate the complaint of Mr. Maurer.

Chairman WALSH. When was that complaint lodged?

Mr. LUMB. It was lodged with Governor—with the governor, and Gov. Tener sent for me—

Chairman WALSH. That is the instance that Mr. Maurer testified to—that complaint to the governor—

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. You did not catch the question; the chairman asked you when that was.

Mr. LUMB. Well, my recollection of that, as to the exact date, is not very clear; but I have the full stenographic notes (transcript) if you permit me to refer to that, I can give it to you.

Chairman WALSH. Very well; if you will get that.

Mr. LUMB. The orders from the governor were about June 8, and the investigation was held on June 11, 1914. Shall I proceed?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; proceed.

Mr. LUMB. Gov. Tener having ordered me to proceed to Hazleton, and having advised the superintendent that I was to go up there, I went, and—not as Mr. Maurer says with him, but I met him at the Loughran Hotel—and I want to emphasize this incident, because there was a question of identity of our men arose up there who were operating in plain clothes.

Chairman WALSH. That is at Hazleton?

Mr. LUMB. At Hazleton; yes. When I arrived at the hotel, having—

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed.

Mr. LUMB. When I arrived at Hazleton, Mr. Maurer and some associates were standing in the lobby of the hotel, and Capt. ——— and Lieut. Mair were there, and I spoke to Mr. Maurer, and Mr. Maurer says, "You have got the advantage of me," and I says, "This is Mr. Lumb, from Harrisburg, whom you talked with in the governor's office, and afterwards in the corridor of the capitol three days ago." And then he remembered me, and we went up into the parlor of the hotel where he had about 15 members of various unions, and 1 or 2 others that he referred to individually. The sum and substance of their charges against the police, and the complaints were that in six or eight weeks of the strike that the police in plain clothes had acted in behalf of the traction company, and that they had discriminated against the men on strike by driving them away with clubs when they were gathered together on the corner, and that one of our men had been in a drunken fight. That was Sergt. Hennig. The witnesses they introduced, without any exception, were either members of the miners' union or the trolleyman's union or men who had personal grievances, as was developed in the examination of the witnesses. For example, Andrew Marty, vice president of the local union, made some charges against Sergt. Hennig of the nature that he had railroaded him to Pottsville for trial, I believe, or perhaps it was Wilkes Barre (referring to memorandum). No; it was Pottsville. Now, Pottsville and McAdoo were in the same county; but the attitude of the burgesses had been made clear by the statements of our men. And I have here—which you may file with your records—a statement of the attitude of the aldermen of Hazleton, taken by Lieut. Mair in a personal interview.

He went to Alderman Moody and he said, "Have you any objections to hearing the cases brought before you by the State police?" and he said, "I don't care to try State police cases." Alderman O'Donnell said, "I don't want State police cases; to hell with them." F. P. Greenwald said, "I don't want State police cases. I am a sick man and about to retire. I don't want to be bothered with them." Alderman Faey: "Will do my duty. Sworn to try cases according to evidence." Heidenrich: "I don't care particularly about trying State police cases, but will try them if they are brought." Alderman Crellin said, "I don't want to handle State police cases." Fallen: "I will take the cases and render verdicts according to the evidence." Fierio: "I don't want to take any cases of the State police or anyone else, except those in the city of Hazleton, as I am police magistrate here." I might say that our men have the power of city policemen in addition to the power of fish and game wardens, and forestry wardens, and had a perfect right to take cases before this police magistrate. Andruzzi: "Owing to being an Italian, and the stand I have taken, I don't care to take the cases." Huth: "I don't want to try the cases, but if cases are brought before me I will try them fairly." John H. Shopp: "I am in sympathy with the strikers, but would try any case according to the evidence."

Now those were the conditions under which the men were endeavoring to cooperate with the sheriff of Lucerne County and the mayor.

At this investigation I found, and so reported, that they had combed Hazleton with a fine-toothed comb, to use a figure of speech, to get some act of immoral conduct or some act that would cast reflection upon the men. They did not have present at that investigation a representative business man or merchant. We did not have one member of the council. They did not have the mayor or the chief of police. They had a policeman. This policeman had ordered two of our men to go on—to move on about their business, and they said, "We are members of the State police force here on duty." He said, "It don't make any difference to me, you beat it or there will be trouble." That was a little clash. That man came and testified against our men. The mayor had no such authority or the chief of police to take any such nonprofessional action against other police. It was merely a little personal issue. He was one of their witnesses.

Another witness was a man by the name of Harris, from the Palace Hotel. This man testified he had seen Sergt. Hennig drunk and had helped to put him to bed. It developed on cross-examination that Sergt. Hennig had reported this man to the proprietor of the Palace Hotel for charging double prices for coffee and sandwiches because they were police; and the proprietor warned this man if he did it again he would discharge him. I asked Mr. Harris for the name of the person that assisted him in putting our sergeant to bed, and he could not recall it. I asked him for the name of any person to whom he had mentioned the fact at a time that might be so close to the time as to be worth something as evidence. He said "I don't recall who I mentioned it to."

Another example of the nature of the charges against these men was the statement that they had operated—15 of them, some said, and some 6 and others 8—in plain clothes getting information as spies for the traction company.

Now, Sergt. Hennig did operate in plain clothes. Sergt. Hennig was in charge of the details there, and being in plain clothes at times he was able to get information as to the workings of his own men and as to acts of violence on the streets. He was also investigating two or three individual crimes which perhaps had no connection whatever with the strike of the traction employees but were matters of a personal nature.

It was stated that on one occasion, as I recall the evidence, that three or four State policemen in plain clothes ordered the crowd to move on, and the crowd referred to their side and said, "We don't know who you are, and you haven't any right, without showing any badge, which our men are required to wear and which badge they wear at all times when they are working in plain clothes, that these men drew their blackjacks and clubbed these men." I asked how they knew these men were State police, and the witness replied that he saw them three or four days afterward in uniform on horseback; and I held him down to the time a little bit, and then he admitted that it might possibly have been a week afterwards. I then invited the attention of the commissioners conducting this thing to the fact that Mr. Maurer had conversed with me in Harrisburg, in the governor's office, between half an hour and an hour and that I had also conversed with him in the corridor of the capitol, and a few days afterwards while I was wearing the same civilian clothes I had approached him in the lobby of the hotel in broad daylight, and he didn't know me. How then could these men—that was a part of the testimony they had—how could these men swear on their oath as to the identity of these men they saw in plain clothes and then a week after said they saw them on horseback in uniform. That is to show you the value of the evidence that they produced to sustain the serious charges they were able to raise against the State police force after six weeks of activity.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of a commission was this, please, Captain?

Mr. LUMB. Why, it was made up of Mr. Maurer—

Chairman WALSH. Legislative committee?

Mr. LUMB. Oh, no; no; purely a committee of strikers. It was an ex parte hearing. We had no witnesses there, or anything else. They simply made their charges and substantiated them to the best of their ability. I objected two or three times to Mr. Maurer putting words in the mouth of the witness who was testifying. And Mr. Roger Deever, one of their attorneys, saw and admitted the unfairness of it. Mr. Maurer would sit there and say, "Now, you tell us about that fight in the barroom," and the man probably never thought of such a thing; but then he could go on and relate about a fight in a barroom. And I objected to his leading the witnesses along in that way; and Mr. Deever admitted that it was certainly unfair to enter into that sort of procedure. So he restrained them to a certain extent.

Chairman WALSH. Well, did they make some finding?

Mr. LUMB. Well, the only finding you will ever see of that investigation is my report to Supt. Groome, and by him to the governor, and the book called "The American Cossack" by Mr. Maurer. My report is a full report, having taken a stenographer along with me. And Mr. Maurer's reply in the Cossack shows only such extracts of the testimony as he thought would best suit his purpose.

Chairman WALSH. What was the evidence in that case refuting the charges that you heard Mr. Maurer make on the stand—that is, about members of the constabulary being in the crowd and that they seemed to be desiring to create a disturbance when they were moving a car? Do you recall it? And that the local police dispersed the crowd, and there were two men, I think he said, and a lieutenant, and maybe more that said they were members of the State police?

Mr. LUMB. That was defective in two respects. In the first place, the identity of these two men in plain clothes was never properly established; and I might say in that connection that the traction company, being unable to obtain our men to operate in plain clothes, had men there who were either Pinkerton or Burns's men, but which I am unable to answer, because we did not associate with them, had nothing in common with them, and ignored them.

Chairman WALSH. Was your contention upon this mission and elsewhere that you did not have any men in plain clothes under those circumstances?

Mr. LUMB. Except Sergt. Hennig, and except where men were relieved from duty occasionally—a man gets worn out in that sort of duty, and he is allowed a day's leave of absence occasionally from the barracks to get clean underwear and do other little things in the way of getting cleaned up. Of course, then he would go to his room and put on his civilian clothes and get on a street car and leave the barracks and would come back after a time and get on his uniform when he went on duty again. We have avoided plain-clothes duty as far as possible.

Chairman WALSH. Now, there is one other point that occurs to my mind. He said that the men of the State police also presented cases in police court and acted as attorney. What was there to that?

Mr. LUMB. Mr. Chairman, we have in Pennsylvania a system of subordinate courts in the cities known as magistrate courts, and in the smaller towns they are called aldermen, and in the counties they are known as justices of the peace, who hear and try small cases, summary convictions, without jury, or if the offense is sufficiently large, if it is of a nature covered by the statute, he has no alternative but to hold a man for court under bail, or to commit him.

Now, you can easily see that it would be an absurd proposition for any policeman to arrest a man for a crime that he had seen committed and simply walk into the justice of the peace and say "I have arrested this man for assault and battery," and then stand there mute himself—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I understood from some other testimony that it is the same custom as obtains in Massachusetts, and in some other States where the officer in these inferior courts presents the testimony of himself and has the right to examine his witnesses to sustain his charge and has a right to ask questions of the adverse witnesses.

Mr. LUMB. Well, it is just like this, the officer must make out what we call a prima facie case, or else the man would not be held and justice would be defeated. He has a right to tell his story, and if the adverse witness starts to tell a falsehood, if he can show it by two or three questions, he has that right. But the entire proceedings, however, Mr. Chairman, is under the supervision of the justice of the peace, and our man could not wrongfully conduct himself in that court without being in contempt of court. And it is another evidence that they are attacking the State police and attacking the system of State government.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Your description is exactly right, Mr. Chairman, with reference to this Commonwealth, and commonly professional men are not present at all—it is almost unheard of.

Chairman WALSH. Now, did you have any personal contact with the Bethlehem situation?

Mr. LUMB. I did not. I was not there. And, as Maj. Groome explains, he only went out when the entire force was ordered out—that either he or I got on the scene.

Chairman WALSH. Now, did the general nature of these criticisms come to the attention of the officials, the superiors of the State police, Maj. Groome and yourself?

Mr. LUMB. Well, no. I want to say to you, in that connection, in every session of the legislature there has been a certain element at work to have the State police force act repealed. Now, their sessions in the legislative hall have been the same as here, general talks, very seldom giving any dates or names, and always drawn very largely from imagination of one man and told to each other, and he, in turn, relates it always as hearsay evidence. Now, any member of the legislature living in that district or representing the people or the grand jury, as I explained, or the district attorney, or the judge can immediately take cognizance of any such conduct as that and bring our men to prosecution. And I want to say to you, gentlemen, that if any matter of that kind was brought to the attention of Maj. Groome or myself it would be sifted down to the bottom, and we can do it easily, for this reason: There is an order on our force issued in 1909 or 1910, a copy of which I have here, saying in just these words: "Any member of this force known to use outside influence for the furtherance of his own interests will be considered as acknowledging his own incompetency and dismissed from the force." Now, that being true, and all our finances being under the supervision of the auditor general of Pennsylvania, what possible advantage could there be to any of the officers of this force; and when I refer to the officers in this case I have reference to the superintendent, the deputy superintendent, or the captains in covering up or ignoring any act of misconduct on the part of the men. The entire force has to stand on its merit. We know that better than anything else.

Now, it is related to you in this way for the purpose of eliminating any presumption that may exist that men are held on the force by political influence. The first victim of this general order that was issued, on our force, was a lieutenant who got a senator and two or three other prominent men in Pennsylvania to endeavor to obtain for him a vacancy which then existed in the grade of captain. As soon as those letters came in, the lieutenant was given his walking papers. You can easily see, then, how absurd that opinion is that we deliberately cover up acts of misconduct on the part of the men.

Chairman WALSH. Did you personally take charge of the investigation, so far as your own department was concerned, in regard to the trouble with which Mr. Moughan was charged, in regard to Mr. Zambo and the case of the other man charged with an assault upon a man by the name of Gallagher?

Mr. LUMB. No; I did not personally take charge of it by going to the scene; but Capt. Robinson, the troop commander, was on the ground, and he dealt with me at Harrisburg, and in that way it came through proper channels to headquarters.

Chairman WALSH. And who is the captain at Hazleton?

Mr. LUMB. At Hazleton?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LUMB. Capt. Pitcher, of Wyoming, is captain in charge of the detail there.

Chairman WALSH. Still on the force?

Mr. LUMB. Oh, yes. He is captain of the troop at Wyoming now.

Chairman WALSH. Did you get the address of Capt. Robinson from Maj. Groome?

Mr. LUMB. No; but I will get it.

Chairman WALSH. Will you be kind enough to do so, and we will have our investigator take his statement?

Mr. LUMB. It is Capt. Joseph F. Robinson, editor of the Baseball World, Chicago, Ill.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I was going to suggest also that if there is anything else you desire to put into the record you may do so. You have gotten the range of this.

Mr. LUMB. Mr. Chairman, I will leave these minutes of the hearing at Hazleton.

(See Lumb Exhibit.)

Chairman WALSH. Have it confined, of course to first-hand facts.

Mr. LUMB. Yes. Well, I think with what Maj. Groome has put in the record and what I have said, you have got a pretty fair idea of both sides of this controversy, so far as our department is concerned. But I would be glad to file with your secretary this legislative journal, if you care to have it, because it has been referred to by the gentlemen who have raised this issue, and it contains remarks made by those from the rural districts who feel that the State police are an important part of our government.

(Witness submitted a copy of the Legislative Journal of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, session 1915, vol. 3, No. 45.)

Chairman WALSH. Now, I would like you to make just one statement. You stated, going back to 1906, where waitresses and others refused to serve the men, and coming down to the situation where they had to go to the steel company's property, how do you account for the prejudice or the lack of sympathy that seems to exist in these towns toward your force? What is the cause of that?

Mr. LUMB. Now, my answer to that, Mr. Chairman, would be more in the nature of a personal opinion than an official statement.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I thought perhaps you had inquired into it and discussed it?

Mr. LUMB. Yes; I will be glad to give you my opinion on the subject, but I would want to state before doing so that this department, in time of disorder, does not take any notice of the fact that a strike exists from that standpoint. It is with us purely a question of the man that throws the brick or fires the gun or burns the tippie; and we do not ask if he is a Republican or a Democrat or a union or nonunion man. It is a question of law or lawlessness on the public highways and the destruction of property.

Now, having cleared the air, so that you will not think this is an official expression of views of the department, I want to say this:

That my knowledge of the old English guilds and various earlier labor unions is that they were for the purpose of protecting the men and raising a boycott, if necessary. They did not at that time seem to recognize the powerful importance of violence toward others who wanted to work. Perhaps it was due to the fact that the populations were not as dense at that time. Now, it has been held in Pennsylvania that if a man wants to go on a strike he has a perfect right to do so; but that he must not obstruct the highways to prevent other men who wish to work from going on to their work. The Supreme Court, in 1860 or 1861, held that there were no innocent bystanders in time of riot; that it was the duty of every law-abiding citizen, as soon as he hears or learns that there is any disorder on the public thoroughfare, to retire to his home. Those facts being true, and it also being true that the labor unions deny any responsibility for violence—they ordinarily, I believe, claim that most of the violence comes from the class of men who just enjoy such excitement, and that it is not officially recognized by the union as a proper thing. I think they are all agreed now that that is the attitude they generally take—that it is not done by one of “our men”; “he is a fellow that came here from Baltimore.” They dynamited street cars in Chester, and cars were blown up, and the unions denied any responsibility for it, and perhaps justly so. I have personal knowledge of the fact that men did come there from Baltimore, and even Philadelphia, and some of them even wearing their conductors’ caps, and performed these very acts. If this is true, I can not understand why the labor union, as such, should object to the presence of men who are sent there by the proper authority of the Commonwealth to enforce law and order. But I am greatly afraid, particularly from what I have heard from Mr. Maurer and Mr. Pierce and Mr. Williams, that there is creeping into our labor unions a sort of spirit abroad of anarchy, and I don’t believe they voiced the sentiments of labor unions at large. I don’t believe they voice the general opinion; and their zeal against our institution is so far-reaching as to be sanctioned by the opinion of the majority of the labor unions of Pennsylvania. That is about as well as I can express it from my personal standpoint.

Chairman WALSH. Then you think this lack of sympathy which you discovered is through the influence of those persons which you have mentioned?

Mr. LUMB. Well, I think—no—every member of the commission must know that there has recently been injected into our country some people from Europe—some people who call themselves Industrial Workers of the World. About three or four years ago there was a strike on the B. & S. Railway, up in Potter County—the Buffalo & Susquehanna. And their attorney, Mr. Robinson, came down to Harrisburg and said, “Capt. Lumb, we have got to have some men.” He said, “The sheriff up there, because of the scarcity of the population, except those who are on the strike, is such that he can not get enough deputies to protect us. And the men are putting sand in the journal boxes of the engines and putting soap in the boilers, and are doing everything possible to destroy the property and imperil life and our rolling stock, and the State must send some State police up there.” I said, “Mr. Robinson (or Roberts, whichever it was) it is impossible to send men under those conditions.” “Why?” he says, “The Industrial Workers of the World are up there, and they are preaching treason and anarchy, and there is a reign of terror among us people, and we don’t dare to go out after dark.” I said, “That is a bad state of affairs in Pennsylvania, but you have got to go to your sheriff, and your sheriff can go to the governor or the superintendent of Pennsylvania and certify in writing that the situation is beyond his control before our men can go on the scene.”

He stated that the sheriff was a high-strung man who had so much pride in his office that he would not concede that the situation was beyond his control, and that the only question was not being able to get enough men to serve as deputies. Now, as a matter of fact, we did not send any men up there, because the request came from the corporation and not from the proper authorities.

That, I think, is the menace to the labor unions themselves that this wrongful spirit is creeping in and undermining their proper attitude of mind toward law and order. But understand, Mr. Chairman, this is purely a personal opinion, based on purely personal observation.

The department of the State police keep no data of labor unions. We have no information about their workings. We never try to attend their meetings. We do not recognize in our official capacity that there is such a thing as a labor union. When we go into a place at the request of a sheriff we are under his directions. He says at this particular point there was bloodshed last night, or at this place they are going to dynamite property, or here is a mob; and under his directions alone we go in and under his directions alone we go out, and the sheriff is the high peace officer of the county in Pennsylvania.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Was it not under the direction of the sheriff that the O'Brien gunmen in Roosevelt, N. J., did their work?

Mr. LUMB. Under the direction of the sheriff, who resorted to the employment of deputy sheriffs; and if you have read the editorials in the newspapers, the majority state that had there existed a State police force of men who could keep their heads under fire that series of shootings would not have occurred.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How about the State police force, or State militia under the direction of another company in Colorado?

Mr. LUMB. I am not familiar with that situation.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It was only a question of this: That what they were doing was done under the direction of the sheriff that formed them. If the sheriff is dominated by one or the other class, and he is in control when you are there, all the feelings of the domination are present?

Mr. LUMB. There you are getting back to the principles of whether our principles of government are correct, because the sheriff is an elective office.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is there any indictment of the form of government, or is there an indictment of the way that it is administered by those who are in office?

Mr. LUMB. In this particular hearing you are referring to?

Commissioner GARRETSON. In any case.

Mr. LUMB. Mr. Garretson, I am not sufficiently educated or a sufficient student of social conditions to enter into any further discussion of this matter with you than the direct duties of the police force of Pennsylvania.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You made the statement that the statement was made by Mr. Maurer that it was more an indictment of the constabulary, it was an indictment of the whole system of government, and I desired to know why—whether it was an indictment of our system of government or an indictment of the methods employed in administering a system of government that if properly administered might be good?

Mr. LUMB. Under the statute laws of Pennsylvania there is only one way of any government; the only right to appoint the superintendent of the police force is with the governor; he appoints him. There is only one way to elect a governor, there is only one way to elect a member of the legislature, and there is only one way to elect a sheriff and impeach him.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has it ever been whispered that the political methods in the State of Pennsylvania were faulty?

Mr. LUMB. I am not a politician, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Two of us. I have wondered if there was suspicion of bosses.

Mr. LUMB. Pardon me for making the remark that I think should be made. When a man is enlisted in this force we make no inquiry into his politics, and Maj. Groome don't know how I vote my ballot, and I don't know how the sergeants and lieutenants under me vote their ballot, and I have a general order, which I have with me, if you wish to see, that prohibits our men from belonging to any political organization or actively engaging in any political fight, and they are prohibited from making political contributions to any party.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is there an order in this city in regard to political activity of all sorts?

Mr. LUMB. I know nothing about this city.

Commissioner LENNON. Is it not a fact that nearly all the criticism against the State police originates from their work in strikes, labor troubles? I have not heard a bit of criticism of your course in all of the other duties you perform for anything else.

Mr. LUMB. Yes, sir; that is quite true; and perhaps I can throw a little light on that situation by this statement: Before the organization of the State police force the National Guards were under the fire that we are under now, and if you abolish the State police force you will see the attention of these same people directed toward the National Guards again.

Commissioner LENNON. I am not a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania and will not take any part in an attempt to abolish the force. Is it not possible that if the men in charge of the police force, when they go to a strike zone, will start giving the same attention to the representatives of the strikers as to the representatives of the employing company—certainly if that is done at all, in so far as conferring with them as to the necessary means of maintaining peace and good order, and not be on the property of one unless you divide your men and put half on the property of the other—would not merely the doing of those things be self-evident and beyond question that the police have no favoritism of any kind, shape, or description to either side in a labor controversy; wouldn't that eliminate a good deal of this?

Mr. LUMB. I would like to say in answer to your question, in the first place when the State police go into a community under those conditions they go in under the direct orders of the sheriff, and you heard the report of Capt. Thomas, which was brought down here as a specimen, and there are hundreds of others on file along with it. In that particular instance Capt. Adams reports that he had a conference with a committee of the strikers, and they came to an agreement as to that bridge, and they were to have 20 pickets. A good deal depends upon the situation where the strike exists. For instance, if there is a strike in a soft-coal region, and if you will examine the census report of 1910 as to the per cent of foreign population of Pennsylvania, particularly with reference to that region, you will find that perhaps two-thirds of the men on strike are actually foreign-born men, either Italians or from south Europe. The minute our men arrive on the scene in their uniforms they are hissed at and jeered at and usually meet with a shower of stones. To reason with them is an absolute impossibility. With reference to distributing our men, as to the assignment of property, some going on the company's property—

Commissioner LENNON. I don't think they should go on either one.

Mr. LUMB. I will try to cover that in my limited way. The men in arriving at a town go to every place providing for public accommodation in hotels and livery stables; and they find that they have been preceded by organizers, who have notified those men that if they gave the State officers their accommodations they would be boycotted forevermore and they might as well go out of business, and the condition depends upon their attitude when we arrive. We would be glad to put up in places where the accommodation is better than on barn floors, and make them eat off of tin plates and drink out of tin cups. These men are men that first had to satisfy the Army recruiting officer that they were citizens of the United States and of good moral character. I speak from 12 years' experience in the Regular Army in peace and in war.

There are two classes of men—the Army makes or breaks a man. The man that is broke is what they call "bobtailed" or discharged without honor; and if the temptations of the new life are too great and he becomes in the habit of getting intoxicated, etc., and disgraces his uniform, after five or six summary offenses he is discharged without honor and can not be reenlisted. The other class are made. They learn self-restraint and self-control and patriotism and learn love of country in the post schools, one of which I had the honor to teach in Fort McHenry, Md. The American soldier of to-day, gentlemen, is no thug; he is a pretty well-trained young man, with a good head, or he won't get through with his enlistment. If he don't come up to the grammar-school education the troop commander finds it out and details him to attend school, which is during the summer months. They may, after they first establish the fact that they are men of employment and moral character, make application to attend that school. Look at the saving in economy to take such men in preference to citizens that we have to look up through various private sources, and then have to depend upon limited observation. A man comes in with an excellent discharge as a sergeant of the Fifteenth Cavalry, and that means that he is not only learned to command himself, but others, and that he is an American citizen above all, and knows the laws to a certain extent and knows the Constitution of the United States. He is detailed for four months of special duty as policeman. He is taught the fish, game, and forestry laws, and we have had cases where they have deceived us; that the man didn't seem to take any particular interest in the study; that he thought it was going to be an easy life, and he didn't want to study any more like he had had to in the Army, so he dropped at the end of his probation period; and on the other hand, if they satisfy us of their good moral conduct they remain on the force.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is there not one qualification that you have not mentioned that is of greater importance for your purpose than anything; that the man who served as a regular soldier learned one further lesson, and that was when he received a command to fire he would obey, regardless of who stood in front, which is one of the things that the citizen soldier has not learned?

Mr. LUMB. That is true, and it is true also that the soldier has learned to shoot accurately and not to shoot the innocent man.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Just one word on behalf of the Commonwealth. Maj. Groome had to leave to make a train, and he wanted me to say that he was not in Erie——

Chairman WALSH. I took his statement for that, and it will be so taken by the commission.

Mr. LUMB. Neither he or I were in Erie.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Now, accusations have been made by Mr. Williams, of South Bethlehem. It is charged that one of the State troopers beat a man over the head and dragged him around, and so forth. Accusations have also been made by the gentleman at Erie about misconduct of troopers in Erie. Speaking for the Commonwealth, I am not satisfied to leave the matter in that shape. If those things are true, we want to know it, and you want to know it, and I submit that it is only fair that the representatives of the Commonwealth be given an opportunity to produce the troopers who were on detail at South Bethlehem and at Erie for examination before you. It is true they are scattered over the State, and we could not have them here until some day next week or possibly later. I may be permitted to say I have engagements in court every day next week, but I understand you will probably be in session for several weeks, and if your commission will fix a time when we will be permitted to present those men to you who were on the detail, or the officers who were in charge of those details at Erie and Hazleton, or any other place that you desire to inquire about, it will be our privilege to do so.

Chairman WALSH. We will have Mr. Manly confer with you, and we thank you for this opportunity, and we likewise wish to send our thanks to the governor whose message you brought us.

We will now stand adjourned until Monday morning at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, on Saturday, May 8, 1915, an adjournment was taken until Monday, May 10, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

EXHIBITS.

CUNNINGHAM EXHIBIT NO. 1.

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Harrisburg, May 4, 1915.

HON. FRANK P. WALSH,
Chairman, Commission on Industrial Relations,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I hereby certify that I have this day appointed J. E. B. Cunningham, Esq., a special deputy attorney general of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, to represent said Commonwealth, and particularly the department of State police thereof, before the Commission on Industrial Relations created by act of Congress approved August 23, 1912, entitled "An act to create a Commission on Industrial Relations," and in any State or Federal court in all matters arising out of or connected with any proceedings before said commission.

Respectfully, yours,

FRANCIS SHUNK BROWN.
Attorney General.

CUNNINGHAM EXHIBIT NO. 2.

[Office of the attorney general, Harrisburg.]

IN RE SUBPOENA COMMANDING JOHN C. GROOME, SUPERINTENDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA, TO APPEAR AND TESTIFY BEFORE THE COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS CREATED BY AN ACT OF CONGRESS APPROVED AUGUST 23, 1912.

To the HON. FRANK P. WALSH, CHAIRMAN, AND THE HONORABLE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS:

The department of State police of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania having been created by an act of assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, approved May 2, 1905, Pamphlet Laws, 361, as a part of the executive branch of the government of said Commonwealth of Pennsylvania for the purpose, as stated in said act, of preserving the peace and preventing crime within the boundaries of said Commonwealth and for the purpose of cooperating with the local authorities in detecting crime and apprehending criminals and in order to take the place, as far as possible, of police theretofore appointed under the provisions of the laws of said Commonwealth authorizing the governor thereof to commission policemen upon the application of railroad, colliery, furnace, or rolling mill corporations, the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, acting through her attorney general, respectfully denies the power and jurisdiction of the said Commission on Industrial Relations to summon and compel the attendance before it, as a witness, of the superintendent of said department of State police of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, or his deputy, and denies the power and jurisdiction of said Commission on Industrial Relations to compel said superintendent, or his deputy, to testify before it to any matters or things connected with or relating to the management, control, operations, or activities of said part of the executive branch of the government of the said Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and denies the jurisdiction and power of said Commission on Industrial Relations to compel the production before it of any reports or papers on file in said department of State police of the said Commonwealth of Pennsylvania.

Assuming, however, that the proposed examination of the superintendent of said department of State police of the said Commonwealth of Pennsylvania is for the purpose of obtaining such information with relation to the organization and operation of said department in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania as may disclose whether it has served the purpose of its creation and as may throw light upon the propriety and advisability of the creation and maintenance of similar departments by other States of the Union, the governor and attorney general of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, without waiving any of her rights, and without conceding the right of your honorable commission to compel the proposed testimony, submit the superintendent of the said department of State police for proper examination before your honorable commission, reserving the right to her legal representatives to advise the said witness that in their opinion he is not bound to answer questions propounded by or on behalf of your honorable commission at any time during the course of said examination they may deem it proper so to do.

Respectfully submitted.

FRANCIS SHUNK BROWN,
Attorney General.

GROOME EXHIBIT.

HARRISBURG, PA., June 1, 1915.

HON. FRANK P. WALSH,
Chairman Federal Commission on Industrial Relations,
645 Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: You will doubtless recall that at the time of the adjournment of your commission in Washington on May 10, 1915, you stated to Deputy Superintendent George F. Lumb, of the department of State police of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and to me as a special deputy attorney general, that we would be afforded the courtesy and privilege of an opportunity to reply to the statements made by Messrs. Maurer, Williams, and Sebald, witnesses before the commission, criticizing the conduct of members of the State police department at South Bethlehem, Pa., during the strike existing there in February, 1910, and at Erie, Pa., during the strike which occurred there in August, 1913.

It seemed to me that the most satisfactory evidence to the commission would be copies of the telegrams, letters, and reports in the files of the department of State police, which were written at the time of the occurrence and without any idea of preparing an answer to charges against or criticisms of the conduct of the members of the force.

As I understood your statement to us we were to be permitted to mail you such evidence to the end that the same might be placed upon the record of the testimony taken before your commission.

Inclosed herewith please find—

First. Copies of telegrams, letters, and reports relating to conditions at South Bethlehem, Pa., in February, 1910; and Second. Copies of telegrams, letters, and reports relating to conditions at Erie, Pa., in August, 1913.

I also herewith inclose a letter addressed to you by Maj. John C. Groome, superintendent of the department of State police, requesting that the evidence herewith inclosed be read into the testimony taken before your commission. If this plan meets with your approval I would be glad to have an acknowledgment of the receipt of these papers so that our files may be completed.

Yours, truly,

J. E. B. CUNNINGHAM,
Special Deputy Attorney General.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE,
Harrisburg, Pa., May 28, 1915.

MR. FRANK P. WALSH,
Chairman, United States Commission on Industrial Relations,
645 Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.

SIR: As requested by your commission when I appeared before it on May 8, 1915, I inclose herewith the data and reports of the operations of the State police force during the rioting at South Bethlehem in 1910 and Erie, Pa., in 1913, and respectfully request that these reports be written in the records of your commission.

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. GROOME, Superintendent.

COPIES OF LETTERS, TELEGRAMS, AND REPORTS ON FILE IN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA, RELATING TO THE CONDITIONS EXISTING AT SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA., FEBRUARY 25, 1910, AND THE DUTY PERFORMED BY THE STATE POLICE IN CONNECTION THEREWITH.

1. Telegram from Sheriff Robert Person, Northampton County, to Gov. Stuart, dated February 25, 1910.
2. Telegram from Gov. Stuart to Sheriff Robert Person, February 25, 1910.
3. Telegram from Sheriff Person to Gov. Stuart, February 25, 1910.
4. Statement of duties to be performed, signed by Robert Person, sheriff, and Capt. J. F. Robinson, February 26, 1910.
5. Report of Capt. Robinson to Supt. Groome on duty performed at South Bethlehem—arrest of Pvt. Moughan and disposition of case, June 16, 1910.
6. Report of Capt. Robinson to Supt. Groome, March 7, 1910.
7. Report of Capt. Robinson, in command, to Supt. Groome, March 10, 1910.
8. Report of Capt. Robinson, in command, to Supt. Groome, March 11, 1910.
9. Report of Capt. Robinson, in command, to Supt. Groome, March 15, 1910.
10. Report of Capt. Pitcher, commanding detachment, to superintendent, March 29, 1910.
11. Report of Capt. Robinson, commanding detachment, to superintendent, April 8, 1910.

[Copy of telegram received from sheriff of Northampton County, Pa.]

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA.,
February 25, 1910—10.55 p. m.

EDWIN S. STUART,

Governor of Pennsylvania, Harrisburg, Pa.:

It is impossible for me to handle and control the situation at South Bethlehem. It is impossible to get sufficient deputies from this community to act. Serious riots and bloodshed and shooting occurred this morning and evening.

Steel officials helped the situation by surreptitiously removing many of the men in box cars this afternoon. Works entirely suspended. It is absolutely impossible for me to protect men desiring to do necessary work. Further riot and bloodshed imminent in the morning. The whole town is in a lawless state, and I must have your help to preserve the peace, since I have exhausted all my resources. Have personally been in works several hours this afternoon and found it impossible on account of mobs to get out. I am supported in the foregoing view by the burgess and chief of police of South Bethlehem.

ROBERT PERSON,
Sheriff Northampton County.

[Copy of telegram sent to sheriff of Northampton County by the governor.]

HON. ROBERT PERSON,

Sheriff Northampton County, South Bethlehem, Pa.:

Your telegram received. There are no facts or circumstances before me indicating that the existing conditions at South Bethlehem can not be controlled by you through the proper and vigorous exercise of your high powers as sheriff. Telegraph me immediately what you have done in the way of exercising your powers as sheriff in preserving the peace of your county.

EDWIN S. STUART.

[Copy of telegram received from sheriff of Northampton County, Pa.]

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA.,
February 25, 1910—12.40 p. m.

HON. EDWIN S. STUART,

Governor of Pennsylvania, Harrisburg, Pa.:

Situation at South Bethlehem on account of strike at Bethlehem Steel Works is beyond my control. Employees of the works are mobbed and beaten both going to and coming from the works, and I am very much afraid that there will be increased violence to-night.

I would respectfully request and urge that 25 or 30 members of the State constabulary be sent us at once to assist in maintaining order, so that they will be here to-night. A large number of employees are desirous of working if they can secure adequate protection to protect men who want to work. We will have to control about 3 miles of territory, including five congested parts.

11004 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

ROBERT PERSON,
Sheriff Northampton County.

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA., February 26, 1910.

The following duties will be performed by the members of the State police while on duty in Northampton County, in consequence of the disorders attending the strike of employees of the Bethlehem Steel Co.: State police are to patrol streets and preserve order on same and prevent as far as possible all violations of the law. The State officers are to work in harmony with the sheriff and his forces.

The sheriff and his deputies will, as far as their powers and ability permit, guard the property of the Bethlehem Steel Co., the State police to do the street and road work outside the plant.

If necessary, both forces will combine and aid one another.

ROBERT PERSON,
Sheriff Northampton County.

J. F. ROBINSON,
Captain State Police.

WYOMING, PA., June 16, 1910.

The SUPERINTENDENT, DEPARTMENT STATE POLICE,
Harrisburg, Pa. -

SIR: I have the honor to report that the case of Commonwealth v. Trooper John T. Moughan, for the killing of Joseph Szambo, was concluded at Easton, Pa., yesterday, June 15, resulting in the acquittal of the defendant.

This action, as you well know, resulted from the death of Joseph Szambo at South Bethlehem on February 26, 1910, incident to rioting of strikers of the Bethlehem Steel Co. on that date, which was the date of the arrival of troopers into South Bethlehem.

On request of Sheriff Robert Person, of Northampton County, and Burgess Peysert, of South Bethlehem, which action of the latter was supplemented by resolution of council of same borough, Capt. Robinson and detail of 24 men were sent to South Bethlehem to preserve the peace. The officials named above in their request stated that, owing to action of striking employees of the Bethlehem Steel Co., they were unable to control the situation, and that the assistance of the State police was required.

Capt. Robinson and detail left Philadelphia on special train about 5 o'clock a. m. February 26, 1910, and arrived at South Bethlehem about 6 a. m. Detail was met at depot by Sheriff Person, who requested that detail proceed at once to the works of the Bethlehem Steel Co. En route from depot to these works a moderate-sized crowd congregated and followed the troopers, jeering and hooting at the State officers, their action finally reaching such a state that it was deemed necessary to arrest the ringleaders, and three of the latter were placed in custody. After reaching the steel company's works and placing the horses within the inclosure or fence surrounding the company's property a mob of upward of 2,000 people congregated, the more bold of the strikers throwing stones, bottles, and missiles of various kinds at the inclosure, and scores of others yelling and jeering and shouting epithets of an unsavory nature at the officers. Capt. Robinson attempted to talk to these strikers and trouble makers, but, owing to the noise of those jeering and hooting, was unable to make any headway in that line, and he finally warned them to desist and go to their homes. Instead of desisting in their conduct, the strikers became more bold, and it finally came to a crisis where more decisive action was necessary.

In the meantime a conference was held between Sheriff Person and Capt. Robinson, at which the former stated that he was unable to control the situation, and that he did not believe the detail of 25 State policemen then at South Bethlehem was sufficient to cope with the existing conditions. He himself had been practically a prisoner within the company's works for two days. An agreement was made whereby the sheriff and his deputies were to protect the company property, guard the gateway, and prevent assaults being made within the inclosure and the State officers were to preserve the peace on the highways, streets, alleys, etc., preventing the congregation of strikers and other persons gathered together for unlawful purposes and to safeguard any person who desired to either enter or leave the company property. At the conclusion of the conference the detail was mounted and left the company property.

Upon leaving the gate entering upon Poplar and Second Streets in South Bethlehem troopers were met with a volley of stones, bottles, etc., thrown by the strikers and sympathizers who had congregated in the immediate vicinity, numbering, as above enumerated, upward of 2,000 persons. This mob with considerable difficulty was dispersed by the detail, the strikers running in alleys and taking possession of houses other than their own in seeking refuge from the troopers.

The square embraced by Poplar, Linden, Second, and Third Streets was cleared and an effort made to keep back the mob from making an attack upon the main gate entering the company's works. At the corner of Third and Linden Streets a mob of upward of 300 had collected and refused to move. This mob had collected shortly after this thoroughfare had been cleared by the troopers. The troopers stationed in that vicinity numbered four men, and in their efforts to again clear the streets were met with open resistance. A number of shots were fired at the troopers from lower Linden Street and the vicinity of the Reading Railway tracks, and scores of rocks and bolts were thrown at the troopers.

In front of the Majestic Hotel, at the corner of Third and Linden Streets, upward of 100 persons had collected upon the steps of the hotel and on sidewalk immediately in front of same. Trooper John T. Moughan, who was stationed near that point, was endeavoring to drive them back when he was struck with a rock and nearly unhorsed. At this time two shots were fired at him presumably, shots being fired from lower Linden Street. He and Trooper Dugan rode into the crowd, and both saw a man attempting to draw a revolver. Moughan fired twice, one of the shots presumably hitting and killing Joseph Szambo, a striker, and the other bullet hit a Hungarian, making a slight wound in his cheek. During the mêlée in the vicinity of the Majestic Hotel, where Szambo was killed, six of the troopers were struck with stones, one of whom was quite seriously injured, and a dozen of the horses were hit. It is estimated that fully 20 shots were fired at the troopers, and hundreds of stones were thrown at them. Near this point the violence and the open opposition to law was so great that it was necessary to advise you by telephone for the purpose of requesting reenforcements for detail of 25 men then on duty. You sent the remainder of Troop B, consisting of 23 men, and 42 men of Troop D, under Capt. Pitcher. These reenforcements arrived in South Bethlehem during the afternoon and evening, and were entirely necessary to cope with the situation in the preservation of peace and the preserving of law and order. The town upon the arrival of the first detail of State police was practically in the hands of strikers, and mob violence ruled. The resistance to the State police was open, and was of such a nature that it exceeded the violence of any strike that has taken place within the past five years in which the State police has participated.

Shortly after the death of the striker Trooper John T. Moughan was placed under arrest on the charge of manslaughter. The trial took place at Easton during the week of June 13 and resulted in the acquittal of the trooper. The prosecution abandoned the case on June 15, after failing to show that the shooting was not justified and that mob violence did not prevail in South Bethlehem when the fatality occurred. No witnesses for the defense were heard, for, as above stated, the prosecution, after hearing about 12 witnesses, decided that the Commonwealth had no case and, with the consent and approval of Judge Scott, present judge of Northampton County, had the jury bring in a verdict of not guilty.

At the time there were on strike upward of 9,000 men, former employees of the Bethlehem Steel Co. A large majority of the strikers was composed of foreigners, and on the day of the arrival of the State police at South Bethlehem, February 26, 1910, hundreds of these strikers were drunk and maudlin and in excitable condition. They had practically been in control of South Bethlehem for several days and the overt acts committed with but slight attempts made on the part of the local police to make arrests. And to this fact, in connection with the drunken condition, I attribute the violent opposition shown to the State policemen and the score of overt acts committed on the day of the arrival of the State officers.

The members of Troop B who were in attendance at court at Easton returned to barracks at Wyoming on June 15.

Very respectfully,

J. F. ROBINSON,
Captain Troop B.

11006 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA., March 7, 1910.

The SUPERINTENDENT, DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE,
Harrisburg, Pa.

SIR: I have the honor to present report of operations of Troops B and D for the past 48 hours, as follows:

Patrols extend on highway outside of steel plant for a distance of 2 miles. Patrols are worked from 4 to 8 a. m., 11 to 1 midday, and 4 to 6.30 p. m. In addition, a regular guard is maintained over stables and quarters of troopers, the reserve being always prepared for emergency calls.

South Bethlehem police and borough officials are openly working against the State police, and they are to a large measure responsible for the continuance of feeling of animosity on part of strikers and sympathizers.

The strength of the State police on duty here is as follows: Troop B, 46 officers and men; Troop D, 40 officers and men. The two troops have a total of 93 horses on duty here, of which 9 are practically unfit for active service. None of the horses is seriously injured or disabled.

Many of the troopers have suffered with slight attacks of tonsillitis and sore throat, due mainly to work in early morning during inclement weather. None of the cases is of a serious nature.

Men and horses are comfortably quartered, the former in steel company offices and the latter in improvised stables on company property.

The territory patrolled by troopers will have to be extended, as the strikers are sending their pickets to outlying districts and this morning stopped two cars, firing on one car.

To-day upward of 4,000 men, not quite one-half of the total number formerly employed, were at work at the plant.

Very respectfully,

J. F. ROBINSON,
Captain, State Police, Commanding Detachment.

[Pennsylvania State police, Troop B.]

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA., March 10, 1910.

The SUPERINTENDENT, DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE,
Harrisburg, Pa.

SIR: I have the honor to present report of operations of Troops B and D on detached service at South Bethlehem, for the past 48 hours.

It was necessary to extend patrols morning and evening to include practically all of the residential sections of the workers so as to protect them from molestation while going to and from work. The strikers have organized a very strong band of pickets, and last night after the patrols were withdrawn from the streets several of the workmen were attacked and beaten, and three houses were stoned.

It is estimated that upward of 5,000 men are now at work at the plant, leaving about 5,000 still on strike. The indications are that the strike will be broken within the next 10 days, and until it is I am of the opinion that the present detachment of State police should remain here on duty. The deputies in the employ of the sheriff are of the usual variety, afraid and inefficient, and if the State police were to leave here to-morrow the following day there would not be a man at work through fear of attack on the part of the strikers.

The executive committee of the strikers yesterday notified all of the storekeepers in South Bethlehem not to sell anything to State policemen under penalty of boycott, and the proprietors of the stores are strictly adhering to the admonition.

Two arrests were made yesterday, one on charge of rioting, the other on charge of disorderly conduct. The defendants will be given a hearing to-day before Justice Enright.

Sergt. Smith and a deputy sheriff have been sent to Pittsville to arrest one James Bocan, a rioter who left South Bethlehem following the issuing of a warrant for his arrest.

Men and horses of detachment on service here are in good condition.

Very respectfully,

J. F. ROBINSON,
Captain Commanding State Police Detachment.

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA., March 11, 1910.

The SUPERINTENDENT, DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE,
Harrisburg, Pa.

SIR: I have the honor to present report of operations of Troops B and D on detached service at South Bethlehem for the past 24 hours.

Patrols have been extended to cover a distance of about 5 miles of streets adjoining the steel company plant and the homes of the workers. Numerous cases have been reported of intimidation and threats, and as the result we made two arrests yesterday on warrants issued upon information furnished by employees. Also rearrested one of the prisoners who escaped from the deputy sheriffs on February 26. The defendant was held for court under a thousand dollars bail on charge of rioting.

Men employed this morning total upward of 5,500.

Eight troopers are ill with slight attacks of grippe and many of the men are suffering with sore throats, due to the patrols in the early morning.

The strikers intend to parade with the women and children Saturday despite the fact that a permit for such a parade has been refused by the burgess and by the sheriff. We may experience some trouble, providing the strikers make good their threat and parade.

Very respectfully,

J. F. ROBINSON,
Captain Commanding Detachment.

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA., March 15, 1910.

The SUPERINTENDENT, DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE,
Harrisburg, Pa.

SIR: I have the honor to present report of operations for the past 24 hours of Troops B and D on detached service at South Bethlehem.

Patrols were maintained as usual. Three arrests were made for rioting, assault and battery, and carrying concealed weapons. At hearings before justices of the peace defendants were held for court.

At meeting of South Bethlehem councils last night Chief of Police Kelly was discharged, owing to neglect of his duties and his open avowal of sympathy of strikers. During the entire strike not an arrest was made by the South Bethlehem police force for disorderly conduct on part of strikers, and the removal of the chief is somewhat in the nature of a reversal of the ill feeling against the steel company and the State police.

Very respectfully,

J. F. ROBINSON,
Captain Commanding Troop B.

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA., March 29, 1910.

The SUPERINTENDENT, DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE,
Harrisburg, Pa.

SIR: I have the honor to herein present report of operations of Troops B and D on detached service at South Bethlehem, Pa., March 25 to March 29, 4 p. m.

Patrols were sent out each morning and evening while the men were going to and from work—the patrols going out at 4.30 a. m. and remaining to 7.30 a. m., and again at 4.30 p. m. and remaining to 6.30 p. m. In addition to the above a reserve detail of 10 men is kept on duty at the office building at all times.

There have been no arrests and no disorder, with the exception of last night at about 11.30 p. m., when four shots were fired at Pvt. McGrath, who was on duty outside of the office building, two of the shots hitting the office building, within about 3 feet of where Pvt. McGrath was standing. The shots came from the rear of some old buildings across the street. A diligent search was made, but could not locate anybody.

Very respectfully,

LEON PITCHER,
Captain Commanding Troop D.

11008 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

SOUTH BETHLEHEM, PA., April 8, 1910.

The SUPERINTENDENT, DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE,
Harrisburg, Pa.

SIR: I have the honor to present report of operations for the past 48 hours of Troops B and D on detached service at South Bethlehem.

Patrols were maintained as usual and no disorders occurred. Forty-four members of both troops have been subpoenaed to appear at court at Easton next week as witnesses in riot, assault and battery, and manslaughter cases.

Very respectfully,

J. F. ROBINSON,
Captain Commanding Detachment.

COPIES OF LETTERS, TELEGRAMS, AND REPORTS ON FILE IN THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE POLICE, OF THE COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA, RELATING TO THE CONDITIONS EXISTING AT ERIE, PA., AUGUST 23, 1913, AND THE DUTY PERFORMED BY THE STATE POLICE IN CONNECTION THEREWITH.

1. Report of Lieut. Thomas F. Wiechard to Supt. Groome, August 23, 1913.
2. Report of Capt. Lynn G. Adams to Supt. Groome on arrival of detachments from Troops A and D at Erie, August 24, 1913.
3. Report of Capt. Lynn G. Adams to Supt. Groome, August 31, 1913.
4. Report of Capt. Adams, commanding detachment on duty at Erie, to Supt. Groome, September 5, 1913.
5. Letter from Supt. Groome to the commanding officer, Troop A, instructing him to withdraw members of Troop A on duty at Erie, Pa., November 8, 1913.
6. Letter from Supt. Groome to Mayor W. J. Stern, Erie, Pa., informing latter of withdrawal of 20 men from duty at Erie, Pa., November 8, 1913.

ERIE, PA., August 23, 1913.

Superintendent JOHN C. GROOME, 1216 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following report of my investigation of the conditions as to law and order at Erie, Pa., where a strike of molders and foundrymen is in progress.

Arrived at Erie at 9 p. m. August 20, and visited the strike zone, and from inquiries made from men employed at the several foundries I learned that the strike was called in an effort to unionize the shops in Erie; that about 1,500 molders responded and were engaged in doing picket duty on the streets leading to the houses of the men still employed at the foundries; that the strike was inaugurated in November, 1912, and has continued since that time.

I next called on the sheriff of Erie County, arriving at his residence about 11.30 p. m., and found the sheriff in a state of nervous distress; so much so that he insisted on our conference being held in an unlighted room, and at the termination he escorted me from his residence by the rear door. The sheriff outlined the conditions to me as being absolutely beyond his control; that he had put forth every effort to handle the situation but was unable to do so; that he had advertised for deputy sheriffs and about 50 men responded to his advertisement but was able to select only 15 men of the right caliber, and some of those selected were doubtful. He told me emphatically that he was positively unable to cope with the situation; that the strikers had established a system of picketing in which violence was resorted to and in the past 10 days one man had been killed and several seriously wounded and that he was now appealing to the department of State police to assist him in putting down the disorder. At 10 a. m. on the 21st of August, I met in conference Mayor Stern of Erie, the sheriff, chief of police, and the county and city solicitors. The situation was gone over in detail, and the mayor told me that conditions had gotten so far beyond his control that he had placed the matter in the hands of the sheriff and that he (mayor) had heartily indorsed the sheriff's request for intervention by the State police. I next interviewed the secretary of the manufacturers' association, and he showed me a list of casualties and statistics substantiating the statement made by the mayor and the sheriff.

The foundries are located in two distinct sections of the city; one section on the east and one on the west side, and the territory covered by the 20 plants involved is so extensive that the Erie police and the extra deputy sheriffs, even though they were properly instructed, would be unable to handle these conditions. I would therefore recommend that a troop of State police be sent to Erie, and they are assured of absolute cooperation from the local authorities. It is my opinion that sooner or later our department would be obliged to take this matter in hand as the disorders are multiplying each day, therefore intervention by a troop at this time will doubtless save serious trouble and the mobilization of the entire squadron.

Very respectfully,

THOMAS WIECHARD, Lieutenant, State Police.

ERIE, PA., August 24, 1913.

Supt. JOHN C. GROOME,
1216 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

SIR: I have the honor to report that the detachments detailed from Troops A and D arrived Erie at 6 a. m., and were detrained successfully without more than a dozen inhabitants being aware of our presence. At 6.30 a. m. 20 men were on the streets in the affected districts doing regular patrol work, preventing the crowds from congregating and picketing, and there was no case of violence reported during the forenoon. The men on the streets were relieved by the other half of the detachment who remained on duty until 1 p. m., when they were relieved for dinner. It was not then found necessary for our men to go on duty until 4 p. m., when the men at work in the various factories begin to leave for their homes, when 20 men were detailed to patrol the streets as in the morning.

At about 4.30 p. m. a crowd of about 500 men congregated between Eleventh and Fourteenth Streets on Parade Street and refused to obey the traffic regulations, and resorted to violence, which in consequence caused the arrest of seven men, charging same with disorderly conduct. Two arrests were resisted, which necessitated the use of considerable force and the conveying of two men to the Hamot Hospital for repairs. The only injury sustained by the members of our detachment was the destruction of one summer helmet. After these arrests the crowd was dispersed, and at 7.30 there being no further necessity for our men to patrol the streets they were relieved.

Conditions on Sunday morning are very quiet, and chances of a general strike on account of our presence seems to be more and more remote as time passes.

In my next report I will inclose blue print locating the various affected factories, and a map of the method that I shall use to protect the workingmen to and from work in various parts of the city.

Very respectfully,

LYNN G. ADAMS,
Commanding Detachments A and D, Erie, Pa.

ERIE, PA., August 31, 1913.

Supt. JOHN C. GROOME,
1216 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

SIR: I have the honor to report that the situation remains quiet in Erie. I have just had a conversation with Mayor Stern, and he believes the quietness of the situation here is entirely due to our presence, and would regret very much the withdrawal of our men while conditions remain as they are, because they would probably revert to the conditions that existed before our arrival.

The suppressed spirit of unrest was demonstrated last night by the stoning of houses occupied by those who had been on strike. This matter, however, was handled by the local authorities, who are taking precautionary measures to prevent a recurrence.

Very respectfully,

LYNN G. ADAMS,
Commanding Detachments Troops A and D, Erie, Pa.

ERIE, PA., September 5, 1913.

Supt. JOHN C. GROOME,
1216 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

SIR: I have the honor to report that conditions are comparatively quiet in Erie in connection with the strike. There appears to be, however, some unrest in the ranks of the strikers inasmuch as some workmen were stoned last night at a railroad crossing on Chestnut Street, south of Twelfth, but was discontinued upon the appearance of our men. The residence of a nonunion workman was burned at 3 a. m. yesterday morning, the fire being apparently of incendiary origin.

11010 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

I am inclosing herewith copies of reports of Burns's detectives in the employ of the manufacturers' association.

Very respectfully,

LYNN G. ADAMS,
Commanding Detachments Troops A and D, Erie, Pa.

NOVEMBER 8, 1913.

Commanding Officer TROOP A, STATE POLICE,
Greensburg, Pa.

SIR: You are hereby instructed to relieve the men of your troop now on duty in Erie and order them to return to the barracks on or before Saturday, November 15.

When you leave you can turn over the command of the balance of the detail to Lieut. Wiechard of Troop D.

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. GROOME,
Superintendent.

NOVEMBER 8, 1913.

Hon. W. J. STERN,
Mayor, Erie, Pa.

SIR: The detail of State police now in Erie that was sent to your assistance August 20, after repeated requests from yourself and the sheriff, with your assurance that it was impossible for the local authorities to maintain law and order, has now been on duty in your city nearly three months, and this detail, with the assistance of your men, has been able to maintain law and order during that time, and I now feel that conditions are such that your police assisted by a small number of State police can continue to maintain law and order in the city, and I am therefore writing to notify you that I shall withdraw 20 men of the force now on duty in Erie on Saturday, November 15. I feel that the local authorities have had ample time to make arrangements that will enable them to successfully handle the situation without outside assistance; and should conditions remain as they are, I expect to withdraw the balance of the men within a short time.

Thanking you for the courtesy you have extended to the officers and men of the force and the assistance you have given us, I remain,

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. GROOME, Superintendent.

LUMB EXHIBIT.

STATEMENTS OF STRIKERS AND OTHERS GIVEN AT HEARING IN PARLOR OF THE LOUGHRAN HOTEL, HAZLETON, PA., JUNE 11, 1914.

Mr. MAURER. Your men in this district since they came here have not been acting impartial in this strike situation, between the employees of the Lehigh Traction Co. and the Lehigh Traction Co. Their conduct has been so as to favor the traction company and reflect against the employees and to harass the old employees. That they have been, on the other hand, partial and favorable to the Lehigh Traction Co. That charge I stand ready to prove.

Another charge was that they arrested men here and took them to Pottsville for trial, and they could have been tried right here. My assumption was that the purpose of taking them to Pottsville was in order to railroad them to jail.

Another was that their presence and action on the streets tended toward disorder, and that their presence was not in the interests of order but disorder, and stand ready to prove this charge.

Mr. Matti is the man who was arrested here and taken to Pottsville on a charge of disorderly conduct or attempting to incite riot. He had a trial in Pottsville and was discharged.

ANDREW MATTI, vice president, United Mine Workers, called to witness stand.

Q. What is your first name?—A. Andrew Matti.

Q. Do you hold any official position in the district?—A. A district superintendent of the ninth district, United Mine Workers.

Q. (By Mr. MAURER). What led up to your arrest?—A. On the 26th of May I went to McAdoo to attend a meeting of the local union of the United Mine Workers. Standing on the corner, I saw one of the—

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. What street were you standing on?—A. Prinn and Railroad. One of the mine workers, a brother miner got off the car, and when I seen him getting off I went to him and wanted to talk to him. He stopped. I put my hand on him and said, "Do you know these cars are unfair." He looked at me, and we started to walk and talk.

Q. But you did put your hand on him?—A. Yes. I told him that I was an official of the mine workers. While talking to him, three men came along; I know one of them, Mr. Hennig. I don't know these other two gentlemen—that is, I would know them if I would see them. I walked away with this man, and was talking quietly. Mr. Hennig walked up and said, "Don't listen to a damned fool." I says, "I know you; I know who you are." That is all that was done that night. I wasn't arrested or anything until the 28th.

Q. What time was that?—A. In the evening, between half past 5 and 6 o'clock. On the 28th of May, at 8 o'clock in the morning, I was in bed. The three gentlemen appeared again. One of the constabulary I know, Mr. Hennig. Two other gentlemen were with him. I was just getting the paper to read.

Q. Where were you then?—A. At home, Hazleton, 625 Arthur Street. They came up to me and said, "Matti, you're arrested." I says, "What for?" They says, "Never mind what for; just come along." I says, "Do you have the warrant?" They says, "Yes," and showed it to me. I says, "The name of the justice is not familiar in this city. I know them all."

Q. What was the name of the justice?—A. Freiler, I think. They took me to Pottsville. When he took me from home I come down here and asked them, "Could I get an attorney to defend me?" Hennig says, "Yes; you can, if you can get anybody." I phoned for Abner Smith, but he wasn't at home. Hennig says, "You have only five minutes' time; we are going to Pottsville." I says, "What are you going to Pottsville for?" Hennig says, "To take you to jail." He says here on the corner before we got on the train, "If you pay $10, it will cost you that anyhow," he says, "if you give me $10 I will let you go." He says "If you pay $10 to me you can go home." I says, "No, sir; I am not guilty." He says, "Now you can look for bail; you have ample time."

Q. Was Hennig alone?—A. He was with me all the time. Then when we got to Pottsville another officer took me up before the justice of the peace.

Q. (By Mr. MAURER.) Now tell about the saloon?

Mr. LUMB. Mr. Maurer, I object to your leading the witness, and request that he state his grievance in his own way.

Mr. MATTI. I am coming to the saloon later.

Q. (By Mr. MAURER). Did you go right from the train to the justice of the peace?—A. Yes, sir. I went in to the justice of the peace and I made a plea before the justice that I couldn't get my witnesses there. "Well," he says, "you have to get bail"; never told me how much the bail was in Schuylkill County. I says, "I want to see my lawyer," and he says, "It will do you no good anyhow to see him because the district attorney is on our side." "Well," I says, "he will give me a chance to get bail or something." Hennig says, "Now, you are going to jail, remember that." He says, "Now, you are going to jail, understand that." The other two gentlemen were there on the corner at a saloon.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. What saloon was this?—A. Right at the corner as you come in from the station.

Q. Which station did you go in?—A. The Pennsylvania. We came from the squire's office and went in that saloon. He set 'em up. Hennig took a whisky and the other constabulary man took a beer and one took a ginger ale.

Q. There were three of them, State police, when they arrested you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many appeared against you?—A. Hennig and another constabulary man and a man that used to be a constabulary. We came from the justice's office and were on the corner of the street. Then we went into the saloon. He set 'em up; Hennig took a whisky and I took a whisky, the other fellow took a beer, and the other fellow took a ginger ale. He (Hennig) refused to pay for the drink I took. I says, "If you don't want to pay it, I'll pay it." He says, "No, ——— you, you don't need to; I'll pay for that drink."

Q. How many of you were drinking?—A. Me and Hennig and the rest of the boys took a drink.

Q. What boys?—A. The constabularies. He says, "You come up and go to jail now." I says, "All right." He says, "Matti——"

Q. Who says?—A. Hennig. The other gentlemen were left in the hotel. He says, "Matti, do you know what I have a notion to do? I have a notion to knock your damned block off." I says, "Take that badge off, and I'll take you down the alley." He says, "Come on, you damned fool, come on." We went to the hotel and I says, "Come on, Hennig, come on in here and we will have another drink." Hennig took a drink and I took a drink; took a glass of beer apiece. I seen a fellow I knew, the bartender, and I says to him, "I'm arrested by this constabulary man; would you go my bail?" He laughed and says, "Why, sure, I will go your bail, Matti." So in the meantime Hennig walked around the bar and went behind the bar. The bartender says, "What are you doing back there; what do you want?" Hennig says, "I want to read this bill here," and he says, "I'll read it anyhow." He says to the proprietor, "If you want to go his bail, you have got to go down right away." The proprietor can't walk; he has rheumatism.

Q. What was Hennig's reason for going behind the bar?—A. I don't know. I'm not going to say anything that I don't know. He says, "You've got to go on down now," and the proprietor says, "I'll phone down to the squire and tell him that I will go his bail."

Q. That was the squire that issued the warrant?—A. Yes, sir. So when we got through talking and we had another beer I went with Hennig and he says, "Do you want to see the district attorney?" He says, "You come up to the courthouse and I will show you how close you were to jail." I went up to the courthouse and he saw the district attorney, and I talked to the district attorney after he got through with him. I says, "Where can I get a good lawyer?" He said there were several lawyers around there, but didn't mention any names. We then went back to the squire's office, and Hennig says, "If your bail is not there I'll kick the ——— out of you. Shut up," he says, and he jerked me again and took me down street to the squire's office, and when we got there the squire was there.

Q. Who furnished your bail, Mr. Matti?—A. The proprietor of the City Hotel. I says, "Pay my fare back." He says, "No; I am done with you now, but I will pay your fare in a Pullman if you want to ride."

Q. Who did pay your fare?—A. Hennig. I returned the fare when we got to Hazleton. He wanted the money back, so I gave it to him.

Q. You parted at Hazleton?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Good friends or otherwise? There was no hard feeling when you separated?—A. Certainly we did. With that many men what could I do? I didn't want my block knocked off.

Q. (By Mr. MAURIER.) Then what?—A. Then I got my hearing.

Q. When was the hearing?—A. The 26th.

Q. What day was it you were taken down that you just spoke about; I thought it was on the 28th that you were arrested? You know it was on the 26th that you touched the man on the sleeve and told him about the cars.

(Witness constantly refers to notebook.)

A. Twenty-eighth I was arrested and on the 29th I had the trial. On the 28th I was took down to Pottsville; on the 29th we had the trial. On the 29th I appeared before a squire, got my witnesses, and give my statement on the road that I did not raise any disorderly conduct and had two witnesses to swear to that. Mr. Hennig swore that I was going to knock his head in on the street, that I raised a disturbance on the street which was never done. I was discharged by the squire not guilty.

Q. (By Mr. KENNEDY.) Matti, who paid the costs?—A. I don't know. The costs were paid. So when we came home after the case went off Mr. Hennig says to me before we parted again, he says, "I'll get you yet." I says, "All right, if you want to get me. All right, if I am guilty." It was here at the station, coming back from Pottsville, on the 28th, I told Hennig, "I am going to get my witnesses ready for to-morrow." He says, "Don't you come up to McAdoo." He says, "If you do, I'll arrest you again." He says, "If you come up to McAdoo, I will have you arrested again." My lawyer says, "You go to McAdoo and get your witnesses," and I did so.

Q. (By Mr. MAUBIER.) Mr. Matti was there any officers of the Lehigh Traction Co. along with the State constabulary to Pottsville?—A. Yes. An ex-constabulary man was to Pottsville with the other two men. He followed me up to Pottsville with the other two gentlemen.

(At this point Capt. Lumb reminded Maurer that he had promised to have all the witnesses sworn.)

Matti sworn by James A. Gorman, notary public.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. Mr. Matti how many drinks did you and Hennig have together on your trip to Pottsville with him?—A. We had two whiskies apiece in that hotel while these two gentlemen were with us, and two beers apiece at the other hotel; that is, the City Hotel.

Q. What was that drink that cost 15 cents that Hennig balked about?—A. Oh, I took a drink of Overholt whisky.

Q. You changed the brand to 10-cent whisky on the second drink?—A. That's it.

W. F. WELSH, second vice president, Trolleyman's Union, sworn.

Mr. MAUBIER. Now, Mr. Welsh, Mr. Matti said something about you being by when he was arrested——

Mr. LUMB. May I suggest that these men be allowed to tell their own stories?

Mr. WELSH. On the morning of May 28 I was going up to our headquarters, which are in the Saeger Building, at the corner of Broad and Church Streets. At the corner of the intersected streets I met Mr. Matti and did not notice that there was any person with him. Matti says, "I'm arrested." And I says, "Who arrested you?" He said, "These three men here." He says, "They are going to take me to Pottsville on this 9.19 train." Evidently it was within a very few minutes of the train time, because one of the gentlemen that was with Mr. Matti kept pulling out his watch and looking at it, and he made the remark that the train was about due. Then he says, "Come on, we have to go." Matti says, "I want a little chance here." Hennig says, "The best thing you can do is to pay your fine of $10, for you know you are guilty and confessed your guilt, for ——— you, you are guilty." Then they started down street for the station. I saw the secretary of the mine workers and come up the street with him, and told him that they were taking Matti to Pottsville. That is all I know about the case.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. Did you know that Matti was under arrest when you first saw him?—A. No.

Q. They didn't have a hold of him; he wasn't handcuffed or anything like that?—A. Oh, no.

Q. Mr. Welsh, will you explain the action of the State police toward the trolleyman?—A. Well, their action from reports given me by the men who are out on strike have been simply intolerable and unbearable. They have on several occasions tried to raise disorder.

Q. When they were in uniform?—A. You don't know who the State police are; they are not in uniform. Several have been pointed out to me as being State police in plain clothes. From information received, I am led to believe that they are trying to stir up trouble.

Q. Capt. Pitcher, how many men are there in Hazleton?

Capt. PITCHER. Twelve men and 1 plain-clothes man.

Q. (By Mr. DEVERS.) Will you compel him to appear in uniform?—A. (Ignored.)

Mr. LUMB. We have had one plain-clothes man in Hazleton.

Mr. WELSH. I would say that if you have only got one man in plain clothes here, unless that is Hennig, there was no State police troopers arrested Mr. Matti.

Mr. LUMB. Private Slifer went along to Pottsville.

Mr. MAURER. I think that we will be able to show that there are more than one plain-clothes man here on duty.

NEIL J. FURRY, national committee, United Mine Workers, McAdoo, Pa., sworn.

By Mr. President KENNEDY, United Mine Workers:

Q. Mr. Furry, do you reside at McAdoo?—A. I do.

Q. Were you at Pottsville when the trial came off?—A. Yes; I was down there at Pottsville on the 29th of May.

Q. How many members of the State constabulary to your knowledge were down there that day?—A. How many members were there? There were two members there and a fellow who said he was an ex-State police, employed by the Lehigh Traction Co. There were two other fellows there, a fellow by the name of Koontz.

Q. The testimony of the State constabulary and the testimony of the gentleman who was a Lehigh Traction Co. police, did it differ in the morning?—A. Yes. The State police and the officers of the Lehigh Traction Co. differed—their testimony was somewhat different, considerable in fact. If you want to hear it I am willing to recite it.

Q. (By Mr. LUMB.) What is the idea, Mr. Kennedy?

Mr. KENNEDY. To show that their testimony was fixed-up evidence. Koontz, a witness for the State police, was fixed. He had fairly good English. I understand that he had been in this country for quite a few years. The testimony that he gave did not coincide with that of the State police. He was discharged. Both sides had submitted all the questions to him that they felt like. After dinner they recalled him to go over the testimony, and his testimony was like that of the State police. In the first place the State police testified that Andrew Matti had called them ——— of ———, skull crackers, and scabs. In the forenoon he said he didn't hear anything like that, but in the afternoon he said he did.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. Do you know where Koontz lives?—A. Koontz lives out here in Hazle Heights. Those fellows took him down to McAdoo; they know where he lives, I suppose.

Q. Do you know his first name? I would like to find him.—A. No.

Q. Did Mr. Matti have an attorney there?—A. Yes.

Q. Did he make any exceptions to this testimony?—A. Yes; some. When we were coming back I was sitting in the smoking car, and Matti came in and sat beside me. Mr. Hennig came in and made the remark to Mr. Matti that he would "get him yet." Matti says, "Well, if you get me, I will be sure and get you." Hennig said that he would make an example of Matti.

Q. Hennig said, "I'll get you yet."—A. Yes, sir. I believe when the citizens of Pennsylvania pay men to work and look after the citizens who are paying them that they shouldn't be out after any individual, and they should carry out orders.

Q. Now, you are expressing an opinion Mr. Furry, and that is not evidence.

WILLIAM FOX, chief burgess, McAdoo, Pa., sworn.

By Mr. KENNEDY:

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Steam-shovel foreman.

Q. Official position?—A. Chief burgess of McAdoo.

Q. Mr. Fox, was there a trolleyman arrested previous to the Matti case on the record?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What was the charge?—A. Well, disturbing the peace and the harmony of the borough and using unchaste language and insulting the person.

Q. What was the disposition of the case, so far as you were concerned? What was the verdict?—A. I found him guilty.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. Where was the hearing held?—A. In the borough lockup.

Q. At what time?—A. Oh, I can't say. Just after the arrest.

Q. Is it not a fact that the hearing was held on the way to the lockup?—A. No; I didn't give no hearing on the outside. I give the man a hearing, and I invited the sergeant in charge or any of the State police to come in for the hearing.

Q. Under what conditions was the man arrested?—A. When the man was arrested the crowd was so thick that I thought there was going to be a riot.

Q. Afraid of getting mobbed?—A. No; they would have to mob me first. I give him a hearing. When we were going in, down into the town, I invited three of them—the sergeant and two other men—to attend.

Q. Where were the State police at this time?—A. The State police went right along, too, and I invited them down into the hearing, and they wouldn't go.

Q. Was there reason to fear that he would be mobbed?—A. Well, its hard to say what might have occurred?

By Mr. DEVERS:

Q. Did they offer any assistance?—A. A man in my position would be crazy to refuse protection. I would resign my office before I would do it. I says to the State police, "I can handle the crowd," and did handle it and proved to them that I could handle it.

Q. You say that there was, or thought that there was, some danger for that man from the mob?—A. I didn't know; but I handled the crowd and saw three State police in it.

Q. You say there was three State constabulary men over there?

Mr. LUMB. Over where?

A. I know there was three in uniform and three in plain dress, civilian dress. Either that or I was misinformed by the sergeant in charge.

By Mr. KENNEDY:

Q. Was there any of the men in the crowd carrying guns?—A. I was informed that some men had guns in the crowd, and when I mentioned it to the sergeant he says, "Those men belong to us. They are in plain dress," and said further, "I am not going to interfere with anything you people do at all."

Q. How many in plain clothes?—A. Three.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. That was on the 6th of May, was it, Burgess?—A. Yes; that was on the 6th of May.

Q. Did you fine this man any money?—A. Yes; I fined him $10.

Q. Who paid the fine?—A. One of those parties that the sergeant represented to me as a State policeman.

Q. Who?—A. The man who paid the fine was one of the State police.

Q. Do you know what object one of the State police would have in paying a man's fine, Burgess?—A. No, sir; unless to help the Traction Co.

Q. When was the fine paid?—A. Fine was paid probably an hour later.

Q. How long was he in jail?—A. Well, after the fine was paid the troopers asked me if I would take him down, and I says, "Yes; I will take you down and assure you that nothing will happen." There was nobody at all around the lockup; they was all at the trolley car.

Q. (By Mr. MAURER.) Do you think that after the man was turned over to you that the State police were needed?

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. Do you think that there was any possibility of anything being done to the prisoner?—A. I can't say.

Q. Who arrested this man?—A. My officer.

Q. Where were the State police at that time?—A. On the car tracks, close to the sidewalk. The officer arrested him right on this corner.

Q. What did the State police do when he was arrested?—A. Went right along with the crowd.

Q. Did you hear any talk of violence?—A. No; I didn't hear anything at all.

Q. Burgess, when this man's fine was paid you accompanied him to a point where you saw two mounted State police, and then, thinking they could protect him, you turned back. Is that right?—A. Yes. I knew he wouldn't be hurt while I was with him.

Q. Now, gentlemen, you see why a State policeman paid the fine. This man had been sentenced to $10 and costs or 48 hourse in the lockup. Is that right, Burgess?—A. Yes.

Q. Yes. And the State police, knowing they could not stay the 48 hours, arranged to pay this man's fine so that he could escape with his life while they were there to protect him, just as they would have done if it had been the president of your union or any other human being.

Q. Mr. Fox, as burgess of McAdoo, what was your attitude toward the State police at McAdoo?—A. I give orders for the police to keep everybody on the move to prevent the injuring of anybody.

Q. When was that?—A. It was the same evening that Matti was arrested. This Hennig was along with a gray shirt on. He says to the officer "Why don't you go over and disperse that crowd over there?" The officer came to me and told me about it, and I says "Keep the sidewalk clear. We are not looking for trouble."

Q. What night was it that you ordered the State police to leave McAdoo?—A. The same evening. The State police and me never had no words after that, after ordering them away from McAdoo. Their advice was all right—they told me to see my lawyer.

Q. Burgess, you can tell us why the man was taken out of McAdoo for the hearing can't you?—A. No.

Q. Did our men make a request to keep the man in the lockup over night?—A. No, sir.

Q. Was any citizen of McAdoo assaulted by one of the State police?—A. Why, yes.

Q. Who was the citizen, Burgess?—A. He was a tender by the name of Philip Riley.

Q. When was this?—A. Maybe two or three weeks ago.

Q. What was he assaulted for?—A. I don't know.

Q. You just heard it?—A. Yes. I later sent for your men to come so that I could ask them about it, but they didn't come. I didn't see the assault.

Q. Were you at McAdoo the night Matti was there?—A. Yes, sir; I was there.

Q. Did he create any disturbance?—A. No; not that I saw.

STEPHEN POSTUPAK, chief of police, McAdoo, Pa., sworn.

By Mr. DEVERS:

Q. Mr. Postupak, were you at the scene when Matti was arrested?—A. Yes, sir; I was on duty that night.

Q. Did you see Matti create any trouble?—A. No, sir.

Q. As chief of police, what has been the action of the State police? Do they favor the Lehigh Traction Co. or prevent trouble?—A. Four men got after a car the night Matti was arrested and were fresh.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. What do you mean, fresh?—A. The State police went right through the crowd with a rush. One of the men says, "Here, come on, come on," and I went over. It only happened about a minute; he only held that man about one minute, and afterwards I heard that he was at Pottsville. There was 15 State constabulary troopers in that crowd at that time, and the State police troopers at Pottsville was about 75.

Q. Now, what did you see the State police do that you thought was wrong. Mr. Postupak?—A. Well, I didn't see anything that anyone should be arrested for.

Q. When was this man arrested?—A. I think it was on the 26th that this man was arrested only 20 feet from me.

Q. When was Matti arrested?—A. The State police arrested Matti the next day.

Mr. MAUBER. This is to substantiate Matti's testimony.

Q. You are a citizen of the United States are you, Chief?—A. Yes, sir.

WILLIAM GALLAGHER, sworn.

By Mr. DEVERS:

Q. Do you reside in South Side?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you state what the State police done to you over there?—A. It was about the same night that this occurred at McAdoo that I had occasion to come here to town to get a prescription filled here in Hazleton, when two of these troopers came along and I was talking to two other fellows when one of the fellows I was talking to said "Those guys are members of the State police." By that time the State police rode up and they says "What are you doing here?" We wasn't doing a thing, but they chased us away from there and went up to the station where there was two girls.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. What did they say to the girls?—A. I don't know.

Q. Did you see them speak to the girls?—A. No; but they went up pretty close to where the girls was and stopped. They must have wanted to talk to them after chasing us away.

Q. Why do you want to drag the names of women into this affair?—A. Well, those State police had no business to chase us; we wasn't doing anything.

Q. How did they chase you?—A. Well, they drove us up the road.

Q. Did they have a hold of you?—A. No.

Q. Well, how did they drive you?—A. Well, we kept moving and they kept behind us.

Q. As a matter of fact, Mr. Gallagher, you could have gone in any direction you wished to, could you not?—A. I suppose so. But what did they want to stop by those two girls for?

Q. Where were the girls?—A. They were in the trolley station. The State police might have had a date with them for all I know.

Q. Did the State police speak to them?—A. I didn't see them.

Q. As a matter of fact, these girls were where they properly belonged waiting for a trolley car, were they not?—A. Yes.

Q. And the State policemen were on the road where they properly belonged?—A. Well, what did they want to drive us for and not drive the two girls?

Q. As an American citizen, what is your object in trying to drag two decent girls into a controversy like this, when, by your own admissions, there was nothing either said or done to indicate the slightest misconduct on the part of the State police or the girls? I submit to you, gentlemen, that this line of procedure is unfair. When four or five men are gathered on the road in a time of disorder they are guilty of riot en route, and the police had a perfect right to disperse them. On what date was this?—A. On the 1st or 2d of May.

Q. Did cars run into McAdoo?—A. I don't know. Later the same evening five of us fellows were talking, and these two State police tried to chase us again. I wouldn't run and they got me between their horses. One of the State police then turned around, and whether he put his foot to me or his hand I couldn't say, but he says, "Get the hell out of here," and he pushed me clear out of the road entirely.

Q. How long were you between these horses?—A. Three or four minutes I was between these horses; I was trying to get out from between them, as I was afraid.

Q. (By Mr. DEVERS). What county was that in Mr. Gallagher?—A. Carbon County.

Q. These men were in uniform, were they?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you notice the number on their collars?—A. No, sir.

Q. These men had no business to do anything to you?—A. No, sir.

Q. No sidewalk at that point?—A. No, sir.

Q. But there were five of you together in a crowd?—A. That's all.

CHARLES MCBRIDE SWORN.

By Mr. DEVERS:

Q. What is your first name?—A. Charles McBride.

Q. Have you heard Mr. Gallagher testify?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Will you give your views of the affair?—A. There were four of us together. We thought we would wait there to take a bus back to McAdoo. Then Gallagher came along and we began to talk with him, and two State police came up and asked what we were doing there. I did not say anything that I remember of.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. You don't know whether you said anything to them or not?—A. I did not say anything. We walked over right on the public road. They rushed Gallagher across the road, and one of them says, "You won't go, won't you?" He then dragged Gallagher across the road, came back, and says, "You'd better get out of here." One fellow came right after us and made us hurry up the road. He says, "Don't let me catch you down here any more." So we went up there, or he took us up. He was on the horse and chased us.

Q. He didn't take you up; you went up that way and he followed you?—A. Yes, sir. When we came down to the station two girls were inside, looking out the window, and the two State constables were there, standing and talking to the girls.

Q. Were the State police mounted?—A. The State police were on the outside of their horses.

Q. Did they have any rights there?—A. I don't know.

Q. What do you want to drag the two girls into this for?—A. I didn't see any reason for chasing us away and leaving the girls there.

Q. You don't know why you were chased?—A. They chased us away because I thought they had a date with the girls.

Q. How many men were in your crowd?—A. There were five of us altogether. Five of us standing there talking.

Q. What is your occupation?—A. Carman. I run cars in the mine.

GORDON HARRIS, bartender-waiter, Hazleton, Pa., sworn.

By Mr. DEVERS:

Q. Harris, what is your first name?—A. Gordon Harris.

Q. What are you employed at?—A. Waiter.

Q. Have you had any trouble with the State constabulary since they are in Hazleton?—A. Why, we had an argument between Hennig and me. Hennig was saying he didn't care where he died; was also under the influence of liquor.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. What did he drink, Mr. Harris?—A. Beer. Mr. Hennig was stationed here before the other troops were stationed here in plain clothes.

Q. Did you ever see him drunk?—A. Yes; on two occasions.

Q. When?—A. About two weeks before the troop went to Freeland; it was in the latter part of April, and once before that. The bellboy took him up to bed.

Q. Who drank with him?—A. He drank alone.

Q. Who saw him drunk?—A. Bartender McAdoo knew, too, Mr. Hennig was drunk. Several weeks after the State troopers were here there were four State troopers going up this side of the street, after having trouble with Officer Roman. Smith was with them in uniform. Hennig was in citizen's clothes; I never seen him in uniform. Two men were with them; heavy-built fellows, both.

Q. Were these men in uniform?—A. Smith was in uniform. Going up the other side of the street the four of them were telling about the other officer moving. Three came down, the three in citizen's clothes. Smith continued his walk up to the Majestic Hotel. Hennig called the proprietor outside of the hotel. One of the State troopers pushed Gaughan. The State trooper said, "You seem to be pretty fresh around here." Gaughan says, "Have you any right to be here; you have no uniform on, and have no license to come in here and mistreat our customers. You have no right of coming in here and interfering with our customers." Four were going up the other side talking; a train was passing.

Q. Do you know either of the officers of the troop—the captain or the lieutenant?—A. I know Hennig.

Q. Do you know either of these gentlemen here? [Capt. Pitcher and Lieut. Mair.]—A. No.

Q. The captain or lieutenant comes here once a week to find out their conduct. Do you ever report these men's conduct? Have you ever tried to report Hennig to his superior officers?—A. I thought Hennig was the superior officer.

Q. Didn't you know which troop Hennig was from?—A. No, sir.

Q. How did you know these plain-clothes men were State police?—A. I have seen them since in uniform.

Q. Why did you not report them to headquarters?—A. I thought at the time it was the business of the proprietor to report this. At another time he was advised to arrest them. The one guy that comes in here says, "There's no one here big enough to throw me out." He went behind the bar and comes down and raps on the lunch bar. I says to them when they come back again, "We are here to see that customers are treated right." "Well, you hain't throwed us out yet, and we don't see anyone in here big enough to throw us out." They told the proprietor that we had slurred them. We weren't saying a word to them. They were deliberately looking for trouble. One guy seemed intoxicated; the dark-complexioned fellow. The evening after that—

Q. When was this?—A. About three or four weeks after they came here. They appeared in the café; I was going home. Smith and Gaughan were talking. Smith says, "Well, I guess there weren't any guys in there that were big enough to throw him out." He said, "That is a hotbed for the strikers." The two fellows who came into the café were dark fellows.

Q. Did you ever say anything to the chief Burgess of Hazleton about the conduct of these men?—A. No; no one but the proprietor.

Q. Did you ever know of anyone but yourself charging anyone more than any other person?—A. No, sir. I charged everybody the same.

Q. Did you ever charge members of this force more than any other customers?—A. No, sir. The proprietor asked me after it appeared that the State police were overcharged, and I said, "No, sir." The other waiter overcharged the State police, and he said it was a mistake and refunded the money. The proprietor inquired if it was a mistake that the State police were overcharged.

ABNEE SMITH, attorney, Hazleton, Pa., sworn

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. Mr. Smith, you have been attorney for the trolley men?—A. I have been the attorney for the men themselves, just because I know the men.

Q. Explain your opinion as to the State police.—A. Some of them are good fellows, and others are mean and act fresh.

Q. Did you ever say anything to the chief burgess of Hazleton about the State police being drunk.

Q. What have you seen them do that was wrong?—A. The first instance I believe that came to my knowledge was that Mr. Gallagher was arrested in McAdoo without any warrant being issued; was brought over in this jail and in this county.

Q. Did you see the arrest?—A. No; I didn't see the arrest.

Q. What have you seen the State police do that you object to?—A. The State police are only acting as private detectives for the traction company. It is the fellows in authority that are responsible; they act as attorneys for the traction company.

Q. How can they act as attorneys, Mr. Smith?—A. They ask questions.

Q. Who do they represent?—A. The State police act as an attorney for defendants of the traction company.

Q. Can you site a specific instance?—A. Before the squire the other night, Saturday night, he appeared and asked for the discharge of these defendants.

Q. What were they charged with?—A. One was charged with carrying a pistol.

Q. Who asked for their discharge?—A. Hennig asked this. They took Matti down to Pottsville and put him under $500 bail. I told the squire $300 would be enough bail, but Hennig made him get $500. He tells the alderman what to do.

Q. Isn't it up to the justice to fix the bail?—A. Not in every instance. They arrest men and take them away to a county seat or take them miles away. They arrested a man at Freeland and tried to railroad him to Wilkes-Barre.

Q. What are we going to do if the local justices of the peace will not hear our cases?—A. What local justices will not hear State-police cases?

Q. Mr. Moody doesn't want to try State-police cases. Mr. O'Donnell doesn't want to hear State-police cases.

[General discussion, etc.]

A. A man not a citizen was arrested last Saturday, and last Monday night Squire Charles heard the case at Lattimer. Hennig asked for the discharge and acted as an attorney for the traction company.

Q. Doesn't the traction company have an attorney of their own?—A. Yes; they had. Hennig is not neutral. I have nothing to say of any of the other men; they are gentlemen. I have nothing against them, and think their conduct ought to be neutral. I have nothing against Hennig personally; he is smart and takes a lawyer's place at a hearing. I think he ought to be neutral.

Q. Were you ever mistreated by the State police?—A. I was on the corner myself; this is the only instance, and I can prove it. A deputy jostled me, and I told him I would hit him in the eye. It took four State police to arrest Mr. Burns. I think that is too many officers to arrest any man. Burns's father is worth about thirty or forty thousand dollars. They tried to railroad him to Wilkes-Barre, and I wanted him to have a chance to get bail. Hennig came around afterwards, and Hennig says, "Well, we'll take the bail."

Q. Was Hennig in uniform?—A. No.

Q. Did you ever see Hennig in uniform?—A. No.

Q. Mr. Smith, how many men have you seen here in plain clothes?—A. Eighteen or twenty.

Q. Capt. Pitcher, tell us how many men are working here in plain clothes.

Capt. PITCHER. One; Sergt. Hennig.

Mr. SMITH. When four men goes to get one man I think that is not proper.

Mr. LUMB. For one man to arrest Mr. Burns might precipitate a fight. Mr. Burns, you are a big man physically, an official of the union, and very popular about here. If one man arrested you, your friends might be tempted to rescue you, might they not? [Burns smiled.]

Mr. SMITH. They arrested six boys—three from Latimer and three from Jeddo. In the first place they took them down to the traction company's office and gave them a drilling. Then they took them to the alderman's office. I went up and said, "I want in," and Sergt. Smith says, "No; you can't be in." Sergt. Smith didn't want anybody in. When Burns was arrested I says, "I'll go this man's bail." Hennig says, "Anyhow we'll take him to jail."

Capt. PITCHER. The boys (State police) were called scabs.

Mr. SMITH. The State police make their brags on the street, "If I hear anyone call me a scab, I am going to arrest him."

Capt. PITCHER. They have called me a "damned scab" right outside here.

Mr. SMITH. The State police are trying to do more than they should do for the traction company.

LAWRENCE BURNS SWORN.

By Mr. DEVERS:

Q. Mr. Burns, are you a citizen of Hazleton?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. (By Mr. LUMB). What is Mr. Burns's position?—A. A miner.

Q. Was any of the State constabulary at your hearing?—A. Some fellow representing the traction company.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. What was his name?—A. I don't know what his name is. He asked for bail. At that time Hennig came along and this here fellow came along and said, "Say, this fellow wants to talk with you." He says, "We want you to get bail for this fellow," and Hennig says, "I want to pay $100 for this man to appear on Monday night for a hearing." Hennig took out a book and read there about committing murder. The squire asked when that law was passed, and Hennig said, "In 1878." He said he would accept $100 bail and give me a hearing Monday night.

Q. What were you arrested for?—A. I was arrested for carrying concealed weapons, and not being a witness, and disorderly conduct. I was arrested on three different charges.

Q. When were you arrested?—A. On Saturday night.

Q. When was the hearing?—A. The hearing was on Monday night. Hennig he went in and told the company's attorney what questions to ask.

Q. Who is the attorney for the traction company that was there that night?—

A. The attorney for the traction company was Bolitski.

Q. How many State police were over at the hearing on Monday night?—

A. Quite a crowd.

Q. Were they orderly?—A. Yes; and they didn't cause any trouble.

Q. If the State police did for once behave themselves, I would like to hear of it. Were the men in uniform?—A. There was two members of the State police in uniform at the hearing.

Q. Was Hennig there in uniform?—A. Hennig was there in citizen's clothes and asked for the release on Saturday night.

Q. Hennig asked for his release?—A. Yes; Hennig did ask for the release of this man. That there case that the Lattimer fellows were arrested in, we were all together. We all had our old clothes on, and we went to the Palace. I went and got Mr. Smith for counsel for this man. A mob was ready to take the man out. I was a little late in getting Mr. Smith there, and he had to push the way to get in the door. I asked Sergt. Smith would I be able to get into that hearing. He said, "I won't let you in." I told him that I had just as much right in there as he had. Mr. Smith says "This is a private office; anyone that wants to get in here can do so."

Q. How many people were there?—A. Hundreds of people were there.

Q. Wasn't there a great deal of surging and crowding around at this time?—

A. Yes; some.

Q. When the crowd was largest, how many people were there?—A. About a hundred, at least.

Q. Were there 200?—I can't say.

Q. Now, Mr. Burns, if you had been an officer of the law at that time, would you not have tried to keep the crowd away?—A. I don't know.

Q. Don't you think that it was the proper thing to keep the office clear?—A. If you want the question answered by one word, I would say, "No." Mr. Smith, the lawyer, said, "This is a public house, and everybody can come in."

Q. Was there any disorder?—A. Everybody was peaceable.

Q. Was Mr. Smith of the State police?—A. Yes; Mr. Smith of the State police was there and Attorney Smith was there.

Q. Were the police in uniform?—A. No; they were in citizen's clothes.

Q. Were there any uniformed State police there?—A. Well, I don't know; can't say.

RALPH GIRARD, policeman, Hazleton, Pa., sworn.

By Mr. KENNEDY:

Q. Mr. Girard, you are a lieutenant officer in the city here, are you?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do you know of any trouble that occurred on the corner when the State police attempted to move the crowd?—A. When the trouble began I wasn't there; did not know at the time the trouble occurred; I wasn't there. I wasn't out on duty, and I was telephoned to to come immediately. The mayor ordered the corners cleared off, and we had them pretty well cleared off when some of the State police persisted in staying.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. Were they in uniform?—A. They had no uniforms on.

Q. Did the State police object to these orders?—A. Well, they did for a minute, but they moved.

Q. Mr. Girard, was it necessary for you to disperse the officers as well as the crowd? Don't you recognize professional courtesy between police officers?—A. We wanted to break up the crowd. A remark made by one of them shortly before that was that he would sooner see bloodshed.

Q. Who made the remark?—A. Sergt. Smith said this.

Q. What induced him to make that remark?—A. I don't know.

Q. Where was it made?—A. It was down in the police station, and he had an argument.

Q. Did you hear him make the remark?—A. He didn't mention the bloodshed, but I thought that was what he meant.

Mr. KENNEDY. You know, Mr. Lumb, a fight in Hazleton usually means bloodshed.

Mr. LUMB. Well, I have often been here and have always had the opinion that Hazleton was a pretty clean town.

JOSEPH ROMAN, policeman, Hazleton, sworn.

By Mr. DEVERS:

Q. Mr. Roman, you are a police officer in Hazleton?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you make any statement of the orders you received in regard to crowds on the corners, and when?—A. I can't bear in mind the exact date, but it was about four weeks ago. I had been given orders to come out in the day-time. Our orders were to keep the crowd moving. I had kept them moving and everything working nice. It was called to my attention that there was a crowd at the Palace Café. I had just come from that place.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. Who was with you?—A. I was alone. That was on my side of the street. I bumped up against two men in citizen's clothes; didn't know whether they were dog catchers or who they were. One of them says: "I have a perfect right to stay right here." And I says: "Move on." I was at them for five minutes before they moved. The first thing I knew Sergt. Smith come down and he grabs a hold of these fellows and says: "Come on; that fellow is looking for trouble." I didn't say a word, because he dragged them up street.

Q. Did you move them?—A. No; I saw Sergt. Smith grab a hold of these two men and take them away. The first thing I knew I saw Sergt. Smith going up with the two men.

Q. Up where?—A. He went up to the city hall and came back in a few minutes.

Q. Did you tell them your orders?—A. They knew the orders.

Q. You didn't want them on the streets, then?—A. No, sir. I, carrying out my orders, went up the road and told them kindly to remove and they moved to the Western Union telegraph station, and one says: "Well, we'll have to get them yet."

Q. Were the State police needed to handle the crowd?—A. Our superior officers sent enough men to cooperate with us.

Q. What were your orders on this occasion?—A. Our orders were to move every man in citizen's clothes along the line. I wish to state another thing that occurred just a day or two ago. Hennig came down to me and says: "Seems to me he is trying to enforce some of his own orders." I said: "As long as you are in Hazleton I've failed to see you in uniform." That same Hennig every time he sees me he tries to bite at me.

Q. He did then show an intention to cooperate?—A. I says: "We have no orders to cooperate with you; and if I see you hanging around the corners or any other place, why, I have just as much right to tell you as anyone else to move."

HENRY ROTH, engineer, Beaver Brook, Pa., sworn.

By Mr. DEVERS:

Q. What is your occupation, Mr. Roth?—A. Engineer.

Q. Where?—A. Beaver Brook.

Mr. LUMB. Is Mr. Roth one of your officials?

Mr. KENNEDY. No.

By Mr. DEVERS:

Q. Mr. Roth, were you on the streets of Hazelton one day about two weeks ago to-day?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What did you see?—A. Two men were standing across the street in citizen's clothes with two men in uniform. I saw a fellow I knew and got to asking him about his woman when a man put his hand on my shoulder and says: "I have a notion to run you fellows in." And then he says again: "I have a ——— big notion to run yous in."

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. Was the man alone?—A. No; there were two of them.

Q. Do you know their names?—A. No; one was a short fellow and the other was a pretty gabby fellow.

Q. When did this occur?—A. Two weeks ago to-night or two weeks last night; I couldn't tell for sure.

Q. What did you do?—A. I turned around and walked down the road to avoid trouble.

HARRY MURPHY, striker, Hazleton, Pa., sworn.

By Mr. DEVERS:

Q. Mr. Murphy, are you one of the striking street car men?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Are you a total abstainer?—A. I never drank in my life.

Q. Tell us what you know about the State constabulary.—A. Two weeks ago to-day I was on the other side of the crossing, standing on the corner. There was two men standing on the other corner at Fox's restaurant there. I started down the road and was going to talk to McDevitt and I hadn't a word out of my mouth when a fellow says: "What are you doing here?"

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. Was he an officer?—A. He wore a uniform.

Q. Did you notice the number on his collar?—A. No, sir.

Q. What did the officer do then?—A. He told me to beat it. I said: "I hain't interfering with anybody. I am talking about my own business." And he says: "Go ahead; beat it."

Q. What did you do?—A. I started out, and he says: "Hey, Jack, come back here. I want to talk to you." He says: "You are only a trouble maker." I says: "No; I am no trouble maker."

Q. Did he say anything else, Mr. Murphy?—A. No, sir.

Q. Who else was with you?—A. Lee Hop.

Q. Have you seen that man since in uniform?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did he say anything to you?—A. No, sir.

Q. Do you know his name?—A. I don't know their names, but have seen them talking around here on the streets.

CHRIST HOP sworn.

By Mr. DEVERS:

Mr. Hop, were you with Mr. Murphy?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Testify on.—A. Why, I was standing on the street when Mr. Murphy come down to me and says, "What do you know about those two fellows up there?" I turned around to see who the two fellows were. We then walked down toward the corner and these two fellows came along, catching up with us.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. Do you know these men?—A. No.

Q. Did any of these men follow you around the streets?—A. Not that I know of, unless it was when I didn't see them. They come up to me on the street and says, "Do you know what you are? You are a disturbance maker." Then as soon as I saw Mr. Murphy walk across the street I walked over, and they wanted to know what this was for.

WILLIAM BURNS, striker, sworn.

By Mr. DEVERS:

Q. Mr. Burns, you are one of the striking trolleyemen?—A. Yes, sir.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. What is your official capacity Mr. Burns?—A. On the grievance committee.

Q. Chairman of it?—A. No, sir.

Q. Where were you when the State troopers tried to arrest you in Free-land?—A. Saeger Building with another man, Bevans.

Q. Describe your arrest?—A. Two State police come up, one a pretty big, dark-complexioned fellow. Slifer says, "I have got a warrant for you, Burns." I says, "All right; let me see it."

Q. For what were you arrested?—A. A motorman made information against me for throwing a chew of tobacco at him, and the State police were serving the warrant.

Q. Where were you given a hearing?—A. Squire Ricketts, Wilkes-Barre, heard the case.

Q. When?—A. About the 10th of May.

Q. When?—A. I don't know whether it was before Decoration Day or after. I think it was before; I am not sure.

Q. Who served the warrant?—A. Slifer and another fellow. When I read the warrant and handed it back to him, Slifer says, "Our orders is to take him down to the traction company's office."

Q. Who gave him these orders?—A. I don't know; unless it was the traction company. I wanted to see Smith (Attorney Smith) and explain the situation to him. He says, "Call up your father." By that time there was two men went to the telephone, and I couldn't get my father right away. So Smith the attorney said he had sent a fellow up to get him.

Q. Which one of the officers had the warrant?—A. Slifer.

Q. Were you given a hearing?—A. No; Mr. Murphy went in to enter bail for court, and they said, "Our orders are to take him down to the traction office." The whole crowd jumped into me and they took me forcibly to the office. They said Smith (Abner Smith) was too ——— smart, and they were going to show him up. Hennig says, "We'll give you a square deal, Burns, we'll let you get bail." They took me then to Heidenrich's office. He wasn't in; then they went out and got another alderman by the name of Frye. At the hearing Sergt. Smith says, "$500 bail," and attorney Smith said he thought $300 was enough. Hennig says, "500 will be all right."

Q. What was the charge?—A. The charge was assault and battery.

Q. Who furnished your bail?—A. I was sitting in there and Crosby went my bail. Hennig wanted to bet me the drinks the other day that he would get a true bill against me; and then said, "Burns, I am going to get you three months at the September term of court."

Q. Was any one with Hennig?—A. No one that I seen.

Q. Did you see any State police going around without a uniform on with the exception of Hennig?—A. Yes; I saw Smith and Freeman and another fellow.

Q. Have they been officious in any way?—A. No; only I was going down the street the other day, and James McDermott, captain of the street railway police, says, "There he goes," and Smith says, "Leave him go."

Q. Did you ever see Hennig in uniform?—A. No. Hennig was here in plain clothes before the others came and was always hanging down around the office of the Lehigh Traction Co. I asked Hennig if he was a State police, and he said "No." I saw he was a liar. He made a liar out of himself.

Q. Is this man in the habit of going to the Lehigh Traction office?—A. Yes. I see him go twice a day.

Q. How many times have you seen him in there?—A. I would say 20 times.

Q. Did you not see other men in that office?—A. Yes.

Q. He said that he has seen other men, possibly Hennig, in civilian clothes around here. What were they doing?—A. These men were mingling in the crowds. Last night there were four of them.

Q. Who were they?—A. Smith, Hennig, Freeman, and another.

Q. (By Mr. MAURER). Is your case settled now?—A. No. Hennig is going to give me three months.

STEPHEN POSTUPAK, chief of police, McAdoo, recalled and sworn.

By Mr. DEVERS:

Q. Were you in McAdoo the night that Andrew Matti had the conductor arrested?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did any of the troopers put up the fine?—A. Yes; Hennig.

Q. Will you explain what happened there that night?—A. Well, I know the time Mr. Matti had the conductor arrested. Squire says, "Bail is $300." The State trooper was looking after bail at the time.

By Mr. LUMB:

Q. Where did he look?—A. I don't know.

Q. The squire let the State police tell him his duty, did he?—A. Well, Sergt. Hennig came up and says, "Here is the bail." I says, "Here, I am entitled to a dollar."

Q. Did Sergt. Hennig get a dollar from you?—A. No. The dollar was due on the commitment.

Q. Did you get your dollar?—A. No. Hennig cheated me out of it. The squire would not pay me after what Hennig said.

Q. Hennig got the bail?—A. Yes.

Q. Was this a union man?—A. He was a nonunion man.

Q. Do you know his name?—A. Walters. He was arrested the 26th of May; the same day as Matti.

PART OF STATEMENT OF ROGER DEVERS, ATTORNEY FOR PLAINTIFFS, AT TERMINATION OF HEARING.

Now, Mr. Lumb, as man to man, don't you think that we have shown you that your men have discriminated against the union and favored the traction company?

Mr. LUMB. On the face of the evidence, that appears to be the case, but this is only one side of the story. The conduct of all the plain-clothes men in Hazelton has been blamed on the State police, the only identity being that your witnesses have seen them afterwards in uniform. Mr. Maurer here is a man of superior intelligence and close observation. He met me in the governor's office, where we conversed for about 20 minutes, three days before I came here and to-day when I addressed him in this hotel he did not know me, although on both occasions I was in civilian clothes. Isn't that true Mr. Maurer?

Mr. MAURER. Yes.

Mr. DEVERS. I will say again that you have some men of character, but some of your men are not what they should be. Should your men be in the adjoining counties to Luzerne when there is no disorder in those counties?

Mr. LUMB. Not without disorder, but you must remember that our men coming here to a scene of disorder have the powers of policemen of a city of the first class throughout the State, and have a right to follow the disorder to its source, no matter in what county it may be. These men are not corporation police, as you seem to believe, but they are looking for the man that throws the brick, sets off the dynamite, or in any way violates the law. They are also fish, game, and forestry wardens. Your union denies responsibility for these disorders, and that being the case why do you object to police being present to prevent them?

Mr. DEVERS. Now, there isn't any disorder, and the local authorities say they can handle the situation without the State police.

Mr. LUMB. But the sheriff has certified to us over his signature that the situation was beyond his control, and we are here by his orders.

Mr. DEVERS. Well, if the sheriff notifies you that your men are no longer needed, will they be withdrawn?

Mr. LUMB. They certainly will, if the superintendent is satisfied that conditions are normal.

Mr. KENNEDY. Why is it that the State police never visit the offices of the union men if they want to find out who is doing the dirty work?

Mr. DEVERS. If your men would come to us, we could tell them where the dynamiting comes from, and we could give them pretty good proof that the cutting down of the poles, and other things, would get pretty near to the traction company.

Mr. LUMB. Don't you see that if one of our men, under present conditions, was to attempt to visit your meeting that he would immediately be suspected of being a gum-shoe man and coming there with ulterior motives. They have not been invited to your office, and you know as well as I that they are not welcome, although I believe that the result of this hearing will be a more cordial understanding on the part of your union men as to the motives of the State police, and we may in the future be able to cooperate to prevent disorder in cases of this kind instead of conditions being as they are.

Mr. DEVERS. Well, we have shown you what we started out to prove, and the time is coming when the State police will be exposed and the man at the head of them will have to get——. (Confusion of voices.)

LABOR CONDITIONS IN PORTO RICO.

(For exhibits under this subject see pages 11181 to 11224.)

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Wednesday May 26, 1915—9.30 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh; Commissioners Harriman, Weinstock, and O'Connell.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Martinez.

TESTIMONY OF MR. P. RIVERA MARTINEZ.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name, please?

Mr. MARTINEZ. P. Rivera Martinez.

Chairman WALSH. And where do you live?

Mr. MARTINEZ. I live in San Juan, Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. And you are a native of that place, are you?

Mr. MARTINEZ. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you have a matter to submit to this commission, I believe, with reference to industrial conditions in the island of Porto Rico?

Mr. MARTINEZ. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have it written out, Mr. Martinez?

Mr. MARTINEZ. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please read it to us?

Mr. MARTINEZ. I will be very glad to do it. Mr. Chairman and members of the commission, I am not very familiar with your language, and perhaps you will excuse me for any fault I may commit while speaking or pronouncing your language.

Hon. Chairman and members of the commission: We feel that it is a great honor for us and our brothers, as well as for the working people of Porto Rico to have the opportunity granted us by the Commission on Industrial Relations of voicing our sentiments in presence of the American people, and also of giving expression to our grievances, the grievances of the Porto Rican producer of wealth as against the several wrongs prevailing in that island, and also to point out the economic, social, and political evils which includes the state of wretchedness the people have fallen into and which justifies the said people to keep up an incessant demand for the improvement of these conditions.

Before going further in the examination of the actual conditions prevailing in the island I deem proper and convenient to refer myself to some details regarding the social and political education of the people in the past, so that the commission may become familiar as much as possible with some of the antecedents which may be very important for your judgment in our case.

The island of Porto Rico is one of the West Indies which occupies an important place as to production. It has been a possession of the Spanish monarchy for more than 400 years and has had a governmental régime such as was absurdly brutalizing in its results, and the régime of this government has been deeply rooted in Porto Rico.

From and after 1898 Porto Rico became a possession of the United States of America.

As a logical consequence of the régime the leaders of the public opinion on the island, the representatives of the people, if they could be called such, those who always held the public offices where the greatest responsibility is required, before and after the occupation of the island by the United States, have and had no other training than that which was unfortunately acquired from the monarchy, of a semimilitaristic tendency, atavic in its principles and bearing the germ of reaction in its own being.

And the reactionary education that has held sway over the island of Porto Rico as long as Spain was the mistress of our destinies is the same that dominates the island to-day, for in spite of being under the American flag for more than 16 years the men who took the Spaniards' places—in the management of the local affairs—are descendants of our first governing classes; they are as ambitious as their fathers were, and as full of social and political vices as they, and as inimical to the rights and public liberty as the most hardened military official of the monarchy could be.

If we were to hold before the commission that the condition of the working classes in Porto Rico at the present time is absolutely the same as it was 25 years ago, we certainly would not be in the right.

It is true that the conditions of the toiling classes have improved somewhat, relatively speaking, though not in proportion to the vast wealth that this same class has produced, and much less in comparison with the great improvements made by the monopolists of commerce, industry, the political power, the financial power, and the masters of privileges and franchises.

But it must be borne in mind that if any change has been noticeable in the condition of the working classes and favorable to them, this change is due solely and exclusively to the great influence of the great organized American people, and in certain instances to the influence of the administration itself, but never to any initiative on the part of our political leaders or to any beneficial action on the legislature in behalf of the wealth-producing masses of Porto Rico.

Moreover, each time we have requested that some legislation beneficial to our class and people in general be enacted into law, each time we have suggested some economic plan that was bound to bring about a change in the island, raise the material standing of our people, discourage the going out to foreign countries of the wealth which we produce, provide for the stability of small industries, ascertain the whereabouts of the wealth produced on the island, obliging the corporations to pay the Government so that it may have the money it needs to meet the expenses of its budget and establish the necessary number of schools; each time we have made demands upon our legislature for some action with a tendency to perpetuate the economic life of Porto Rico, we have been made the object of derision; they have even intended to deny us the right to petition the legislature; we were insulted in the worst manner, and the legislature even included within its records that it did not see fit to do anything through the strange suggestion of labor or any other organization alike.

The self-styled patriotic leaders in our island, the descendants of reaction, who are both influential agitators in public, and men representing the opinion in the leadership of political parties, are also the representatives of the people in the house of delegates, are some of them attorneys of the biggest corporations, of the sugar, tobacco, and coffee trusts, of the railroads and street car companies, electric power and light companies; they are also in the banks, which reap fabulous profits and live off usury; some of them are also who in a like manner grant the franchises, and consider the workingmen as being inferior and unworthy to live like persons; they are who in their political business are creating an anti-American political feeling; they are at the same time who hold the Americans responsible for this condition of wretchedness and misery by casting discredit upon the American people and their institutions. But whenever it is a question of taking their stand with the Americans they are not a mite reluctant to do so whenever it suits their purposes better.

The undertaking of bettering the conditions of the laborers in Porto Rico must be very gradual, constant, and brought about through the introduction of democratic institutions that are advanced, through the agency of the school, the wise administration of the laws and justice, the general and social education encouraged by the labor organizations, and the cooperation which the Government can offer within the limitations of its powers to the working classes.

But the task of bettering the conditions of the laboring classes in Porto Rico while the whole political power is in the hands of a group of privileged persons must be very gradual, even more so than anywhere, and we may say it is almost impossible of being carried out.

Our affirmation is justified by facts that occur on that island frequently enough, and many of which are yet quite recent. All the present generation must die off, and possibly the grandchildren of this generation, before the working classes of Porto Rico feel that a favorable change has been brought about, unless the new organic act for Porto Rico pending in Congress provides in a true manner for the education of the people, for an inflexible sanitary system, a true department of agriculture and labor, and besides the necessary guaranties, rights, and liberties of the people, and the recognition of them as citizens of the United States.

It being the purpose of this honorable Commission on Industrial Relations to ascertain and investigate the causes which keep a state of industrial unrest throughout the different States and Territories of the Union, and though we have passed lightly over certain of the political evils that have been the cause of the industrial unrest in Porto Rico, let us now very briefly establish some facts, so that the reasons ascribed to the Porto Rican worker may be all the plainer understood by you.

Upon reaching this point we are prone to make the following questions: Was there ever any such thing as a frequent industrial unrest in Porto Rico under the Spanish régime? If such was not the case, why did affairs progress in that way as they did? If any industrial unrest is now evident, why should it be so? If any industrial unrest now arises, what is the cause for the same, or which are the causes for the same?

To these questions we shall endeavor to answer in the briefest possible manner, and we shall consider only such points as in our opinion are of the greatest importance.

In the first place, we wish to assert that, in our opinion, Porto Rico can not be called a people in the true sense of that term and that with the duties and rights that this name implies and should assume that name only since the year 1900, however much it may have been a possession of Spain for more than 400 years.

Porto Rico had but too few schools; this may be proved from the fact that there were, in 1899, about 1,000,000 inhabitants, but only 26,000 children whose names appeared as having entered the schools of the island. This alone is sufficient to show that the island lagged behind in the matter of education, and also that of misunderstanding the true conception of what real social struggles are, and it also shows that the toiling masses had no ambition on that account, and public rights and liberty were most totally unknown.

At that time about 85 per cent of the population could neither read nor write, and common-school education was a privilege not within the reach of the poor, inasmuch as the monopoly of these schools was meant to attend to the needs of the sons and daughters of the rich, but not those of the poor.

The toilers were made to believe that they lived like animals, and that their mission was determined by divine fate, and that as this was to be their lot they might as well work on patiently without any other ambition than that of serving the master until his death and turn over to him the total product of his labor. And the toilers were generally converted to this belief, and accordingly not able to stand up like men and fight exploitation.

Porto Rico never knew the meaning of liberty in any shape or form. It was not permitted to speak or spread political or religious ideas, except such as the Government authorized; nor were any writings allowed that did not praise the régime of the Government, and that, too, in the only paper in existence in Porto Rico, and which was managed and controlled by the same Government.

Neither prices, salary, nor contracts existed with respect to labor. Laborers were called upon to work for what the bosses wanted to pay, and under this generous paternalism they were paid whatever the employer saw fit to give them, and in pursuance with the system (truck system) the workers were required to buy their provisions at the store of their employer for whom he worked, and this employer would give him a ticket or brass check that could only be traded in for articles at his place of business.

The Porto Rican laborer had been working century after century under these same conditions without ever giving any thought to bettering himself, in the first place, because the means by which he could have exercised self-defense were not within his reach; nor was he ever able to learn what these means were, inasmuch as he was unable to read and write; and the cause of all may be traced to the upholders of that system of education, so pernicious in its consequences. In the second place, though they had known how to read and got familiarized with these means, they would have discovered that whatever meant a protest in the form of a document was put out of the way in Porto Rico; and, then, also no one was allowed to speak, write, censure, or criticize the acts of any public employee.

These are the most fundamental motives why these industrial unrests we see wherever the modern industries have taken a foothold did not take place in Porto Rico.

The fact that the lands were not cultivated as at present also cooperated in this state of things in Porto Rico. There was not so large a population, the industries had not developed and extended themselves to public and private lands; there was not lack of work, and therefore, though being in an almost primitive state, it may be said that the laborers did not feel quite so directly the effects of the régime, because, though being considered as slaves or animals, preventing them of the privileges of speaking, protesting, of taking part in the making of the government, of exercising the right of voting or sharing in the public responsibilities, however they were permitted to subsist on, though only for the purpose of producing wealth under the best conditions.

Thus we have lived for centuries, and our history records not a protest from the laborers or an outcry of complaint against the exploitation of the adventurers which devastated the island.

But what had taken place? On May 12, 1898, quite early that morning, the guns of the squadron of American warships awoke the city of San Juan with the good news that a new era of liberty resounded in the whistling of those shells.

The war between the United States and Spain decided, in pursuance with the treaty of Paris, that Porto Rico was henceforth to be an American possession forever, and shortly after the bombardment of the city of San Juan Gen. Miles's troops took possession of the island and caused the Stars and Stripes to be raised over all the towns.

We know not why, but it is a fact that the people of Porto Rico felt and feel a sincere affection for the American people and its Government, and the music of those military bands in all the towns sounded like hymns of redemption for the people of Porto Rico, and the whole island felt an inspiration of liberty that was quickened by the powerful impulse of the American people.

Shortly before the coming of the Americans into Porto Rico, and while we were still under Spanish rule, some knowledge was gained in Porto Rico for the first time of those doctrines of labor which set forth "that all men are equal." A Spaniard had traveled to Porto Rico and came from Cuba. He was being persecuted by Gen. Weyler, Spanish governor in Cuba, for the crime of saying publicly "that all men are equal, and that nobody should live off the labor of another human being." And this doctrine was considered equally dangerous by the Spanish Government of Porto Rico, and persecution was at once brought to bear against that man and in the same spirit as it had been in Cuba. To tell the laborers of Porto Rico at that time that they were entitled to a higher standard of living, to have sufficient schools, to appoint the government by means of their votes, that they were equal to the bosses in the exercise of their human rights, the same as the enjoyment of divine rights—all of these things constituted a danger in Porto Rico for the reactionary element, and they did their level best to stifle the idea of instilling into the minds of the workers the spirit of self-defense.

With this object they imprisoned who for the first time dared to speak to us of economic liberty and political rights, and just when it was our good fortune to be bombarded by the American fleet, the man to whom I refer had been in prison for seven months. He had not been even accused; he had committed no crime; no trial had been held against him; he was simply waiting to see what action the masters of Porto Rico would take in his behalf.

Luckily, the American troops proved to be a God-send for him, and they forbade any more injustice should be imposed upon him.

A few months passed. The relations between the people of Porto Rico and the American people were established. Newspapers began to come, as also books and other literature from the States, and though the number of those who knew English was rather limited, still something was coming home to the people which was not easily forgotten and which was taken up as a sound advice from the American people.

When the civil government was established in 1900 several strikes and incidents occurred throughout the island from 1901 to 1904, precisely because those who were chosen to form the Government were the reactionaries, those whose education was a misfit, those very ones to whom the word "liberty" was something horrible, and those also who could not bear having a law that should place us all on the same level in the enjoyment of our rights and public liberties, and of those who supposed then and at present that the worker was born only to be a slave.

The necessary channels of solidarity between the American and Porto Rican workers having been established by means of this generous principle that moves the world, the man to which I refer having gotten a clear understanding of the meaning of American liberties endeavored to spread the principles of trade unionism under the auspices of the American Federation of Labor. But the Porto Rican element, which was the direct offspring of reaction, would have nothing to do with meting out anything like justice and liberty; their aim was to put in practice the same system of persecution that was exercised against us during the Spanish Government. At this time persecution was not only directed against this man, for there was a small group of men who had to put up with this same thing; they stood by him in the contest, and he was with some others thrown into prison, and the first federation of workingmen was closed; then this was taken as an example to show the people what a horrible thing a labor organization was, and persecutions under the civil government was just as fierce as it had been under the old monarchial government.

Chairman WALSH. When was that; what date was that, Mr. Martinez?

Mr. MARTINEZ. From 1901 to 1904; when the civil government was established in Porto Rico by the American Government.

But the American Government soon discovered through the American Federation of Labor and the American press what was going on, and the Federal Government itself took action. The consequences were the setting free of the men who had been thrown in prison, the federation was reopened, the laws that prohibited peaceful and legal meetings were abolished, the corrupt office holders were separated, and a new era of peace and tranquility once more settled over the island, and the necessary guarantees for the labor organizations were secured.

The people have kept on educating themselves in the principles of organized labor movement as understood in America; schools have multiplied; merchants began to arrive, and new industries were soon created; corporations began to organize themselves and take up the lands, as well as the whole bulk of the natural wealth; franchises began to be granted; business went along on the increase, and in a short time the population increased from about 1,000,000 to 1,200,000 inhabitants, and we owe it to the initiative of the American people if the island has enjoyed the wonderful prosperity that it really has, but which unhappily has been used only to emphasize on the slavery of the people, because all the wealth that is produced does not remain on the island, to go back again into the business interests of that locality; it goes out and benefits the strangers and becomes dividends on the shares of their holders.

With the increase in population, the higher valuation of the land in towns and country, with the concentration of industry and business, with the formation of the trusts and the concession of some franchises, the worst of evils have come upon the island as a direct consequence of all this. I refer most particularly to the economic evil. The organization of speculative business established in Porto Rico the same régime we find in the States and also in the financial world, and as a consequence of this the laborers began to feel the direct burden of the industrial system in many different forms. Property increased wonderfully in value after it was in the hands of the corporations. The wage system asserted itself above everything, and all the small craftsmen and landholders were grouped under the same head within the meaning of this wage system, because the corporations had gulped everything to their advantage.

Living expenses increased 40 per cent, and had gotten to be a serious problem for the destitute.

The provisions increased 40 per cent from the moment the land no longer produced vegetables and some other products and fruits, the cause of this being the utilizing of the land by the corporations for planting sugar cane and tobacco.

The increase in population, brought on through constant reproduction and very powerfully by immigration that is frequent and unlimited, produced the scarcity of work which had never been seen so much before.

The inquisitorial method of placing men on the "black list" to make them starve to death, which is characteristic of the corporations, was put into practice.

The inhabitants of the island were required to comply with new obligations and greater social compromise as a direct result of the progress that came about; from the moment a man's home had to be remodeled to suit the best conditions, from the moment his sons and himself had to wear shoes and his whole family adopt a higher plane of living, he certainly could not be seen wearing in the towns old dilapidated clothing and shoes; all these necessarily brought on a marked increase in the expense of living.

Privileges in the application of the law were so taken advantage of in Porto Rico that no wealthy delinquent has ever been sent to the jail.

The great mass of wealth producers were left to shift for themselves, no attention whatever having been paid to their needs, and the wage scale is practically now what it was when the Americans began to occupy Porto Rico.

These were the first motives and facts that gave cause for the first protests of the working people of Porto Rico, for they were beginning to educate themselves in the practices and doctrines as established by the organized workers of America, and it was quite natural for them to desire better conditions, to eat better food, to have a more cheerful home, to participate directly in the public affairs of the island, and all this gave them the inspiration to contribute their share in correcting certain social evils through the channels of proper legislation. They being prompted by the desire to make their homes more comfortable, the laborers of Porto Rico initiated the first strike. But what came of it?

Chairman WALSH. The first strike—what was the date of it?

Mr. MARTINEZ. 1901. While we have been theorizing for years on ideas, spreading the principles of unification among the workers, insisting on the creation of a powerful organization for the laborers, neither the representatives of the country who are Porto Rican, nor the members of the corporations the bulk of whom are strangers, thought that the propagation of our doctrines would constitute a menace to them; but when we decided to join to the theory the practice of the same doctrines—in other words, when we reached the point where we offered resistance and initiated strikes because the capitalists did not choose to amicably yield to our demands—then we found other latent evils that had not manifested themselves because it was not the proper time for them to come out.

As soon as the laborers asked for more wages and left their work, their tools, the fields, or the shops, when the machines were paralyzed, and everything was at a standstill, we confronted, or constituted, a danger for the society and the capitalists, as they say, because our demands to them meant an onslaught against their capital and their holdings. And the same system employed by the strength of money in other parts of the world was also carried out in Porto Rico. Men were thrown in prison, beaten and clubbed in the streets of towns and country districts. They were killed by the policemen, and brought down through terror and reduced to absolute silence. The courts proceeded in pursuance to the dictates of the capitalistic system. The promoters of the strike who had been most active were convicted, and the power of the Government helped on in whatever way it could, to bring about the defeat of the aspirations of labor, giving as a pretext that it was anxious to protect public rights and the private property against the aggression of the strikers, when everybody knows the peaceful character of the laborers of Porto Rico, and when the same workers of the island have been described, not by ourselves, in the following terms:

"Its laboring classes are a contented and productive people, strong, of good build, temperate habits, good natured, and notably free from acts of malicious violence."

Upon realizing of the fact that we could not apply the practice of our theories and aspirations through the legal and peaceful means of strikes, we have also discovered that another great evil, which is, indeed, sufficient cause for protest from the mass of the toilers, was found in the action of the Government when it prevented the laborers from exercising the right to strike, and consequently this is another cause for the industrial unrest in Porto Rico, and perhaps the most important of them all.

Some executive orders that are issued from time to time as if they were "ukases" for the purpose of hindering the free emission or exchange of thought, to discourage the propaganda of the ideas, the peaceful manifestations, or to dissolve them violently by the use of force, trampling thus upon the constitutional rights of the people and giving access, as has been the case in many times, to irreparable incidents—right here is another evil that necessarily contributes to the realization of industrial unrest in Porto Rico.

Such commands of those of hindering the progress of public meetings, or to order the orators to get off from the speaker's stand and imprisoning them arbitrarily, as has occurred quite frequently, are in themselves an outrageous illegality which the workers can not put up with, and this, too, is another cause for the industrial unrest in Porto Rico.

The treatment which the workers receive in some of the courts, the insults of the judges and prosecuting attorneys (fiscals), the inquisitorial investigations practiced by officials of the Government, the proceedings held in secrecy, relic of the antiquated monarchy, is another evil which is affecting us in Porto Rico, and which certainly does not satisfy the aspirations of the working classes, which should be entitled to the same privilege within the law granted to the bosses of the island.

We have in this manner become familiar with the social, economic, and political evils and the causes that have led to constant warfare between capital and labor. Industry has kept on its same pace through several years, and in proportion as it has made progress, this very progress has been the direct cause why more pressure has been brought to bear each day upon the worker, whether he be found in the field or the workshop.

A very large number of men from the toiling masses of Porto Rico who have devoted themselves to the study of social and economic problems, and who have been so closely in touch with the labor organizations of America, have learned more and more each day, and they are always looking ahead to learn even more and thereby bettering the conditions of the workers in the island. Thus it is that we have been able to become familiarized with other phases of the social problem which were almost unknown to us.

The sincere relations that the organized labor of America has always had with us have very powerfully influenced our social, economic, and political education. By the other hand, the school. When about 10 years had elapsed since the occupation of the island by the Americans the number of persons among the workingmen who are able to read an English paper or book has very largely increased. The press of the island, which has gone on the increase, now translate articles from the American papers. The workers, up to this date, have had 8 of 10 exponents of the public teaching of the ideas, and the best desire to cultivate the union sentiment has been felt at this time throughout all the towns of Porto Rico.

These are the means which have given us the power to know that labor-saving machinery displaces work done by hand, and these effects are easily felt. How is it that work was not scarce in Porto Rico a few years ago, at a time when there were few industries and when little business was going on? Why is it, we again ask ourselves, that work was not scarce and the people did not feel the pinch of such hard times?

The answer is quite simple. The introduction of modern machinery in the large centrals or sugar mills, in cigar and tobacco manufacturing, in the shoe shops, and wherever hand labor was used, the introduction of machinery, do we say, has thrown quite a number of working people out of employment in Porto Rico. To-day there are manufacturers who can do with 20 men the work done at a previous period with 100 men, in the sowing season, in the plowing of the ground, in the work about the plantations, machinery shops, sawmills, planing mills, sash and blind factories, railroad workshops, dredging of harbors, coffee mills, and in all lines of work which constitute in themselves the life of Porto Rico.

Then, too, the constant immigration in Porto Rico, as we stated before, is another cause why workers are more abundant.

Another great cause similar to this in its effects has been the employment of women and child labor for doing the same work that was done by men alone; and the wages paid to the women and children amount to less than one-half of that paid to a man. The Porto Rican woman is still more docile than the man; she has yet the same atavistic education of several generations; there is no law that protects her sincerely against exploitation, and as a consequence she is preferred to man whenever possible, for then capital has the opportunity of doubling its money more rapidly.

The laborers of Porto Rico being, as they are, placed in this situation, our struggles could not possibly be limited to the bettering of our conditions as men, but to work for the defense and the liberty of womanhood and childhood.

Capitalistic ambition is responsible for taking men and women and children, as if herds, into the narrow rooms of the factory and workshop; the youth would frequently get sick; they breathed no good air; there was a scarcity of light, and everybody aged rapidly; the easy life of the past was no more to be seen; there was need of rising early in the morning to go to work, oftentimes from 12 to 14 hours per day, for 30, 40, 50, 60 cents per day out in the country places, under the command of a harsh boss, and for 60, 70, 80 cents or $1, the most for 10 and 12 hours' work in the shops of the towns and cities, where no air got in. Of course, our struggles must need be directed toward another legitimate aspiration. The limit of hours that should be worked in the day and the limit of days to be worked in the week; the better sanitary conditions, whether in the shops or in the field, occupied our attention.

How were we to secure any improvement in the conditions of labor and establish, too, the necessary defense for the women and children? Our experience has recognized only two means—the action of revolution, and the action of evolution which can and must be brought into action by the legislative power of any country. We were always, as we are now, in favor of lawfulness. In whose power was it to offer these means of security and life, not only for the workers, but to the rest of the people of Porto Rico who were exposed to contract disease from a number of sickly laborers in these shops? We answer that this duty devolved upon the local Legislature of Porto Rico.

We were, besides, able to learn something else. There never had been in Porto Rico since many years any such thing as large pieces of machinery. Motor power was almost unknown. What about the railroads? A few miles of rail, that could be traveled over in no time with an insignificant engine, and accidents were seldom sustained by the workmen. But the island was apparently involved in a good deal of progress for a certain group of privileged persons. Many hundreds of miles of railroad track have been laid; the transportation service is relatively enormous; the sugar centrals have all big, modern machinery that have won the admiration of the world; electric car lines were built; several other means of transportation of production and of some other character were introduced, either operated by steam or by electricity, and accidents began to occur more and more frequently at the expense of the laborers themselves, their arms, their legs, any of their muscles, life itself, and there were a good many accidents in among the people. Thus did the workers bear along the progress of the island, and left their wives, children, and dearest ones alone in the world. And what must be done? Apply to the legislature. Provide the necessary means by the adoption of a law to protect the orphans of these soldiers of industry who fall in this battle for human progress. But our demands which were relatively insignificant were derided, and upon being derided we had no other course than that of recurring to the political action we had at our disposal, in order to obtain the protection we were entitled to in the bettering of the sanitary conditions in the workshops, to defend the lives of our fellows, and to cut down the working hours of the women and children at least. Since then our struggles in the country had to include the three aspects—the economical, the social, and the political or legislative aspect. We must also obtain the best possible legislation to defend ourselves while at work at dangerous occupations.

We had to fight for the abolition of judicial and police abusive power in our struggles.

We had to struggle against the concession of abusive franchises to exploit the people, and against the concession of privileges granted to certain parties.

We had to fight the granting of public land to private corporations and individuals for private gain, while the peasants of the island had no land on which to live or sow any crops.

We had to struggle to abolish the use of public force which was turned against us during the strikes, for this force always does the bidding of the employers.

We had to contend against the contempt we have always incurred on the part of the bosses and lords of the wealth and those who hold the monopoly of representation on the island.

When the employers saw that our strength merely consisted in the union of our will, the dues within the organizations, and in the strength which the laborer's organization of America has generously offered us, they decided to carry on a vigorous campaign against us, to break us up. They created organizations which they said were inspired by patriotic principles of regionalism, and these organizations rallied the same patriots of the island, some of which represent the Government at the legislature, in the courts, and executive power, and some of the so-called laborers' enemies of the trades-union movement.

They said we were anti-Porto Ricans and accused us to the rest of the island for maintaining a foreign organization in Porto Rico, for this is how they call the American Federation of Labor. They did all in their power to bring about intense hatred against the American Government and the American people and their institutions, because we represented for them an obstacle in their onward march to reaction, and because fortunately and in spite of our humility, the American people always gave us more credit than to the bosses of the island. And being as it is that in Porto Rico the partners, shareholders, lawyers of the corporations, political ringleaders, and some of the representatives of the Government are all one person, they have been all the time waging warfare on our organization, which we must naturally defend, this being also one among many reasons why industrial unrest is found in Porto Rico.

We being as always partial to legal means in the solution of our questions, have always applied to the Government to have our evils corrected, and in so doing we asked for no privileges, but merely for justice, but the governmental organization of Porto Rico is such, and the power which the absurd representatives wield is such that we have never, never, since some time to the date, been able to obtain redress for the injustice that has been committed against us.

The natural disgust most manifested itself when years and years went by without having gotten any recognition. It is high time that a remedy be applied to the evils we complain against after so many years of petitioning, and it would have been right that those who did some clubbing on the people be brought to account, and the public officials guilty of corruption be removed, for they are a disgrace to the American people and to the workers of the island, and not having succeeded in getting any moral satisfaction and redress from the Government, this must necessarily be another reason for the clash in dissatisfaction.

We have also been able to recently discover a fundamental reason the wealthy element claim to have in order to combat us, and it is that they are afraid of losing their positions, and that would seem most too trying for them.

We have been able to ascertain from important declarations by men of the house that these people look with horror upon the fact that a laborer's son aspires to the study of law, medicine, or to be a representative at the legislature, or enter any other liberal profession. More yet has been said; these or similar words were said in the sessions of the Legislature of Porto Rico:

"Whither are we going at this rate? These laborers are bound to assault our positions; we shall no longer have anybody to work for us in the shops or in the fields; we are unable to find any woman cook or female servants; all of them are bound they want to be lawyers, and the women want to be stenographers or office employees. These workmen vie with us in the style of their dress, they want to dress the same as we do, in a word, they want to be our equals."

It will be easily inferred from this what idea the upper class has formed of the workers, and we may well understand why they are claiming for themselves the position of the master and lord for life. Here is the reason why they make such a strong resistance against us. Hence why they have clubbed us when they have failed in defeating labor through legal means, and we must necessarily in our defense include the defense of free speech, liberty of the press, of holding peaceful meetings, for even that has been suppressed in Porto Rico to destroy the aspirations of the workers of the island.

The latest incidents that have occurred in Porto Rico justify all these statements.

The last strike in Porto Rico was brought about by the agricultural workers on the sugar-cane plantations. The maintenance of the protective tariff and destructive influence of the European war made the price of Porto Rican sugar soar in the world's market, and we naturally thought that the proper time for the workers' increase of their wages in proportion to the increase of the sugar had come, if we are to take in consideration that in the last year, and with the mere announcement that the protective tariff was to be abolished, the wages of the laborers were generally cut down in almost one-third. Accordingly, a general agitation was started in the island to increase wages and reduce the hours of labor. The commission got together in the various towns and petitioned the employers for a raise in wages, and these, as they always did, refused to come to any agreement with the men; had they done so, they would have avoided the strike. Consequently, about January 1 ultimo, the strike carried on by the agricultural workers was initiated in Bayamon, and then it spread to other towns of the island. Fortunately, the employers at Bayamon partly granted the request of the workers and promised to pay them more wages, and the Bayamon worker at last saw their conflict come to an end, no incidents having occurred there.

Other towns initiated strikes, and as soon as the sugar trust and growers association heard of this movement, which was now general, they got the authorities to turn their forces in its defense.

The Government did so, though it did not say so openly, and this was sufficient proof as may be understood from the proofs that came out afterwards. After more than 20 hours of discussion with the employers we agreed upon a signed contract or agreement with the representatives of a powerful corporation in the town of Fajardo. The workers signed it, and the representatives of the corporation, central, and the Government did the same, represented by one of the chiefs of an organization in Porto Rico called the Bureau of Labor of the Government of Porto Rico. But what came of this? The Sugar Growers' Association, which in Porto Rico is the same as the National Association of Manufacturers in the United States in its policy, held a meeting of all the sugar growers of the island. They discussed the agreement arrived at at Fajardo, and upon learning that the agreement provided for a gradual increase in wages in proportion to the price that sugar was to be sold, the growers association passed a resolution to the effect that no contract or agreement should be collectively made with the workers, complicated the situation, and they, the growers, relied upon a plan to force the workers to work for the same wages. And so it came about, two days after the signing of the contract by the Fajardo corporation, the terms of the same were violated by the representatives of the corporation.

When we applied and appealed to the Government to bind them to their agreement we were able to realize that the Government, through its Bureau of Labor, was the most active of all in bringing about the nullification of the contract, and this decision was made known by telegram to the chief of the Bureau of Labor to the workers of Farjardo, though not very clearly expressed to them.

The representatives of the sugar corporations, with the Government's knowledge of the fact, armed dozens of men with revolvers and rifles to be used in their own behalf, when there is no law in Porto Rico granting that privilege to anybody. The insular police headquarters were established out in the country, in the sugar mills, the plantations, and the same masters of the sugar mills gave food, provided horses, bed, and lodging to the insular police that is paid by the people of Porto Rico, and the whole force was at the disposal of the bosses. Why should the employers want to do away with the idea of coming to terms with the laborers? Simply to scare them into subjection, to make them go back to work under the old conditions, they were thrown out of their huts, and their household goods were turned out of doors, and they were persecuted in many ways. All public meetings were declared illegal by the police and dispersed with pistol shots and clubbing; the most peaceful meetings were disbanded by shooting; a number of five men were killed by the police in Vleguis and one in Ponce; a very considerable number of men was wounded; and the strike was weakened up just as the employers wanted it to be done, and more than 300 men were sent to jail in order to justify the brutalities of the police. Not a few families mourned the loss of some member dear to them, and desolation left an infamous stain of blood in the history of the island.

Thus is briefly stated what occurred recently. We have filed our protests against all these facts and against the onslaughts which jeopardized the rights of all men; we have protested to the governor against these things and begged them to offer the proper redress; we have insisted again on this score; we have persisted time and again and brought our grievances to the consideration of the proper authorities, those authorities which represent the American Government in Porto Rico, and we have always obtained the same answer; we were answered in the negative, and nothing more. We now have the experience of two strikes that have taken place under the administration of the actual governor of Porto Rico, the police of which have been at the disposal of the employers, who have sought every available means to persecute the workers, and we have never been able to obtain anything like justice in any case for the workingmen of Porto Rico.

As this was not sufficient to force the workers into subjection, the governor of this island, acting under the influence of the employers, issued an approbrious proclamation in pursuance of which the public peace was placed entirely into the hands of the police, so as to justify their brutalities. And the same proclamation made the statement that the laborers would not be permitted to hold parades bearing arms, when the governor should know very well that there never had been any laborers' parade bearing arms during the labor conflict in Porto Rico. He also forbade insidious meetings, when he should know there had never been any such kind of meetings in the island.

Such conflicts as these never occurred under the administration of ex-Governor George R. Colton, and yet there have been strikes in Porto Rico; but he never gave us any cause for complaint.

Now, honorable gentlemen of the commission, this is not the first instance in which we have the honor of coming before the American authorities in search of protection for the labor organizations, security for the liberty of the people, and guaranties for the American institutions which in Porto Rico are being constantly discredited, especially so by the very persons who received the greatest favors from the Government and the people of Porto Rico.

The island of Porto Rico is not now governed practically by the United States. The island is governed by the same reactionary faction to which I have been referring at the beginning of these remarks. What your representatives do in the island, what they allow to be done, is what the native and Spanish element by which they are surrounded want to be done.

The aspirations of a considerable number of the so-called "patriots" of our island consist in nothing more than asking constantly for more self-government; but this self-government they are asking for is not intended for Porto Rico, but for a group of privileged politicians. The people of Porto Rico, and I refer to the producers of wealth, have not yet, and would not have for some years to come, enough influence to steer clear of the reactionary faction which is always quite resourceful in political power and influence.

What these dear "patriots" of ours understand by self-government is to take the places of the Americans who are in the public offices; in this way all opposition would be removed, and they could see their way clear, and they would be in the position of committing all sorts of injustice against the people. They will be coming here year after year before your Congress with their same petition for more self-government, but their real motive is to obtain more public offices for themselves to do in Porto Rico as they please.

Right now all the judicial system of the island is practically in the hands of the Porto Ricans, because, excepting the attorney general and some two justices, the balance of the men in the judicial system are Porto Ricans; the whole executive system, including the insular police force, is Porto Rican; the regiment of infantry of Porto Rico is Porto Rican, and the lower house of the legislature is exclusively Porto Rican. In the upper house, or executive council, as it is called, there are four American members of it, and a majority of seven Porto Ricans. Then we have the governor, who is an American.

It may be inferred from this that we enjoy an almost absolute self-government, for which the Americans living in that island are not responsible, mainly, for the state of affairs.

The greatest harm done to the working people of Porto Rico is precisely that of granting so much of the so-called self-government to the privileged politicians of that island. The greatest harm that could be done in the future to the laborers of Porto Rico, and what would impair the credit of the American institutions in that island would be to keep on granting more of that self-government to this group of politicians, who are after these privileges only to use them against the people and act as they wish to.

As a proof of what we set forth herewith, and which has stood for many years as a living example of bitter experience, we are in a position to assert the following:

When the military government was first established under the American rule in Porto Rico the working classes were granted the benefits of a strict eight-hour law.

Wages were more adequate to the needs of the workers in the island according to the expense of living.

Absolute freedom of the speech and of the press and absolute guaranty in the exercise of all political and religious beliefs.

All sorts of public securities and respect to the organizations and their members.

Just as soon as these politicians began to enjoy the benefits of self-government in pursuance of the establishment of civil government, disturbances took place, regrettable incidents were committed, assassinations, etc.; the laborers were persecuted and their federations closed, the right of free speech or discussion and holding public meetings was suppressed, and the Porto Rican civil government itself was ordered to establish a hateful anarchical government on the island.

Then it was that the President of the United States had to intervene, and he became conscious that a more close vigilance had to be exercised with the office holders of that island.

But time flits away. The persistent demand for more self-government has again been heard, and the honorable President of the United States began to yield in favor of making appointments in the persons of some Porto Ricans; more self-government than before has been granted, and the island feels ashamed at present for what it sees and has seen.

With the amount of self-government at the disposal of our politicians at this time there have been committed against the people social crimes that were unknown to have existed before; daring onslaughts have been attempted and carried out against the aspirations of the people; the corporations have been given all the power that could be given to them to exploit the mass of laborers. The right of free speech and meeting has almost practically been abolished, and all sorts of abuse has been resorted to against the helpless workers, whose aim is to live like human beings and not like animals.

Under this actual system of self-government it was that the gravest of conspiracies has found expression, both publicly and privately against popular education. An attempt has been made to minimize the teaching of the English language in the public schools, and there has been a desire for demoralizing the teaching profession, such as trying to make the pupil hate the American methods of teaching and even to hate the American teachers. More than 200,000 children of school age have been left without school accommodation. About 300 teachers have been dropped from the teaching force because the school appropriation has been slashed and cut down last year. A measure came up before the legislature whereby the capitalists, merchants, and corporations were favored in every possible way. This had for its object paying the least possible taxes to the insular treasury, and on this account the appropriation for public education is not nearly so large now as it used to be.

In order that those who enrich themselves at the expense of the people should not pay taxes, many items figuring on the appropriation bill have been cut down, and it may be stated that these favored the poor people and public services.

The appropriation for sanitation, schools, roads, and all other items of public service have been, as I stated, to you just now, cut down.

The labor laws as passed in the legislature at different times are so faulty that they are scarcely practical. For the last eight years a compensation bill of employers' liability bill has been under consideration, but no law as yet has been enacted. The employees of the Government receiving the smallest salaries have been cut down, whereas those higher-salaried men have been left intact.

All this has been possible to do to the self-styled "patriots" when they had at their disposal sufficient self-government, and they want more self-government in the future to keep on doing as they have done.

But as the mass of the laborers of the island have not the sufficient organization, education, and political power to repel the action of these men in the management of the island, on this account the worst and least deserved punishment that can be applied to the workingmen of Porto Rico is the concession of more self-government to the representatives of a reactionary and pernicious education which would be in itself a menace to the working people of Porto Rico.

We have wished to point out, in the limit of time we have spent, some of the most important reasons that determine the industrial unrest of the island by establishing some comparison, however slight, in the development of business and industries of the past and of the present, and we are quite sure that the gentlemen who hear us will understand our reasons perfectly.

Though our mission in that country is not and never has been that of a political party, the same needs that confront us obliged us to participate with our indirect action in the fight, for we could not dispose of any other means within the law, to obtain that legislation so necessary to our own defense since this was the only course we had.

These statements which I make before the honorable commission are the same we have been making year after year, and we should be ready to repeat as long as no favorable change is brought about for the Porto Rico laborers, they who are exploited by the powerful corporations which have everything their own way on the island, and which seem to constitute in themselves the invisible government of Porto Rico.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the commission, before finishing these remarks, I only wish to add some of the remedies we have suggested in behalf of the Porto Rican laborers in order to bring about beneficial changes for them and all the people in general.

If the laboring mass of that island had sufficient organization to set down a scale of wages adequate to the needs of life and in harmony with the labor it produces, this alone would be sufficient for the island to change its condition immediately from that of wretchedness to one of prosperity for all. And it must of necessity be so because wages are the most powerful stimulus of industry, and it is the only part of the wealth that remains in the country and benefits local trade. But such is not the case, as we have not this strength, and as it shall not be with us for some years to come, the most urgent remedies we should advocate are the following:

The Congress of the United States should request and direct your commission to proceed to Porto Rico to make a full and public investigation of all the affairs of the island and to ascertain the true conditions prevailing among the people, with the instructions to make a special report to Congress of their findings, with the recommendations that same commission may deem fit.

Increase the school appropriation to such an extent that the children of school age (404,211 in 1914, and of whom but 160,766 could be admitted into the schools) may receive the benefits of a public education. After admitting these 160,766 pupils the department of education was unable to offer accommodations to the rest, and on this account only about 40 per cent of the total number who are of school age receive education in the public schools.

The lands of the people of Porto Rico under a practical and economic plan should be turned over to the peasants for them to make farms that will produce and be beneficial to all. Porto Rico is first and last an agricultural country; there is no hope, at least for the present, that large manufacturing enterprises will thrive on this island, for local conditions do not favor any undertaking of this kind.

By means of a people's bank the Government should grant to the peasants sufficient loans to obtain the necessary implements for cultivating this land, buy the animals, etc., and provide for the needs of life, until the lands produce the first crop.

Instead of allowing the banks in Porto Rico to exploit the business of loaning money at from 12 to 20 and more per cent interest, when they obtain this same money in the United States at 4 and 4½ per cent, thus keeping up a system of usury that victimizes the people of the island, it seems to us that the Government with its sound financial credit should take a large loan in the States and establish a peoples' bank from which money could be taken out at 6 per cent interest. This fact would help the poor landowners, and the island with the profits, and would create a condition such that both the profits and most of interests would remain on that island.

The island should have and maintain a department of labor with the same prestige and authority of the other departments of the Government, at the head of which loyal and intelligent men could be found cooperating with the laborers to bring about better conditions for that class; men who could enforce the necessary labor laws and promote the welfare of the working masses generally.

The Federal law of immigration should entirely apply to Porto Rico. Owing to the ambition of the employers there, they have been able to secure the immigration of any people who care to enter Porto Rico by having the Federal law amended so that it is not so drastic in regard to Porto Rico as to the United States. Porto Rico is one of the sections of the world that most needs the application of a drastic immigration law, owing to its excessive population and abundance of unemployed laborers.

There should be a special law to discourage the absentee of the wealth produced in the island, or to place certain limitations on the same, so that the island be not drained of its wealth by the ambition of these men, because if this is to go on we shall have to witness a mighty poor condition of affairs.

No more franchises should be granted except those which would prove surely to be beneficial to the people and not for the exclusive benefit of those seeking these franchises.

All the Federal laws relating to labor and beneficial in character should apply to Porto Rico through an act of the Congress of the United States.

The United States Congress, upon passing any legislation on the constitution of Porto Rico, in whatever sense this may be done, must take into account the limited amount of power, the small influence, and capacity of the laboring people, as well as the political vices, pernicious education, and bad habits of the masters, and whenever any legislation is to be brought about it should be such that the laborers be not left in the lurch and at the mercy of their masters, but, on the contrary, protected sufficiently and given the assurance that in the enjoyment of all the constitutional rights they are to enjoy the same rights as those of this country.

The possessors of capital should be obliged to pay their full share for what the Government needs for public instructions, for roads, and for improvements of the island, public sanitation, and the security of justice. And by the means which the legislature offers must be avoided the abuse of power in the courts and the use of armed men in labor disputes, be these policemen, soldiers, or private agents.

These simple rules are, in our humble opinion, the ones that could do a great deal of good for the island of Porto Rico.

Aside from all this, gentlemen of the commission, I hold that no better opinion could be gained concerning Porto Rico and the condition of the laborers than by going out there, taking a look at the dwelling houses, knowing what food the workers eat, noticing how many hours they work, learning from them directly something about their customs and habits, for however much we may strive to give you a description of the conditions of the Porto Rican laborers, we could never succeed in depicting the real situation of things in the same way you could if you but could see these things with your own eyes.

I feel certain that, in spite of all that I might have said, I have told you less than the island itself can, and the laboring class also; but a mere glance at the situation would make all these things come home to you much better.

That is the conclusion of my paper.

Chairman WALSH. We thank you for your paper. We will now hear from Mr. Iglesias as to the details and affidavits; and if there is anything further you wish to say, you will be recalled later.

Mr. Iglesias.

TESTIMONY OF MR. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Iglesias, as you have observed, we are a little limited for time, so I am not going to ask you to go through the general topics referred to by Mr. Martinez; but you may proceed with the statement more directly of some of the matters you have to present—for instance, the trouble at Visques. Is that right?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Kindly direct your attention to that.

Mr. IGLESIAS. My intention is now to prove——

Chairman WALSH. Just state the story of the strife or trouble at Visques—that is, the casualties, people hurt, what the fight was about, the number of wounded, the number arrested, the charges upon which they were arrested, the number of convictions, the appeals to the higher courts, and the final results. I am going to say this also, for the purpose of shortening time—I am going to have you make verbal statements, and then, if you have more than one affidavit, you understand, on any subject, you may give us the substance of the affidavits and then put them in the record so the whole commission can take them up when they meet.

Your full name is Santiago Iglesias?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You reside where?

Mr. IGLESIAS. San Juan, Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. And what is your business?

Mr. IGLESIAS. At this time I am organizer of the American Federation.

Chairman WALSH. The American Federation of Labor in Porto Rico?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; and president of the Free Federation of Workingmen there.

Chairman WALSH. Of the Free Federation of Workingmen?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a native of Porto Rico?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Of what country are you a native?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Spain.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you lived in Porto Rico?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Eighteen years.

Chairman WALSH. And you came there for what purpose?

Mr. IGLESIAS. I came from Cuba. I have been eight years in Cuba and came to Porto Rico in consequence of the persecution from Gen. Weyler there.

Chairman WALSH. Are you the gentleman referred to by Mr. Martinez that was in jail in Porto Rico at the time the Americans occupied it?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What was your occupation before you went there?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Carpenter.

Chairman WALSH. You are a carpenter by trade, are you?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a man of family?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; I have a wife and eight children.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you may go ahead, Mr. Iglesias.

Mr. IGLESIAS. I am going to refer to the same men referred to by Mr. Martinez that have been complained against the doings of the agents of the Government and the agents of the employers against them.

As Mr. Martinez has stated in a general way, it is almost the same complaint of the workingmen of Porto Rico, and I am going now to refer to the affidavits presented by the people there that have been injured, sworn to before notaries and judges. We brought those almost every bit of evidence from almost every town and city and country village where the police and agents of the corporations attacked our people and terrorized our people there.

More than 100 telegrams as to these matters—I notice the chairman says we have got but little time, and I will not read them at this time; but from each town since the 4th of January we received in our office in San Juan dozens and dozens of telegrams charging the local authorities and agents of the corporations of battling with the people, and attacking the people, and shooting them and terrorizing them, and to force them in that way to take the work again under the same conditions that they were previous.

I have here from Juncos, which is the first instance, a short statement, and statements of about 20 others, some of them workingmen and some of them not, the statements of fact pertaining to the last labor strike in Porto Rico.

In the city of Juncos, island of Porto Rico, and before the notary public above mentioned appeared Catalino Marrero, and there are others, I don't read the names.

Chairman WALSH. The names are given there, are they?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. All right, we will take them into consideration.

(The statement referred to and the accompanying exhibits mentioned below are printed at the end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 1.")

Mr. IGLESIAS. All of legal age and residents of said city of Juncos, under oath deposes and says, that before they went into strike they beg their patrons for better wages and more respect during working hours; that they were only paid from 40 to 50 cents for working hard from 6 o'clock in the morning to 6 o'clock in the evening; that they were bad treated by their patrons and their agents; that during working hours they were not even allowed to perform human ordinary necessities; that they were never heard, and therefore they decided to go into pacific strike to force their patrons to justify them (the laborers) in their demands for better wages, treating, respect, etc.; that the strike lasted for about 10 days; that an agreement was signed by agents of both laborers and the patrons; that they (the laborers) have fulfilled their part to the said contract; that said patrons have violated their part to said contract; that their patrons used a circular of Gov. Yager to influence us in believing that no one had right to go into strike asking for better wages and more respect, etc.

Mr. Eloy Franquis—

Chairman WALSH. Were they cigar makers?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir; they are agricultural workers.

Chairman WALSH. Agricultural workers?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Mr. Eloy Franquis, under oath, deposes and says that he is a resident of the city of Juncos, P. R.; that he is a cigar maker; that on the 1st day of February of the present year, while he was addressing pacific strikers in a place called Pueblito del Rio of the municipality of Las Piedras, Corporal J. Lopez, of the insular police of the island of Porto Rico, grabbed him down the tribune without justification; that Mr. Franquis was addressing the crowd in a correct manner; that a moment afterwards Mr. Franquis was authorized by said corporal of the insular police force of Porto Rico to continue his speech; that the police force intended to end the meeting without cause; that deponent was charged for slander before the municipal court for the municipal district of Las Piedras, P. R.; that his case was heard and the defendant, Mr. Franquis, was discharged.

Outline of Exhibits C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, L, M. They are all here in Spanish.

Chairman WALSH. They are all in Spanish?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; you can see them there—the seals and the notaries and all. Mr. Eloy Franquis, under oath, deposes and says that about the 1st day of February of the present year about 500 laborers came to him asking his cooperation to better the conditions of the working classes of the municipality of Juncos; that he acceded and went on, and from the beginning of the strike managed all affairs of same; that the conduct of the police force of the city of Juncos during the strike was very bad; that on one occasion the police told the strikers that they were not allowed to traffic along the carreteras or public roads; that the police ill treated the poor strikers; that the police intended to intimidate the pacific action of the strikers, insisting on them to go to work, or, on the contrary, they said to the strikers, they had orders to use their clubs; that on the 4th day of February a great meeting was to be held in Gurabo, a town near Juncos, and to that effect the laborers from Juncos were on their way to former; that the police, using the most libellant words ever heard, tried and consequently ended the laborers' assembly with their clubs and also firing their revolvers; that many of the assemblers were hurt by the police without justification at all; that the number of victims reached from 15 to 20; that some of the victims went to the hospital to be cured of hurts suffered by clubs of the police; that as soon as the police knew they (the laborers) had gone to the hospital tried and in effect imprisoned all of them; that they were charged by the police of different crimes before the municipal court for the municipal district of San Lorenzo, P. R., and sentenced by said court; that all of them appealed from the sentence rendered by the municipal court for the municipal district of San Lorenzo, P. R., to the higher court—that is to say, the district court for the district court of Humaco, P. R.—and the higher court discharged and freed all of them on the ground that they were innocent of the crimes imputed them; in one particular case a laborer named Pablo Rivera Nieves, a sick man, but a striker, was beaten by the police; persons of 50 years of age were also beaten.

As shown by Exhibit F, Eleuterio Mazán, was the bearer of the American flag in the assembly above referred when the police ended same; that a policeman named Julio Soto, knowing it was the national flag, broke it to pieces; that said Mazán called the attention of the police to the fact that they had broken the American flag, and the response was that the police club poor laborer and afterwards charged him with the commission of a crime; that said charge was dismissed.

As shown by affidavit No. 860, Exhibit G, authorized before the notary public, Mr. Pedro Santana, jr., Mr. Augustin Cintron, of Juncos, P. R., deposes and says that he knows perfectly well that the police force almost in the whole island of Porto Rico, and specially during the strike periods, are in the habit of living on the sugar factories or centrales, not to restore order in case of need, but for causing intimidation to the poor laborers who are working on in the centrales, trying to persuade them to not go into strike, and if they do explaining to them (to the laborers) that they are liable to be clubbed.

As shown by affidavit No. 861, Exhibit H, Mr. Lucas E. Castro, an industrial man of an excellent reputation in the city of Juncos, under oath, deposes and says that he is a resident of the city of Juncos; that he was in Juncos when the strike began; that he followed the course of all affairs in connection with same; that he can say that the conduct of the laborers on strike during the last one was an excellent one; that he saw the police ending a pacific assembly of the strikers, using their clubs and revolvers without justification at all; that on one occasion the action of the police was so hostile to the strikers that almost the whole town was compelled to close doors, etc.; that he never saw a striker make an attempt against the public power.

Exhibit I, affidavit No. 862, before the same notary, Mr. Pedro Santana, jr., Mr. Catalino Marrero, under oath, deposes and says that he is a resident of the city of Juncos, P. R.; that during the last strike the chief of police of said city, Mr. Vicente Torres Quintero, called him one day and told him to tell some laborers who were working on a plantation called "Amel" that everything was all right as far as they continued working; but otherwise, if they were willing to go into the strike, they were liable to be clubbed and imprisoned.

Affidavit No. 863, Mr. Modesto Martínez is a doctor in pharmacy, of the city of Juncos; he declared under oath that the conduct of the strikers in February this year was an excellent one; that they simply left their work to beg for better wages and better treatment; that he saw the police on one occasion clubbing the poor laborers that went on strike.—Exhibit J.

Exhibits K. L. M refers to same thing above mentioned, and affidavits were taken in order to make evidence corroborative.

Exhibits N, O, P, and Q, affidavits from 867 to 870 before the notary public above referred, Mr. Pedro Santana, jr., indicate the following: That deponents Luis Sanchez Ocana, Juan Roman, Jose Maria Pereira, Juan Rivera are all neighbors of the city of Juncos, P. R.; that they are all well acquainted with the last strike of February of this year; that the conduct of the strikers was of a high order; that assemblies of the strikers were ended by the insular police without justification at all; that strikers were clubbed in the streets, intimidated by the insular police, and told to go to work in order to prevent being clubbed and imprisoned; that the strikers never attempted against the public authorities, and always had faith in their leaders' work. "In a general way we can say that the constitutional rights of the strikers were violated by the insular police of the island of Porto Rico, and this permitted to be done under the flag of Stars and Stripes."

A better idea of what really happened during the last strike in Porto Rico can be obtained reading carefully all of the affidavits authorized before the notaries public of the island of Porto Rico.

Here is one from Humacao, Porto Rico. It is an affidavit to demonstrate how the police are conducting themselves.

Chairman WALSH. Does that refer to any of the occurrences that grew out of the fight at Vieques?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You are on that subject now?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; it is all through the island of Porto Rico; almost the same thing.

Chairman WALSH. I was trying to get my mind on two things, the fight on the island, which I understand is about 10 miles from San Juan.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Oh, you refer to this of Vieques?

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead and read that affidavit in your own way.

Mr. IGLESIAS. We will read this; I am going town by town.

Chairman WALSH. All right.

Mr. IGLESIAS. The above strike's case was heard before the Hon. Cuevas Zequeira, judge of the district court for the judicial district of Humacao, P. R.

Tomas Martinez was charged for the crime of assault and battery in the person of Evaristo Berrios, corporal of the insular police force of the island of Porto Rico.

The district attorney for the people, Mr. Jose Hernandez Usera, introduced witnesses to prove his case, consisting of several policemen.

The defense also introduced his to prove Tomas Martinez was innocent of the charges filed against him.

After both parties were heard, the honorable judge of the court, Mr. Cuevas Zequeira, among other words, said:

"I think that the proofs introduced by the district attorney in this case have been weak; that the policemen who have testified in this trial, some of them, fell in very important contradictions."

The honorable judge, calling Mr. Berrios, told him: "Mr. Berrios, you are a corporal of the insular police force of Porto Rico; according to the testimony you are a perjurer. This court have faculties according to the last laws passed by the Legislature of Porto Rico to punish you for your conduct. The court hopes that you will never conduct as you have done to-day before this court. You may go now."

The district court of Humacao, after considering all the circumstances connected with this case, discharged the defendant.

I want to refer for a moment to the Juncos matter and to petitions sent to the governor for relief and redress, and the only answer they received was a little telegram, as follows:

SAN JUAN, PORTO RICO,
February 30, 1915.

ELOY FRANQUIS, Juncos:

Your telegram received. Has been endorsed to chief of police for investigation. Matter relates to it.

M. A. MUNOZ, Secretary to Governor.

The Central Labor Union of San Juan and the State Federation sent letters to the governor requesting, about the Juncos matter, to send help to our people, and the same kind of a reply was received. It is as follows:

SAN JUAN, PORTO RICO,
February 9, 1915.

SIR: Pursuant to instructions from the governor, I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 6th inst., along with which you transmitted a communication relative to the agriculturists' strike at Juncos, and I desire to state in answer to the same that this matter has been referred to the attorney general, to be duly taken into consideration by him.

Respectfully,

MIGUEL A. MUÑOZ,
Secretary to the Governor.

Mr. RAFAEL ALONSO,
Secty. F. F. of W. of P. R., San Juan, Porto Rico.

Of course, the said petitions were never heard of again.

Chairman WALSH. That is all you heard of them?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. I want to state that the police have been, at the start of the strike, charged that the force was not very strong in handling the striking. Such was the statement made by the employers, and consequently the request to the governor that the police take more care of the strikers, because their position was very easy to their interest, and asked for 200 more police in order to protect the interests of the employers. Now, the misprotection of the interests of the employers we will see about a little later.

Now comes the case of Vieques. All these happenings occurred in just 10 or 12 days. The same proceedings that took place in Juncos were repeated again all through the island.

Chairman WALSH. Now you are talking about Vieques?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Where they had an occurrence—this refers to one occurrence in Vieques?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And the trouble lasted 10 or 12 days and extended all over the island?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you are attempting to portray to us the general conditions at each one of those places while that disturbance lasted?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, as to Vieques.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, you know the island of Vieques is a little possession adjacent to the island of Porto Rico and has about 10,000 or 11,000 population. It has five corporations of sugar interests there who practically control the whole island. It is separate about 9 miles from the mainland.

Chairman WALSH. From the main island?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. The first news from Vieques came through the reports from the police to the governor. Nobody directly knew what happened in Vieques until four days after it happened, so far as the laboring people were concerned. The press only published the accounts and news that the governor's office afforded to the press. Consequently the press was censored even as to the telegrams sent from the island.

Chairman WALSH. Even the press could not receive the news from the island for three or four days?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No.

Chairman WALSH. So you did not know the condition there until three or four days after the occurrence was over?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you then gathered that from the report of the police at Vieques to the Governor of Porto Rico?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. Then we sent a commission from San Juan to ascertain.

Chairman WALSH. A commission of what?

Mr. IGLESIAS. A labor commission.

Chairman WALSH. Selected by the organization?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; by the federation, with a lawyer. And this commission made a report to us. This report is signed and sworn to before a notary by ex-special district attorney of Porto Rico, who had been engaged in work by the department of justice.

Chairman WALSH. Was he your attorney?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And he was the one who went down to make this investigation with the commission?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And the report is made and sworn to by him?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. You will see from the report that it is not made in favor of the workingmen at all.

"SAN JUAN, PORTO RICO, March 30, 1915.

"MR. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

"General organizer of the American Federation of Labor,

"San Juan, Porto Rico.

"DEAR SIR: After going to the isle of Vieques for a second time at your suggestion and for the purpose of appearing in behalf of the accused during the strike that occurred there recently, gathering up my impressions and investigating matters thoroughly relative to this strike, I take the pleasure of transmitting to you herewith in the most impartial manner what I have found abnormal in the proceedings of this case as well as my personal opinion relative to the legal methods we should adopt for getting up proofs of the facts that have been so misunderstood in the press.

"In the first place, upon arriving at Vieques I called personally at the municipal court there which had intervened in the substantiation of the strike cases that interested us, and I was able to see a series of documents of appeals in sufficient number that had been presented by the same interested parties who had taken this course against decisions rendered by that court on March the 10th, 11th, and 12th inst. With the exception of six or seven among seventy appeals, more or less, all the rest had been rejected by the court on the ground that two days had elapsed, in the opinion of the judge, before the said appeals could be filed.

"I put forth all my persuasive powers to conciliate the municipal judge of that court and make him change his mistaken opinion of this matter. I produced, under my signature, and as the representative of all the sentenced persons I had been able to consult in prison, all the appeals that had been rejected on the fifteen inst., or in other words, within the five days which, in my humble opinion the law allowed, which limit was granted for filing the appeal, but it was of no avail; this privilege was denied to me for the above reasons as alleged by the judge.

"Shortly after my arrival at San Juan I established the extraordinary mandamus recourse presented by myself before the honorable court of Humacao District, which had immediately dictated the said document-peremptorial auto-ordering the appeals to be admitted, which was carried out later because the fiscal later acceded to my petition.

"At the time I was discussing with the municipal judge whether he ought or ought not to admit those appeals on the occasion of my first visit to Vieques, after investigating all the sentences in the possession of the warden of Vieques prison and which were a part of the expedients to each of the accused, I was surprised to realize that on the 16th day, or in other terms, one day after denying me the privilege of filing my appeals, the municipal judge transmitted a communication dated the 16th, ruling the sentences as erroneous and which as writs of imprisonment applied to the expedients and accordingly the said communication accompanied new orders amending the preceding sentence, but which in spite of having been sent on the 16th were dated the 10th, 11th, and 12th days of March inst.

"As this has been brought to bear without any intervention of any kind, not in presence of the accused and aside from the time limit prescribed under the law for filing all appeals, I understood that this amounted to a new sentence, and I once more established a recourse for appeal against all sentences thus amended, which has not been necessary for me to do owing to the provable effect of the mandamus filed at the proper time and legally recognized."

Chairman WALSH. Let me see if I can not shorten that up and also understand it a little better. Now when he went out there the judge told him that his view of the law was that two days having elapsed, these men were not entitled to have their cases reviewed on appeal?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And then did he come back to Porto Rico?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No; he remained there.

Chairman WALSH. He remained there?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And subsequently—his contention was that he had five days within which to file his appeal, and when he came to getting the papers again he found the judge had dated the time of the conviction back to the 10th?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Or other days; is that correct?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. So on the face of the record, it would appear that more than five days had elapsed?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. In other words, if his contention is true, the lower magistrate falsified the record as to the date of trial?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; as to the dates given new orders, to amending the sentences.

Chairman WALSH. Now, to what court did he have his appeal?

Mr. IGLESIAS. To the district court.

Chairman WALSH. In Porto Rico?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Or on this smaller island?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No; on the main island.

Chairman WALSH. Now, let me shorten this a little. Then he applied for a writ of mandamus to the court of Porto Rico?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. To compel them to send up the record of that case?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, was the record finally sent up?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many men were involved in this appeal?

Mr. IGLESIAS. About 75 or 100.

Chairman WALSH. And were they all workers?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Were any of them employers or bosses?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Or any of them police officials?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. They were all workingmen?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, did he succeed in having their cases brought up to the upper court?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. First, what was their punishment before the lower judge or magistrate?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Six months and $200 fine.

Chairman WALSH. Each got six months in jail and $200 fine?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what did the superior court of Porto Rico do with these cases?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, several of them—about a third—have been discharged and some of the others put at 90 days.

Chairman WALSH. About a third of them were discharged?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, after it got up to the upper court, was it retried or, that is, did they hear evidence again, or was it heard just on the record?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No; new—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). A new trial?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. In the superior court?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many judges?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Just one judge.

Chairman WALSH. And was there any further appeal for the one-third that were convicted and got 90 days?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Went to a still higher court?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And have they been discharged?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No.

Chairman WALSH. So the result was that the upper court sustained your lawyer and said these men did have a right to appeal?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The upper judge discharged two-thirds of them?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And found one-third of them guilty and gave them 90 days in jail?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you have appealed those cases to the court of appeals?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And it is still pending?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And undecided?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, if that does not cover all the points, you may read.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Oh, yes; there are other points—

Chairman WALSH. What other points do you want to cover?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Oh, many. I request you to be heard.

Chairman WALSH. Well, you understand we are seeking to gain time, and if I have stated that correctly, we will assume that they are proven by your affidavits—that is, so far as your side of it is concerned.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That is right, is it [addressing Commissioner Weinstock]? Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, if there are any points not covered by my statement, you may read.

Mr. IGLESIAS. There is another point, you will find.

Chairman WALSH. All right. I want to give you your own way to do it, so far as I can, Mr. Iglesias, consistent with getting through.

Mr. IGLESIAS (reading). "After making an investigation of the legal proceedings against the several prisoners I was able to gather that some of them, about five or six, had been thrown into prison pursuant to peremptory orders of imprisonment issued by the humacao fiscal"—humacao fiscal is the district court, the higher court of Vieques—[continues reading] "to answer to the charge of attempt to commit assassination, under date of February 17, 1915. On February 23 the same persons were set free, in pursuance through an order of the court emanating from the same fiscal, and that same day they were transferred from the jail of Vieques to the headquarters of the police, and without serving any previous notice, and at a time when the court was not legally constituted in its true forum, sentences were dictated against them on the charge of transgression for illegal carrying of firearms exhibited to them, and they were sentenced to serve a certain period in jail, which, if I rightly remember, was 60 days. After being sentenced on this ground they were transferred from the police headquarters to the town of Humacao, at which place they remained until the 26th, and from there back to Vieques prison, under an order of imprisonment for assault and battery, under date of the 26th, by Judge Jose S. Aybar, of the municipal court of Vieques.

"Somewhat later, aside from being sentenced for illegal bearing of firearms, according to accurate information gathered by myself, they were also sentenced or convicted for riot in the country district of Vieques, on the ground of riot at the municipality seat of that island itself, and as prisoners of a crime qualified at first as offense against human life, undoubtedly owing to serious circumstances, which, had they been true, could only have resembled that qualification. Again I say they finally judged merely for the crime of assault and battery, which, though it is true, is almost the same as a lesser transgression"—

Chairman WALSH. They gave him 60 days just from the police station without any court?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. [Reading:] "But it deprived those accused parties of the right of trial by jury as demonstrated by the seriousness of the case they were accused of. In cases of assault and battery they receive the maximum penalty."

Chairman WALSH. What was the maximum penalty?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Six months.

Chairman WALSH. Six months and $200.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. [Reading:] "As there are yet to be tried several cases that have been classified in various ways against individuals accused during the strike, it was my privilege to appear for them as counsel on my second visit. They had been accused of carrying arms, taking part in the riots out in the country, and also in Vieques town, and for assault and battery, and I was able to form an exact idea of how these cases should have been heard, especially those which had come up before the rendering of the decision in the cases for which appeals had been established. In regard to cases for bearing arms a number of sticks"—that is the arms to which the police referred. The stick is the same as in this country to carry flags, but as they have no refined sticks like in the States here they put any piece of polling—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). A rough piece of pole?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You mean they carried those poles with flags on them?

Mr. IGLESIAS. With flags on them.

Chairman WALSH. So, do you mean to say the weapons they were charged with carrying were the flag sticks upon which the flags were?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; those sticks were by the judge considered arms.

Chairman WALSH. The sticks they used for the flags were charged as weapons and arms?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, did they have any of those sticks or any of those poles upon which the flags were not attached?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead.

Mr. IGLESIAS (reading). "In regard to cases for bearing arms a number of sticks of different sizes were exhibited in presence of the judge; they were classified under the name of 'garrotes' (big sticks) and these had small pieces of paper stuck on them with a number and the name of each individual. In searching for the 'corpus delicti,' I ascertained that the proof of these charges was presented by the police, and I was informed by them in open court that these six or seven sticks were only a few of the two or three hundred that the strikers had in their possession when the parade disbanded, and which took place February 11 of the present year. I was also informed that such as were provided with sticks during the riot were let free, but that afterwards, when these sticks were all in a bunch, the policeman or policemen who claimed to have gotten hold of them asserted, from mere guesswork, that such and such a stick had been used by such and such an individual. I presumed that fact of determining which sticks belonged to each particular individual, and whether these sticks were of small or large sizes, and in case some of these had been declared as large, and not a few of small size, even under these circumstances it would have been impossible for the judge to determine which particular stick had been used by any given individual, and for want of sufficient proof in this regard the accused persons should be absolved, as indeed they were, by order of the honorable court.

"If the trials heard previously to this for illegal bearing of arms were all heard under the same conditions, why, then, should sentence be passed against them?"

Because no lawyer was present and in the same circumstances many of those poor fellows were sentenced by the judge; but when a lawyer was there to defend them he had to release them.

"I must say further there was no doubt but that the accused parties who were sentenced for this transgression of the law were in a like manner sentenced for various causes and given the maximum penalty. For this reason it was, as I understand it, they decided not to enter any plea for appeal, because they had practically served their sentences.

"We next come to the case of Mr. Emilio Garcia, known as Mateo Garcia, and who was taken into court on the 26th for the hearing of his trial to answer against the charge of illegal bearing of arms on February 11, and upon reading out the charges, the said Emilio Garcia stated that on the 11th day of February he bore no arms, and accordingly prayed the court to suspend the proceedings until February 27, and that he was in a position to prove that the statements made by him were true and that on that very day he had no arms in his possession at the place mentioned by the court. But on February 27 he was not a little surprised to hear, not the same indictment, but another in which he was accused of carrying arms on February 16 and not on February 11 as appear in the former indictment, he having been obliged to withdraw his witnesses and suffer another trial for which he was sentenced.

"Riot in the country.—According to evidence furnished by the people of Porto Rico the following explains itself very clearly: On the same road as that where the witnesses passed, another parade of the strikers, headed by policemen themselves, passed also, but they had no lettered signs, nor was there any indication that it had been used as a private road for a number of years. February 16th, ult., when another similar parade had already left the town for Barrio Puerto Real, and upon arriving at this point, a certain Esteban Huertas was stopped by two policemen who charged him of being the spokesman of the workers, and these police forbade Huertas not to pass that way, and that these orders come from superior authority. When Huertas said it was not becoming that the participants in the parade should turn back half-way down the road to come to town and then go by another road; hereupon the police crouched down and aimed at the strikers. The said Huertas fired his revolver three times at the same remarks being made, and firing against the participants of the strike came not only from the police, but also from the majordomos," (the superintendents of these plants) "of Central 'Esperanza,' who, being somewhat behind and hidden by the cane fields, fired also. The local chief of police had taken measures on the 11th, and it seems that he was looking ahead for an incident of that kind to occur, and accordingly ordered the majordomos to be separated from the rest of the strikers, and that is the position they kept on the same day of the riot which as is well known resulted in such fatal consequences that four workers were killed, two policemen, and several workers wounded.

"Riot in town.—After the facts just referred to took place and a number of the men from the disbanded parade who lived at the same town of Vieques, went back to their houses, and upon getting into town, a certain Mateo Garcia was violently arrested near the police barracks. Many persons naturally wanted to know the reason for this. At this moment the chief of police, according to what he himself says, having received word that the barracks would be taken, instead of waiting for the attack, it is as stated, he went out with seven policemen to meet the strikers who were going back to their homes, and all were standing in a line, they shouted 'Halt,' and fired 15 shots. According to what the police themselves say, when they shot at the strikers stopped, and as they did so, they took to their heels without even trying to make any resistance, or carry out any violence of any sort in an endeavor to take the barracks by assault, and under the command of the chief of police of the said barracks, order had been given to fire against the strikers. These are the facts that characterizes the riot in town, according to the opinion of honorable judge of the municipal court of Vieques which passed heavy sentences upon a number of persons whose misfortune was to be present at that place whether involved in the strike or not.

"Assault and battery on the police.—I was present at and witnessed the case of Lorenzo Huertas, accused of assault and battery in its worst form, and which led to the following evidence:

"A witness named Parrillas, who was accused along with the strikers, and who declared he had ascertained that some one was accusing him of having been aggressive to the police, and as soon as the said Parrillas found this out he offered his cooperation to testify against his accuser; said witness also declared that he did not consider himself free from a trial until the fiscal should give him assurance of the contrary. So that this individual, acting under the influence of a strong resentment against the man whom he suspected, stood ready to accuse him in court, and still fearing that his position was not quite safe, made the following declaration: While he happened to be among the participants of the parade reported to have risen up in open manifestation against the police in the country district of Vieques on February 16, when Policeman Brignoni was lying on the ground with machete blow on the back part of the head, a shot in the same place, and several wounds in the body, and considered by everybody dead, the accused party drew close to him saying, 'Let us kill him outright,' and as he said so he dealt him a blow with a machete on the hand with which he covered his face. All of the above came to pass at a time when it was said that a riot was on foot.

"Considering this testimony, and not wishing to discuss the credibility of the witness, I presented a motion to the court, the facts not being considered as a misdemeanor, in order that the case be referred to the district court of Humacao, in pursuance with our laws, so that the trial should be held accordingly to the legal requirements, and that a jury be appointed to hear the said trial. To this request the judge replied the following, 'Though he held the same opinion as the defense, he was sorry to say he could not grant the request, because this case had originally been transferred to the fiscal of Humacao district court, and that it had been returned with instructions to revise it as being a mere case of assault and battery in its worst form.'

"Somewhat later I was informed by phone that nine of the men accused for rioting in the town and country district of Vieques had been convicted and had entered a plea for appeal from this decision.

"I make no mention of the final cases or decisions, convictions, or penalty imposed, because it has already been done in the joint report presented to the convention of the Free Federation of Labor held at Cayey, by Mr. Prudencio Rievera Martinez and myself, and which it is my desire to add to this.

"Considering the above-stated facts, I have come to the following conclusion:

"First. As the riot is supposed to have taken place out in the country the guilt of the accused parties depends on the legal reasons for having passed by the road which, as it was reported, was forbidden, on the legality of the order given by the police to the paraders not to pass through any public place without any other order excepting the order that they were not to pass through there, the guiltiness of culpability of the accused depends on the aggressive and unjustifiable attitude of the police to exact a strict compliance of their order, which, had it been any good, would have strengthened his authority, but being illegal it granted all the rights to those who attempted to pass on the road which they tried to close. The threatening attitude of the police was answered by the desire which the strikers had for wanting to forge ahead on the same road over which they had formerly traveled.

"Only one individual appears to have shot at the police, and that, too, after the police had threatened to open fire on the group of strikers, and I infer from this that if we may be allowed to discuss over the attitude of the strikers, we should not discuss over the attitude of those who were with him, and who were not only defending themselves from a grave and justifiable danger, but that, far from getting together to withstand the assault of the police, either by force or violence, merely acted in this case on the spur of the moment and at a time when they could not stop to wait.

"After having taken place—the alleged riot—nobody compelled the strikers to abandon the place of the supposed riot; in the whole trial there does not appear any proof of it, and on this account our argument that only one person is guilty, can not involve into culpability the rest of the individuals that happened to be present at an uprising that might have taken place out in the country without previous thinking.

"Second. In so far as the alleged riot of the town is concerned, the idea or version that some one may have given the chief of police that the strikers had been trying to attack the police headquarters, because the impatience of the police did not leave time to these men to carry out this purpose, or even the attitude brought about by them upon being shot at by the police at some distance from the headquarters, stopping at first, and then taking to their heels, and without committing any acts of violence in an attempt to attack the headquarters. This would not be a sufficient cause for calling it a riot, much less when it is a question of individuals who for the most part lived in town, and who were of necessity compelled to return to their homes after being attacked by the police in the country district of Vieques.

"Third. The police taking as a basis of their belief that the participants were armed, there does not appear any clear proof in the proceedings that they had been carrying weapons contrary to law and much less could the accused persons be identified, inasmuch as many of the sticks called 'garrotes' by the police would in the hands of any man going out for a walk be scarcely of such size as to justify his detention, and others there were short in length, though big, were provided with flags, and there were still other sticks to which flags were attached by nails. These proved that those sticks had been used neither in defense or in offense but as symbols, with the flags, of the idea they represented.

"Fourth. Concerning the complaints against taking away of life, or attempting to assassination, judged as assault and battery, I understand that though it is apparently true this favors the accused as to penalty, in case they should be found guilty, these accused individuals have been deprived of the right of a trial by jury, which should have been done, not to benefit the accused parties but because the fear of a trial by jury composed of twelve citizens independent from the administration could have meted out justice in a more impartial manner in a case of such transcendental importance.

"Fifth. The fact that appeals (filed in due time) were denied, as has been proved with the mandamus issued by the judge of the Humacao district court, leads me to suspect, together with the inconsistency with which these cases were tried that the accused parties were defenseless in the locality of Vieques, which is separated from the rest of Porto Rico, and had no lawyers to plead their cases, and heavy bonds were required of them, and I can conceive how difficult it was for these people to give bonds required of them by, and that the responsibility weighing upon the parties involved in the Vieques incident has not been justly divided out, we are hopeful that we shall be able to submit the cases of these men resolutely to the honorable district court of Humacao, and we also trust that we shall find in presence of this court opportunity enough to obtain justice which the Vieques workers are longing so much to obtain, and this too from the honorable justice who presides over the said court and in whose trust the accused have placed all their rights with the assurance that their legitimate hopes for explaining definitely the truth will be fulfilled, and that they will not be defrauded of their rights.

" Given at San Juan, March 30, 1915.

" JOSE DE JESUS TIZOL,
"Attorney at Law."

Chairman WALSH. Now, are those men whose appeals are still pending in the court of appeals, or are they out on bond or in jail?

Mr. IGLESIAS. They are in jail awaiting——

Chairman WALSH. Awaiting for their appeal to be decided?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. Now, the lawyer who appeared before the district court, the higher court, makes this affidavit:

" Before the notary public of the city of San Juan, Porto Rica. Mr. Jose Martinez Davila, affidavit No. 1016.

" Mr. Rafael Lopez Landron under oath deposes and says: That he is the attorney for defense of the laborers indicted in Vieques. Porto Rica, on account of the last strike.

" That since he is a practicing attorney in this island of Porto Rico, he never had seen such a peculiar proceeding as that used in all the cases of the poor laborers who went on strike last February, and especially that one used by the district court of the district of Humacao, Porto Rico.

" That cases triable by jury and that are mandatory by law to be tried by jury have been tried according with the wishes of the district attorney.

" That the constitutional rights of the defendants have not been respected.

" That in certain cases a man who has been discharged once for a given crime has been tried two, three, or more times for the same crime.

" That such proceedings are influencing very much the minds of the laborers in Porto Rico, and all and every one of them are in a reign of terror."

The same lawyer says:

" To the effect that as attorney for the great number of strikers, agriculture workers in the island of Vieques, the deponent believe to have thoroughly proven by means of six witnesses, business men, and well to do, that on February 16, 1915, insular policemen Sergio Brignoni and Sotero Moreira (those were the ones who killed the poor people in the country), had been drinking rum at noon of a high alcoholic degree, and that they were carrying in their pockets a half-pint bottle of such redish colored rum when they went to the country to watch for the strikers, and that they, the policemen, had stated before leaving that they were ready to put an end to the strike that very same afternoon, and that in fact one hour afterward, about 3.35 p. m., the same day, and at the place known at 'Trianon,' on the road 'Puerto Ferro,' Vieques, and according to numerous testimony presented, the police held up the parade and fired against the paraders about 15 shots from carbine, and that in the confusion that ensued the police was thrown down by some of the paraders, inflicting them serious injuries."

A letter from Vieques, April 1, 1915.

VIEQUES, April 1, 1915,

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, San Juan, Porto Rico.

DEAR SIR AND FRIEND: At this writing I have just heard that a few days before the shooting affray in the country where some many of our countrymen were killed, Mr. Murraille had asked the house of A. Mayol & Co., of your city, 60 rifles, and he received only 16.

The means, sir, that that was an intentional affair, and also two days before the incident, he set out for San Juan. You can endeavor to secure the copy of an invoice of these rifles, it might come in handy.

As I stated to you in my card for want of lawyer here we are unable to secure the affidavits considering the fact that the judge acts as he does.

Fraternally, yours,

E. MARRERO.

VIEQUES, PORTO RICO, March 30, 1915.

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS.

San Juan, Porto Rico.

DEAR COMRADE: I trust that through your mediation you will communicate to Tizol to ask him if he could do a beneficial turn in behalf of the accused.

We have heard among the accused and nonaccused laborers that the riot was started among the police and the mayordomes of colonies.

Other workers who took part in the parade out in the country also know how it started, and one of them has not been accused; he lives at Puerto Real. The rest who are ready to testify to these facts of the majordomes are arrested. This man who has not been arrested is Hilario Figueroa. He says that if called upon to testify he will tell how it happened. The majordomes summoned to appear were: Jose Casanova, Julio Casanovas, jr., and others of Lujan, Jamie Riveras and Valentin Colon from Perle.

Those who were looking from a neighboring hill say that Policeman Brignoni killed Cruz Levita, who was the first to be wounded and killed.

The rest were killed by the majordomes who stood near the cane field and at the same time wounded by ammunition and bullets. These people made haste to leave this place.

Fraternally,

MATEO GARCIA.

The police ordered the people not to pass this place, and in giving this information I have to mention one of the things that occurred at Vieques, at this parade, it was composed of two or three hundred people, and they, of course, asked the police to stop the parade in the midst of the public road and let the people pass, and after little argument they commenced the shooting. The only witnesses that they, the workers, had to prove their side were themselves, and in order to prevent that any could appear as witnesses in favor of the accused men, the only course to follow was to arrest everyone, and the entire body that was in the parade, and only those that don't dare to say anything were silent, they were let free, but those that had any intention to give evidence in any court in favor of them, regarding the doings of the police when they were parading, were held. Consequently the deplorable affair at Vieques was very hard for us to look for men to serve as witnesses, as far as the country people were concerned. We have men, industrial and agricultural, that appear freely and voluntarily before the court and testify in favor of us. Our federation there was ordered to be closed, and terrorized. The police——

Chairman WALSH. You mean your headquarters?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. At Vieques?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Were ordered to be closed?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. Here are three affidavits signed by Hilario——

Chairman WALSH. Let me look at them before you read them.

Mr. IGLESIAS. All right. This is another.

Chairman WALSH. These are the translation of the same affidavits you have offered in evidence in Spanish?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I guess you better read them.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; all right. They are selections from them [reading]:

“TRANSLATIONS OF THREE AFFIDAVITS.

“These three affidavits signed by Hilario Figueroa, Isidro Sanes, and Narciso Gautier are intended to prove that:

“On February 21, 1912, being the hour about 9 a. m., the three men whose names are above stated were at the office hall of the Agricultural Laborers' Union No. 12006, which organization is affiliated with the American Federation of Labor;

“That such office is established at the country district known as Puerto Real;

“That at the hour above stated came to the office the policeman named Nicasio Garcia, badge No. 124, with another policeman whose name is not reported, and the said policeman Garcia ordered the financial secretary of union No. 12006 to close down the doors of the office and stop business. He also told the secretary that the office will not be allowed to be opened any longer, and that they should keep themselves of having the office opened, because if he find it opened again he would know what to do.”

These affidavits have been sworn to and before the municipal judge of Vieques, Porto Rico. [Continues reading:]

" TRANSLATION OF AFFIDAVITS.

"The three affidavits signed by Emilio Garcia, Martin Cruz, and Basilio Melendex are intended to prove that:

"On February 15, 1915, a peaceful parade of the laborers on strike was going on a public road near the central 'Esperanza' in Vleques, P. R.

"That this road is the one which there is to travel from the district of Puerto Real to the harbor of the same name.

"That the insular policeman, Nicasio Garcia, badge No. 124, who was coming from the Central with another policeman and the chief, Jose Julia Marin, fired one shot with his carabine against the strikers, and on account of that the parade stopped;

"That Emilio Garcia, who was the leader in the parade, requested the chief of police to cause the order to be kept, and that if the police was to prevent them to pass that way, the same police should tell them which was the public road the paraders should take to reach the harbor of Puerto Real where they intended to go.

"That to this inquirèment of Emilio Garcia, the chief of police answered, 'Well, I do not allow you to pass this way, because this road is of the property of Mr. Murraille.'

"That in view of that Mr. Emilio Garcia drafted a telegram to be sent to the governor, and told the chief of police what follows: 'Well, as we do respect the orders of the authorities we will not pass this way, but we shall remain here until we receive the answer from governor informing us whether we can pass or not.'

"That by inquirèment chief of police answered to have not authorize policeman Nicasio Garcia to fire over the strikers. That later they were allowed to pass after police having troubled them as they pleased."

These affidavits are sworn before the municipal judge of Vleques, Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until 2 o'clock; we have to have a little executive session of the commission.

(Whereupon, at 12.15 p. m., Tuesday, May 26, 1915, an adjournment was taken until 2 o'clock.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. You may resume the stand, Mr. Iglesias.

Mr. IGLESIAS. In order to save time I will refer briefly to the telegrams I have received from several towns all over the island, protesting against the course that the police took against the strikers down there, and several are made regarding facts denying the right of speech. I am going to give you these papers.

(The papers referred to are printed among the exhibits at end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 2.")

Mr. IGLESIAS. At this time I want to refer to a conference that took place between me and the governor. I went there to request him to take some steps to do something in favor of the poor agricultural workers that were beaten and maltreated all over. I refer subsequently to the specific points, Juncos and Humaceo, and several other points. The governor promised that he would send investigators.

Chairman WALSH. For the federation to send their investigators?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No; the Government itself.

Chairman WALSH. That the Government send investigators?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; but we never heard about any results.

Chairman WALSH. Did the governor send investigators into those different cities?

Mr. IGLESIAS. I have been informed that in Juncos one man went there to investigate matters. I never knew what the results were, even our own people down there. Those fellows were tried for the charges, they were accused, and at the same time there were about 12 injured down there. Meetings were dispersed, and practically terrorized our agricultural workers in order to compel them to go back to work.

Chairman WALSH. Could you tell us without reading them the substance of them?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Some say that the speakers criticized and insulted the police and the authorities, and incite, and consequently the police had to break and stop the meetings, but most of the speakers went to court, charges were preferred, and most of them have been discharged.

Chairman WALSH. Were the speakers men that were trying to organize the workers?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did they work themselves, in any instance?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; agricultural workers, and to help them in their petitions for raise in wages, and so forth.

Chairman WALSH. Were any of them organizers of your own organization?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Some of the speakers?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; many of them.

Chairman WALSH. How many men have you in your organization?

Mr. IGLESIAS. About 15,000.

Chairman WALSH. About 15,000?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; 15,000 to 20,000, and most of them at this particular time, practically could not hold meetings. All the workers there want to speak in regard to the agricultural strikers, but they were prohibited to come on the roads from one point to another point. That meant they never could get together.

Chairman WALSH. They were public roads, were they?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; public roads.

Chairman WALSH. And your claim is that the police would not allow them to walk along the roads from one point to another?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And in that way impeded their right of personal liberty to go where they pleased, and kept them from getting together for organization purposes?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That is your charge?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How large a police force did they have at that—what is the name of that place, Vieques?

Mr. IGLESIAS. About 14 police and the chief.

Chairman WALSH. Did they add any to the force during the time of this struggle?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Oh, yes; several ones, but very few.

Chairman WALSH. Now, there was a meeting at Ponce, was there?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would give us, without referring to the memoranda, unless you have to; if you have to take an affidavit in order to refresh your memory, it would be all right, but I thought we could get at the facts better by inquiry than by reading.

Mr. IGLESIAS. My purpose was only to talk about it, and handing you the affidavits sworn out by hundreds of people.

Chairman WALSH. And put them into our record so that we can take them into consideration afterwards. Now, can you give us a description of what took place at Ponce? I understand there is quite a complaint about that.

Mr. IGLESIAS. The affair at Ponce came in this way: We went to several towns to hold meetings along the line of the eastern coast of the island, and we had some difficulties in these towns. The people there wanted us to speak. A little later in the evening—

Chairman WALSH. Were you present at Ponce?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; I was requested myself to be at the meeting, and the meeting was composed of about 2,000 people there. About five of us had assumed to speak, and everything was very quiet down there, and I was talking myself about half past 11, and when I was referring to the matter that I had had an interview with the governor, and put before him the grievances that the police could not be impartial because of the way they were taken by the employers themselves on the premises, the manufacturers—

Chairman WALSH. See if I understand you. You say the police were not impartial because they were taken by the employers onto their own premises?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Sure; into their buildings, in the manufactories.

Chairman WALSH. Into the manufactory?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; the offices of the sugar manufacturers. I referred that they took their meals there; they ride their horses, their automobiles. They drink down there.

Chairman WALSH. Who, the police?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; the police, and I told that because I saw it myself. Just on several occasions, I have some complaints, and had to go to the offices of the manufacturers of the sugar plantations to look for the chief of police several times, and when I arrived at this point the captain of police says, "You are going to stop right here," and then the police begin to shoot everybody there, and disperse the meeting, and kill the men, and several ones were slightly wounded.

Chairman WALSH. What was the date of that?

Mr. IGLESIAS. On the 1st of March.

Chairman WALSH. What were you saying at the time the police did this?

Mr. IGLESIAS. The police, they had their headquarters on the premises of the manufacturer, and they took their meals there; they ride their horses there——

Chairman WALSH. Were you telling that?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That is what you were saying?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; and then I say, because this same thing I told to the governor himself, and the governor told me that it was impossible to do it in any other way, that they have not enough money to have enough horses and automobiles, and that the police can not come to town to take their meals, and consequently they had to stop in the offices of the employer.

Chairman WALSH. How big a place is Ponce?

Mr. IGLESIAS. It is about 65,000.

Chairman WALSH. And what police force have they there, ordinarily?

Mr. IGLESIAS. They only have perhaps 25 police.

Chairman WALSH. And were these men residents of the city of Ponce, these policemen that had their horses there, or were they rural police?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Of course, the insular police consists of a force of 600 or 700, and they are distributed.

Chairman WALSH. Did they have jurisdiction all over the island?

Mr. IGLESIAS. All over the island, and the governor is the general chief of the police.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you had been to the governor and complained. Were you on a strike in Ponce?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What class of workers were they?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Agricultural workers.

Chairman WALSH. And you went to the governor and complained that the police were quartered in the manufacturing establishments, sugar refineries, and so forth?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And at the time you were making this speech you say there were 2,000 people present?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you were telling the people what you told the governor about the police being not impartial and having their horses there and being fed themselves and drinking?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, was it at that point you were arrested and taken from the stand?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, I was arrested a half an hour after, because the police were shooting the people, clubbing the people, and terrorizing the people, and when all the things were over, then——

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Who was the man who was killed?

Mr. IGLESIAS. A poor fellow by the name of Caballera.

Chairman WALSH. Was he a laborer?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Where did he work before he was on strike?

Mr. IGLESIAS. In Ponce.

Chairman WALSH. Did he have any family?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. A wife and how many children?

Mr. IGLESIAS. I don't know how many children he had. Now, if you will permit me, I will read the charge that the attorney——

Chairman WALSH. About that situation?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I wish you would give the substance of it in some way, will you, please, Mr. Iglesias, because it is difficult to follow it when it is read, and it is so voluminous, and, so far as I am concerned, I can get a better understanding of it when you just explain. And I think the commissioner can. Can you [addressing Commissioner Harriman]?

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, just give the substance. You have a good description of this other matter and what the attorney said about that. Now, give this in the same way.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, it is very short.

Chairman WALSH. All right.

Mr. IGLESIAS (reading). "The district attorney charges Santiago Iglesias, Francisco Paz Granela, Manuel Texidor, Prudencio Rivera Martinez"—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). That is this gentleman here [indicating the first witness of the day]?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. [Reading:] "Santiago Carreras, Maximiliano Combre, and others"—there were two or three others we don't know—"for breach of the peace (riot), misdemeanor, committed as follows: The above-mentioned Santiago Iglesias and others, in Ponce, within said district, and about the first day of March, 1915, while a public meeting was held on account of the agricultural strike, and while one of the defendants, Mr. Santiago Iglesias was addressing the crowd in a violent and threatening manner to the auditory exciting to those present to raise against the governor of Porto Rico and all the Porto Rican's authorities, saying that the governor of Porto Rico with his proclamation and in agreement with the insular chief of police had violated the constitution, and that similar facts had determined the United States and French Revolutions; that the police beat and ill treated the working classes because they (the police) had their barracks at the sugar factories, where they were given meals, drinks, women, etc."

Now, we were arrested that night, and the following day a habeas corpus was presented to the district court of Ponce asking the release of us; and then the district attorney down there came to the lawyer and made an agreement to lay aside the habeas corpus and let us go free under $300 bail under the agreement that perhaps he would not prefer charges against us, and consequently let the matters be quieted for a month or two.

Well, according with the law in 20 days in a misdemeanor case the district attorney had a duty to prefer the charges against any man; and in a case of felony it is 60 days. Nearly a month passed by and there was a very strange coincidence that we would receive on the 26th of March notice that we were to be held by this commission. Then the same date appeared the district attorney, just two or three days before it was closed the right he has in the felony case to present charges that was introduced before the court those charges against us.

Chairman WALSH. This charge that was introduced against you, you claim, after you had been notified to appear before that commission?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; on the 26th of April.

Chairman WALSH. And it occurred on the first of the month?

Mr. IGLESIAS. The trouble occurred on the 1st of March.

Chairman WALSH. And four days more the law would prevent it—

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, already it had to be debarred in the question of misdemeanor; it only has 20 days.

Chairman WALSH. This was a misdemeanor case?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I would ask you right at this point, I see this lawyer charges you with using firearms. Did you use some firearms there?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And "steel arms," it says. Did you have a knife?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Or a sword?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir; no, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. Martinez, so far as you know, have any firearms or a sword or a knife?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Two or three persons, you will know, have been put in the same charge, and the lawyer will ask to separate those fellows; but in order first that those arms and this knife appear in the charge, then they took those two or three poor fellows with us.

Chairman WALSH. Well, did your lawyer advise you that if they named some and did not name others that they could not prove somebody else had the knife or gun?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And that they could not bring in somebody else and prove they had a knife or a gun and charge it to you that you had it?

Mr. IGLESIAS. And the same charge—and when we were at the police headquarters, arrested, a friend went to the chief of police and asked if we wanted anything we could get from our families, and he was clubbed and beaten.

Chairman WALSH. What is his name?

Mr. IGLESIAS. The last sheet of the paper you will find it. I haven't read it, but I want to put it in the record.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, I see.

(The paper referred to is printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 3.")

Chairman WALSH. Now, I want to ask you another question. Did Mr. Granela and Mr. Texidor and Mr. Carreras or Mr. Martinez—did they have knives or guns or anything?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir; they spoke before me.

Chairman WALSH. All speakers?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; all of them; they were speakers before me and at the meeting. But the intention was to demonstrate that there was 20 or 30 meetings that were dispersed all over the island, and many speakers put in jail and prosecuted. The only ones that was not cited to be in jail were the officials of the federation, and they got them together—all the officials there—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Now, the affidavit you want to read from Mr. Piris was that after the riot took place in front of the police barracks, Mr. Iglesias, the police started to beating him, and they put him in their clutches and taken him in those barracks, and the district attorney heard of it and he went to him, and after he went in a time or two they came and took him down to the headquarters and took the keys from him, although he asked them not to, and broke into all the desks and took the papers away.

Chairman WALSH. That is what is alleged here?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And after they did it the chief told them they were justified in doing it because they were looking for firearms and steel arms and guns and power, and so forth?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Then, we will not read that [referring to the paper already introduced as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 3"]. You may proceed.

Mr. IGLESIAS. I have an affidavit by 223 people.

Chairman WALSH. This affidavit is signed by 223 people [reading:]

"That the party or parties responsible for the bloody tragedy which took place in Ponce on the 1st of March, 1915, were Captain Fernandez Nater, of the insular police, and the policemen at his orders, who without motive or cause whatever attacked the defenseless masses that were then celebrating a meeting at the market place at Ponce on the occasion of a general and peaceful strike of the agriculture workers throughout the island; that as a result of the brutal attack of the police a man by the name of Cavallero was killed and seriously wounded one Hemenegildo Robeldo and many others injured; that the people there congregated did not make any attack in any form to the police, nor did they make any provocation on anybody, but fled wildly in all directions. All of which we have been eyewitnesses."

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And that was signed by 223 people who were eyewitnesses?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; and sworn to. You will find here people in all walks of life, merchants, lawyers, and manufacturers and preachers and many teachers. Because the Ponce people, just thousands of people, have protested tremendously against such brutal manner. It is the second time an occurrence of the same kind has occurred in Ponce. The papers in Ponce were protesting against this affair.

Chairman WALSH. Are those the clippings in Spanish?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Those are the clippings in Spanish. (One I am going to refer to though that the district attorney called up Carvajal, the editor of this paper, and advised him not to be in touch more with the question of the meeting of the dispersed meeting.)

Chairman WALSH. Please interpret the head of that for the benefit of the commission.

Mr. IGLESIAS. This is the Echo of Ponce.

Chairman WALSH. That is the name of the paper?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is the head line there?

Mr. IGLESIAS. The Echo editor before the fiscal.

Chairman WALSH. What does that mean?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Before the district attorney.

Chairman WALSH. What did the paper say?

Mr. IGLESIAS. This paper—all of them, all the papers in Ponce protest against such brutal and such occurrences there, and there was one of the bunch of papers against the police.

Chairman WALSH. What attitude did they take in this matter?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; and every paper in Ponce—I have all the copies here of every kind of paper there. Not one there but—

Chairman WALSH. Give the names of the papers.

Mr. IGLESIAS. El Eco de Ponce, El Dia, La Conciencia Libre, and El Aguila, and El Tiempo.

Chairman WALSH. Are those all Ponce papers?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. All right. You say they take the same general attitude?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Put them in the record.

(The two batches of newspaper clippings referred to entitled "El Echo ante el Fiscal," March 16, 1915; "La Nola del dia, El capitan Fernandez Natér y guardias que tomaron parte en los sucesos de la Noche trágica deben ser inmediatamente relevados," March 6, 1915; "Donde esta la libertad," no date; "Carta abierta, el Hon Gobernador de P. R.," March 7, 1915; and "Investigacion oficial," no date; "Los sucesos de antenchoe," dated March 3, 1915; published in El Eco de Ponce; "El Motin del lunes," published in El Dia, March 5, 1915; "El suceso del lunes," published in La Conciencia Libre, March 7, 1915; "El meeting sangriento," published in El Aguila de Puerto Rico, March 3, 1915; "Labor nefesta," published in El Tiempo, March, 1915; were submitted in printed form.)

Mr. IGLESIAS. Now, the legislature of the lower house of Porto Rico took a stand in regard to that affair at Ponce.

Chairman WALSH. At what was your bond fixed in this case brought on April 26?

Mr. IGLESIAS. In the first instance, it was $2,000.

Chairman WALSH. Are you out on bond now?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, $300.

Chairman WALSH. And so is Martinez?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, everyone of us. The lower house of the legislature passed a motion.

Chairman WALSH. Is the motion translated there? Have you got a translation of that motion?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, but I have the report of the commission on the investigation.

Chairman WALSH. Is that translated into English?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Let me look at it.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Here it is.

Chairman WALSH. Now, this commission was the commission of your organization, was it?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, a commission of the legislature.

Chairman WALSH. They appointed a special commission of the legislature to investigate?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Was the legislature in session at the time this occurred?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What was the terms of the lower house of that legislature?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Sixty days.

Chairman WALSH. And it happened to be in session at this time?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I see they say:

"The commission has practiced a careful investigation of the incident that occurred at Ponce, and gave a chance to every interested party therein to explain the commission what he knew about the case. The facts may be divided into two parts. The first which relates the manner in which the riot started and the other which relates to the death of a certain Caballero.

"The events that gave rise to the disturbance of the public peace are sub-judice, and this commission must not invade the jurisdiction of the court of justice.

"But one man was killed at Ponce at the conclusion of the riot, and the commission heard the statements of many persons from the various social classes which proffer concrete charges against a guardsman as being the cause of the said man's death, and, being prompted by the desire of obtaining justice, we are obliged to declare that the circumstances in which this man's death was brought about must be investigated.

"Whereas, the commission not entertaining any desire to intrude upon strange jurisdiction begs to advise the house of delegates that this body inform the attorney general of the expediency, in other words, the necessity, of investigating the facts concerning the death of Caballero, and furnish the said officeholder the record by the commission relative to this delicate matter.

"The preceding report having been approved by the house of delegates, it is hereby respectfully submitted to the honorable attorney general along with the record in the above referred report.

"J. L. AMEDEO,
"Assistant Secretary.

The balance of the report, which contains a large amount of testimony, I see was submitted to the legislature with this report, and you can submit that to us so that we may have it translated if we see fit.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

(The paper so referred to is printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 4.")

Chairman WALSH. Is that the legislature you are still talking about?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. I remember one more distinguished man in Ponce took the floor.

Chairman WALSH. Was he a member of the legislature?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That is Mr. Soto?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Soto made a speech in the House and this was taken from his speech [reading]:

"Mr. Fous Soto asked Messrs. Huyke and Martinez Nadel if from the declarations sworn before them it may be asserted that the police ordered Santiago Iglesias to leave the speakers' stand while he was speaking, and these two gentlemen answered affirmatively.

"It being so, stated Mr. Fous Soto, I believe that the occurrences that have taken place at Ponce are of such a serious importance that they should not be overlooked by none of us who stand for the defense of the fundamental principles of that liberty we now enjoy under the Constitution of the United States and under those laws enacted by the legislature of Porto Rico. It is my understanding that the police is authorized in no case to order any speaker to leave the stand, and to disband any meeting, because that fact simply is a violation of the law which guarantees the right of free speech, and for that reason, and not taking in consideration any of those details which signifies but too little in comparison to the fundamental principles of the liberty of free speech, I move that the report of the investigating commission be amended by adding to same the following motion:

"That the House of Delegates of Porto Rico file within its records its most energetic protest against the violation of the law defining the rights of the people, which violation was committed by the insular police at Ponce, when ordering an orator to leave the stand while he is speaking, and while he was exercising his legitimate right of censure or criticize."

"This motion was lost for 19 votes against 11 votes in favor."

Now, attached to that is the full address of this delegate in Spanish?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; and what happened is told there in that paper, which is one of the leading papers of San Juan.

Chairman WALSH. You may offer that in the record.

[The matter referred to, entitled "Investigacion de los sucesos de Ponce," published in El Tiempo, March 10, 1915, at San Juan, P. R., was submitted in printed form.]

Mr. IGLESIAS. I want to offer the picture of one man injured in Ponce and a letter he sent to the governor, and this picture represents almost the style of our poor peasant workmen in Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. He has his shoes off in this picture and is barefooted; is that the way these workmen go all the time, or was that picture taken in his bedroom?

Mr. IGLESIAS. That was taken when he came out from the hospital.

Chairman WALSH. And that picture was taken in his street clothes?

Mr. IGLESIAS. The people took the picture.

Chairman WALSH. This letter attached you refer to is as follows:

"Outline of a letter sent to the honorable the governor of Porto Rico by Mr. Hemenegildo Robledo:

"On the eleventh day of May of the present year Mr. Hemenegildo Robledo sent a letter to the honorable governor of Porto Rico, Hon. Arthur Yager, stating in a general way the following:

"That he was a spectator at a meeting held in the city of Ponce during the early part of March, this year.

"That the police ordered the meeting to be ended and at the same time began (the police) firing and clubbing everybody at the meeting.

"That the writer, on account of such attitude, went home.

"That on his way home a policeman beat him in a desperate way; another policeman, whom I don't know, fired against me twice, wounding me in the arms and on the left side.

"That the writer had to go to Hospital Tricoche, in the city of Ponce, Porto Rico, where he was a patient for about forty-five days.

"That the writer is now an invalid on account of the shooting, being inutile of the left leg.

"The writer states that he thinks it is not a crime to go to a meeting to hear the orators, as he did.

"That the only fault, if any, he committed that night was to be present at the meeting, hearing the orators.

"That, notwithstanding all the above facts, the writer has been charged by the district attorney of Ponce of the crime of breach of the peace (riot).

"As the writer don't know the author of the shooting, he asks the governor of Porto Rico the privilege of being allowed to identify the guilty policeman, so that the writer be able to establish the consequent criminal charge.

"The writer asks the honorable governor to inhibit the district attorney at Ponce, Porto Rico, to try his case, on account of having said functionary knowledge of all injustices committed with the writer without having taken proper action.

"The writer is willing to be accused by any other district attorney."

And attached to that is a communication in Spanish, the communication of Mr. Robledo?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Please offer that in the record.

(The matter here referred to is printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 5.")

Chairman WALSH. Is that the usual custom for the people to go in their bare feet and be dressed the way that man is in that picture?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; without shoes, and almost without clothes.

Chairman WALSH. How much wages was this agricultural laborer getting whose picture is shown here? What wages did he get when he worked?

Mr. IGLESIAS. 45 or 50 cents a day.

Chairman WALSH. Is he a married man?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. In gold or paper money, Mr. Weinstock would like to know.

Mr. IGLESIAS. It is United States money in Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. The circulating medium is the same as ours?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Right at that point, how does a man live on 40 cents a day? What is the cost of living?

Mr. IGLESIAS. It is higher than it is in the United States.

Chairman WALSH. Where does the man live? For instance, do they furnish the quarters?

Mr. IGLESIAS. He lived in a shack in the country near Ponce. He has perhaps a little coffee in the morning, without sugar and without milk, and a piece of codfish and a piece of banana and perhaps some beans, and that is all.

Chairman WALSH. This man's name was what, that was injured? What was the name of the crippled man?

Mr. IGLESIAS. I don't remember his name; those papers were sent to me from Ponce. Now, we have here perhaps 14 or 15 affidavits, all in Spanish, but all of them speak in the same way as the other copy.

Chairman WALSH. That is, this one copy, which is the translation of the Spanish affidavits, of which you have about 16 in all—this one of Alberto Fernandez?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. This one is as follows:

"Affidavit by Mr. Alberto Fernandez before the notary public of the city of Ponce, Porto Rico, Mr. Leopoldo Tormes Garcia, March, 1915:

"No. 1929. That he is of age; that he is a resident of the city of Ponce, Porto Rico; that last night about half past 11 he was coming down from the moving picture, called 'Cine Habana,' and when he reached the corner of Plaza Del Mercado, in the city of Ponce, Porto Rico, I find out that there was a meeting in front of the house of Mr. Julio Torres; that he stopped to hear the meeting; that Mr. Santiago Iglesias was in the meeting; that said Santiago Iglesias was then addressing the crowd; that in a moment a riot arose, and deponent saw the police firing their arms and clubbing the assemblers; that deponent then ran down Leon Street, of the said city; that while deponent was going by the left sidewalk of Vives Street, he saw a policeman beating a man with a stick resembling a stave; that the poor victim beg the policeman to stop beating him (the victim), saying these words, 'Don't hit me more,' and then the policeman shoot him, and the poor man said to said policeman, 'Please don't kill me that I am going out,' and then the policeman shoot again a second time, killing him; that the policeman left the poor man on the street; that captain of the insular police, Mr. Nater, was told by the policeman that the victim had a knife; that deponent went to the place where the victim was lying and, seeing he was expiring, ran away; that he knows the policeman very well; that his name is Norberto Quiles; that he knows the policeman perfectly well.

"There are about 15 more affidavits corroborating the facts sworn by Mr. Alberto Fernandez, to show that the police was the exclusive party who, in a violent way, ended the meeting above referred, resulting deaths and wounded persons, who were innocents and were in proper manner hearing the pacific meeting given by the laborers on strike. * * *

Mr. IGLESIAS. A resolution of the lower house asked the attorney general to make an investigation of that particular case. The district attorney of Ponce made the investigation and found that the Police Quiles was responsible.

Chairman WALSH. You may put that affidavit in the record.

(The affidavit referred to is printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject, marked "Exhibit No. 6.")

Chairman WALSH. Have you a translation of the report of the committee of the legislature?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No; the only report was that you read before.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, yes; that was the result of the investigation?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; the result of the investigation was to indict a policeman.

Chairman WALSH. Was the policeman indicted?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; by the district attorney of Ponce for voluntary homicide.

Chairman WALSH. Is that the highest degree of homicide, voluntary homicide?

Mr. IGLESIAS. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. What is the greatest punishment that can be inflicted for it?

Mr. IGLESIAS. That is assassination in the second degree.

Chairman WALSH. Does capital punishment exist in the island?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Can such an offender be punished by that, in the island?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No; it is third or fourth degree for killing a man.

Chairman WALSH. Such as shooting him without malice, or something like that?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. But now I want to refer to the same question because perhaps 90 per cent of the people of Porto Rico are asking that something be done, and the governor has promised to do something. But at the same time we find the governor defending these men.

Chairman WALSH. Defending the policemen?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; in this way. First, to the executive board of police: this board appointed by the governor, makes the declaration telling that the police is innocent, and they denote from the police fund $100 to defend this police, and at the same time passed a collection of money among all the headquarters of the police to defend that police.

Chairman WALSH. The executive board appointed by the governor conducted an investigation, did they?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. But they just made a finding that he was innocent?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Innocent; and paid the money in.

Chairman WALSH. That is government funds?

Mr. IGLESIAS. I believe so.

Chairman WALSH. Where did they get the $100?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Police funds.

Chairman WALSH. From the police funds?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No; from the funds of the board. It is the board of police that have the charge, to qualify the police.

Chairman WALSH. And the money that that board has is taken out of the local taxation; is it?

Mr. IGLESIAS. I can not say to that.

Chairman WALSH. Did they vote $100?

Mr. IGLESIAS. The only thing now is that the police is under bail, and serving his duty as before. He has not been relieved. He is serving in the same position as a man that has the confidence of his superiors.

Chairman WALSH. Have you the statement in English?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No; in Spanish. The commission of police says that he has no record of voting $100 of this fund to defend him. Besides that, most of the collection of money has been faken from 13 police headquarters, to help this police killer. That is a statement that has been taken from the press. Now, in Ponce we find a communication of several workmen, where they accused the police of coming to their homes and threatening them to go to work or leave the house.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does the company own the houses?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; and some of our people were taken out without any process of law.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Who took them out, the police?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; the police.

Chairman WALSH. This that you offer is dated February the 24th, and is signed by Juan Figueroa, Juan Vezquez, Luis Colon, Juanito Figueroa, Gerardo Vega.

"PONCE, P. R., February 24, 1915.

"Mr. Chairman of the Strike Committee:

"We are pleased to inform you that yesterday at 2 p. m. Policeman Rios came to us. He is on duty at Central Fortuna and came to bring us an order from the boss former (Jefe de Cultivo) Mr. Hanson. Said order related to the laborers who did not want to break the strike were given a 44-hours limit to move out of the quarters, and in case they disobey this order we would be expelled by the police from the said quarters without any more legal advice and without the need of any civil procedure of any kind.

"Thus it is we have been obliged to go back to work for 50 cents (the same price) for to do otherwise meant sure expulsion for us from the above referred quarters.

"The said police Rios, who bears badge No. 45 after transmitting us the order which Mr. Hanson gave him, spoke to us in these terms:

"The Company is most too good for you, for you are getting housing facilities, your medicine free. If the employers were otherwise they would charge you, make you pay for the rooms and medicine.

"The same day in the morning the agents of the company passed around a circular in which it is said the governor and Secretary Travieso had given orders not to allow any one to hold public meetings in the rural zone, also the parading and holding of public meetings in the country or about the streets or highways. The same circular said that each striker should stay at home. Groups of three persons as stated in the said circular were not allowed, and he who did not comply with this order would be arrested by the police.

Very sincerely, yours."

Mr. IGLESIAS. Now, there are telegrams that I want to give from every part of the country.

Chairman WALSH. Giving the alleged conditions there with reference to the striking agricultural workers?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Are they all from different parts, or some from the same parts?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Different parts.

Chairman WALSH. All from different places?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; and some telegrams from the governor, when this man applied for help. The matter has been referred to the police, and will be investigated, he said.

(The telegrams referred to are printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 7.")

Mr. IGLESIAS. I want to read a telegram from the mayor to the governor.

Chairman WALSH. Is it in English?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. I am informed——

Chairman WALSH. Let me see it, please. (Reading:)

ARECIBO, February 21, 1915.

HON. GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO, San Juan, P. R.

I am informed constitutional rights have been suspended in Arecibo. I do not see why this should be done in a city where conditions are the same as in other peaceful parts of the island. I believe this measure taken especially here will throw discredit upon this people and this local administration. I sincerely advise and request reconsideration to avoid weakening of people's confidence in American principles of government. This administration offers hearty co-operation to keep order.

E. LANDEON, Mayor of Arecibo.

Mr. IGLESIAS. I want to refer to a telegram that I sent myself to the governor of Porto Rico, and the reply.

Chairman WALSH (reading):

HON. ARTHUR YAGER,

Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.:

Went barrio Arecibo to hold labor meeting, being absolutely prohibited right free speech and meeting by police, which informed me to have superior orders to dissolve every meeting in barrios and public roads; prohibiting also groups ten persons bearing national flags. Earnestly request you to grant this people constitutional rights meeting and free speech for credit sacred American liberties.

American Federation of Labor request you to guarantee my constitutional rights of free speech and meeting.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS.

Organizer American Federation of Labor.

SAN JUAN, February 21, 1915.

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Arecibo, P. R.:

I have received your telegram, and with reference to same wish to state that constitutional rights of free speech and assembly have not been suspended, but that in view of the existing condition in the island, and in order to guarantee peace and tranquillity to all the inhabitants of Porto Rico, I have found it necessary to place the rural zone under the control of the chief of police, who is directly responsible to me for its peace and order. Urban zone will be regulated as before. Request you to kindly see my proclamation to the people of Porto Rico and my letter to chief of police, which you will find in any of today's morning papers, so that you may know exactly what my position is.

ARTHUR YAGER, Governor.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, I went to the chief of police and showed this telegram, and he said the mayor would grant a permit. He says, "I never will permit you to speak anywhere. I will not permit ten peasants or five peasants, and this kind of demonstrations will be prohibited. Well, I inquire, "It is just through the island," and he said, "Yes, sir; all through the island it is the same." And I have affidavits here——

Mr. WALSH. Are they in English?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; in English. I have the translations.

Chairman WALSH. Let me see them, please. [Reading:]

"Affidavit from Nicomedes Rivera, Emilio Fariza, Jose M. Roman, and Pablo Ramirez: To the effect that on February 22, 1915, they were held up on the road leading from Arecibo to San Juan, near the Central Cambalache, and to their surprise they found that two policemen ordered them to abandon the auto car, where they were going, and to hold up their hands as if they had been bandits, in order that they might be searched. They were searched, and nothing was found on them.

"Affidavit of Esteban Padilla: That on February 20, 1915, the declarant, in company of Messrs. Santiago Iglesias, Nicomedes Rivera, and Manuel Francisco Rojas, went to a place known as "Dominguito" for the purpose of holding a meeting. That on reaching the place the local officer of the insular police, Mr. Chapel, was informed by Mr. Iglesias, general organizer of the A. F. of L. that a meeting was going to be held, whereupon the officer in question objected to such meeting, stating that he was carrying out orders from his superiors, and the declarant and his companions had to return to the city without obtaining their purpose.

"Affidavit of Nicomedes Rivera: That on February 20, 1915, about 4.30 p. m., the deponent, in his capacity of organizer of the American Federation of Labor, went to barrio "Dominguito" for the purpose of illustrating the masses in their duties and rights in connection with the agricultural strike, but he was not permitted to address them by the police stationed at said barrio. That during the time that he remained there the deponent noticed that some of the men who acted as strike breakers were not permitted by the police to stand about the house where they had to collect their money for the work performed and who had been offered increase in wage for so doing, but which was not fulfilled by the employers, the police assisting the latter with their clubs and threats in keeping away the protesting laborers from the place.

"Affidavit of Esteban Padilla: That on February 21, 1915, while the deponent, in company of Nicomedes Rivera, were going through the Lares road to barrio Dominguito, two policemen ordered the automobile stopped and proceeded to search them for arms. That the matter was brought to the attention of Mr. Shettini and District Attorney Aponte and they were promised that there would not be a repetition of the matter. That notwithstanding this promise they were again held up the following day by two other policemen and all the occupants of the automobile searched worse than the day previous."

Mr. IGLESIAS. We sent a commission to the chief of police, the general chief of police, in order to make an agreement how we can hold meetings. They say there never will be permits to hold such a meeting in any place, in any manner. Here is a telegram regarding the arrests.

Chairman WALSH. Is it in English?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. [Reading:]

ARECIBO, February 16, 1915.

JUSTICIA, Free Federation, San Juan:

Strikers arrested and sentenced forthwith without defense for carrying working tools. Case and trial summarily, Pedro Rivera, Esteban Martinez, Bautista Ayala, Faustino Medina, Cristino Hernandez. Eighteen sentences pending. A woman held under securities hundred dollars for disturbing peace and extortion, according to police.

Whenever possible let editor come here.

M. F. ROJAS,
Chairman Strike Committee.

And those people were discharged after appearing in the district court, being in jail about 28 days. When they went to the district court they were dismissed, their case. Now, another case—two affidavits more.

Chairman WALSH (reading). "Affidavit of Pablo Ramirez and José Maria Roman: To the effect that they had been intrusted by the strike committee to establish a service of vigilance in behalf of the strike at barrio Campo Alegre, Hatillo, due to the many abuses that the workers were subject in that section at the hands of the police. That the deponents were violently assaulted by two policemen. They begun by asking if deponent were carrying arm; then they proceed to make a search on our persons and ask for our names. On giving the names they stated that 'this are the birds we were looking for,' and forthwith they assaulted the deponent with their hands and club to the extent that the horses on which deponent were riding were abandoned to seek refuge at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Rosado, where deponent remained until the following day for fear of a new attack. That medical attendance was required for treatment of the blows received as is shown by the medical certificate attached to this declaration. That the matter was reported to the district attorney and Chief Shettini, who stated that they would make an investigation, which was never made, and the result is unknown.

"Affidavit of Esteban Padilla: States under oath that on February 19, 1913, he was called to the insular police headquarters about 8 or 9 a. m., where he was met by Mr. Geo. R. Shanton, chief of the insular police, the district attorney, Mr. José R. Aponte, and District Chief Schettiny, and other policemen. That he was told by Mr. Shanton that meetings in the rural zone were prohibited as well as any manifestation or group of more than ten persons even under shelter; that it was also prohibited to carry flags, and when asked to explain whether the national flag, too, was told that all kinds of flags; that the declarant suggested that he be allowed 24 hours only to go through the country districts to hold meetings in order to inform the people of the Government prohibition as long as it has not been made public, but it was refused."

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I think I won't want to read more affidavits. I perhaps have nearly 100 affidavits.

Chairman WALSH. And do they all, those hundred that you refer to, concern Ponce—or all other places in the island?

Mr. IGLESIAS. All other places in the island.

Chairman WALSH. And it covers the topic of interference with the strikers, and the conduct of the police and such matters as you have already detailed?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And it is like that, the same general line?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. We will read all of the affidavits; you can just offer them in the record.

Mr. IGLESIAS. They are translated.

Chairman WALSH. I see they are all along that same general line, that they were assaulted by the police, and as they claim, without cause, and complaining of the conduct of the police.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

(The papers referred to are printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 8.")

Mr. IGLESIAS. And here are telegrams, too.

Chairman WALSH. These are telegrams referring to the fact that at different places they refused to allow them to hold meetings, or be upon the highway, and being stopped on the public highway and searched, and they are all that way, except one from Andres Orellano, which reads:

BARCELONETA, P. R., February 27, 1915.

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Federacion Liber, San Juan, P. R.:

Trial held to-day. Judge convicts; 10 dollars or jail. Pays the fine. I am set free. Ask for guaranties. Chief Cabrera persecutes.

ANDRES ORELLANO.

(The telegrams above referred to are printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Inglesias Exhibit No. 8.")

Mr. IGLESIAS. Here is an affidavit from Mrs. Sofia Rivera.

Chairman WALSH (reading). "Affidavit of Sofia Rivera." To the effect that on February 16, 1916, the deponent, while standing with her four sons at the level pass on the railroad line of the Central Cambalache, which crosses the road from Arecibo to San Juan, and where she is employed to attend the crossing, the deponent was an eyewitness of the abuses of the police with defenseless laborers. The police with their club and in an aggressive manner assaulted them. This caused me to call for help, which brought some persons to the place. The police that beat the laborers then confronted me and abuse me with words, and on demanding respect on they part the deponent was arrested and locked in jail. That bail was fixed for my provisional release. That the trial was held, and without any witnesses but the police I was given 30 days for disturbing the peace in the person of the police. The deponent further states that the laborers assaulted by the police were all of them strikers."

Mr. IGLESIAS. Now comes more telegrams from the governor that the matter will be taken up and be investigated.

Chairman WALSH (reading):

" MUNICIPAL GOVERNMENT,
" Maunabo, P. R., February 26, 1915.

" Whereas the active anticapitalistic propaganda has so emphasized itself as to constitute a menace in this vicinity;

" Whereas section 30 of the municipal ordinance authorizes me to take the necessary steps for the management of the municipality in pursuance with the laws, it being the true meaning of these to preserve the peace; I have therefore determined the following:

" To temporarily forbid the holding of any public meetings within the limits of the town, and in order that this decision be carried out there is issued a copy of this provision which has been handed to the chief of the police headquarters of this town of Maunabo.

" VTE. ORTIZ Y LOPEZ.
" Mayor of the Municipality."

" This is an exact copy of the original, and I therefore issue the same upon the request of a certain Florencio Cabello.

" MAUNABO, February 26, 1915.

" Seen and approved (Vo. Bo.)

" [The seal of Maunabo municipality and the signature of Mayor Vte. Ortiz y Lopez.]"

Mr. IGLESIAS. Here is another.

Chairman WALSH (reading):

" OFFICE OF THE MAYOR.
" Yabucoa, P. R., February 23, 1915.

" Mr. JOSE DIEPPA, Rep. A. F. of L.

" DEAR SIR: In answer to your letter requesting use of the public square (plaza principal) on Tuesday next, must say you may use the same for holding a meeting at any hour when the Catholic and Protestant churches are not holding services.

" Very truly, yours,

" JOSE BERRIOS, Alcalde."

Who is Jose Dieppa?

Mr. IGLESIAS. He is an organizer.

Chairman WALSH. An organizer of what?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Of the Free Federation of Workmen. And here is another from Yabucoa.

Chairman WALSH. It is denying the use of the public square for public meetings?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. Here are some telegrams.

Chairman WALSH. They are telegrams from the secretary of the governor acknowledging receipt—I will read them:

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 12, 1915.

Mr. ENRIQUE VELEZ, Cabo Rojo, R. R.:

Telegram received. Indorsed labor bureau.

M. A. MUNOZ, Secretary to Governor.

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 20, 1915.

To JOSE DIEPPA, Yabucoa:

Impossible to leave San Juan and leaving a thousand matters undone. On some other occasion will be pleased to appear.

J. C. BILLS, Jr.

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 20, 1915.

To JOSE DIEPPA, Yabucoa:

Much pressing business hinders us from acceding to the urgent expressed in your telegram.

BILLS.

Mr. IGLESIAS. That kind of telegrams we have had by the dozen, telling on account of pressing matters they can not leave San Juan to help the people. Here is a clipping from the paper.

Chairman WALSH. Is it in English?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Let me see it, please (reading):

" Influence of the speaker is called for to hold a meeting.

" The speaker of the house of delegates received a telegram from the town of Guayama informing him that the laborers wanted to hold a meeting in the country district named Jobos, and that they were not allowed by the police to do so. The laborers are requesting Mr. de Diego, speaker of the house, to interpose his influence to be permitted the holding of that meeting.

"Among the orators that were to take part in the meeting there were the lawyers Messrs. Martinez Davila and Cervoni Geli, both of them ex-delegates to the house of delegates."

Mr. IGLESIAS. And on the same line you will find in every town and city——

Chairman WALSH. The same request?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; and denied.

Chairman WALSH. Here is one from Florencio Cabello:

"MAUNABO, P. R., February 20, 1915.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Justicia, San Juan, P. R.:

Workingmen on strike had the purpose to go in a parade to the near town of Yabucoa, and the chief of police notified us that he had received an order from the general headquarters, and that in pursuance of it he had to prevent all kind of acts or parades outside of the urban zone. We believe this to be abusive. Please request Julio Aybar to protest before the house of delegates.

FLORENCIO CABELLO, President.

[Translation.]

MAUNABO, P. R., February 23, 1915.

HON. GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO, San Juan, P. R.

SIR: Since the beginning of the agricultural workers' strike the attitude of the people is and have been a peaceful one, and no one persons have been arrested during these ten days the strike have lasted.

The arriving here of the chief of police named Azua who is everywhere provoking the people have cause a general consternation. He has made the statement that he shall snatch the American flag from the hands of that bearing it, and that he would cause everybody to go back to work by mean of his club. In a word, the attitude of this new chief of police is intolerable to this peaceful people, and we respectfully request you to kindly order this chief to be removed from here so as to prevent lamentable consequences, and so that we may be able to keep peace here.

The signers of this telegram are all merchants and no strikers, and we see our interests threatened by the attitude of the police, though up to this date order have not been altered.

Juan Rivera, Carmelo Garcia, Juan Garcia Ortiz, Evaristo Fernandez, Octavio Garcia (farmaceutico), Jose G. Sanchez, Juan Lafuente, Salvador Legea, Juan P. Delgado, Federico Leon, Serafin Delgado, Casimiro Estebe, Florencio Cabello, President Strike Committee.

Mr. IGLESIAS. We now present them from several other towns.

Chairman WALSH. Telegrams from several other towns to the delegates at San Juan?

Mr. IGLESIAS. To the central officers of the American Federation of Labor.

Chairman WALSH (reading):

HUMACAO, February 17, 1915.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Justicia, San Juan:

Pollicemen serving at the district of Central Borinquen have clubbed workers on strike. We earnestly call for investigation. People is indignant for such injustice. Minor children are being employed to violate our signed contract.

ARTURO FIGUEROA, Correspondent.

(The telegrams referred to are printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 9.")

Mr. IGLESIAS. Now, as to the proceedings of the employers in regard to us. This is an original circular that the sugar growers' association has passed all over the sugar manufactories.

Chairman WALSH. Is it in English?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Let me have it, please. (Reading:)

11070 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

COPY OF A LETTER FROM THE SUGAR GROWERS' ASSOCIATION.

SUGAR GROWERS' ASSOCIATION OF P. R.,
San Juan, P. R., March 18, 1915.

To the members of the S. G. Association, San Juan, P. R.

DEAR SIRS AND FRIEND: The Federacion Regional of Porto Rico, a working-men's society duly organized with regulations approved of, and of which I furnish you with a copy, wishes to push its works of organization and establish committees in all the towns of the island, and in such a capacity will have a tendency toward educating the working classes to habits thrift, quiet, and morality, and discourage them from the customs of resorting to strikes, which are upheld by the Free Federation, and I deem this a quite fitting course to adopt, and we should assist in the work of extending its influence and effects; and I have been advised by the heads of the said Federacion Regional that a small contribution of $15 per sugar cane grower, even for once, would be a great help to them in the reorganization of their work, in the establishment of which they have taken so much interest. I have accordingly thought proper to look with favor upon the plan of the Regional and forward same to you; and, after examining the said plan and are in full accord with it, then if you approve of it just send your check to the organization for the fifteen dollars asked.

The Federacion Regional and the Liga Obrera are two separate organizations but which are working along the same lines in the proceedings, but both are contrary openly on all lines to the methods which the Free Federacion is adopting.

Awaiting your reply, I remain,
Very friendly, yours,

R. ABOY BENITEZ, President.

NOTE.—The name also bears the imprint of the signer.

Mr. Channery, who examined your documents, says that all that you have left contain the general matter?

Mr. IGLESIAS. But this is a new point.

Chairman WALSH. All right; pass it over.

Mr. IGLESIAS. It is to demonstrate——

Chairman WALSH. The employers' association was requesting the members of their association to subscribe to another alleged association of workers?

Mr. IGLESIAS. With the aim in sight to break——

Chairman WALSH. They were opposed to the federation?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. Now, the letter that is mentioned in that letter——

Chairman WALSH. Let me look at it if it is in English. Is that the other organization that they approve of?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; honorary members.

Chairman WALSH (reading):

"Honorary Members: Arthur Yager, J. C. Bills, jr.; Jose de Diego; Manuel F. Rosay; Benito Zaluondo; Ramon Valdes Cobian; Ramon Negron Flores.

"SR: In pursuance with a resolution passed by the executive committee of the 'Liga Obrera de Puerto Rico,' an institution which for the last three years has organized and maintained a program, an ideal and a force for a more perfect understanding between capital and labor. The Liga has deemed proper to select fifteen commercial concerns of the highest reputation and good position in the barrio of Puerta de Tierra and among this number yours is included in order that you give your most spontaneous wish and trusting in the good accruing from them all, these will not hesitate to cooperate with their mite to help defray the printing of a large manifest which will be issued on or about the fifteenth of this month, and a few copies we shall forward you for whatever use you may choose to make of them.

"Thanking you in advance for the adherence you may deem proper in favor of this petition of ours, which will be highly appreciated by all the members of this body, we remain,

"Very respectfully, yours,

"JOAQUIN DEL LIANO, Jr.,
"The Chairman."

Mr. IGLESIAS. Also, I don't charge that any of these honorary men have the intention to give their sanction to those men to write letters and ask for money, nevertheless it appears that it was a strikebreakers' association.

Chairman WALSH. You claim it is a strikebreakers' association, and your complaint is, whether these men authorized it or not, they were circulating a letter under the name of the Government, or Mr. Bills?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. The men were workmen, or at least he believes they are defending, or have some kind of conciliation between workmen and the employers through the Bureau of Labor. The Bureau of Labor, according with the law that created that bureau, and which the federation worked so hard to have the law passed, makes it the duty to go on places on strike and investigate matters of the strike, and their work along the line of bringing the two parties together to discuss the matter with a view of conciliation and agreement. In Fajardo we had about 23 hours' discussion with one of the biggest concerns, sugar concern, discussing matters in the line of an agreement. One of the representatives of the Bureau of Labor was present at that time, and after 23 hours of discussion we got together on an agreement on the line of raising the wages, according to the price of sugar.

Chairman WALSH. Is it in English?

Mr. IGLESIAS. I have only one of the papers.

Chairman WALSH. Is it in English?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Let me see if we can get at it. (Reading:) "The sugar situation and the recent strike."

This states it properly, does it, this newspaper clipping?

Mr. IGLESIAS. From the growers' side.

Chairman WALSH. This is from the employers' side?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH (reading): "The following article appeared in the Louisiana Planter of February 27, 1915:

"At a meeting of the Sugar Producers' Association, held in San Juan last week, representatives from most of the large sugar interests all over the island discussed means of handling the situation and finally asked for a conference with Governor Yager and requested the enlisting of at least 200 more insular police. The sugar men asserted that fully this number were required to provide adequate protection for sugar property and to prevent strikers and agitators from coercing contented laborers into strikes and possible violence.

"At this conference Governor Yager was told that in various sections cane fires had followed meetings of strikers at which threats were made by strikers against the property of cane men. It was decided, however, that no more police would be employed except as a last measure. Efforts to reach some definite plan which all of the sugar men should follow out in dealing with their labor were considered inadvisable because of the different conditions which exist in the different sections.

"Most of those who attended the meetings were inclined to oppose a basis of settlement which the Fajardo Sugar Co. had reached with its laborers, which provided for a sliding scale of wages to be based on the price of sugar. Since this agreement was entered into it was found unsatisfactory by the laborers and after a trial of but two days it was dropped, in so far as the field laborers were concerned. In the factory it is still in force. This agreement provided for a wage of 60 cents per day for field labor when sugar was selling at $3 per hundred pounds; 65 cents when sugar was selling for $3 to $3.50; 70 cents when sugar was selling for $3.50 to $4.00; 75 cents with sugar selling for $4 to $4.50; 85 cents with sugar selling for $4.50 to $5, and $1 per day when sugar sold at $5 and above.

"In the factory a somewhat similar scale was worked out and is now in force. The factory labor is getting at present from 70 cents to $1.50 a day, it is said, and the agreement entered into provides that with sugar selling at $3.00 to $3.25 per hundred pounds the employees shall receive an increase in wages of 5 per cent; with sugar selling at $3.25 to $3.50 the increase is to be 10 per cent; $3.50 to $4, 15 per cent; $4 to $4.50, 20 per cent; $4.50 to $5, 25 per cent, and at $5 and above, 30 per cent.

"Previous to the strike Fajardo had been paying on the basis of approximately 25 cents a ton for cane cutting. On this basis the cutters were making from 40 cents a day up to 80 cents and $1. The sliding scale didn't please the laborers and instead they asked for a flat rate of 75 cents a day. On one plantation where this flat rate was tried out it was found that in one day sixteen cane cutters cut but eighteen tons of cane. After this experiment had been made and found unsatisfactory the laborers finally agreed to work on their former basis, with a few increases on different fincas, and reports to-day are that everyone is satisfied at least for the time being.

"At Central San Vicente, near Manati, Rubert Hermanos, the owners, advanced their men to a flat rate of 75 cents a day and besides are giving them one meal a day. This arrangement seems to have completely satisfied the former strikers.

"Around Arecibo, the only town in the island which has a Socialist administration, conditions seem to be the worst, and both Central Los Canos and Cumbalache Central are still closed down."

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, now, the agreement was signed by the employers and employees of Fajardo, and the representatives of the Bureau of Labor and myself, and three days afterwards they broke it.

Chairman WALSH. Have you that agreement there?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Here——

Mr. IGLESIAS. It is signed by about 500 people and sworn to.

Chairman WALSH. The affidavit says—here is a telegram from Mr. Bills, which I will read.

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 19, 1915.

Mr. DOMINGO SANTOS, Fajardo, P. R.:

Mr. Bird, manager of the Fajardo Sugar Co., has officially informed the Government that workingmen are not fulfilling their part of the contract which makes it, therefore, void. I trust all differences will work out regardless of strike.

BILLS.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Who is Bills?

Chairman WALSH. He is the commissioner of labor for Porto Rico; he is here.

Mr. IGLESIAS. And more than 500 signed it and swore to it.

Chairman WALSH (reading). "Affidavit duly sworn to which we the undersigned agricultural workers in the colonies (colonias) in the corporation 'Fajardo Sugar Growers Association' beg to submit and do hereby set forth:

"First. That we have accepted in all its parts the contract entered into on February 8 with the said corporation, which we have obtained honestly and peacefully through our representative, Mr. Sant. Iglesias, and our strike committee—Messrs. Bonifacio Diaz, Nicolas Rexach, and Sotero Ponce—at a meeting held in the room of the Ayuntamiento (town hall) of this locality, and which contract, signed by Mr. Jorge Bird Arias as legal representative of the said association, authorized us to receive the stipulated and agreed upon on the basis of a wage scale like that of the New York market.

"Second. We have fulfilled our part of the contract above referred to and also that part pertaining to our work.

"Third. We deny the statements made by Mr. Bird to the Government that we admitted or accepted other forms of work than that agreed to on the contract.

"Fourth. We understand, according to a telegram from Mr. Bird, that said contract has been annulled by Messrs. Bird and Honoré, without the attendance of Mr. Iglesias.

"Fifth. We understand that Mr. Honoré, along with Mr. Bird and Mr. McLane, went to several colonies and asked two or three ignorant workers if they would like other kinds of work, as that of "working by the job," and which act we believe to be illegal was not the will of more than 1,000 men out on a peaceful strike claiming more wages and protesting against the exceedingly low salary of 50 cents per day, considering the actual price of sugar.

"We understand that this contract has been violated by Mr. Bird for prices not agreed to or introduction of reforms in the work and for which act we earnestly pray for justice, protection, and guarantee.

"Fajardo, February 16, 1915."

Your claim is that it was the boss that broke the contract and not your people, that they were willing to work?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. Now, you will find here a stand taken by the bureau of labor in Porto Rico. We claim that after this agreement was reached the Government received a delegation from the Sugar Growers' Association, and they requested more protection for the sugar cane and sugar mills, and they disclaimed that it was a very good agreement that was made by Fajardo. That it was no good for them.

Chairman WALSH. The growers' association went to the governor and asked for more protection, and said that this agreement made by Fajardo was not a good one?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir; and they said it was because of the workingmen that didn't want to work under such an agreement, when it was before the public.

Chairman WALSH. In public they said the workmen broke the agreement, and when they went to the governor they said it was no good for the boss?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; and at the same time the bureau of labor sent no more men around.

Chairman WALSH. Then the bureau of labor quit sending men out to try to mediate or do away with the strike?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. We have one in Juncos and Humacao.

Chairman WALSH. A representative of the labor department?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; but they called them away.

Chairman WALSH. The claim you make is that when the growers went to the governor and said it was no good for them, that the labor department called in their representatives?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. Here is a paper in Porto Rico that claims an interview had taken place——

Chairman WALSH. This is where Mr. Bills is interviewed by the editor or the reporter of a paper. [Reading:]

"EDITOR. Are you aware that new strikes have broken out in the island?

"BUREAU. Yes, sir; through daily information issued by the headquarters of the insular police.

"EDITOR. Were you or any other employee of your office at the public meeting in the evening held of February 22 on Plaza Baldorioty?

"BUREAU. Mr. Bills (the chief) and Inspector Escalet.

"EDITOR. So, then they heard the speech of Mr. Iglesias?

"BUREAU. Yes, sir; to the very last word he said.

"EDITOR. Has there been any difference of opinion between you and Mr. Iglesias that justify the attacks made by the latter against the employees of the bureau of labor and more particularly Messrs. Bills and Honore?

"BUREAU. The leaders of the Free Federation, especially the residents of San Juan, after the first six months have never been in accord with our program as followed by this bureau and its methods of enforcing the laws, from what we have been able to understand. They have always thought that our attitude should be decidedly partial to the laborers; they seem to forget that the mission we are imposed by law is that of conciliating and harmonizing the interests of the employer and employee, and they require very energetically our activities to be directed in such a way as to satisfy the interests of their organization. As is logical we can not possibly accommodate them, and consequently we are not on the best of terms with them.

"EDITOR. Have the leaders of the Federacion Libre and the sugar-cane growers ever helped you out to bring about a peaceful solution in the strikes?

"BUREAU. In the strikes that have been in Rio Grande, Juncos, and Caguas they gave us proof of their willingness to help, and attended all the meetings and rectified all their former attitude.

"The employers have proved themselves to be deeply possessed with the confidence and esteem for this bureau, and on this account we feel sincerely grateful to them.

"EDITOR. And do they cooperate as much now as they used to?

"BUREAU. The leaders of the Federacion Libre have changed their line of conduct (program) and now censure only our neutral position, and they propagate this censure in their public and private meetings."

Mr. IGLESIAS. This refers to the position that we took about the department of labor. It was a resolution passed——

Chairman WALSH (reading):

JOINT RESOLUTION OF THE COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS IN GENERAL.

The undersigned, committee on resolutions in general, in the part relating to the report of the president, concerning the method of procedure of the bureau of labor during the last agricultural laborers' strike, beg to make the following statement:

First. We have studied the recommendations made to us as to the violations of the contracts and agreements made by mutual consent between laborers and employers during the last agricultural laborers' strike, and in which the representatives of the bureau of labor were present.

Second. That in some of these agreements in which the said bureau has intervened its representatives have signed their names in order to guarantee all the more the rights of the country workingmen.

Third. That this chief of this bureau has permitted the violations of the above-referred contracts and agreements of which the employers made little after they had signed them, while the principal representatives of the bureau have advised the workmen to accept the conditions to which they were submitted and begging them to settle their differences without striking, and without requiring the employers to carry out their part of the clauses signed by themselves, causing thereby great losses to the laborers, and practically denying them their help or authority to have the terms of the contracts carried out.

Fourth. This conduct of privilege observed by the said officeholders was practically granted in behalf of the sugar corporations, and depriving his office of the friendly feeling and assistance of the strikers and workers, and it furnished the means of affirming solemnly our opinion in favor of having true labor representatives at the head of that bureau, so they may carry out beneficial work in behalf of the people and the laboring classes of Porto Rico, using the limited means at its command as provided under the law, and we further declare:

That the official representative of the said bureau of labor, considering his attitude in this strike, does not deserve our confidence on account of his ideas and method of procedure, for his knowledge is of a different sort from that which is needed to protect and watch over the conditions of labor on our island, and his evident misunderstanding of the cause which the American Federation of Labor defends, and we declare that:

The American Federation of Labor accepts as a general principle the constitution of the bureau of labor until such time as the Legislature or the Congress of the United States does not make provision for the control of the aspirations of the proletariat of the island, of a true department of agriculture and labor, with the powers, duties, prestiges, and resources as the other departments of our insular government, and that the American Federation of Labor in Porto Rico does not look kindly upon the bureau of labor while it is being represented by men without ideals, who are ignorant of the service required in a bureau of labor and opposed to the organization of labor and who are utterly unused to labor disputes.

We recommend, moreover, that the executive council of the American Federation of Labor in the United States persist in its demands for reforms in the bureau of labor and that all the documents and affidavits presented by the workers as evident proofs of the violations of contract and agreements with the employers and of the method of procedure of the head of this bureau.

This evidence will be sufficient to prove the justice of our demands and reasons for our protest in asking for an office or department of labor that shall be managed and represented by true men of experience with the sufferings and conditions of the social and economical side of the workers of Porto Rico.

For the above-stated reasons we hope to receive the unanimous sanction and approval of this convention.

Yours, fraternally,

JOSE FERRER Y FERRER, Chairman.
JOSE DIEPPA, Secretary.

Mr. IGLESIAS. It was passed by the last convention of the federation.

Chairman WALSH. Of the federation in Porto Rico?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; on the 18th of March.

Chairman WALSH (reading). "Clipping from Voz de la Patria, Mayaguez, P. R., Saturday, January 24, 1915:

"This morning it was our greatest pleasure to hail our good friend and companion, Mr. Carmelo Honoré, a recently graduated lawyer, and who came into town just to-day.

"Carmelo Honoré is a workman, his trade being that of a carpenter. This friend of ours owes it to his energies for having obtained such instruction in the intellectual profession chosen by him, and he is besides assistant chief of the bureau of labor, and to this he has added the title of attorney at law.

Upon having obtained the right to practice law in the courts he naturally desired to make a start in his home city where he was born. He now comes to defend a certain Andres Camacho, from Cabo Rojo, accused of the crime of seduction. We again wish Friend Honoré well and hope he will obtain a complete success in his profession."

"THE BUREAU OF LABOR.

"The representative of the Fajardo Sugar Co., using the government as an instrument, and the latter, the bureau of labor, made little of the desires of the workmen and their promise, from what may be seen in the affidavits that are sworn to by the hundreds of country workers and which give details of this ignoble deed.

"In a telegram signed by Mr. Bills you shall see therein that after saying that Mr. Bird had broken the contract, he advised the workmen to smooth off all the difficulties, not including the strike—aside from any consideration of a strike. Was Mr. Bills allowed to advise the workers to adjust their difficulties and advocate the strike? What would the employers say and what right would they have if Bills, instead of stating in his telegram to come to an understanding with respect to breaking a contract on the part of the employers without going on a strike, would advise to strike? Would Mr. Bills be allowed to do so then? What must we, the laborers, think of a labor bureau chief who after a contract is broken by the employers advises the employees to settle their dispute without getting up a strike?"

Chairman WALSH. Now, I think that sufficiently shows the attitude of the labor bureau toward you and the attitude of you toward the labor bureau.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Here is something [indicating].

Chairman WALSH. All right, I will let you pass on that, because those are new points. Take all the time you want if you have any new points.

Mr. IGLESIAS. That book [indicating] refers to a report.

Chairman WALSH. I see it is a report of the Bureau of Labor to the legislature of Porto Rico, department of labor, charities, and correction.

Mr. IGLESIAS. We have regarded that report as a report against workingmen rather than in favor of them.

Chairman WALSH. Do you want to read what is quoted here?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Some things quoted in there are the keynote of that report, and shows that its purpose was to induce the workingmen to believe that the law intended to be enacted by the legislature was a very fine law for the workingmen, and that was a law proposed to have a piece of land near San Juan to be divided among certain workmen, but the workingman is by the same report to pay about $4.12 a square meter, when in San Juan we find land much better at 50 cents or 75 cents a square meter; and the report was intended to convince the workingmen that it was a very fine scheme, and the scheme was that commercial business in San Juan wanted the legislature to pass a law to give $196,000, or to authorize the municipality of San Juan to pay $196,000 for certain lot of land that was in the commercial section of the island near the harbor. The value of land in Santurce sometime ago was 9 and 10 cents a square meter then, and to-day perhaps is 20 cents a square meter of a certain good land. That means that when the municipality was able to buy a piece of land for $16,000 intended to be for the protection of the houses of the workmen, the municipality refused to buy this piece of land, and on the other hand, for the purpose of passing a law to buy that piece of land, perhaps a fifth of the other in quantity, they want to pay $196,000.

I went to the legislature and talked with some of the friends of labor we had there, and put it in such a way that we succeeded in killing that bill. I want to be clear in this, that the man who represented the labor bureau was not intentionally dishonest or rather had no knowledge of this particular thing. He was very new in Porto Rico when he wrote that book, and I have called his attention to that.

Now, if you see that report you will see some misstatement made there, where there is great injustice.

Chairman WALSH. Let me understand your complaint; your complaint is that a law was proposed to appropriate $196,000 to purchase a certain piece of land and sell parts of it to the workers?

Mr. IGLESIAS. To give the authority of the municipality.

Chairman WALSH. You did not deem that good legislation; you did not think that was wise legislation and opposed it?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And the legislature refused to enact the law?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You defeated the law?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you claim that Mr. Bills, whom you have referred to, was quite a new arrival in the island, and made this report, which was a report of the bureau of labor; and he advocated the same law that you had opposed and he made certain statements, which you have marked in there, which you believe improper statements to appear in a report of that kind?

Mr. IGLESIAS. But now that same report has been reproduced by the bureau of labor, and it has been received again in a report on the housing conditions.

Chairman WALSH. You protested against this labor report, and he made a report to the department of labor, charities, and correction, regarding the housing conditions, and used the same material substantially as in this report?

Mr. IGLESIAS. He repeated the same thing.

Chairman WALSH. Which you had protested against?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. I want to hand you these three copies of the reports of the labor bureau in San Juan.

(The reports referred to, entitled, "Annual Report of the Bureau of Labor to the Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico," published in San Juan. P. R., were submitted in printed form.)

The following report is just backing up what we have said in regard to the conditions of labor.

Chairman WALSH. You offer those three reports of the department of labor to prove what you say in regard to the condition of labor is correct?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Absolutely correct. The second report substantially had the same matter, but that first showed the beginning of the division among the bureau of labor. This was in their report, and aim to better labor, to protect the welfare of the laboring classes, and protect them from exploitation by their employers or other associations of capital such as their landlords, and promote the relations between laborers and employers. The bureau will not interfere, however, in favor of any effort, either of laborers or of those who claim to be working for the benefit of laborers, unless such efforts are intended primarily to injure the employees.

Chairman WALSH. I will read the typical cases marked here. You say the reports are the same?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH (reading). "In certain respects we believe the inland laborer especially has been much misrepresented. He is not a lazy man. Thousands of the wage earners of the island, especially inland, are enemic or the offspring of anemic parents, and are not physically as efficient as the corresponding type of unskilled laborers in the States.

"Also all of them are underfed. When put at heavy manual labor, the middle of the afternoon finds them exhausted. It is true also that the great mass of the laborers are unskilled, but they are slowly awakening to the realization of their present conditions. In all parts of the island one will find serious, hard-working men who are deeply discontented with their surroundings. It is not a mere passing discontent; neither is it of the socialist type. It is rather a feeling of injustice of years of struggle against the impossible, and as the masses of the people are becoming better educated this feeling is settling into a solid determination to improve labor conditons. They are coming to realize that they must do more efficient work."

Then you present pictures of the coffee children; how young are children put at coffee picking?

Mr. IGLESIAS. When they are 6 and 7 years old.

Chairman WALSH. Do the whole families work—the women, too?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; the whole family.

Chairman WALSH. You have this marked (reading). "Coffee cultivation has two seasons. The busy or picking season lasts only about three months, from the middle of September to the middle of December, and during this season the number of workers is tripled. Then men, women, and children are all engaged in coffee picking. The work is by piece, the pickers receiving from ten to fourteen cents per almud, according to the section and the condition of the crop. The amount that a person can pick varies greatly with the thickness of the coffee. A fair average for a man is from two to three almudes per day, women and children picking about as much as men. It is impossible to gather actual statistics as to the number of women and children employed, because on the pay roll of the plantations only the man's name is stated, the coffee which his wife and children pick being entered in a lump amount with his own.

"This is the lowest paid labor on the island. Thirty years ago the coffee pickers were paid the equivalent of about forty cents American gold, a higher rate than that which they are usually receiving at present. Then came the depreciation of the "provincial" currency, so that forty cents was only worth 25 cents in actual purchasing value, but the old scale of wages still continued.

During the past three or four years the rates have been increased to a limited extent. The usual pay per almod five years ago was eight cents. This year an average of ten to twelve cents prevails."

The following is also marked [reading]:

" PLANTATION STORES.

"The prices of food at several plantation stores in various parts of the island are given in the section on prices and cost of living. It was difficult to obtain from the managers of these stores the exact prices charged the laborers, and since so many of the articles are sold in one or two penny amounts, it is probably that the actual prices per unit of food are higher than this table shows, and several cents higher than in the neighboring towns. On the other hand, it seems to be necessary for the inland plantations either to maintain a store themselves or to grant the right to some outside merchant to build a little store on their land for the purpose of serving their workmen. The expenses of cartage, small sales with consequent wastes, etc., must be considered, so that probably the actual prices in most cases are not unfairly high. In many cases the plantation store is absolutely necessary in order to prevent the laborers from losing so much time in walking to the nearest town.

"The dangers of the plantation store are well illustrated in a few of those cases investigated. In one instance the merchant had two sets of prices—one for the workmen of the plantation, and another, from 1 to 2 cents less per pound, for those who did not work on the plantation. In this case there was another store a quarter of a mile down the road. The merchant and the owner of the plantation had the usual agreement, however, whereby the merchant sold to the workmen on credit and received his pay every Saturday from the proprietor of the plantation, that amount being deducted from the workmen's wages. Both the owner of the plantation and the merchant stated in emphatic terms that the men were not forced to buy at this store; that there was another competing store within a reasonable distance and that many of the workmen purchased their food there. The fact is, however, that very few laborers have any money with which to purchase their food from Monday morning until they receive their pay on Saturday night. The so-called competing store down the road having no way of insuring payment would not sell on credit and the men were actually obliged to purchase at the plantation store, paying the higher prices demanded in order to get anything to eat during the week. It developed from investigations made among the merchants of the neighboring town that the proprietor of this store was a cousin of the owner of the plantation.

"There is a law on the statutes of Porto Rico forbidding payment of wages in food and requiring that the laborer be free to purchase wherever he likes. The result of this has been that employers in most cases have tried, in form at least, to have no direct connection with the stores, and in the majority of cases the bigger, more successful plantations actually have no connection. There are instances, however, where the mayordomo issue a time check to the laborers, and this check is exchangeable at the store for food. Due to his influence over the men, the mayordomo practically compels them to redeem these checks at the store when they are paid on Saturday, and in this way the storekeeper is protected in giving credit."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Who publishes that?

Chairman WALSH. It is a special report of the bureau of labor to the legislature of Porto Rico by J. C. Bills, jr., chief of the department of labor, charities, and correction.

The following is also marked:

"The wages in Porto Rico are uniformly low. The cost of living is higher than in many other tropical countries. Hence standards of living are generally reduced to a primitive stage. Any honest observer of the life of the unskilled laborers of this island must admit that their situation is unfortunate, and the chief cause is inefficiency, resulting from existing conditions, lack of practical education, consequent small earnings, and in many cases wages too low for the labor performed. Yet most employers say that, considering its inefficiency, local labor is the 'most expensive in the world.' Very few employers, however, say that they 'can not afford' to pay more. The fact is that at present most of the industries of the island, except those that have extended their business imprudently and are forced to pay tremendous interest, are highly successful. In other words, the condition of wage earners, especially those engaged in agriculture, has not kept pace with the general development of the island."

I understand all these Government reports, and I will not read them into the record; but Mr. Bills's attention was called to them, and he has marked some of these places for the investigators, and it will not be necessary to read anything further in extenso from the Government report; we will take it as conceded, as it is a Government report, unless you have something additional to add.

Mr. IGLESIAS. This will show the wages [indicating].

Chairman WALSH. This paper you have just referred to shows the average daily wages of carpenters, masons, painters, and laborers in 1901, 1905, 1912, 1913, and 1914.

(The matter referred to is shown on page 78 of a pamphlet entitled "Third Annual Report of the Bureau of Labor to the Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico, 1915," which was submitted in printed form.)

Chairman WALSH. What hours do the carpenters work?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Nine, 10, and 12 hours.

Chairman WALSH. That tabel shows a drop in the wages of helpers from 79 cents in 1913 to 69 cents in 1914?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What was the cause of that?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Because, when the military government went there.

Chairman WALSH. When the military government first went in there was a great feeling of enthusiasm, and wages went up for a while?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; and the representatives of the American people stand for more wages for the people and more protection, and, of course, the workmen have an opportunity to raise them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They were the highest, apparently, in 1913?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And then there seems to be a reduction; was there a general reduction of wages in 1914 from 1913?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The rate was lower in 1914?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As this table shows?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was there a general reduction of wages all over the island?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Commissioner Weinstock wants to know how the wages compared then with the wages before the American occupation.

Mr. IGLESIAS. We have at this time the same wages.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Martinez stated that in the statement he read this morning.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Then there is also shown here the average daily wages of bakers, tailors, and shoemakers in 1901, 1905, 1912, 1913, and 1914.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

(The table referred to is shown on page 81 of the annual report heretofore referred to, and which was submitted in printed form.)

Chairman WALSH. Then here is table showing the average daily wages of laborers in principal agricultural industries in 1901, 1905, 1912, 1913, and 1914?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

(The table is shown at page 83 of the annual report heretofore referred to, and which was submitted in printed form.)

Chairman WALSH. Were they usually paid by the day?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Have you made yourself familiar with the cost of living of agricultural laborers in this country and in Porto Rico?

Mr. IGLESIAS. In this country?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. IGLESIAS. I don't know about that.

Chairman WALSH. Well, go ahead. I will tell you what I wish you would do. You are coming down to these budgets and these conditions, and if you would, I would like to ask you to let them go until Mr. Bills puts his in, and if you have any comment to make or contradiction of them or anything of that kind, you will be given an opportunity afterwards.

Mr. IGLESIAS. All right. Now we come to some other matters in regard to the attitude of the government of Porto Rico in regard to the strike. We were very anxious to get from the government some redress, and we wrote a letter to the governor requesting him to appoint a commission, or rather a judge, district judge—either a special judge or district judge—and a fiscal or attorney in order to ascertain our charges against the police. He answered me with this letter, and I have replied, and the answer and the reply are here.

(The correspondence referred to by the witness is printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as Iglesias Exhibit No. 11.)

Chairman WALSH. Now, you wrote a letter to the governor of Porto Rico—

Mr. IGLESIAS. Asking for the appointing of a commission to investigate the matters of charges which the workingmen all over the island had preferred against the officials there—the officials of the Government.

Chairman WALSH. And his reply was that it ought to be left to the local government unless there was some specific charge against the local officials?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Sure.

Chairman WALSH. In which case he would appoint a commission to ascertain the truth or falsity of that charge?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That is the substance of it?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; but I would like to read the answer.

Chairman WALSH. Is this the answer I have in my hand?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Well, that was covered in the general statement, and I will interpret it for the commission. Now, the governor refused to appoint such a commission, and states that he believes it is unnecessary to appoint any such special commission as was suggested by you, and goes on to say [reading]:

"If any public officer has acted in an illegal manner this action can be ascertained and proper punishment given without the formation of such a special commission. The proper course to be pursued by any person who believes that any public officer is guilty of any criminal action is to present the facts before the fiscal of the district or before a municipal judge or a justice of the peace. If any such officers fail to proceed in accordance with the law, where the facts show that there has been a crime committed by the accused, the matter should then be presented to the attorney general to be investigated by him. The attorney general has assured me that in any case where there is evidence that any officer of the department of justice has failed to take the proper action, after proof has been submitted to such officer that a crime has been committed, he will investigate the case thoroughly and will see that justice is done.

"Respectfully,

"ARTHUR YAGER, Governor of Porto Rico."

Mr. IGLESIAS. I want now to read my statement going to the attorney general.

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Now, you went to the attorney general?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, previous, before in other strikes, previous strikes; and I say what happened in my letter.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you wrote a letter to him on April the 24th and you say you have received this letter of the 19th, and go on to say [reading]:

"According to your letter you seem to be in doubt on the following points:

"That can not understand clearly just what authority we wish to give this special commission which we propose.

"That to accede to our petition for the appointment of a special commission, two members of which are to be appointed by the Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico, be an admission that there is not confidence in the judicial department of our Government.

"That if the matters of which we complain are properly presented to the proper officers of the department of justice, they will receive an impartial and fair consideration."

"In answer to the three points referred to above, and in order to reaffirm the advisability of appointing a special commission, and in consideration of the arguments and reasons expressed in your letter, we again insist upon the appointing of a special commission to be composed as follows:

"Of a special judge and special fiscal.

"The Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico will choose two lawyers who shall be authorized by the Government to present documents, and upon their petition they shall either summon witnesses or cause the necessary proofs to be legally produced; they shall be authorized to examine and cross-examine any and all witnesses, and they shall have the same rights as the fiscal in every particular relating to the accumulation of direct proofs and corroboration. We are not very particular about the appointment of district judge or district fiscal to serve on the above commission.

"The 'special commission' shall hold its sessions at Vleques, Ponce, and San Juan, and shall practice an investigation of all the charges and affidavits presented to it and in any way related with the incidents of the last strike of the country laborers of all the towns of the island, and the said commission shall give to the Government an account of its investigations with recommendations pertaining to the principles of justice and good government. The said commission shall employ a stenographer to carry on its work.

"As you may see, we neither want any special authority for ourselves or for our counsels unless this be legal and duly accepted by an impartial government, and which wishes to know the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and which desires to punish public employees who have made themselves guilty of extralimitation of authority or felony in true sense of the word.

"There would be no danger of your having any lack of confidence in the department of justice if the appointment of this special commission were authorized inasmuch as the members of the same are to be appointed by the Government itself and gives the authority, and the said members exercising such authority shall do so in pursuance with the insular laws, which course has been pursued by this Government on various occasions.

"Sir, since you have assumed the governorship of the island we have submitted to your consideration many a charge and affidavit, and some charges not sworn to, against certain policemen and judges who have been committing abuse against the workers, and none of the investigations practiced (ordered) by you have given these workers any satisfaction despite the fact that arbitrariness, humiliations, and illegal truths were inflicted against poor and helpless men and women. We have never, no never, known any cases to be decided favorably by you in behalf of the injured workers during the whole period of your governorship.

"This is perhaps largely due to the fact that the investigations as carried out (ordered) by you are of a private character, almost inquisitorial, at the police headquarters or else in offices not open to the public, as the general run of people say, among the interested parties, and the accused police and officers are on hand and meet on friendly terms, which is a system rather employed for terrorizing than protecting the victims.

"On this account we meet with a remarkable case that has occurred within your administrative period, sir, in which case a fiscal of the department of justice has emitted an extraordinary unjust opinion in submitting his report to the honorable the governor of Porto Rico, and which clearly demonstrated the kind of equality before the law upon which this conclusion is based, especially so when it was a question of one of the most bitter complaints from the general secretary of the Free Federation, Mr. Rafael Alonso, against a policeman charged of gross abuse on his person and others and sometimes afterwards this very policeman was accused of killing a poor striker. The paragraph specially referred to is the following:

"'Admitting that Policeman Quiles was not very polite with the strikers in the above-mentioned incidents, it is to be borne in mind that the conditions were extraordinary and that the police had to act arbitrarily to avoid disturbances, as it was easier to stop them before they began than it was afterwards. I do not give very much weight to the evidence as the witnesses in favor of the strike would say almost anything against the police. As a matter of fact, while Policeman Quiles evidently acted somewhat beyond his authority, I think the circumstances warranted his actions. Now that the strike is over, Quiles may be reprimanded.'"

Chairman WALSH. Was that the man that had killed a man?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Was that after he had killed him?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, before; in some other place.

Chairman WALSH. And this same Quiles, whose statement is that? This is a statement that came from the attorney officer after making an investigation?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. He said this Quiles had acted beyond his power, but that he thought it better to stop these disturbances before they began than afterwards. Then you go on to say [reading]:

"Now, then, if any attorney (fiscal) of the department holds such an opinion, and if said opinion is so worded without cause for the same, does not the honorable governor think that we have every reason and sufficient motives to demand the appointing of a special commission, with powers to practice a public investigation and do its work in a complete, impartial, and sincere manner against all the atrocities that have been committed against the country laborers during the last strike, and in which cases it is desired our attorneys would be authorized to establish proofs as if they were a true fiscal.

"Besides, you state that the department of justice had already practiced these investigations, which we take to mean that the said department has formed a proper opinion of itself. We claim that the Government and the people will never know the absolute truth of the incidents and acts of tyranny and oppression brought to bear by the public employees, except through the agency of the special commission it is proposed to appoint, and in which all the parties concerned would have the same privileges of presenting their proofs without fear and reserve.

"Emphasizing once again upon what we have heretofore expressed in the letter, we again desire to respectfully suggest to you the urgent necessity of the special commission for which we have petitioned you so persistently.

"Respectfully, yours,

"SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

"President of the Free Federation of Workingmen of Porto Rico."

Chairman WALSH. Have you a response to that from the governor?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. But that was dated April the 24th, I believe?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And that was how long before you left?

Mr. IGLESIAS. The 24th. Well, we left on May the 12th.

Chairman WALSH. On May the 12th?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And on the 26th, two days following that, an information was filed against you and Mr. Martinez and these other men charging you with misdemeanor?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And you are now out on $300 bail?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And the information was filed by the attorney general or the district attorney at Ponce?

Mr. IGLESIAS. The attorney general.

Chairman WALSH. The attorney general's office filed it?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Yes?

Mr. IGLESIAS. You say the charge against me?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. IGLESIAS. No; the district attorney at Ponce; but, of course, under the directions of the attorney general.

Chairman WALSH. Are the district attorneys all subordinate officials to the attorney general of Porto Rico?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. All under that one department?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The attorney general has his headquarters at San Juan, and the different attorneys have their offices in the different districts?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. But those district attorneys, you say, are all under the authority of the attorney general?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, anything else there is that you want to submit?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. Now, after reading that letter you may judge why we do not care to present any affidavits or anything else in Porto Rico. We know that we never will have any justice in Porto Rico. This is the third or fourth time that we came to the United States for protection.

Chairman WALSH. This is the third or fourth time?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you go before?

Mr. IGLESIAS. I came here when President McKinley was alive; that was the first time. And the second time was when President Roosevelt—at that time he himself took the matters up of Porto Rico, and he by his influence and the public press of the United States, and through the agency of the American Federation of Labor, they helped us, stopping many of the wrongs done against the poor people there, and some of the inquisitorial laws were suppressed and suspended. And when Mr. Taft was President, too, I came here to look for the same kind of protection in favor of the people down there. I myself—I have been about 22 times put in prison—arrested. Sometimes I have been seven months entirely without any general hearing. I have never been a minute serving any conviction or any sentence.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever been convicted?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Never.

Chairman WALSH. And you have been arrested 22 times?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And in jail without trial, you say, one time for seven months?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; and another 40 days, and 30 days, and 25 days, and 6 days, etc. And one time I came here and the President sent a letter of recommendation to Gov. Hunt on petition from President Gompers, and when I arrived there I was put in prison just when I landed at San Juan.

Chairman WALSH. When you got back?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. When was that?

Mr. IGLESIAS. That was about 1902 or 1903.

Chairman WALSH. What were you charged with then?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Contempt of court.

Chairman WALSH. What were you usually charged with these 22 times you were arrested?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, sometimes because of breaches of the peace, or injury to the honor or respect of some officer, or writing some article and making some address.

Chairman WALSH. Writing an article or making a speech or speaking disrespectfully to an officer?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; according with the Spanish law, not enforced at that time. Sometimes I was charged with conspiring to raise the price of labor. I was sentenced to four year and four months for that crime.

Chairman WALSH. Where was that?

Mr. IGLESIAS. 1904; and then——

Chairman WALSH. In Porto Rico?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; in Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. I thought you said you had never been convicted any of the 22 times?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, because the higher courts reversed those convictions.

Chairman WALSH. And discharged you?

Mr. IGLESIAS. And discharged me.

Chairman WALSH. Was violence ever committed against your own person by the officials?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; I was shot at and intended to be assassinated twice.

Chairman WALSH. Shot at twice?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; but never got——

Chairman WALSH. They didn't hit you?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No.

Chairman WALSH. But you were shot at, were you?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. Well, this was the first year of our movement.

Chairman WALSH. That was the first year of your movement?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How many times have you been arrested, say, within the past few years?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Just once, and that was in Ponce.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, these 22 times were in the early part of your movement, when you were trying to organize them?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And were those arrests mostly under the old laws that do not obtain any more?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. When I was sentenced to four years and four months the press of the United States took the matter up at that time. They printed editorials, and the Government in Washington, through petitions from the convention of the American Federation of Labor—I meant the Cranston convention of the A. F. of L.—and the President of the United States called attention to the governor there and advised that such laws can not be maintained under the American principles, and since that time, less or more, I never have been arrested until now.

Now, in regard to one of the important things in our country is education. The education of the people—we have been complained that the courts in the——

Chairman WALSH. Now, have you anything that has not been covered by Mr. Martinez. I think he covered——

Mr. IGLESIAS (interrupting). Yes. I want to cover this, that the budget of last year cut the education item in more than $700,000—$735,535—against the education—cut off.

(The matter referred to entitled "Appropriation act of the Legislative Assembly at Porto Rico for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916," was submitted in printed form.)

Chairman WALSH. The budget was cut down this last year for education.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. I have to make this statement, that many of the employers in Porto Rico are making efforts to prevent the legislation to pass appropriations giving enough money for education. They used to say sometimes that agricultural work as it is done don't need much education to do the kind of work they are doing.

Chairman WALSH. Who says that?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Some of the employers there.

Chairman WALSH. You mean you just heard them say it, or that they do say it?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; they have made the statement and published it.

Chairman WALSH. Have you got the articles?

Mr. IGLESIAS. I have just—the Bulletin of the Bureau of Labor at Washington in regard to this and other matters makes the statement in the places where you will find the slips. I have put markers.

Chairman WALSH. This is a bulletin of the Bureau of Labor issued November, 1905. I see it says (reading):

"The furnishing of the house is equally simple. A hammock is indispensable and there is, as a rule, a bench or two, a few pots or jars, but usually no chairs and no bed. The clothes are hung upon nails, and there is no such thing as a bureau or washstand. There are also no tables and no carpet or matting. The benches are often nothing but a solid log upon which the people sit. It may be stated as a rule that the cost of all the articles in an ordinary peon's hut is not above $10.

"Practically the only decoration ever seen consists of the colored lithographs of American advertisers, sometimes in Spanish, not usually in English. In one room visited the decoration consisted of 50 or 60 copies of a small colored lithograph issued by an American manufacturer of soap.

"In the cities the housing conditions are probably worse upon the whole than they are in the country. The inhabitants of the country have at least the advantage of fresh air. In view of the aversion of the average Porto Rican peon to currents of air, and especially the night air, the lack of completeness with which his house shuts out the air is perhaps a blessing in disguise.

"The housing conditions in the worst section of San Juan are almost indescribably bad. While a considerable reform has been effected since the American occupation, especially in the matter of sanitation, the conditions even now are extremely evil, and in some respects worse than in the worse habitations in our American cities. In a number of houses which were visited in the course of this investigation it was noticed that habitations which had originally been intended for two or three families had subsequently been converted into rude tenement houses. The available space was poorly utilized, the halls being wide, the buildings low, and much expensive ground partially wasted. Nevertheless these homes, by reason of exorbitant rents which have increased greatly during the last six or seven years, bring in as much as $200 or even $300 a month, and this money is usually sent to Spain, where as a rule the absentee landlord resides.

"The invasion of Porto Rico by Americans, and the infusion of American ideals into the life of the people have led to some slight changes in the attitude of the people toward work and toward the worker. The sons of rich plantation owners are becoming more willing to enter lucrative careers, though the professions are still unduly preferred over agriculture and business. The Americans have, moreover, tended to strengthen somewhat the position of the workingman by giving him a vote, by defining his position before the law, and by recognizing to a less extent than did the Spanish the difference between the employer and employed. Nevertheless, even at the present moment it is quite clear that the social and economic position of the Porto Rican worker is low, that he is held in small esteem, that there is a contempt for his work—a contempt not even disguised by conventional phrase—and finally that the economic power and the political influence of the workingman are extremely small.

"To a considerable extent the former relationship between employer and employee was conventional rather than contractual, being upon the basis of a patriarchal and more or less benevolent despotism on the part of the employer rather than a free relation entered into by a contract between approximately equal parties. Wages were fixed largely by custom and were fairly uniform in any given district for the same industry. These wages, moreover, were only partly in money, being supplemented by the grant of free lodging and often by other gifts or grants.

"The condition exists to a greater or less extent in the island at the present time, although within recent years, and especially since the agricultural strikes, the patriarchal attitude of employer to workingman is giving way and is being displaced by a very different attitude based on a more purely contractual relation. The attitude of the employers at the present time is to secure labor as cheaply as possible, and of the workingman to obtain all the wages which he can possibly secure."

Chairman WALSH. Now, you give us that as 1905. Do you claim that is still the same situation?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; very likely at this time. It is the final and the best report that has been made upon Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. I see you have another piece marked that I want to read into the record. [Reading:]

"The programme which the American people must carry out in order to live up to the theory under which the island was acquired and to improve the conditions of the laboring and other population of the island, is necessarily an extensive one. If the condition of the people is ever to be raised to a standard at all comparable with that prevailing in the United States, the people must be educated and the sanitary conditions improved, civil and political rights guaranteed and extended, and the condition of the workingman amply protected by law. The American people should recognize that they owe a duty to the Porto Ricans, and that they can not permit the welfare of the population for which they have accepted responsibility to be determined by accident or by conflicts of interests. The American people must, if they are to raise the standard of Porto Rican peons, continue to prosecute the work of education upon the island, no matter how severe the financial drain. It is equally essential to carry out a programme of sanitation which will guarantee to every Porto Rican infant the chance to live its allotted life.

"The power of Porto Rican peons to insist upon fair and reasonable conditions of labor is, and for decades if not for generations will continue to be, far less than that of the workmen of the United States, or of the countries of western Europe. It is not probable, under present conditions and without the benefit of progressive education, that the peons of the country will be able to obtain more favorable terms of employment and more reasonable conditions of labor without the intervention in some way of the governmental authority. The demands of the peons for better conditions of labor will be in direct opposition to the interests of those who may insist that they are of a low type, just as their demands for education may be opposed on the ground that their work must remain unskilled.

"If, by means of education, by means of improved means of communication, by means of a free press, and of assemblages and meetings and conventions, and of fairs and entertainments that will bring the people together, the standard of living of the men, and especially of the women, of Porto Rico, is once raised; if the demands on life made by this people become sufficiently great to prevent the population from assuming marital responsibilities with its present recklessness; if, moreover, the resources of the country are exploited more wisely and the peon himself be assured of the ownership of at least a patch of land and be taught to utilize it economically, the conditions of life and labor of the great mass of the Porto Rican population may be permanently improved. Such an improvement, however, will be difficult and slow, and will be evident only as measured by decades or generations, and not by years. If, however, the island be utilized merely or primarily as a means of providing opportunities for investment and commercial exploitation by American citizens; if the policy of educating the people be held up on account of its expense and alleged uselessness; if the standard of living of the people be not raised, the condition of Porto Rico and of the Porto Rican laboring class after one hundred or two hundred years will be no better than it was in the year 1898, when the sovereignty of Spain gave way to the dominion of the United States of America."

(Papers referred to containing, among other things, the matter just read by the chairman, are printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 12.")

Chairman WALSH. Now, you were stating that the budget which provides for the appropriation for education, shows that the appropriation was cut down?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And it is cut down now. What is the proposed cut; from what point to what point?

Mr. IGLESIAS. From $700,000 or $800,000.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Iglesias, the commission thinks that unless you have one or two more points, what you might call high points, that it would be well for you to submit this in writing for the record, the time being really so far advanced.

Mr. IGLESIAS. All right. I want to speak about the fires and the charges of incendiarism on the part of the workingmen.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. IGLESIAS. One of the arguments of the employers that was sustained by the Government was to the incendiarism in the island.

Chairman WALSH. That is, it was stated here in one of the statements or one of the papers that after the meetings of the strikers had taken place that frequently fires were found to have occurred in the cane.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. Now, I want to state this: In the first place fires in the cane fields have occurred all the time every year. Even if there was a strike or not a strike. Fires regularly happen in cane fields.

Chairman WALSH. And your statement is—did they break out at the same time?

Mr. IGLESIAS. And the proof—

Chairman WALSH. Or is it seasonal?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Certain seasons?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. It is proved that after the strike was over, you find here the reports from the police headquarters telling what fires have been occurring in the country and in the cane fields—reports from police headquarters published by the press containing the accounts about 15 fires that had broken out, and they read like this:

"At 5 a. m. the bells at the firehouse awoke the people, and it was evident that fire had broke out somewhere. We ran in the direction of Rosa Street and saw the house of Esteban Carduche afire. The fire spread from the first house to about nine more, almost all of which were insured. The house where the fire there originated was being repaired; we are not sure whether there was any insurance on the same, but the house next door was insured."

Chairman WALSH. That is the general tenor of those articles.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Now, I want to state that we have a report here from the district attorney of Mayaguez—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Have you got that?

Mr. IGLESIAS. He wrote a particular statement.

Chairman WALSH. He was the district attorney?

Mr. IGLESIAS. He was the district attorney.

Chairman WALSH. Did that refer to fires that occurred while the strike was going on?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. In San Lorenzo, Nazuabo, Mayaguez, and Puerto de Tierra.

Chairman WALSH. And I understand the district attorney wrote an article stating that fires occurred in his district were largely fires in buildings set upon fire, or property set upon fire by the owners of the property because they had it overinsured?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; and I have the paper, or I have the clippings, but I don't find them.

Chairman WALSH. Well, if you find them you can offer them in evidence, and if you don't find them at this time we will call for them, and you have them the first thing in the morning.

Mr. IGLESIAS. All right. Another case: Even if the cane fields burn, the owners don't lose anything. That cane has got to be ground, and the sugar is just the same. It means that the fire in the cane field is no loss at all. We have some manufacturers of sugar that used to put fire on their own canes in order to accomplish two things: First, to have the work of cutting the cane cheaper—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Yes; I understand. Besides, the burning of the cane field does not destroy the sugar in the cane.

Mr. IGLESIAS. No.

Chairman WALSH. And some employers do that instead of cutting the cane.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. And sometimes when some kind of bug is going to injure the cane then they put the fire to it. When a colony that belongs to or have a contract with any of the manufacturers or sugar corporations, and when they want first to grind their cane, then they put the fire in.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Don't want to let the other fellow get ahead of him?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So he burns the place up. Is that a general charge, that occurs?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, it is nothing out of the ordinary times to see fire in the canes, nothing else. You put the fire in the cane field and get the workingmen and cut it out; cane may be six days or seven or eight days waiting for the grinding. Nothing is lost in the fire. But the employers, of course, get in the press statements that the fire was going on and the entire cane field and buildings being burned up; but a district attorney has proved it himself, and he states that in his court he has tried many people for arson, and he finds that it was thought insured houses and insured property more higher than property values.

Chairman WALSH. I see we have been over that. But in brief the workingmen have been charged with incendiarism, but nevertheless—

Mr. IGLESIAS. But, nevertheless, no man has been found guilty—that I know. Some have been put in prison among the members of the strikers, but have been released again, with any—

(The translation of the newspaper clippings referred to by the witness are printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 13.")

Chairman WALSH. No worker has been found guilty of arson, of setting them on fire?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No.

Chairman WALSH. But some were arrested during the strike charged with that, but are any of them still in jail and not tried?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No.

Chairman WALSH. All of them were released from jail?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; as far as I know. I don't know of any man that is in jail awaiting trial.

Chairman WALSH. Now, have you any other point?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Well, I would like to speak about the laws of Porto Rico, the labor laws.

Chairman WALSH. Then I will have to excuse you while I put Mr. Clark on the stand, a gentleman that we promised to let go. I will call you when we get through with Mr. Clark.

Mr. IGLESIAS. All right.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Channery makes this suggestion, that Mr. Bills has the labor laws here, but there is some comment you want to make on them?

Mr. IGLESIAS. If he is talking about the local laws, all right, I will hear.

Chairman WALSH. But after the labor laws, have you any other point you want to bring up?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir; the question of national legislation in regard to Porto Rico, and the laboring men there.

Chairman WALSH. All right, we will put you on before we put Mr. Bills on.

TESTIMONY OF MR. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS—Continued.

Mr. IGLESIAS. I want to refer now to the national legislation.

Chairman WALSH. What were you going to call our attention to next, Mr. Iglesias?

Mr. IGLESIAS. I was going into the national legislation question, and I want to put into the record another document.

Chairman WALSH. This refers to the petition for a writ of habeas corpus, presented to the supreme court of Porto Rico, May 7, 1915, on behalf of the 26 prisoners that had been sentenced in connection with the strike. It contains the reasons why the prisoners claim their release, and also contains the brief upon the law upon the subject as contended for by the petitioners?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir.

(The matter referred to by the witness is printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 14.")

Mr. IGLESIAS. And I wish to file an entire list of agriculturists and manufacturers in Porto Rico and the paper that shows the prices that have been paid for sugar for the last five years. There are two papers.

(The papers referred to by witness entitled "Comparative Statistical Report of Sugar Manufactured in Porto Rico from the Crops of 1909, 1910, 1911, 1912, 1913, and 1914," published by the Government of Porto Rico, and a chart showing the "Weekly Quotations of Sugar for 1912-1913," by John C. Pudney, 17 Battery Place, New York, were submitted in printed form.)

And some photographs giving an idea of the so-called agricultural work in Porto Rico.

(The photographs here referred to by witness were submitted.)

You have already heard there was a bill intended to create compensation for the workingmen. It was in the legislature for several years. Now, the lower house passed about two times a bill that was regarded as too radical by the employees, and just last year, the last session of the legislature, Mr. Travieso, I think, the last part of last year, introduced another intending to create another compensation law. It has an insurance scheme in it. The speaker of the house has another bill to be regarded as the workmen's compensation, without any insurance scheme. The lower house has passed before that kind of a bill. Mr. Travieso, being a member of the upper house, appointed by the President of the United States (composed of 11 members), owing to a request made to Mr. Travieso from the Labor Federation and to the speaker of the house to be kind enough to give us some oral information as to the difference of the bills in regard to compensation law. Mr. Travieso answered that he was willing to do that sometimes and he wrote two letters to the secretary of the federation promising that he would give a conference to the representatives of labor, but on December 23 he informed that he could not do that, and then refused, giving his reasons for refusing, and the reason was first that he was not able to give such information in regard to his bill previous to introducing it in the council; after which we requested again, and he replied he could not do that. The same thing was tried to the speaker of the house, and the speaker of the house answered this letter that is translated into English.

Chairman WALSH (reading):

"Answering your communication of December 20, I am pleased to advise you I shall again introduce at the next session of the legislature the bill on compensation to laborers for accidents sustained during their work.

"Relative to the difference between the bill of Mr. Travieso in the executive council and one introduced by myself in the lower house, there is but one important difference, namely:

"In Mr. Travieso's bill the compensations are to be paid from an insurance fund created by the laborers themselves, who are to pay out therefore part of their wages by the employer and the people of Porto Rico, whereas in my bill the compensation is to be paid out by the responsible employer alone; no objection would be made if the employer chose to take out insurance policies for his men. The remaining provisions of Mr. Travieso's bill have practically been copied from mine, which I presented at the House of Delegates in the name of the commission created for studying the bill.

"I have just caused a copy of Mr. Travieso's bill to be sent to me. I desire to look it over again to see, after which I shall be pleased to communicate my impression with you again in regard to the conference you desire to have with me, as per your letter.

"Very sincerely,

JOSE DE DIEGO,

"Speaker of the House of Delegates."

Mr. IGLESIAS. There was a difference between the lower house and the upper house, and consequently no labor laws passed; but, nevertheless, I heard the lawyers of the big corporations, like the Guanica Central, and others told me that even the bill of Mr. Travieso or Mr. de Digo would be opposed, and they were assured they never would pass and could not have such a compensation law. As to the question of petition of several labor unions all over the country, the agricultural unions, they claimed that a great corporation had in their hands thousands of acres of land that belonged to the people of Porto Rico, and the poor laborers, they had no land or no lot to be possessed by themselves. I have heard an estimate from the secretary of the Interior given to us—it was given to the lower house first.

I have a paper, in regard to the holding of property lands by the corporations in Porto Rico without paying anything to the people of Porto Rico. They have in their hands thousands of acres of land when the poor peons haven't a square meter, and we have protested before the Government, and you will find a letter from the secretary of the Interior giving some information in regard to the big corporations having in their hands thousands of acres of land without paying anything to the people of Porto Rico for its own property; and just at this time is occurring the same thing and the poor peons live on the lands that belong to the people of Porto Rico, and they are being thrown out when the proprietors want to do so in time of strike.

(The letter referred to by the witness is printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 15.")

In some instances hundreds of acres of land have been granted to a corporation when the poor people have not even a small lot.

On account of this protest against those conditions the legislature passed a kind of a law intending to remedy in some way those conditions and perhaps in regard to such a law your commission will have something to present to the representatives of the Government.

Two important things have been protested against by us. Two or three years after the occupation by the American troops there an attorney, called by name Harlan, went there, and he found that hundreds of children and couples living in the country were living together without getting married. That was on account of the great distance to come to the town to get married.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did they live together without getting married?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes. And the Catholic priests charged too much for a marriage, and they have no money to get married, and consequently they come together and live together and have children and live so 14 or 15 or 25 or 30 or 40 years. And this attorney saw that the best thing to do was to legalize those unions and then have a law passed which our legislature called the "common-marriage law," and in that way all those children, all those couples, the children of those couples became legalized. But what occurred was that many children that have their rich fathers when the law was appealed to and the mothers asked the fathers to give them money some of the lawyers having cases of that kind came to the legislature and succeeded in repealing the law, because they didn't want the law to force the rich fathers to recognize their sons and take a part of their inheritance and property to maintain them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They disfranchised them again?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They took away that advantage which had been given them?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Some cases had been granted. The fathers under that law had to take care of those children and recognize them, and the children, in case of the death of the father, had the right to ask for a part of the property of the father.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That law was repealed?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did that mean, for instance, that there had been cases where children had been given property, and that that property was taken away from them?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; that had been given.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was it retroactive? Did it work backward and take away property that had been given to the children?

Mr. IGLESIAS. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It only applied to the future?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How long was that law effective?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Five years.

Chairman WALSH. And then it was repealed?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; sometime ago.

An other matter we protested about: We have a law to prevent in many ways the seduction of our girls, or, at least, to make responsible those who were guilty of seduction. We have a law there which compels a man there who seduces a girl to get married or go to jail, but now that law was reformed some way that no father can get a remedy under the law unless he has some corroborative evidence that makes the charge good for the girl. And, also, that law was changed and reformed in such a way that poor people can not have relief in many instances, chiefly in the case of the country people. Now, we have, since the United States took Porto Rico, asked for recognition as citizens of the United States. You may know that we are at this time nothing; we are citizens of Porto Rico, but Porto Rico is not a nation and has no organization as a nation, consequently we belong to the United States; we are a part of the United States but we are not citizens of the United States. We have been asking for years for our citizenship, and it has never been given to us. We are administered in a certain way; the governor can be a good ruler or not, according to the character of the man and according to the honor and the will and the sentiment of the man.

The people have the right to vote to elect the legislature, but the voters in Porto Rico are, about 60 per cent of them, controlled by the masters and the corporations in Porto Rico. In consequence, we have an organic law that means our constitution.

Chairman WALSH. At this time the commission is going to take a recess for 15 minutes, because we want to run later to-night and try to finish up.

(At this point a recess was taken for 15 minutes, at the conclusion of which Mr. Iglesias resumed the stand and his examination continued.)

TESTIMONY OF MR. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS—Continued.

Mr. IGLESIAS. I want to state, Mr. Chairman, in regard to citizenship, that I have two documents, a file of correspondence with Mr. Sampel Gompers, and a letter from Mr. George R. Colton, the ex-governor, in regard to the same matter, which refers to our position in regard to citizenship. I want these put into the record.

(The correspondence referred to by witness and the letter from Gov. Colton are printed among the exhibits at the end of this subject as "Iglesias Exhibit No. 16" and "Iglesias Exhibit No. 17," respectively.)

Also, here is a report of a hearing before the committee on the Pacific Islands and Porto Rico of the United States Senate, which I also want to put in the record.

(The document referred to, entitled "Citizenship of Porto Ricans," dated May 7, 1912, Washington, D. C., was submitted in printed form.)

Also, a report on hearings before the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives.

(The document referred to by the witness, entitled "A civil government for Porto Rico," dated Feb. 26, 28, and Mar. 2, 1914, Washington, D. C., was submitted in printed form.)

Here is also a pamphlet, being a report of hearings before the Committee on Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives, referring to a bill proposing to create a department of agriculture and labor in Porto Rico, the head of which shall be a member of the executive council of Porto Rico.

(The document referred to, entitled "A department of agriculture and labor in Porto Rico," dated May 2 to 4, Washington, D. C., was submitted in printed form.)

I also want to hand you the annual report of the Secretary of War, 1911, dealing with the Porto Rican affairs, citizenship, etc., from which you will see that in some ways the Government officials in Washington agree in many ways with our petition.

(The document referred to by the witness, entitled "Annual report of the Secretary of War, 1911," dated Washington, D. C., Dec. 4, 1911, was submitted in printed form.)

Chairman WALSH. What became of the proposed legislation that was being discussed at that being discussed at that hearing?

Mr. IGLESIAS. All was lost, year after year, for 13 years. Well, the citizenship and general bill has passed the House twice, but when it went to the Senate it did not hold.

I call the attention of the commission to this pamphlet, the message of the governor of Porto Rico. This is the first message, and is addressed to the legislature of Porto Rico by Gov. Colton. You will find in this message to the Legislature of Porto Rico the true conditions of the entire people of Porto Rico, and especially workingmen, and how this governor and representative of the United States intends to do as much as he can in favor of the masses of the people there.

(The document referred to, entitled "Message of the Governor of Porto Rico to the Seventh Legislative Assembly, First Session, January 13, 1913," San Juan, P. R., was submitted in printed form.)

In the previous four years more labor laws were passed and more fair dealings in regard to the workingmen.

Then, here is a pamphlet I want to introduce into the record, entitled "Porto Rico's Case and the Tariff Bill," which is mentioned in regard to the economical conditions of Porto Rico, and are set forth in this book by a commission appointed by the governor and the Legislature of Porto Rico to appear before the Senate Finance Committee, in order to argue in favor of the protection of sugar, and you will find here in this book all the figures in regard to the subject. It tells the course about the conditions in regard to education, etc., from 1901 to 1914; all through those years the condition of education has arisen a little, always up and up every year, to benefit the condition of the masses of the people in that respect, and certainly have improved, but in one year, this year of 1914 to 1915, more than $700,000 was cut off from the education fund. I had not intended to make any criticism of any money that has been given in favor of education.

(The document referred to by the witness was entitled "Porto Rico's Case and the Tariff Bill," dated Washington, D. C., May 17, 1913, and published by the Porto Rico Official Economic Commission, was submitted in printed form.)

Here is another special message from Gov. Colton in regard to weights and measures, intending to defend the poor people from being cheated out of their rights.

(Printed pamphlet submitted, entitled "Special Message of the governor of Porto Rico to the Seventh Legislative Assembly, Extraordinary Session, July 5, 1913. Weights and Measures.")

And you find here in this pamphlet the full report of this bureau of weights and measures that was created on account of the recommendation of the governor, and you will find in the pictures of many weights and measures that were taken that were false in many instances.

(Printed pamphlet submitted, entitled "Gobierno de Puerto Rico. Oficina del Secretario Negociado de Pesas y Medidas. Eduard J. Saldafia, Jefe. Primer Informe Anual del Negociado de Pesas y Medidas. Enero 1, 1915. San Juan, Puerto Rico. Negociado de Meteriales, Imprenta y Transporte. 1915.")

Nevertheless, representatives of the people who have protested against this thing have been put in jail in many instances. The governor has a chance to call those things by their proper names, but our people had to go to jail for repeating the same thing that the governor—Colton—said.

Now, here is the last annual report of the governor, and you will find how much profit there has been along economical lines. This administration paid more wages and gave more guaranty to the workman by giving more help to them.

(Printed pamphlet submitted, entitled "Extracts from the Annual Report of Hon. George R. Colton, Governor of Porto Rico, for the Fiscal Year Ending June 30, 1912. Published by the Commercial Agency of the Government of Porto Rico, 569 Fifth Avenue, New York, N. Y.")

You will see that there was a rise in money from thirteen millions a year in the commercial business of the island to ninety-five millions and a rise in the value of property from eighty millions to one hundred and seventy-two millions, but notwithstanding that the wages of the working people at this time are lower than when the American occupation began, and when these people organized and went on a strike the police beat them and incarcerated them and killed them. The condition of the workmen of Porto Rico can be seen from this action, but you gentlemen of the commission can not recognize how they are living. None of the cotton workers of the South are living under the conditions of the Porto Rican workers. The same people and the same agricultural workers that you pay in Florida $1.25 for the same sugar, and where the land is not near so good for raising sugar as it is in Porto Rico, yet in Porto Rico they pay only one-half of the wages that the working people get here for the same kind of work. The corporations there are making money, at the rate of more than 27 per cent on their investments, and the Tobacco Trust now at this time controls the whole business of Porto Rico and is making easy money, and so the Sugar Trust. We have a law—our organic law—stating that no corporation shall have more than 500 acres of land. Nevertheless corporations there control 50,000 acres of land—some 25,000 acres, some 20,000 acres, of land. When they control as much as that they go to Santo Domingo and send agricultural products to Porto Rico, and I do not know under which law they have the right to bring cane from Santo Domingo to Porto Rico.

We have a law in Porto Rico granting the permission to agricultural concerns to import seeds from other parts of any foreign country, and those corporations are importing cane and coconuts, and other things are coming into Porto Rican harbors, being sent in as "seeds." That is the way this kind of business has been done by the corporations.

The lands of the people of Porto Rico are being owned by the corporations there, and the Government, as shown by the last message, of the actual governor, has announced the same thing and asked the legislature to do something in the way of retaking these lands from those corporations, but nothing has been done by the legislature. The governor recommends that a commission be appointed in order to ascertain how many acres of land are in the hands of the corporations, and nothing has been done in that particular respect.

I have a letter from the commissioner of education giving us the first information, on our requests—he says that in the last two months they lost 288 teachers in the school in consequence of the reduction of the budget, and those teachers had to get out from the school. Our training schools have been suspended under the argument that the working people do not need much to be in touch with that education or to learn how to do a thing at home, or how to dress, or how to buy things, or how to live. This kind of education, a certain kind of vocational training, has been shut down, and consequently the idea is to maintain the working people and the masses of the people in a serf condition.

(See Iglesias Exhibit No. 18.)

I have here an article which I took from my paper, and I want to introduce it into the record. It is a short story of the conditions of the laboring women down there.

Chairman WALSH. What is this from?

Mr. IGLESIAS. From my paper. I wrote it myself, and I want it to go into the record. That shows the condition of the working women there in many instances.

(Newspaper clipping submitted, entitled "The Labor Women in Porto Rico—Misery and Exploitation." Name of paper and date not given.)

Chairman WALSH. Just proceed.

Mr. IGLESIAS. I am going to submit articles calling for a congressional investigation. This is in Spanish, and I will send it to you in English.

(Newspaper clipping submitted, entitled "Congressional Investigation Needed in Porto Rico." Name of paper and date not given.)

The laws of immigration of this country, except Porto Rico—some provisions of the law to be applied in Porto Rico—when we have enough labor there, plenty of labor. But there has been the action of some invisible influences working against Porto Rico. Almost every Federal law that you find to protect in any way you will find the exception of Porto Rico. Hawaii—that means the sugar enterprise—we call the attention of the commission to recommend that Porto Rico be placed on the same footing as the workmen of the United States are in the question of immigration or any law helping working people of Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. You want the same laws applied to the working people of Porto Rico as apply to the people of the United States?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes, sir. That is the best way to make true American citizens.

Here is a copy of the intended bill of the new organic law for the Territory. It has been in our congress for the last two years and intended to be reintroduced in the next.

(Printed document submitted entitled "A comparison of H. R. 14866, a bill to provide a civil government for Porto Rico, and for other purposes, and the act of Apr. 12, 1900, known as the 'Foraker Act,' and acts and resolutions amendatory thereof, now forming the organic law of Porto Rico. Washington, Government Printing Office, 1914.")

I just want to be through in a moment, declaring that we are in accord with everything said by my colleague, Mr. Martinez, and in the conclusions I have a report of Dr. Wiley (Weyl) for 1905, truly and correctly stating that the need of the Porto Rican people, is first, education—education, no matter how much it costs. We are now 66 per cent who can not read nor write. And then, to protect their freedom, let the people have the chance to speak among themselves in the streets and rural places and in the halls and in other places, to give them the free speech, to maintain the rights—constitutional rights, of the people; to treat the people there as men, as human beings.

We have about 1,400 persons, or more than 1,400, in the jails in Porto Rico, in the penitentiary, and you never will find a rich man there, no commercial man, no business man—not a man that has something in his hands to defend himself, no matter what a criminal he is. He may be a criminal, he may rob, he may take papers from the courts and do many things he wants and never will he go to jail—never, never, never!

And in that way I request from you, gentlemen.

Chairman WALSH. We excuse you and are obliged for your testimony. Just remain in attendance, because either yourself or Mr. Martinez might have something to say when you hear other witnesses.

Mr. Bills, please.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN C. BILLS, JR.

Chairman WALSH. Now, Mr. Bills, I am going to ask you to help out as much as you can by being very brief, and yet exhaustive enough to cover all these subjects.

You have been given a list of questions, have you not?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I will just ask you the questions; or would you rather follow the questions themselves?

Mr. BILLS. Just as you like.

Chairman WALSH. Just read them and answer them if you care to.

Mr. BILLS. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that most of these matters have been considered in our reports.

Chairman WALSH. Well, then, if when you get to those you give us the general thought of your report, the general consensus of your report, and refer us to it.

Your name, please?

Mr. BILLS. J. C. Bills, jr.

Chairman WALSH. What does the J. stand for?

Mr. BILLS. John.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside, Mr. Bills?

Mr. BILLS. San Juan, Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you lived there?

Mr. BILLS. Since September 1, 1912.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you live before you went there?

Mr. BILLS. I was in college and law school at Harvard, the last year.

Chairman WALSH. A lawyer by profession?

Mr. BILLS. I have studied law; I have never practiced law.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever done anything except as a student? Have you worked any place?

Mr. BILLS. Yes; during my time in college I made a special study of social ethics and economics, and also did a great deal of social-settlement and welfare work; and for two years I had charge of the playground of the Providence Play Ground Association and newsboys' work at Boston.

Chairman WALSH. You were in the social-service profession before you went in the civic service?

Mr. BILLS. Yes; and I worked in the Civic Service House for four years under Mr. Bloomfield training a class in public speaking.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understood you had been training labor leaders.

Mr. BILLS. The class was made up of local leaders, labor unionists, Socialists, and advanced thinkers in general.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I imagine largely Socialists and advanced thinkers.

Mr. BILLS. No; a great many of the labor-union men were there for theoretical training.

Chairman WALSH. What is your position in Porto Rico?

Mr. BILLS. I have charge of the insular bureau of labor.

Chairman WALSH. First, I would like for you to state what your personal duties are and how much of a staff you have.

Mr. BILLS. Perhaps the best way to answer that is to refer to the law establishing the bureau of labor.

Chairman WALSH. We are trying to epitomize. How many have you on your staff?

Mr. BILLS. An assistant, two investigators or "inspectors," we call them, a stenographer, two clerks, and a messenger.

Chairman WALSH. Who is your assistant?

Mr. BILLS. Mr. Carmelo Honoré.

Chairman WALSH. All the rest are Porto Ricans?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What was Mr. Honoré's business before he went into the department of labor?

Mr. BILLS. He was in the postal department, Federal postal service, at Mayaguez; and before that a contractor, working his way up from an ordinary carpenter.

Chairman WALSH. What were the investigators?

Mr. BILLS. I ought to state also that Mr. Honoré was, until about a year ago, a member of the Free Federation and was while a carpenter in Mayaguez one of the local leaders.

Of the two inspectors, one, Luis Baviera, was a local leader of the Free Federation at Corey and a cigar maker. The other, Alejandro Escales, was a cigar maker and, I believe, a vice president of the Free Federation. Both of those men came into the bureau of labor under the civil-service examination, being the highest men that took the examinations.

Chairman WALSH. What is the general attitude of the Porto Rican employees toward organized labor?

Mr. BILLS. Porto Rican employees generally know very little about organized labor. Mr. Iglesias made the statement here that there were 15,000 organized men. Now, according to the documents which he has given us, the last one being within the last four or five months, showing the names of unions and towns in which located and their membership—I haven't them here, unfortunately, but I remember that the membership was between three and four thousand.

Chairman WALSH. You think Mr. Iglesias is probably incorrect in his figures?

Mr. BILLS. Either one way or the other; I don't know. I am very certain there are not 15,000 organized men.

Chairman WALSH. What would you say from your studies in this country before you went there, as applied to everyday conditions, as to whether or not organization seems or does not seem to be necessary?

Mr. BILLS. I think it is very necessary. And I would like to put myself on record as being most emphatically in favor of the principles of organized labor and the work that has been accomplished in this country through organized labor; and whatever I have to say in the way of criticism, if I am called on to give concrete information, is not in any way against organized labor or against the leaders of it, but against what, to my mind, is the inefficiency of the organization in Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. Now, Mr. Iglesias mentioned two other organizations. Just describe, first, the Free Federation of Labor. Is that about what the regular trade-union is in this country, and are those other two what are known in this country as employers' organizations of labor, or what might be called fake organizations?

Mr. BILLS. The Free Federation is a real labor organization.

Chairman WALSH. What about the other two?

Mr. BILLS. The other two I don't know. This is the way I came in touch with the Liga Obrera. This is the one in which the governor's name and my name appear as honorary members. About a year and a half ago I received an invitation to attend their convention. I attended that convention and spoke. It was a very educational sort of convention. Their by-laws provide for educational advancement. About a week or so later a delegation of that organization came to my office with a big written document and some seals on it and notified me that I had been chosen an honorary member, and I know also the governor was made one.

Chairman WALSH. Did you pay any money?

Mr. BILLS. No; never paid a penny.

Chairman WALSH. Did you notice its literature afterwards?

Mr. BILLS. I heard the letters read here from the Federacion Regional and from the Liga Obrera, but this literature was sent out since I left the island, and I shall certainly remove my name from that letterhead.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know anything about the details further of those two organizations?

Mr. BILLS. Why, I know this, that we were planning a bulletin on labor organizations in Porto Rico, and we sent out communications to all the various labor groups, and stated that we would print nothing unless they would give us actual proof that their members were paying dues. The Federacion Regional refused to show us the papers. The inference is that they do not pay dues. The Leagua Obrera gave us proof that they had about 80 members—80 or 35 members—paying dues.

Chairman WALSH. Well, then, you would not look upon those as legitimate organizations?

Mr. BILLS. Not as legitimate labor organizations; that is, they have not the power to do anything. Of course, they do some educational work among their members, probably.

Chairman WALSH. Is that the only reason, Mr. Bills, for thinking that they are not legitimate, that they have not the power?

Mr. BILLS. Why, I have no proof that they are not legitimate, except these letters which I heard read here to-day.

Chairman WALSH. Your attention had not been called to that before?

Mr. BILLS. Had not been called to that before.

Chairman WALSH. What is the general attitude of the Porto Rican employers toward organized labor?

Mr. BILLS. I think the attitude of the Porto Rican employers toward what is known as the American Federation of Labor is very similar to the general attitude here. That would be my impression.

Chairman WALSH. Just what is their attitude.

Mr. BILLS. Some favor it and some do not.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what do you see of the large employers, American manufacturers in the island, that you say would favor it?

Mr. BILLS. Why, I have talked with individual employers who expressed a belief in the principles of labor organization.

Chairman WALSH. Well, who were they, if you recall the names?

Mr. BILLS. I have talked with a good many. I talked with some officials at the head of the Porto Rican American Tobacco Co., who spoke favorably of organized labor.

Chairman WALSH. Well, if there is no objection, just state their names.

Mr. BILLS. I am not sure enough of the ideas of the particular individuals with whom I talked.

Chairman WALSH. Does that one tobacco company, that Porto Rico American Tobacco Co., control the production of tobacco in Porto Rico?

Mr. BILLS. Now, that I couldn't say.

Chairman WALSH. Is it popularly supposed to? You heard the statement that Mr. Iglesias made here that the Tobacco Trust did control practically all the production of tobacco in the island?

Mr. BILLS. Of course, the Porto Rico American Tobacco Co. owns nearly all of the large cigar factories. They also produce a great deal of tobacco. They manufacture there and they export a great deal of tobacco.

Chairman WALSH. Well, you heard the statement of Mr. Iglesias with reference to the fact that there was a law limiting the acreage of any one corporation to 500 acres, but that the law is not observed, and that they know it.

Mr. BILLS. That is a part of the Foraker Act, the organic act under which Porto Rico is governed.

Chairman WALSH. Well, is it violated that way?

Mr. BILLS. I don't know; I have no proof at all.

Chairman WALSH. Is it popularly supposed to be?

Mr. BILLS. I have heard many people say that it is violated.

Chairman WALSH. Well, in your investigations through your department, do you find this same company does operate large tracts of land—more than 500 acres?

Mr. BILLS. Most of the tobacco, I believe—this is an aspect of the business in which I have made very little investigation, but most of the tobacco, I believe which this company uses is produced by independent farmers, the company advancing money to them to finance their crop and then buying the crop in the end.

Chairman WALSH. Does that seem to be a legitimate arrangement or a subterfuge to avoid this law that—

Mr. BILLS (interrupting). I should say that was a legitimate business arrangement.

Chairman WALSH. If it be true that they do operate, or that any one company owns or controls land greater in acreage than 500 acres, you don't know of it?

Mr. BILLS. I don't know of it; no.

Chairman WALSH. In the principal industries of the island, please outline briefly the wage scale and the length of the workday.

Mr. BILLS. We have stated those in our report.

Chairman WALSH. Well, epitomize it, if you please.

Mr. BILLS. Coffee, at the present time, from 30 to 40 cents a day; at present, male labor.

Chairman WALSH. And how long do they work; how many hours per day?

Mr. BILLS. Why, from 9 to 10 and 11 hours a day. Sugar, the average before the strike was, I think, according to our figures, 54 cents. That has been increased, as the result of the strike, to something like 68 or 69 cents; and they also work 9 to 10 hours a day.

Chairman WALSH. Is that regarded in that country as a living wage for a man?

Mr. BILLS. It is a living wage, Mr. Chairman, under the standard of living which obtains there.

Chairman WALSH. I notice one of those reports said that as a rule the working people were anemic and underfed.

Mr. BILLS. The hookworm has devastated the laborers, especially those of the interior, for years. During the past 10 years or so the Government has waged a campaign against it, Dr. B. K. Ashford discovering the disease there. If I remember correctly, his first investigations showed that the working efficiency of the laborers in the interior was approximately 50 or 60 per cent of normal, due to the fact that their blood was not strong, but that had improved to 70 or 80 per cent last year. Still there is a great deal of hookworm, especially in the interior. As to being underfed, Mr. Chairman, I have never found a starving person in Porto Rico. Their food is extremely simple, the result of poverty; but they are a hospitable people, and when one man has no work or food and another man has, the latter assists the former. And we must, it seems to me, in a study of conditions in an island like Porto Rico, bear in mind the fact that many of the native fruits and vegetables are very nutritious and very cheap.

Chairman WALSH. Please describe the housing conditions of the agricultural laborers; the cost of the houses first.

Mr. BILLS. I also have a very exhaustive report on that.

Chairman WALSH. About how much are they? Give it to us as we go along, and it will help us.

Mr. BILLS. I would say that it would take the average agricultural laborer four to six days to build a house. The material that is used in that house is mostly given to him by the employer. He erects his own house. Perhaps the boards used in the floor may be worth two or three dollars. The house as a whole—I would agree with the figures of Dr. Wiley—is worth ten or fifteen dollars.

Chairman WALSH. The house is worth ten or fifteen dollars; are they one room?

Mr. BILLS. Two rooms, with a half partition between them. The roofs are thatched with grass. The sides are leaves of the royal palm. They are raised from 6 inches to 2 feet above the ground, and the floor is of boards and pieces of soap boxes.

Chairman WALSH. The sanitary arrangement, if any?

Mr. BILLS. Of course, in this I am speaking of the masses of the agricultural laborers—not those that are living in plantation houses—and among this class of people there are very few sanitary facilities.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What about the cities, outside of the agricultural districts, the house rent in towns?

Mr. BILLS. The plantation houses are built of wood and zinc, with from two to three rooms, and are worth from one hundred to one hundred and fifty dollars. They are always, practically, provided with outhouses.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do they charge rent for them?

Mr. BILLS. No; they charge no rent, the one condition is that the laborer shall work for the employer when he is wanted.

Chairman WALSH. That the laborer shall work for the employer; what does that mean, that the work is seasonable?

Mr. BILLS. The agricultural work is seasonable.

Chairman WALSH. These people that you say get 30 to 40 cents a day, do they have employment the year around at that?

Mr. BILLS. Probably not. The housing conditions in the town, we have in main two classes of houses—the tenement, somewhat similar to the tenements here in the States; many are old brick structures, with very poor means of ventilation. The sanitary conditions have improved vastly in the last three or four years, but there is still room for improvement. The second class are shacks.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I notice in your report filed here by Mr. Iglesias, showing the cost of these houses and the income, etc., the per cent apparently is enormous, over 100 per cent?

Mr. BILLS. These figures were compiled very carefully, and compiled by myself.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I saw 149 per cent.

Mr. BILLS. One hundred and thirty-nine per cent, from 20 per cent up to that. That refers to Puerta de Tierra, a laborers' quarter and a suburb of San Juan.

Chairman WALSH. Give us some typical family budgets of laborers, as of laborers in the country.

Mr. BILLS. The bureau of labor is now working on a report on the cost of living, and I have many family budgets. I would say that the average family has $2 or $3 a week for food, and clothing costs perhaps an average of 50 cents.

Chairman WALSH. Is that per man?

Mr. BILLS. Per family.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What clothing do they have. The pictures we saw show them without shoes and without covering, really, of any kind, really, except possibly trousers.

Mr. BILLS. The laborers of Porto Rico, the poor inland laborers of Porto Rico—there are various classes of laborers—as a class do not wear shoes. They always wear trousers and undershirts and outer shirts.

Chairman WALSH. Do they ever wear drawers and shoes?

Mr. BILLS. Generally drawers, I would say, almost universally, and a straw hat. The clothing in the inland section is purchased out of the income of the entire family, obtained during the coffee-picking season, when the wife and children are employed and the income is increased. It frequently is $20 or $30 a week, during the two or three months of the busy season. I would say also the increase in the use of shoes has been tremendous. I believe, this is a general statement, that the majority of laborers in Porto Rico own a pair of shoes. But they don't wear them when working, partly from poverty and partly because they are not in the habit of wearing them.

Chairman WALSH. Have you some typical budget on the tobacco laborers?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. First, you say they are making $20 or $30 a week? How long is the season?

Mr. BILLS. From the middle of September to the last of December, in the coffee season.¹

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is about two months?

Mr. BILLS. About three months, and the busiest part of that in any one section covers probably about two months.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then there are those that would not be employed after two months?

Mr. BILLS. Women and children are practically not employed at all in coffee except during the season.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then the 10-months' salary, or the 9 months', as the case might be, of the family decreases after two or three months' employment of the total family and becomes simply the earning of the man?

Mr. BILLS. Of the male.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that averages what? How much employment does he get per year?

Mr. BILLS. It has been impossible to get complete statistics on those things.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He is not steadily employed the year around?

Mr. BILLS. It is probably true that one-half of the men in that section, during the rest of the year, are not employed more than one-third or one-half of the time.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the rest are employed how much?

Mr. BILLS. Steadily, the best men.

¹ NOTE.—Twenty to thirty dollars a week is exceptional. The average weekly earning of a family of four or five members during the busy season is between $10 and $15.—J. C. BILLS, Jr.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the one-half that are not employed live on the generosity of the men that are employed?

Mr. BILLS. In the coffee section of the island.¹

Chairman WALSH. On what account are women and children engaged in industrial pursuits in the agricultural line?

Mr. BILLS. In the picking of coffee and the fertilizing and picking, in some divisions, of tobacco, and in a few sections of the island in lighter work in connection with sugar, and in some cases in picking fruits and washing and packing them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What are the sanitary conditions when they are working, the women and children, in the coffee fields?

Mr. BILLS. A coffee field is a hillside covered with bushes from 10 to 15 feet high and shade trees above that, and it is outdoors.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do they get far from their homes in the field, where they live? In other words, do they get so far away that they have to stay away from their home for a while, in connection with coffee fields?

Mr. BILLS. Not overnight.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They all get back to their homes nights?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do men and women work together in those fields?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, we had a situation presented to us in California in the hop-picking fields which looked like it might need correction; that is, the toilet facilities there. There were none there, and complaints were made that men and women working that way together, that they should be provided.

Mr. BILLS. Of course toilets are not provided by law in the fields.

Chairman WALSH. In the coffee fields it is just like they are in the hop fields; that they have no toilet arrangements; that they have to go under a tree or bush?

Mr. BILLS. Exactly that.

Chairman WALSH. And how close are they together when they are at work; is it a concentrated proposition?

Mr. BILLS. No, sir; they are paid by piecework, so much per measurement.

Chairman WALSH. But do they work close together in the field?

Mr. BILLS. No, sir; they do not.

Chairman WALSH. How large are the fields?

Mr. BILLS. The coffee plantations are from 20 acres to several hundred acres.

Chairman WALSH. Take those of several hundred acres; how many men and women would be at work at one time?

Mr. BILLS. It depends altogether on the condition of the crop.

Chairman WALSH. Take a typical case, as closely as you can.

Mr. BILLS. One finca that I know of, with approximately 200 acres in it, and they had employed when I was last there, during the picking season, about 50 or 60 people—men, women, and children. Whether that is typical or not I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. What are those women and children paid?

Mr. BILLS. They are paid by the piece. They are paid anywhere from 8 cents to 12 cents a measure.

Chairman WALSH. What do they earn?

Mr. BILLS. They can pick from 2 to 3 measures a day.

Chairman WALSH. What do they earn in regular money?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You say 2 or 3 measures in a day?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Of how many hours?

Mr. BILLS. Probably eight hours; perhaps longer.

Chairman WALSH. What are their earnings per week?

Mr. BILLS. An individual woman or child, or the family?

Chairman WALSH. The individual woman first?

Mr. BILLS. The pay rolls I have seen would give from $1.50 to $2.50.

Chairman WALSH. Per week?

Mr. BILLS. Per week.

Chairman WALSH. That is per woman?

Mr. BILLS. Per woman. Sometimes, of course, when coffee is plentiful they get considerably more.

Chairman WALSH. How much do the children earn?

¹ Many of these laborers have small gardens. Others go to the sugar sections and work.—J. C. BILLS, Jr.

Mr. BILLS. About the same.

Chairman WALSH. How early do they go to work in those fields?

Mr. BILLS. About 6 o'clock.

Chairman WALSH. And how late do they stay?

Mr. BILLS. On an average they stay till between 12 and 3 o'clock.

Chairman WALSH. What is the minimum age?

Mr. BILLS. From 10 up.

Chairman WALSH. This gentleman that was on the stand said that some of them worked in the field that were 6 years old?

Mr. BILLS. That is contrary to law, and I have no evidence of that.

Chairman WALSH. Have you tried to look it up?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is the minimum age?

Mr. BILLS. Ten years.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you had any infractions or violations of the law or punishment under that?

Mr. BILLS. Quite a number.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is the punishment?

Mr. BILLS. From $25 to $100.

Chairman WALSH. Have you a report on that, showing the conditions?

Mr. BILLS. I have.

Chairman WALSH. Just indicate what report it is in?

Mr. BILLS. It is in the third annual report.

Chairman WALSH. Give a full description of your report.

Mr. BILLS. Third Annual Report of the Bureau of Labor of Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. Read what is on the back of it.

Mr. BILLS. I haven't it here.

Chairman WALSH. Did you submit it to Mr. Manly?

Mr. BILLS. I gave it to someone.

Chairman WALSH. Now, briefly state what are the laws regulating the employment of women and children.

Mr. BILLS. Women work 8 to 9 hours a day, not after 10 p. m., or before 6 a. m. Children under 14 and over 10, not more than 7 hours a day in establishments and 8 hours a day in agricultural work, and in order to work during school hours they must be provided with a special permit issued by the mayor showing that they are orphans, or their parents are unable to support them, and also with an age certificate. Children from 14 to 16 work the same hours, but have to have only the age certificate. The law provides that there must be from 250 to 400 cubic feet of air capacity where women and children are working, and walls and floors cleaned and the women provided with chairs and allowed to use them when possible. There are also regulations regarding the street vending of children and the issuing of certificates.

Chairman WALSH. What provision is there for enforcing these laws, and to what extent are they enforced?

Mr. BILLS. The bureau of labor is empowered under that law to inspect and summon and place under oath and to investigate, and is authorized therefore to enforce it. The law is enforced in practically all of the establishments in Porto Rico. We still need a few other provisions to be able to say that it is absolutely enforced, but it is practically enforced in all of the urban sections of Porto Rico. It has not been possible, with our limited force, to carry on such regular inspections in the mountain sections, to enable me to say that it is enforced.

Chairman WALSH. How do you get your appropriation?

Mr. BILLS. By the insular legislature.

Chairman WALSH. Do they limit you?

Mr. BILLS. We are given a certain amount for traveling expenses.

Chairman WALSH. You submit your budget?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir; I do mine and—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). And have they granted what you have asked?

Mr. BILLS. No, sir; we have never had what we asked.

Chairman WALSH. Are the appropriations inadequate to properly enforce the labor laws with respect to women and children?

Mr. BILLS. There is no doubt that it is not sufficient, and the number of inspectors is not sufficient to enforce it. There is in that law a provision whereby it does not apply to children over 16 and under 10, who are employed in agricultural work, who are accompanied by their parents or guardian or relatives.

It is practically impossible to do anything in those fields, because they are always accompanied by a relative.

Chairman WALSH. Have you tried to do anything, or just considered it useless?

Mr. BILLS. I have been in every part of the island on horseback and trains and automobiles in the past year and a half, and our inspectors make inspections of these towns, and make trips often to the country, and also we have investigated, I think I can say, practically every complaint we have ever received from labor organizations. The members of labor organization have made complaints for violations of these laws, and we have, I think, investigated all of them.

Chairman WALSH. Please give us some idea of the unemployment question of the island.

Mr. BILLS. That is a very serious problem. There are more laborers in Porto Rico than jobs. Offhand I would say by 200,000 or 300,000, perhaps 200,000. Our principal industries are seasonal, coffee for three months, sugar and tobacco for six months, and it means a great deal of unemployment during the idle season. I have not complete statistics to show, but I have here figures of various industries.

Chairman WALSH. What efforts if any are being made to revise this condition of unemployment—minimize it?

Mr. BILLS. The Government has endeavored to provide Government work to give employment, road work, and things of that sort. We have in the bureau of labor a very small employment agency. We have also on a few occasions taken laborers from one section to another, by arrangement with employers, to get them work.

Chairman WALSH. Is unemployment a recent condition, or does it seem to be a permanent one in the island?

Mr. BILLS. It seems to me to be a permanent condition.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any suggestions for remedying it?

Mr. BILLS. There could be a great deal of temporary relief offered by transporting laborers from the sugar sections up to the coffee sections and vice versa during the busy seasons; the seasons not being the same months of the year. The ideal solution would be to have some arrangement whereby many of these laborers could go to Santo Domingo.

Chairman WALSH. Have you given any attention to the suggestions made by these people, that there should be more reform in the law, so the people can get to the land and till it themselves?

Mr. BILLS. A great deal; and there was at the last session of the legislature a law enacted for the selling of small portions of Government land—there are probably 100,000 to 150,000 acres scattered around the island—to laborers on installments and under conditions so that the more efficient laborers can get little gardens and lots on which to build their homes.

Chairman WALSH. What comment have you to make on suggestion by Mr. Iglesias about putting that in a report—you heard his complaint about it?

Mr. BILLS. That was a different matter; it was the blue-colored bulletin which we issued—

Chairman WALSH. That was not the same law?

Mr. BILLS. That is not the same law, and I would like to speak a word about that.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would.

Mr. BILLS. Very shortly after I got to Porto Rico I began to study the housing conditions, and I had made an investigation of Puerta de Tierra, the suburb of San Juan that I mentioned. A special session of the legislature had been called, and I was notified that a bill would be introduced for the sale of certain insular government lands in Puerta de Tierra. What I was afraid of was that, by some possible manipulation, that land would get into the hands of the landlords that at present control all of the land in Puerta de Tierra. Therefore we issued a little bulletin, not for the purpose of urging laborers to pay $4.16 a square meter for land but with the purpose of tying up the sale from the insular government to the municipality of San Juan, so that if it was sold it could not go into the hands of the landlords of Puerta de Tierra, the suburb that I mentioned. I have not the bill, but it is self-explanatory. It is to the effect that no person owning other land shall be entitled to purchase that land, and provides for installments up to 10 years to laborers. And also to show that they could purchase that land in from 8 to 10 years at the price of $4.16 a square meter by paying only the same amount that they are now paying for house rent for land rent. Of course it would have been possible for the city of San Juan to sell a great deal of that land cheaper than that.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please describe the principal articles of diet of the working people and various staples. Take the agricultural worker and urban worker as well.

Mr. BILLS. In the extreme inland they are principally bananas, yantias, and other forms of tubers, which they can purchase on their income, from 5 to 6 or 7 for a penny, bananas 10 to 20 for a penny, and yantias, which are a form of sweet potato, they grow practically wild.

Chairman WALSH. Are they nutritious?

Mr. BILLS. Very; they are very starchy. And all over the land rice, beans, and codfish are used. Codfish varies in price, according to the section, from 10 to 12 cents a pound. Rice, according to the section, of course, a great many grades of it, from 4 to 5 cents a pound. That is the quality that is used. The red beans, which they use a great many of, from 6½ to 8 cents a pound, and the white bean a penny less. These beans at the present time have raised in price on account of the war another cent, perhaps; I am not sure.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are those retail prices you are quoting?

Mr. BILLS. Retail prices.

Chairman WALSH. What is the price of our beans?

Mr. BILLS. I really don't know.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You will have to go to Boston to find out.

Mr. BILLS. Of course sugar and coffee also. Coffee is now cheaper; it would be 10 and 12 and 14 cents a pound.

Chairman WALSH. And how about the fish?

Mr. BILLS. Codfish?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. BILLS. Codfish is quoted from 10 or 11 to 13 cents a pound.

Chairman WALSH. All salt cod?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir; salt cod.

Chairman WALSH. Shipped in?

Mr. BILLS. Imported. The rice is practically all imported. The red beans are mostly imported.

Chairman WALSH. Red meat is not generally eaten by the laborer?

Mr. BILLS. They can not afford it.

Chairman WALSH. What is the price of meat there?

Mr. BILLS. I have nothing except this report, which is a year old.

Chairman WALSH. Would about 18 cents be right?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir; we get it at the American grocery store there at a higher price than it is sold in the native market.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What do you pay for roast-beef, for instance?

Mr. BILLS. I think roast beef—twenty some odd cents a pound.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I assume that you have such things?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir; but I don't do the marketing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. American beef?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir; at a few stores.¹ We have a system of public markets that are owned and run by the municipalities, and frequently they let out the right to sell meat to those merchants who will agree to sell it at the lowest price during the ensuing week.

Chairman WALSH. Who does that?

Mr. BILLS. The municipalities.

Chairman WALSH. Are the company stores maintained on the larger plantations?

Mr. BILLS. Company stores are maintained on the more inaccessible plantations.

Chairman WALSH. And are the employees required to patronize them?

Mr. BILLS. No, sir; except as they are required by the fact that they have no money to buy anywhere else.

Chairman WALSH. You heard the description of Mr. Iglesias that sounded rather familiar to me, and it occurred to me that perhaps he was describing it.

Mr. BILLS. The laborers of Porto Rico as a class, of course, there are many exceptions, live on credit for one week. They request their employer to make an arrangement, either by having a store themselves, or by making an arrangement with some merchant so they can buy on credit for a week, and the employer guarantees the payment of their accounts.

¹ Practically all of the beef sold on the island is native beef.—J. C. BILLS, Jr.

Chairman WALSH. Do they charge more where on credit than where it is cash?

Mr. BILLS. I have found a few cases where they do, but in the last year our investigators have investigated two or three hundred stores, and I think without an exception there was nothing of that kind. Of course, there is the danger of that.

Chairman WALSH. You mean danger inherent in the system that they could overcharge them?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir; the workers are illiterate, and the books are kept in a very fragmentary way. I have investigated that question as carefully as I could. I found three cases during the past year where the employers issued pieces of metal or paper checks of some sort, which were redeemable at their store or at a store in which they had an arrangement. We did our best to get evidence for a trial and failed. In all these cases that system was changed. And they now sell simply by credit, kept on the books.

Chairman WALSH. Please give us a general idea of the consumption of alcoholic beverages by workers and of the influence of such consumption on family income? What sort of liquor do they drink and how general?

Mr. BILLS. It is chiefly a kind of rum made out of sugar molasses. There is quite a bit of alcohol consumed in the island, but I never have seen more than 8 or 10 drunken Porto Ricans.

Chairman WALSH. They are temperate people?

Mr. BILLS. You almost never see any drunkards.

Chairman WALSH. And you say they are a kindly and generous people?

Mr. BILLS. Extremely hospitable.

Chairman WALSH. And they appear to be intelligent people when opportunity affords? Do they take to education well?

Mr. BILLS. I think they do. Of course, there is a great deal of illiteracy in the island.

Chairman WALSH. Did you hear Mr. Martinez read his statement here this morning?

Mr. BILLS. I did.

Chairman WALSH. Are his conclusions as a general thing well founded?

Mr. BILLS. I don't remember them sufficiently to say.

Chairman WALSH. I thought maybe you would. Some of them were very striking, and I won't take time, at least not now, to go over them, but I thought maybe you could say in a general way, from your experience down there, whether his conclusions as a whole were sound?

Mr. BILLS. I really don't remember them sufficiently to say.

Chairman WALSH. Did the paper impress you, Mr. Bills?

Mr. BILLS. Very much.

Chairman WALSH. Was there anything in it that you would say was incorrect in his statement of conditions or conclusions or suggestions as to remedies?

Mr. BILLS. As he read his paper, my impression was that he had stated, as a general condition, many things which did not deserve to be called general though they might be true in individual cases.

Chairman WALSH. What, for instance?

Mr. BILLS. I don't remember.

Chairman WALSH. Please give us a general idea of the medical facilities for the urban population and the general health conditions existing there.

Mr. BILLS. The municipalities, all of them, maintain free dispensaries where medicines are given out. They, all of them, have hospitals, some of which are very inadequate. There are also private physicians. The director of sanitation stated, I believe, a year or so ago that there was 10,000 people who died there without medical facilities.

Chairman WALSH. Where was that?

Mr. BILLS. In Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. On the whole island?

Mr. BILLS. Yes; on the whole island.

Chairman WALSH. Ten thousand people out of the population of 1,000,000?

Mr. BILLS. Out of a population of a million and a quarter.

Chairman WALSH. Died without medical attention; in what year was that?

Mr. BILLS. During the preceding year—I am not sure of the year of which I am quoting.

Chairman WALSH. When was that stated—you say during the preceding year?

Mr. BILLS. It was stated, as I remember, about six months ago.

11102 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Chairman WALSH. That was last year, then?

Mr. BILLS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You heard the statement of Mr. Iglesias with reference to the contract that was made by the Free Federation, called the Fajardo Plantation?

Mr. BILLS. I did.

Chairman WALSH. What do you say about that situation? You have gone into that community into a great many places. I mean, as to how contracts were performed. Did you make some memoranda of some of this matter?

Mr. BILLS. I did, of a few things.

Chairman WALSH. Did it include that?

Mr. BILLS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I will wait a little later, and perhaps it will be a little more convenient and better for you and for the commission to make comment on those matters altogether, that you think are worthy of comment, and I am obliged to you for making it.

Is it your opinion that the diet of the average family in Porto Rico is sufficient to keep them in good working condition?

Mr. BILLS. I think the diet, so far as the nourishment included in it is concerned, is sufficient.

Chairman WALSH. How as to quantity?

Mr. BILLS. I think that, in a general way, they have sufficient quantity. I have put that question to a great many physicians who have worked among those people. As to variety, I should not think it was sufficient.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There are fairly large families there in Porto Rico, are there not?

Mr. BILLS. The average in 1910 was 5.1, and the average among the agricultural laborers is probably one or two higher than that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Where do you get your deduction that you think they are fairly well fed? How is it possible on the wage they receive that an average family of more than five is fairly well fed?

Mr. BILLS. I am frank to say that my impression, when I first went to Porto Rico, and for months after I had been there, was that the laboring masses of the island were very inadequately fed; but I have put that question to physicians who know much more about it than I do, and they almost universally say it is not so; that they are adequately fed as far as nourishment is concerned.

Chairman WALSH. I do not remember the date of that report of the department of labor; but you remember that Mr. Iglesias submitted it and I read it here, that his impression as a whole was that they were anemic?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir; as a result of the hookworm.

Chairman WALSH. They did not say it was the hookworm, but that it was a result of their being underfed.

Mr. BILLS. What was the date of that, Mr. Iglesias?

Mr. IGLESIAS. 1905. Mr. Bills also stated that in one of his reports.

Chairman WALSH. That they were underfed?

Mr. BILLS. That is what I stated in our first annual report.

Chairman WALSH. What year was that?

Mr. BILLS. 1912.

Chairman WALSH. 1912?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir; and my impression—the impression of a layman, I think, certainly would be that they are underfed; but I was simply deferring my opinion to that of the physicians, whom I thought knew more about it than I did.

Chairman WALSH. What was the date of that report where you say you think they are underfed; that was your first annual report?

Mr. BILLS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What year was that?

Mr. BILLS. December, 1912.

Chairman WALSH. When did you get this additional information from talking to physicians as to the cause?

Mr. BILLS. Since then.

Chairman WALSH. So you have changed your opinion about that?

Mr. BILLS. My opinion has been governed by the medical men with whom I have talked. My notion, as a layman, is that they are certainly inadequately fed.

Chairman WALSH. How many physicians did you talk to?

Mr. BILLS. I presume I talked to—I don't know how many—20 or 30, or more.

Chairman WALSH. Did you take down what they said about it?

Mr. BILLS. No.

Chairman WALSH. Did you talk to them as an officer, as an official, to put it in your statistics?

Mr. BILLS. That matter was always brought up in connection with other matters of information. I was talking with them to get information.

Chairman WALSH. Has the data been preserved in some sort of way? That is, as to who the physician was, and where and when he said it, and what opportunity he had for observation of the different classes of people; whether urban laborers or agricultural laborers?

Mr. BILLS. I can name one physician, whom I remember well, a Dr. Stevenson.

Chairman WALSH. My question was whether that data was preserved and put in statistical shape?

Mr. BILLS. No.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It was verbal conversation?

Mr. BILLS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And no notes?

Mr. BILLS. No.

Chairman WALSH. Who was Dr. Stevenson?

Mr. BILLS. An American physician practicing in a little country mountain town. How long he has been there I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Is he a general practitioner?

Mr. BILLS. Yes. I had a long talk with him about the nourishment of the mountain peasants living through that section whom he knows very well.

Chairman WALSH. Any other physicians that you recall by name?

Mr. BILLS. I really have talked with so many physicians that I can not recall whether or not I talked with them about this particular thing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You got out among them, and you knew the people yourself generally?

Mr. BILLS. Yes; I have been, I think, in most every square mile of Porto Rico.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You have been in the huts or dugouts where the people live?

Mr. BILLS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And have seen them there and the things they have in their houses?

Mr. BILLS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And haven't you formed some sort of practical idea as to whether these people get sufficient food?

Mr. BILLS. I intended to state my practical idea. I have been right there and have stayed with them, and my practical idea is that I could not live on what they live on.

Chairman WALSH. As they go at their meals do they act like they were hungry or that their appetites are not good? I do not want to suggest it to you, but there are a lot of ways I have of determining whether a person is hungry or not. Do they look hungry to you?

Mr. BILLS. The laborers who get the lowest wages eat what they call "peaches," a kind of banana, which they boll green, and which costs practically nothing. And I have seen such laborers eat a tremendous plate of those bananas and just a penny's worth of rice and beans. And they certainly seem to be good, husky, hungry laborers.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you may start on your own comments, please, Mr. Bills. While I have that in mind please give me briefly a little history of this Fajardo matter. Mr. Iglesias claims they finally got an agreement with that particular company; that they entered into a regular contract, and that no sooner was the contract entered into and signed up—and I believe the labor department took part in the conference—that within a day or two the employers went about among the ignorant and illiterate laborers and suggested to them that they change the contract almost at once, with a result that in three days the contract was broken, the employers claiming that these men who Mr. Iglesias claims they provoked into breaking the contract were not typical; and he has here statements of 500 of those laborers that they did not break the contract, but were glad to keep it; and then he produced a telegram of which he complains you wired them to put up with it and not try to have a strike about it.

Mr. BILLS. I would like to ask Mr. Iglesias if he has the Spanish telegram? I heard the translation. It was sent in Spanish, and I remember dictating that telegram to my stenographer, and it is not translated correctly into English.

Chairman WALSH. Have you the Spanish telegram, Mr. Iglesias?

Mr. IGLESIAS. I will look and see if I have it.

Mr. BILLS. The same thing is true of an English translation of an interview that went to the papers there which Mr. Iglesias introduced here.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you speak Spanish before you went down there?

Mr. BILLS. I did not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Did you learn Spanish since you went down?

Mr. BILLS. I can convey my ideas and understand.

Chairman WALSH. Does your secretary send your telegrams?

Mr. BILLS. Yes; he does that.

Chairman WALSH. That is, he translates them into Spanish for you, or into English?

Mr. BILLS. Yes; into Spanish.

In regard to the Fajardo strike, as I remember, the bureau received a telegram from the union organizer—I think his name is Santos—requesting us to act.

Mr. Honoré, my assistant, went there. He was on a trip to Rio Grande and other places, and he went, according to what he told me, to Mr. Bird, the manager of the centrale, and also of the plantation, and requested him to meet the representatives of the strikers. Mr. Bird refused, saying he was perfectly willing to meet with his employees or those who had been his employees, but was not willing to meet with the cigar makers who knew nothing about his business, and the organizers of the strike were members of the free federation and practically all cigar makers; but, by some means, Mr. Honore persuaded Mr. Bird to meet Mr. Iglesias, and I think Mr. Iglesias said the conference lasted some hours, and, as I understand it, no agreement was reached, and, finally, Mr. Honoré suggested this sliding-scale plan, and that was signed.

Two or three days later Mr. Bird came to San Juan and complained that the laborers on the plantations refused to work, saying they were not represented by Mr. Iglesias, and refused to go back to work.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Have you any writing about the workingmen taking this course?

Mr. BILLS. I have not. I stated that was what Mr. Bird said.

Chairman WALSH. I will have to inform you, Mr. Iglesias, that we do not allow persons in the audience to ask questions.

Mr. BILLS. Mr. Honoré first went out to Fajardo to investigate and see if he could not settle it. I heard Mr. Iglesias say here that Mr. Honoré, with the management of the centrale, visited various sections. That complaint was made in Porto Rico, and I asked Mr. Honoré about it, and he said he offered to furnish a horse for the labor representative there, and I knew nothing more about it than that. Mr. Honoré came back and told me that both sides were violating the contract; that there were large sections where the laborers refused to go back to work and other large sections where although Mr. Bird himself did not know about it they were not paying wages according to that agreement. We took the matter up with Mr. Bird, and he informed the Government officially that he considered the contract broken because the laborers had not gone back to work.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, what do you think about that proposition? Did Mr. Bird or the men break it?

Mr. BILLS. I wish to add that about a month later I was through that section and stopped to talk with probably 10 groups of laborers along the road, and they were all being paid by the terms of that contract, and that was a week after the strike situation on the island had ended.

Mr. Bird's statement was that he was endeavoring to carry out the terms of that contract as far as he could.

Chairman WALSH. Did you tell Mr. Bird what you found, and did you say to him, "It looks to me as though these men wanted to carry out that contract"? Did you bring any influence to bear on him to do it, if possible?

Mr. BILLS. I certainly did.

Chairman WALSH. Just from your opinion, did you think the men, in bad faith, violated that contract?

Mr. BILLS. I do not think there was any bad faith anywhere.

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. Bird violate it, do you think? Did he intend to violate it?

Mr. BILLS. No; I do not think he did; in fact, I am very emphatic that Mr. Bird would have carried it out.

Chairman WALSH. Is Mr. Bird an American?

Mr. BILLS. No; he is a Porto Rican. He is a man of very high standing in Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. Are you well acquainted with him?

Mr. BILLS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. How many men has he working for him?

Mr. BILLS. I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. A very great number?

Mr. BILLS. He has the third largest centrale in the island. Mr. Bird has always been perfectly willing to show his pay rolls, etc., which, under the law, we can not compel.

Chairman WALSH. He is obliging.

Mr. BILLS. I will say that he has the best plantation houses of anyone I know of.

Chairman WALSH. Where is his residence?

Mr. BILLS. At Fajardo.

Chairman WALSH. Is that the name of the town?

Mr. BILLS. Yes. Now, that agreement, while perhaps scientific, was really complicated, and in fact the laborers told me later when I saw them that they were misformed as to the price of sugar by people who wanted to hurt Mr. Bird. They were told, "Sugar is now worth 7 or 8 cents," and they were not getting a corresponding wage, while the fact was that sugar was worth only 4 cents.

Chairman WALSH. So it was difficult to carry it out.

Now, we are just about to adjourn and have just a minute or two and you may explain about that Spanish telegram.

Mr. BILLS (translating the Spanish telegram). "Mr. Bird has notified the Government officially that the laborers have not complied with their part of the contract. He considered (not the bureau, but Mr. Bird) the contract null. I hope all differences can be arranged. Now, I really don't know the meaning of this word.

Mr. IGLESIAS. "Without strike;" "without requiring a strike."

Mr. BILLS. And considering the fact that there had been a strike and a settlement, I am sure labor leaders in this country would have gone personally to Mr. Bird to see if the new difficulty could not be arranged.

Now, this is an example of the sort of criticism which has been made—simply on the technicality of a word.

Chairman WALSH. Now, that you have translated that; was the translation given by Mr. Iglesias correct or incorrect?

Mr. BILLS. I think it was incorrect.

Chairman WALSH. In what respect?

Mr. BILLS. Because, as I remember it, it said or it indicated that Mr. Bird said that the laborers were not complying with their part of the contract, and therefore I considered the contract broken.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until 9.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

(Accordingly, the commission adjourned on Wednesday, May 26, 1915, until 9.30 o'clock Thursday morning, May 27, 1915.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., Thursday, May 27, 1915—9.30 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners Weinstock and O'Connell.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Bills, please. We will resume where we left off.

Mr. BILLS. I don't remember exactly—

Chairman WALSH. We were talking about the Fajardo business, and your last answer was that Mr. Bird notified—oh, yes; you just read that telegram or just translated it.

Mr. BILLS. I would like to add to what I said about the strike at Fajardo that two or three weeks after the strike was over, according to information gathered by the inspectors of the bureau of labor, the average daily wage of the 3,000 or more employees of Mr. Bird had increased from 60 cents a day to 72 cents a day.

Chairman WALSH. Was that the average daily wage of the day laborer?

Mr. BILLS. The adult male day laborer.

Chairman WALSH. Has Mr. Bird any factories or refineries?

Mr. BILLS. Not a refinery, but a factory where the cane is ground and reduced to raw sugar.

Chairman WALSH. What wages are included in that?

Mr. BILLS. Just the field labor.¹ And although Mr. Bird did inform the Government that he considered the contract broken, I believe that he has lived up to that contract in every case where the workers went back to work. I say this out of justice to Mr. Bird.

Chairman WALSH. Did they go back to work under the contract?

Mr. BILLS. No; but were paid under the contract.

Chairman WALSH. Is the contract still in force on Bird's plantation?

Mr. BILLS. I don't know whether Mr. Bird considers it in force or not.

Chairman WALSH. Is it in force?

Mr. BILLS. The laborers are being paid, as far as any information I have, according to the terms of that contract.

Chairman WALSH. All right, you may go ahead now with your own comments, Mr. Bills.

Mr. BILLS. In reviewing the questions that you gave me to answer, I am afraid that I have given very fragmentary answers, and I really hope the commission will consider these reports of the bureau of labor.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, we do. As far as I was concerned, our questions were touching the large topics from your viewpoint. You have the reports there and those reports will of course be deeply considered.

Mr. BILLS. What I meant to say was that my fragmentary answers might be unfair or untrue as generalizations, in some cases. Also Mr. Iglesias said yesterday that there was a change in the tone of our reports after the first special report. Now, I think that is true. There has been no change in the statement of facts. There has been a change in the expression of opinions. I mean by that, that I don't give opinions.

(See supplementary statement by Mr. Bills at end of his testimony, p. 11115.)

Chairman WALSH. You don't give opinions?

Mr. BILLS. I try not to.

Chairman WALSH. Why is it, have you gotten a different viewpoint, become more judicial?

Mr. BILLS. I was 26 years old when I went to Porto Rico, and I mention that to show that a later study of conditions there convinced me that my point of view was not entirely true. That is, the climate, the food that they have, and the customs fixed upon them through centuries must be considered.

Chairman WALSH. Shouldn't you consider the customs that have been fixed upon the others for centuries—the employer? Do you see more justification now, after men working for 30 cents a day, than before you went down there? You have been accustomed to the changed conditions and changed ideals, we may say.

Mr. BILLS. No; if I may continue, the customs must be considered in suggesting remedies. The mere doubling of wages in a majority of cases would not improve the standard of living.

Chairman WALSH. Why?

Mr. BILLS. Because the laborer would not work full time. This is a charge made by almost every employer in Porto Rico, and one that I did not believe in until I saw a hundred or more pay rolls, including the pay rolls in the Government service; but they proved to me that if the standard of living was fixed at $2 or $3 a week, and if the laborers received more than that, they didn't work one or two or three days each week. I don't say that is universally true, but generally true; that in order to increase wages we have to look at the same time to the raising of the standard of living. Slight increases undoubtedly could be made without having that result.

Chairman WALSH. Then what you would have in mind about increasing the wages is that it would be a bad thing for the laborer?

Mr. BILLS. No; I do not mean to say that.

Chairman WALSH. Really, I don't understand your viewpoint exactly about that. I don't get that exactly. Now, when you went down there you indicated that the laborer was getting 30 or 40 cents a day; that it rather shocked you?

Mr. BILLS. It did shock me.

Chairman WALSH. And after you were there for a while you found out they had the hookworm, or were shiftless, and if you gave them more money they would not work so much, and it didn't make any difference; that it would not be worth while giving it to them?

¹ Factory laborers are generally skilled men and are paid double or treble the rates paid field workmen.—J. C. BILLS, Jr.

Mr. BILLS. I don't mean that.

Chairman WALSH. I don't want to put any words in your mouth, but I wish you would make that plainer.

Mr. BILLS. I don't think the laborers of Porto Rico are shiftless, but it is very difficult for any person to use profitably an increase in their income unless they know how to use that increase, and while the standards of living of the agricultural laborers have been on the $3-a-week basis, an increase does not mean that they will build any better houses or wear any better clothing. Their standard of living in their own community, their social position, is fixed.

Chairman WALSH. Their social position is fixed?

Mr. BILLS. In their own community. I think there is another reason for this, that during the idle season they are obliged to live, because there is no work, on such a low standard of living that during the other months and when business is good and they could earn a little more they have no incentive to do it, because their position in their own community is fixed.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask you a few questions right there.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Some years ago, Mr. Bills, when I was at Manila, in talking with one of the commissioners, he said that in handling the affairs of the Government there was one very great problem, and that problem was how to get them to work. He said if they earned enough to keep them that day that they would knock off, and could not be induced to go back to work until they had consumed what they had earned. And he asked if I had not noticed this in my world-wide experience. And my answer was to raise the ambition of the natives and increase their wants, and in order to fill their increased wants they would work more continually. Is the condition at Porto Rico the same as the conditions in the Philippines?

Mr. BILLS. I think you have stated the condition as it is in Porto Rico, generally among the agricultural laborers, but that does not apply to the workers in the towns, who have acquired higher standards of living.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Who have greater ambitions?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then the science is to raise their ambitions and increase their wants, and instead of preaching the simple life that you ought to preach a complex life?

Mr. BILLS. Absolutely. I would like just a word on this report.

Chairman WALSH. I might just say a word in that connection. You do not find the Porto Rico laborer any different from what you find other laborers, than from what you find Col. Weinstock and myself?

Mr. BILLS. How do you mean?

Chairman WALSH. Does not that follow with all people who are loafing because they do not have to work in every community? Is not that true? It is kind of a natural thing, if things are coming easy for a man who has worked pretty hard to accumulate something, then he indulges in world-wide investigations of other men and has a good time generally. Is not that true?

Mr. BILLS. I think that is true.

Chairman WALSH. And is it not also a fact—you have made a study of this question—that there is not an exploited class of laborers in the world that they are not also condemned inferentially for being lazy or shiftless or bad or something else?

Mr. BILLS. I think that is true.

Chairman WALSH. The argument you make about these men in Porto Rico is the argument that we hear about the exploitation in lumber camps or any place else. It is the old story, isn't it, that if a fellow is exploited, he is also abused?

Mr. BILLS. It is the old story.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Not necessarily, if I may be permitted.

Chairman WALSH. Let me get the witness to say it, and maybe he will go back on you. [Laughter.] I want to clinch this down for you, Mr. Weinstock.

It is the same old story. Here is a man getting 30 cents a day; it is an awful thing, you think; but after you look over the field awhile and you meet Mr. Bird and find out he is the very best employer in the island, that cuts a figure. It is kind of a justification of the employer, and it is rather a complex thing, and you look at it awhile, and then you find out they have the hookworm, or some doctor thinks they have the hookworm, and then you find out that if one of these men gets $2 and has it on hand he will lay off for a day or two and go and have some fun home; so you begin to see—I am speaking generally; I do not mean you, you understand—that it would not make much difference to pay him more anyhow, and besides he has a social status—though, of course, some of us do not agree that anybody has a social status—and it is fixed by the centuries. It has made him bare-footed, with a straw hat on his head, and maybe in centuries he will grow out of that. All these things enter into the situation. Whenever there is such a class of laborers that is the situation. Is not that true economically, although that is like one of Brother Weinstock's questions. I ask myself a nice long question, and answer it. Go ahead, Mr. Bills. My answer is yes. [Laughter.]

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is it true, Mr. Bills, that that charge can be laid against the workers of all the rest of the world? Is it not true that that charge can not be laid, for example, against the Chinese coolies, who are thrifty and industrious at all times, and does not that hold also with the Japanese?

Chairman WALSH. Are the Chinese thrifty?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Absolutely, at all times.

Chairman WALSH. I understood they hit the pipe and loafed around.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But you do not get the real Chinaman here.

Chairman WALSH. You leave out those Chinamen on West Sixth Street in Kansas City! [Laughter.]

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you have studied the problem of Asiatic labor, as I take it you have, Mr. Bills, you will find the same charge that is made against the Filipinos is not made against the Chinese and is not made against the Japanese; that they are thrifty and industrious, no matter how much they earn they keep on working and do not lay off simply because they have enough to keep them for the next few days. Therefore I think the statement of our friend the chairman will not stand the test of analysis.

Chairman WALSH. And your answer is no. [Laughter.]

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Let me see if I can——

Chairman WALSH (interposing). Arbitrate this matter?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, possibly.

What is the objection to these people if their wages were raised and they discovered that they did not need to work so much and could live by working only three days a week? That would not be the justification for keeping them under a reduced wage?

Mr. BILLS. I did not mean to justify the reduced wage.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There is no law against these men learning to save a little and lay aside a few pennies for a rainy day, so called, and teaching them to save something.

Mr. BILLS. The fact is that they do not save anything. The fact is most of them do not save a thing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There is no reason why they should not be taught that that would be a good thing to do.

Mr. BILLS. I think that is what ought to be done.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They should be taught to lay aside a few pennies, regardless of their absolute indifference to it now.

Mr. BILLS. Absolutely. I have stated many times that I believe they were not receiving a fair wage—not merely a living wage, but a fair wage, considering the work they perform. Of course, that is something very difficult to determine.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Of course, a fair wage might be considered such there and not here. If a low wage be a wage upon which a family just exists, under our standard of living they do not live, they just exist; and if a standard wage was based upon the possibility of existing, China has us all beat 40 ways in the matter of living on a small wage, or existing, because a penny in wage in China is like a dollar in wage in the United States, and it is practically the same, to my mind, in the islands.

I want to get at a more serious aspect of this matter down there, to my mind. You, as I understand, under the law are authorized to report labor conditions in the island. That is, you make investigations of them and prepare reports to the governor. I am particularly interested in the charges that the police department interfere with public meetings, the breaking up of public meetings and the arresting of men or the shooting of people and all that, that has taken place down there. What has been your purpose or method of procedure? Do you make these investigations, and what recommendations do you make to the governor intervening your annual reports when you make them up? If a disturbance occurs some place and you make an investigation, do you immediately report to the governor your findings in the situation and make recommendations about it?

Mr. BILLS. We do.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As to whether, for instance, the police force have gone far beyond their authority and exercised rights they were not entitled to exercise and used means that were abusive; that were rather the cause of the disturbance than the preventative of it?

Mr. BILLS. We investigate particularly the causes of the disputes. The enforcement of the law of peace and order is not in any way under the bureau of labor, and the investigations regarding the excessive use of authority and things of that sort are made, I believe, always by the department of justice.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If you went to this town where this strike occurred that Iglesias was speaking of, where there were men shot, and it was a labor disturbance, you would naturally investigate that as a labor disturbance or labor strike. If you, upon investigation, learned that the police force had done certain things, you would make that a part of your report and a part of your recommendation to the governor?

Mr. BILLS. We never have.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would it be in connection with the disturbance?

Mr. BILLS. The disturbance is a matter which we never have been requested to do anything with. It is simply a question of the disputes and what methods can be adopted for settling them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does your office act in any way in the way of mediation and conciliation?

Mr. BILLS. That is exactly what we try to do. This last strike, as an illustration, started in Bayamon. The strikers called a meeting of the employers at the city hall on Sunday, and I attended. The meeting was very poorly conducted, and the employers were very angry because of insults they thought they had received. It took us a week of dealing with the larger employers before they were willing to meet in a conference called by the bureau of labor. Finally they agreed to make certain concessions, and a conference was called, and the matter was settled by an increase of 10 to 15 cents a day. That is always our procedure. We have no power to officially summon either side. We can only get a conference with the consent of both sides. We endeavor, before calling a conference, to find out what the real matters at issue are, to discuss those matters with both sides, to see what possible arrangements may be made, and then if they are willing we call the conference. In this last strike we obtained conferences, with the powerful assistance of the governor, acting directly on the employers in all the north coast places except one, and in some of the places on the southern coast. Our success, in other words, depends entirely, under the law, upon having the confidence of both sides. We have no power.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If a strike occurred on the island, on which there would be a number of people involved, and out of that strike grow disturbances and riots and deaths, and your department made an investigation of the cause of the strike, and you would not interest yourselves in any phase of it except just the strike itself and the cause of the strike; you would not ascertain that the police or other authorities had gone beyond what you considered their legal rights, and had been a party to inciting riots, for instance, or a party to unnecessary shooting or killing of people; do I understand you to say that would not be a part of your duty?

Mr. BILLS. We never have been called upon to make any investigation of disturbances, but, of course, in investigating the cause——

Commissioner O'CONNELL (interposing). What do you mean by having been called upon? Does somebody have to call upon you to go to a place where there is a strike?

Mr. BILLS. No; I am misstating myself. Of course, in investigating the causes we endeavor to obtain information, because it is pertinent to the cause itself, regarding any disturbances, and, while we made no investigation in Vleques, because it was impossible to get anyone there, one of our representatives did go to Juncos, where there was trouble during the strike, and I believe interviewed the strikers who had been arrested and the police and others there, and, in fact, obtained a conference and settlement there after the disturbance occurred.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, what ' want to find out is whether you in your investigation as you went to Juncos, would report to the government that you found a certain situation there, either that the strikers were at fault, in your mind, in striking, or that there was interference on the part of the police department unnecessarily, and that there was no occasion for it, and their pres-once there or their actions in being there intensified the situation. Did you make any conclusions which you passed to the government, except as we find it in your annual report?

Mr. BILLS. Orally; but in the report about the cigar makers' strike there are no opinions of any sort, and in the report we are making on the sugar strike I do not think there will be any opinions.

Chairman WALSH. Please follow with any comment you have to make, because those larger questions about the police, etc., as far as Mr. Weinstock and myself are concerned, we will take the statement of Mr. Travieso. Any comment you desire to make on anything you may do so.

Mr. BILLS. There is a paragraph on page 83 of this report on the housing conditions, May 30, 1914, that I would like to go into the record, descriptive of the character, in the matter we have just been discussing, of the Porto Rican laborers [reads]:

"To say that these people (speaking of the inland laborers) are contented and prefer to live as they do is not true. Customs clinch themselves upon a people so that they appear contented, and these inland laborers have lived under the same conditions for three centuries. Their standards of living are modest and their desires few. In this sense they are contented. Yet there is a deep and powerful change coming over them. They are going to the cities in greater numbers than ever before; their children are attending the little schools in the hills. New ambitions are awakening. When the dull season comes they can not find work. There are times when many of them are hungry. They are not contented.

"That the Porto Rican laborer is of a cheerful disposition is especially true of the so-called jibaro (rustic). He has been obliged to find his joy in simple things. He greets you with a smile; he welcomes you to his house and cheerfully divides his cup of coffee with you; he dances with a show of gayety on a Sunday afternoon. He is ever cheerful but not happy. There may be some customs and prejudices of minor importance that he is loath to change, but in the main he prefers to live as he does because he is obliged so to live. Those who adhere to the laissez faire policy and believe that conditions are good enough as they are do not know the real heart of these people. They need and deserve and must ultimately receive the opportunity to improve their living and working conditions."

Chairman WALSH. That is what report?

Mr. BILLS. That is the report on the housing conditions of laborers in Porto Rico of May 30, 1914.

Chairman WALSH. When was that report made?

Mr. BILLS. It was completed a year ago this coming July or August. There are many pictures in here of typical housing conditions.

There were a number of things mentioned by Mr. Iglesias and Mr. Martinez which do not seem to me to be very important, but they have been placed in the record, and they are not true or are exaggerated statements.

Mr. Iglesias claimed that during the last agricultural strike, after the settlement at Fajardo, the bureau of Labor stopped its efforts to obtain settlement because a committee of the sugar employers went to see the governor at that time, but that is not so. There was a committee of sugar men who went to see the governor. I heard of it and went to the governor. When I got there the sugar men had left. The governor said they had protested against the action of our men as fomenting the strike, but the governor said to me to go right ahead, if we were sure we were acting properly as officials, in the same line of action we had been following. After that occasion a conference and settlement came at Juncos. Inspector Escalat was at Humacao. Mr. Iglesias was present, and a settlement was reached, although we had not called that conference. Also, at Guayania, Ponce, Arecibo, Anaaco, we were working constantly. After that conference, due largely to the statement of Mr. Iglesias and his leaders, that the Governor of Porto Rico was with the strikers and that the governor wanted the strikers to win, and things of that sort, the employers became so angry that they would not meet in any conferences, although we were in constant communication with the central offices in San Juan, and as soon as we got a chance to have a conference we had one, but it was almost impossible to get a conference after that time. It is true that after that time I called in one of our inspectors, because I received information from the police department that he was associating constantly on the street, arm in arm, with some of the leaders of the strike.

Chairman WALSH. Who was that?

Mr. BILLS. One of the inspectors, Mr. Barrera. He was in an official capacity to get the two sides together, and he should not have thrown his influence on the side of the strikers. That is all there is of truth in that statement.

Mr. Martinez mentioned the sanitary conditions, stating that they were bad. That is true, but there has been a greater improvement in the sanitary conditions in the last few years than it is possible to imagine. We have a board of health which can issue regulations with the force of law, and there has been a great amount of legislation placed upon the books for the improvement of the housing conditions and sanitary conditions in general. And while it is impossible to enforce that law in one week or in one year, yet in the case of many of the houses for the laborers and factories these sanitary regulations have been complied with. I mention that to show that the government of the island, which is largely under the control of the Porto Ricans themselves, has become active, wide-awake, and constructive in its attitude toward these problems.

Chairman WALSH. When was your law passed limiting the age of children that could work in agricultural pursuits; that 10-year limitation?

Mr. BILLS. March, 1913.

Chairman WALSH. Passed by the legislature?

Mr. BILLS. Yes; after creating the bureau of labor. The bureau of labor started with my arrival there.

Mr. Martinez also mentioned the question of immigration. He implied that the Federal law was not in force in Porto Rico. The Federal law is in force in Porto Rico as well as in the States. Our immigrants there are not many. We get from 200 to 250 immigrants each year from St. Thomas and St. Kitts, a few of these coming on to the States. These people are not a progressive or efficient or good element in the community, and while very few are coming in I believe it would be well if the Federal immigration law could be made to exclude those people. They live in one little section of Puerta de Tiená and do create competition with the native laborers there, and because they speak English they have some advantage over the natives, which I think is unfair. Aside from that, there is practically no immigration into Porto Rico.

Now, in regard to this woman and child-labor law. I tried to state yesterday that it was in force in the urban sections, in factories, and so forth. It can not be applied, as far as children are concerned, to agricultural work, but does apply to women, and we are enforcing that as much as possible.

Chairman WALSH. I want a reference to that law. Is it in one of your publications?

Mr. BILLS. It is in the back of the second annual report.

Chairman WALSH. I want to see particularly that clause that makes exception when the child is with its parents.

Mr. BILLS. That exception was an amendment passed shortly before the law went into effect.

Chairman WALSH. There is no child under that law allowed to work that is under 10 years, regardless of parents or guardians?

Mr. BILLS. No; and it seems to me that it should be born in mind that our women and children in agricultural work are included, while in the United States such laws do not apply to agricultural work.

We also have other labor laws providing regulations as to scaffolding, and so forth. There have been 30 prosecutions in the last year, and only two were lost. And under the child-labor law we had 8 or 9 prosecutions and lost only 2. And the Porto Rican Tobacco Co., which, it was claimed, controlled the island, was prosecuted three times and a penalty assessed against it each time, the penalty running between $25 and $100.

Chairman WALSH. How much did the total penalties amount to?

Mr. BILLS. Two hundred dollars—one for $25, one for $75, and one for $100. Those cases were appealed to the district court.

Chairman WALSH. And were the verdicts affirmed?

Mr. BILLS. Yes; the verdicts were affirmed and the money actually paid. All these laws are mentioned in our report.

There is a growing middle class in Porto Rico. Dr. Wile, in his report in 1905, says practically there is none. It is a small class, but a growing middle class, of merchants, artisans, and so forth. Also something was said by Mr. Martinez about the Porto Rican control of the upper house and the danger of that to the people of the island. The Porto Ricans have had control of the upper house simply at the last session of the legislature, and at that session a workman's compensation act, carefully drafted, was passed by the upper house. It will speak for itself. A law providing for the sale of government land under very reasonable or nominal terms to laborers was passed. A law securing the payment of wages to laborers was passed, something similar to the Texas law requiring the payment of wages to railroad employees.

Chairman WALSH. Did I understand the workman's compensation act was passed by both houses?

Mr. BILLS. By the upper house.

Chairman WALSH. Your legislature convenes when—biennial sessions?

Mr. BILLS. Annual sessions.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a limitation on the length of time to which the legislature remains in session?

Mr. BILLS. Sixty days.

Chairman WALSH. Sixty days?

Mr. BILLS. And there was also a bill passed, an amendment to the woman-and-child-labor law, under which we could more adequately enforce that law. Three of them were new legislative enactments, and the other was an amendment to the woman-and-child-labor law. Only one of them passed the lower house. But to claim that Porto Rican control of the upper house is a detriment to labor I don't think is entirely fair.

Chairman WALSH. Please explain briefly how the upper house is chosen.

Mr. BILLS. They are appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the consent of the Senate of the United States.

Chairman WALSH. How many members?

Mr. BILLS. Eleven, seven of whom are Porto Ricans.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The mere fact that the upper house passed some legislation would not indicate that they were favorable to labor in that legislation. We have some cases here where for many years the Senate was known to be hostile to labor, yet legislation was passed in the Senate when it was well known that it could not go through the House.

Mr. BILLS. There was no reason to think that the lower house would not pass it.

Chairman WALSH. They were apparently in good faith about it?

Mr. BILLS. They were apparently in good faith, and I had talked with a majority of the members of the lower house.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Why did it not go through the lower house?

Mr. BILLS. One reason was that Mr. Iglesias got up on the platform at San Juan and delivered a speech, which was considered very critical and insulting to the lower house. A Porto Rican gentleman would not say those things of another and he does not expect anybody to say them of him.

Chairman WALSH. A Porto Rican gentleman would not say what things?

Mr. BILLS. What he said, insulting things, such as those stated by Mr. Iglesias from the platform. I don't mean to infer—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Mr. Martinez said—

Mr. BILLS. I don't mean to infer—

Chairman WALSH. You mean what you might call the upper class?

Mr. BILLS. No; I don't mean that.

Chairman WALSH. I don't understand exactly what you mean. What do you mean by saying a Porto Rican gentleman would not say anything that was insulting?

Mr. BILLS. He would not have expressed himself in that way. I don't remember the phraseology of Mr. Iglesias, but he would not have expressed himself in the way that Mr. Iglesias did.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Probably use other language that meant the same thing?

Mr. BILLS. He might have used other language that meant the same thing. A year before, or two years before, there came out an article in the labor press criticizing the lower house, and the animosity aroused in the lower house by such speeches and articles which it seemed to me were very inopportune developed a great deal of opposition to labor legislation.

Chairman WALSH. You think he was acting in too much haste about changing the conditions?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir; I think so.

Chairman WALSH. And spoke too forcibly about it?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Might not this construction be put upon it, Mr. Bills, that the members of the lower house would permit their personal feeling to influence them more than the spirit of statesmanship; that is, as to acts of resentment toward what you say was regarded as offensive statements on the part of the other witness, the members of the lower house in resentment simply turned down legislation?

Mr. BILLS. I am sure that that feeling influenced many members of the lower house who had no particular interest in this legislation; who we had worked with to arouse their interest. It was not a matter of personal opposition to the legislation because of their own private interests. Of course, they were not very vitally interested in it, or they would have passed it in spite of everything.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, the preceding witness, I can not think of the names—

Chairman WALSH. Iglesias.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Iglesias; is that the gentleman that made the speech?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir; he was the gentleman that made the speech.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In place of helping his cause then by his utterances antagonistic to the members he defeated his end?

Mr. BILLS. I feel frank in speaking of these things here, because I have talked of them with Mr. Iglesias and also with Mr. Gompers. I think he has by expressions of his own views at inopportune times, and I don't wish to say incorrectly, because he perhaps does generally speak the truth, but in effect defeated, or helped to defeat, the very cause for which he is working. And I mention it here simply because I think it throws some light upon the charge he has made against the government at this time.

Mr. Martinez also mentioned an investigation by this commission, or some commission of the United States Congress, of labor conditions in Porto Rico. I would like to add my word of request to that of Mr. Martinez. I think that if an investigation were made there the investigators going on horseback through the interior sections of the island, going into the huts, talking with the people, finding out their standards and customs, etc., that it would do a great deal of good. I have endeavored to arouse interest in the States in my small way regarding the conditions in Porto Rico. A couple of days ago I went over and talked with Secretary Wilson, endeavoring to get him to send an investigator there to make a report. He did not say whether they would or not, but I hope they will, because they can reach the American people where we can not. It is not merely for the laborers in the island, but for everybody in the island. We should have our conditions known here in the States, because our future is in the hands of the United States Congress, and we can not get favorable legislation, which the business people deserve and the laboring interests need, until there is some public interest in these matters in the United States.

(See supplementary statement by Mr. Bills at end of his testimony.)

Mr. Martinez or Mr. Iglesias stated that Federal laws do not apply to Porto Rico. Of course they do all apply to Porto Rico, except those that are, because of their nature, inapplicable. The Federal workmen's compensation act of 1913 applies only to interstate commerce and the District of Columbia, and did not, unfortunately, apply to Porto Rico.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There has never been any congressional investigation in the island?

Mr. BILLS. I think not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There has been individual congressional investigation; Members of Congress have been there and made personal investigations, but never by direction of Congress?

Mr. BILLS. I think not. There was an investigation made by a commissioner, Mr. Carroll, I think it was, shortly after the island was taken over.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes, sir; he was a representative of the department.

Mr. BILLS. And there have been two reports made by the department of labor. Mr. Iglesias made some charges against the police and governor, and so forth. He probably has the facts better than I have.

Chairman WALSH. I would suggest, in order to shorten things up, Mr. Weinstock made several suggestions that he would like to inquire about, and if it is satisfactory to you we will let Mr. Travieso go on the stand now, and you retain anything that you might want to say about these things.

Mr. BILLS. There are two or three things I would like to mention, omitting the general charges against the police, and so forth. Mr. Iglesias read a couple of sentences from our second annual report, stating the position of the bureau of labor, without reading the parts before or after. He has printed them once or twice in Porto Rico, as showing the attitude of the bureau of labor. I would like to have that whole paragraph marked in that report on page 9 inserted.

Chairman WALSH. While Mr. Travieso is on the stand you might mark that, and then come on and read the whole paragraph, whatever it is, and then show us, if you will, the changed conclusion that should be drawn from it. I don't want to hurry you off if you have any other matters. I believe you said you had one or two?

Mr. BILLS. Why, yes. Mr. Iglesias introduced a telegram from some laborer, which stated that Mr. Honore was defending a seduction case, I think, in the town of Mayaguez. I know nothing about that case, but that telegram by itself is unfair to Mr. Honore. A man who started in at the very bottom as a carpenter, and became a contractor, and worked nights, and entered the Federal civil service, and worked his way up in the post office at Mayaguez until he was next to the chief, and studied at nights——

Chairman WALSH. What was that charge, I wish you would bring it back to my mind?

Mr. BILLS. It was simply a telegram to him from some one, stating that Mr. Honore was defending a seduction case.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; I remember it now.

Mr. BILLS. And who by studying law at nights finally entered the bar in Porto Rico, and who has never used any of his official time in private practice, and, in fact, I know has never taken any case which in any way conflicted with his official duties. It seemed to me that that telegram in itself was unfair.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Honore, is he permitted to practice private law?

Mr. BILLS. There is no objection to it under the law, and in these cases he has gone before the court he has taken a vacation. It is better for the bureau of labor for him to take a day or two off now and then, than to take a month off solid.

Chairman WALSH. Does he attend to much private practice?

Mr. BILLS. I think he has had a half a dozen cases in the last year.

Chairman WALSH. And instead of taking his vacation when he gets these cases, he gets a furlough?

Mr. BILLS. Yes, sir; 10 or 12 days vacation, a day at a time.

Chairman WALSH. And what is the government regulations; how many days a year does he get?

Mr. BILLS. Thirty days, not counting holidays and Sundays.

Chairman WALSH. And instead of taking his vacation he goes and tries the case?

Mr. BILLS. He goes and tries the case. Mr. Iglesias also mentioned a statement in our bulletin on the housing conditions, in which I said that the landless man was not a good citizen. The context was not given, but what I wrote was that a man not owning land did not have the incentives to good citizenship that the man had that did own land, and that the government should establish conditions so that the laborers could own some land.

It was also said that the prisons and penitentiaries were full of poor men, that no rich men were in them. Within the last year Mateo Figardo, one of the wealthiest men there, has been convicted of violation of the internal-revenue law and sentenced to 10 months in jail. One of the leading merchants of San Juan——

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He has not been put in jail or the penitentiary?

Mr. BILLS. I think he is on bond now.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He has not been locked up?

Mr. BILLS. I don't think so. One of our leading merchants of San Juan was convicted of selling lottery tickets, and his case is before the United States Supreme Court, and in the last month a member of the pharmacy board, one of the influential citizens of the island, has been convicted of bribery.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But Mr. Iglesias said the jails were filled with poor people. You are citing cases where people were found guilty of crime, but are any of them in jail doing time?

Mr. BILLS. I have no doubt there are many in jail doing time. That, I don't know about; but I want to refute the inference that the department of justice is in favor of the rich and against the poor. I believe that is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. All right.

The following notes were subsequently submitted by Mr. Bills and refer to his testimony on the pages indicated:

NOTE TO PAGE 11106.

I should have added that our policy has been to publish the facts, concretely and in detail, and to leave the reader to form his own opinions. It is my experience that this method is usually more effective in bettering conditions than the expression of personal opinions which, while generally true, may not be true of particular instances and so tend to arouse opposition among persons who have been unjustly included in such opinions. The statistical work of a bureau of labor should, I believe, serve two purposes—first, to show the need of specific legislation to the members of the legislature and furnish them with data for the drafting of such legislation and, second, to educate employers and the public in general regarding actual conditions and suggest nonlegislative, as well as legislative, method of improving them. The personal opinions of the chief of a bureau of labor are not as effective in the accomplishment of these results as the frank and accurate statement of facts. My above answer is not, however, entirely true. The reader of any of our reports will find many expressions of opinion, but I have endeavored to support them by proof and to qualify them so that they would constitute real evidence of labor conditions and not be merely expressions of personal opinion. This is, I believe, the change to which Mr. Iglesias refers and I have made it intentionally.

There is no one in a position of authority in Porto Rico who has ever tried to conceal or minimize actual conditions, be they social, political, economic, or industrial. On the contrary, it is the hope of the people of the island that the United States Government will pay more attention to its conditions and so realize the necessity of remedying some of the urgent needs. The problem is to awaken interest in Congress so that legislation may be enacted which, under the present law, our local legislature can not pass. It is for this reason that I urge an investigation. But by investigation I do not mean a mere superficial study or a biased effort to prove predetermined beliefs. To be of any real service to the people of Porto Rico such investigation must be broad and thorough. It must include business, commercial, and political problems, as well as labor conditions. Climate, race, and custom must also be considered, and outside investigators can only appreciate their significance after close, personal contact with them. Certainly no social or labor legislation will be effective which can not be adapted to fundamental local conditions.

TESTIMONY OF MR. M. TRAVIESO.

Chairman WALSH. Your name, please.

Mr. TRAVIESO. M. Travieso, jr.

Chairman WALSH. And where do you reside, please?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I reside at San Juan, P. R.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a native of Porto Rico?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I was born in Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. And what is your business or profession?

Mr. TRAVIESO. My profession is that of attorney at law.

Chairman WALSH. Were you educated in Porto Rico or in this country?

Mr. TRAVIESO. At Cornell University, State of New York.

Chairman WALSH. And your present profession with the Government is what?

Mr. TRAVIESO. It is secretary of the island.

Chairman WALSH. And your appointment comes from where?

Mr. TRAVIESO. From the President of the United States.

Chairman WALSH. It is a direct appointment?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Direct appointment by the President.

Chairman WALSH. And your duties generally?

Mr. TRAVIESO. My duties are similar duties to that of a secretary of state of any of the States of the Union, and besides the duty of acting as governor of the island in the absence of the governor.

Chairman WALSH. And you were requested to come here, on a request we made to the government to have some one representing the government in Porto Rico at this hearing?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I have been told by Mr. Channery that you had made some notes of matters that transpired here, and that you are in a position to make a statement, which you desire to do without questioning?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. We would be very glad to have it, Mr. Travieso.

Mr. TRAVIESO. Mr. Chairman, before I take up several matters presented by Mr. Iglesias and Mr. Martinez, I want to make a general statement in regard to the general conditions of the island of Porto Rico. There are several facts which have not been brought to the attention of this commission, and which I believe will help the commission in forming an opinion as to the conditions in general in the island.

Several questions were submitted to me in writing by Mr. Channery, and the first one is this, to give a brief outline of the Porto Rican people by nationality, industries, and mental development. The commission well knows the people of Porto Rico. The natives are of Spanish descent, of Spanish origin. The majority of the population is of that origin, and with the exception of a portion of the population, which is of full negro blood of African descent. The principal industries in the island are the manufacture of sugar, of coffee, and tobacco. Those are the only ones, and for the last few years we have had much of fruit industry. The country, as has been stated, is mainly an agricultural country. The factories that we have are such that are necessary in the preparation of the product for market and the shipping to the market of the fruit.

The mental development of the people of the island is what is stated here, and I agree with every statement made by Mr. Martinez, as far as this point is concerned, that we for 400 years were under the Spanish Government, with nothing of public-school facilities or opportunity to improve our people mentally.

The result or at least the cause for the present condition is the ignorance of our masses, of our people. The man up in the mountain, the group-up man—I believe there is absolutely no hope for him as far as his mental condition is concerned. He does not know how to read or write, and probably has little notion about right and wrong, and nothing can be done as far as his education is concerned for him. He is not in a position to go to school and begin with his a, b, c's; he is too old for that, and our work is being concentrated and our hope of the future is in the children. I will explain later what the Government and everybody in the island, employers and employees, and everybody else, is doing for those children.

During the last 16 years—and I wish to refer to this point in the last report of the governor for 1914. As stated by Mr. Iglesias, the budget in 1898 was the year of American occupation, for educational purposes was but $60,000. I will refer to 372 of the report of the governor of Porto Rico, table 3, which gives the growth of the school system by years. The total appropriation for the year 1898-99, which was the first year under American occupation—and that was the first opportunity our people had of providing for education and we went as far as we could along that line, and from a total of about $60,000 under the Spanish Government our budget at once made big progress along that line, and we appropriated $279,216 for education.

Chairman WALSH. That is the next year?

Mr. TRAVIESO. That is the first year of the American occupation. We have always realized from the very beginning—and in fact we realized it before, but we had not the means in our hands for accomplishing it—that the solution of the Porto Rico problem, whether you look at it from the point of labor or from the social standpoint or from the political standpoint, is education. If we educate our man in the country, he will get a better wage, he will be a better worker, and he will have to get a better wage. His work will be much better, and if he progresses along that line he will progress also as far as wages are concerned.

Our budget kept increasing steadily from year to year up to the year 1912-13, when our total appropriation—that is, our insular revenues—was $1,902,711.68. In the year 1913-14 our appropriation was increased considerably, about 50 per cent, and we appropriated that year $2,745,740, which, together with the appropriations made by the school boards, brought the total figure over $3,000,000.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Was that the last year of Spanish rule?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I refer to 1913-14.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What was the last year of Spanish rule, and what was the appropriation made during that year?

Mr. TRAVIESO. About $60,000.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then it has increased about five times—no; much more than that.

Mr. TRAVIESO. Oh, yes; 50 times. I refer at this time to a complaint or grievance presented by Mr. Iglesias. Mr. Iglesias complains that the legislature at the last session or during the last year made a cut of $700,000 in the appropriation for education. He naturally wants to blame somebody, the government or the legislature, for doing it. I think it is my duty to explain to this commission the reasons for that little reduction.

In the first place, this large appropriation of $2,745,000 was made during the most prosperous year on the island of Porto Rico, when sugar was being sold at an unusually enormous price. The island was prosperous, the taxpayers were paying taxes without complaint, the customs revenues of the island, which, as you know, go into the insular treasury, were increased by the importation of much machinery, and it was a year of great activity in the island. Naturally everybody was pleased, and there was during the administration of Gov. Colton, to whom Mr. Iglesias refers as a very good governor—and I agree with him; no one can make any complaint about his administration. But we must consider the fact that he was handling the ship when the sea was quiet. Everybody was prosperous and naturally no complaint would be made. The wage earners were getting better wages than ever before. The sugar planters were making money and everybody there was paying taxes, and the legislature took advantage of that opportunity to appropriate, as far as it could go, $2,700,000 for education. But the prosperity did not last very long, and the tariff bill was presented in Congress for the reduction of the tariff. One of the provisions was a reduction on sugar for three years or two years, up to March, 1916. Next year, if nothing happens between now and then, sugar will be placed on the free list. Immediately that caused a financial panic in the island. The centrales, the corporations that own those sugar mills, are heavily indebted. Most of those mills were erected with machinery purchased on credit to be paid for in installments. The lands were also bought on credit and have mortgages on them. They had to bond all this property in order to raise funds for operating the mills.

When the threat of the reduction of tariff came and this panic ensued as a result of that, naturally everybody began to retrench in their expenses, and one of the necessary reductions was in the wages paid to the laborers. The laborers willingly submitted to a proportion of reduction in their wages, and there was a reduction in the activities of the island. The insular revenues have decreased ever since this tariff act went into effect to the amount of $370,000 or about that sum over the previous year, so in only one item of our income the customs revenues were reduced $350,000 by virtue of the tariff. Our sugar industry has been threatened with destruction by the tariff. Everybody agrees in the island—and it is a fact which this commission must bear in mind, and I hope the commission will give to the matter its due consideration—that this is the fact.

Mr. Iglesias has presented a pamphlet which I helped prepare and to which my name is attached. I was a member of that commission before Congress to oppose the passage of the free-sugar provision, and that pamphlet contains very good and complete information about our social conditions and our political conditions and everything, and the reasons why the free-sugar provision should not go into effect as far as Porto Rico is concerned. It will ruin our industry. I agree with Mr. Iglesias and Mr. Martinez that the condition of our labor is a disgrace to Porto Rico. I do not hesitate to call it a disgrace. I do not believe it is due to any intentional fault on the part of the employers. It is certainly not due to any negligence or failure to perform any duty on the part of the Government. It is simply, as I said before, the result of the work of centuries of ignorance of our people and, another point to which reference has not been made, to the excess of population which we have on the island.

Porto Rico has an area of 3,600 square miles and has a population of 1,200,000 inhabitants.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is the area?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Three thousand six hundred square miles.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How does it compare in size with any of our American States?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I think it is about the size of the State of Connecticut.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It has a population of how much?

Mr. TRAVIESO. One million two hundred thousand. It must be 1,250,000 by this time. If you divide the number of inhabitants by the number of square miles, you have an average population of 334 inhabitants to every square mile.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is a greater density than that of Connecticut, is it not?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I believe that Porto Rico is the second or third, taking it as a country. Taking it as a country, I think it is third in the world in density of population.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is the density greater or lesser than Belgium?

Mr. TRAVIESO. It is a little less, but it is either second or third to Belgium. The result of this is that, owing to this density of population, to the lack of factories and of industries and manufacturers in the island, the whole population of practically about 800,000 men in the whole island that do not own property, who are not landowners, have to make their living by working for somebody else. They have to be wage earners. Therefore, the supply of labor that we have in the island is greatly in excess of the amount of work to be done. That is the reason why there must be certainly unemployed people in the island.

Another fact that must be brought to the attention of the commission is this: Our crops naturally occur once a year. As to the coffee, as stated by Mr. Bills, the picking season is from about the middle of September to the beginning of January; that is about three and one-half months of the coffee crop. At that time there is great demand for hands. Sometimes even coffee is lost for lack of hands to pick it. But that lasts only about three and one-half months. At that time the men and women and children and anybody who is able to work go to the plantations and pick the coffee, and they make money. I have myself seen families—my father owns a coffee plantation, and I know more about coffee than sugar for that reason—and I have myself paid to a family of a man and wife and two or three children as much as fifteen or eighteen dollars a week for picking coffee. A good picker, a man who is an expert, ought himself, without the help of anybody, to pick five or six hundred pounds a day, and with the help of his family naturally he gets a much larger amount. When the coffee season is closed the women and children do not work. The work is left only for the men then. If during the coffee-picking season you have to employ, say, 200 men, women, and children, the rest of the year all you have to do is to prune the trees and clean the land and keep it in condition for the next crop, and that work you can do, perhaps, by employing a force of 15 or 20 men. They go from one place on the plantation to the other. The rest of the people have to go somewhere else to get a living. They go down to the flatlands, down to the seashore where the cane grows. That increases the supply of labor in the cane lands.

I know it is a fact in a good many cases that the employers prefer to employ a greater number of men than that and to pay them a lower wage so they all may have an opportunity to earn something and, anyway, get enough to live, so they will not starve. They employ a greater number of men than needed rather than employ a smaller force of men at a higher wage. I know of cases where the men in the plantation have been called in, and it had happened on my father's plantation, and that situation put before them. The situation is this, so far as coffee is concerned: We lost our European markets. During the Spanish Government all our coffee was sold in Europe—in France and as far as Russia and Italy. That market was closed by the application to our products—by treating our products as American products. The protective tariff of the United States, which does not protect us, as far as the articles that we need are concerned, operated against us as far as our exportation was concerned, and our coffee was considered as an American product and treated accordingly. Therefore, the duties having gone up, the price has come down, from as high as 32 and 35 pesos of Spanish money that we sold coffee for prior to the American occupation, down as low as $8 or $9.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is not a fair comparison—between 35 pesos and $8?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I will give the reduction from pesos to dollars. A peso was equivalent to 60 cents American gold, so that 35 pesos would be about $21. This year it has been sold at $11 or $12.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. At what rate can you raise coffee profitably?

Mr. TRAVIESO. It costs between seven and a half and eight dollars a hundred pounds to produce it ready for the market. That is the reason the coffee growers are not making money. During the coffee-picking season they have to pay the usual price, and people make money, but the rest of the year the plantation is not producing enough to justify the usual expenditure of money in improving. People are simply holding on to what they have, waiting for better prices.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are wages higher or lower than when you were getting 25 pesos per hundred pounds?

Mr. TRAVIESO. You can see these wages are about the same, and have been about the same all the time, with very slight variation. What has changed is the number of men employed. They do not employ so many men because they can not afford to improve the plantation. They do not get their money back if they put it into the land. The wages are lower because they are employing more men than they need in order to keep them alive. I know in the case of my own father he has been losing money because the plantation is making nothing. His profession is that of physician, and he can live without the plantation, yet he realizes the situation, and he has there 15 or 20 farmers living on the plantation. They have houses built for them, and they have a piece of land to cultivate if they want to. He called these people to him and said, "I can not give work to every one of you at the wage you have been getting during the good years. I know all of you have to live, and I will agree to pay you as a wage enough to keep you alive; or you can work one day and the other man can work the next day at the full wage." In that way they are all getting enough to live; they are not starving or going hungry, and naturally are getting wages lower than a man should get.

No one denies that the men in Porto Rico, as a general rule, the agricultural hands, are underpaid. There is no one who denies that, even the planters themselves, and the question is whether under existing conditions they can afford to do better.

Now, I have taken too long, but I think I ought to explain those facts so that the testimony of Mr. Iglesias may be taken together with this explanation.

Chairman WALSH. You made it very clear, I think.

Mr. TRAVIESO. The school facilities of Porto Rico—not to make my testimony too long I am going to leave with the commission for reference a volume containing the report of the Governor of Porto Rico for 1914, which contains as an appendix the reports of all of the heads of the departments of the island, and the report of the commissioner of education is very clear and specific about the number of children going to school.

The total enrollment of the children for years of 1913 and 1914, which is the last report I have, was 207,010 in all of the schools of the island. The number of children in the rural schools was 109,524, and in the urban or city schools the enrollment was 70,954.

Now, we realize, and always have, that the most of our appropriation for education should be spent in the rural schools. We want to put our money to the best use we can by furthering the advantages for education in the lower schools. And even this last year, when we were compelled to reduce our budget because our revenues had decreased and the condition of the island did not justify the appropriation of more money, we had to cut it about $700,000 as compared with the previous budget; but we made a resolution in the legislature and insisted all the way through—I was a member of the conference committee of the budget as finally passed by the legislature, and we decided we would sacrifice anything, from the university down to the high schools or any other active educational department, rather than close a single rural school, and we carried that program through; and I can show this commission that not a single rural school was opened in the year of the greatest prosperity of the island which is not closed when conditions have changed; they are all still open.

Chairman WALSH. Where did the cut fall?

Mr. TRAVIESO. We cut from the university.

Chairman WALSH. How much from the university?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I think the cut from the university was $80,000 from the total appropriation.

Chairman WALSH. Where did the next cut fall?

Mr. TRAVIESO. We cut from what we considered somewhat of a luxury, and that was the domestic science school.

Chairman WALSH. How much of a cut fell on the domestic science department?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I could not give you exact figures on that from my memory, but I can assure the commission—

Chairman WALSH. If you can do it, I wish you would analyze that, so we might have it when we come to make a report—just where the cut fell in practical operation.

Mr. TRAVIESO. I do not know whether I can from the data we have at hand, because all this happened last January, and I do not think I have any report, but I can get the facts for the commission.

Chairman WALSH. Will you attempt to do so before the 1st of July?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes. I can get the exact figures and submit them to the commission.

(See Travieso Exhibit No. 1 at end of this subject.)

Chairman WALSH. Could you say from recollection whether or not the cut resulted in the closing of any of these schools entirely?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No schools have been closed except those I have mentioned.

Chairman WALSH. And your machinery is all still there?

Mr. TRAVIESO. What is that?

Chairman WALSH. Your machinery is all there for carrying on education?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes; we simply have closed some of the shops for lack of men to run them. It has not been due to the desire on the part of anybody to curtail our educational department; if we had more money, we would get the vote of every man in the island to put it back in education. The percentage of our expense for education has been almost steadily about 30 or 33 per cent; one-third of our total appropriation has gone to education. The budget for this year is three million—the total budget of the island is $3,600,000, and about one million and a quarter is appropriated by the legislature for education; that is, without the appropriation of the school boards.

Chairman WALSH. What was your total budget last year for all purposes?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Our total budget for last year for all purposes was about $4,000,000; a little over four million, perhaps two or three hundred thousand more.

Chairman WALSH. Compared with what—this year?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Three million six hundred thousand dollars.

Chairman WALSH. A falling off of about $500,000?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir; a falling off of about $500,000. We simply could not go any higher. I might say in passing that high budget I read, the highest in our history, when we appropriated $3,000,000 for education, the entire budget was $7,000,000 for the whole island, nearly twice the amount usually appropriated. We all went crazy and appropriated money, not blaming anybody, and we did that from our desire to appropriate as much as possible for education. We had money, and the best use we could put it to was to appropriate it for schools, which we did. The following years we found we could not repeat the performance, and we had to come back to the ordinary circumstances and cut it several hundred thousand dollars, as stated by Mr. Iglesias.

Chairman WALSH. Which was the high year on school appropriations? Has it been uniform in progress or was it higher, say, for the years 1913 and 1914?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes; we almost doubled the appropriation that year.

Now, the general status of the laboring population and the attitude of the legislative bodies toward labor legislation. The legislative history of Porto Rico in regard to labor legislation really begins with the year 1902, when the first laborers' liability act was passed in the island. That statute, its main feature, and the only one worth mentioning here, was the one that limited the right of the employee in the case of injury to recover. He could sue his employer for any amount not exceeding $2,000 in case of personal injury, and in case of death his family was entitled to sue the employer for any amount not to exceed $3,000. That law was enforced until the year 1912, I think, or 1913, when I introduced a bill into the legislature to repeal that section of the law where it limited the right of the employee, so far as the amount was concerned. The bill passed both houses, and it became a law, placing the employee upon the same footing as any other citizen, as far as his personal right to recover damages was concerned.

Chairman WALSH. It repealed the limitations of the former law?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. In case of both death and of injury?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes; so that the employees of to-day are on the same footing and on the same level as any other citizen.

Chairman WALSH. Was any part of that fixed liability a penalty?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No; it was simply that he had to bring his case in court and could not recover more than $3,000. The legislature, when their attention was called to that fact, said they understood that was a great injustice to the laboring classes, and by a unanimous vote of both houses repealed the same.

That same law provided for a commission to make a study of the matter of a workmen's compensation act. The commission made a study of the several bills that have been passed in the United States along the line of compensation, but left aside the question of an insurance plan for the workmen of the island. They presented to the legislature a report, submitting a draft of a bill. The bill, after very hard opposition in the lower house, both by men who were interested by not having any compensation act, because it injured their interests, and also on constitutional grounds the bill was very strongly opposed, and passed the house by only one majority, and it was sent to the council, and in the council I am personally in favor of an insurance plan, as far as Porto Rico is concerned; I think the result would be better, and the benefits to the employees would be greater and safer. So I took up the question from the insurance standpoint and made quite a study of it, and submitted in the council a substitute bill to take the place of the house bill.

Mr. Iglesias read a letter on yesterday from the speaker of the house in regard to my bill, which shows two things—that the honorable speaker never read my bill or forgot what he read. In this letter he says to Mr. Iglesias:

"Relative to the difference between the bill of Mr. Travieso in the executive council and one introduced by myself in the lower house, there is but one important difference, namely:

"In Mr. Travieso's bill the compensations are to be paid from an insurance fund created by the laborers themselves, who are to pay out therefor part of their wages by the employer and the people of Porto Rico, whereas in my bill the compensation is to be paid out by the responsible employer alone, and no objection would be made if the employer chose to take insurance policies for his men."

Now, that is not correct, because my bill specifically provides for an insurance fund created by an appropriation by the insular legislature of $50,000 to start the operation of the law, which sum is to be refunded back to the Government from premiums collected by the Government itself through its fiscal agents from the employers; and there is a provision in my bill, very clear and specific, which I took from the laws in force in the United States, which makes it a misdemeanor, punishable by two years in prison or a fine of $5,000, if any employer should deduct a single cent from the wages of his employees as a contribution to an insurance fund, so that the burden of my bill falls entirely upon the shoulders of the employer.

Chairman WALSH. Then that was either a complete misstatement or misapprehension?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes; a complete misstatement or misapprehension.

Chairman WALSH. So the only objection he makes to your bill does not exist?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No. This bill introduced in the council two years ago as a substitute for the house bill. The speaker took the position that his bill should be passed like he wanted it or no legislation should be enacted at that session. That happened during the last few days of the session, when we were overburdened with work, and the result was no legislation was passed as far as the compensation act was concerned.

This year, last January, I revised my bill and improved it considerably and introduced in on the opening day of the session of the legislature.

Chairman WALSH. Was the compensation for death—what was the compensation for death in your bill?

Mr. TRAVIESO. In case of death the family of the man gets $1,500 in cash; that is to enable them to get a house and have a home, and then they get payments—weekly payments, of, I believe—one-half of the wages that the man was getting at the time of his death.

Chairman WALSH. For how long?

Mr. TRAVIESO. For a period of—I would not like to state that from memory. Unfortunately, I brought a copy of my bill, but not of the bill as finally passed by the council when amended. In my bill originally the provision was as follows. [Reads:]

"Section 6. That hereafter whenever any workman shall lose his life as the result of injuries sustained while engaged in a hazardous occupation and the death should occur within three years after the accident"—

The words "hazardous occupation" were stricken out, and it is made general as to any man employed.

(Continues reading:) "And the death should occur within three years after the accident, the legal heirs of such deceased workman, if they depend exclusively on the earnings of the deceased for their support, shall receive relief from the workmen's relief trust fund, as follows:

"Burial expenses, not exceeding forty dollars.

"If the deceased leaves a widow or a mother, or both, depending exclusively upon his wages for support, then the said widow or the said mother, as the case may be, shall receive the sum of one thousand five hundred dollars; and in case there is a dependent widow and a mother left by the deceased, and both of them dependent upon the earnings of the deceased, then in such case each one of them shall receive the sum of one thousand dollars.

"If the deceased workman should leave a widow and one or more children who depended on his wages for support, then the widow shall receive the relief provided in subdivision (b) of this section, and the child or children, as the case may be, whether the deceased left a widow or not, shall be paid a weekly sum equal to fifty per centum of the weekly wages received by the deceased at the time of the accident which resulted in his death, computed on the basis of a sum of not less than three nor more than six dollars; the said payments to be made for a period of not more than two hundred and sixty weeks."

Chairman WALSH. How did that compare with the compensation which was provided for in the bill of the speaker?

Mr. TRAVIESO. The figures were more or less alike, but the objection to the house bill of the speaker was the same objection that was made to the case—the commission must know of the Ives case, decided by the New York Court of Appeals. It contained no provision for the option of the employer; it made it mandatory; he had to submit to the law and was deprived of his right to a hearing in court, and it contained all the constitutional objections that have been made to compensation acts and that have been upheld by courts.

Chairman WALSH. Now, Mr. Travieso, I don't want to throw you out of the order of your statement or to hurry you, and still I know that a question will be asked for you to cover, if you will, please, that whole complaint about the handling of the police?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I am going to that, because I think that is the most important.

Chairman WALSH. If you have to omit anything, we would prefer to have you put this in first.

Mr. TRAVIESO. Regarding the history of the strike, the recent strike of agricultural workers. This strike began at Bajamon; it was started by the agricultural workers themselves, and for a number of days the strike was peaceful, no one was hurt, there were no fires in the cane fields, and the trouble was settled at Bajamon, I believe, at the instance of Mr. Bills, chief of the bureau of labor, who brought the parties to an understanding, and the trouble as far as Bajamon was settled to the satisfaction of all.

Then the strike began to break out in other parts of the island. The governor at once gave instructions to Mr. Bills to get hold of the situation and exercise or use his influence with both laborers and employers to bring the matter to a settlement. Mr. Bills took hold of the situation from the beginning and was getting very good results, and no one was complaining either against the Government or against the employers or employees. As soon as men who agitate these labor questions in the island started to get into the situation trouble began.

I will say as a general statement that the employers of Porto Rico are as a whole, they don't get along very well with Mr. Iglesias. Either they don't believe in him, or in his preaching, or in the manner in which he conducts the interests of labor on the island. The relation is, that as soon as Mr. Iglesias gets into these troubles, trouble begins in the island. A few days after that cane fires began to start in different parts of the island. I have a complete list of the fires that occurred in the island during the recent strike. Mr. Iglesias said yesterday that these fires were due either to accident or to the fact that men set fire to the cane filth in order to get their cane ground before. He also made a statement, which I don't believe anyone that knows anything about it, or anything at all, would corroborate, and that is that you don't lose anything by the setting fire to the cane filth, because the sugar stays in the cane just the same. Mr. Iglesias misunderstood the fact. It is true that if a cane field takes fire you can save part of the sugar. The leaves take fire, but the stalk does not burn, but when you grind them and get the sugar out of them there is naturally nobody but what will understand that there must be a loss. Fire consumes not only the leaves, but the cane itself, and that is a loss of sugar, and no man would ever for a single minute think of setting fire to a cane field in order to get ahead of the next man and grind his cane before, because naturally he would be the loser.

Here is an incident of the total number of fires along those days, while the strike lasted, here is a list where they had altogether 83 fires. Now, as to the question of their being accidental, here is a place where on February 23, in the jurisdiction of Aguada, at 8 p. m., the cane fields of the Coseager Centrale Corporation were set fire from 19 different parts; that is, while the strike was going on, and the men on strike in that jurisdiction. The police worked actively, and arrested a number of them, and arrested Ramon Ramirez, Fautino Morales, Felipe Alers, and Remigio Esteves. Ramon Ramirez pleaded guilty. The other three were charged with having taken part in the conspiracy. The men were taken before the district attorney and held under $10,000 bail each. Now, it is very, very strange that 19 accidents should take place at the same time in different parts of a cane field.

Chairman WALSH. What was the punishment inflicted on the one that pleaded guilty?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I have no data as to that.

Chairman WALSH. Was he sent to the penitentiary?

Mr. TRAVIESO. If they were convicted they certainly would be sent there, because it is a felony.

Chairman WALSH. Arson?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Arson; it would be arson in the first degree if it was at night.

Chairman WALSH. And you have no data as to whether any of them were sent?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No; not as to the results.

These fires broke out, and yet the government was naturally taking precautions to prevent, and trying to catch the men responsible for it, whoever they were. Now, Mr. Iglesias referred to fires in the city, where the houses were destroyed. That has no connection itself with the strike, and—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I have drawn that distinction from the data given, and I think the rest of the commission have.

Mr. TRAVIESO. I merely referred to the cane field. The governor naturally if an employer comes—for instance, these people came to the governor and complained that their plantation was set afire in 19 different places, they applied to the governor for relief and protection, and naturally it is the duty of the governor, as we understand it, that it is our duty to send police there if we can afford it, for them to catch the men responsible for a fire, and prevent the reoccurrence of another fire. The duty is not only to arrest the men guilty of the crime, but to prevent the reoccurrence of crime, and that is the reason why the police were sent to the different centrales where fires were taking place. Now, in the centrales there is a complaint that the police live at the centrales. It is a fact in many places.

Commissioner WALSH. What is a centrale?

Mr. TRAVIESO. A sugar mill; and naturally they are not inside the town, they are outside in the cane fields. These centrales, the policemen have to live somewhere, and he has to live there; he is not going home and coming back, and naturally quarters are furnished by the owners of the centrales, because he is there to protect property and life, and there is nothing in the complaint that the police live in the centrales. It is true, and they could not do otherwise. If I am sent to watch property or protect it I have to camp out or live in the property of the corporation.

Chairman WALSH. The same thing has occurred in Pennsylvania.

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir. Now, the first trouble that started was begun at Juncos, and reference was made to that yesterday by Mr. Iglesias. Mr. Iglesias complains that the governor has not taken any action on the investigation of this matter. The commission must know that daily in Porto Rico we get—we Porto Ricans are a great people for complaining; we complain about everything. It is not a fault, perhaps it is a virtue; we are getting to know what our rights are, and are complaining. I get in my office dozens of complaints every day, and I can not go personally, naturally I have not the time; but if it is a complaint against the policeman, I refer it to the chief; if it is against a judge, I refer it to the attorney general; and if Mr. Iglesias sends a telegram, and we get several every day from him, I refer it to the proper authority for investigation. If we get a letter several days afterwards saying there is nothing in the complaint of Mr. Iglesias, the matter is filed without any further direction. When the matter is of importance a report is drawn, and such was the case in the affair at Juncos. The Government sent, upon getting a complaint that a collision had taken place between the police and laborers at Juncos, the governor selected one of the best men that could be found in the district to make an investigation, and I refer to Mr. Samuel C. Bothwell. He is the marshal of the Supreme Court of Porto Rico, and a lawyer, and a very able man, and a man well liked by every man in the district.

Chairman WALSH. Is he an American?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir; he is an American. He has no interest anywhere, either against or for the employer, and I don't believe that a more impartial man could be found to make an investigation.

Chairman WALSH. How long has he been on the island?

Mr. TRAVIESO. He has been on the island ever since the American occupation there, and has been marshal of the supreme court.

Chairman WALSH. Does he practice law also?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No, sir; he is not allowed to practice.

Chairman WALSH. He gives his time to the duties of his office?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir. So, Mr. Bothwell submitted a report on February 10, 1915, explaining to the governor what had taken place at Juncos. He went there personally, and I am proud to submit to the commission the report of Mr. Bothwell with regard to the strike.

(See Travieso Exhibit No. 2.)

Mr. TRAVIESO. I will read four lines of the report to give an idea. Mr. Bothwell says [reading]: "My opinion, after the investigation, is that not only were the police fully justified in what they did, but that they were entitled to very high praise in not hurting more of the strikers and in a greater degree."

One of the troubles at Juncos, as it appears in that report, were the troubles of these parades of the people that were armed with revolvers and machetes and clubs. They tried to go through a private road and they were interfered with by two policemen. Just when they were arguing the question, the police and the strikers, one of the bookkeepers of the centrale, probably frightened by the looks of this crowd, or believing that he could scare them away, he came out with a revolver in his hand and began to shout and yell and trying to scare this crowd, and the police took hold of this man and took the revolver away from him and took him back to the centrale and shoved him in the other room together with the other employers, so they could not come out, and the strikers at once, when they saw that, armed themselves with pieces of wood that were in a pile near the centrale, and they went for the two policemen, and the two policemen used their clubs, and two or three men were hit on the head, not very seriously, and the whole matter was quieted down, and Mr. Bothwell gives the facts very clearly in that report.

The trouble at Vieques is the most important of them. Vieques is a small island on the eastern shore of Porto Rico, separated from the island about 10 or 15 miles from the main island. The island has a population of about 10,000 inhabitants, and the total number of policemen in the island is, I think, about 14 policemen to take care of the population of 10,000 men, scattered all over that island.

Chairman WALSH. About how many policemen?

Mr. TRAVIESO. About 14. I have the exact number. The island of Vieques has a total population of 10,425 inhabitants. The number of policemen at Vieques is 1 district chief, 1 sergeant, 6 guardsmen, making a total of 8. Then at Mosquitos, another jurisdiction of the island, there is a lance corporal, 2 guardsmen, making a total of 3; and at Puerton Real there is the same force. The lance corporals and 2 guardsmen—8 and 6, making 14; 14 altogether for the whole island of Vieques.

We were advised of the trouble at Vieques by telegram from the district attorney of Humacao. The chief of police at Vieques, immediately upon the happening of these events, sent a telegram to the district attorney at San Juan, asking for police enforcements and advising him of the trouble, and he immediately communicated with us, and we told the chief of police and instructed him to go over to Vieques and see what the matter was. So the chief of police started for Vieques at once. He went over to Humacao and proceeded with the district attorney to Vieques. They took a steam launch and went there at once.

I would like to submit to the commission a report of the district attorney at Humacao, one of our ablest lawyers in the island, who has been for a number of years—for five or six years—the clerk of the supreme court at Porto Rico. He is the son of our chief justice. He is a graduate of an American university and had been appointed, I believe, just about less than a week before this trouble at Vieques occurred.

The report of the trouble at Vieques agrees somewhat with the statement of Mr. Iglesias as to how the matter occurred. There was a parade of about 200 or 300 men parading along one of the roads in Vieques in a public highway. They came to a point where, in order to proceed to another part which they wanted to reach to propagate a strike, they had to cross through a private road, through a cane field, a road between two cane fields which divides one cane field from another. This plantation had two policemen who had been sent there by reason of the cane fires that had taken place. They were there instructed by the governor to protect lives and to protect property. They had seen the parade of men who were not armed, who were going peacefully along, parading and propagating their ideas without trouble. But the orders they had were not to allow anyone to parade with arms, and everyone of these 200 or 300 men, or a great number of them, were armed. They had machetes and had clubs and had revolvers, as this report of the district attorney shows. They tried to go through this private road, and the two policemen stood there between the highway and the private property, and they called to the leader, a man by the name of Huertas, that "this is private property, and you have no right to go there, and we are here to prevent you from doing it." What did this man Huertas do? Instead of either turning this crowd away from the two policemen and going in another direction, what did he do? According to the letter which Mr. Iglesias read here yesterday—though he did not read according to a copy of the letter which I have, and I want to refer to that point. I have a copy of that letter sent to my office by Mr. Iglesias himself, with his former letter, asking for the appointment of a commission, which was addressed to me as acting governor of the island. The letter is a copy signed by the writer—by the attorney. The attorney says—and I am translating from the Spanish, because the letter was originally written in Spanish [reads]:

"The crowd was stopped by two policemen, who requested the man who had charge of the leadership of the laborers, Saturnino Huertas, not to pass over that road, because they had superior orders. When Huertas replied, calling his attention to the inconvenience that had to be met by the men in the parade, because they would be compelled to walk back about one-half of the distance in order to return to the city and then to start over again in another direction, the two policemen alighted from their horses"—

They were on horseback. [Continues reading:]

"They pointed their carbines to the laborers, and the said Huertas then made three shots from his revolver, and the consequent panic ensued."

So the commissioner will see, not from the side of the government but from the report of the attorney appointed by Mr. Iglesias to investigate the trouble in Vieques, that the only thing the police did was to call the attention of these men not to pass through there, and in order to show that they were ready to make their orders obeyed—and there were only 2 men against 200 or 300—they left their horses and placed themselves in position to make themselves obeyed; and this man Huertas drew his revolver and fired three shots at those policemen, and then the trouble came to them."

Mr. Iglesias read yesterday the same paragraph which I have translated from a signed copy of the letter. I have it here at page 93 of the stenographer's minutes as he read it. He read it this way [reads]:

"When Huertas said it was not becoming that the participants in the parade should turn back halfway down the road and come back to town and then go by another road, hereupon the police crouched down and aimed at the strikers. The said Huertas fired his revolver three times at the same remarks being and firing against the participants of the strike came not only from the police but also from the majordomos."

He stated right there—which is a different statement, because here the responsibility is thrown on the police while in the other it appears the trouble was started by three shots from Huertas's revolver.

Mr. Iglesias claimed yesterday that these 200 or 300 men were not armed in any way; that all they had were some branches of a tree that they had cut; and they had inoffensive flags at the ends of those poles in order to take them in their parade. But I will read to the commission from the report of the district attorney in regard to the wounds received by the two policemen, and the commission will understand that those wounds could not possibly be committed by an inoffensive branch of a tree. This is a report of the doctor, J. S. M. Pressly, an American at Vieques. This portion of the report to which I wish to call the attention of the commission reads as follows:

"According to the medical certificates issued on that day by an American doctor, who is the municipal physician of Vieques, named J. S. M. Pressly, Policeman Brignonl had eight wounds, as follows:

"Wound No. 1. Incisive wound in the upper portion of the neck, dividing the structure from the vertical column. Closed by stitches and probably caused by machete.

"Wound No. 2. Perforating wound caused by bullet from revolver, fired so closely that grains of unburnt powder were injected into the skin. Point of entrance in the lower left occipital region, passing in hard and finding exit in the midline of the lower occipital region.

"Wound No. 3. Incisive and bruised wound probably caused by blow with club covering the whole left parietal region, closed by suture.

"Wound No. 4. Incisive wound in crown of head, closed by suture.

"Wounds Nos. 5 and 6. Incisive wounds on external surface, lower part of right forearm, closed by suture.

"Wound No. 7. Incisive wound on external surface of middle part of left forearm, closed by suture.

"Wound No. 8. Incisive wound passing obliquely across part of hand and lower forearm on left side, fracturing the second and third metacarpal bones and the first phalange of the small finger, closed by 12 sutures."

The other policeman, named Sotero Moreira, had wounds somewhat similar. they were all caused by similar weapons.

Chairman WALSH. Did he have a gunshot wound also?

Mr. TRAVIESO. It does not say.

Chairman WALSH. A machete wound?

Mr. TRAVIESO. They all seem to have been made by machete; but he had six wounds.

Chairman WALSH. Six wounds that might have been made by a machete?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes. These two policemen naturally, when they were fired at by Huertas, had to defend themselves. They fired their revolver or carbines, and the result was that three men were killed right off. Five or six were wounded and one of them died in the hospital a few hours afterwards, making a total number of four dead and four or five wounded. The two policemen were left on the field for dead. They were so cut up that they really did not finish them, because they thought they were dead. They were taken from there to the hospital and they were at the point of death for several days, especially this man Brignonl, who we were expecting every minute to learn had died.

All this information came to Porto Rico and San Juan by telegraph from the fiscal or district attorney who went to make this investigation. Mr. Iglesias said he never heard of the occurrence until four or five days after it took place. Mr. Iglesias knows, and everybody knows, that it was a fact that Mr. Iglesias's colleague, a member of the house of delegates, brought that matter to the attention of the house of delegates upon the following day. The telegrams and the information that were received were turned over to the press, and it was published all over the papers in San Juan. Either Mr. Iglesias was not attending to that part of the work or he overlooked the information. Everybody knew it in San Juan; knew that it had taken place. Every newspaper had its information from their reporters who went with the chief of police, and two or three days after that a committee of men, appointed by Mr. Iglesias, went over there and made an investigation.

The governor of Porto Rico, against whom a complaint seems to be made, I suppose from all this—I want to say that there is no more unjust complaint than the one made against the governor. I do not believe there is a man in the island of Porto Rico—and I do not like to speak about any man in particular in the way that I am going to do about the governor, but I believe that he deserves whatever I am going to say about him. I believe firmly that the labor classes of Porto Rico and the people of the island as a whole have no better friend than Mr. Arthur Yager, the present governor of the island. He is a man who has especially devoted himself to a study of social questions. He takes a great interest in the welfare of everybody in Porto Rico, and especially the working classes. By virtue of the duties of my office I have to be in touch with the governor more than any other official in the government of the island. I take his place when he goes away, and naturally I have to keep myself informed of everything he does and everything he thinks about our conditions down there. I know he worries a whole lot about the existing conditions of the laboring classes. I know he is trying to get a remedy for them and using the best of his ability and of his intelligence and power to promote the welfare of the classes. I do not believe there is a man in public life in Porto Rico, from the governor down, either in the upper house or the lower house, whom you could call an enemy of the laboring classes of Porto Rico. We all feel kindly toward them, and we would go to any sacrifice whatsoever to better their conditions. The governor is second to no one in his estimation of our people and his desire to do good for them. So whatever has taken place the governor should not in any way be blamed for what has happened.

Chairman WALSH. You think he feels friendly toward them?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Certainly; there is no doubt about that. It is shown by his writings, and I have brought here a copy of the last message of the governor to the legislature showing that he takes an interest in all these matters. I refer especially to his recommendation to the legislature of the passage of an act providing for a distribution of government lands on easy terms to the laboring classes of the island. That appears at page 6 of the message. Also he urged the increase of the educational facilities. He also urged very strongly the passage of a workingmen's compensation law, in either form, by way of a compensation act or under an insurance plan. All through his message you can see what the treatment of the man is toward these poor people in the island. Time and again he has said to me that the most perplexing problem he has, that worries him most and what he thinks more about, is how to find a means for bettering the conditions of these working classes. That is the problem we all think about and that we would be willing to help anybody who is willing to help us solve it. If we have not come to a solution of it, it is because it is not within our means to do it and not because we did not want to.

When this report came to the governor, the governor called me to his office and submitted to me the report and the telegram from the chief of police and the district attorney relating to this trouble at Vieques. The governor had not, up to that time, made any public utterances or statements in regard to the strike. He assumed that his duty was to act impartially in the matter and not to take sides one way or the other. But I can say that if the governor was partial in any way it was in his efforts to try to get the employers to submit to terms presented by the strikers; and from the very beginning, and in my presence, the governor of Porto Rico stated to a number of the employers of these strikers that the strikers were right in claiming a higher wage and shorter hours of labor, and I told them so myself, and the influence of every man in the government was with the strikers, that the strikers were right in their desire to get a better wage and shorter hours of labor. That fact no one denies, and the sympathy of everybody in the island was in favor of the strikers, and if this strike had been peacefully conducted, if Mr. Iglesias and Mr. Martinez—and I am glad they are here to hear what I say about their campaign—if they had refrained from using insulting and abusive language, if they had refrained from trying to incite these people, who are peaceful but ignorant—you can take them either to church or to kill two policemen, if necessary, because of their ignorance—if they had refrained from using that language, the trouble at Vieques would not have occurred, the other trouble at Ponce would not have occurred, and the strike would have been completely a victory for both Mr. Iglesias and for the employers themselves.

Chairman WALSH. What was the language?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I do not know exactly. I could not say that Mr. Iglesias said this or the other thing, because I was not present; but the reports in the press and the investigations by the fiscal at Ponce show that Mr. Iglesias was very violent in his language.

Chairman WALSH. You have the alleged utterances in this report, have you?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Not the specific utterance, but in substance what he said.

The governor succeeded in his efforts to get the employers to come to terms, and there at the governor's house agreements were made, or terms were made, to grant some of the points made by the strikers, and the strike was called off at several of those plantations through the influence of the governor and the influence of Mr. Bills, of the bureau of labor. Mr. Iglesias himself and several other speakers said at several places, as the reports show, that the governor was not with them; that the governor was in favor of the strikers; and that there was even a sort of quiet complaint, that did not come out in the press, against the governor for having been too much in favor of the strikers.

The general opinion was that the governor and the bureau of labor, as Mr. Bills stated, I believe, were helping the strikers, and that was because we never concealed our opinion and belief, and I reiterate it here, that the strikers were right and that they were entitled to a better wage, because they submitted themselves to a reduction in the wage when the price of sugar went down, and it was natural and logical for them to expect that when the price of sugar went up by reason of the European war they should be given also the benefit of the increase of price. We all agreed with them in that part of their fight. But when it came, Mr. Chairman, to a question of setting fire to property, when men began to attack the police and disobey the law, when people were being incited to arson and murder, and all those things, in the public squares of the cities and towns—when that preaching began to produce its results, as it did at Vieques, and two policemen were nearly killed and four poor, innocent laborers, who were misdirected and misled into what they did, were killed, then the government understood that it was time to interfere and try to put a stop to it.

Chairman WALSH. What was the date of the Vieques trouble?

Mr. TRAVIESO. The Vieques trouble occurred on the 16th of February, 1915.

Chairman WALSH. What was the date of the Ponce trouble?

Mr. TRAVIESO. It occurred a few days later, on March 1. The governor told me, and we discussed the matter of what we could do to prevent a recurrence of the Vieques affair. The island became quite excited. The employers thought this would take place again, and they began to come to us for protection and asking that the police forces be increased by 200. The request was made, but it was not granted. We considered we could handle the situation without any such increase of the police force, and we tried to do it, and I think we succeeded.

I believe even a suggestion was made from the side of Mr. Iglesias that the Porto Rican regiment should be called out. It seems to be inconsistent that such a request should be made, as everybody knows when the military forces get out the rights of free speech and all those constitutional rights are more or less suspended. If you put a town under military rule, meetings are suspended for a time. That is done practically everywhere, and it would have been done there under military rule. Mr. Iglesias, who complains about the curtailing of his liberty of speech, was ready and willing to have the military called out to cope with this situation, created, I believe, by himself—and I do not hesitate to say that.

The governor decided then to address a proclamation to the citizens of Porto Rico. I will submit to the commission a copy, both in English and in Spanish, of the governor's proclamation. I do not believe Mr. Iglesias has submitted a copy of it. He complains about it, but does not submit it. I will not take the time of the commission to read it, but I want to call attention of the commission to the fact that the governor here says, in the third paragraph, very plainly and in terms that can not be mistaken [reads]:

"I believe that the laborers of Porto Rico, as anywhere in the world, have a perfect right to go on a strike and to remain at home or go out on the streets if they so desire, but without arms."

In Porto Rico it is not allowed to carry arms; it is a misdemeanor. [Continues reading:]

"But without arms, without riotous manifestations, without committing acts that might provoke and incite a riot or an attack upon persons and property, and the laborer or the striker who conducts himself in this manner will receive the protection of the police. But, on the contrary, armed laborers engaged in riotous parades, shouting, and howling through the streets and roads of Porto Rico, provoking disorder and inciting to riots, these will not receive the protection of the government, but will be immediately arrested by the police and taken to the courts to receive their due punishment.

"The credit and the good name of Porto Rico demand that peace and order be immediately reestablished in those parts of the island where they have been disturbed."

So the governor merely makes that statement of the law, and he says to the strikers: "Your right is to strike peacefully, without attacking people or destroying property. If you behave yourselves and conduct your strike without these elements, the law, the policeman, will protect your parades and your meetings and be by your side; but if you break the law, you have to submit to the penalty of the law." That proclamation was published and promulgated by me as secretary of Porto Rico, and was published in every newspaper in the island and had the desired effect. The next day everything was quiet, and the strike continued, and cane fires subsided for a while, and the island began to feel that the government was ready to protect every man's life and property. I don't believe that any complaint absolutely can be based on the proclamation of the governor. No man that is a law-abiding citizen will refuse to attach his signature to that document, and if any blame is to be given to anybody for it I want to take one-half of it, because I helped the governor to draft it.

Now, there seems to be a general charge made by Mr. Iglesias that the governor tried to use the police to break the strike. Now, if that had been the intention of anybody in the government, that would have been done in the mainland, where we had 600 policemen to accomplish this purpose; and as the matter started in Vieques, a long way from Porto Rico, we least thought that trouble would occur; and all of a sudden it broke; and it is quite a coincident that this trouble at Vieques happened, I believe, there a day or two after or three days after one of Mr. Iglesias's right-hand men, a man named Piris, went over to Vieques and started a strike over there and made very violent speeches against the employers and police and everybody and incited those people, and the result was the Vieques strike.

They were quiet for a while. I believe Mr. Iglesias himself controlled his activities for a few days after the proclamation, until the meeting took place at Ponce. This meeting was taking place, I believe, at the market place in Ponce, and, according to the report, to which I want to call the attention of the commission, and speaking from personal knowledge, I can not say, it is merely from the official information that I have.

Chairman WALSH. You were not present at the meeting?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I was not. The report of the district attorney of Ponce, in reference to the Ponce trouble, contains this paragraph. It says: "Santiago Iglesias was the orator who from the tribune incited the people, and who caused the police to interfere on account of his language, the riot thereupon ensuing. Francisco Paz Granela, Manuel Texidor, and Prudencio Rivera Martinez"—he was the gentleman that testified here—"occupied an automobile in which they had come from San Juan, and from which automobile revolvers were shot off against the police, and the police were also incited. Maximiliano Bre was detained as a consequence of said riot, and a revolver which had been shot off shortly before was taken from him, and Jesus Rosado was also detained as a consequence of the riot, and a knife was taken away from him."

Chairman WALSH. Taken away from whom?

Mr. TRAVIESO. From this man Rosado.

Chairman WALSH. He was in the automobile with Iglesias and Martinez?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No; this man Rosado was not in the automobile; neither of them were in the automobile. The report says that shots were fired from the automobile and this revolver was taken from Bre and the knife from Rosado.

Chairman WALSH. Is there anything in the report that shows the specific language used by Mr. Iglesias on this occasion?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No. The information is that he was criticizing severely the employers and the police and the governor and government, and everybody that he thought was against the interests of the strike, and the chief of police believing that Mr. Iglesias's language was in violation of the law, and complying with the proclamation of the governor, he called Mr. Iglesias down and ordered his arrest for violation of the law. The policeman who received the orders from the chief tried to execute the orders and arrest Mr. Iglesias. According to the report, when he was going to do that one of the men who were there near to this place where Mr. Iglesias was tried to stab the chief of police with a file that had been sharpened, and the chief, in order to protect himself, drew his revolver and shot this man. He was wounded, but he has recovered. He is the man, I think, whose picture has been presented here. His name is Roveldo.

Then, when that shot was fired, the riot occurred. People began to run one way and the other, and the fire was exchanged between the police and the strikers, and there is evidence that another man by the name of Cabellero was killed by a policeman by the name of Quiles. Now, when this news came to San Juan the house of delegates was in session at that time, and Mr. Barrow, who is Mr. Iglesias's representative in the house, he brought to the attention of the house these facts, and they appointed a committee of two members, one from each of the political parties, and they proceeded to Ponce and made investigation from the reports presented by Mr. Iglesias yesterday. The commission will see that this committee of the house refused to enter into how the riot started or who was responsible for it or anything like that. They said that the matter was under the jurisdiction of the court, and they had no right to interfere and refer merely to the killing of this man, which they believed should be investigated. Now, I don't see how a complaint can be made against the government, because the matter was investigated. The opinion of the district attorney is that this was unnecessary, but that he was not maliciously killed. The district attorney has filed an information against him for involuntary manslaughter. It is punishable by 15 years in the penitentiary.

Chairman WALSH. What is the minimum?

Mr. TRAVIESO. One year.

Chairman WALSH. Did he give the details as to lack of necessity for the killing?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No, sir; he doesn't go into the details, but he says from the testimony he has taken it appears that there is sufficient evidence to charge this man with having illegally and unnecessarily killed this striker. It appears that the wound that killed him penetrated his body through the back.

Chairman WALSH. Which would indicate that he was running at the time?

Mr. TRAVIESO. There was some testimony that the man was running away from the place and the policeman shot at him.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of a man was he; was that looked into? Whether he was of good character?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I believe, to use a common expression, he was a poor devil.

Chairman WALSH. He was a poor fellow?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes; he was neither a striker or employee of the cane fields, and probably had nothing to do with the strike; he was a sightseer.

Chairman WALSH. An innocent bystander?

Mr. TRAVIESO. An innocent bystander; and the evidence of the police, as far as cited, is that this man had a knife with him, that this policeman tried to take it away from him, and the man started to run first and then turned around and faced the police. The policeman shot him, and when the man fell the policeman stooped down and took this knife away from him. That is his side of the case.

Chairman WALSH. Did he turn around again; he was running, you say, with the knife?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And then he turned on the policeman?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And then he started to run again?

Mr. TRAVIESO. He started to run again, and the policeman shot him. So this is a matter that the Government as an executive branch of the administration can not be blamed for.

Chairman WALSH. The prosecution is going on now?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir; the man is indicted; and although I don't like to speak with certainty as to the fact, but I can assure and promise the commission that in all probability this policeman has been suspended from employment and from salary; because, as a general rule, in the regulation of the department a man that is charged, a policeman charged with any offense, no matter how trifling it may be, that man loses his moral force in the community entirely, naturally, being under an indictment; and the uniform and club and revolver are taken away from him, and he shall retire until he is clear from that charge. If he is properly acquitted he goes back to the force. If there is doubt left in the department as to his moral conduct, or anything like that, he is discharged, so I can assure the commission that this man is not on the police force at this time. I know they would not allow him there for a minute, after an indictment was filed against him. I will submit to the commission the report of the district attorney with reference to this trouble at Ponce.

(See Travieso Exhibit No. 3.)

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall the substance of the statute with reference to incitation to riot, the statute under which the police were proceeding when Mr. Iglesias was interfered with?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Under the law of Porto Rico, I will say, that our penal code is taken from the American code, from the code of California, which is similar to the code of New York; both civil and criminal code. The Spanish code was done away with after our first legislature met, and that contains a provision making inciting to riot a misdemeanor.

Chairman WALSH. Does it contain the words, "anyone who by words may incite to riot"?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir; and it is in my opinion a violation of the statute punishing breaches of peace. I have always claimed that a man who is contending that he is exercising his right of free speech, that he can not go on the platform and insult another man. If it is a misdemeanor to stand on the corner and insult that man as he goes by, I think it is an aggravated offense to insult that man on the platform in free speech. Whenever he abuses that power, and if he insists on a violation of the law, and it is a breach of the peace, we prosecute him like was done here.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. On that point, if I may ask, what is your interpretation of the law? Is it your interpretation of the law that you can prevent a man from talking in public by assuming that he is going to say things, or is it your interpretation of the law that under the right of free speech a man is at liberty to say anything he pleases, but if he says things that are punishable he should be punished for it?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would not prevent him from talking?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So your interpretation of the law is that any man can get up and say anything he pleases?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But if he says things that are improper and unlawful he should be punished for it?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes; my interpretation of the law is that a man can go and discuss any other man who is in an official capacity; if he is an official of the government he can criticize his official acts; and I have heard Mr. Iglesias criticize my actions as district attorney; and I took my medicine like we say in the United States. I heard what he said, but did not agree with him. But I heard what he said with pleasure.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are you sure you heard him with "pleasure"?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Well, yes, with pleasure; for I like to see a man say what he feels; I admire a man who speaks his mind and is frank, and Mr. Iglesias was quite frank on that day. So I would not punish a man, no matter whom he criticized, from the government down. I think it is a part of our duty to stand the test of criticism of the citizen; but I believe that no man should go on the stump and criticize a man who is not in public life, or expose him to ridicule or charge him with the commission of a crime for which he has not been indicted; and in things like that I think the right of free speech is limited by the rights of other people.

Chairman WALSH. I was going to ask you, Mr. Travieso, in regard to the warrant that was issued by the municipal judge referred to here; was that warrant issued before or after the meeting?

Mr. TRAVIESO. After.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Iglesias said that he was not arrested for half an hour, the police being too busy minding you to do it?

Mr. TRAVIESO. The fact was that Mr. Iglesias jumped in that automobile and tried to get away from the place as fast as he could. Mr. Iglesias always succeeds in not getting into trouble.

Chairman WALSH. If your theory was correct, then he could not have witnessed what the police were engaged in during the half hour involved?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Probably not.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead.

Mr. TRAVIESO. Several men were arrested, Mr. Iglesias being one of them, and the municipal judge fixed the bond in the sum of $2,000, which they could not furnish, and they applied for a writ of habeas corpus to decrease or reduce the amount of the bail, and that was reduced by the district judge at once to the sum of $300. They got the bail and they are still out on bail, and have not been tried, and the case is pending trial in the city of Ponce.

There has been a charge made by Mr. Iglesias, a general charge made, that these men at Vieques have been deprived of the right of a jury trial. Our system of law is such that we divide crimes into misdemeanors and felonies. We have a jury system exactly similar to the one in the United States.

Chairman WALSH. May I shorten that by saying it is an inferior court, like our inferior courts, where they do not provide a jury; that the right to a jury trial is not given, but the guaranty of a right is preserved in the higher court?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. It is the same situation; is that correct?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes; these cases were tried before the municipal court because they were misdemeanors, for which the law did not provide a jury trial. After conviction they appealed to the next higher court, which is the district court, and there they have a jury for felony cases, but not for misdemeanors. The advantage of taking an appeal is that you try the case de novo—that is, the district judge does not care what the lower court decides, but he tries the case again from beginning to end—and these cases were retried, and some of them were acquitted, but the largest number of them the conviction was affirmed, although the judge, believing probably that the penalty was too excessive, reduced it in almost every case. So the men can not complain that they have not been getting justice. They have been tried exactly like any other citizen who violates the law.

I have here a list, which I will supply, of the fires that took place on the island during the strike.

(See Travieso Exhibit No. 4.)

I have also a list prepared by the district attorney of Humacao giving the names of the defendants and the crimes they were charged with and the sentence in the trial court and the decision of the district court on the new trial.

(See Travieso Exhibit No. 5.)

Mr. Iglesias complained that the municipal judge of Vieques refused to approve the appeals of these men taken to the district court. There is the report of the attorney general of Porto Rico covering this point, in which the facts are different from those submitted by Mr. Iglesias. Mr. Iglesias charged the municipal judge—and I am sure if we were testifying under oath Mr. Iglesias would not have made the statement that the municipal judge of Vieques falsified or forged the original sentences. I do not believe that Mr. Iglesias would dare to sign a complaint to that effect. It is easy to make a statement when no responsibility attaches to the statement.

Chairman WALSH. Had you ever heard that charge made before?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No; the first time was here yesterday, and I have no doubt, if the facts were true, Mr. Iglesias would have filed a complaint against him. The attorney general says in his report: "There was a misunderstanding of the municipal judge at Vieques in regard to the right to try it in his court."

I want to call the attention of the commission to the fact that these municipal judges in some of the jurisdictions are not required to be attorneys, but just citizens who are vested with that power.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Like justices of the peace?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes; exactly.

(Here witness read a letter in regard to the municipal judge refusing to allow appeal.)

Chairman WALSH. I want to ask you about one thing before we adjourn. The proclamation of the governor, as I recollect it, made no declaration as to assemblies at all, did it?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No.

Chairman WALSH. There was a complaint made here that there was some objection to the meeting in numbers exceeding five, was it; or to the extent of five—I do not recall?

Mr. TRAVIESO. That charge is absolutely unfounded and untrue. I will submit to the commission copies of the letters of the governor to the chief of police.

Chairman WALSH. Just a moment while that is on my mind.

Mr. Iglesias, where did you say that inhibition came from? Where do you say the order came from not to allow the men to meet to the extent of five?

Mr. IGLESIAS. You have in your files affidavits of men that have had conferences with the chief of police.

Chairman WALSH. I remember now.

Mr. IGLESIAS. And the governor sent me a telegram saying I have to see the chief of police.

Chairman WALSH. I remember it now perfectly; it slipped my mind.

At this point we will stand adjourned until 2 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 12.30 o'clock, the commission took a recess until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

TESTIMONY OF MR. M. TRAVIESO—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed now, Mr. Travieso.

Mr. TRAVIESO. I left my statement this morning at the place where a reference was made to the prohibition of the police of gatherings of more than five men. Mr. Iglesias charged that that was done in pursuance of instructions of the governor to the police of the island. I have here a copy of the first letter of the governor, addressed to the district attorneys, the mayors, and the district chiefs of the insular police of Porto Rico. A copy of this letter I will leave with the commission, but I want to refer to this paragraph, which says [reads]:

"The proclamation which I have to-day addressed to the people of Porto Rico will show you clearly the attitude of the government throughout the serious situation existing to-day in this island. It is of absolute necessity that disorder, fire, and riot should cease immediately and that absolute quietness be reestablished. The parades of laborers armed with machetes, clubs, and other arms must be strictly prohibited, and the machete shall only be used as an instrument of labor when the laborers are about their daily occupation. Meetings at which orators incite the odium and discredit of anybody shall be suppressed and when riot and disorder is provoked.

"The peaceful laborer and everyone who desires to engage in his daily occupation shall be protected, and it shall be prevented at all cost, and by means of force, if necessary, that the freedom of the peaceful citizen to work and not to join the strike be abridged.

"In case of riot and disorder the leader and the authors who by their word or by their actions lead the unconscious masses of the people to execute acts of violence and disorder shall be severely punished.

"Every authority has the absolute support of the government to compel the faithful and energetic execution of the law, and absolute neutrality shall be observed in conflicts between capital and labor, and both shall be protected when within the law; but if any of said elements violate the law, they shall be severely punished, and the government is ready not to allow the rights of the laborer to peacefully strike and to demand in a peaceful manner an increase of his salary, either by remaining at home without working or by persuading the employer by word of mouth to increase his salary, to be used as an instrument and as a means to incite the people to commit acts of violence and force to obtain an increase in salary which can not be obtained peacefully."

That was the original letter of the governor to the insular police. Several telegrams were received when this order was tried to be executed. The governor, to prevent misapprehension or misinterpretation of his letter by the police, followed that letter by one two days later, where he makes more clear and explicit his intentions and his position. In his letter of February 25, 1915, he said [reads]:

"It was not my intention that you should suppress peaceful meetings of the laborers who may gather at some certain point on the public roads or in the 'barrios' for the purpose of discussing in an orderly manner their grievances. So long as these meetings are peaceful and orderly in their spirit and attitude, and so long as the speakers discuss the grievances of the working people within the limits of the law, I desire that you shall not in any way interfere with them."

That was addressed to the chief of insular police and communicated by him by circular letter to every district chief of police in the island.

Both of these letters I would like to offer in evidence.

(See Travieso Exhibits Nos. 6 and 7.)

So that from these two letters which I have offered in evidence it can be seen that the governor has been making clear his intention that the right of free speech and the right of assembly and getting the masses of the people together to discuss questions should not be abridged or impaired in any way, and naturally no one should have any intention of preventing that or curtailing that right in any way.

After the strike at Vileques took place Mr. Iglesias addressed a communication to the governor, to which he referred yesterday, asking for the appointment of a special commission. Mr. Iglesias did not read from his letter and did not, I believe, introduce it in evidence. He merely referred to it and to the reply.

of the governor. Mr. Iglesias proposed in his letter the appointment of a commission, which was to be formed of a district judge, a district attorney, and two attorneys appointed by him——

Chairman WALSH (interposing). It was introduced in evidence, together with the reply.

Mr. TRAVIESO. And he also proposed that the president of the federation of labor, who was Mr. Iglesias himself, should have sort of supervision of the workings of this commission, to watch the proceedings, to see that the proceedings were properly conducted. In other words, it was to be a commission of four, under the superintendence of Mr. Iglesias. According to his letter this commission was to have not only the power to investigate, but the power to prosecute and to punish. In other words, the ordinary administration of justice was to be suspended and done away with and in place of the regular machinery for the administration of justice this commission was to take hold of the situation and to deal with it from the investigation to the punishment of every official in the government that had committed any violation of the law.

The petition of Mr. Iglesias came to my hands at the time when I was acting as governor of the island. The governor was away. I studied Mr. Iglesias's petition, and I came to the conclusion, in the first place, that it was not advisable to appoint any such commission, because the government had full confidence and has full confidence in the integrity and in the ability of every man that is a judge in the island of Porto Rico, and the government could not admit for a single minute that the administration of justice in the island was not sufficient to cope with the situation and to punish properly any man who was guilty of a violation of the law.

In the second place, the petition had to be denied for the reason that the governor had not the power under the law to appoint any such commission. The duties of the governor are defined by the organic act of Porto Rico passed by Congress, and the governor has the power to appoint the judges defined in that law, the duties of which judges are also defined by the local statutes. The governor would have no power to give this commission the power to investigate and to prosecute and to punish anybody, unless the Legislature of Porto Rico met and passed a law creating a commission with that power, and I even doubt if the Legislature of Porto Rico would have power to create a commission and give to it judicial powers—the power of prosecuting and punishing for a violation of the law.

Upon these grounds I thought that the application of Mr. Iglesias had to be denied, and I instructed the acting secretary of Porto Rico, the man who was taking my place, to reply to Mr. Iglesias to that effect. The answer of the secretary is inserted in Mr. Iglesias's second communication to the governor.

Mr. Iglesias thought, perhaps, the denial that I had made would not be sustained by the governor, and upon the return of the governor on April 14 he addressed another communication to the governor, wherein he inserted the original communication to me, the reply of the acting secretary of Porto Rico, and reiterated his petition that this commission should be appointed. The governor replied then, upholding my interpretation of the law and denying his application. I do not believe this is any ground for complaint against the government for refusing to appoint this commission, because the position of the governor is that he had no power to appoint any such commission or give such commission the powers desired to be given to it by Mr. Iglesias.

The letters being in evidence, I will not offer them, because I do not want to incumber the record.

I would like to present to the commission a clipping taken from the Times, a Porto Rican newspaper having the largest circulation in the island, and it is a friend of the labor movement. I never knew the Times to be against labor or in favor of capital, and they are really quite impartial in their statement in this regard. It is from the Times of May 14, and it is an editorial in reference to the opinion of that publication as to the conduct of the governor during the strike. It is voicing the public opinion of the island in regard to Gov. Yager.

(The clipping so referred to, entitled "Mr. Iglesias goes north," was published in the Times of May 14, 1915.)

Mr. TRAVIESO. Regarding the riot at Ponce, I will offer a supplemental report made by the district attorney of Ponce under date of March 24, this year, a paragraph of which I will read, and it says, "According to the declarations which are in my hands, it appears that the labor leader, Mr. Santiago Iglesias, comported himself in an illegal manner while addressing his hearers, his speech being one of threats, irony, and contempt for the different officials of the government, for which reason the chief of the insular police of this district, Mr. Fernandez Nater, ordered him to descend from the stump. At this juncture a man armed with a taper file attacked Corporal Ferrer, who was going to execute the orders of his chief, and when the latter saw this he was compelled to come to the aid of his subordinate. Immediately confusion ensued, and shots were fired indiscriminately by the police and by the civilians, the man who attacked the corporal and the captain being wounded, and being now an inmate of the Prisoche Hospital, where he is recovering from his wounds.

(See Travieso Exhibit No. 8.)

Chairman WALSH. Is there any document that we have here, Mr. Travieso, that undertakes to quote the language of Mr. Iglesias, literally or substantially?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I don't know of any. In the testimony affidavits were presented by Mr. Iglesias; there were affidavits made before the house committee that investigated the matter, and the witnesses differ as to the language. Really, that is a subject that is now, and will be investigated before the district court of Ponce when Mr. Iglesias is tried for the offense of which he is accused, and there are two sides in the affidavits. The side of the police is clearly against Mr. Iglesias and the affidavits of Mr. Iglesias's friends are in his favor.

Chairman WALSH. Then we have all of the testimony on both sides as far as you know as to what Mr. Iglesias said?

Mr. TRAVIESO. As far as I know, it is all before the commission. There are one or two points that I want to touch upon briefly.

Mr. Iglesias in his testimony yesterday in reference to the compensation act I heard my name mentioned in his testimony, and, although I am here for an impersonal matter, I would like to explain the situation somewhat further. As I said this morning, I introduced this bill for the insurance compensation of labor by the insurance system. The bill was presented and did not pass two years ago, and I introduced it last a year ago. I received a letter signed by Mr. Iglesias, I believe, inviting me to deliver an address or lecture before the people for the federation of labor. I responded to that at the time, when I was acting as governor, and my reply stated very plainly my ground for not taking part in that meeting at that time. I thought that acting in the capacity of governor at that time that I should not go into a discussion on it, or any other thing, and I said that in my letter that I would be very glad, after my duties had been performed as governor, to take part in that discussion. The governor was back in the island the day before New Year's, and I was very busy helping him in the preparation of his message and preparing for the legislature.

After the legislature met, the speaker of the house introduced, on the first day, his old bill that had been defeated two or three times, as I understood. I then introduced mine. I felt then as a matter of courtesy to the speaker that I should not go out of my way, out of the floor of the council to discuss in different places bills that were pending before the legislature. I wanted to serve the people in the council, and it was for that reason, and not from any desire not to discuss my own bills, that I did not take part in these conferences. I promised Mr. Iglesias, and promise him now, that I would have no objection now to returning to the island and taking this matter and debating it with anybody that wants to enter the debate. I am very much interested in passing that bill, and I believe it is a good law, and very much affects our men in the island, and I hope to get Mr. Iglesias's help, which I have never been able to get all the previous time. The bill was printed and freely distributed, and we advertised public hearings in the executive council, advertised in the newspapers, and they all had notice of it. I did not see Mr. Iglesias at the hearing, and no one appeared in behalf of his organization. I was informed later that at a hearing before the house Mr. Iglesias expressed himself against the establishment of the insurance system for the compensation of workmen. I don't know after reading, or after having seen its provisions, he has changed his mind and is in favor of it. In other words, these charges are general, and most of the charges that have been made before this commission are, that the public lands of Porto Rico have been granted to private corporations without the payment of any consideration to the government. I can say without hesitation that the charge is absolutely unfounded.

The government of Porto Rico has quite an extension plan that belongs to it, and every piece of land that I know of is either in the possession of the government or is rented to private individuals or corporations, but by virtue of the contract they pay rental for the property of not less than 6 per cent of the assessed value of the land. Usually the terms of the contract of lease—and I don't know of any case, and I don't believe that Mr. Iglesias, if required to produce one, could point out a single case where the government has granted (and granted implies the consent of the government) has granted land to a corporation without the payment of rent. There may be land that belongs to the government on which are living the people that may be termed "squatters," without the consent of the government, but in no case are people accepting government land without paying for it. Mr. Iglesias may refer to the case of the Guanica centrales. It was in possession of lands claiming the ownership of those lands, or the right of possession by virtue of a lease from some man there, I don't remember his name, at Yacuo. This man believes himself to be the owner of that property. It came to a point where the government began to litigate with this man Guanica on one side and the government on the other side to recover possession of the land. The controversy was started, as I am informed, by this Guanica acknowledging the right of ownership in the government, and they were allowed to remain in possession by the execution of a contract where the government is recognized to be the owner of the land, and they pay rental to the government. That is the only case that has been brought up for public discussion.

Before I close, if I may, I want to say a word with reference to the question of citizenship. I want to join my voice to that of Mr. Iglesias and Mr. Martinez in advocating that the question of citizenship should be decided at the earliest possible date. We have been claiming it for 16 years, and if we believe, as we all believe, that it is our duty to raise the moral and social standard of our working classes, one of the best means toward that end would be to make all these men somebody as far as citizenship is concerned. At the present time our people are men without a country, we might say. They are allowed to live in Porto Rico under the protection of the American flag, but they are denied the right of citizenship and they can not call themselves citizens of the United States, while, as a matter of fact, they are enjoying the same right as citizens of the United States, and it is only a question of declaring them citizens of the United States. I hope that is done at an early day and done collectively without requiring them to go before a court and state that they want to be citizens.

There was statement made by Mr. Martinez in the paper he read yesterday with which I want to take issue. He said in one of those paragraphs, if I am correct, that one of the biggest mistakes made by the administration, the Federal Government, was granting—the granting of too much self-government to Porto Rico, he believing that that is one of the reasons for the social unrest existing in the island and for the condition of the agricultural laborers. I find a very great inconsistency in the statement of Mr. Martinez, why he believes a mistake has been made in granting too much self-government, and in the following paragraph he advocates the passage by Congress of the bills pending before Congress, and those bills provide for the granting of more self-government to Porto Rico; so, on the other hand, he condemns the American administration for giving us too much self-government, and on the other hand, he complains of the administration because they do not pass bills providing for more self-government.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Who do you refer to?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Mr. Martinez; in his statement read at the opening of this investigation.

He also complains that the men in control of the administration of the Government, who are leaders in official circles, are men, who, he says, are more or less men who had Spanish training and ideas, and who were reactionaries. The fact is, Mr. Chairman, that the majority of the men who have any power in their hands in Porto Rico, not only those in the upper house of legislature but the district judges and district attorney, the men who have the greatest responsibility in their hands, are men who have been trained in the United States. Most of them are young men up to date in American ideas, who came to this country when they were young men; they got their training and education in this country and went back there fully Americanized and fully aware of the necessities of our country, and fully aware that something should be done for the laborers of Porto Rico, and everyone of them willing to do it. They are not what could be called reactionaries, and do not look backward; they look forward.

The means we have to fight against these conditions are weak, and it is not our fault if we do not succeed. We have not the organization and the means such as exist in a big, rich country like this. We have to fight against conditions as we find them and do the best we can.

A complaint was made against my colleagues in the lower house of the legislature, and either Mr. Iglesias or Mr. Martinez said that the attorneys in the legislature, or members of the legislature, were attorneys for the big corporations. It is true in some of those cases those men are attorneys for corporations, but they are elected by a popular vote, the people themselves—the very men represented by Mr. Iglesias, and who are wage earners, put them in office. It is in their hands—it is in their power, and if they are not satisfied with the way they conduct their duties as legislators, it is in their power to change them. We have universal suffrage and every man has a vote, and if he does not know how to use it, it is his fault. And I think that Mr. Iglesias should concentrate his efforts toward the education of those people and teach them how to use their vote. I do not believe any man is using his place to further the interests of the corporations he may represent; but if there is any such man, it is in the power of the voters to punish him by not reelecting him, and that Mr. Iglesias should teach to the men that follow him.

I want to say, before I forget it—to say that there was another bill recommended by the governor in his message to meet a condition that exists in Porto Rico, like it does everywhere, where men work for a contractor, for instance, and that contractor throws up his contract because he is unable to go on with it and those wage earners sometimes lose a week's wages. They can not go to court and sue that contractor to recover $4 or $5 or $6 or $7 for their week's wages; they have to hire a lawyer and pay him, and naturally it does not compensate them to do that.

Mr. Bills, the chief of the bureau of labor, drew a bill following the recommendation of the governor and it was introduced in the Executive Council and passed by a unanimous vote, providing that when a wage earner is defrauded in this manner by a contractor or his employer he may sue the employer in court and recover not only the amount of damage but a certain amount as attorneys' fees, so that there will be an inducement for the lawyers to take up these cases, because they know their fees are going to be paid. This bill passed by a unanimous vote of the upper house of the council, but, to my great surprise, it was defeated in the lower house by Mr. Iglesias's representative, Mr. Aybar. If Mr. Aybar had voted in favor of that bill; if he had used his influence in the house for the passage of that bill, the bill would have become a law and the existing evil would have been corrected. Either Mr. Aybar was not informed as to the contents of the bill, or I find no explanation of his action in that respect. All our work along that line was lost by the vote of the very man that claims to represent the interests of the working class in the lower house of the legislature, and that is a fact that can be substantiated.

There are so many points that I would not think would throw any light on the main question that I will not go any further.

Chairman WALSH. I think you have covered very thoroughly the matter, but Mr. Commissioner Weinstock has some questions to ask you at this point.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I will make my questions very brief, and I am sure you will try to brief the answers, because we are working under great pressure.

Mr. TRAVIESO. I realize that, and I am sorry to have taken so much time.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. We must adjourn this evening, and we have several witnesses here who want to be heard. My questions will be rather desultory and disconnected, but I will give them to you in the order in which I have jotted them down.

Have any charges of graft been made against legislative members in Porto Rico?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The legislature is clean?

Mr. TRAVIESO. It is clean.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is there a free and honest ballot in Porto Rico?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I do not think it is any freer there than it is here or anywhere. I do not believe the absolute free ballot exists in the world.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have the secret ballot?

Mr. TRAVIESO. We have the secret ballot.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The Australian ballot?

Mr. TRAVIESO. The Australian system. The men, being ignorant and not knowing how to write or read, have to express their vote by making a cross; by making their mark.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Who is entitled to vote in Porto Rico?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Every man who is over 21 years of age.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Regardless of illiteracy?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Regardless of illiteracy; yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you have woman suffrage?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No; we do not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Does he have to have any property?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Absolutely not. He has to be of age and be a citizen of Porto Rico or of the United States.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You stated that to put sugar on the free list means the ruin of Porto Rico. Why?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Because we have to compete with Cuba in the production of sugar.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What advantage has Cuba over Porto Rico?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Cuba has the advantages of a more fertile soil—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). Any cheaper labor?

Mr. TRAVIESO. And perhaps cheaper labor.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know what wages are in Cuba as compared to Porto Rico?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I could not say, from memory. I know that they appear in the pamphlet which we presented to Congress.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Approximating it, about what difference do you think there is in the average percentage, dealing with it on a percentage basis?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I do not believe the difference exactly in the wages as to the production, but they are more or less similar because the countries are very similar to one another. The difference is that the cost of the production of sugar in Porto Rico is much higher than in Cuba. In Cuba, for instance, they plant cane and they get seven and eight and nine crops out of the same planting. In Porto Rico we have to replace it every two or three crops.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, they have a much more fertile soil?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes; and we have to use fertilizer to keep our soil producing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But they have comparatively little advantage on the wage question?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Very little advantage on the wage question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is there any difference in the efficiency of labor; is the Cuban labor any more efficient than the Porto Rican labor?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I do not think so. I think our men are just as efficient as any other men.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are the proceedings of the legislature conducted in English?

Mr. TRAVIESO. In the Executive Council we use both languages. Those of us that speak enough English to make ourselves understood use the English language.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How many members are there in the lower house?

Mr. TRAVIESO. They are all in Spanish.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I say, how many members are there?

Mr. TRAVIESO. There are 35.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. From what ranks are they generally recruited; what walks of life do they come from?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Like almost every other parliament or legislative body, the lawyers get the best of it, and the majority of them are lawyers.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are there any representatives of labor in the house—representatives of organized labor?

Mr. TRAVIESO. There is one, the gentleman I mentioned before, Mr. Aybar, and another man, Mr. Vargas. Both of them were elected by the same district.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. They are unionists themselves?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Mr. Aybar is, and Mr. Vargas, I understand, was until two or three years ago, when he had some disagreement with Mr. Iglesias, and he resigned from his position in the free federation, but he still represents the labor interests, and I think is the most efficient man that the labor people have there.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is the governor appointed by the President?

Mr. TRAVIESO. The governor is appointed by the President.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Has he power to initiate legislation?

Mr. TRAVIESO. To recommend it in his message.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But not to initiate it?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Not to introduce it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Has he the veto power?

Mr. TRAVIESO. He has a conditional veto power.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is the condition?

Mr. TRAVIESO. We may pass a bill by two-thirds of both houses over his veto.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, that law is the same as it is in most of our States?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes; with the exception that the federal congress has retained the power to declare any law void that is in conflict with the constitution.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The statement has been made that wherever the white man, the American or European, goes into other countries he carries with him and introduces certain vices that the people there before have never practiced. Has American occupation brought any new vices to Porto Rico?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I do not think it has. Perhaps—no; I do not think it has any.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Drinking and gambling?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No; I think drinking has not increased any. Our people are not, fortunately, given to drink very much. The climate is not well adapted to that vice, but of course there are exceptions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would your legislature, for example, have the power to appoint a minimum wage commission and fix legal minimum wages?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I do not believe we would have, within the powers given to us by the organic act.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Haven't you the same powers that any State would have in the Union?

Mr. TRAVIESO. No; not exactly. We have very limited powers, and they are defined by the organic act. I do not believe we could, as far as fixing a minimum wage regarding the contracts between private individuals.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Could you do it for women and minors?

Mr. TRAVIESO. We have done it, under the exercise of what we claim to be the police powers, in the matter of health.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have fixed the wage?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Not the wage; I mean the hours of labor.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you can fix the hours of labor under a police regulation, why can not you fix the minimum wage for women and minors?

Mr. TRAVIESO. That is done under the argument that it is better to health.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is exactly the same reason offered in fixing the minimum wage in this country for women and children, that it is necessary that they shall be able to live decently so that they can reproduce.

Mr. TRAVIESO. I think the same argument could be invoked. There is no reason why it should not be.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you understand that organized labor in Porto Rico wants the authorities to be more than neutral in labor disputes or wants the authorities to favor organized labor?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I think, judging by what I know of the desires of the leaders of the movement, as far as I can judge from their communications and the way they act, that they would like the Government to be more than neutral; they would like the Government to be decidedly in their favor.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, they want you to be more than neutral? They want you to be biased in their favor?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Exactly. I can say that, for instance, Mr. Iglesias himself is a man that if he gets a letter from the governor saying, in the course of the usual procedure, the governor addresses him "My dear Mr. Iglesias," and when Mr. Iglesias gets such a letter from the governor, at the first opportunity or at the first meeting he has he reads that letter from the governor and makes those organizations believe that he is a private and intimate friend of the governor and has "pull" with the administration, and all that; and he goes as far as to say sometimes that the Government is with him, and that is the propaganda he makes among the people. That is a natural feeling to have. Perhaps I would feel the same way. I do not blame him for it, and I think that is part of his duty, to get everybody on his side and to get everybody to help him.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is the policy of the Government in labor disputes?

Mr. TRAVIESO. To be entirely impartial and to use its influence, whenever necessary, to see that justice is done the laboring classes, and that we did during the last strike.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you regard the conditions of the workers better or worse since American occupation?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I think they are better, taken as a whole.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What advantages to the worker do you see in American occupation?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I think prior to American occupation for a number of years the majority of these people living in the country were anemic. We started, I think, with an appropriation of $75,000 a year to start a campaign against anemia, and then we reduced that gradually as the anemia was disappearing, and the number of cases that have been cured from this disease is several hundred thousand people that have been treated successfully.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What are the disadvantages to the worker under American occupation as compared to what they were before American occupation?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I do not believe they have any new disadvantages, except, perhaps, the cost of living may be a little—it is higher than it used to be.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That, of course, is a world condition?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes; that is a world condition.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And not confined to Porto Rico?

Mr. TRAVIESO. You could not blame anybody for it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. On the whole, you would say the workers are better off under American occupation than they were under Spanish rule?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I think they are. I think the island as a whole is better off in every other respect.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are there Socialists and I. W. W.'s in Porto Rico?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I do not know. It is hard to draw the line between Socialists and—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And the I. W. W.'s? They usually announce themselves; those that are Socialists announce themselves as Socialists, and those that are I. W. W.'s announce themselves as I. W. W.'s.

Mr. TRAVIESO. For instance, if you ask 100 citizens in Porto Rico, 99 will tell you that Mr. Iglesias is a Socialist, and I know Mr. Aglesias does not admit the fact that he is. He would deny that, and yet ninety-nine men out of one hundred will tell you that he is, judging by his preachings.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are there any socialistic organizations there, any bodies that call themselves socialistic groups?

Mr. TRAVIESO. There is a group called Socialists up there in one place. They won the last election. There was a majority split, and then the Socialists got the better of it and they elected a mayor who claims to be a Socialist.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are there any groups there that call themselves I. W. W.'s—Independent Workers of the World?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Not that I know of.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Complaint was made by one witness that Porto Rico has been having hard times. From what you know of world conditions, are the times in Porto Rico any harder than they have been universally for the last two or three years?

Mr. TRAVIESO. At the present time, perhaps, Porto Rico is far better off than most of the South American countries because, owing to the European war, the price of sugar has gone up very high. I believe they are selling now pretty close to $5. The sugar people are making money now. That is why we believe that they should pay better wages to the employees.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The previous witnesses seemed to have grievances against the officials. Now, do you know from your knowledge whether their grievances are greater against the American officials or the native officials?

Mr. TRAVIESO. The point is that the grievances are all of such a general nature, nothing is specific. In that letter in which I replied to Mr. Iglesias I sent to him in reply to his complaint I told him very plainly that the courts were open to him, to any citizen that cared to present a complaint against any individual. Under our law, and every other law that you know of, you can not complain of a man unless you have it in writing under oath.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are the judges natives?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are the judges of the supreme court?

Mr. TRAVIESO. They have two American judges and three Porto Ricans.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How are the supreme court judges chosen?

Mr. TRAVIESO. By appointment by the President of the United States.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And do you think that the condition of Porto Rico would have been better or worse if the United States had treated Porto Rico as Cuba—gave her absolute independence?

Mr. TRAVIESO. That is a very difficult question to answer, but I am very frank in my statement and my opinion, and I want to try the American rule as far as possible before I decide in favor of independence.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So at this time you would not advocate it?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I would not only not advocate it but I have opposed it openly and bravely, I might say.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is there a demand for independence?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir; it doesn't extend very largely, but it is there.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. From what branch of society does this demand come, from the worker?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Not from the worker exactly, but from the men who are agitating this, one is the speaker of the house of delegates.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What would happen to-day if the United States would separate Porto Rico from this country and give it absolute independence? Would the conditions be any better for the worker?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I don't think it would be better off, I would not like to try it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The workers would have nothing to gain by that?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I don't think they would, in the present condition of Europe, because if anything could save us it would be a market for our coffee. If we had good prices for our coffee the economic problem would be solved.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Did I understand from your previous statements that the first act of violence was committed in the recent labor trouble by the workers?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir; at Vieques.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRAVIESO. It appears so from the reports submitted to the commission and from the letter of Mr. Iglesias's attorney.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That the first act of violence came from the workers?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir; it says that there.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is your tax rate?

Mr. TRAVIESO. One per cent on the assessed value of the property.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And how is property assessed, full value or part value?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Property is assessed; for instance, agricultural land is taxed so much per acre.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is it taxed at the selling price?

Mr. TRAVIESO. At what we considered to be the market value. We say, for instance, if sugar lands are selling for $200 an acre, that is what they are assessed at.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. For full value?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. About 1 per cent?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You spoke about the officers of the island being neutral, between the employer and employee, indicating that they would not advise either side, only in the line of keeping peace. Did not the governor of the island address the cigar makers and advise them to return to work on the terms of the employer?

Mr. TRAVIESO. The present governor?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. TRAVIESO. I have no knowledge of that. At that time I was not in the position I occupy now.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. My information is that he did, and advised them to return to work on the terms of the employers, and that the employees refused to accept the advice, and later on made a settlement with the cigar companies on a much better basis than was suggested by the governor or offered by the employers, which to my mind would indicate that the governor was interested, at least, to have them accede to the wishes of their employers.

Mr. TRAVIESO. I would not deny or admit the fact, because I have no information whatever on the matter. I am absolutely ignorant about those facts.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You say that the conditions are better there than they were formerly, which I suppose everybody will concede. Do you think that the fact that workers in Porto Rico organize themselves into whatever form they may have, even though it may be small in number, has not had a beneficial influence on the island?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I think it has. I wish all of them would be organized.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You think it would be well for them all to be organized?

Mr. TRAVIESO. I think so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It would have the effect of bringing better legislation to the island?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir; and the mere fact of their organizing would be an evidence of progress.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It would indicate that they were becoming more intelligent by organization?

Mr. TRAVIESO. Yes, sir; more intelligent.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. We thank you, Mr. Travieso.

Mr. TRAVIESO. I want to tell the commission, in closing, to consider that the work we are doing now in the island, the Government and all, we are destroying the work of 400 years, and have only had a chance of 16 years, and it is hard to destroy 400 years in 16 years.

Chairman WALSH. We thank you very much for your attendance.

Chairman WALSH. I believe you stated that you had a matter, Mr. Martinez, that you could present in 15 minutes, covering the cigar makers, which you had not an opportunity when you were first upon the stand?

Mr. IGLESIAS. On the question of the cigar makers' strike, we have agreed it shall be five minutes to me and five minutes to him.

The CHAIRMAN. This will have to be concluded by 6 o'clock. You may proceed, Mr. Iglesias.

TESTIMONY OF MR. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS—Recalled.

Mr. IGLESIAS. It has been stated by the secretary of Porto Rico, Mr. Travieso, that in certain sections of the island 18 fires started at different places, and just at that particular place, Aguada. I want to state that in that particular place there never has been a strike—no strike at all.

Chairman WALSH. Where is the closest place there was a strike to that place?

Mr. IGLESIAS. About 10 miles, perhaps. The men who were arrested there have been set free, because no specific charge has been proved against them. The reason for taking them was because it was rumored that a strike was to take place, and to prevent this strike those men that were named as the leaders were taken to jail and accused of fires that never occurred.

I want to refer to the fact that we never have said that our men in Vieques should oppose the police. Our attorney, in giving us the information from Vieques, took himself the opinion from the "people of Porto Rico," from the fiscal, in order to convince everybody that he had not intended to be passionate in giving his views and his opinion. The "people of Porto Rico" are represented by the fiscal. He represents them as attacking first, and not us. We are convinced the police attacked the poor men first and killed them, and that other people, that are not even workingmen or strikers, in order to prevent the police to kill more men, injured these police and attacked the police in order to prevent more killing. But we never said that our men or the workingmen attacked the police first. It was the fiscal who says that, not us.

It has been said that the application for habeas corpus was presented to the court in favor of us in Ponce in order to ask for the reduction of bail. No; we have presented a habeas corpus at the court of Ponce the following day of being arrested, asking that these men be set free and treated as innocent men and not because we had to ask a reduction of bail. The district attorney there made the agreement with our attorneys to let us go free on $300 bail pending an information or investigation that he wanted to make. He took nearly 60 days to get that information. The same day that we were invited to come to this country to appear before this commission, then the charge was introduced by the fiscal at Ponce.

Mr. Travieso stated that I asked for the military regiment of Porto Rico to come to the camp. That is true—in our favor. The governor of Porto Rico told me that he could not do anything, that the police had the right to do it, and that we would have help to maintain the law; that if we wanted to hold a meeting we must apply to the police, and the police will see if we have the right or not. But we said to him that, "You, in your proclamation, indicated that the peaceful paraders and meetings could be held if they were peaceable." He said, "The police will tell you." The police have told us, "We will not permit those meetings, even peaceable." He said, "Well, perhaps because they are afraid of trouble." Then I say to the governor, "If they fear any outbreak, you have about 1,000 soldiers. They could take to the cane fields; but we ought to be permitted to hold meetings and speak to the people." He said, "No; because if I call the soldiers, then public opinion will believe that there is some more serious trouble."

Mr. Travieso said that the land had never been granted free from the legislature or through the legislation of the Government. I declare here that about 6,000 acres has been granted to a man called Borda, a business man, without any payment to the people of Porto Rico, and that land now is under contract with a sugar corporation, and it gets about $10,000 or $15,000 a year, and the people of Porto Rico did not get a cent. Some other pieces of land of 500 and 2,000 and 1,000 acres are given to several individuals. The legislature has granted pieces of land to a lot of men—rich men—that has the value of more than $50,000, free of any cost to them. The same thing has been done with the Young Men's Christian Association and with some other associations that the workingmen have no use of.

Mr. Travieso said something about the reduction of the school budget. It has been said it was because of the revenues and the taxes that can not be paid into the treasury. I say that at the last day of June the same sum of money will be spent in Porto Rico as was spent in previous years, and we will have a net reduction of more than $700,000 left in the school budget. But in taking into consideration the difference between the last budget and the present one is only a so-called economy of $500,000 or less, and you will see that the reduction of the budget took place in the school item, taking more than $700,000—$735,535.

I will say further on this that the same legislature that has reduced the school budget has given more than $80,000 or $100,000 perhaps to the sugar-growers' association in this way: They have a so-called experimental agricultural station for their own business. We have another experimental station created by the Federal Government. That experimental station of the sugar-growers' association was made by collections among the different manufacturers and sugar centrales, by one giving $2,000 and another $1,000, etc. But now the people of Porto Rico have to pay the expenses and do the work for the employers, for the sugar interests, and the legislature passes a law to buy the land of the so-called agricultural experimental station and pay a mortgage of about $30,000 and then $80,000 more for the land, and place on the people of Porto Rico the burden of paying about $30,000 or $40,000 to pay the chemists and the agricultural experts and some other men in order to do the work for the employers and for the sugar interests there, and in the same budget where there was a cut in the education budget.

Chairman WALSH. The education budget was cut down more than $700,000, and the legislature appropriated $80,000 or $100,000 for this experimental station that was for the benefit of the sugar growers alone? That is your statement?

Mr. IGLESIAS. Yes; that is it; and put the payment on the people of Porto Rico for years to come.

Mr. Travieso said something about the municipal judge of Vieques and what he did in changing the sentences or the dates of the sentences. That statement comes from our attorney himself, and it is so. He referred to us in that statement. That statement will be verified in Porto Rico, because one of the great things we will get from this commission will be that this is the first time that Porto Rico will know how these investigations were carried on by the Government of Porto Rico, and who pays the Government of Porto Rico, and how those documents have been written and given to the Government of Porto Rico. Everybody thinks that some friends of the people mentioned here have written the reports. They appear before the people as impartial and just men. We will know now from your records who are responsible for the situation in Porto Rico.

Chairman WALSH. You have just one minute more.

Mr. IGLESIAS. Referring to Mr. Bills, the chief of the department of labor, he said it was unfair to refer to the lawyers working in his department. Yes; they work as lawyers. They are paid to put down the gamblers and other things like that, and it is all mixed up in the same political family. The boss of this chief in Fajardo is a shareholder in that sugar-growers' association, and an important politician, and at the same time a brother-in-law of Mr. Bird, and the judge of that town is another brother-in-law. The boss of this man is a brother-in-law of that man, who is a chief of the entire labor department.

11144 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

They are brothers-in-law and sons-in-law—the mayors and judges—whole families that take the localities there and they do the things they please.

Chairman WALSH. Anything else you have to say you will have to submit in writing. You, Mr. Martinez will have to submit your statement in writing in the record, if you desire to say anything further.

Mr. Iglesias subsequently submitted the following letter:

SAN JUAN, P. R., June 29, 1915.

HON. FRANK P. WALSH,

*Chairman Commission on Industrial Relations,
Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.*

DEAR SIR: In addition to all what we have stated before the Commission on Industrial Relations, during the hearing held at the Shoreham Hotel, Washington, D. C., May 28, and the several charges preferred against the administration of Porto Rico, we are also inclosing to you herewith copy of a statement made, published in one of the biggest papers of the island in regard to fires, by one of the district prosecuting attorneys of Porto Rico that have been for many years in that position. This copy is sent to you such as I offered you when the sittings of the commission were adjourned at Washington, D. C.

We are also inclosing you herewith a copy¹ of our official organ, "Justicia," and have marked with red pencil an article of said paper in which we are answering to the statements that have been published by "The Porto Rico Progress," which is regarded in Porto Rico as the official organ of the government of this island, and which probably may be inspired by the Bureau of Insular Affairs, which is a dependency of the War Department, and under which bureau are all the affairs of Porto Rico.

We beg to call your attention to the article in our paper which is an answer to "The Porto Rico Progress," and more particularly to the quoted paragraphs of "The Porto Rico Progress" that when referring to the labor representatives before the Commission on Industrial Relations says as follows:

"Also they were unfortunate in having come into contact with the Commission on Industrial Relations, whose general attitude on labor questions undoubtedly has given them a false impression on the attitude of Uncle Sam himself.

"At Washington, hearing it developed that all the witnesses from Porto Rico want a congressional investigation or a careful study by some commission appointed by Congress. Absolutely nothing can be accomplished by such an investigation.

"But the question of interest to Porto Rico is: To what will this investigation amount?

"To which I venture to answer, Nothing."

We do insist that the Congress of the United States should inquire into the true conditions of the island, and we are sure that due justice and sincere protection may be provided for the laborers of this island by Congress when enacting any law or the new organic act for the people of Porto Rico.

Very respectfully, yours,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

President of the Free Federation of the Workmen of Porto Rico.

[Translation.]

PARAGRAPHS FROM A STATEMENT MADE PUBLIC BY MR. ANGEL ACOSTA QUINTERO, PROSECUTING ATTORNEY OF THE DISTRICT OF MAYAGUEZ, P. R., TAKEN FROM THE PAPER "LA DEMOCRACIA."

ACCESSORIES OR PARTY OF THE FRAUD DONE AGAINST INSURANCE COMPANIES.

The recent fire in city ward (locally known) Puerta de Tierra, San Juan, the cancelling of the policies against fire in connection with the same, have brought some protest from the press. We understand the insurance companies did what was right. Those whose policies have been cancelled need have no fear, for they will henceforth be more "assured" against the risk of arson. A sad official and professional experience has taught us that the cancelling of certain policies has avoided a calamity and a conflagration as well.

¹ Submitted in printed form.

We have seen the insurance company agents many times in connection with the police and have suggested to them the advisability, pursuant to certain reports and investigations, of cancelling certain policies.

This advice has been heard and grave dangers (fires) have been avoided in so doing.

In our official and professional practice we occasionally find that real estate buildings insured and then destroyed by fire for the most part are insured for a larger sum than that given for the effects of valuation and taxation on property.

Tenement houses (ranchones) or houses that are only taxed for $800, $1,000 appear as being insured for $1,500, $2,000, and even $3,000.

Some there are who live in insured houses; others there are who live in houses that are not insured; but the tenant in either case has his furniture and household effects insured even for a larger amount than they are worth, and there is no data at the internal-revenue office of such a valuation.

In cases like these the agent who issues the policy is just as guilty as the applicant. Moreover, we believe that the insurance company agents in such cases have acted up true.

The crime—not of arson, but of fraudulent destruction of insured property, causing at the same time the destruction of those not insured—has become natural, it has become deep rooted and commonplace among, and it is necessary that the upright people and the legislature put a stop to this. It is high time that the abuse should be done away with, and that this abuse, this shameless act of many an evildoer and thief current be discouraged among us, for there is a tendency that the good Porto Rican people are only capable of committing arson.

STATEMENT OF GOV. ARTHUR YAGER.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, Porto Rico, June 3, 1915.

GENTLEMEN: I have been informed in letters received from Mr. Martin Travieso, jr., and Mr. J. C. Bills, who are at present in Washington, that in the hearing before the Commission on Industrial Relations, May 26, in regard to the recent strike among the sugar workers of Porto Rico, the statement was made by Mr. Iglesias and corroborated by Mr. Gompers that during the cigar makers' strike in 1914 Gov. Yager advised the strikers to return to work upon the conditions set forth by the employers.

I desire to state emphatically that both Mr. Iglesias and Mr. Gompers are mistaken; that I did not give any such advice at any time and especially at the conference held in my office between the parties to that controversy, some time in March.

First, in support of my statement to this effect, I desire to submit in the first place the explicit statement of Mr. J. C. Bills, the chief of the bureau of labor, who was present during the whole of the conference, which lasted several hours, and who understood everything that was said by all parties, both in English and in Spanish, and whose recollection is clear, and whose testimony is unequivocal on this point. Secondly, the testimony of my secretary, Mr. Miguel Muñoz Morales, who was also present during the whole conference and acted as interpreter for me and for those who spoke in Spanish.

Second, it is not at all probable, in a conference at which both parties were represented and which had been called by the governor to secure a settlement of the matters in controversy between them, that the governor would have given any such advice to either side. The entire purpose of the conference was to bring the parties together in order that they might talk over, face to face with each other, the matters in controversy and see if they could not come to some sort of agreement, by compromise or mutual concession, which would end the strike and bring about a reopening of the factories and a return of the laborers to work. The proper attitude of the governor was simply to impress if possible upon both parties the interests of the public at large in having the matter settled and the industry continue. I am perfectly sure that I never for one moment departed from this attitude of complete impartiality as between the two parties. I remember clearly that it was a complicated matter, full of technical details as to grades and shapes of cigars and methods of payment, which I did not fully understand, but all of which had a bearing upon the amount of wages paid to different classes of workmen and the methods of conducting the business. All these things were thrashed out by the participants in the conference, and much to my regret they separated without reaching an agreement.

Third, in proof of the fact that this was my attitude throughout the entire strike I desire to submit letters written by me to the employers and the laborers at the time when the strike was finally settled on June 8, 1914. These letters will show conclusively that I did not undertake to judge as between the parties, but simply to urge upon both parties the importance of arriving at a settlement because of the suffering produced among the families of the workers, and because of the damage done to the community at large through the prolongation of the strike. I also inclose copies of some correspondence between myself and Mr. G. W. Perkins, international president of the Cigar Makers' International Union of America, Chicago, Ill., which will also show the spirit and purpose of the government throughout the strike, and indicate clearly that Mr. Perkins himself understood and appreciated my personal efforts to secure a fair settlement. I also send a letter written to Mr. Gompers during the progress of the strike. It is hardly necessary for me to explain that when I emphasized to Mr. Gompers the importance "for all the interests concerned, and especially for the public interests, that these strikers should all go back to work," I did not mean to imply that they should go back upon terms or under conditions laid down by the employers, but that they should get together and agree upon some fair settlement of the points in dispute and resume their work under conditions satisfactory to them.

Very respectfully,

ARTHUR YAGER, Governor.

The honorable the COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS,
Washington, D. C.

[Cigar Makers' International Union.]

CHICAGO, ILL., June 23, 1914.

HON. ARTHUR YAGER,
Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.

DEAR SIR: I have your esteemed favor of the 10th and note with more than passing interest all that you say in connection with the strike of the cigar makers and the final outcome.

At a banquet given to President Gompers and myself when leaving San Juan, among other things, I said that no one could successfully govern the people of any country, without the governing forces thoroughly understanding the temperament of the people and realizing fully the former and present conditions, and knowing something of the hopes and aspirations of the people from their own standpoint. I judge from your letter and what you said personally that you are in accord with the fundamental sentiment underlying the foregoing statement. I am conscious of the fact that circumstances over which you had no control made the situation a delicate and a difficult one to handle.

With assurance of appreciation for the sentiments expressed in your letter, I am,

Very truly, yours,

G. W. PERKINS, Int. Pres.

JUNE 10, 1914.

MR. G. W. PERKINS,
Monon Building, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: I received in due course of mail and read with much interest your letter of the 24th of April.

I assure you that I have kept in mind steadily the ideas and purposes which you credited me with at the time of your visit here and which you express so clearly in the letter referred to.

Of course you will have learned before this reaches you that the cigar makers' strike has at last been settled in a manner satisfactory to both parties. Certain issues were waived, and what I take was the main issue—that of wages—was compromised, and the factories are to be opened and the laborers go back to work to-morrow.

I rejoice greatly in the settlement and in the increase of wages which the laborers were able to secure, and now I desire to assure you of two things: (1)

That I labored constantly to secure just this kind of a settlement through all the three months and more of the strike. The first conference that was held was arranged at my suggestion, the second one likewise, and the third and last one was arranged in response to a special request that I made of both parties to get together and make another effort to come to a settlement; and when this last conference was in session and seemed to have reached a deadlock, I sent to them a special message urging them not to give up the matter until a settlement was reached. I am thankful to say that they took heart again and did reach a settlement. (2) In spite of all this I think the laborers here have allowed themselves to be prejudiced against the Government because they have not all of them clearly realized the weight of responsibility placed upon the authorities to keep the peace and preserve order. Some of the strikers, I do not believe there were many, were imbued with the idea of accomplishing their purpose by violence, and it was necessary for the entire administration to be firm and alert in its efforts to keep order. This was sometimes misinterpreted into a lack of sympathy with the cause of the laborers. Of course I am not so foolish as to charge the whole organization with responsibility for the acts of a few of its members or sympathizers; but in a time of struggle and excitement like this the great body of laborers are not always able to keep clear in their minds the issues involved and to do justice to those who have the difficult task of preserving the peace and enforcing the law regardless of their personal sympathies.

I am writing thus freely to you because I am of the opinion that Mr. Gompers was himself perhaps somewhat prejudiced by the vigorous representations made to him by local leaders. However, we can certainly all rejoice now in the settlement of the difficulties in an entirely honorable way, which I think was preferable to any way, even that of arbitration.

With best wishes for you, and assuring you always of my interest in the cause of the toiling masses everywhere, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

ARTHUR YAGER, Governor.

SAN JUAN, P. R., June 8, 1914.

To the parties at conference for the settlement of the tobacco strike.

GENTLEMEN: When the industrial life of a people is disturbed by a rupture of the relations between labor and capital it becomes the duty of all public-minded citizens and especially of all who are charged with public positions of trust, to exert every possible effort to promote a proper, satisfactory, and expeditious settlement of such controversy.

A long-continued struggle brings serious suffering not only upon the parties immediately interested but also upon the public at large. Prompted by this sense of duty, I have appealed to you, the representatives of the parties involved in this strike, to meet in conference and make a further attempt to reach an agreement upon the questions still at issue; and I am now sending this brief message to express to you, on behalf of the people of Porto Rico, and especially in behalf of the families who are now so bravely enduring suffering and privation because of this struggle, my appreciation of the promptness with which you have responded to my request that you meet again in conference. I desire to extend also my earnest hope that you will continue the negotiations begun under such propitious auspices until a proper and beneficial agreement can be reached, an agreement that will promote better and more lasting relations between the employers and employees of the tobacco industry of Porto Rico.

Congratulating you upon the progress you have already made toward a settlement, and trusting that you will, in a patriotic and broad-minded spirit, be able to agree upon a fair and honorable settlement, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

ARTHUR YAGER, Governor.

JUNE 3, 1914.

Mr. PRUDENCI RIVERA MARTINEZ,
President Central Strike Committee,
Federación Libre, Luna Street, San Juan, P. R.

DEAR SIR: I have received a communication from the president and the secretary of the "Concejo General de Oficio," and also a copy of the resolutions adopted by the general assembly held May 27 in the house of delegates, San Juan, making an appeal to me to do what I can to aid them in securing a peaceful settlement of the controversy between the cigar makers and the Porto Rico American Tobacco Co. I am addressing this reply to their communication to you as the president of the central strike committee, hoping you will communicate it to them.

In view of the fact that this strike has continued now for more than three months and has closed the factories of Puerta de Tierra and Bayamón, inflicting great loss not only upon the parties immediately concerned but also upon the merchants and general business of the community, and entailing great suffering upon many innocent people, I have concluded that it would be proper for me to request that another conference be held by the members of your committee and the officials of the company.

I am aware that one or two conferences have been held before this and have failed to effect a pacific settlement; but I am compelled to believe that both parties really desire a pacific settlement of this disastrous strike, and I am, therefore, led to hope that continued discussion of the differences between the parties will eventually lead to a pacific settlement. At any rate it will assuredly do no harm to make another effort to secure a pacific settlement of a controversy which is so harmful to all parties concerned and to the public as well.

I have, therefore, commissioned the bureau of labor of the insular government to have an interview with you and also with the officials of the company, with a view to arranging a conference. I hope you will accede to this arrangement.

With sincere respect, I am,
Yours, very truly,

ARTHUR YAGER, Governor.

JUNE 3, 1914.

Mr. JOHN FRESE,

Vice President Porto Rico American Tobacco Company,

San Juan, Porto Rico.

DEAR SIR: I have received a communication from the president and the secretary of the "Concejo General de Oficios," and also a copy of the resolutions adopted by the general assembly held May 27 in the house of delegates, San Juan, making an appeal to me to do what I can to aid them in securing a peaceful settlement of the controversy between the cigar makers and your company.

In view of the fact that this strike has continued now for more than three months and has closed the factories of Puerta de Tierra and Bayamón, inflicting great loss not only upon the parties immediately concerned but also upon the merchants and general business of the community and entailing great suffering upon many innocent people, I have concluded that it would be proper for me to request that another conference be held by the officials of your company and the committee of the strikers.

I am aware that one or two conferences have been held before this and have failed to effect a pacific settlement; but I am compelled to believe that both parties really desire a pacific settlement of this disastrous strike, and I am therefore led to believe that continued discussion of the differences between the parties will eventually lead to a pacific settlement. At any rate it will assuredly do no harm to make another effort to secure a pacific settlement of a controversy which is so harmful to all parties concerned and to the public as well.

I have therefore commissioned the bureau of labor of the insular government to have an interview with you and also with the committee of strikers with a view to arranging a conference. I hope you will accede to this arrangement.

With sincere respect, I am,
Yours, very truly,

ARTHUR YAGER, Governor.

APRIL 29, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. GOMPERS: I received in due course of mail your letter written from Washington with reference to the labor conditions in Porto Rico, and, as you suggested in that letter, the laborers of this island have occupied a large place in my policies and my thoughts.

I take for granted that you familiarized yourself when here with the important phases of the local situation as to the strike of the cigar makers of Porto Rico, and that you have kept in touch with the developments which have taken place since you returned to Washington.

I am sure you will agree with me that it is important for all the interests concerned, and especially for the public interests, that these strikers should all go back to work. Every day that passes emphasizes the importance of their doing so. There have been some acts of violence, as you are aware, and all of them seem to have been committed against those who were opposing the strikers, the last being a well-nigh successful attempt to assassinate the foreman of the Bayamón factory, against whom the strikers entertained especial objections and whose discharge by the company they made a condition of their return to work. Such acts as these have greatly injured the cause of the strikers and of union labor in general in the estimation of the public. I fear that a continuation of the contest will lead to still further injury.

I am inclosing herein a circular recently issued, by the committee of strikers, appealing for aid in the United States. Practically every assertion made in this appeal is false except the most important one of all, and that is that the striking workmen and their families are in great need and are suffering greatly for the necessities of life. I wish that I could do something to help them, but under the circumstances I do not think that any help extended along the lines of their request would be of any real benefit.

I inclose also a copy of an official report on the strike made by the bureau of labor which I am sure is thoroughly impartial and gives the actual facts.

I am sending these documents to you with the hope that you may be able in some way to bring to bear upon the leaders of the strike here the influence of your larger knowledge and wider experience, so as to secure a settlement of the difficulties and a return of the strikers to work.

I have done everything that I could to keep the peace, preserve order, and at the same time promote the interests of the public by securing a peaceful settlement of the strike.

With best wishes for you, I am,
Yours, very sincerely,

ARTHUR YAGER, Governor.

Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS,
Washington, D. C.

(Through the Bureau of Insular Affairs.)

[Cigar Makers' International Union.]

CHICAGO, ILL., April 24, 1914.

HON. ARTHUR YAGER,
Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.

DEAR SIR: Being mindful of your statement made to President Gompers and myself on the occasion of our visit to your office on March 26, that it was your desire to be helpful in bringing about a better understanding in the cigar makers' strike and a speedy termination of the same along lines mutually satisfactory to both sides involved, I am taking the liberty of saying that since my return home I have been furnished with regular weekly reports from our representative in Porto Rico. These reports complain bitterly against the authorities in some places, who, it is charged, are taking sides with the firm, and I should judge from the tone of the reports that this can only arouse bitter resentment on the part of the workers now on strike.

I am sure that all fair-minded and right-thinking men and women are desirous of bringing about peace in the tobacco industry, and I am frank to say that in my judgment this desirable end can not be accomplished unless the full rights and privileges and lawful purposes of the workers are readily considered and safeguarded against any injustice or unwarranted interference on the part of those whose duty, as we understand it, is to simply keep the peace. I should judge that the workers of Porto Rico are at least partly aroused to a realization of their rights and privileges, and because of temperament and environment any attempt to unjustly interfere will have a tendency to arouse bitter resentment and unnecessarily delay a just and fair settlement of the difficulty.

I am of the opinion that if these people now struggling to maintain and improve living and working conditions are beaten by an unwarranted exercise and interference of the police authorities, that while it may temporarily suppress the strike, it will by no means ultimately do so.

Your manifestation of interest and apparent desire, on the occasion referred to, to be helpful in bringing about stability of employment and fairer conditions warrants me in urging that in so far as lies within your power the rights interests, and activities of the cigar makers be safeguarded and protected against any unwarranted or unjust interference on the part of the police power of the island. I have personally, verbally, and in writing urged upon our officers and members there a strict obedience to all laws and conservative action and have urged that our officers and members there agree to submit the whole controversy to arbitration, and I have been assured that they have agreed to do so.

Yours, respectfully,

G. W. PERKINS, Int. Prest.

REPORT OF THE GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO COVERING THE STRIKE OF AGRICULTURAL LABORERS ON SUGAR PLANTATIONS IN PORTO RICO.

SAN JUAN, P. R., April 19, 1915.

Mr. PRESIDENT: In reply to inquiries made from your office of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, with respect to the recent strike of agricultural laborers on sugar plantations in Porto Rico, I have the honor to make the following report covering the history of this strike from its inception to its conclusion. I also inclose documents supporting the statements made in the form of official reports from fiscals and other judicial officers and a report from the chief of the bureau of labor discussing the various phases of the matters involved in the controversy between the sugar producers and their laborers.

The cause of the strike was the low wages and the long hours of labor which prevailed on the sugar estates in Porto Rico. It is true that low wages have been the rule in the island for a great many years, doubtless for centuries, but it was felt by the laborers that inasmuch as the wages of some of the sugar workers had been somewhat reduced in the last two years, owing to the crisis in this industry, and inasmuch as the present price of sugar has been greatly increased by the European war, it was an opportune time for the wages of the sugar workers to be increased. In this view of the matter the laborers had the entire sympathy of the public and of the Government. In fact, the justice of their contention was freely admitted by the owners of the sugar mills.

Unfortunately there was no organization or leadership whatever among the workers in the sugar fields, and being generally illiterate and quite amenable to influences outside themselves, the situation furnished a great opportunity for the professional labor leaders. The opportunity was promptly seized by the leaders of the Free Federation of Labor, and their organizers and speakers were sent to all parts of the island not only to foment the strike but also to induce the agricultural workers to enter their organization and become permanently amenable to their leadership.

The strike was inaugurated at Bayamón on January 18 by a group of cigar makers. It was spread along the north coast, from one community to another, but in many places was settled in a week or so by the employers granting some increase of wages. The methods used by the leaders to spread the strike became more and more objectionable as time went on. Meetings were held at night in the various towns and villages, in which the language used became ever more violent and incendiary, and by day noisy parades were led along the highways and through the cane fields, persuading, and sometimes intimidating the peasants so as to get them to cease work and join the strike. Pretty soon cane fires began to occur among the standing canes, which, of course, menaced the destruction of the whole unharvested crop. At the same time several destructive fires occurred in some of the towns of either incendiary or accidental origin, and while these had no connection with the strike, they tended to increase the uneasiness, and considerable alarm was felt by the property owners, and they appealed to the Government for stronger protection. The owners of the sugar estates were especially urgent in their appeals. The governor promised to use every means in his power to maintain order and protect property, but he stated to them that he believed the sugar laborers were justly entitled to an increase of wages. The employers agreed to this and promised to grant an increase when their laborers returned to work.

The first clash between the strikers and police occurred at Juncos on February 4. A large body of strikers or their sympathizers tried to force their way over a private road into the fields of a sugar estate after they had been prohibited to enter by the police. This was not at all serious and resulted only in a few bruises and slight wounds among laborers.

On February 16, however, there occurred a very serious outbreak of lawlessness and murderous violence at Vieques. Vieques is a small island of about 10,000 population under the jurisdiction of Porto Rico and situated some 15 or 20 miles distant and therefore somewhat difficult of access for lack of regular means of transportation. In Spanish times it was used as a sort of penal station by the Government of Porto Rico, and as a result the population at the present time is supposed to be somewhat more turbulent than those on the main island. The land is very fertile, and a large part of it is planted to sugar cane. To this island one of the leaders of the federation of labor proceeded and set about getting up a strike, using their usual methods. The first intimation the Government had of his activities was the report of a very serious riot that had taken place in Vieques on the date mentioned. The chief of police was immediately dispatched with reinforcements of police, and the fiscal, or prosecuting attorney of that district accompanied him with instructions to restore order and investigate thoroughly in the regular legal manner the entire occurrence, arresting and arraigning all offenders in the manner provided by law. The official report of the fiscal made to me soon after his arrival in Vieques is herein inclosed. It is an important document, for it discloses a most deplorable affair and illustrates what might have been done by the misguided leaders of the laborers wherever they might secure an opportunity to carry out their operations in their own way.

A mob of so-called strikers, armed with machetes and revolvers, marching about the cane fields in a secluded spot, some 6 or 7 miles from the town of Isabela Segunda, came upon two lonely policemen who were guarding some private property and right of way. They were immediately warned by the policemen that they could not enter, whereupon they divided, surrounded, and attacked the police, cut them down in the most ferocious manner with their machetes, and, leaving them for dead upon the roadside, marched away to the distant town, with the evident purpose of destroying, in like manner, all the police to be found there, and of taking complete possession of the little island. It is true, of course, that the two policemen defended themselves bravely, and before they were cut down shot and killed two or three of their frenzied assailants and wounded several others. It is also true that the six or eight policemen who were in the town rallied together at their cuartel, and armed with guns, which they fired in the air, succeeded in dispersing the mob after its arrival without further casualties. But the spirit, methods, and purpose of the leaders who had organized, armed, and inspired this mob were plainly manifest, and the menace to public order was too serious to be overlooked. Moreover, the papers throughout Porto Rico immediately published accounts of this riot, and a painful impression was produced upon the minds of all good citizens.

It was necessary that prompt and firm action be taken by the government to assure all classes that order would be maintained and personal-property rights be protected. The governor immediately issued a proclamation to the people and a letter of instruction to the chief of police, defining clearly his attitude toward the situation, and announcing his determination to preserve order and at the same time to uphold the law and deprive no citizens or class of their constitutional rights and liberties. The Vieques riot was the turning point of the strikes. A full understanding of it is necessary in order to explain the acts and policy of the government.

After the proclamation the atmosphere cleared and uneasiness, on the one hand, and the tendency to violence on the other, gradually passed away. On the north side of the island the sugar centrals, one by one, compromised the controversy with the laborers, and all promptly resumed work at somewhat higher wages. On the south side the strikes continued for some time in a few localities, and the leaders made desperate efforts to rekindle the fires of passion and spread disorder further, but they were forbidden to make incendiary speeches and incite the peons to violence, which is contrary to the laws of Porto Rico, and also to march about the country in large bodies the peasants through the cane fields, for the reason that these bands intimidated workers who were actually working in the fields, and also invariably led to a string of cane fires following in the wake of the paraders.

The entire movement finally closed with the so-called Ponce riot. The exact facts as to this occurrence have not yet been thoroughly ascertained. The judicial authorities of the Ponce district have the whole matter in charge, and no trials have as yet been held. My information, gathered from reports of the police and the fiscal, is to the following effect: A large meeting was held in the principal plaza of Ponce to promote the strike. After many speeches had been made, at about midnight or later, Mr. Santiago Iglesias, the president of the Free Federation of Labor, began to address the meeting. His language was said to be very incendiary and inciting to lawlessness. The police who were present called upon him to desist. Several labor leaders surrounding the speaker resisted the execution of this command, and confusion immediately followed in which shots were fired and one unfortunate man was killed and two or three others were wounded, not seriously. Mr. Iglesias and one other speaker were arrested for violent language, and some other persons for disorder. All were given bail. There is dispute as to who fired the fatal shot. The district court, in due process of law, will, undoubtedly, in my judgment, enforce the law impartially after fair trials of all the accused.

After the Ponce affair the strike on the south side greatly diminished in excitement and soon entirely ceased. The laborers, in practically every case, were given an increase in wages as soon as they returned to work.

SUMMARY.

As will be seen, the strike was due in the main to a controversy between the sugar workers and their employers over an immediate increase in wages. The wages of these laborers were pitifully low, the time seemed opportune, and the justice of their plea for higher wages was universally admitted. The other points as to shorter hours, contract work, etc., as will be seen from the report of the chief of the bureau of labor, were very much more difficult of proper settlement. The intrusion of the Free Federation of Labor into the matter was resented by the employers inasmuch as none of their laborers had any connection with this organization; but this may have been useful and even necessary because of the lack of leadership and intelligence of the workers.

The strike began at Bayamon on January 18, and was gradually extended to other points, but was settled at Bayamon January 29 before many other places were involved. Altogether there were perhaps 20,000 workers involved in the movement from the beginning to the end, but not more than 6,000 were out on strike at any one time. The movement ended March 1, with a substantial increase of wages for the laborers concerned, not only for those who joined the strike but also for those who did not.

The demands made by the leaders of the strike differed in different points, but most frequently they were a flat rate of $1 per day for all classes of field workers, the limitation of the working day to eight hours, and the abolition of the contract (or ajuste) system of harvesting and cultivating cane. Substantial gains were made by the laborers, and doubtless more could have been gained, if the tendency to, and the acts of, violence could have been entirely eliminated. The wages of the field workers on the sugar plantations have always been and are still pitifully low, as are the wages of all unskilled laborers in Porto Rico; but their standards of living, of intelligence, and moral character are also low and have been for a long period of time. These unhappy conditions are the result of overpopulation and the tradition and usages of centuries of bad administration and social evolution. These conditions are well understood in the island and in the United States and can be improved only gradually and through education and patient effort on the part of the Government and all those interested in social uplift. Certainly violence and lawlessness can not help.

In considering the table of wages before and after the strike appended to the report of the chief of the bureau of labor herein inclosed, it must be remembered that only the wages of day laborers are given. The wages actually received by those who work under contract are not easily ascertainable. It is universally conceded, however, that the strongest and best workers prefer the contract system, and that they earn considerably more than the day laborers.

Finally, both during the strike and since its close only regular and legal methods have been used by the Government to prevent and punish acts of violence. The police have been used only to preserve order and protect property. No constitutional or legal rights of laborers or of others have been contravened.

There is no trial by jury in the municipal courts of Porto Rico, but in the district courts, in felony cases, trial by jury exists. All offenders against the laws have been arrested, arraigned, bailed, and tried by the regular judicial officers and methods. Appeals to the higher courts have been granted in all cases where they have been applied for, and there is no reason whatever for any one to believe there is any danger of a miscarriage of justice in any case for lack of a fair trial or for any other reason.

The leaders of the Free Federation of Labor have frequently demanded unusual and extra legal methods of investigation and procedure, but these demands have been refused, as there has never at any time seemed to be any need for them. As an illustration, there is inclosed a copy of the most recent demand of this nature and the reply of the Government.

All the inclosed documents are forwarded to support and supplement the statements made above.

Very respectfully submitted.

_____, Governor.

To the honorable the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C.

[Telegram—Translation.]

VIEQUES, P. R., February 18, 1915.

The GOVERNOR, San Juan, P. R.:

We began inquiry into Vieques affair at 3 p. m. The following facts proved by evidence secured up to 10 p. m.: Two policemen received serious machete and revolver wounds and three laborers were killed in riot ~~out~~ in the country. Four seriously wounded laborers are in the hospital. Two of them will probably die. The policemen, while preserving order, were set on by 300 strikers in groups. All were armed with revolvers and machetes. Evidence shows attack on policemen was premeditated. They were left for dead. Fiscal ordered the arrest of the four men who wounded the policemen on a charge of assault with intent to kill. Bail fixed at $5,000. Seventeen men arrested on charge of rioting. Bail fixed at $2,000. Forty other arrests of strikers awaiting investigation. Various kinds of weapons seized. Inquiry to be continued to-morrow. The police conducting themselves as they should. Everything is quiet.

HERNÁNDEZ AND SHANTON.

SAN JUAN, February 20, 1915.

To the Fiscals, the Alcaldes, and the District Chiefs of Police of Porto Rico:

The proclamation¹ which I have to-day addressed to the people of Porto Rico will show you clearly the attitude of the government throughout the serious situation existing to-day in this island. It is of absolute necessity that disorder, fire, and riot should cease immediately, and that absolute quietness be reestablished. The parades of laborers, armed with machetes, clubs, and other arms, must be strictly prohibited, and the machete shall only be used as an instrument of labor when the laborers are about their daily occupation. Meetings at which orators incite the odium and discredit of anybody shall be suppressed and when riot and disorder is provoked.

The peaceful laborer and everyone who desires to engage in his daily occupation shall be protected, and it shall be prevented at all cost and by means of force, if necessary, that the freedom of the peaceful citizen to work and not to join the strike be abridged.

In cases of riot and disorder the leaders and the authors, who by their word or by their actions lead the unconscious masses of the people to execute acts of violence and disorder, shall be severely punished.

Every authority has the absolute support of the government to compel the faithful and energetic execution of the law, and absolute neutrality shall be observed in the conflicts between capital and labor, and both shall be protected when within the law, but if any of said elements violate the law they shall be severely punished, and the government is ready not to allow the rights of the laborer to peacefully strike and to demand in a peaceful manner an increase of his salary, either by remaining at home without working or by persuading the employers by word of mouth to increase his salary, to be used as an instrument and as a means to incite the people to commit acts of violence and force to obtain an increase in salary which can not be obtained peacefully.

¹ Submitted in printed form.

11154 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

The Government expects every one of you to do your duty, and thus you will receive the absolute support of the authorities.

ARTHUR YAGER,
Governor of Porto Rico.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, Porto Rico, February 25, 1915.

SIR: In accordance with my verbal instructions to you, and in order that you may understand clearly how to exercise your control over the meetings and parades of the striking laborers outside the urban zones, which by my letter of the 20th instant were placed under your control, inasmuch as such meetings are not generally regulated by municipal ordinances, I desire to make the following explanatory statement in writing.

It was not my intention that you should suppress peaceful meetings of the laborers who may gather at some certain point on the public roads or in the "barrios" for the purpose of discussing in an orderly manner their grievances. So long as these meetings are peaceful and orderly in their spirit and attitude, and so long as the speakers discuss the grievances of the working people within the limits of the law, I desire that you shall not in any way interfere with them.

Noisy and threatening parades of large bodies of workmen for the purpose of intimidating peaceful laborers, or parades which cause or tend to cause the setting of fires in the cane fields or disorder among the people, should be prohibited. This, of course, will not prevent the peaceful use of the roads by the laborers or others who desire to assemble at any point for the purpose of holding a peaceful meeting.

This letter must not be construed as in any manner modifying or withdrawing any part of my proclamation or letter of the 20th instant, but simply as explaining the manner in which you are to execute some of the instructions of the letter.

Respectfully,

ARTHUR YAGER,
Governor.

THE CHIEF OF INSULAR POLICE, San Juan, Porto Rico.

MEMORANDUM OF THE QUESTIONS IN DISPUTE DURING THE RECENT STRIKE OF THE AGRICULTURAL LABORERS IN THE SUGAR-CANE INDUSTRY.

The matters complained of and discussed by the strikers were:

(1) Low wages; (2) improper payment of wages at stores; (3) the ajuste system; (4) the system of agregados, i. e., laborers living in houses owned by their employers; and (5) a shorter working day.

It is extremely difficult to gather accurate data upon the earnings of laborers employed in this industry, because thousands of them work by ajuste, and neither the contractor nor the employer has any records of the daily earnings of the individual laborers. Also laborers employed by ajuste work irregularly, so that it is difficult, even when the daily or weekly wages can be obtained, to know whether or not those wages represent a full day's or full week's working time. The plan of investigation has been to go to three or four of the most important colonos of each section and get such information from their payrolls as they had, and then to go out into the fields and talk with the laborers with the purpose of corroborating and supplementing this information. This work is not complete, but such data as has been gathered is shown in the following table:

Table showing daily wages of laborers in cane fields investigated, January to March, 1915.

District.	Name of mill.	Number of laborers investigated.		Average daily wages.
		Before strike.	After strike.	Before strike.	After strike.
Aguada.....	Central Coloso.....	490	(1)	$0.525	(1)
Aguirre.....	Aguirre.....	(2)	(2)	.50	(1)
Añasco.....	Ana María.....	198	280	.57	$0.717
Arecibo.....	Cambalache and Los Caños.....	193	202	.56	.615
Arroyo.....	Lafayette.....	(2)	(2)	.57	.67
Barceloneta.....	Plazuela.....	(2)	(2)	.54	.65
Bayamón.....	Juanita.....	156	449	.48	.595
Caguas.....	Santa Juana.....	136	131	.535	.61
Camuy.....	Soller, Alianza.....	155	(2)	.49	(1)
Carolina.....	Progreso.....	143	(2)	.67	(1)
Cayey.....	Cayey.....	162	(2)	.665	(1)
Ensenado.....	Cuánica (Colonias).....	(2)	(2)	.65	.75
Fajardo.....	Fajardo.....	(2)	(2)	.60	.72
Guayama.....	Macheta.....	599	600	.604	.715
Guayanilla.....	Rufina and San Francisco.....	(2)	(2)	.50	(1)
Hormigueros.....	Eureka.....	(2)	(2)	.44	.53
Humacao.....	Ejemplo and Pasto Viejo.....	239	243	.52	.715
Jayuya.....	Santa Bárbara.....	30	(2)	.50	(1)
Juana Díaz.....	Boca Chica.....	(2)	(2)	.50	.60
Juncos.....	Juncos.....	190	259	.51	.61
Loíza.....	Canóvanas.....	322	287	.56	.67
Manatí.....	Monserate.....	1,200	1,049	.54	(1)
Maunabo.....	Columbia.....	301	301	.545	.65
Mayaguez.....	Rochelaise.....	(2)	(2)	.44	.59
Naguabo.....	San Cristobal.....	125	134	.48	.59
Ponce.....	Fortuna, Mercedita, and Constancia.....	(2)	(2)	.55	.65
Patillas.....	Providencia.....	250	250	.57	.67
Rincón.....	Córsica.....	(2)	(2)	.60	.70
Río Piedras.....	Vannina.....	(2)	100	.54	.59
San Sebastián.....	Plata.....	(2)	(2)	.50	.60
Santa Isabel.....	Cortada.....	(2)	(2)	.55	.65
Toa Baja.....	Constancia.....	(2)	(2)	.60	(1)
Utua.....	Utua.....	40	(1)	.41	(1)
Vega Alta.....	Cármén.....	(2)	(2)	.54	.64
Vega Baja.....	San Vicente.....	1,700	1,700	.62	.70
Vieques.....	Puerto Real, Playa Grande, Arkadia.....	(2)	(2)	.65	.75
Yabucoa.....	Mercedita.....	176	156	.51	.59

¹ No strike, or strike settled before any outside agitator took any action. Really, laborers at these places have obtained 20 per cent increase over prevailing salaries in 1914; and hours of work reduced on same basis.

² Inspectors of the bureau of labor were unable to see pay rolls and had no chance to get data, but salaries prevailing, furnished by laborers.

Summary.—From the above table it will be seen that laborers in 28 mills and properties went on strike and upon return to work they get, practically, an increase on salaries of from 9 per cent to 37½ per cent which render a general average of 23½ per cent over prevailing salaries before the strike.

The second complaint, that wages should be paid in lawful money and not in metal disks or pasteboard checks, and that laborers should not be permitted to run credit accounts at stores owned by the employer or in which the employer guarantees the payment of the purchases made by his employees, is an important and exceedingly difficult problem. The bureau of labor has made investigations of many of these cases during the past year, but it has not been possible to prove a technical violation of the existing law. The bureau of labor proposed an amendment to this law at the last session of the legislature which died in the house. That great injustice is frequently practiced upon illiterate laborers through this means is certain.

Employers have a right to issue evidences of indebtedness from day to day or from week to week, where it would not be reasonable to expect them to have on hand a large amount in cash, and where such evidences of indebtedness are redeemable in lawful money at reasonable times and places. Of the principle there can not be any criticism. The trouble is, however, that the laborers need ready cash from day to day and frequently sell these evidences of indebtedness at tremendous discounts before the arrival of the regular pay day, at which time they could exchange them for lawful money. The system of giving such metal or pasteboard evidences of indebtedness is frequently connected with the store-credit system, the employer giving these disks or cards to laborers showing the amount of money which they have earned, and the laborers taking them to the store belonging to the employer or with which the employer has an arrangement where he is permitted to make purchases with them. Upon pay day, of course, the employer redeems these disks or checks, paying the storekeeper their face value in lawful money. Usually, however, no disks or checks are given by the employer, but the laborers are allowed to purchase on credit without them, their purchases being entered in a credit book and the amount thereof deducted from the wages which are due upon pay day. There is one evil of great importance that attaches to both these systems, and that is that the prices of food in many, if not in a majority, of such stores are higher than they are in the other stores in the same community. There is really no reason for this as the storekeepers very seldom lose anything on such accounts. There is another evil connected with the credit-book system, and that is that the storekeeper does not keep the quantity and the items purchased from day to day, but simply enters the word "efectos" (things) with the value of the same, and the vast majority of the laborers being illiterate, there is no doubt that the customary disputes between the laborers and the storekeepers, when they come to settle up, are frequently, if not usually, justified so far as the laborers are concerned.

A great difficulty is, however, that practically all of these laborers live one week behind hand. On Monday morning they have nothing to make their purchases with for the coming week; they must get food somewhere, and they themselves beseech their employers to provide them with means of purchasing on credit. I believe that the government can accomplish considerable in preventing exploitations under the present law, but new legislation is absolutely essential to a material betterment of conditions. It is doubtful, however, whether perfect conditions in this problem can ever be attained through legislation or through strikes.

The third point in dispute, that of the ajuste system, is a just cause of complaint in some sections of the island, while in other sections it seems to be working equitably and advantageously. Ajuste contracts vary greatly in different sections of the island. In some places the ajuste contractor controls hundreds of men and is comparable to an administrator or superintendent in the importance of his work. Such ajuste contractors agree to cut hundreds of acres of sugar cane, for example, at a stated price per acre. In other cases the ajuste contractor has only a few men under him, and the importance of his position is comparable to that of a subboss. Such contractors agree to cut a certain number of rows of cane, for example, for a certain price. In both of these cases the ajuste contractor has control of the employees either directly or through his subcontractors. The smaller ajuste contractors work themselves with their laborers, and sometimes the price received is divided proportionately among the gang, the contractor receiving a few cents more. In still other sections of the island the employer makes his ajuste contracts with the individual laborers directly. This is the simplest case and varies but little from ordinary piecework. It is certainly the most satisfactory method.

The difficulty with the system of ajuste contract is that one or more middlemen are introduced, each one of whom is in a way an independent merchant profiting according to the cheapness with which he can employ his needed laborers. The remedy is for the employer to have a salaried employee who will make contracts directly with the individual workmen. This is more cumbersome, according to some employers, and, of course, it increases the burden of administration upon the employer and his staff.

The fourth problem in dispute, that of the agregados or laborers living in houses belonging to the employer, also varies greatly in the different sections of the island. In some places as, for example, Bayamon and about Aguadilla, there are employers who allow their laborers the free use of a house and also of a small piece of land on which vegetables are cultivated and in some cases, pigs and chickens and even a cow and a calf are kept by the laborer upon his employer's land. The general rule seems to be that where the employer provides nothing except the land, then the laborer shall take all or practically all of what is produced; but where the employer provides the seeds and the implements for cultivation, etc., then the laborer gives the employer one-half of what is produced. In some other sections of the island, especially along the south coast, such laborers are given the use of a home and nothing more. In many trips about the island the undersigned has found not more than three or four cases in which laborers living in plantation houses received less wages than laborers living outside of the plantations. They are generally paid the same rate of wages. The advantage to the employer is that he has a resident supply of more or less skilled labor upon which he can depend. The one condition upon which laborers occupy such houses is that they must work for the employer when he requests their services. During the last strike many laborers were thrown out of such houses in violation of law. Generally in the sugar-cane sections the houses occupied by such laborers have been erected by the employer and are built of boards and zinc, but in many places they are mere thatched huts erected by the laborers from palm leaves, etc., obtained from the employer's land.

The fifth problem in dispute, that of the hours of work per day, is practically the same in all parts of the island. Laborers usually say that they work from 6 a. m. to 6 p. m., with from one-half hour to one hour off for the noonday meal. Employers say that their laborers do not work steadily all of this time. It is probable that the average working day is approximately 10 hours. The agreements made during the last strike fixed the maximum day at nine hours.

J. C. BILLS, Jr.

REPORT OF MR. HOWARD L. KERN, ATTORNEY GENERAL OF PORTO RICO.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE OF PORTO RICO,
OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
San Juan, April 20, 1915.

The honorable the GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO,
San Juan, P. R.

SIR: I am inclosing herewith two copies of a report of the fiscal of Humacao summarizing the facts in connection with the riot which occurred on February 16, 1915, in the island of Vieques. Previous to this report the fiscal had made oral reports to this office and had sent a complete copy of the affidavits, in Spanish, taken during his investigation. The present summary, which is dated April 19, 1915, covers the situation up to that time, and I have asked the fiscal to give me complete statistical information of all the cases in the municipal court of Vieques and the appeals to the district court of Humacao as soon as these appeals have been decided by the district court. When this information is forthcoming I will send you a copy.

I have also requested the fiscal of Ponce to send me a complete statement of the number of persons arrested in the riot which occurred in Ponce on March 1, 1915, and the number of persons who were injured in that riot. There was one person killed in this Ponce riot, and I now have a detailed report of the investigation made by the district fiscal of Ponce in regard to this death, and if I ascertain that there is sufficient evidence against one Norberto Quiles, a policeman, who is charged with having unnecessarily caused this death, the fiscal will be directed to proceed with the trial against him.

These two riots are the only instances which have come to my knowledge in which there have been any deaths or serious injuries during the recent strike of the cane workers in Porto Rico. There have been several other disturbances and clashes between the police and the strikers, but none of them of as serious a character as these two. You already have a report by Mr. Samuel Bothwell, who was appointed special fiscal for the purpose of conducting an investigation in regard to the disturbance at Juncos.

In no case has any striker or any other person been deprived of adequate relief in the courts. The trials have all been held, and are being held, in the ordinary course of procedure and the accused are given the rights of bail and appeal. Indeed, if in any case such rights were denied, any person has a right to bring a special proceeding in a higher court to see that these rights are secured, and if in any case evidence was presented to me that these rights were not being granted, I would immediately take steps to see that they were enforced. As you of course know, there is no right to a trial by jury in misdemeanor cases in Porto Rico, and none of the municipal courts have jury trials. All of the crimes of which the persons who were convicted in the municipal court of Vieques were charged were cases of misdemeanor. Many of them have been appealed to the district court of Humacao, where they will be tried de novo, but of course without a jury, inasmuch as they are misdemeanor cases. All of the evidence must be produced at this new trial, and every case must stand or fall upon the merits as presented to the district court. There was a misunderstanding of the municipal judge of Vieques in regard to the right to appeal in some of the cases in which convictions were had in his court, and the municipal judge at first refused to allow an appeal in certain cases where the appeal was not presented within three days, but upon this fact being communicated to me I immediately wrote to him a letter, dated March 20, 1915, in which I cited to him an act approved May 28, 1904, and requested him to study this law thoroughly and to state the ground upon which he had denied these appeals when they were presented within five days from the date of the sentence. I did not, of course, direct the municipal judge to allow these appeals, for that is a matter for judicial determination, and if he wrongfully refused to allow appeals his action could be reviewed by a higher court and he could be compelled to allow such appeals. On March 23, 1915, the municipal judge replied that he had reconsidered his former decision and had decided to allow the appeals.

My information from the various officials of the department of justice is that the strike situation is entirely settled and that at the present time there are no disturbances in the islands, and that all parties are endeavoring to obtain a proper judicial determination holding those persons responsible who have violated the law.

I scarcely need state that any complaint as to illegal action on the part of any insular official will be carefully investigated, and if found to be true the proper action will be taken.

Respectfully,

HOWARD L. KERN,
Attorney General.

APRIL 19, 1915.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL, San Juan.

SIR: Referring to the Vieques riots, I have the honor to submit to you the following report:

On the night of February 16, 1915, I received from the police district chief at Vieques the following telegram:

"A riot has just taken place of a serious character. Policemen and civilians seriously wounded. Your immediate presence urgent to institute criminal proceedings. Bring police reinforcements from Humacao district."

As soon as I received that telegram I tried to communicate by telephone with the police headquarters at San Juan, and I was informed that the chief of the insular police would meet me at Humacao on the following morning with police reinforcements in order to proceed at once to the island of Vieques. On the following morning Col. Shanton arrived at Humacao, and early in the morning we proceeded to Naguabo Playa, but on account of some trouble in the motor of the steam launch that was to take us to Vieques we had to go to Fajardo and there take a steam launch to Vieques. I took with me the stenographer of the district court of Humacao in order to take the testimony of every witness in connection with the investigation. Col. Shanton, myself, and the other members of the party arrived at Vieques at noon on February 17. I took the testimony of the alcalde at once in the hotel, and after lunch we went to the municipal hospital in order to take the testimony of those who were seriously wounded, it being claimed at that time that some of them were in a dying condition.

There in the hospital we found two policemen seriously wounded, named Sergio Brignoni and Sotero Moreira. According to the medical certificates issued on that day by an American doctor, who is the municipal physician of Vieques, named J. S. M. Pressly, Policeman Brignoni had eight wounds, as follows:

Wound No. 1. Incisive wound in the upper portion of the neck, dividing the structure from the vertical column. Closed by five stitches and probably caused by machete.

Wound No. 2. Perforating wound caused by bullet from revolver, fired so closely that grains of unburnt powder were injected into the skin. Point of entrance in the lower left occipital region, passing in hard and finding exit in the midline of the lower occipital region.

Wound No. 3. Incisive and bruised wound, probably caused by blow with club, covering the whole left parietal region. Closed by suture.

Wound No. 4. Incisive wound in crown of head. Closed by suture.

Wounds Nos. 5 and 6. Incisive wounds on external surface, lower part of right forearm. Closed by suture.

Wound No. 7. Incisive wound on external surface of middle part of left forearm. Closed by suture.

Wound No. 8. Incisive wound passing obliquely across part of hand and lower forearm on left side, fracturing the second and third metacarpal bones and the the first phalange of the small finger. Closed by twelve sutures.

I took the testimony of this policeman, who is a strong young man, and, although he was in a serious condition, his head was very clear, and gave a very vivid picture of the riot which had taken place the day before on the afternoon. He mentioned the names of practically every one of those who had assaulted him, because, having been born and brought up in Vieques he was familiar with almost everybody, and knew them well. All those who took part in the assault upon him were tried in the municipal court of Viequez for aggravated assault and battery and were sentenced on March 12, 1915, to two years in jail and $2,000 fine each. The trial could not be had before, because the main witness—that is, the injured party—Sergio Brignoni, having been so seriously wounded, was not able to leave the hospital and attend the trial until about that date. On March 15 all of the defendants took an appeal to the district court of Humacao, and on the same date the appeal was allowed by the court and the bond fixed at $2,000, which they have not been able to furnish, and they are in jail, awaiting the hearing of the appeal. All these appeals in cases related to the Vieques riots have been set for the 26th of april, a special criminal term having been called for said date.

The other policeman wounded is named Sotero Moreira, and he had six wounds, as follows:

Wound No. 1. Incisive wound in the left parietal region.

Wound No. 2. Incisive wound in the crown of the head. Closed by suture.

Wound No. 3. Incisive wound below the left leg.

Wound No. 4. Incisive wound on the external surface of the lower part of the left arm. Closed by suture.

Wound No. 5. Incisive wound of third finger of right hand, fracturing the bone and almost amputating the finger. All the foregoing wounds were caused by machete.

Wound No. 6. Contused wound on the external surface of the lower part of the right thigh, caused by blow with blunt instrument.

I also took the testimony of this policeman, but he could not mention the names of those who assaulted him, because he had only been in Vieques about three months and was not familiar with the people; but he said that he could identify them if they were brought to his presence.

There were five persons accused of aggravated assault and battery upon this policeman, and they were tried on the 12th of March and sentenced on the same date to two years in jail and $2,000 fine each, and they all appealed on the 15th of March, and the appeal was allowed on the same day and the bond fixed at $2,000, which they have not been able to furnish. Some of the defendants in this case are also defendants in the other case above mentioned. Policeman Sergio Brignoni being a very important witness in this case, trial could not be had until he was able to leave the hospital.

I found in the hospital five peons wounded, named Augustin Ortiz, Bruno Gonzales, Zollo Sanchez, Rafael Perez, and Ceferino Morel. Augustin Ortiz had two bullet wounds, and died on February 20, 1915; Bruno Gonzales had one bullet wound; Zollo Sanchez y Cordero had one bullet wound; Rafael Perez had several gunshot wounds; and Sergio Morel had two gunshot wounds.

With the exception of Agustin, who died as above stated, all the others recovered.

After examining those who were in the hospital we proceeded to the cemetery, and there we found three dead peons, named Cruz Lavita, Bernabe de Santiago, and Mario Lopez. A post-mortem examination was made of their bodies, and, according to the certificate issued by Dr. Pressly, they died from hemorrhage caused by bullet wounds.

I at once started to take the testimony of the different persons who had been arrested in connection with the two riots which had taken place on the 16th of February, one in the country and the other in the town of Vieques. This examination continued until about eleven o'clock p. m., and on the morning of February 18 we rode out to the place where the riot had taken place, and there on the spot we examined some witnesses, and I obtained a very graphic description of the occurrence.

I took the testimony of 118 persons between February 17th and February 18th, and on this day at three p. m. I finished the investigation and we sailed back to Porto Rico about five p. m., leaving some police reinforcements in Vieques to keep law and order. Before my return I set at liberty the following persons who had been arrested the day before in connection with these riots: Jose Maria Samuel, Qumersindo Rojls, Juan Parrilla, Nolasco Navarro, Avelino Roman, Francisco Garcia, Juan Gautier Colon, Leonardo Bermudez, Pablo Burgos, Dionisio de Santiago, Domingo Huertas, Anastasio Gautier, Sabat Lugo, Tiburcio Garcia, Genaro Melendez, Francisco Santiago, Luis Melendez, Manuel Rivera, Genaro Morales, Nepomuceno Lopez, Alfredo Esquiaron, Evaristo Camacho, Evaristo Mercado, Otilio Casillas, Julian Ayala, Atanasio Rivera, Agustin Garcia, Inocencio Torres, Santiago Aponte, Rufino Velazquez, Juan Encarnacion, Francisco Delgado, Isidoro Garcia, Senobio Laureano, Roman Ramos, Ruperto Tirado, Juan Carrasquillo, Nicolas Melendez, y Saturnino Huertas.

There remained in jail 21 persons accused of participating in the riot which took place in the town of Vieques on the 16th of February and 34 accused of participating in the riot which took place out in the country the same day. There remained also in jail seven persons accused of assault with intent to kill Policeman Sergio Brignoni.

From the testimony of all the witnesses it was evident that a very serious riot had taken place in Vieques on the 16th of February, 1915. It seems that there were two big crowds of strikers parading through the town of Vieques and through the country roads trying to pick up more laborers to join the strike. One of these crowds was composed of about 200 or 300 persons, laborers armed with machetes, clubs, and the leaders with revolvers. The other crowd was of smaller size and was unarmed. Policemen Sergio Brignoni and Sotero Moreira were detailed by the district chief to accompany the unarmed parade, and they went out to the country, and at a certain plantation or barrio called Trianon, belonging to Mr. Murraille, the unarmed parade met the armed parade; then they halted and leaders of the armed parade tried to go through a cane field crossed by a private road belonging to Mr. Murraille, and these two policemen advised them to go on through the public road and not to trespass upon a private land and break through a private road. The leaders refused to obey the instructions from said policemen, who were riding on horseback, and after inciting the crowd they urged them to go through the private road if necessary by force and told them that they could overpower the two policemen, because they were very much larger in number. When the two policemen noticed the attempt made by the leaders and those who were walking in front of the parade to use force in order to cross that private road, then they rode back and dismounted and the crowd avalanched upon them and they were compelled to use their rifles and revolvers to repel the attack; and a real battle with revolvers, machetes, and clubs ensued, in which three laborers were killed, five were seriously wounded, and the two policemen were so seriously wounded that they were left there as dead. This is called the country riot. Another riot took place afterwards, in which this same crowd took part. This second riot is called the town riot.

After the armed parade left the two policemen as dead in the country, then they planned to come to the town and take the police station by assault. They did come to town armed with revolvers, machetes, and clubs, shouting through the streets, "Down with the police! Let us take the station by assault!" And the police was notified of those shouts, and then the four or five policemen who were in the station lined up on the street armed with their rifles, and when the crowd came near to the station they shot through the air and dispersed the mob and arrested a good many of them.

From the information which I got in Vieques there is no doubt that on account of the violent conduct of the leaders the laborers on strike were in a very turbulent mood. When I was there there were two fires in cane plantations in one night, and there had been ten fires in a week.

The conduct of the strikers was so violent that I was told by witnesses that when they passed through the different plantations if they found any laborers working they would go into the cane fields and compel them by force to quit work, and in the case of cartmen they would cut with machete the rope that held the yoke to the oxen, and in that way set the oxen free and compel the cartmen to abandon the animals, the loaded cars, and quit the work, leaving the oxen alone to eat the cane and destroy the property. I am told by trustworthy witnesses that property owners did not dare to go upon the road, because they were afraid of being assaulted, and the overseers did not dare to go out of the cane fields alone without risking their lives.

On account of the riots which took place out in the country there were 53 defendants sentenced to different periods in jail from six months to two years and fined from $250 to $1,000. And on account of the riot which took place in the town there were 31 defendants sentenced likewise.

There were 38 cases for carrying concealed weapons, of which 30 resulted in conviction and 8 in acquittal, and of the former in 17 cases appeals have been taken to the district court of Humacao. There are 15 more cases for carrying concealed weapons in which trial has not been had, because the defendants can not be found. Of all the foregoing cases the records of the two cases for riots have already reached the district court of Humacao, and also the records of the appeals taken in the two cases for aggravated assault and battery upon Policemen Brignoni and Moreira. The records in the other cases for carrying concealed weapons are being prepared with all possible haste by the clerk of the municipal court of Vieques, and undoubtedly every appeal in connection with the Vieques disturbances will be heard in the district court of Humacao at the special criminal term called for the 26th of April, 1915. As soon as the appeals are decided I will submit to you a tabulated statement of the disposition of said cases. I want to call your attention to the fact that in accordance with our laws a second appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court of Porto Rico.

Respectfully,

J. HERNANDEZ USERA,
Humacao District Fiscal.

RESOLUTION ON ECONOMIC CONDITIONS OF PORTO RICO.

[Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico.]

SAN JUAN, March 1, 1914.

Honorable members of the Legislature of Porto Rico:

Pursuant to Gov. Yager's recommendations, seconded by petitions from corporations and money, labor, and land monopolies of Porto Rico; and

To judge from the declarations by some of your representative members, in passing the resolution naming a commission to investigate the departments of the insular government, the purposes of the legislature seems to be to effect important economies in public services, and to lower taxation, though in so doing governmental institutions which are instrumentalities for progress and public justice may have to be dispensed with or crippled.

In the years from 1903 to 1911 we have in all sold $29,291,424 more than our purchases.

During the fiscal year 1912 the island purchased in the United States and foreign countries $42,926,473 and sold to them $49,705,413. So that that year alone witnessed a balance of trade in favor of the country of $6,778,940.

In short, according to official figures, the island had netted the handsome profit of $36,070,364 up to 1913. Never before had work in the country been rewarded by such a balance of trade for a like period.

The total taxable wealth of the island, which amounted to $90,000,000 in 1898, rose to $178,275,130 in 1912. Thus, in that year the total wealth had doubled, while the population had increased but 17 per cent. Yet in 1913 one of the facts best known to all was that there were an alarming decrease in the money in circulation and a loss of credit.

And this was not due to a want of duly incorporated banks to supply the community with money and credit for its business operations. In fact, such private concerns have doubled, being now 11 in number instead of 5 as formerly.

Nor is it due to a want of corporations whose object is to profit by encouraging production that we all feel now this lack of money and credit; for, indeed, in the fiscal year 1912 private corporations reached their heyday. In that year alone there were registered in the secretary's office as many as 12 foreign and 40 domestic corporations, with an authorized capital stock of $1,481,500 and $6,903,000, respectively. So that these corporations, together with the many others registered during the preceding 11 years, should have insured many additional millions for business transactions.

Nevertheless, neither the money in circulation increased nor credit was available at lower rates of interest. On the contrary, while credit was contracting more and more, the circulating capital, as estimated by business men through their agents, was in 1913, as now, hardly in excess of $4,000,000.

The treasury finds it difficult to farm the revenues completely and on time. The official deficit is estimated at about $2,500,000. The 11 private banks, instead of making liberal loans, instead of facilitating credit, are calling in loans and restriction credit. Notwithstanding the fact that sugar still commands a good price the centrales are failing one after another. Land is passing into the hands of absentee landlords at an alarming rate. Usury is exacting unheard-of interest rates; loans are given at rates varying all the way from 9 to 100 per cent.

We are compelled to buy elsewhere, at four or five times their cost, food-stuffs of prime necessity which we can and should produce here superior in grade and more cheaply and abundantly. We have to import, via North America, rice from Japan, milk from Switzerland, and corn from the Far West. A dense population, with coasts all round, have yet to feed on fish purchased in outlying countries. Being prevented from producing for home consumption, they have to give all their energies to producing exchange commodities or raw materials; the former to enrich foreign speculators with, the later to be returned in the shape of manufactured goods at an exorbitant price.

The Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico can not remain silent in the presence of such state of things, of a growing crisis which hampers and dampens our energies and wears down and annihilates our large producing classes, the island's proletariat; and when it is desired to cause, and we are threatened with, a setback in our progress and a return to both the wretched conditions and the moral, physical, and intellectual oppression of former times.

What becomes of the enormous production of our large family of 1,118,012 inhabitants? Whither does it find its way? How is it that 90 per cent of that community form part of the proletariat?

The press, voicing certain purposes, suggests measures which leave in the minds of the producing masses a feeling of alarm.

What we ask for is a public and thorough-going investigation, with a view to ascertaining the whole production represented by the agricultural, industrial, financial, and intellectual activities of the people of Porto Rico. We want and we ask for humanity's and the Porto Rican people's sake that before excusing owners of monopolies and exploiters of the country from the payment of taxes they should pay, an inquiry be made into the sources of revenue of Porto Rico so as to determine whether there are reasons for doing away with public services or whether in spite of the Democratic tariffs the country does produce enough to incur budgetary expenditures of not less than $7,000,000.

Is it perchance not known that the large production wrought by the country's inhabitants leaks out of the island through open valves, and that through those valves escapes our money, and with our money land ownership, and with land ownership sustenance, and with sustenance the health and strength of the people? We have a school population of 404,211, almost half a million; yet only 160,766 attend school—that is, about a third part, hardly 40 per cent, are receiving education. Owing to lack of roads and schools the rest are condemned to ignorance. Must those innocent human beings live on doomed to illiteracy and exploitation, like so many beasts of burden?

Shall we give up all hope for betterment? Shall a country busily engaged in the work of production have to go without a goodly share of public services, while very large exploiting agencies go untaxed? Shall the deficits, the decay brought on by legalized usury, have to be met with greater privations and more hardships inflicted on our immense proletariat—ninety per cent of our population?

Is the present financial crisis due to natural, unavoidable causes, or is it due to purely artificial causes arising from combinations by monopolies or by monopolists and exploiters of the country?

Can the Government of Porto Rico maintain all present public services, improving them, increasing the number of schools, urging public works, sanitation, and labor potentialities forward?

We have been overtaken by no cataclysm, storm, floods, war, blockade, earthquake, or anything of the sort ordained by the Divine Will. Purely willful, fictitious, artificial, preconceived causes and unbounded speculating ambitions can alone have brought on this deplorable condition of things.

In view of the seriousness of the present situation, the Central Labor Union of San Juan, affiliated with the American Federation of Labor and the Free

Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico, at the convention of unions held on Monday, January 26, 1914, proposed and adopted the following resolution:

Whereas, pursuant to the governors' recommendations, and at the request of capitalist and monopolist combinations of the country, the Legislature of Porto Rico has just passed a law to investigate the departments of the Government, with the object of effecting economies by suppressing public services, and considerably lowering the revenues of the insular treasury;

Whereas increased production by the labor population of the island has marked increasing poverty of that same population, this can only be the consequence of private monopoly of the producing forces and of the profits of production, this production and profits, instead of benefiting the country, cause financial hardship and threaten to destroy those institutions of our which are agencies for civilization and to turn us into an enslaved factory; and

Whereas a people suffering great social and economic hardships should know the causes therefor and secure the urgent remedy required thereby: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Central Labor Union of San Juan, in general assembly, That the honorable houses of the Legislature of Porto Rico be requested to enact a measure authorizing the honorable governor to name a people's investigating commission, to be composed of six members presided over by a justice of the supreme court, with the following rights and duties:

1. The commission shall proceed to make a full and public investigation all over the island to ascertain the number of all producing private corporations or companies operating for profit: the total production of each in 1912; a list of the total operating expenses of each, so itemized as to show the amounts for salaries, wages, improvements, and maintenance; the number of partners or shareholders in each; the number of shares held by each shareholder, the face value and the market price of shares; the place of residence of shareholders, their full names; and the sums distributed out in dividends; all these details to be ascertained also from each and all the banks doing business in the country.

2. The commission shall be composed of citizens not connected with any corporation or enterprise for speculation, or with banking institutions, and who are not lawyers for any company; and the commission shall have discretionary power to investigate, in this connection, any other details which in its opinion may be relevant.

3. The commission shall contain representatives from the legislature, labor, industry, and commerce, said representatives to state under oath that they have no personal or pecuniary interests in the business of any corporation. The commission to be presided over by a justice of the supreme court.

4. A sum not less than $25,000 shall be appropriated to enable the commission to employ the necessary personnel, and such means as its work may require, the commission being empowered to examine witnesses and to compel parties to show their mercantile books, documents, and papers.

5. It shall be the duty of the commission to begin work immediately, and to make to the governor of Porto Rico separate reports for each of the investigated private corporations, companies, firms, or enterprises for the exploitation of urban or rural properties. The governor of Porto Rico shall in turn send the reports to the legislature, with suggestions for such measures as he may deem necessary to get from the investigated corporations the benefits due to the country.

6. Reports on investigations shall also contain the following information:

- (a) The number and names of citizens, companies, banks, corporations, or private owners of estates with more than 500 acres of land, and the number and names of those possessing more than 5,000 acres, together with a statement in both cases as to the industry to which the land is devoted, nationality of the owners, total tax paid on all heads, and, in case of concealment or fraud, amount of tax not paid and tax that should be paid under the law.

- (b) Number and description of the banks in the island, annual business operations, number of stockholders, dividends paid, amount thereof sent out of the country, interest rate charged, tax paid, and tax that should be paid on dividends leaving the country.

- (c) Native and foreign persons residing in the island who directly, indirectly, or through shares or subcontracts, have businesses, industries, or urban properties in Porto Rico and send the proceeds thereof to Europe and America, enriching thereby other peoples and impoverishing ours.

11164 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

(d) Number of corporations remitting to shareholders in outlying countries over $5,000 a year, as well as number of those sending under the same conditions over $2,000,000 in dividends; amount of tax not paid and amount of production concealed.

(e) Number and names of private individuals who have loaned or loan money at an interest rate exceeding 12 and 25 per cent per annum; approximate sum loaned by them; sum they collect all over the island as interest charges.

(f) Number and description of insurance companies of all kinds doing business in the country without paying taxes.

This is all we petition of the honorable Legislature of Porto Rico. It is our hope that your love for the good people of Porto Rico will induce you to direct your attention to the highly important questions hereinbefore stated, and that before proceeding to suppress any public service in any way an instrumentality for progress, you will favorably pass on this project for a public investigation.

Very respectfully,

RAFAEL ALONSO,
President Central Labor Union.
(Signatures of various other officers.)

CORRESPONDENCE OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR RELATING TO SITUATION IN PORTO RICO.

[American Federation of Labor.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 4, 1915.

EXECUTIVE COUNCIL, AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

COLLEAGUES: A few days ago I received an unsigned cablegram from Porto Rico, as follows:

"SAN JUAN, P. R., Feb. 19, 1915.

"FEDERATIONIST,

"American Federation of Labor,

"Ouray Building, Washington, D. C.:

"Twenty thousand sugar-plantation workers struck, asking 80 cents wage per day. Police killed 22 wretched peasants; 50 wounded, both sexes. Meetings violently dissolved. Terrorized workers forced to work. Request Industrial Relations Commission to come soon to make investigation Porto Rican workers. Implored your American people press protection humanitarian rights."

I immediately called up Gen. MacIntyre, Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, read the cablegram to him, and asked if he had had any information as to the situation. He said he had not. He then sent for me the following cablegram:

WASHINGTON, D. C., Feb. 24, 1915.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, San Juan, P. R.:

Cable me accurate account of alleged killing and wounding of agricultural workers in consequence of strike and if constitutional rights have been violated.

GOMPERS.

To that a reply was received, as follows:

PONCE, P. R., Mar. 2, 1915.

FEDERATIONIST,

Ouray Building, Washington, D. C.:

Police dissolved peaceful meeting with shots while I was speaking. One dead, several wounded severe. Organizers Martinez and myself jailed. Federation hall searched.

IGLESIAS.

I heard nothing further upon the matter and neither have I seen any press reports as to the situation in Porto Rico. To-day I received a report from Organizer Santiago Iglesias upon the situation, copy of which you will find inclosed herein.

As I shall have to leave the city early in the morning to keep important engagements in Philadelphia and New York, I have requested Secretary Morrison to lay the entire matter before Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Labor, and to urge that that department shall make an immediate investigation. As soon as I am in a position to give the members of the E. C. any further information upon the Porto Rican situation it will be promptly transmitted to you.

Fraternally, yours,

SAML. GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

MARCH 9, 1915.

P. S.—Secretary Wilson did not return Mr. Iglesias's letter until yesterday afternoon, hence the delay in sending this letter to the E. C. Since dictating the above I have received two additional letters from Organizer Iglesias, dated February 27 and March 3, copies of which are inclosed herein, copies having also been furnished to Secretary Wilson.

S. G.

[American Federation of Labor.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 17, 1915.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

COLLEAGUES: Regarding the situation in Porto Rico, you will please find inclosed herein copies of additional letters from Organizer Iglesias, which have just been received. Copies of these letters have also been sent to Secretary Wilson of the Department of Labor.

In my letter transmitting copies of these communications to Secretary Wilson I expressed a strong hope that something will be done to ascertain the official and actual conditions which prevail, not only for the use of the Government but for the rectification of the wrongs which have been inflicted upon the people there.

As soon as I have any further information upon this subject I shall be glad to transmit it to you.

Fraternally, yours,

SAML. GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

[Federacion Libre de los Trabajadores de Puerto Rico. Afiliada a la American Federacion of Labor. Fundada en 1899.]

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 22, 1915.

Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS,
Pres. American Federation of Labor,
801-809 G. St., N.W., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I am writing you this letter on this Washington's Birthday with the purpose to inform your office in regard to the actual affairs in which are involved at this time the agricultural workers of this island who declared themselves on a strike in Bayamon during the last days of January and which has been generalized throughout the whole island.

About 30,000 agricultural workers of the sugar-cane fields and some of the mills are at this time on strike. The bulk of them are lacking of a necessary organization and direction and of all necessary resource for striking. However, it has been necessary for me to intervene in this strike and lend to the workers all the help in my hand, for the simple reasons that this is the most favorable we have to make the peasants know our principles and aims of the trade-unionism and the best occasion to create the most powerful organization of the poor agricultural workers. When this strike was originally and spontaneously declared in Bayamon, where the men were unable to support themselves and their family with the wages they were receiving, and also unable to suffer longer the bad treatment they suffered as slaves, I immediately thought that no better opportunity would present itself to bring about any favorable change in behalf of the peasants, after taking into consideration the deplorable conditions prevailing at the countries, the low wages and long hours they are working, and taking into consideration also the high and good prices obtained at this time in the American market by the corporations in the selling of the sugar, I immediately thought, I do repeat, that no better opportunity would present itself to enforce the recommendations of the convention of the American Federation of Labor held in Philadelphia, Pa., in regard to the organization of the skilled and unskilled laborers, and which were transmitted by you to your representatives by the last circular received from the headquarters.

But the old, old history is repeated everonce that the workingmen entertain any plan to look for freedom. As soon as the bosses did realize themselves that the slaves were trying to break up their chains and to offer the labor movement the opportunity to be heard, and the chance to create a powerful organization, the repressive measures were taken and are actually in full force. It has been and it is my intention, when intervening in different towns involved by the strike, to cause that a settlement be reached where the entity and personality of the organized-labor movement be recognized, and, due to our efforts as trade unionists, some agreements were reached after a very hard work and discussion was done; but these agreements where I have appeared as a labor representative, the representatives of the capitalists, and the chief of the bureau of labor, have been broken down and violated by the capitalists and owners of the plantations, and with the consent of the government represented by the bureau of labor as it has been known by a telegram of the same chief of that bureau. The capitalists and owners of the cane plantations and mills with this policy, by which are making fun of the peasants and taking as a joke this serious conflict, are causing the men to despair and voluntarily creating as a consequence the bitter feelings.

The labor men are persecuted, jailed, wounded, and killed up in the streets and countries with the intention of stopping the advancement of the labor movement and cut in the button the aspiration for freedom of this peasant folk, who produce all the wealth of the island.

I am receiving every day telegrams from the different sections of the island in strike informing of the brutalities and assaults of the police force to the strikers. The most serious accidents have taken place in Vieques.

Vieques is a small island situated in the eastern part of Porto Rico which belongs to the United States and to Porto Rico, and which is under the government control of this same country. This island of Vieques is 9 miles long and 2 miles wide, and there are established 4 sugar mills of different corporations. When they, the inhabitants of Vieques, realized the price in sugar and compared their actual situation with that one of the other towns of Porto Rico they also thought they were entitled to better their conditions and went to strike. Readyway the plots and combinations of the capitalists and some officials of the Government reached them also, and on February 16, while coming from the country to the city in a pacific parade to hold a meeting in the town, they were assaulted by the police and foremen of the sugar-cane plantations and hunted as beasts, some of them. The parade was violently dissolved with the guns of the policemen and foremen. Four of the agricultural workers were left on the ground dead, more than 10 wounded, and in order to justify their action more than 100 men were jailed. At the present there are in jail more than 50, against whom charges have been preferred. The last information received from Vieques is that the police force have compelled the financial secretary to close down the doors where headquarters of the local unions affiliated to the American Federation of Labor are installed.

According to the old policy of tyranny, the Government has absolutely adhered itself to the bosses and privileged, the police force have been put at their disposal to force the agricultural workers to return to work, to compel them to leave the houses where they are living if not going to work under the old conditions, and when protesting against those actions they are brutally wounded, jailed, and killed without any consideration.

The bosses have also been granted the privilege to have a private corps of guards, armed to the teeth, to work as strike breakers and hunters of strikers, and all the public police force, under the pretense of keeping order and guaranteeing the properties, are to the service of the private corporations, landlords, and capitalists breaking the strike, forcing men to work, enjoying their banquets and drinks, and in almost all the towns where the workingmen are striking the local headquarters of the police force are installed within the sugar mills or under their premises, the men of the force are fed by the plantations' owners, and the horses used by the police to ride on horseback to hunt the strikers are also given by the bosses.

The constitutional rights of free speech and free press have also been suspended and martial law has been practically declared. Governor has made public to the people of Porto Rico by means of a proclamation that all the rural zone is under the control of the police force, and that no meeting or manifestation will be tolerated by the police.

In order to give you an approximate idea of the state of affairs in Porto Rico, besides of the former information, I am quoting here the substance of some of the telegrams received from different sections of the island, as follows:

"Juncos, Feb. 15, 1915.—Mayor, judge, and police are accused by the people of being in same plot with the proprietors of the central to watch out for defenseless labor strikers, at which placed their were attacked and fire upon by police. At time of shooting nobody was arrested. As many wounded as presented themselves to the hospital were arrested and bailed out for large amount. Numerous workmen sustained wounds and 15 workingmen in jail."

"Anasco, Feb. 15, 1915.—To-day 5 workingmen have been beaten by the police without any cause whatever. Velez arrested for upholding the rights of workmen. Police antagonize the strike. We are without protection."

"Anasco, Feb. 15, 1915.—Beating goes on. We need protection. See governor."

"Arecibo, Feb. 15, 1915.—Capt. Schettini forbids peaceful parade of workingmen. Orders use billies and revolvers against workers. Felix Ruiz clubbed for no reason. Men prohibited to use the main road. Many men arrested."

"Arecibo, Feb. 16, 1915.—Strikers arrested and sentenced forthwith without defense for carrying working tools. Case and trial summarily six men. Eighteen sentences pending. A woman held under bail for disturbing peace."

"Ponce, Feb. 16, 1915.—Strike on. Conduct police unworthy. I am not answerable for attitude of strikers. Speak to governor."

"Anasco, Feb. 16, 1915.—Meeting held last night broken up on Plaza with shots and clubbing. Police completely under control of the cane plantation owners."

"Mayaguez, Feb. 16, 1915.—Police together with foremen break strike. Anasco brutalized by police. Investigation should follow soon."

"Mayaguez, Feb. 16, 1915.—Workingmen break strike at bidding of police and foremen. Anasco police beating and arresting strikers."

"Arecibo, Feb. 16, 1915.—Peace disturbed. Police keep on with abuses against orderly and defenseless men. Juan Diaz clubbed by Guardsmen Rivera and Pagan. Snatch American flag away from workingmen. Capt. Schettini and Lieut. Chapel do work gratifying to cane planters."

Besides the telegrams that I have quoted in substance, telegrams have been received every day informing of more new brutalities committed by the police force.

While in Arecibo yesterday I sent the following message to the governor:

"ARECIBO, Feb. 21, 1915.

"ARTHUR YAGER,

"Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan:

"Went barrio Arecibo to hold labor meeting. Absolutely prohibited right free speech and meeting by police, who informed me to have superior orders to dissolve every meeting in barrios and public roads, prohibiting else groups 10 persons bearing national flags. Earnestly request you to grant this people constitutional rights meeting and free speech for credit sacred American liberties. American Federation of Labor request you to guaranty my constitutional rights of free speech and meeting."

The mayor of Arecibo also sent the governor the following telegraphic message:

ARECIBO, Feb. 21, 1915.

I am informed constitutional rights suspended in Arecibo. I do not see why this should be done in a city where conditions are the same as in other peaceful parts of the island. I believe this measure taken specially here will throw discredit upon this people and this local administration. I sincerely advise and request reconsideration to avoid weakening of people's confidence in American principles of government. This administration offers hearty cooperation to keep order.

E. LANDRON, Mayor of Arecibo.

In answer to my telegram Governor Yager has answered as follows:

"I have received your telegram, and with reference to same wish to state that constitutional rights of free speech and assembly have not been suspended; but that in view of the existing conditions in the island, and in order to guarantee peace and tranquillity to all the inhabitants of Porto Rico, I have found it necessary to place the rural zone under the control of the chief of police, who is directly responsible to me for its peace and order. Urban zone will be regulated as before. Request you to kindly see my proclamation to the people of Porto Rico and my letter to chief of police, which you will find in any of to-day's morning papers, so that you may know exactly what my position is.

"ARTHUR YAGER, Governor."

According to this state of affairs I did not hesitate in sending you some information by cable, according to the information of the press. I also proceeded to send you another cable making a rectification in the number of men killed by police, because I proved that the number of men killed was a canard.

The number of men killed is at this time four, as has been proved by the direct investigation made by the State federation.

For all these facts stated we have deemed necessary to request the Commission on Industrial Relations to investigate the motives and causes that are the origin of the actual unrest prevailing in Porto Rico, where the workingmen have lost all the hopes for obtaining due justice and redress from the hands of the local authorities in this island and from those representing the American Government in Porto Rico.

I am sending you here inclosed a copy of our letter to the Commission on Industrial Relations, and beg your best efforts to secure that the actual conditions of this island be investigated as suggested.

I am also sending you herewith a copy of the last cable sent to the Federationist on February 21st.

Yours, fraternally,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Gen. Org. A. F. of Labor.

NOTE.—Have sent my cables to you addressed under the name of "Federationist" to save money. Personal cables cost 75 cents by word and press fares 20 cents a word.

S. I.

[Federacion Libre de los Trabajadores de Puerto Rico. Afiliada a la American Federation of Labor. Fundada en 1899.]

SAN JUAN, P. R., Feb. 27, 1915.

Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS,
Prest. American Federation of Labor,
801-809 G St. NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: According to the cablegram received yesterday through the governor of Porto Rico in which you were requesting accurate information regarding the general affairs of the strike in the island, I sent the secretary of Porto Rico a letter requesting him to transmit to you a cablegram answering to you in which a substantial informatiton was rendered.

I am very glad to give you some more details upon the case by means of this letter. When the occurrences were reported in the first moment, some mistakes were reported. Among them the number of workingmen killed at Vieques and the statement made by the same capitalistic press of San Juan informing that at a riot at Juana Diaz, 15 men had been killed and 25 wounded. But when we had the chance to directly investigate the occurrences at all these towns, the most accurate information has been transmitted to your office, and it is what in substance contains the cablegram requested to the secretary of Porto Rico to be forwarded to you.

I have feared that the Government of Porto Rico would have censored all the details and information, and that is the reason why I was, in my cablegram to you, as brief as possible.

But the cablegram I should have sent to your office had to be the following:

From the investigation directly practiced by Organizer P. Rivera Martinez, of the Cigarmakers' International Union of America, at Juncos, it has been proved that the police disbanded, violently and illegally, a parade of peaceful agricultural workmen who were out on strike on February 4. Twelve strikers were clubbed by the police and wounded. Despite the fact that a number of pistol shots were fired by the police, nobody was wounded by the bullets. Nobody was arrested at the time of disbanding the parade, but the wounded, upon presenting themselves at the hospital to be cured, were arrested by the police to justify their brutal action, and later sentenced without even giving them any reasonable time to prepare their defense or to be represented by a lawyer. The flags which the strikers carried in the procession, even the American, were torn by the police from the hands of those who bore them.

On February 16 in Vieques the strikers, upon going into the town in the attitude of orderly workers, were attacked by the police and the managers or foremen of the sugar estates. Four workmen were killed, three of them wounded quite seriously, and six more sustained lesser wounds. These wounded ones were victims of the policemen's bullets and slug shots, as well as the dead, who not only fell a target to the bullets of the police but also to the bullets of the foremen of the centrals.

The laborers in defending themselves wounded two policemen with their cutlasses or machetes. More than 100 arrests followed. In the town the police scattered the people with shots and blows. There was great dread in the town. The police closed the federation office. Those who took part in this investigation were Organizer P. Rivera Martinez, Julio Aybar, member of the house of delegates, and Brother Bolivar Ochart.

The press reported that at Juana Diaz the police had killed 15 workers and wounded 25, but this was afterwards denied by the Government.

At Anasco the police often attacked the country folk who were striking, and a meeting was dissolved amidst shots and blows; five workers sustained wounds. At Arecibo a gathering was dispersed, an American flag was torn from the hands of an aged country striker, and he himself was hit by the policeman's billy. Two labor speakers were criminally clubbed at 4 a. m. in a country district called "Dominguito," at Arecibo, after which the police took care to conceal their names, and it is not even known to-day who did the clubbing.

At Humacao five countrymen were clubbed and a gathering was dispersed. At San Lorenzo a meeting was violently dispersed by the police. The police was openly doing the bidding of the owners of the sugar estates. They live, eat, and drink in quarters provided for them on the estates and sugar mills.

Gov. Yager tells me that he is going to give the unfortunate country folk protection against illegal onslaughts, but the next day the police exercise violence to a still greater degree. Taking as a starting point the advice of the landowners and bankers and stockholders, who, being helped by the capitalistic press, are daily heaping lies upon lies against the strikers, the governor turned over to the police the whole rural region and these in their turn have forbidden that there should be any public meeting, gatherings, parades, and that not even groups of 10 persons on the highways and barrios of the whole island, though it were shown that such gatherings are of an orderly and peaceful character.

Martial law was practically declared by the police and attacks upon the persons were accumulating rapidly, to the discredit of the police, who kept on terrorizing the country people.

We, representatives of the American Federation of Labor, were forcibly deprived of calling open-air meetings of the workmen to address them and give them advice throughout the rural zone.

When I ask the governor to interfere with the brutal violation of the Constitution by the police, he gave me assurance that he would do it and that he would give me a copy of his order, but he has not made good his promise up to the present time, and thus it is that the wish of the police is secured, namely, that of breaking the strike of the poor country workers through fear and intimidation, through persecution and the "stick." The bureau of labor is only an agent of the Government, which stands in favor of the landowners in this connection.

In his last statement given to the press it is quoted as saying: "The landowners have proved themselves to be possessed of the confidence and regard which this bureau has for them and for which we are sincerely grateful toward them."

The following telegram was sent by the chief of the bureau of labor: "DOMINGO SANTOS, Fajardo, P. R. Mr. Bird, manager of the Fajardo Sugar Co., has officially informed the Government that workmen are not fulfilling their part of the contract, which makes it therefore neutral. I trust all differences will work out, regardless of strike. BILLS." This telegram was sent after the Sugar Growers' Association and Corporations had agreed not to sign any terms of agreement with the workers or agree upon any wage scale. More than 1,000 country workers in Fajardo filed complaints, duly sworn to before a judge, protesting against the attitude of the chief of the labor bureau in combination with the landowners.

11170 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

The country workers denounce the impious facts and treatments that are being directed against them, and all the leaders of the unions complain of more abuses, newly committed and repeated acts of moral violence to get them to take up their work. The organization of the peasants and all unskilled laborers and their defense for more wages will be practically impossible unless the Washington authorities hinder them from being executed any longer and this beautiful island from being turned a vast factory of tolling slaves, so warranted by the officials of the Government.

Very fraternally, yours,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Gen. Org. A. F. of L.

[Federacion Libre de los Trabajadores de Puerto Rico. Afiliada a la American Federacion of Labor. Fundada en 1899.]

SAN JUAN, P. R., March 3, 1915.

MR. SAMUEL GOMPERS,
Prest. American Federation of Labor,
801-809 G St. NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: According to the policy followed by the Government of Porto Rico regarding the strike, persecutions and brutalities of the authorities are daily being committed.

Last Sunday, Feb. 28, and according to repeated requests from the different towns on strike, I concluded that it was necessary for me to pay a visit to those different towns and cities, to give them my advices, and take in the several meetings the necessary advantages for the propaganda of the organization of the agricultural workers and of other trades who have demonstrated, especially the agricultural workers, to be ready to create the most powerful organization in the island.

Bearing in mind that our time should be limited and saved as much as possible, I requested the organizer of the Cigarmakers' International Union and some other officers of organized labor in Porto Rico to accompany me in order to be able to hold a meeting at every one of those towns in the eastern and southern part of Porto Rico which are on strike.

On Feb. 28, very early in the morning, I left San Juan with my companions and the first town where we stopped was Yabucoa. There were about 2,000 men in strike. They have been denied the constitutional rights of speaking and assembling when they want and where they legally please, and at the time we reached Yabucoa the workingmen had been unable to hold a meeting while they had been on strike for two weeks.

I requested the local committee of the strike that the tribune be placed at the called Plaza, and while I was speaking I was ordered by the chief of police to leave the place on the ground that the mayor of the city, who is interested in business and the main enemy of the strikers, had not given his permission to hold the meeting there. I had to come down from the tribune, and then it was placed in one of the extremes of the town.

From Yabucoa I sent to the Governor of Porto Rico the following telegram:

YABUCOA, P. R., Feb. 28, 1915.

HON. ARTHUR YAGER,
Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.:

When I was speaking at the Plaza of this town the police told me I had to dissolve the meeting because the mayor said that there was no permit to hold the meeting at the Plaza. He refused many times to give permit.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Gen. Org., A. F. of L.

After having held a monster meeting at Yabucoa, at which all the orators and myself did our part, and where the conditions prevailing are notoriously marked of partiality against the strikers, we proceeded to Maunabo. From Maunabo I had to send the Governor of Porto Rico the following telegram:

MAUNABO, Feb. 28, 1915.

Hon. ARTHUR YAGER.

Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.:

Agricultural workers of Barrios Palo Seco, Lisa, and Matuyas had to return back their homes because police prohibited them to walk town, certainly to prevent them to attend a labor meeting, where the labor federation representatives were going to address the people.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Gen. Org., A. F. of L.

The Governor of Porto Rico up to this date has given no answer to the two telegrams above mentioned. We did at Maunabo all we could in favor of the strikers and to bring the parties to terms, and we reached at last an agreement by which the hours of labor daily for the agricultural workers were reduced to nine, and salary of 50 and 55 cents per day was increased to 80 cents daily.

After having held a meeting there and left all things settled at Maunabo and the agreement signed, we proceeded to Guayama where we also held another meeting lasting to 1 o'clock, March 1, and in which did their part two lawyers who are actually in sympathy with the strike, and who have cooperated to the agitation and maintenance and defense of the same.

On March 1, in the morning, we left Guayama and went to Ponce via Salinas, reaching the city of Ponce about 4 o'clock p. m. In view of the conditions prevailing in Ponce, and being necessary for us to return to San Juan as soon as possible to pay attention to some other important matters, we had already decided not to take part in the meeting of Ponce and had already taken the automobile to return. But a commission composed of members of the local unions of Ponce among which were officials of the Cigarmakers' Union 449, requested us in the name of the organization and in that of the agricultural workers to do our part in the meeting at the open air, and then we agreed that the automobile would remain near the place where the meeting was to be held to be taken by us immediately after having done our duty.

The meeting was opened at half-past 7 p. m., and in the same took part the characterized members of the organized labor movement: Mr. Modesto Calderin, Mr. Santiago Carreras, Mr. Francisco Paz Granela, Mr. Manuel Texidor, Cigarmakers' International Union's organizer Mr. Prudencio Rivera Martinez and myself. While I was speaking for about an hour, and making the statement that "the police could not be placed on an impartial and independent position while having their quarters in the premises of the sugar mills and plantations, while eating and drinking with the bosses, while using the horses of the sugar mills owners under the pretense of being guaranteeing the properties," I was brutally ordered to leave the tribune, while the captain of police, Fernandez Nater, cried: "This meeting has finished."

Then the police was ordered to dissolve the meeting, and shots and clubbing against the gathering were made. The result of this social crime committed against the people was a poor man dead and several wounded. Organizer Rivera Martinez, myself, and all my fellows from San Juan in the commission were arrested and placed under a bail of $2,000. From Ponce I sent the governor the following telegram:

Hon. ARTHUR YAGER.

Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.:

Last night police dissolved a peaceful meeting while I was speaking, shooting and clubbing poor peasants. One dead and several wounded. Seven labor representatives and myself were jailed—accused of riot. This fact is very deplorable, and respectfully protest against unnecessary and unjustifiable disregarding of constitutional rights.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, Gen. Org. A. F. of L.

No answer has been given to the quoted telegram. We remained in jail up to half-past 12 p. m., March 2, when we were provisionally sent free under bail of $300 each, returning to San Juan at 6 a. m. to-day.

The offices of the federation in Ponce were researched by the police, who violently broke the locks of the desks and took with them some papers and documents of the strike committee.

If the Federal authorities do not take a rapid and energetic action in favor of the American Constitution and in behalf of the Porto Rican laborers we fear that the labor organizations may be swept from the surface of the island by the Democratic Government, represented in Porto Rico by Mr. Yager, as an unjustifiable punishment for the working masses of this Island.

Yours, fraternally,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Gen. Organizer A. F. of Labor.

[Federacion Libre de los Trabajadores de Puerto Rico Afiliada a la American Federacion of Labor. Fundada en 1890.]

SAN JUAN, P. R., March 4, 1915.

Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS,
Prest. American Federation of Labor,
801-809 G St. N. W., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I have in hand your two letters of Feb. 24, inclosing me copy of your cablegram and a clipping from the New York Call, in which some information is reported about the affairs of the strike in Porto Rico.

Regarding the cablegrams which were received by you on February 19 addressed to the Federationist, I beg to inform you that those cablegrams were directly sent to the Federationist in order to save some money instead of being sent to you, and though not bearing any signature both cablegrams were sent by me. The fact of the cablegrams not bearing my signature is due to a mistake on the part of the clerk in charge of handing the cablegrams to the cable office, because he did not put the signature into the columns of the blank intended for the words for which we are going to pay. That is the reason why the cablegrams went to you without my signature. The first cablegram sent to you reporting 22 men killed was based upon the information of an old capitalistic paper of this same city, which is supposed to be an impartial one, and who very early in the morning, as every day, was circulating in San Juan giving the information that, in addition to the 7 men killed at Vieques, 15 more had been killed at the town of Juan Diaz in a riot between the strikers and the police. The information of the paper above mentioned, La Correspondencia de Puerto Rico, was denied by nobody in the first moment, and the ratification of the report published was heard everywhere. On account of that I sent you the first cablegram on February 19. But later, when I was able to gather some more information I immediately and in the same date sent you another cablegram correcting the number of men killed. When the first report was received from Vieques informing that the police had disbanded a peaceful parade of the workingmen, the same official report stated that six men had been killed, among them two police. Based upon this official report it was that I sent you the second cablegram. But still doubting of the truth, I request Mr. Rivera Martinez, organizer of the Cigarmakers' International Union, and Mr. Aybar, labor representative in the house of delegates, to visit the island of Vieques and make a thorough and impartial investigation of the facts. The investigation was made, and the result was that four men were killed by the police while disbanding the peaceful parade of the strikers, six seriously wounded, some other more sustaining lesser wounds; more than 100 men arrested; constitutional rights of assembling and speaking suspended; hall federation closed down by the police; and the most cruel brutalities committed by the police force against the strikers.

When having the very accurate information gathered directly by our representatives, I sent you that information. The man sending cablegrams directly to the Call is Mr. Edward Conde, and all the information sent by that man was near to the truth according to the statements given by the same capitalistic press of this island.

I have carefully revised the information published by the New York Call and found that generally the information is accurate, outside of a mistake contained in same which is that in the following paragraph: "The police have set fire to hundreds of their shacks, leaving thousands of men and women shelterless." It is true that fire has been set to some houses in the barrio of Puerto de Tierra, San Juan, and in the town of Maunabo. More than 40 houses were burned in San Juan and about 175 in Maunabo, but it is supposed that the fire has been set by those insuring the houses in the companies for more than their proper values, because fires have always begun in one of those houses insured.

What the police have done with the poor peasants it is to request them to leave their shacks immediately and go out if they are not willing to return to work under the old conditions. This statement regarding the police to set fire to the shacks of the poor peasants is the main one I have found in the information published by the Call. The most of the information published by the New York Call is taken from our labor paper Justicia, which I am sending you, regarding the conditions of the laborers in Porto Rico.

I have given my very particular attention to that part of your letter stating that "Gen. McIntyre had informed you not to have received any information as to the killing or wounding of anyone or that any constitutional rights of the people were invaded; that the governor had cabled that there had been an attack upon one of the plants of the sugar refineries; that the property was in the hands of a receiver; and that the situation was well in hand." Regarding this point, as informed to Gen. McIntyre by the governor of the island, I am grounded in saying that that is the first information I have received about having been attacked any of the plants of the sugar refineries in the hands or out of the hands of any receivers. They are grounded in saying that the situation is well in hand. It has always been, it is, and will be. It is better than in hand. It is under the terrorism, brutalities, and assassinations of the police force, under whose control are all the towns of Porto Rico, with the request and order of the governor, tolerating the suspension and annulment of all the constitutional rights of the citizens of Porto Rico not only in the rural zones as in the beginning, but within the urban zones and at everywhere. The cablegrams, copy of which you send me in your letter, was received by myself, by means of the secretary of Porto Rico, and the manifested partiality of the Government is precisely proved in the same case. As soon as I received your cablegram I sent to the secretary of Porto Rico a letter containing duly quoted a cablegram to you and requesting him to transmit it to your office by means of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, as your request had been received. The letter referred to was sent to the secretary of Porto Rico on February 26, and a copy of it was sent to you. As the answer given to you was containing the accurate information of facts, I was in the confidence that the Government would transmit to you our answer if affairs were to be appreciated fairly and conducting to a square dealing. But it has not been so. Five days after having sent our answer to you I have received from the secretary of Porto Rico the letter which I quote herein:

[Government of Porto Rico, office of the secretary.]

SAN JUAN, March 2, 1915.

SIR: Replying to your communication of the 26th ultimo, wherein you request this office to transmit to the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs the cablegram quoted in your said communication and purporting to be a reply to a cablegram received by you through this office, I beg to inform you that it is the policy of the Government not to transmit messages through official channels when the said messages are not in strict accordance with the facts. I regret to say that in the cablegram that you desire to be sent through this office some of the statements therein made are contrary to the facts as they appear by the several investigations made by the Government. For the above reasons I respectfully inform you that it is my duty to decline to comply with your request.

Very respectfully, yours,

MARTIN TRAVIESO,
Secretary of Porto Rico.

MR. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
President Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico,
San Juan, P. R.

This information will explain you what has happened. I am perfectly in accordance with your recommendation that to expect fruitful results and rightening of the wrongs inflicted upon the working people no exaggerated accounts should be transmitted, and I have ever tried to follow that policy, so that any charge preferred against the enemies of this people or the conduct of any authority may be proven. But in the same manner it is my believing that all the abuses of the power should be denounced, and that it would be a crime for us to keep silence while the armless and defenseless peasants of this island ask for better wages and better living conditions, and they are violently disbanded and criminally assassinated in the cities and countries, while the hall federations are illegally closed down by the force, and while the constitutional rights of the people are placed in the hands of the most brutal and unscrupulous people of this island.

Awaiting for your instructions and good advices and trusting that your efforts will greatly cooperate to settle the affairs of the island, I am, with best wishes,
Fraternally, yours,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Gen. Org. A. F. of L.

[Federacion Libre de los Trabajadores de Puerto Rico. Afiliada a la American Federacion of Labor. Fundada en 1899.]

SAN JUAN, P. R., March 5, 1915.

The EDITOR OF THE TIMES,
San Juan, P. R.

SIR: In answer to your courteous invitation for a version of Mr. Conde's speech, as delivered by him at Fajardo a month since, and in view of the letters from Mr. Bird, as representative of the Fajardo Sugar Co., inserted in your daily, it remains for me to repeat here again what I had previously reported on the matter—that is to say, that Mr. Conde's speech was well thought and meditated, and that all what he said on that occasion was in accord with his ideas and the law, otherwise the police which was present would have called his attention or denounced him. Things worse than that I have witnessed in Ponce.

The letters printed in the Times come all of them from interested parties to whom Mr. Conde's speech could not make a good impression. The signers of the letters in question are all of them, without doubt, persons of standing and well to do in the community, but they are indeed prejudiced for reasons of social and human nature. They seem to be commonly interested because of family or business reasons, and in certain cases they appear in Mr. Bird's pay roll. This, of course, makes them feel hostile and grudgesome in commenting over the speech.

Neither Mr. Conde nor the Federacion Libre can rejoice over the death, accident, or misfortune that may befall a human being, and we could not feel so toward Dr. Santiago Velez or Mr. Bird. Mr. Conde neither declared that he was in favor of incendiarism, but rather turned them into ridicule.

Besides, the ideas of Mr. Conde, there is no doubt but what they are utterly opposed to his accusers, and therefore it is quite natural they should say whatever he (Mr. Conde) said was all out of place, terrible, and even impious. The speaker had the right, and still has it, of uttering the most fit opinions on his subject at issue then, and the gentlemen whose signatures appear in the above-referred-to letters have the same right to hold a contrary opinion about Mr. Conde.

On the other hand he went to Fajardo upon the invitation of the workmen of the locality to help them to bind a contract with the employers or let the strike go on. After the meeting referred to he took part in the discussion of the terms of the arrangements and was busy at this for a whole day with Mr. Bird and other employers, and, mind you, there was not friction of any kind among those people. It is in reality very strange that after the strike should be over and arranged and the contract not fulfilled by Mr. Bird that they should now turn around and accuse Mr. Conde of fact that took place as between employers and country employees at the Fajardo town hall and to which Mr. Conde gave his assistance.

I think it is enough for me to say that whatever statements were made by him with the object of warding off the bad impression Mr. Bird reminded the signers of the contract relative to the address delivered by Mr. Conde, which after all did not produce the same disagreeable influence as the speech which Mr. Iglesias pronounced at Ponce and to which your editorial of to-day refers.

The Ponce meeting began at 7.30 p. m., and five speakers had already delivered their address before Mr. Iglesias himself stepped forward to speak also. The meeting had been going on for four hours before anybody ever dreamed of how it would end. Mr. Iglesias began speaking at 11.15 p. m., and after he had spoken about three quarters of an hour and stated that the police could not possibly be impartial, in as much as they had taken up their headquarters on the estates, sleeping, eating, and using the horses and automobiles of the landowners in connection with the strike. At this point of Mr. Iglesias's remarks a loud cry from Capt. Fernandez Nater, saying, "There, now, that will end it;" those words brought on the most reproachful blow that can ever be dealt to the rights of free speech and the most unjustifiable attack against constitutional guarantees of any civilized people. The people were dispersed by clubbing and shooting, and the result was that one man was killed and others wounded.

Besides this lamentable incident I am quoted as having used violent language against the governor, religion, and other institutions generally, all of which is absolutely false and purposely gotten up.

I am in the same position as Mr. Conde, or perhaps worse off than he, Mr. Editor, since it is impossible to prevent popular opinion and commentaries, when these are replete with prejudice and sentiments hostile to the cause for which we stand and believe to be just and patriotic. Not wishing to tire you with a lengthy letter, I beg to remain,

Very sincerely, yours,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Gen. Org. of A. F. of L.

[Federacion Libre de los Trabajadores de Puerto Rico. Afiliada a la American Federation of Labor. Fundada en 1890.]

SAN JUAN, P. R., March 10, 1915.

Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS,
Pres. American Federation of Labor,
801-809 G St. NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I am very much pleased to give you this additional information regarding the so-called riot of Ponce, about which I sent you formerly more detailed information. When the house of delegates was informed by one of his members that a meeting had been disbanded by the insular police in Ponce while I was addressing the gathering, the matter was in the first moment discussed and one of the members of the house moved that a special committee be appointed to investigate the facts and inform the house of the truth in view that one of the men present in the meeting had been killed by the bullets of the police, and some others more seriously wounded.

Such committee went to Ponce and gathered the information they please from the public and the insular police, but nor I, neither the men which in my companion were arrested and placed under a bond of 2,000 accused of riot, were requested to inform to that committee. The committee returned from Ponce, and in spite that all the affidavits concurs in the fact that the responsible of violating the law, depriving the citizens from the free exercise of their liberty, and of killing the man who is dead, and of the men being wounded is the insular police; in spite of that the committee of the house have not dared to inform and tell the truth to that legislative body. Their report to the house was quite a "white wash" to the police, though verbally and not with their signature; a member of the such committee, composed of two men recognizes that the most brutal crime have been committed with the people of Ponce, and the most unjustified violation of the law have been committed by the police.

The report of the committee to the house of delegates was largely discussed and an important discussion of the general affairs of the island and the policy of the government in the strike was maintained. The most important part of the discussion in substance is as follows:

LOWER HOUSE INVESTIGATION OF THE PONCE INCIDENT—EXTRACT OF THE SESSION.

Mr. Tous Soto, of the district of Ponce, asked Messrs. Huyke and Martinez Nadal, the members of the investigating committee, if from the statement made by them it must be construed that the police caused Mr. Santiago Iglesias to come down from the speaker's stand in the midst of his address, and they answered in the affirmative.

"It being so," said Mr. Tous Soto, "I believe the Ponce incident must be given such an important significance as shall not be overlooked by the men who stand for the fundamental principles of the liberty we all enjoy under the Constitution of the United States and the laws enacted by the legislature of this country. I understand the police have no authority at any time to cause a man to come down from a public rostrum and so break up a meeting, for this is equivalent to a violation of the law which guarantees the free expression of thought; and on this account laying aside all particulars which have such small significance as compared with the fundamental principles of the liberty of thought. I move that the following amendment be added to the report of the investigation committee:

"Be it enacted that the most energetic protest of the house be brought to bear against the violation of the law defending the rights of the people committed at Ponce by members of the insular police while they caused a man to come down from the speaker's stand or rostrum while he was in the full exercise of his rights of censure."

Mr. Tous Soto stated that above all it was the duty of every citizen to safeguard the liberty acquired by himself, and that the right of free speech is consecrated by the laws of this island and by the United States Constitution, and that it was of more importance than all the law that could be called into action to violate the sacred right of the people in expressing themselves freely. The people must not be dependent upon the police to interpret their words and suspend a public meeting, inasmuch as the police have no authority to do this, but this is the business of the courts to decide whether a speaker infringes upon the laws.

Mr. Huyke, one of the members of the committee, stated here that the police acted upon being instructed by their chiefs, and I say that if this is the case, then I will amend my amendment in such form that the criticism of this house be directed against the person of this government who had issued such instructions, because I understand that nobody in Porto Rico is above the Constitution or any other man of whatever high standing he may be as to abolish the Constitution and the law defining the rights of the people.

The amendment proposed by the delegate, Mr. Tous Soto, was voted upon, and all the reactionaries and capitalists in the house voted against the rights of the people, defeating the amendment and so justifying the most brutal and social crime committed in Ponce and the most unjustified violation of the Constitution of the United States.

With kind regards, I beg to remain,
Fraternally, yours,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Gen. Org. A. F. of L.

[American Federation of Labor.]

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 23, 1915.

THE EXECUTIVE COUNCIL AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

COLLEAGUES: Referring to the situation in Porto Rico, I herewith enclose copy of a cablegram received from Organizer Iglesias, in President Gompers's absence. I have transmitted copy of same to Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Labor, so that he can have the information in connection with the other communications which have been furnished to him bearing on the situation in Porto Rico.

Yours, fraternally,

FRANK MORRISON,
Secretary American Federation of Labor.

[Cablegram.]

CAYEY, PORTO RICO, March 21, 1915.

FEDERATIONIST, Washington.

Last night police violently disbanded peaceful meeting, clubbing people and federation leader, who was arrested. Annual labor federation convention now in session at Baptist Church feels indignant against police lawlessness. Constitutional rights absolutely disregarded. Judicial brutalities sentenced 130 men Vieques for alleged riot and assault, depriving them of jury trial, appeals being illegally denied. More than one hundred pending sentences. Federation convention discussing general strike plan to protest against disgraceful administration, which gives no credit to American principles of justice and liberty.

IGLESIAS.

CORRESPONDENCE RELATING TO ALLEGED KILLING AND WOUNDING OF WORKERS.

[Government of Porto Rico, office of the secretary.]

FEBRUARY 25, 1915.

SIR: I have the honor to quote below for your information cablegram just received from the Bureau of Insular Affairs, Washington, D. C.:

YAGER, San Juan.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS: Cable me accurate account of alleged killing and wounding of (circling?) workers in consequence of strike, and if constitutional rights have been violated.

SAMUEL GOMPERS.
McINTYRE.

Respectfully,

MARTIN TRAVIESO, Jr.,
Secretary of Porto Rico.

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
San Juan, Porto Rico.

[Federacion Libre de los Trabajadores de Puerto Rico. Afiliada a la American Federacion of Labor. Fundada en 1899.]

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 26, 1915.

Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS.

Prest. American Federation of Labor.801-809 G St., NW., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I have just to-day received from the secretary of Porto Rico the letter which I quoted herein below and which is as follows:

[Government of Porto Rico, office of the secretary.]

FEBRUARY 25, 1915.

SIR: I have the honor to quote below, for your information, cablegram just received from the Bureau of Insular Affairs, Washington, D. C.:

YAGER, San Juan.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS: Cable me accurate account of alleged killing and wounding of (circling?) workers in consequence of strike, and if constitutional rights have been violated.

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
McINTYRE.

Respectfully,

MARTIN TRAVIESO, Jr.,
Secretary of Porto Rico.

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
San Juan, P. R.

To the former communication I answered to the secretary of Porto Rico in the way you may see by the copy of the letter I am attaching herewith for your information.

Yours, fraternally,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Gen. Org., A. F. of L.

[Federacion Libre de los Trabajadores de Puerto Rico. Afiliada a la American Federacion of Labor. Fundada en 1899.]

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 26, 1915.

Hon. MARTIN TRAVIESO, Jr.,

Secretary of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.

HON. SIR: In answer to yours of February 25 inst., I would be very grateful to you for transmitting Hon. McIntyre the cablegram quoted herein below:

"McINTYRE, Washington:

"Answer Gompers parade strikers Vieques was dissolved by police and foremen. Four workingmen killed, eight wounded. In several towns meetings were broken, twenty-seven men wounded. Constitutional rights speech even myself denied in rural zones, which are under control police. Strikers claims police used to break strike. Some strikers Arecibo summarily sentenced. Federation Hall, Vieques, close down by police. More than 100 arrested and sentenced. Letter mailed."

11178 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Thanking you very much in advance, I beg to remain,
Very respectfully, yours,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Presidente Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico.

[Government of Porto Rico, office of the secretary.]

SAN JUAN, March 2, 1915.

SIR: Replying to your communication of the 26th ultimo wherein you request this office to transmit to the Chief of the Bureau of Insular Affairs the cablegram quoted in your said communication and purporting to be a reply to a cablegram received by you through this office, I beg to inform you that it is the policy of the government not to transmit messages through official channels when the said messages are not in strict accordance with the facts.

I regret to say that in the cablegram that you desire to be sent through this office some of the statements therein made are contrary to the facts as they appear by the several investigations made by the government.

For the above reasons I respectfully inform you that it is my duty to decline to comply with your request.

Very respectfully, yours,

MARTIN TRAVIESO, Jr.,
Secretary of Porto Rico.

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
President Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico,
San Juan, P. R.

STATEMENT OF MR. FREDERICK F. INGRAM.

[Frederick F. Ingram Co., perfumers and manufacturing pharmacists.]

DETROIT, MICH., Mar. 15, 1915.

Hon. LOUIS F. POST.
Department of Labor, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. POST: Referring to the inclosed page¹ from Public, March 12, I know something of the situation in Porto Rico, it so impressed me that while visiting there last spring I addressed a communication to Congressman Doremus from this district (inclosed find copy of same). So far as I know, forwarding my observations to Congressman Doremus has produced no results.

I did not talk on the island with workingmen or their representatives; was in touch only with business men, Americans and natives, but the information I gathered through them made me feel that if a tendency then apparent was not speedily checked the result would be a most humiliating situation for the United States. It looked to me as if it was leading to a system of dependent peonage even worse than the situation existing in Mexico preceding the present disturbances there. The natives of Porto Rico are a fine race, superior to any others in West Indies, Central America, or Mexico. Previous to the American occupation all had access to the land, their little patch of ground, and opportunity for advancement if disposed to advance. The ownership of this land is being centered to corporations, if I was correctly informed when there, that is almost unbelievable.

Might I venture to ask you to forward this to Hon. Frank P. Walsh, chairman of the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations, if you approve of it.

Yours, respectfully,

F. F. INGRAM.

I received a letter to-day from a business friend in Ponce, P. R. He says the cigar strike has been followed by a school strike. The dissatisfaction and unrest has emptied the schools of the native children.

¹ Submitted in printed form.

22 APRIL, 1914.

HON. FRANK E. DOREMUS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. DOREMUS: Leaving to-day homeward bound, visiting on the way several other W. I. islands and the Canal Zone after 3 weeks spent in Porto Rico, primarily for a rest and incidentally to develop a trade on the island, meeting many men in the mercantile lines, natives as well as Americans, has given me opportunity to learn about local conditions as viewed by business men.

It seems to me that the situation in Porto Rico is not correctly understood in Washington, which prompts me to write you on the subject.

The manager of one of the largest mercantile houses on the island, an American, but of 15 years' active business experience in Porto Rico, said, "When the Americans came to the island, of its population of 1,100,000, they found 1,000,000 to be their friends. To-day the Americans and their Government can count all their friends in the 100,000 and to have some of the 100,000 left."

It is claimed that promises made at the time of occupation have been broken, that acts undreamed of then have since been done by the American rulers, surpassive in some instances in their unpopularity of anything heretofore ever done by former rulers. This is provoking unrest and prejudice against the Americans here, interfering with business and prosperity of all the races and classes.

Much was expected from the change of administration, but so far there has been disappointment that has filled the cup of bitterness, for the old evils have not only been continued, but it is claimed new evils have been imposed from which American residents are perhaps the greatest sufferers, excepting those in official life.

It seems to me that justice as well as political experience should prompt those that will be held responsible for existing conditions to carefully consider these alleged grievances, some of which follow:

First. That the same system and in a large measure the same gentlemen as under the previous administration are still in power and the unofficial domination is by the same influences.

Second. The former and present Government greatly antagonize the natives by misgovernment and favoritism.

Third. It is conceded that Gov. Yager is well meaning but lacks political experience, is easily imposed upon by special interest that has his ear and that have impressed upon him their viewpoint. That he ignores the Democrat organization and the party leaders as well as the business interest, except the sugar and tobacco corporations.

Fourth. Porto Ricans were promised citizenship by Gen. Miles. It is not yet granted. They want collective citizenship, not the kind proposed in the present Senate bill which treats the Porto Ricans as illegitimate children, legitimacy to be conferred by a court upon application.

Fifth. The recent special revenue tax on American goods entering the island is very exasperating. It injures the business of Americans in the States, who otherwise could sell in the island. It relieves the island real estate of taxes which are transferred to the consumers—a tax upon the poor to the profit of the rich and the corporations. This tax was made retroactive, embargos placed upon stores, and their stocks were released only when the stamps were affixed to goods, in some cases confiscating property because the goods could not be sold at the increased prices. This tax works out to the profit, so it is claimed, of the great sugar corporations, enabled by it to hold land out of use because of the very small tax on it, thus depriving the poor of employment that working such idle land would afford.

Also, so it is claimed, to the advantage of the American Tobacco Co., who under various names own the tobacco companies operating here.

Sixth. The limited land-holdings clause of the Foraker law is being evaded by the corporations as it was under the previous government, and sugar corporations through dummies have acquired immense holdings, making it practically impossible to buy a few acres for raising other crops or for pasture, except poor land in the mountains, while the new proposed organic act now before Congress omits the clause altogether.

Seventh. By a scheme officially permitted cane is being imported from Santo Domingo by the large Guánica centrale, to the detriment of the Porto Rican people and to the loss of revenue by the treasury.

I inclose copy of resolutions adopted by the Ponce Democratic Club (Ponce is the largest county on the island) this month which names other apparently serious grievances. I have talked with many business men of the island and they, of all political parties, seem agreed as to the seriousness of the situation. Its application to practical politics in the coming campaign for the election of a new Congress, which seems to be a certainty, is regarded with much complacency by our Republican friends and, it seems to me, with reason, for if the Democrats do not take steps during this session to relieve themselves of responsibility for such undemocratic measures forced upon a helpless people the party will have an exceedingly increased hazard to overcome to carry the close districts.

I expect to be back home by May 22. I know it is a far cry from Detroit to Porto Rico, but it is not so far but what these matters may be with us for explanation in November.

Frankly, it seems to me that Porto Rican affairs need looking into. They will be looked into. I hope it will be by the Democrats, who are responsible for the present status.

With kind regards, I am,
Yours, sincerely,

F. F. INGRAM.

EXHIBITS.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 1.

STATEMENTS PERTAINING TO THE LAST LABORERS' STRIKE IN THE ISLAND OF PORTO RICO.

The following is an outline of the affidavits taken before the notary public of the city of San Juan, P. R., Mr. Pedro Santana, jr., with offices at corner of San Justo and Tetuán Streets, of said city:

EXHIBIT A.

In the city of Juncos, island of Porto Rico, and before me the notary public above mentioned, appeared Catalino Marrero, Agustín Cintrón, Juan Cruz Rivera, Lorenzo Vazquez, Juan Pagán, Francisco Peña, Gregorio Marquez, Agapito Ocasio, Aniceto Hernandez, Encarnación Robles, all of legal age and residents of said city of Juncos, under oath depose and say: That before they went into strike they begged their patrons for better wages and more respect during working hours; that they were only paid from 40 to 50 cents for working hard from 6 o'clock in the morning to 6 o'clock in the evening; that they were badly treated by their patrons and their agents; that during working hours they were not even allowed to perform human ordinary necessities; that they never were heard and therefore they decided to go into pacific strike to force their patrons to justify them (the laborers) in their demands for better wages, treating, respect, etc.; that the strike lasted for about 10 days; that an agreement was signed by agents of both the laborers and the patrons; that they (the laborers) have fulfilled their part to the said contract; that said patrons have violated their part to said contract; that their patrons used a circular of Gov. Yager to influence us in believing that no one had right to go into strike asking for better wages and more respect, etc.

EXHIBIT B.

Mr. Eloy Franquis under oath deposes and says: That he is a resident of the city of Juncos, P. R.; that he is a cigarmaker; that on the 1st day of February of the present year while he was addressing pacific strikers in a place called Pueblito del Río of the municipality of Las Piedras, Corp. J. López, of the insular police of the island of Porto Rico, grabbed him down the tribune without justification; that Mr. Franquis was addressing the crowd in a correct manner; that a moment afterwards Mr. Franquis was authorized by said corporal of the insular police force of Porto Rico to continue his speech; that the police force intended to end the meeting without cause; that deponent was charged for slander before the municipal court for the municipal district of Las Piedras, P. R.; that his case was heard, and the defendant, Mr. Franquis, was discharged.

OUTLINE OF EXHIBITS C, D, E, F, G, H, I, J, K, L, M.

Mr. Eloy Franquis under oath deposes and says: That about the 1st day of February of the present year about 500 laborers came to him asking his cooperation to better the conditions of the working classes of the municipality of Juncos; that he acceded and went on, and from the beginning of the strike managed all affairs of same; that the conduct of the police force of the city of Juncos during the strike was very bad; that in one occasion the police told the strikers that they were not allowed to traffic along the carreteras or public roads; that the police ill treated the poor strikers; that the police intended to intimidate the pacific action of the strikers, insisting on them to go to work, or, on the contrary, they said the strikers they had orders to use their clubs; that on the 4th day of February a great meeting was to be held in Gurabo, a town near Juncos, and to that effect the laborers from Juncos were on their way to former; that the police, using the most libelous words ever heard, tried and consequently ended the laborer's assembly with their clubs, and also firing their revolvers; that many of the assemblers were hurt by the police without justification at all; that the number of victims reached from 15 to 20; that some of the victims went to the hospital to be cured of hurts suffered by clubs of the police; that as soon as the police knew they (the laborers) had gone to the hospital, tried and in effect imprisoned all of them; that they were charged by the police of different crimes before the municipal court for the municipal district of San Lorenzo, P. R., and sentenced by said court; that all of them appealed from the sentence rendered by the municipal court for the municipal district of San Lorenzo, P. R., to the higher court, that is to say, the district court for the district of Humacao, P. R., and the higher court discharged and freed all of them on the ground that they were innocent of the crimes imputed them; in one particular case a laborer named Pablo Rivera Nieves, a sick man, but a striker, was beaten by the police; persons of 50 years of age also were beaten.

As shown by Exhibit F, Eleuterio Mazán was the bearer of the American flag in the assembly above referred, when the police ended same; that a policeman named Julio Soto, knowing it was the national flag, broke it to pieces; that said Mazán called the attention to the police to the fact that they had broken the American flag, and the response was that the police clubbed the poor laborer and afterwards charged him with the commission of a crime; that said charge was dismissed.

As shown by Affidavit No. 860, Exhibit G, authorized before the notary public, Mr. Pedro Santana, jr., Mr. Agustín Cintrón, of Juncos, P. R., deposes and says: That he knows perfectly well that the police force almost in the whole island of Porto Rico and specially during the strike periods are in the habit of living on the sugar factories or centrales, not to restore order in case of need but for causing intimidation to the poor laborers who are working in the centrales, trying to persuade them not to go into strike; and if they do, explaining to them (the laborers) that they are liable to be clubbed.

As shown by Affidavit No. 861, Exhibit H, Mr. Lucas E. Castro, an industrial man of an excellent reputation in the city of Juncos, under oath deposes and says: That he is a resident of the city of Juncos; that he was in Juncos when the strike began; that he followed the course of all affairs in connection with same; that he can say that the conduct of the laborers on strike during last one was an excellent one; that he saw the police ending a pacific assembly of the strikers, using their clubs and revolvers without justification at all; that on one occasion the action of the police was so hostile to the strikers that almost the whole town was compelled to close doors, etc.; that he never saw any striker to attempt against the public power.

Exhibit I, Affidavit No. 862, before the same notary, Mr. Pedro Santana, jr., Mr. Catalino Marrero under oath deposes and says: That he is a resident of the city of Juncos, P. R.; that during the last strike the chief of police of said city, Mr. Vicente Torres Quintero, called him one day and told him to tell some laborers who were working on a plantation called "Amel" that everything was all right as far as they continued working, but otherwise if they were willing to go into the strike they were liable to be clubbed and imprisoned.

Affidavit No. 863, Exhibit J: Mr. Modesto Martínez is a doctor in pharmacy of the city of Juncos; he declared under oath that the conduct of the strikers in February this year was an excellent one; that they simply left their works to beg for better wages and better treatment; that he saw the police on one occasion clubbing the poor laborers that went on strike.

Exhibits K, L, M refer to same thing above mentioned, and affidavits were taken in order to make evidence corroborative.

Exhibits N, O, P, and Q, affidavits from 867 to 870, before the notary Public above referred to, Mr. Pedro Santana, jr., indicate the following: That deponents, Luis Sanchez Ocaña, Juan Román, José María Pereira, Juan Rivera, are all neighbors of the city of Juncos, P. R.; that they are all well acquainted with the last strike of February of this year; that the conduct of the strikers was of a high order; that assemblies of the strikers were ended by the insular police without justification at all; that strikers were clubbed in the streets by the police; that strikers were intimidated by the insular police and told to go to work in order to prevent being clubbed and imprisoned; that the strikers never attempted against the public authorities and always had faith in their leader's work.

In a general way we can say that the constitutional rights of the strikers were violated by the insular police of the island of Porto Rico, and this permitted to be done under the flag of Stars and Stripes.

A better idea of what really happened during the last strike in Porto Rico can be obtained reading carefully all the affidavits authorized before the notaries public of the island of Porto Rico.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 2.

[Telegram.]

CIDRA, February 17, 1915.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, San Juan, P. R.:

Agricultural workers of cane fields are peacefully on a strike. Chief of police, with two policemen, prevent the laborers to hold peaceful meetings. Laborers are threatened to be clubbed and shot if they hold any meeting. Police frankly to the side of the interests of the corporations. No reasons are taken into consideration by the police, who seek for the chance to provoke a conflict. See governor and send us an urgent resolution.

JOSE E. SEGARRA,
Strike Commission.

[Telegram.]

VIEQUES, P. R., February 11, 1915.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, San Juan, P. R.:

Leaders labor movement arrested. We need protection to-day. Answer at once.

MANUEL CRISTIAN.

[Telegram.]

JUNCOS, P. R., March 15, 1915.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, Editor of Justicia, San Juan.

Lawsuit followed against Masan for alleged insult to the American flag has been stayed. Who will be the real offenders?

ELOY FRANQUIZ,
Correspondent.

MUNICIPAL COUNCIL JUNCOS, P. R.,
OFFICE OF THE MAYOR,
March 9, 1915.

Messrs. JOSE M. PEREIRA and ELOY FRANQUIS, Chairman & Secretary Union Obrera Central.

SIR: In answer to your letter dated to-day relative to holding a meeting Wednesday next March 10, I may say you are free to use the Plaza de Pueblo Nuevo.

Respectfully, yours,

JOSE BARBERAS,
Mayor of the Town.

N. B.—This plaza or square is situated on the outskirts of the town, and this communication means that the mayor who signed his name to it refuses the laborers the use of Plaza Central which is in the middle of the town itself. (Remark from the translator.)

GURABO, P. R., February 8, 1915.

Mr. RAMON GONZALES NIEVES,
Mayor of the Town.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned commission, auxiliary committee and true committee of the agriculturists' strike begs to request of you an authorization to fill out and comply the necessary requisites under the law for the purpose of holding parades and meetings in public both in town and country.

We desire that permit be issued to us in writing and for an unlimited space of time.

Very sincerely, yours,

(Signed by 11 citizens, and for the mayor of the town as an approval.)

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 19, 1915.

GUILLERMO COLON, Gurabo:

Your telegram received and placed in the hands of chief of police.

ARTHUR YAGER.

[Telegram.]

SAN LORENZO, P. R., March 6, 1915.

EDITOR OF JUSTICIA, San Juan:

Since the night of the outrages committed by the policemen in our labor meeting, we do not dare to hold any meeting if the honorable municipal judge is not present in it. When he is unable to attend the meeting we do not hold them, until there be not removed from here Chief of Police Juan Alejandron, and Policeman Suner bearing badge number 335, and also Policemen Nemesio Garcia and Plo Concepcion. Request governor to kindly accede to our petition for the good of our families which are most alarmed on account of the attitude of these policemen.

Were we not so peaceful and sincere keepers of law, last night certainly would be a tragic one.

If governor wants to have as an evidence any document signed by a very large number of persons from all social classes, I will be very glad to do so, and more than three hundred families will bless him if acceding to our petition.

JOSE G. GARCIA.

Correspondent.

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS—CACIQUISM OR BOSSISM.

The force of reaction has done nothing but show its aggressiveness during these years past. All the work that could be done to combat the labor organizations of the island has been done, even though for this it has been necessary to occupy certain positions and defend men and Government officials who, unfortunately, are the most harmed by accepting that kind of support or defense.

The detrimental achievement of those who stand for reaction and inquisitorial methods, the enemies of the democratic institutions, is not and can not be easily forgotten in the course of a few days.

A newspaper which for nearly half a century has been the genuine representative of inquisition in Porto Rico, the faithful interpreter of tyranny and despotism, the official organ of the odious government of the monarchy in Porto Rico; the periodical, we say again, has become the defender of the island caciques (bosses), because the methods adopted by the administration to rule this country for a few years back has been all the advantage to the tyrants, such as those which the Spanish Government put into practice as well as all the most despicable and hateful means suggested by the reactionary group of the advisory chamber.

The enemy of all the American institutions; the enemy of all that bears the seal of democracy; the enemy of all that represents a principle of liberty; the enemy of the teaching of the English language in the schools of Porto Rico; the enemy of all the American governors ruling this island; the defender of the Spanish monarchy, with all its horrors, is now the best friend of the American Administration in Porto Rico.

And it is not the best friend of the American administration because he has done hating American institutions, rectified his conduct, altered his liberty that is at hand, or because it thinks English language should be taught in the public schools, or because he has become reconciled with the principles of liberty or altered his conduct. No; not a bit of it. He is even now in more perfect accord with the principles of the monarchy and more partial than ever to the absurd methods of reactionarism.

What is going on now in the Government just suits it. The Administration has just met it half way, but he did not go to the trouble of going to it. Enough said. What greater discredit could come upon the Administration of Porto Rico than that of receiving its support by the reactionary elements of this island?

And if not, let us stop to consider what has been and is the attitude of the reactionary press of Porto Rico, which approves of all the brutalities of the public officials and every means of oppression.

When only a few months ago one of the representatives at the House of Delegates of Porto Rico presented a bill granting the Free Federation of the Workmen of Porto Rico a building site for the purpose of erecting thereon the labor temple, El Boletín Mercantil, which is the paper to which we have been referring all along in this article, published an editorial that wreaked vengeance on the American Federation of Labor, because, in the opinion of El Boletín Mercantil, the said American Federation of Labor is an exotic organization and an enemy of Porto Rico. And let us see what stand this paper, which defends the Administration of Porto Rico, also takes in behalf of the American institutions, whether these be labor organizations or not. The article just referred to was published under the title "The Enemy at Home," and contained such reading matter as this:

"The Free Federation has requested the house of delegates to grant it a building site toward Puerta de Tierra for the purpose of erecting a building thereon, to be known under the pompous name of Temple of Labor; but, in other words, the said building would be nothing but a sort of lodge (or refuge) for the conspirators of the liberty of Porto Rico."

And the said periodical went on, saying in the same article:

"What would this so-called Temple of Labor be but a lamentable branch of the American Federation of Labor, an inimical institution to all local (religion-alistas) tendencies, as may be proved from the time it has been carrying on its work among us?"

Another paragraph of the same writer says:

"The tendencies of this exotic organism are sufficiently well known and which aspires only to weaken the spirit of regional defense on the island, that the legislative authority should lend it the powerful arm which they are striving to obtain in proportion as this international labor organization extends throughout Porto Rico; and he who does not care to desert the rank and file of the patriots remains in a weaker condition of self-defense when he has to withstand the all-absorbing politics and her corrupting influence as we have had occasion to see here later.

"The perfidy of the politicians who have found their 'Eldorado' here, figuring in the obscure play at which we have seen them, has found some relief for the most weak resistance of the country introducing and giving vent to the element of discord and also this pro-Americanizing tendency which seeks nothing but an appetite and an absurd satisfaction for a grudge."

This should suffice to know the manner of thinking of such as take their stand for the administration in Porto Rico when they declare themselves as virulent enemies of all that is American, just for that fact only.

And the men who believe so are the defenders of the actual American administration in Porto Rico, and it is necessary for one to think that the administration has had to become reactionary so as to reach an understanding.

Another paper representing another phase of the capitalistic opinion and which directed its shafts of insult against us and President Gompers, is "La Democracia," the official organ of the Unionist Party. This paper is published and edited by Mr. Luis Muñoz Rivera, Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico at Washington, and who is at the same time its proprietor and editor.

Several articles published in this paper plainly induced the Government to apply persecution and vexatary measures against us. We quote herewith:

"In any well-regulated country the Government is alone responsible for the maintenance of good order and guarantee of the people. We have had disorder going on now one month and the Government has not paid any attention to the situation, which surely casts discredit on the island at a time when the status of Porto Rico is to be defined very soon at Washington.

"It is very significant that every year, whenever Congress makes an attempt at taking action on political reforms of the country, that such disturbances should be found at the federation whose leader is the anarchist, Santiago Iglesias, or Santiago Panting (we leave it to anybody to ascertain his name), who, together with the old man, Gompers, sued not long ago as a dynamiter, who endeavored to prevent the Porto Rican Government from not falling into the hands of the Porto Ricans."

These paragraphs in themselves published in the periodical of Luis Muñoz Rivera, Resident Commissioner of Porto Rico at Washington, should plainly show the rankling and the hatred which those who live by despotism feel against the institutions of liberty, and hence the hatred they have conceived for Gompers and Iglesias and for those who hope to see this island to form a part of the American people and in all the enjoyment of the rights which the citizens of the United States have.

The plot to destroy us because we stand for the establishment of the American institutions in Porto Rico does not "let up" for a minute. All the mud slinging that can be done against the American institutions and the American people is heaped up by the partisans of monarchy and by those who were born on the island, those who in spite of this hold high positions in the Government and are constantly betraying the public, which gave them its confidence, if elected, or the American official who got their appointment, if they were so designated.

We propose to go on resolutely with our work until the day when the American Congress recognizes that Porto Rico must be a part of the American people and enjoy all its rights to the liberty, the guarantees, and the citizenship of the American people.

Meanwhile, let the struggle go on and we shall see the result.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 3.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF PONCE, PORTO RICO.

In the name and by the authority of the people of Porto Rico.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, &c.

THE PEOPLE OF PORTO RICO	} In the district court for the judicial district of Ponce, P. R., April 26th, 1915. vs.
SANTIAGO CARRERAS ET AL.

The district attorney charges Santiago Iglesias, Francisco Paz Granela, Manuel Texidor, Prudencio Rivera Martinez, Santiago Carreras, Maximiliano Combre, and others, for breach of the peace (riot), misdemeanor committed as follows: The above-mentioned Santiago Iglesias and others in Ponce, within said district and about the first day of March, 1915, while a public meeting was held on account of the agricultural strike, and while one of the defendants, Mr. Santiago Iglesias was addressing the crowd in a violent and threatening way to the auditory, exciting to those present to raise against the governor of Porto Rico and all the Porto Rican's authorities, saying that the governor of Porto Rico with his proclamation and in agreement with the insular chief of police had violated the constitution, and that similar facts had determined the United States and French revolutions; that the police beat and ill treated the working classes, because they (the police) had their barracks at the sugar factories, where they were given meals, drinks, women, etc. By that time the district chief of police ordered the speaker to end that attitude, and then and there the defendants above mentioned, in an illegal, malicious, and voluntary way, acting together and without legal authority, causing fear to a great number of persons therein present, they (defendants) used firearms, steel arms, causing in that way a breach of the public peace.

The above criminal charge is signed by the district attorney for the judicial district of Ponce, P. R., and subscribed and sworn by said attorney before the secretary of said district court on the 23d of April of the present year.

AFFIDAVIT OF JUAN CRUZ PIRIS.

The following is an outline of the affidavit taken before the notary public of the city of Ponce, R. I., Mr. Leopoldo Tormes García.

Deponent Mr. JUAN CRUZ PIRIS: The testimony of Mr. Juan Cruz Piris, of the city of Ponce, P. R., to the effect that some time after the riot he was in front of the insular police barracks, where the captain and some policemen grabbed him and started beating him with their clubs, guns, etc., for about five minutes; afterwards he was taken inside the barracks and therein examined; three hours later, then the district attorney came and questioned him (deponent); that district attorney ordered his discharge, because there was not criminal liability imputable to him (deponent); that the district attorney asked the police's captain why the deponent had been beaten, and he answered it was by mistake; that after this deponent went home to sleep; that five minutes after deponent had reached his house five detectives inquired from him the key to open the building where the American Federation of Labor's offices are situated in Ponce; that deponent answered he had not the key; that they (detectives and deponent) went to look for the person who had possession of the key; that he was found; that the police opened the doors of said building and started a search of all papers, desks, etc.; that deponent begged district Chief of Police López Arzuaga to leave everything in order and don't break the desks; that said chief answered deponent that he (the chief) was authorized not only to do what he pleases, but also to beat deponent in the mouth; that nothing wrong was found; then the chief told him they were justified in doing all they had done, because they had an order to look therein for firearms, steel arms, gunpowder, etc.; that they left the building carrying with them all papers concerning the strike.

AFFIDAVIT OF MR. CATALINO SANTOS.

The following is the affidavit of Mr. Catalino Santos before the notary public of the city of Ponce, P. R., Mr. Leopoldo Tormes García:

No. 1930.—That he is a resident of the city of Ponce, P. R., of legal age; that on the night of the first or second he was hearing the meeting; that he saw when the police started firing their arms and clubbing the assemblers; that he fled; that he saw a policeman firing the crowd; that the crowd didn't make any resistance to the police; that everybody in the crowd was unarmed; that going home he saw a man fell to the ground owing to a policeman's shot.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 4.

REPORT OF THE COMMISSION ON INVESTIGATION OF THE PONCE INCIDENT.

The commission has practiced a careful investigation of the incident that occurred at Ponce and gave a chance to every interested party therein to explain to the commission what he knew about the case.

The facts may be divided in two parts—the first which relates to the manner in which the riot started, and the other which relates to the death of a certain Caballero.

The events that gave rise to the disturbance of the public peace are sub-judice, and this commission must not invade the jurisdiction of the court of justice.

But one man was killed at Ponce at the conclusion of the riot, and the commission heard the statements of many persons from the various social classes, which proffer concrete charges against a guardsman as being the cause of the said man's death; and being prompted by the desire of obtaining justice, we are obliged to declare that the circumstances in which this man's death was brought about must be investigated.

Whereas the commission, not entertaining any desire to intrude upon strange jurisdiction, begs to advise the house of delegates that this body inform the attorney general of the expediency—in other words, the necessity—of investigating the facts concerning the death of Caballero, and furnish the said officeholder the record of the commission relative to this delicate matter.

The preceding report having been approved by the house of delegates, it is hereby respectfully submitted to the honorable attorney general along with the record¹ in the above-referred report.

J. L. AMEDEO,
Assistant Secretary.

¹ The record referred to was submitted in Spanish in typewritten form.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 5.

OUTLINE OF A LETTER SENT TO THE HONORABLE THE GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO BY MR. HEMENEGILDO ROBLEDO.

On the eleventh day of May of the present year Mr. Hemenegildo Robledo sent a letter¹ to the honorable Governor of Porto Rico, Hon. Arthur Yager, stating in a general way the following:

That he was a spectator at a meeting held in the city of Ponce during the early part of March, this year.

That the police ordered the meeting to be ended, and at the same time began (the police) firing and clubbing everybody at the meeting.

That the writer, on account of such attitude, went home.

That on his way home a policeman beat him in a desperate way; another policeman, whom I don't know, fired against me twice, wounding me in the arms and on the left side.

That the writer had to go to Hospital Tricoche, in the city of Ponce, P. R., where he was a patient for about forty-five days.

That the writer is now an invalid on account of the shooting, being inutile of the left leg.

The writer states that he thinks it is not a crime to go to a meeting to hear the orators, as he did.

That the only fault, if any, he committed that night was to be present at the meeting hearing the orators.

That notwithstanding all the above facts the writer has been charged by the district attorney of Ponce of the crime of breach of the peace (riot).

As the writer don't know the author of the shooting, he asks the Governor of Porto Rico the privilege of being allowed to identify the guilty policeman, so that the writer be able to establish the consequent criminal charge.

The writer asks the honorable governor to inhibit the district attorney at Ponce, P. R., to try his case, on account of having said functionary knowledge of all injustices committed with the writer without having taken proper action.

The writer is willing to be accused by any other district attorney.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 6.

AFFIDAVITS FROM PONCE, P. R.

The following is an affidavit by Mr. Alberto Fernandez, before the notary public of the city of Ponce, P. R., Mr. Leopoldo Tormes Garcia March, 1915.

No. 1929.—That he is of age; that he is a resident of the city of Ponce, P. R.; that last night about half past 11 he was coming down from the moving picture, called "Cine Habana," and when he reached the corner of Plaza del Mercado, in the city of Ponce, P. R., I find out that there was a meeting in front of the house of Mr. Julio Torres; that he stopped to hear the meeting; that Mr. Santiago Iglesias was in the meeting; that said Santiago Iglesias was then addressing the crowd; that in a moment a riot arose, and deponent saw the police firing their arms and clubbing the assemblors; that deponent then ran down Leon Street of the said city; that while deponent was going by the left sidewalk of Vives Street, he saw a policeman beating a man with a stick resembling a stave; that the poor victim begged the policeman to stop beating him (the victim), saying these words, "Don't hit me more," and then the policeman shot him, and the poor man said to said policeman, "Please don't kill me, that I am going out," and then the policeman shot again the second time, killing him; that the policeman left the poor man on the street; that captain of the insular police, Mr. Nater, was told by the policeman that the victim had a knife; that deponent went to the place where the victim was laying and seeing he was expiring ran away; that he knows the policeman very well; that his name is Norberto Quiles; that he knows the policeman perfectly well.

There are about fifteen more affidavits corroborating the facts sworn by Mr. Alberto Fernandez, to show that the police was the exclusive party who in a violent way ended the meeting above referred to, resulting in deaths and wounded persons, who were innocents and were in proper manner hearing the pacific meeting given by the laborers on strike.

¹ Typewritten letter submitted in Spanish.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 7.

[Telegram—Translation.]

SAN JUAN, P. R., *February 21, 1915.*Mr. JUAN CRUZ PIRIS, Ponce, P. R.:

I beg to advise you that you should see upon my proclamation of yesterday, in order you may perfectly realize of the attitude of this Government. Rural zone is under the control of the chief of police who is responsible to me of order within the same.

ARTHUR YAGER, Governor.

[Telegram.]

PONCE, P. R., *February 21, 1915.*Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, Fed. Libre, Arecibo, P. R.:

Inform note police hinders parade and meeting laborers out of city. Looking for you every minute.

J. CRUZ PIRIS.

[Telegram.]

ARECIBO, P. R., *February 6, 1915.*J. C. BILLS, Chief Bu. of L. San Juan, P. R.:

Request sojourn of labor inspect. here at next meeting with employers.

M. F. ROJAS, President Strike Committee.

[Telegram.]

PONCE, P. R., *March 4, 1915.*Mr. S. IGLESIAS, San Juan:

We are still under dominion of terror. meeting in town forbidden. People excited front city hall, want meeting. Last night all social classes crowded front of city hall, cheered commission, house delegates, acclaiming justice. Capt. Nater and police ordered out down hall by petition, people which protested. I am investigating conspiracy, purpose assassination of yourself and Aybor.

CALDERIN.

[Telegram.]

PONCE, P. R., *February 26, 1915.*Mr. S. IGLESIAS, Fed. Libre, San Juan, P. R.:

Denounce governor; no guaranty given by police. They break up peaceful laborers' gatherings. Want laborers to go back to their work. See if you can come.

MODESTO CALDERIN.

[Telegram.]

PONCE, P. R., *March 2, 1915.*Mr. M. BERNARD SILVA, Federation Libre, San Juan, P. R.:

Last night while Iglesias was addressing meeting same was violently dissolved by police by shots and blows. Iglesias and other leaders arrested. Texidor under bond. Takes Angle Capital with information. Telephone Inglesias family, no serious accident. Accused of riot, the boys and all required bond $2,000.

J. CRUZ.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 8.

AFFIDAVIT FROM ANDRES ARELLANO.

To the effect that on April 1, 1915, he was at the town of Barceloneta; that the same day a conference was announced by Mr. Luis Fajardo, who requested deponent to present him to the public; that while deponent was introducing to the public the speaker took occasion to state that on his arrival at Barceloneta, on February 17, he, deponent, had been arrested by the local chief of police, Domingo Rivera Cabrera, without any motive for such action; that immediately the officer in question stepped up to the platform where the deponent was standing and dragged him to the ground, stating at the same time, "You are going to jail again; I will fix you." When deponent was on the ground the officer searched his person, but did not find any arm; that deponent was reduced to arrest, and bail fixed at $100, which was furnished by two citizens, for disturbing the peace; that while deponent was in jail he was visited by the justice of the peace and warned that he could never speak again in Barceloneta, and that if he caught deponent speaking he, the justice in person, was going to arrest him.

AFFIDAVIT FROM RUERTO PONCE, JULIAN CACERES, CERAFIN RODRIGUEZ.

To the effect that on the 16th of February, 1915, when they were returning home and near Central Camabalache, on the road from Arecibo to San Juan, they were met by the police stationed at that place and questioned as to whether or not they were strikers; that the aggressive manner in which the question was put to them they hesitated to answer, whereupon they were insulted and an attempt was made to assault them, stating in a most violent language that they had to get done with the strikers anyhow; that due to the risk they were confronting they decided to flee from the place; that the police, mad at the fruitless pursuit of them, took hold of Juan Diaz, a laborer who was going to the city with the national flag, seizing it from him and clubbing him merciless with their clubs.

AFFIDAVIT OF JUAN DIAZ.

To the effect that on February 16, 1915, when the deponent was coming from barrio Santana to the city to take part in parade of the agriculture strikers, and while he was carrying an American flag, was unexpectedly assaulted by the corporal of the insular police, Pablo Norat, stationed at Central Cambalache. The deponent further states that he was taken to the emergency hospital in the city to be cured, and was therefrom taken to the hospital for treatment, as he could not stand on his feet, due to the awful beating that he had been subjected to, and without any respect to the American flag.

AFFIDAVIT FROM CESARIO RIOS, BARDOMERO PEREZ, ESTEBAN MARTINEZ, FAUSTINO MEDINA, JOAQUIN CORTES, JUSTINO RIOS, JUAN RODRIGUEZ, JUSTINO HERNANDEZ, FELIPE RIVERA, FELIX SALCEDO, BAUTISTA AYALA, MANUEL ORTIZ, ISIDRO MOLINA, PEDRO RIVERA, JESÚS CORTES, NICASIO TIRADO, EVARISTO CLASSEN, CELESTINO SILVA, CARLOS ORTIZ.

To the effect that on February 16, 1915, the deponents had met at barrio Carreras, Arecibo, to consider the situation in connection with the strike; that all of them were arrested by the police, among them Pedro Manzano and Manuel Barrio, and were taken to the police headquarters, and from there to the jail; that charges were preferred against the deponents for extortion, and bail fixed at $500 each to obtain the release; that the bail being excessive for poor laborers they had to remain in jail until February 26, 1915, when the deponents were tried and sentenced to 30 days each; that the sentences were appealed to the district court, and on March 15 the case was heard and the deponents were acquitted, as nothing could be proved, notwithstanding the charge of the district attorney and the testimony given by the police; that innocent as the deponents were, they had to remain in jail from the time of the arrest until their acquittal.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 9.

[Telegram.]

ARECIBO, P. R., February 15, 1915.

JULIO AYBAR,
San Juan, P. R.:

Capt. Schetini forbids public meeting of peaceful strikers along main road. Police orders use of billies and revolvers if laborers disobey. Country workers indignant. Awaiting guarantees to be able to defend themselves. Felix Rouiz beaten without cause. Francisco Martinez arrested for carrying a stick. Main highway barricaded near Cambalache. Get information department of interior about right to use highway around Cambalache.

M. F. ROJAS,
Chairman Strike Committee.

[Telegram.]

ARECIBO, February 20, 1915.

"JUSTICIA,"
San Juan, P. R.:

Strict orders Chief of Police Shanton to local police forbidding parades and groups more than 10 persons in public highways. Meetings forbidden in all agricultural district Arecibo. Forbidden carry flags though it were the national flag. Orders are to search the peasants wherever found. Summary: They implicitly suspend constitutional guarantees.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, Org.

[Telegram.]

ARECIBO, P. R., February 23, 1915.

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Editor "Justicia," San Juan, P. R.:

Police to-day deal blows to José María Román and Pablo Ramírez, Barrio Dominguito. Yesterday I passed by Hacienda "Los Caños" (sugar estate) going to Dominguito, where they gather cane to weigh it. Saw cane weigher and a policeman. The cane weigher told policeman I was one of strike committee. I was searched.

NEMESIO MORALES,
Correspondent.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 10.

[Telegram.]

HUMACAO, P. R., February, 1915.

Hon. ARTHUR YAGER,
Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.:

Representatives of labor and employers are ready to meet in conference with view of reaching an agreement, but bureau of labor representative is asked by employers to be present.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS.

[Telegram.]

YABUCOA, P. R., February 23, 1915.

EDITOR OF JUSTICIA, San Juan:

Police refused to grant rights and guarantees to hold meetings in country. They snatched away flags on main road from the hands of the laborers and dissolved meetings.

JOSÉ DIEPPA, Cor.

11192 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

[Telegram.]

SAN JUAN, P. R., February 16, 1915.

JUAN BTA. DELGADO, Anasco:

Your telegram received. Matter endorsed chief police.

M. A. MUÑOZ,
Secty. to the Governor.

[Telegram.]

MAYAGUEZ, February 16, 1915.

Mr. JULIO AYBAR, House Delegates:

Police together. Overseers (capataces) break strike. Anasco brutalized by police. Investigation should follow soon.

JESÚS BALSAC.

[Telegram.]

MAYAGUEZ, February 16, 1915.

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Editor "Justicia," San Juan:

Workingmen break strike at bidding of police and overseers. Anasco police beating and arresting strikers. Urge governor to investigate.

J. M. BALSAC.

[Telegram.]

GUAYANILLA, P. R., March 2, 1915.

Mr. J. AYBAR, San Juan, P. R.:

Workers Barrio Indio have quit work, Chief Police Salmon Costa compelling them go to work. Here situation quiet; ask chief of this. Are witness Eladio Torres, Meliton Ortiz.

RAMON VAZQUEZ,
Pte. Strike Comette.

[Telegram.]

ANASCO, February 15, 1915.

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Editor "Justicia," San Juan:

Meeting held last night broken up on plaza with shots and clubbing. Police completely under control of the cane plantation owners. See governor and show him my telegram. Secure immediate investigation of facts and safety for our lives.

JUAN BTA. DELGADO,
General Correspondent.

[Telegram.]

ANASCO, February 15, 1915.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Editor "Justicia," San Juan:

Beating goes on. We need protection. See governor.

J. B. DELEGADO,
General Correspondent.

[Telegram.]

ANASCO, February 15, 1915.

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Mgr. "Justicia," San Juan:

To-day five workingmen have been beaten by the police without any cause whatever. Governor has been advised of facts. Velez denounced for upholding the rights of workmen. We have requested immediate investigation. Police, and cane proprietors' personal antagonizing strike. We are without protection.

JUAN BAUTISTA DELGADO,
General Correspondent.

[Telegram.]

AÑASCO, February 16, 1915.

Hon. GOVERNOR OF P. R., San Juan, P. R.:

Policeman Antonio Carlos and his companion Carde have threatened workingmen Toribio Mendoza, Zaenon Cuevas, Pedro Viera, Juan Cabaguin, Ramon Acosta, Manuel Pereira. Police is terrorizing. We request the necessary guarantees for our lives.

JUAN BTA. DELGADO,
Labor Representative.

[Telegram.]

AÑASCO, February 15, 1915.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS, San Juan:

We are still under outrages. We are in need of guarantees. See governor.

JUAN B. DELGADO.

[Telegram.]

AÑASCO, February 9, 1915.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Editor of Justicia, San Juan:

An agent of the plantations "Bravo" fired three times with his revolver against a striker. Lieutenant of police beats strikers instead of arresting aggressor. Strikers are not armed. Agents of the plantations are armed to the teeth.

JUAN RAMIREZ LORENZO,
Correspondent.

[Telegram.]

AÑASCO, February 10, 1915.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Editor of Justicia, San Juan:

We need you to see governor and inform him that some policemen armed with carabines are making propaganda among the strikers to cause them to go back to work. We have witnesses of this.

JUAN BTA. DELGADO,
Correspondent.

[Telegram.]

SAN JUAN, February 26, 1915.

FLORENCIO CABELLO, Maunabo, P. R.:

You telegram received. I understand refusal for authorizing you holding meetings is due to purpose preservation order. I advise agreement of the mayor and chief police who have authority to forbid meetings contrary to public order, who will surely not oppose meetings absolutely peaceful.

ARTHUR YAGER, Governor.

[Telegram.]

SAN JUAN, February 24, 1915.

JUAN CRUZ RIVERA, ET AL., Maunabo, P. R.:

Your telegram received. Has been referred to general police headquarters for immediate consideration.

ARTHUR YAGER, Governor.

[Telegram.]

YABUCOA, P. R., February 28, 1915.

Hon. ARTHUR YAGER,

Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.:

When I was speaking at the plaza of this town the police told me I had to dissolve the meeting because the mayor said that there was not permit to hold the meeting at the plaza. He refused many times to give permit.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Gen. Org. A. F. of L.

11194 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

[Telegram.]

MAUNABO, P. R., February 28, 1915.

Hon. ARTHUR YAGER,

Gov. of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.:

Agricultural workers of Barrio Palo Seco, Lisa, and Matuyas had to return back to their homes, because police prohibited them to walk town, certainly to prevent them to attend a labor meeting, where the Labor Federation representatives were going to address the people.

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Gen. Org. A. F. of L.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 11.

FEDERACION LIBRE DE LOS TRABAJADORES DE PUERTO RICO,

San Juan, P. R., April 14, 1915.

Hon. ARTHUR YAGER,

Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.

HONORABLE SIR: The following communication was sent to your office:

"APRIL 3, 1915.

"To the honorable the GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO,

"San Juan, P. R.

"SIR: The Free Federation of Workingmen of Porto Rico, affiliated to the American Federation of Labor, at its convention in the town of Cayey, P. R., held from March 18 to March 24, inclusive, resolved to demand of you the following:

"'For the purpose of obtaining full knowledge of the truth in the criminal abusive and despotic cases on the part of the police and other authorities in the towns of Vieques, Ponce, Juncos, Arecibo, Humacao, Añasco, Cayey, and Barceloneta, and in order to give the opportunity so that the persons of other localities desiring it be present to testify or serve as witnesses in connection with these cases, we propose that a commission be appointed as follows: A district judge, a fiscal, and two associate lawyers, to be chosen by the Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico, and who being empowered as accusers shall proceed according to law to investigate, formulate, and uphold to the last resort the public accusation resting upon each of the members of the police force, of the judges, and of the administration in general, and against whom, in pursuance with the facts found against the accused together with the declaration of the witnesses and affidavits, there may be found concrete charges of extra limitation of powers, authority, or any other crime.

"'The president of the Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico is to be present at this investigation with the purpose of taking cognizance of the proceedings and doings of the commission for the effects of better ascertaining the penal result.

"'We consider this as being the only legal means to arrive at the truth of this case, and that it is as impartial as it is logical.

"'The Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico, duly constituted under the laws it faithfully wishes to carry out, is willing to respect and maintain the judgment or decision arrived at by the commission to be named for that purpose.

"'All we want is an opportunity to present publicly and impartially the facts of the matter in support of our plea in connection with the facts as they occurred during the last agriculturists' strike of Porto Rico, and which have been the cause for so many tears in Porto Rican homes and deprived hundreds of citizens of their liberty and practically prohibited the free exercise of all guarantees under the law, and more particularly as specified in section first of the United States Constitution now in force in Porto Rico, and which defines the rights of the people and granting the same to all citizens alike.

"'We beg to forward you under separate cover copies of certain documents, telegrams, and statements of the facts concerning which we request an investigation to be carried out.

"'Hoping to receive a favorable reply to this our request, we are,

"'Very respectfully, yours,

"'SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

"'President of the Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico.'"

We have received the following answer to the above:

"GOVERNMENT OF PORTO RICO, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,

"San Juan, April 9, 1915.

"SIR: By direction of the acting governor, I have the honor to answer your letter of the 3d instant, in which, pursuant, to a resolution adopted by the convention recently held by the Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico at Cayey, you request the appointment of a commission which is to be composed of a district judge, a fiscal, and two lawyers to be chosen by the federation, and is to investigate certain facts reported to have been committed by judicial and administrative officials and individuals of the insular police force which the federation holds to be punishable or to have been committed in excess of their authority.

"The government holds that there is no reason to justify the appointment of such special commission. All the investigations it may be necessary to pursue concerning the acts of public officials in connection with the recent strike of the agricultural laborers will be carried out by the proper judicial or administrative officers, in whose intelligence and impartiality the Government has the fullest and most absolute confidence.

"Therefore if concrete charges under oath against any person performing public duties are preferred by you or any other member of the Free Federation to the governor the proper investigation will be ordered without delay, and if the charges are duly proved you may be assured that the guilty official will receive the punishment he deserves.

"But, in view of the frequency with which charges which have on different occasions been preferred against the agents of authority have proved to be wholly groundless, the Government has made it a rule, in order to avoid expenses and delays in the despatch of public business, not to order any investigation unless the charges preferred are supported by affidavit or by evidence proving the facts upon which said charges are based.

"Respectfully,

"R. SIACA PACHECO,

"Acting Secretary of Porto Rico.

"Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

"President Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico.

"San Juan, P. R."

FINAL PETITION.

The Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico is in full accord with the idea of presenting a sworn declaration (affidavits) on all concrete charges in its possession or it may have to bring up later against the public officers of the Government who may be responsible for the said punishable facts as well as extralimitation of authority in connection with the agricultural workers' strike in Porto Rico during the administration of its government.

But the Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico reiterates the just petition that such sworn statements and charges are to be presented in due form to a commission to be appointed by the governor and authorized by him, and which is to be composed as follows:

A district judge, a fiscal, and two associate lawyers, the latter two of which will be appointed by the Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico, who, as a commission, shall proceed in due process of the law to a full investigation, and which shall formulate, sustain to the very last resort the public charges against whoever proves to be guilty of such concrete charges and extralimitation of authority or of any other crime.

The reasons we have for insisting upon the appointment of this commission is that we are firmly convinced that in no other way can the Government obtain the absolute truth of the deplorable facts of tyranny and oppression brought about by the public officers of the Government during the strike, and that this is the most impartial course, as well as sincere equity, by means of which the parties will be favored with equal advantage in presenting their case publicly and the Government will safely ascertain the truth, all the truth, and nothing more than the truth.

Respectfully,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

President Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
Porto Rico, April 17, 1915.

MR. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

*President Free Federation of Workingmen of Porto Rico,
 San Juan, Porto Rico.*

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of April 14, 1915, in which letter you inclosed a copy of a letter from you, dated April 3, 1915, to this office, and of a letter dated April 9, 1915, from the acting secretary of Porto Rico addressed to you. In your letter of April 3rd, 1915, you state that the Free Federation of Workingmen of Porto Rico, affiliated to the American Federation of Labor, at its convention in the town of Cayey, P. R., held from March 18 to March 24, inclusive, resolved to demand of the Government that a commission consisting of a district judge, a fiscal, and two associate lawyers to be chosen by the Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico, be appointed, and that this commission, "being empowered as accuser shall proceed according to law to investigate, formulate, and uphold to the last resort the public accusation resting upon each of the members of the police force, of the judges, and of the administration in general, and against whom, in pursuance with the facts found against the accused, together with the declaration of the witnesses and affidavits, there may be found concrete charges of extra-limitation of powers, authority, or any other crime."

You also request that the president of the Free Federation of Workingmen of Porto Rico be present at this investigation for the purpose of "taking cognizance of the proceedings and doings of the commission for the effects of better ascertaining the penal result."

This letter of April 3, 1915, was replied to by the acting secretary of Porto Rico, on behalf of the acting governor of Porto Rico, in a letter dated April 9. In this letter it was stated that there was no reason to justify the appointment of such a special commission; that all the necessary investigations would be carried out by the proper public officials in the judicial and administrative branches of the Government; but that if you or any other member of the free federation should present to the governor under affidavit concrete charges against any person holding public office, an investigation would be immediately made, and if any such charges were duly proved, the guilty party would receive the proper punishment. With this reply, made on behalf of the acting governor, I fully concur; but now you have presented a further petition, in which you again insist upon the appointment of this special commission, and I wish to state to you the further reasons why I believe that such a request can not be granted.

"I do not understand clearly from your letter just what authority you wish to give this special commission which is proposed by you." If it is proposed that this commission shall be given the powers of a fiscal or committing magistrate, this course would be illegal, and if it is proposed that they shall merely act for the purpose of preliminary investigation to present charges and evidence to the proper committing magistrates, then I do not believe that it is necessary. If the free federation desires to appoint a committee or employ lawyers to investigate alleged violations of law and present charges, and the evidence upon which such charges are based to the district fiscals or other committing magistrates, there is no objection to this course being pursued, but for me "to accede to your petition for the appointment of a special commission, two of the members of which are to be appointed by the Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico, would be an admission that I do not have confidence in the judicial department of our Government, and, on the contrary, I believe that if the matters of which you complain are properly presented to the proper officers of the department of justice they will receive an impartial and fair consideration. Moreover, it would be highly improper to designate a district judge to act in any such capacity as is suggested in your request. Regular and special fiscals from the department of justice have already made several investigations in connection with the disturbances of which you speak, and it is the proper function of the prosecuting officers of the Government to make such investigations. It is, however, the duty also of every citizen having knowledge of any criminal action to present the evidence which he may have to the proper prosecuting officer; and it is only in the event that such officer fails to do his duty, after the facts have been fully presented to him, that I would feel that it was necessary to ask the attorney general to make a special investigation, and even in such cases the proper course to be pursued is to present the facts first to the attorney general.

Therefore I believe that it is unnecessary to appoint any special commission such as is suggested by you. If any public officer has acted in an illegal manner this action can be ascertained and proper punishment given without the formation of such a special commission. The proper course to be pursued by any person who believes that any public officer is guilty of any criminal action is to present the facts before the fiscal of the district, or before a municipal judge or a justice of the peace. If any such officers fail to proceed in accordance with law, where the facts show that there has been a crime committed by the accused, the matter should then be presented to the attorney general to be investigated by him. The attorney general has assured me that in any case where there is evidence that any officer of the department of justice has failed to take the proper action, after proof has been submitted to such officer that a crime has been committed, he will investigate the case thoroughly and will see that justice is done.

Respectfully,

ARTHUR YAGER,
Governor of Porto Rico.

SAN JUAN, P. R., April 24, 1915.

HON. ARTHUR YAGER,
Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I have received your communication of April 19 inst., in which you reply to the petition submitted through my agency by the last convention of the Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico requesting you to appoint a special commission with authority to practice a complete and impartial investigation of all the regretful facts occurred during the past strike of the agricultural workers.

According to your letter, you seem to be in doubt on the following points:

"That can not understand clearly just what authority we wish to give this special commission which we proposed.

"That to accede to our petition for the appointment of a special commission, two members of which are to be appointed by the Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico, be an admission that there is not confidence in the judicial department of our Government.

"That if the matters of which we complain are properly presented to the proper officers of the department of justice they will receive an impartial and fair consideration."

In answer to the three points referred to above, and in order to reaffirm the advisability of appointing a special commission, and in consideration of the arguments and reasons expressed in your letter, we again insist upon the appointing of a special commission, to be composed as follows: Of a special judge and special fiscal.

The Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico will choose two lawyers, who shall be authorized by the Government to present documents, and upon their petition they shall either summon witnesses or cause the necessary proofs to be legally produced, they shall be authorized to examine and cross-examine any and all witnesses, and they shall have the same rights as the fiscal in every particular relating to the accumulation of direct proofs and corroboration. We are not very particular about the appointment of district judge or district fiscal to serve on the above commission.

The "special commission" shall hold its sessions at Vieques, Ponce, and San Juan, and shall practice an investigation of all the charges and affidavits presented to it and in any way related with the incidents of the last strike of the country laborers of all the towns of the island, and the said commission shall give the Government an account of its investigations, with recommendations pertaining to the principles of justice and good government. The said commission shall employ a stenographer to carry on its work.

As you may see, we neither want any special authority for ourselves or for our counsels unless this be legal and duly accepted by an impartial Government and which wishes to know the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and which desires to punish public employees who have made themselves guilty of extra limitation of authority or felony in true sense of that term.

There would be no danger of your having any lack of confidence in the department of justice if the appointment of this special commission were authorized, inasmuch as the members of the same are to be appointed by the Government itself and gives the authority, and the said members exercising such authority shall do so in pursuance with the insular laws, which course has been pursued by this Government on various occasions.

Sir, since you have assumed the governorship of the island we have submitted to your consideration many a charge and affidavit and some charges not sworn to against certain policemen and judges who had been committing abuse against the workers, and none of the investigations practiced (ordered) by you have given these workers any satisfaction despite the fact that arbitrariness, humiliations, and illegal truths were inflicted against poor and helpless men and women. We have never—no; never—known any cases to be decided favorably by you in behalf of the injured workers during the whole period of your governorship.

This is perhaps largely due to the fact that the investigations as carried out (ordered) by you are of a private character, almost inquisitorial, at the police headquarters or else in offices not open to the public, as the general run of people say, among the interested parties, and the accused police and officers are on hand and meet on friendly terms, which is a system rather employed for terrorizing than protecting the victims.

On this account we meet with a remarkable case that has occurred within your administrative period, sir, in which case a fiscal of the department of justice has omitted an extraordinarily unjust opinion in submitting his report to the honorable the governor of Porto Rico, and which clearly demonstrated the kind of equality before the law upon which this conclusion is based, especially so when it was a question of one of the most bitter complaints from the gen. sec. of the Free Federation, Mr. Rafael Alonso, against a policeman charged of gross abuse on his person and others and sometime afterwards this very policeman was accused of killing a poor striker. The paragraph specially referred to is the following:

"Admitting that Policeman Quiles was not very polite with the strikers in the above-mentioned incidents, it is to be borne in mind that the conditions were extraordinary and that the police had to act arbitrarily to avoid disturbances, as it was easier to stop them before they began than afterwards. I do not give very much weight to the evidence, as the witnesses in favor of the strike would say almost anything against the police. As a matter of fact, while policeman Quiles evidently acted somewhat beyond his authority, I think the circumstances warranted his actions. Now that the strike is over, Quiles may be reprimanded."

Now, then, if an attorney (fiscal) of the department holds such an opinion, and if the said opinion is so worded without cause for the same, does not the honorable governor think that we have every reason and sufficient motives to demand the appointing of a special commission with powers to practice a public investigation and do its work in a complete, impartial, and sincere manner against all the atrocities that have been committed against the country laborers during the last strike, and in which cases it is desired our attorneys would be authorized to establish proofs as if they were a true fiscal?

Besides, you state that the department of justice has already practiced these investigations, which we take to mean that the said department has formed a proper opinion of itself. We claim that the Government and the people will never know the absolute truth of the incidents and acts of tyranny and oppression brought to bear by the public employees except through the agency of the special commission it is proposed to appoint, and in which all the parties concerned would have the same privileges of presenting their proofs without fear or reservation.

Emphasizing once again upon what we have heretofore expressed in the letter, we again desire to respectfully suggest to you the urgent necessity of the special commission for which we have petitioned you so persistently.

Respectfully, yours,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
President of the Free Federation of Workingmen of Porto Rico.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 12.

HON. SIRS: Animated with the best desire and highest patriotism, we beg you to prove all those evils denounced in the communication which was sent to the chairman of the honorable Commission on Industrial Relations, dated February 19, 1915, by the Free Federation of the Workingmen of Porto Rico, for the sole purpose of having these evils removed from the country because they are actually detrimental to the industrial pursuits of the island and because they constitute the greatest reasons that determine the condition of slavery and wretchedness now existent in Porto Rico.

For the above reasons we do begin our statement and will try to produce the necessary evidence in each case in order that the situation of the island be impartially understood, and aside from any sentiment of passion it may be asserted whether or not the working people have sufficient reasons to be continually entering protests so as to bring about a change from the present situation in which they are, and at the same time it will be demonstrated whether they ought to receive the bad treatment they are getting at the hands of the corporations and employers, this not being all, but from the Government, that should be more particularly interested than anyone in presenting the best possible solution in this connection, inasmuch as this would add great credit to the Nation and to the island as well.

When making the statement "that in our opinion there is no people on the face of the earth in which the laborers, more especially the farm hands, occupy a more unfortunate condition and are the victims of the worst sort of exploitation," we must offer for the investigation those fair testimonies and statements from persons who may be considered as most impartial, and in so doing let us quote herein some paragraphs of Mr. Walter E. Weyl, Ph. D.

"The Porto Rican laborer has the reputation of being extremely lazy, but it is probable that his reputation in this respect is somewhat worse than he deserves. It is frequently alleged by large planters that they do not pay their workmen any higher wages, because if they did the men would work a fewer number of days. It is claimed that the men who earn 50 cents a day for 6 days would not work over 4 days if the rate was raised to 75 cents a day. This assertion, which is made by the Porto Rican employers, as it was made by the English employer two centuries ago, must be taken for what it is worth, although it might be suggested that the experiment has not often been tried. What does appear to be true is that the Porto Rican is fairly constant in his employment and works with a fair degree of regularity. On many of the plantations the testimony is that workmen return with a fair degree of regularity to their work and accept all the employment offered to them. In a majority of cases, on the other hand, the failure to work regularly throughout the week is attributed to the conditions of the industry and to the fact that the employer can not use the men. In the coffee districts, for instance, large numbers of men are left unemployed at the end of each crop, and during the season there is no work for the men when it rains. It is quite the truth that when the ordinary peon earns more than usual he is likely to spend it in gambling, but it has not been demonstrated that in Porto Rico an increase in wages would mean a proportional reduction in the number of working days." (See the report of Dr. Weyl under the caption, "Labor conditions in Porto Rico," inserted in the bulletin of the Bureau of Labor, No. 61, Department of Commerce and Labor, pages 770 to 771, Nov., 1905.)

From the same report of Dr. Weyl we quote what follows:

"The amount of saving among the workmen of Porto Rico may be practically disregarded. In the first place, wages are too low to admit of any extensive saving. With the wages prevailing, especially in the coffee districts, it is more wise to spend than to save. In some parts of the island in recent years the earnings of the family have not been sufficient to maintain the workman in a state of industrial efficiency. The best investment of the meager earnings of the workman in these districts is in food and drink, and anything like saving would be unwise and almost criminal, if it were not impossible. In the sugar districts on the coast it might be possible to save small sums of money, but under present conditions the habit of the Porto Rican of not saving seems perfectly justified, in view of the narrow margin between wages and the cost of mere subsistence. Even if wages were higher, it is doubtful whether for many years to come there would be any extensive saving." (See the report of Dr. Weyl inserted in the bulletin of the Bureau of Labor, No. 61, Department of Commerce and Labor, p. 775, Nov., 1905.)

Regarding housing conditions Dr. Weyl says:

"The housing conditions in the rural districts of Porto Rico are extremely primitive. There is no necessity for the house to be warmed, since the temperature, except in the higher altitudes, is never sufficiently low to cause discomfort. The houses of the majority of rural workers are merely a framework of poles, covered with the bark of palm trees and with dried leaves, and thatched with palm leaves or a tough grass which is found all over the island. These houses are sometimes built on the ground, but more frequently they have a board floor made of palm. This floor is raised from the ground so as to permit the rain water to flow under the house, and often the house is built on a slight incline. The house invariably is one story in height, and usually consists of one large room, varying from about 10 to 20 feet square. This room, especially if it is large, is sometimes divided by a partition. There is, as a rule, no division of the sexes, since in such cases all the family live, and often work, in one of these rooms during the day and sleep in the other at night. The influence of these conditions upon the sexual impulses of adolescent children is not favorable.

"The furnishing of the house is equally simple. A hammock is indispensable, and there are, as a rule, a bench or two, a few pots or jars, but usually no chairs and no bed. The clothes are hung upon nails, and there is no such thing as a bureau or washstand. There are also no tables and no carpet or matting. The benches are often nothing but a solid log upon which the people sit. It may be stated, as a rule, that the cost of all the articles in an ordinary peon's hut is not above $10.

"Practically the only decoration ever seen consists of the colored lithographs of American advertisers, sometimes in Spanish, but usually in English. In one room visited the decoration consisted of 50 or 60 copies of a small colored lithograph issued by an American manufacturer of soap.

"In the cities the housing conditions are probably worse upon the whole than they are in the country. The inhabitants of the country have at least the advantage of fresh air. In view of the aversion of the average Porto Rican peon to currents of air, and especially the night air, the lack of completeness with which his house shuts out the air is perhaps a blessing in disguise.

"The housing conditions in the worst section of San Juan are almost indescribably bad. While a considerable reform has been effected since the American occupation, especially in the matter of sanitation, the conditions even now are extremely evil, and in some respects worse than in the worst habitations in our American cities. In a number of houses, which were visited in the course of this investigation, it was noticed that habitations which had originally been intended for two or three families had subsequently been converted into rude tenement houses. The available space was poorly utilized, the halls being wide, the buildings low, and much expensive ground partially wasted. Nevertheless, these houses, by reason of exorbitant rents, which have increased greatly during the last six or seven years, bring in as much a $200 or even $300 a month, and this money is usually sent to Spain, where, as a rule, the absentee landlord resides." (See Dr. Weyl's report, above mentioned, in pp. 789, 790, and 791.)

Dr. Weyl's report continues, as follows:

"The invasion of Porto Rico by Americans and the infusion of American ideals into the life of the people have led to some slight change in the attitude of the people toward work and toward the worker. The sons of rich plantation owners are becoming more willing to enter lucrative careers, though the professions are still unduly preferred over agriculture and business. The Americans have, moreover, tended to strengthen somewhat the position of the workingman by giving him a vote, by defining his position before the law, and by recognizing to a less extent than did the Spanish the difference between the employer and employed. Nevertheless, even at the present moment it is quite clear that the social and economic position of the Porto Rican worker is low, that he is held in small esteem, that there is a contempt for his work (a contempt not even disguised by conventional phrase), and, finally, that the economic power and the political influence of the workingman are extremely small.

"To a considerable extent the former relationship between employer and employee was conventional rather than contractual, being upon the basis of a patriarchal and more or less benevolent despotism on the part of the employer rather than a free relation entered into by a contract between approximately equal parties. Wages were fixed largely by custom and were fairly uniform in any given district for the same industry. These wages, moreover, were only partly in money, being supplemented by the grant of free lodging and often by other gifts or grants.

"The condition exists to a greater or less extent in the island at the present time, although within recent years, and especially since the agricultural strikes, the patriarchal attitude of employer to workingman is given away and is being displaced by a very different attitude based on a more purely contractual relation. The attitude of the employers at the present time is to secure labor as cheaply as possible and of the workingman to obtain all the wages which he can possibly secure." (See the same bulletin of the bureau of labor above mentioned in p. 806.)

Regarding the present tendencies, Dr. Weyl says:

"There are many reasons for not anticipating a rapid and radical improvement. In the first place, Porto Rico is essentially an agricultural country. Its natural resources are all agricultural, and it has neither the geographical position nor the resources of iron and coal to permit it ever to become a great manufacturing country. The small manufacturing industries which formerly existed on the island have tended rather to diminish than to increase as a result of the American occupation. Free trade with the United States means the importation of articles manufactured more economically upon a large scale to take the place of articles formerly manufactured by the hand or by simple tools on a small scale. While it is possible, and even probable, that a considerable industry will grow up in the making of cigars and in the canning of fruits, it seems reasonable to think that the country will remain permanently in an agricultural state.

"It is, moreover, practically inevitable, from the tendencies now observable, that a large proportion of the laboring population will belong for many decades, if not permanently, to the peon class. There is no room in the industry of the island for large numbers of skilled men. Most of the work to be performed upon the sugar, coffee, and tobacco plantations is the rudest agricultural labor, and the great mass of the population will necessarily be employed at these tasks. Conditions as they now exist tend rather to lessen the hold of the peon upon his land. The enormously increased prosperity in sugar culture, as well as the growth of larger estates and the increasing custom of grinding sugar in huge central factories, causes the real unit of production rapidly to increase. To be economically operated, a sugar mill requires the output of several thousands of acres; and while the ownership of these acres may for a considerable time remain in the hands of separate owners, the lands must be cultivated in a joint manner and practically as a single operation.

"The programme which the American people must carry out in order to live up to the theory under which the island was acquired and to improve the conditions of the laboring and other population of the island is necessarily an extensive one. If the condition of the people is ever to be raised to a standard at all comparable with that prevailing in the United States, the people must be educated and the sanitary conditions improved, civil and political rights guaranteed and extended, and the condition of the workingman amply protected by law. The American people should recognize that they owe a duty to the Porto Ricans, and that they can not permit the welfare of the population for which they have accepted responsibility to be determined by accident or by conflict of interests. The American people must, if they are to raise the standard of Porto Rican peons, continue to prosecute the work of education upon the island, no matter how severe the financial drain. It is equally essential to carry out a programme of sanitation which will guarantee to every Porto Rican infant the chance to live its allotted life.

"The power of Porto Rican peons to insist upon fair and reasonable conditions of labor is, and for decades if not for generations will continue to be, far less than that of the workmen of the United States, or of the countries of the western Europe. It is not probable, under present conditions and without the benefit of progressive education, that the peons of the country will be able to obtain more favorable terms of employment and more reasonable conditions of labor without the intervention in some way of the governmental authority. The demands of the peons for better conditions of labor will be in direct opposition to the interests of those who may insist that they are of a low type, just as their demands for education may be opposed on the ground that their work must remain unskilled.

"If, by means of education, by means of improved means of communication, by means of a free press and of assemblages and meetings and conventions and of fairs and entertainments that will bring the people together, the standard of living of the men, and especially of the women of Porto Rico, is once raised; if the demands on life made by this people become sufficiently great to prevent the population from assuming marital responsibilities with its present recklessness; if, moreover, the resources of the country are exploited more wisely and the peon himself be assured of the ownership of at least a patch of land and be taught to utilize it economically, the conditions of life and labor of the great mass of the Porto Rican population may be permanently improved. Such an improvement, however, will be difficult and slow, and will be evident only as measured by decades or generations, and not by years. If, however, the island be utilized merely or primarily as a means of providing opportunities for investment and commercial exploitation by American citizens; if the policy of educating the people be held up on account of its expense and alleged uselessness; if the standard of living of the people be not raised, the condition of Porto Rico and of the Porto Rican laboring class after one hundred or two hundred years will be no better than it was in the year 1898, when the sovereignty of Spain gave way to the dominion of the United States of America." (See Dr. Weyl's report upon labor conditions in Porto Rico inserted in bulletin No. 61 of the Bureau of Labor, Department of Commerce and Labor, November, 1905, pages 815, 819, and 820.)

Another testimony that we do consider as a fair one and which we do produce herein as an evidence to strengthen our assertions, is the statement from Hon. Samuel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, who has twice visited the island in the years 1905 and 1914, and who has had the opportunity to personally study and investigate the labor conditions of Porto Rico.

The statement from President Gompers is as follows:

"I saw men working in the sugar refineries in Porto Rico 15 and 16 hours a day for 40 cents a day.

"I saw men working on the sugar plantations cutting cane, working and hauling 15 hours a day for 40 to 45 cents wages. Several of the sugar refineries have a system of truck or company stores, or, as we labor men have designated them, "pluckme stores," where the employers pay this 40 or 45 cents a day with little checks for 15 or 16 hours' work, which checks, of course, are redeemable only at the company's store. The people have no money other than these tokens. The company store sells an inferior quality of the "necessaries" of life—and I will try to tell you a little later what are the necessities of life as they understand it—at greatly increased price over that which the same articles could be purchased for elsewhere, if the people only had the money and the right or the opportunity to make the purchase.

"As a consequence, these people, even if they had the desire to leave the employment of these companies, could not do so. Travel to another part of the island to what? Find work at something else? Impossible, even if they desire to take the chance to find work. How are they going to pay the fare for a coach or upon the railroad with this kind of money? They are as much bound to the soil as were the serfs in the old time guilds when the lords and barons held their sway.

"I have seen women and girls selecting coffee from 12 to 14 hours a day in the coffee houses for 15 and 20 cents a day. I have seen laborers receive only from 30 to 40 cents a day for 11 or 12 or more hours of labor. Riding along the road from time to time I directed the driver to stop to make an inquiry from the laborers. I often got the answer that they did not know what wages they were going to receive until they were paid.

"I have seen more idle men, more unemployed men, not idle by choice, but because they can find no work to do, in my travels in Porto Rico than I have ever seen among like numbers of people in all my life; nothing to do.

"Not only on the sugar plantations; not only in the coffee fields and mills; not only in the orange groves; not only among the cocoanut trees; not only in the fruit orchards and fields, but in every line of industry. I never saw less building construction nor less repairs going on.

"I never saw more wretched men and children in all my days. I never saw so many poorly fed men, women, and children. I never saw more children clothed only with the atmosphere and sunshine anywhere on earth, and I have seen something of this mother earth.

"In the island, so wonderfully situated, with such a balmy climate, so full of rare sunshine and brilliancy, I never saw so many hovels and shacks where the only ray of light penetrated through small doors, the rest completely obscured in darkness. There live the father, mother, and children, and sleep and eat and perform the functions of life. I have seen ten or twelve people living in just one small room; not only one, but thousands and thousands of instances. Out of town in the suburbs and along the roads most of the houses are built of stilts, and when I say a house I want you to bear in mind that I refer to shacks, the exterior dimensions about twelve by ten feet, with a height of perhaps eight at the highest point, and thatched roofs. They are warmed by the elements. In the rainy season in Porto Rico we have heard how it rains. My visit was not made during the rainy season. But notwithstanding that, there was not a day while I was there that it did not rain in torrents for an hour, and still I say that was outside of the rainy season.

"But imagine men and women and children living in these little shacks and trying to protect themselves from the rain by getting under the houses. These houses are so dilapidated that everything in the room becomes absolutely saturated with rain, and as soon as the rain is over they must go back to those rooms and eat and sleep and perform all ordinary duties of life therein.

"I saw more misery and hunger stamped on the faces of men and women and children in Porto Rico than I ever seen in all my life, and hope I may be spared from seeing the like again.

"I have been asked several times whether conditions are better or worse in the island now than they were under the Spanish rule, and I want to say this: That having seen the poverty and misery, and the absence of the possibility of modesty under such circumstances, and having seen the myriads of men that are hungered, and women and children, too, dying there of starvation, knowing that there is a constant monthly death rate of 450 to 1,000 people from anemia, in other words, hunger, starvation, I say to you, ladies and gentlemen, it matters little to me under which rule conditions were better or worse. I know that the conditions prevailing in Porto Rico to-day reflect no credit upon our country." (See the editorial of the newspaper "Justicia," dated Jan. 23, 1915. Vol. II, No. 17. Edited at San Juan, P. R.)

Another statement with which we want to cooperate in the verification of our report is that one from Mr. George Williams Perkins, president of the Cigarmakers' International Union, who also visited the island and after having personally learned about our conditions and made the necessary inquiries, is perfectly warranted when stating:

"Porto Rico has been exploited by Spain for centuries, but is now being exploited by rich Americans, corporations, and trusts just as relentlessly and just as brutally as it was under the Spanish monarchical rule. The American Tobacco Company practically owns all the available land suitable for growing tobacco. Prior to American occupation 5,900 acres of land were devoted to the cultivation of tobacco. At the present time 25,000 acres of land are devoted to the growing of tobacco. And the most of these acres are owned and controlled by the trust, the American Tobacco Company. At the time of the American occupancy and control the value of cigars exported to the United States was about $300,000 per annum. At the present time the value of the cigars sent to the United States is about $5,000,000 per annum. Just prior to American occupancy the cigarmakers working in the smaller factories received from $3 to $4 weekly in wages. At the present time cigarmakers working for the smaller factories receive from $2.50 to $3.50 as weekly wages. Just prior to the American occupancy, the cigarmakers working for the larger factories received weekly wages of from $8 to $10. At the present time the cigarmakers working for the larger factories receive from $5 to $12 in weekly wages. The trust, the American Tobacco Company, employs, in a measure, practically the same methods there that they do here. Their first move was to put in women and children under the bunch break and roll up system, and to gradually reduce wages by the old shell game of changing sizes.

"The great mass of the agricultural workers are illiterate and live in homes that beggar description. It is true that the United States has started a public-school system in Porto Rico. I personally visited several of the alleged homes in the agricultural districts, which are composed of a small one-room shack with positively no division within the shack and practically no furniture except that of the crudest and barest necessity. None of them had running water or other conveniences of any kind. They go to the nearest river or brook for what little water they use. These shacks, in which the whole family, consisting of man and wife and all the way from five to eight or ten children, are built of crude, cheap boards, with usually a thatched roof made from the bark of trees. These tenants play peek-aboo with the sun in the daytime and with the stars at night through holes through which the rain pours when the clouds weep at their misery. The houses are on stilts and frequently I saw whole families huddled with the pig, the dog, and chickens under the house in order to escape the rain. In one of these alleged homes they were actually drying tobacco on the outside as well as in the inside of the house. The homes of the city workers are some better and in a little more sanitary condition, but still years and years behind the proper sanitary conditions. Some of the workers living in the city have two or three rooms, but if they have any more than that they take boarders.

"Some idea of the manner in which these poor people are exploited is portrayed by the following: The Porto Rican Tramways, Light and Cars Company has its head office in Canada; the American Railways Company have their head office in France; and, as you all know, the Porto Rico American Tobacco Company has its head office in Wall Street, New York. The people employed by these trusts, outside of those who are organized in the International Union, receive from thirty cents a day to fifty-two cents per day in wages. I have already told you something of their homes. They live on rice, bread, and fruits, mostly wild fruit.

"The chief industries in the island are tobacco, cigars, sugar, coffee, and fruit. The best of the land is owned by a few trusts. The most of the people live in huts and receive wages from thirty to fifty-two cents per day.

"While, in my judgment, Porto Rico can never be a manufacturing country of the variety and scope of countries of the Temperate Zone, it nevertheless, under proper management and laws calculated to be beneficial to the mass of the people can enjoy a condition and standard of living which would be eminently satisfactory to the great mass, who could live in contentment and prosperity. Porto Rico is in the Tropical Zone; its lands are fertile and require little attention; no fuel and mighty little clothing is required, hence with the proper disposition of the land and the opportunity to till it in their own interests the masses would enjoy a reasonable degree of prosperity. It is a shame to permit them to be exploited for the sole benefit of a few soulless corporations and trusts located in America and other countries." (See the Olgar-Makers' Official Journal, published at Chicago, Ill. Issue of May, 1914, pages five, six, and seven.)

The foregoing statements, which, in our opinion, will offer no doubt to the men in charge of weighing our arguments, have been published by the signers, and with the sole purpose and aspiration of having for the workingmen of the island the due justice and redress to which they are entitled.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 13.

REPORTS FROM THE POLICE HEADQUARTERS PUBLISHED BY THE PRESS.

[Taken from La Democracia.]

LAST NIGHT'S FIRE.

Shortly before 11 o'clock an attempted (conato) fire broke out in the store of Messrs. R. Suarez & Co., popularly known as Canel de Panama. The fire was put out shortly afterwards by the men of the pump station.

[La Correspondencia, April 2, 1915.]

COLONY ON FIRE.

In colony known as "Vasca," at Yabucoa, a fire broke out. Some 80 cuerdas of cane were burned. From reports given out the fire was accidental.

[Union Obrera, April 5, 1915.]

TEN HOUSES BURNED AND 4 RUINED.

At 5 a. m. the bells at the fire station awoke the people, and it was evident that fire had broken out somewhere. We ran in the direction of Rosa Street and saw the house of Esteban Carduche afire. The fire spread from the first house to about nine more, almost all of which were insured. The house where the fire there originated was being repaired; we are not sure whether there was any insurance on the same, but the house next door was insured.

[The Times, May 11, 1915.]

FIRE AT CAGUAS.

On the 8th day of this month, and at night, a big fire started and burned the grandstand of the B. B. league. The police are investigating the case.

[La Correspondencia, May 8, 1915.]

FIRE AT AGUADILLA.

Early in the morning on this 5th day a big fire broke out at barrio Victoria, which destroyed two houses pertaining to Mr. Aniceto Ceide. Both were insured for $3,000 by the Commercial Union Insurance Co. and the London Assurance Co. The municipal judge and police are investigating this affair.

Reports coming from Guayama have it a big fire broke out in the cane fields of "Reunion," Josefa and Melania colonies. This took place at 4 a. m. Losses were approximately 93 cuerdas of cane.

FIRE AT ARROYO.

APRIL 15, 1915.

A big fire occurred in the cane fields of Central Machete. Losses reported to be 4 cuerdas of cane. Matter is being investigated.

[Taken from La Correspondencia, May 7, 1915.]

BURNED THROUGH CARELESSNESS.

A telegraphic dispatch from Yabucoa states a peon yesterday at the Yabucoa Central lighted a cigar which had fatal consequences. Result, 10 cuerdas of the plantation were burned.

FIRE IN A CANE FIELD.

From Lares comes the news that on the 12th, p. m., quite a serious fire took place in the cane fields of Hacienda Dolores (Guanica Centrale). About 40 cuerdas of cane were consumed. The matter is being investigated.

[From the Ponce Eagle, April 24, 1915.]

FIRE IN CANE FIELD.

Eighteen cuerdas of cane field were burned at Hacienda Barrancas pertaining to the Guanica Centrale. The Hacienda Barrancas is situated in barrio Machelo Arriba, this municipality. The police are aware of the event, and the corresponding investigation will be practiced.

[The Times, April 26, 1915.]

At barrio Machelo Arriba, Ponce jurisdiction, 18 cuerdas of sugar cane were consumed by the fire at Central Barrancas. This cane was the property of Guanica Centrale.

[La Correspondencia, April 17, 1915.]

A FIRE.

At Hacienda Dolores, in the town of Lajas, a fire broke out which burned up some 40 cuerdas of sugar cane.

FIRE.

APRIL 3, 1915.

The Guayama police report that on March 30, p. m., a fire broke out in the cane field of Central Lafayette. Result, 2 cuerdas of cane burned out.

The next morning another fire broke out in the cane fields again at Colinia Esperanza, the property of Central Machete. Then cuerdas of the plantation were destroyed.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 14.

SUMMARY.

This petition for habeas corpus was presented to the supreme court of Porto Rico on May 7, 1915, in behalf of 26 prisoners from Vieques who had been sentenced in connection with the strike by the municipal court there and who were afterwards retried for the same offenses in the Humacao district court and sentenced for a second time to imprisonment.

The request for the writ of habeas corpus briefly states as follows:

1. That all of the said petitioners are illegally deprived of their liberty.
2. That the petitioners Esteban Huertas, Santos Torres, and Aquilino de Hóyo were so deprived of their liberty by sentence imposed upon them by the Humacao district court on April 23, 1915, condemning them to two years' imprisonment each for assault and battery to the police on February 16, 1915, at 3.35 p. m., at the place known as Trianon. Vieques, when the same parties had been previously sentenced by the same very court and for the same offense, and notwithstanding that they had been sentenced also by the municipal court at Vieques to 60 days' imprisonment for the very same deed and offense; that is to say, for carrying concealed weapon, and notwithstanding further that they were retried again on April 29, 1915, by the above-mentioned court—Humacao district court—again for assault and battery and given two year each.
3. That the petitioners Francisco Encarnación, Rafael Pere, and Higinio Colon are serving sentence imposed by the Humacao district court on April 29, 1915, giving them one year each for rioting at the same place and hour mentioned above, when they had been previously tried for the same offense under the charge of carrying concealed weapon and given 60 days imprisonment each.
4. That the petitioners, Pedro Encarnación, Marcelino Melendez, Manuel Ojeda Iro, and Narciso Encarnación, are now confined by virtue of sentence imposed by the Humacao district court on April 29, 1915, giving them two years each for assault and battery to the police at the same hour and place already mentioned, when these same parties had already been tried and sentenced by the Vieques municipal court for the same offense under the charge of carrying concealed weapons.
5. That the petitioner, Derfin Arizmendi, is now confined, due to a sentence of 3 months imposed by the Humacao district court on April 28, 1915, for rioting at the same hour and place already mentioned, when the very same court had previously passed sentence of 30 days upon him for the same offense under the charge of carrying concealed weapon.
6. That the petitioners, Martin Rivera, Juan Casillas, Julio Alместica, Evaristo Camacho, Juan Becerril, Alfredo Augustin, Lucas Zelardo, Nepomuceno López, Juan Torres, Matias Ramos, Juan Velez, Julian Torres, Alfredo Isidoro, and Ramón Figueroa, are serving sentence of 3 months each for rioting, imposed by the Humacao district court on April 30, 1915, the offense being alleged to have been committed at the aforementioned hour and place, when these parties had been previously tried by the Vieques municipal court and given 30 days each for the same offense, under the charge of carrying concealed weapons.
7. That from the records it appears that there had been a previous conviction of these parties for the same offense and for the same substantial act.
8. That it is prohibited by the Constitution of the United States to prosecute and punish twice or more for the same offense.
9. That the application for the writ is not only made to the supreme court by virtue of its original jurisdiction in such case, but also for the purpose of defeating the jurisdiction of the Humacao district court in sentencing and depriving of their liberty for a second and more times the same parties that had already been tried by the proper court for equal offenses.

The application winds up by requesting that the writ of habeas corpus be granted, and it is sworn to by the attorney upon information received of reputable persons and by facts of his own knowledge.

This application was denied by the Supreme Court of Porto Rico on May 8, 1915, on the ground that lack of jurisdiction had not been shown.

Whereas a motion was presented to the same court which briefly states as follows:

It seems to the petitioners that the Supreme Court has not interpreted in the true sense the text of the application, where it is repeatedly stated that the lack of jurisdiction is due to the fact that they had been tried and sentenced for an offense committed on February 16, 1915, at the place known as Trianon at Vieques, and afterwards retried and submitted to new trial by the Humacao district court. The motion recites that the non bis in idem is a constitutional prohibition that exists in all civilized government without exception. In a country where such guaranty does not exist it is useless to provide for a limitation of prosecutions and extralimitation of power at the hand of the judiciary, and it also makes fruitless any defense against the wantonness of the judiciary power when it violates its most elementary duties. To abandon this guaranty is to resign to everything. The parties in this case can not help insisting with all the respect that it may be deemed necessary that the Constitution and due respect for the law be upheld.

The motion continues, making citation of the law and different provisions, and ends by requesting that the writ, notwithstanding the great delay already had, be granted.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 15.

PUBLIC AND PRIVATE LANDS OF PORTO RICO—WHOM ARE THEY BENEFITED WITH THEM.

We have made the statement that at the head of the organization of great enterprises there stood, and there actually stands, the sugar growers' trusts, which practically got hold of nearly all the lands available for cultivation in Porto Rico, and they even obtained some land which belongs to "the people of Porto Rico," which they carry on for their own personal benefit and without benefit of any kind to the workers of Porto Rico.

Almost as a repetition to the foregoing statement we have asserted that while the country folk lack of work and even a piece of ground on which to place their huts and devote their energies to planting their crops, corporations there are on the island which hold the land of the people of Porto Rico in just the same way as any private individuals, without as much as paying a red cent to the insular treasury, but they simply utilize vast extensions of this land for their own personal profit and have not been required to pay for this land or give them up.

The people starve for want of work, while a group of individuals and corporations are in possession of this land and all the privileges and franchises attached thereto, so as to exploit the workers all the more for an indefinite period, even without any permission from the government, and in order to state clear proofs we herewith insert some paragraphs of the last message of the honorable governor of Porto Rico to the legislature of the island.

"MESSAGE OF THE GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO TO THE EIGHTH LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY, FIRST SESSION, JANUARY 11, 1915.

"Public lands.—The public lands of Porto Rico belong to the whole people, and should be administered for the benefit of all the people of the island. That they are not now so administered is made evident by the most casual inquiry.

"Owing to inadequate and inaccurate surveys, it is impossible to ascertain the boundaries of the various tracts of public lands, or the amount of character of these lands, or where they are located. It is known and suspected that some public lands are now in possession and use of private individuals who have no right to them and no need to use them.

"It is rather vaguely estimated that there are in the whole island—[continues the Governor]—about 150,000 acres of public land. Of these lands there have been surveyed during the past ten years, or twelve years about 25,000 acres. At this rate of progress it will require at least a half century to complete these surveys. Meanwhile the lands are being trespassed upon and wasted in a manner that is entirely indefensible and without excuse."

According to the official data at the present time more than 25,000 acres of land are devoted to the growing of tobacco, and the balance of all the other cultivable land of Porto Rico is in whole controlled by the sugar trusts and owned by themselves. The people have also made the accusation that the organic act of Porto Rico is being violated in many ways and because this island has been placed under the provisions and dispositions of Congress, that is the body in more direct line to righten all the evils mentioned. On account of the great monopoly of the lands, the people of this island are economically considered like a feudal vassalage or a factory post fet only to be "worked," and the people considered as slaves depending on the sugar trusts, the tobacco trusts, and speculative schemes. It is also charged with some degree of justification besides the monopoly of the lands that another cause of our misery is that Porto Rico has been converted into trading and bartering post in which more slaves are employed, and that more than 60% of the net product of earnings made by the workingmen of this island are taken away by the trusts and corporations which well sufficiently explain why this country is drained of its wealth and which leaves the people in a wretched condition financially.

When the eighth Legislative Assembly of Porto Rico opened its first session last January, Delegate Aybar from the Mayaguez district requested of the speaker of the house to ask the commissioner of the interior to submit a report on the public lands of Porto Rico as well as the use that had been made of them up to the present.

The commissioner of the interior sent to the clerk of the house of delegates a communication explaining what disposition had been taken of those public lands, and uses to which these lands have been put may be seen from the said reports and from them may be seen also that the free use of these lands has been granted to a number of capitalists for a term of from 30 to 40 years.

The communication from the commissioner of the interior to which we refer reads as follows:

"GOVERNMENT OF PORTO RICO, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

"SIR: With reference to your letter dated 19th inst. in which Hon. J. Aybar requests information concerning the leasing of public lands, I am pleased herewith to forward a statement showing what disposition was made of all the holdings pertaining to the people of Porto Rico and which are at the present time leased, and also showing the area and relative location of the land, period when the contracts expire, and the annual income as well as the person who leased said land.

"The only lands of The People of Porto leased with the privilege of not being subject of the terms of the lease are the marshy lands of "Caño de Tiburones," with a total area of 4,200 acres adjoining in and around Arecibo and Barceloneta; they were leased to Mr. Wenceslao Borda for a period of forty years; the lands adjoining the Barrios of "Las Marias," Guayama, and Salinas, which were leased to Mr. Juan R. Balz for a period of thirty years, but the terms of this contract were never carried out because Mr. Balz left the land; and next comes another parcel of marshy land measuring 6,270.95 square meters adjoining Puerta de Tierra in San Juan City itself, but more particularly San Antonio Dock; this was leased to Mr. Harnand Behn for a period of thirty years, he obligating himself to build a bulkhead therein, to dredge the channel, and to turn the ground in a sanitation condition, all of which necessitates an expense of no less than $105,000.

"Besides the land leased as is here shown, there are other the lease of which is undergoing the due process of the law (tramitation) especially one with an area of 453.99 acres, already approved by the executive council to the Guanica Centrale, and another having 414.95 acres to Mr. George Mussenden. These are located with the municipalities of Guanica and Yauco, respectively.

"When the measurement of the land of The People of Porto Rico was carried out in these municipalities this department of the interior found out that the sugar mill "Cinco Hermanos," which belonged at the time to Mr. Alejandro Francheschi, who had leased the Guanica Centrale, was also occupying as his property the said tract of land (453.99 acres) pertaining to The People of Porto Rico; it was also ascertained that Messrs. Lluveras Brothers were holding as their own property another tract of land pertaining to The People of Porto Rico (482.64 acres); Mr. George Mussenden occupied the aforesaid tract of land (414.95 acres), while other persons occupied other smaller tracts.

"In November of 1914 this department, as is customary in cases of this kind, advised all the landholders of The People of Porto Rico in the towns of Yauco and Guanica that in order to enjoy the usufruct of the land they held they were required to make a contract with this department of the interior, all of whom expressed their willingness to have contracts drawn up, with the exception of one who claims the ownership of the land held by him.

"This office began at once to proceed to issuing contracts for the leasing of this land, the occupants thereby recognizing the fact that The People of Porto Rico is the real owner of the land.

"Respectfully yours,

"MANUEL V. DOMENECH, Commissioner.

"Mr. JOSE MUÑOZ RIVERA,

Clerk of the House of Delegates, San Juan, P. R."

The summary inclosed by the commissioner of the interior with the communication above quoted is the following:

"SUMMARY.

"In pursuance with the foregoing statement issued by the commissioner of the interior, to which he refers in the preceding letter, under the approval of the executive council the following acreage of public land has been leased:

"Number of acres leased, 10,383.46 acres. Besides total number of square meters, 172,804.33 square meters. And a number of islands and islets leased, 22 in all; extent of acreage not given. Number of houses, 7, and 5 shacks. Number of building lots (quantity of acres not given), 36 in all.

"The sums obtained by The People of Porto Rico for such leases amounts to $9,106.91 per year, which is only another way of saying that the average price paid by the occupants of the public land of Porto Rico is only $0.25 per acre yearly."

This, then, is what is being paid to The People of Porto Rico on these lands, the occupants of which are known.

Among the largest occupants are the following:

Wenceslao Borda, who pays not a red cent, 4,200 acres at Arecibo. This privilege was granted him by the Legislature of Porto Rico, and for which purpose hundreds of poor country families were ordered off this land. This privilege was granted Mr. Borda for the period of 40 years.

Mr. C. B. Battle, 121 acres in Barros for $90 per year.

Balseiro and Giorgetti, 102 acres within the urban zone of the town of Berceletoneta for $1,240 per year.

Messrs. Antonio Pacheco and Antonio Rodriguez, 255 acres at Ciales for $90 per year.

Mr. Enrique Chevallier, 502 acres at Guallanilla for $65 per year.

Mr. Ramon Gonzales, 297 acres at Isabela for $148.87 per year.

Florencio Cintron, 121 acres at Juana Diaz for $73 per year.

Behn Brothers have 6,270.95 square meters of marshy land adjoining the barrio of Puerta de Tierra, in San Juan, and pay absolutely nothing, and hold the land for 30 years at that; they expect to construct a coal shed or deposit.

So may be found the lands belonging to The People of Porto Rico.

We also adduce as another evidence in our assertion that there are capitalists now carrying farming for personal profit on the public lands of Porto Rico without paying any rent to The People of Porto Rico, or even without the consent of the same, the fact that follows:

As soon as it became known in Porto Rico that the American Federation of Labor, at its Philadelphia convention, had adopted a resolution requesting the honorable President of the United States or the American Congress to appoint a commission to investigate the economic conditions of the island and to ascertain the violations of the organic act of Porto Rico by the corporations holding a larger acreage than is required under the law and to probe what disposition has been made with these lands, from that moment irregularities began to be known as to the use that had been made of these lands, as well as the illegalities existing. And this fact may be proved from the fact that some capitalists candidly had made the statement to the same officials of the Government that for some years past they have been making illegal use of these lands. There was one capitalist who expressed himself before the Senate as follows:

"I have been making free use for many years of some 435 acres pertaining to The People of Porto Rico for the simple reason that I ignored whether these lands were mine or whether they belonged to the People of Porto Rico." These lands were some of the most fertile lands in Porto Rico. And the said gentleman continued as follows in his statement: "But as I am now convinced that these lands belong to The People of Porto Rico, I honestly desire to lease them and pay rent on same from now on."

We have mentioned this case, but this has not been the only one in Porto Rico; and the lands have been leased and not a cent has been paid by anybody for the former use of the land; and the country folk are fairly starving (dying away with hunger) for want of sufficient ground in which to plant anything, and they have not even so much room as to build a shack.

Believing these arguments to be sufficient to demonstrate to what extent the monopoly of the lands exists in Porto Rico, and the illegal use that is being made of the same, we merely stop here with the statement that the total acreage of public lands of Porto Rico in the hands of the corporations privately and individually constituted runs above the 70,000 acres mark.

(To verify the letter from the commissioner of the interior see the issue of the paper Justicia dated January 30, 1915, Vol. II, No. 18.)

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 16.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., April 15, 1914.

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Organizer, American Federation of Labor,
Box 807, San Juan, P. R.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER Enclosed you will please find copy of letter which I have just received from Hon. Jose de Diego, speaker of the house of delegates, together with copy of my reply. I want you to give the subject matter of the enclosed very serious consideration and make full reply to me so that I may have it at the earliest possible moment.

With best wishes, I am, fraternally yours,

SAML. GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

HOUSE OF DELEGATES, PUERTO RICO, SPEAKER'S ROOM,
San Juan, April 8, 1914.

Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. GOMPERS: I suppose you are already reposed of your quick and laborious campaign in Porto Rico, and I beg you to excuse me if I trouble your attention, but it is for the importance and transcendancy of the matter contained in this letter.

After you having sailed for New York, I was informed that in the meeting which you presided in the Municipal Theatre of our city, it was resolved that you should recommend to Congress in the name of the "Free Federation of Laborers of Porto Rico," the granting of the American collective citizenship to the Porto Ricans.

I thoroughly understand that such a recommendation is inspired in a noble purpose; but I can not conceal that at present the immense majority of the Porto Ricans, rendering a sincere homage to the high value of the American citizenship, desire, however, to maintain its exclusive citizenship of Porto Rico.

Any which the future of our island may be, the Porto Ricans will always feel a high esteem toward the people with which we always have been related with ties of gratitude and affection.

But it is a terrible thing for the Porto Ricans that the policy of the Government of the United States should grant us American citizenship not as a source of rights and liberties, but as a chain which will tie us forever to a perpetual colony. Read the report of the Committee of Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives, regarding the bill of Porto Rico and you will see that it takes from us all hope to constitute our country as a State of the Union, or as an independent Nation. They want to make us forever a colony; they want to apply the system of the English imperialism, inconsistent with the institutions of the United States.

Within this situation, the Unionist Party and our house of delegates, which as you know, represents the immense majority of this country, have requested the President and the Congress not to adopt a measure, which as the American collective citizenship, may prejudice the future of Porto Rico; even though we accept that the optional citizenship may be permitted, as it is provided in the bill which Mr. Shafroth introduced in the Senate, in order that those Porto Ricans who desire it, could acquire the noble title of American citizenship.

This measure of optional citizenship covers the whole matter and with it a thing, as the citizenship, which must rise voluntarily and freely from the heart, is not imposed to anybody forcedly.

Herewith I am sending you two copies of the last memorial of the house of delegates regarding this matter and under separate cover several other pamphlets on matters relating to our political régime.

But the principal subject of this letter is to present to your consideration the convenience that the branch of the American Federation of Labor of Porto Rico should not take any action in favor of any of our local parties, but in those matters which directly affect the labor problem.

Concerning the citizenship, the Unionist Party and the Republican Party are here in a frank and open struggle, and any action of the American Federation of Labor favoring the collective citizenship would be understood as a support to the Republican Party.

This matter of the local policy has mostly obstructed the progress of the Free Federation of Labor, and I am very interested in that the labor associations may obtain the greatest exit and receive the aid of all the parties.

The Unionist Party in its last convention consigned in its platform the most important problems of the laborers, and all the leaders of the party are ready to work for the emancipation and welfare of the working classes of Porto Rico.

The question of the citizenship should be postponed until the Government of the United States and the people of Porto Rico may have studied better which should be the future of our island, but meanwhile the important and urgent thing is, without affecting the citizenship, to change the present régime into a system of home rule, which may permit us to show our capacity for self-government and in which our purposes may not be obstructed or paralyzed, as it happened in the workmen's compensation bill, by a aristocratic and oligarchical house, as the executive council.

And hoping that you will give your high and illustrated attention to the matters contained in this letter, I remain,

Sincerely yours,

JOSE DE DIEGO.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR.

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 15, 1914.

Hon. JOSE DE DIEGO,

Speaker of the House of Delegates, San Juan, P. R.

MY DEAR SIR: Your favor of April the 8th has been duly received, and I assure you I appreciate your letter and its contents and have given the subject matter which you present very serious consideration. It was a great pleasure to me to meet you when in Porto Rico and to have the opportunity of listening to the excellent address you delivered on workmen's compensation and your sympathetic declarations in regard to labor.

Now as to the subject of citizenship for Porto Ricans, I shall make further inquiry into the matter. You can rest assured that whatever I may do, it will be with the object in view of what will best serve the interests of the people of Porto Rico.

Trusting that I may hear from you again at some time, with assurances of my high regard, I am,

Very truly yours,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President, American Federation of Labor.

FEDERACION LIBRE DE LOS TRABAJADORES DE PUERTO RICO

APRIL 29, 1913.

Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS,

President A. F. of L., Washington, D. C.

DEAR SR. AND BROTHER: I am in receipt of your kind letter of April 15 with which you included a copy of the letter sent to you by Hon. Jose de Diego, speaker of the house of delegates, as well as the reply you made to him, stating that you would make a further inquire concerning the question of citizenship for the Porto Ricans. You, at the same time invite me to give this matter the most serious consideration and to forward you a reply at my earliest opportunity.

The resolution approved at the convention of organized labor held in San Juan, March 31 ult., requesting "that Mr. Samuel Gompers, president of the A. F. of L., present at this convention, urge upon Congress the granting of collective citizenship for the people of Porto Rico," is but a ratification and the repeated petition which the Federacion Libre de los Trabajadores de Puerto Rico, has constantly approved, year after year at its annual meetings and presented each time in the conventions held by the A. F. of L., and favorably endorsed by such conventions at the wish of the workingmens' delegation from Porto Rico. The Federacion Libre has not only believed but still believes this petition for citizenship to be inspired by the noblest purposes, but it understands and has emphatically declared that collective American citizenship, upon being granted by Congress declares and completely defines the status of the People of Porto Rico, and it further consolidates for all time the peaceful revolution brought about by the United States Government upon its taking possession of this island in 1898, that it upset the monarchical régime, annulled military and clerical despotism and bureaucratic insolence and in their place establishes civil liberty, liberty of thought, of the press, of free speech, and association.

Collective citizenship for Porto Rico means its opportunity for complete political liberation as a people aspiring to constitute itself after a democratic form of government, thus obtaining the guarantees for the present and future, all of which will be enjoyed by the laboring masses in their development toward their social and economic welfare and social and human justice.

Mr. de Diego is unable to ascertain whether the immense majority of Porto Ricans wish to keep their Porto Rican citizenship and refuse American citizenship. Truth of the matter is that the vast majority of the people of the island stand positively by the American institutions and have constantly been asking for the right of being made American citizens.

The only persons whose attitude has changed in regard to this matter, whether on account of sentimental or other causes, are the leaders of Unionist Party and even some from the Republican Party. Mr. de Diego, like other prominent leaders, has been asking for collective citizenship for several years; they now refuse this privilege. We, the organized workingmen, are decidedly in favor of collective citizenship and have absolutely no reason to change our attitude or opinion. On the contrary, we affirm that the people of Porto Rico ought to be granted American citizenship through Congress collectively, because it is justice.

This is what we have been asking for for 16 years, even before the organization of the Republican Party on the island, and even before the Unionist Party was what it is to-day, and even before Mr. de Diego was elected speaker of the house of delegates.

Mr. de Diego puts forth as an argument that American citizenship would not be conceded as a source of rights and liberties, but as a chain which will tie us forever to a perpetual colony, but we affirm that there is only one class or kind of American citizenship in the United States, and that is the only one which Congress can grant to us. The idea of Mr. de Diego and others is that they confound American citizenship with the form of local government which Congress might make for the people of Porto Rico and this form may be more or less democratic or advanced, but which in the end can be nothing except a temporal and not a permanent form. American citizenship is permanent. As to whether we shall be recognized as a State of the Union, this is a proposition which can not be decided at this time and nobody is prepared to say what the future representatives of the American people would or would not do.

Texas, New Mexico, Arizona, Oklahoma, and other States of the Union had to wait a long time, perhaps one or two generations, before they were taken in as States. Therefore, this argument is very premature at this time and we give it absolutely no importance.

It is our opinion that the first step toward the freeing of Porto Rico is that it should be granted collective American citizenship, omitting those who do not choose to become such in just form as proposed in the inclosed bill, and which is none other than a part of the general bill of reforms reported favorably to the House by Chairman Jones at the present session of Congress.

Senator Shafroth's bill proposes individual citizenship and Mr. de Diego admits that, because he is confident, undoubtedly, that the great ignorance of the countrymen and poorest workingmen will contribute to their not adopting it. And, besides, with individual citizenship a very deep division would be established, fed, as it were, by the elements who are interested throughout the island in keeping away the people of Porto Rico from the beneficial influence of the people of the United States.

Mr. de Diego lays before you the convenience for the American Federation of Labor in Porto Rico not to meddle with politics either with one party or the other, and precisely in this matter of American citizenship, because it was understood that when we stood for collective citizenship, it was understood that we favored the Republican Party. The Federacion Libre was established before either of the parties in Porto Rico, and this petition for American citizenship is older standing than the opinions of both parties, and, besides, this is a question which is not and never can be a local proposition of party politics, but rather a national issue of the greatest importance for the entire population of the island of Porto Rico, and above all for the working classes.

We are convinced that the guarantees, rights, liberties, and progress of the working classes of Porto Rico depend largely upon the influence and power lent to it from time to time through the American Federation of Labor, by the American people and National Congress. The Unionist Party, the Republican Party, the house of delegates, and the government of the island itself have paid some attention to the demands of the workingmen, not through any self or spontaneous initiative on the part of the political leaders or representatives of the local government, but through the determination of obtaining justice by the initiative of the organized workers of Porto Rico, assisted, as it were, in a determined and powerful manner by the American Federation of Labor at Washington, and also through the influence of ideas, aspirations, and the powerful example given us every day by the laboring people of the United States, struggling daily for their rights and well-being; if the working people of Porto Rico must be sure of not being persecuted and outstripped in this country, they must be closely united with the labor army of the Nation just as is represented in the American Federation of Labor.

The secret, and not frankly expressed policy of Mr. de Diego is to ultimately arrive at a situation of independence of the people such as Cuba, Santo Domingo or Venezuela, and we cannot for obvious reasons stand for any such thing as that.

If you authorized me to participate in the public hearings that are to take place in the Senate and before the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico when the Jones bill for Porto Rico comes in approved form from the House, I would go to Washington myself at the proper time to present a statement regarding all these very important matters to Porto Rico laboring men, and I would, before all, do my best endeavor to have all demands of our fellow workers including in the new organic act under directions of yours and legislative committee.

Your story of the travel to Porto Rico has been received and read with very much interest.

With best regards, I am,
Fraternally yours,

SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
Gen. Org. A. F. of L.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., May 6, 1914.

Mr. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,

Organizer, American Federation of Labor, Box 807, San Juan, P. R.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: I have read with a great deal of interest your letter of April the 29th which has just been received. You state the Porto Rican situation clearly and forcefully. As to your suggestion to come on to Washington to appear before the Senate Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico when the Jones bill is taken up, I would say that your coming on is utterly impractical at this time, because what with the Mexican situation, the canal repeal tolls proposition, and particularly in so far as labor legislation is concerned, it is hardly probable that Congress will take any action at this session on the Porto Rican bill. You may rest assured that the legislative committee of the A. F. of L. will not neglect the matter.

With best wishes, and hoping to hear from you whenever convenient, I am,
Fraternally yours,

SAML. GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 17.

GOVERNMENT HOUSE, PORTO RICO,
Jajome Alto, October 30, 1911.

MY DEAR MR. IGLESIAS: Replying to your letter of the 28th instant, asking an expression of my opinion in regard to the granting of collective citizenship by the Congress of the United States to the people of Porto Rico, I beg to inform you that I am unreservedly in favor of such action. I believe that the granting of full citizenship of the United States to the people of this island is the paramount political consideration now pending in their behalf; that it would have a far-reaching beneficial effect upon their lives and activities; contribute more than anything else to their happiness and contentment and thus promote the progress and prosperity for their native land, which has become, through the interests of all affected, an inseparable part of the United States.

The people who await this act of justice are sympathetic, lovable, and loyal; there is nothing in their character incompatible with our national life, and their blending into it will add a note of mingled sweetness, patience, and idealism that will perhaps be a beneficial admixture with our more rugged temperament. They and their country have become a part of us and our country; they need and are entitled, from every consideration, to all of the benefits of our institutions, sentimental and otherwise, that such affiliation should bring. They came into our country, as a whole, willingly and gladly more than thirteen years ago, but no opportunity has yet been given them to become citizens without traveling fifteen hundred miles from their present residences in American territory to another part of the United States, which is of course out of the question for the mass of the people, while during that time many thousands of foreigners, with to say the least, no better qualifications than they have emigrated to the United States and individually become citizens thereof and are to-day exercising their rights as such. That this inconsistency is understood by the people of the mainland, and will be eventually reconciled, is shown by the fact that both of the principal political parties of the United States, in 1906, incorporated into their platforms clauses indicating their intention to support the granting of citizenship to the people of Porto Rico. That such action has not yet been taken is probably due to the fact that the measure has not yet been presented opportunely or in proper form to secure its passage.

The people of Porto Rico have made their desires for citizenship manifest to all men in high governmental positions who have visited the island, and practically all of such officials, including President Taft and his predecessor, President Roosevelt, have recommended to Congress that it be granted, but measures before Congress or any other legislative body for that matter, must be followed up by those at interest and their friends upon the ground to prevent their being overlooked. Trusting, therefore, that your organization, representing as it does the largest class of people in the island, who are not less interested than all other classes, will adopt such means as may be deemed proper and efficacious for procuring the early consideration of this just and wise measure by Congress, and assuring you of my full cooperation in that behalf, I am,

Very sincerely,

GEO. R. COLTON,
Governor.

HON. SANTIAGO IGLESIAS,
President Federacion Libre, de los Trabajadores de Puerto Rico,
San Juan, P. R.

IGLESIAS EXHIBIT NO. 18.

Teaching corps.	1913-14	1914-15	Decrease.	Increase.
General superintendents.....	2	3
Special supervisors.....	5	2	3
Supervising principals.....	41	41
Assistant supervising principals.....	9		9
Principal teachers.....	10	10
Teachers of English.....	150	110	40
Graded.....	795	825		30
Rural.....	1,350	1,325	25
Continuation and industrial.....	50	50
Manual training and household economics for grades.....	130		130
Music.....	25		25
Drawing.....	25		25
Special.....	30	20	10
Agriculture.....	41		41
High school.....	69	59	10
Total.....	2,733	2,445	318	30
Increase.....			30
Net loss.....			288

TRAVIESO EXHIBIT NO. 1.

Comparison of appropriations for department of education.

Appropriation.	1912-1913	1913-1914	1914-1915	1915-1916	1915-1916 savings.
Salaries and contingent expenses, office of the commissioner.....	$46,000	$75,500	$53,500	$45,450	$8,040
Salaries and contingent expenses, common schools.....	809,600	1,499,250	1,088,350	1,072,650	15,700
Textbooks and school supplies (common schools).....	67,500	135,000	90,000	50,000	40,000
Salaries and contingent expenses, high schools.....	32,740	110,350	65,635	58,845	6,790
Scholarships:
United States.....	16,000	16,000	16,000	8,250	7,750
High schools.....	8,640	8,640
Industrial school buildings and maintenance.....		125,000
Summer institutes for teachers.....	1,000	1,000
Total.....	981,480	1,970,740	1,313,485	1,235,202	78,280

¹ Includes additional appropriation of $528,250 granted by the legislature of 1913.

TRAVIESO EXHIBIT NO. 2.

SUPREME COURT OF PORTO RICO, MARSHAL'S OFFICE,

SAN JUAN, PORTO RICO, February 10, 1915.

Hon. ARTHUR YAGER,
Governor of Porto Rico, San Juan, P. R.

SIR: I have the honor to report an investigation made by me at Juncos at your request regarding the fight between the police and the strikers at the Juncos Centrale.

My opinion, after the investigation, is that not only were the police fully justified in what they did, but that they are entitled to very high praise in not hurting more of the strikers and in greater degree.

Briefly, as it seemed to me, the situation was this: The strikers of Juncos desired to march to Gurabo. From Juncos to Gurabo the carretera is the logical, best, and straightest line, and known by all to be a public road. The parade turned from this road to the Juncos Centrale with the intention of passing to Gurabo by a trail road which runs between or over the several estates between the Juncos Centrale and Gurabo. This road is variously called in different parts by the names of the adjoining estates. The sworn reason for wishing to go by this road, according to one of the directors of the labor party, was to withdraw from the fields laborers who had not as yet joined the strike.

It seems that the day before this parade the director of the Juncos Centrale. Tomás Survirana, had asked the chief of police of Juncos for police protection from these same strikers. Three policemen had been sent there with orders from the chief to protect the property of the centrale. The manager of this centrale told these policemen that this road was the private property of the centrale and that he wanted it protected, and that under no circumstances should they allow any labor parade to pass over it.

The parade, when it reached the entrance to this road, was stopped by these three policemen and informed that it could not pass over this road. A commission from the parade then went to the office to ask from the administrator of the centrale permission to pass over this road. This permission was refused. Then the parade turned back and went toward Juncos, a distance of from thirty to forty meters. Some hot-heads in the parade urged and insisted that the parade return and attempt again to pass the police. On their second return they were again stopped by the policemen who insisted that they should go away and not attempt to force a passage through the road. Near to where the strikers were stopped were the piles of firewood for the boilers. Perhaps as a means of intimidation to the three policemen who were there alone, or perhaps with the intention to use them as weapons, a number of the strikers seized these logs of wood. The directors of the labor movement busied themselves in taking the clubs from the members of the parade and by voice attempted to persuade all to drop their clubs and stones. Just at this instant the bookkeeper of the centrale, Simón Lizarribal, came running down with a revolver in his hand and pointed it at the strikers. Notwithstanding the threatening attitude of the strikers against the police, the police took time to shove this bookkeeper with his revolver in the storeroom and shut the door on him. This unfortunate interruption of the police at the moment that their attention to the strikers was most necessary and important gave a chance for the row to begin, so that after they had shut the bookkeeper in the storeroom the fight had begun, and in order to prevent the parade from marching over the road they were compelled to use force. I don't think that the strikers in marching through there had any desire to fight, and I am sure, from the action of the police, that they used every means in their power to prevent a row, and that they did their duty in the very mildest possible manner under the circumstances to give the protection to the property, for which purpose they were there. It must not be overlooked that there were but five policemen all told at this point (the Chief of Gurabo and one policeman from Gurabo arrived just as the row started and joined the other three), facing this crowd of from five hundred to one thousand men, all armed with clubs or stones, or at least the clubs and stones so closely available that they only had to be picked up. At the very beginning of the row there were very few of the strikers who had weapons in their hands.

My impression is that if it had not been for the interference of the bookkeeper with his revolver that there would have been no clash of a serious nature between the police and the strikers. It can be said in this connection that when the police were fighting the strikers the bookkeeper and other employees of the centrale were safely shut up in the storeroom and took no part in the fight.

I wish to say that I took quite a number of affidavits from all sides which I believe will sustain my conclusions in the matter. They are filed in the attorney general's office with a report which I am submitting to him regarding these same matters and one or two incidental questions which came up.

Respectfully,

S. C. BOTHWELL.

TRAVIESO EXHIBIT NO. 3.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE OF PORTO RICO,
OFFICE OF THE FISCAL,
Ponce, April 20, 1915.

HON. HOWARD L. KERN,
Attorney General, San Juan, Porto Rico.

SIR: Answering your letter dated the 18th inst., relative to the details of the riot which took place in this city on the night of March 1, 1915, I wish to inform you that Messrs. Santiago Iglesias. Santiago Carreras, Francisco Paz

Granela, Manuel Texidor, Prudencio Rivera Martinez, Maximiliano Colmbre, and Jesús Rosado were arrested that night on warrant issued by the municipal judge.

Santiago Iglesias was the orator who from the tribune incited the people and who caused the police to interfere on account of his language, the riot thereupon ensuing; Francisco Paz Granela, Manuel Texidor, and Prudencio Rivera Martinez occupied an automobile in which they had come from San Juan and from which automobile revolvers were shot off against the police, and the people were also incited. Maximiliano Colmbre was detained as a consequence of said riot, and a revolver which had been shot off shortly before was taken from him, and Jesús Rosado was also detained as a consequence of the riot and a knife was taken away from him.

There was a dead man, Juan Arroyo (a) Caballero, and another wounded, who is recovering in the "Tricoche" Hospital, whose name is Hermenegildo Robledo. The dead man, it is alleged, was killed by Insular Policeman Norberto Quiles. The investigation is now in your possession. And it was the wounded man who assaulted the chief of police of this district, Mr. Fernandez Nater and Corporal of Insular Police Ferrer with a knife when the latter went to arrest Iglesias in obedience to orders received from his chief.

The investigation against Policeman Quiles is in possession of Y. H., and I await your directions in this case and the return of said investigation, as well as the termination of the present jury trials, to present accusation for riot, misdemeanor, against the parties hereinabove mentioned and the wounded man, now convalescing, Robledo.

Inasmuch as the term to file this accusation is about to expire already, I would appreciate it if you return to me the investigation which is in your possession as soon as possible.

The accused are all enjoying liberty under bail bonds of three hundred dollars each.

Respectfully,

LIBERTAD TORRES GRAU, Fiscal.

TRAVIESO EXHIBIT NO. 4.

LIST OF CANE FIRES TAKING PLACE ON THE ISLAND OF PORTO RICO DURING THE RECENT STRIKE OF AGRICULTURAL LABORERS, COMPRISING MONTHS OF JANUARY, FEBRUARY, AND MARCH, 1915.

AGUADA.

February 23, at 8 p. m. the cane fields of the "New Corcega Central Corporation" were set afire from nineteen different parts. The police worked actively and arrested Ramón Ramírez, Fautino Morales, Felipe Alers, and Remigio Esteves. Ramón Ramírez pleaded guilty and charged the other three men with having taken part in the conspiracy. The men were taken before the district attorney and held under $10,000 bail each.

March 16, eight cuerdas of cane were set afire on this date belonging to the central "Coloso." From all appearances the fire was of an incendiary nature.

AÑASCO.

February 9, on this date the cane fields of Colonia "María," belonging to Oscar F. Bravo, were set afire. Six acres were completely destroyed. The fire appears to have been intentional.

February 15, at 10 a. m. thirty-one cuerdas of cane belonging to Colonia "Eugenia" were destroyed by fire. It was proven that this fire was intentional and strikers were suspected of committing this deed.

February 15, at about 12 p. m. six cuerdas of cane on plantation "Tres Hermanos," belong to central "Corcega," were destroyed by fire.

February 17, at about 8 p. m. a fire took place in the "Esperanza" cane plantation, belonging to the Guanica Central. One and one-half cuerdas of cane were destroyed. A public meeting was being held in the town by strikers when the fire occurred.

ARECIBO.

February 10, fires took place during the night in cane fields belonging to the "Caños" and "Cambalache" Sugar Centrals. The same were immediately smothered. There was also a fire in the "Lisas" cane plantation, belonging to M. Savala & Co., 12 acres having been destroyed.

February 17, a fire took place in the "Mercedes" cane plantation belonging to Central "Cambalache." The foreman surprised the criminal in the act and shot at him, but without wounding nor overtaking him.

February 19, the cane fields of Mr. Gandía, district of Hatillo, were also set afire. The police shot at the criminal, but the latter escaped.

February 19, at 11 a. m. fires took place in cane fields belonging to the "Caños" and "Cambalache" Sugar Centrals. The same were smothered immediately.

ARECIBO.

February 22, at 9 p. m. one-fourth cuerda of sugar cane belonging to the "Plantaje" colonia was destroyed by fire.

ARROYO.

February 25, during the night a fire took place in the cane fields of Mr. Rafael Nido. One cuerda of this product was destroyed by fire.

February 28, at daybreak a fire took place in the cane fields belonging to Mr. Fantauzzi. Slight damage was caused thereto. It was proven that the fire was of an incendiary nature.

March 5, during the night another fire took place in the cane fields of Mr. Fantauzzi. About one cuerda of this product was destroyed thereby. From all indications this fire was of a criminal nature.

March 12, about one cuerda of cane, belonging to Central "Lafayette" was destroyed by fire during the night.

March 15, on this date about one-half cuerda of cane, property of the "Lafayette" Central, was destroyed by fire.

BAYAMON.

January 24, at about 10.15 p. m. a plantation belonging to Central "Juanita" was set afire, part of same being destroyed. Antero Pizarro and Juan Pizarro were arrested and held under $1,000 bail.

January 19, at 10 p. m. a fire took place on plantation belonging to Messrs. Dávila & Co. One and one-half cuerdas of cane, valued at $300, was destroyed.

February 9, at 9.10 p. m. an attempt was made to set fire to a cane field belonging to José Barroso, of barrio "Juan Sánchez." A bottle containing kerosene oil was found on the place.

CAGUAS.

February 22, during the night a patch of cane belonging to Angel Barroso was set afire. About one cuerda was destroyed thereby. It was proven that the same was intentional.

FAJARDO.

January 1, at 7 a. m. a fire took place in the "Aguas Claras" plantation belonging to the "Fajardo Sugar Co." Slight damage was caused. On the night of this same day a half cuerda of cane belonging to the "Tolonesa" plantation (Fajardo Sugar Co.) was destroyed by fire.

January 15, at 9 p. m. nine cuerdas of cane were destroyed by fire at the "Fortuna" Colonia.

January 17, at about 3 p. m. a fire took place on the "Santa Rita" plantation belonging to the Fajardo Sugar Co.

January 18, during the night four cuerdas of cane from the "San Pedro" plantation of the Fajardo Sugar Co. were destroyed by fire.

January 21, at about 4 a. m. a fire took place on the "Santa Isidra" plantation of the Fajardo Sugar Co. and slight damage was caused thereto.

February 9, at daybreak two fires took place in the "Santa María" and "Aguas Claras" plantation of the Fajardo Sugar Co., situated in the barrio of Ceiba. Three cuerdas of cane were destroyed. The police arrested Pedro Carmona, Mercedes Filomeno, and Deniel Santos. The municipal judge held these men under $5,000 bail each.

March 15, at about 8.30 p. m. the "Santa Rita" plantation, belonging to the Fajardo Sugar Co., was set afire from different parts. About 1 acre of cane was destroyed thereby.

March 25, at 2.30 p. m. a fire broke out in the cane fields belonging to Successors of Fuente Fria. Slight damage was caused. The fire proved to be of a criminal nature.

March 26, at about 9.15 a. m. about three cuerdas of cane of the "Tolonesa" plantation, belonging to the Fajardo Sugar Co., were destroyed by fire. From all indications this fire was of an incendiary nature.

GUAYAMA.

February 21, at about 1 a. m. a patch of cane of the "Esperanza" plantation, belonging to the Central "Machete," was set afire. About two tons of cane were destroyed. Francisco Soto and Juan Montalvo were arrested and held by the district attorney under $10,000 each. Soto was a watchman of the Central in question, but appeared on the list of strikers.

March 22, at about 7.30 p. m. a fire broke out on the "Vardaguez" plantation of Central "Machete" and four cuerdas of cane were destroyed.

HUMACAO.

February 5, at 10 p. m. a fire broke out in the cane of Mr. Avelino Marquez, situated in barrio Montones de Las Piedras. A little over one cuerda of cane was destroyed. There is reason to believe that the fire in question was of a criminal nature.

February 9, at about 6 p. m. a half cuerda of cane of the "Patagonias" plantation, property of Mr. Roig, was destroyed by fire. From all indications this fire seems to have been intentional.

JUANA DIAZ.

February 21, at about 12 noon a fire took place at Central "Amelia." Some three cuerdas of cane were destroyed as a result thereof.

JUANA DIAZ.

February 22, during the night a patch of cane was set afire at Central "Ponceña." About three cuerdas of cane were destroyed. Florencio Fernández was placed under arrest as the perpetrator of this deed.

February 28, during the night a fire broke out in the cane fields of Central "Luciana" (property of the Guanica Central). About one-eighth part of a cuerda of cane was destroyed.

March 11, at about 11 p. m. a fire broke out at Central "Luciana." About one-third of a cuerda of cane was damaged.

JUNCOS.

February 9, at 9.30 p. m. Manuel Hernandez set fire to cane of the "Santa Ana" plantation, belonging to Central Juncos. Slight damage was caused thereto. Hernandez fled but was arrested the following day and held under $15,000 bail.

MAYAGUEZ.

February 9, on this date a fire broke out in one of the plantations of the Guanica Central and three cuerdas of cane were destroyed thereby.

February 16, two cuerdas of cane were destroyed by a fire at Central "Rochelais" on this date. Jorge Nadal was arrested on the same day for inciting others to destroy cane fields.

February 18, during the night a fire broke out in the middle of a patch of cane on the "Cristy" plantation, belonging to Central "Rochelais." About one cuerda of cane was destroyed. It was proven that this fire was of incendiary origin.

11220 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

MANAUBO.

February 19, during the night a fire broke out in the "Garona" plantation, belonging to Mr. Fantauzzi. Slight damage was caused thereby.

March 20, at daybreak a small amount of cane belonging to Central "Colombia" was destroyed by fire.

NAGUABO.

February 26, seven cuerdas of cane of the "Esperanza" plantation, property of the Fajardo Sugar Co., were destroyed by fire.

PONCE.

February 20, at "Barrancas," of the Guanica Central, six cuerdas of cane were destroyed by fire. Strikers Ramón del Valle and Lorenzo Nieves were arrested as suspects. Another fire broke out at about 1 p. m. at the "Estrella" plantation of Messrs. Sauri & Subirá. At this latter place twenty-two cuerdas of cane were destroyed. Strikers Marcial Cartagena and Juan J. López, suspects, were arrested.

PONCE.

February 20, at 12 p. m. a fire broke out at the "Esperanza" plantation, of the Guanica Central. Slight damage was caused thereby.

February 20, at about 3 p. m. a fire broke out at the "Estrella" plantation, belonging to Messrs. Sauri & Subirá. Slight damages caused therefrom.

February 28, at about 3 a. m. a fire broke out at the "Fortuna" plantation, which caused slight damage to the cane. Juan Figueroa was arrested on suspicion.

March 11, two fires broke out during the night at Central "Reparada." A meeting of strikers was commenced at the time the fire started. There is reason to believe the same was intentional.

RIO PIEDRAS.

January 21, at about 11 p. m. two cuerdas of cane were destroyed by a fire taking place at "San Patricio" plantation belonging to Messrs. Cerecedo, of San Juan.

SANTA ISABEL.

February 19, during the night a fire broke out at the "Cuatro Hermanos" plantation, and six cuerdas of cane were destroyed.

VEGA BAJA.

February 4, during the night three fires broke out at the "San Vicente" and "Carmen" Sugar Centrals. Some of the cane was destroyed.

February 25, at about 8 p. m. a patch of cane belonging to Mr. Francisco Jimenez was set afire in fifteen different places. Candles were found at various places.

February 28, at about 3.30 p. m. three cuerdas of cane belonging to Mr. Luis García were destroyed by fire.

VIEQUES.

January 23, at the "Leguillon" plantation, belonging to Central "Esperanza," a fire broke out in which thirty cuerdas of cane were destroyed. Alfonso Velázquez was arrested on suspicion.

February 13, at Central "Esperanza," belonging to Mr. Mourraille, a fire took place. This fire was no doubt intentional.

February 22, at 9 a. m. a patch of cane belonging to Central "Arkadia" was set afire. On investigation Rito Ayala was arrested and held under $15,000 bail.

February 24, at 10 a. m. ten cuerdas of cane, belonging to Central "Arkadia," were destroyed by fire. From all indications this fire was intentional.

YAUCO.

January 18, thirty-eight cuerdas of cane belonging to the Guanica Central were destroyed by fire.

YABUCOA.

February 20, at about 1.30 p. m., a fire broke out at Central "Mercedita." From eight to nine cuerdas of cane were destroyed. The police surprised strikers Martín Morales and Victorino Rodríguez as they came out from the place where the fire started. On seeing the police they fled, but were arrested later. Both men were taken before the municipal judge, who held them under $4,000 bail each.

February 21 a fire took place in the cane fields of Messrs. L. Martinez & Co., but the same was smothered immediately.

February 27, at 11 a. m., 20 cuerdas of cane belonging to the "Diaz & Aboy" plantation were destroyed by fire. The fire started at two different places at one time.

TRAVIESO EXHIBIT NO. 5.

MAY 12, 1915.

The honorable the GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO,

San Juan, Porto Rico.

SIR: I have the honor to enclose herewith a copy of a letter from the district fiscal of Humacao giving results of the cases against persons engaged in the Vieques riots which were appealed to the district court of Humacao from the municipal court of Vieques. You will note from this letter that the fiscal states that he entered into a stipulation with the attorney for the various accused as to the facts, and that the court sentenced those persons in regard to whom the stipulation was entered into to three months in jail in each case.

I am enclosing a copy of this stipulation and a copy of my letter dated May 6, 1915, to the fiscal of Humacao in connection with this stipulation; also a table of the cases tried in the district court of Humacao in connection with the same matter, with the names of the accused, the crimes of which they are accused, and the result of the trial in each case.

Respectfully,

Attorney General.

Casos de Vieques, Abril de 1915.

CORTE DE DISTRITO DE HUMACAO, P. R.

No. del acusado.	Nombres de los acusados.	Acometimiento y agresión a sotero moreira.	Acometimiento y agresión a sergio brignonl.	Motin campo.	Motin pueblo.	Portar armas.
1	Pedro Encarnación.....	2 años.	Absuelto.	$200 90d.
2	Esteban Huertas.....	2 "	2 años.	"	" "
3	Santos Torres.....	2 "	2 "	"	" "
4	Aquillino del Hoyo.....	2 "	2 "	"	" "	Sobrese.
5	Narciso Encarnación.....	2 "	"	" "
6	Vernancio Cabrera.....	Absuelto.	"	" "
7	Benito Ojeda.....	Sobreseldo.
8	Marcelino Meléndez.....	2 años.	Absuelto.
9	Manuel Ojeda 1°.....	2 años.	"	Sobrese.
10	Delfin Arizmendez.....	3 meses.	$30 30d.
11	Francisco Encarnación.....	1 año.	$200 90d.
12	Rafael Pérez.....	1 "
13	Higinio Colón.....	1 "	$200 90d.
14	Manuel Cristián.....	1 "	Sobrese.
15	Martín Cruz.....	Absuelto.
16	Evaristo Camacho.....	3 meses.	Sobrese.
17	Pilar González.....	Absuelto.	$30 30d
18	Ventura Cruz.....	"
19	Alejandro García.....	"	$200 90d.
20	Juan Mercado.....	3 meses.
21	Ambrosio Carrasquillo.....	3 "	Sobrese.
22	Carmen de la Cruz.....	3 "	"
23	Sixto Cabrera.....	Absuelto.	$200 90d.
24	Miguel García.....	Sobrese.	" "
25	Simplicio Cardona.....	3 meses.	Sobrese.
26	Julio Alméstica.....	3 "
27	Miguel Hernández.....	3 "
28	Martín Rivera.....	3 "	$200 90d.

11222 REPORT OF COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

Casos de Vieques, Abril de 1915—Continued.

CORTE DE DISTRITO DE HUMACAO, P. R.—Continued.

No. del acusado.	Nombres de los acusados.	Acometimiento y agresión a sotero moreira.	Acometimiento y agresión a sargio brignoni.	Motin campo.	Motin pueblo.	Portar armas.
29	Juan Gautier.....			3 meses.
30	Gregorio Jaime.....			3 "
31	Celerino Monell.....			3 "
32	Antonio Rivera.....			3 "
33	Manuel Batali.....			3 "
34	Aniceto Serrano.....			3 "
35	Antolino Ramos.....			3 "
36	Marcelino Garcia.....			3 "
37	Aniceto Rodriguez.....			3 "	Sobrese.
38	Cruz González.....			3 "
39	Juan Becerril.....			3 "
40	Alfredo Augustin.....			3 "
41	Leonardo Morales.....			3 "
42	Diego Camancho.....			3 "
43	Lucas Belardo.....			3 "
44	Quintín Becerril.....			3 "
45	José Rosado.....			3 "
46	Nepomuceno López.....			3 "
47	Juan Torres.....			3 "
48	Rufino Velázquez.....			3 "
49	Gabriel Nieves.....			Sobrese.
50	Francisco Corsino.....			3 meses.
51	Celestino Sanes.....			3 "
52	Matias Ramos.....			3 "
53	Julián Tapia.....			Sobrese.
54	Juan Casillas.....			3 meses.	$200 90d.
55	Juan Vélez.....			3 "
56	Manuel Ojeda.....			3 "
57	Vicente González.....			3 "	Sobrese.
58	Julián Torres.....			3 "
59	Alfredo Isidoro.....			3 "
60	Ramón Figueroa.....			3 "
61	Emilio García.....				Absuelto.	$50 60d.
62	Gumersindo Rojas.....				Sobrese.
63	José María Samuel.....				"
64	Marcelino Meléndez.....				$200 90d.
65	José García.....				Sobrese.
66	Alejandro García Félix.....				"
67	Basilio Meléndez.....				"
68	Daniel Rodríguez.....				$200 90d.
69	Eugenio Morales.....				"
70	Antonio Rivera.....				Sobrese.
71	Luis González.....				"
72	Matias Ramos.....				$200 90d.
73	Lorenzo Huertas.....				"

RESUMEN.

Acometimiento y agresión:
Condenados.....		7
Absueltos.....		1
Sobreseídos.....		1
Total.....
Motin campo:
Condenados.....		43
Absueltos.....		13
Sobreseídos.....		3
Total.....		59
Motin pueblo:
Condenados.....		18
Absueltos.....		1
Sobreseídos.....		15
Total.....		34
Portar armas:
Condenados.....		3
Sobreseídos.....		1
Total.....		4

TRAVIESO EXHIBIT NO. 6.

SAN JUAN, February 20, 1913.

To the fiscals, the alcaldes, and the district chiefs of police of Porto Rico:

The proclamation which I have to-day addressed to the people of Porto Rico will show you clearly the attitude of the Government throughout the serious situation existing to-day in this island. It is of absolute necessity that disorder, fire, and riot should cease immediately, and that absolute quietness be re-established. The parades of laborers armed with machetes, clubs, and other arms must be strictly prohibited, and the machete shall only be used as an instrument of labor when the laborers are about their daily occupation. Meetings at which orators incite the audium and discredit of anybody shall be suppressed and when riot and disorder is provoked.

The peaceful laborer and everyone who desires to engage in his daily occupation shall be protected, and it shall be prevented at all cost and by means of force, if necessary, that the freedom of the peaceful citizen to work and not to join the strike be abridged.

In cases of riot and disorder the leaders and the authors who by their word or by their actions lead the unconscious masses of the people to execute acts of violence and disorder shall be severely punished.

Every authority has the absolute support of the Government to compel the faithful and energetic execution of the law; and absolute neutrality shall be observed in the conflicts between capital and labor, and both shall be protected when within the law, but if any of said elements violate the law they shall be severely punished and the Government is ready not to allow the rights of the laborer to peacefully strike and to demand in a peaceful manner an increase of his salary, either by remaining at home without working or by persuading the employers by word of mouth to increase his salary, to be used as an instrument and as a means to incite the people to commit acts of violence and force to obtain an increase in salary which can not be obtained peacefully.

The Government expects everyone of you to do your duty, and those you will receive the absolute support of the authorities.

ARTHUR YAGER,
Governor of Porto Rico.

TRAVIESO EXHIBIT NO. 7.

[Government House, Porto Rico.]

FEBRUARY 25, 1915.

In accordance with my verbal instructions to you, and in order that you may understand clearly how to exercise your control over the meetings and parades of the striking laborers outside the urban zones, which by my letter of the 20th instant were placed under your control, inasmuch as such meetings are not generally regulated by municipal ordinances, I desire to make the following explanatory statement in writing:

It was not my intention that you should suppress peaceful meetings of the laborers who may gather at some certain point on the public roads or in the barrios for the purpose of discussing in an orderly manner their grievances. So long as these meetings are peaceful and orderly in their spirit and attitude, and so long as the speakers discuss the grievances of the working people within the limits of the law, I desire that you shall not in any way interfere with them.

Noisy and threatening parades of large bodies of workmen for the purpose of intimidating peaceful laborers, or parades which cause or tend to cause the setting of fires in the cane fields or disorder among the people, should be prohibited. This, of course, will not prevent the peaceful use of the roads by the laborers or others who desire to assemble at any point for the purpose of holding a peaceful meeting.

This letter must not be construed as in any manner modifying or withdrawing any part of my proclamation or letter of the 20th instant, but simply as explaining the manner in which you are to execute some of the instructions of the letter.

Respectfully,

ARTHUR YAGER, Governor.

The CHIEF OF INSULAR POLICE,
San Juan, Porto Rico.

TRAVIESO EXHIBIT NO. 8.

[Department of Justice of Porto Rico, office of the attorney general, San Juan.]

MARCH 25, 1915.

The honorable the GOVERNOR OF PORTO RICO,
San Juan, P. R.

SIR: I have the honor to submit to you herewith a translation of the report of Fiscal Torres Grau upon the present status of the investigation of the riot in Ponce which occurred as a result of the recent strike.

Yours, respectfully,

HOWARD L. KERN,
Attorney General.

[Department of Justice of Porto Rico, office of the fiscal, Ponce.]

MARCH 24, 1915.

HON. HOWARD L. KERN,
Attorney General, San Juan.

SIR: In accordance with our telephone conversation of yesterday, I am to-day reporting regarding the particulars of the riot which occurred in this city as a result of the agricultural strike.

My first intention was to present an accusation as quickly as possible before the district court, as a means of avoiding future contingencies, but since the House of Delegates acted in this case, and taking into consideration that the said strike ceased completely, I expected that your honor would send me the record of the house with instructions.

In the course of the investigation of the events there are several declarations which I am forwarding to your honor, as some liability arises therefrom for an officer of the insular police.

According to the declarations which are in my hands, it appears that the labor leader Mr. Santiago Iglesias comported himself in an illegal manner while addressing his hearers, his speech being one of threats, irony, and contempt for the different officials of the Government, for which reason the chief of the insular police of this district, Mr. Fernandez Nater, ordered him to descend from the stump. At this juncture a man armed with a taper file attacked Corp. Ferrer, who was going to execute the orders of his chief, and when the latter saw this he was compelled to come to the aid of his subordinate. Immediately confusion ensued, and shots were fired indiscriminately by the police and by the civilians, the man who attacked the corporal and the captain being wounded and being now an inmate of the Tricoche Hospital, where he is recovering from his wounds.

Now, according to the declarations which I attach, it appears that later on, and when the riot had been subdued, a policeman attacked from behind a man who was retiring and without justification shot at this man, thereby causing his death.

This was what gave rise to the investigation made by the House of Delegates and was one of the principal reasons for withholding presentation of an accusation by me, as public opinion indiscriminately pronounces itself against this policeman.

Inasmuch as he is an employee of the people of Porto Rico—that is, an insular policeman—in accordance with section 64 of the political code, I forward said declarations so that your honor, upon examination thereof, may decide whether I should continue the investigation against said policeman, giving him an opportunity to be present and defend himself, and when said investigation is complete, that it be forwarded to your honor that you may decide what might be most proper in the interests of justice.

Respectfully,

LIBERTAD TORRES GRAU, Fiscal.

INDEX OF SUBJECTS.

[The references in roman are to volume and those in arabic to page.]

- Agriculture, seasonal labor problem in..... V, 4911-5027
- American Federation of Labor, the Socialist Party, and the Industrial Workers of the World..... II, 1441-1579
- Apprenticeship..... II, 1801-1903; III, 2929-2982
- Arbitration and mediation of industrial disputes..... II, 1905-1961
- Asiatics, smuggling of..... VII, 6001-6344
- Black Hills, industrial conditions and relations in gold-mining operations..... IV, 3537-3679
- Building trades of New York City..... II, 1581-1799
- Butte, Mont., mining conditions and industrial relations..... IV, 3681-4095
- California, unemployment in..... V, 5029-5085
- Centralization of industrial control and operation of philanthropic foundations..... VIII, 7427-7759
- Chicago, Ill.:
Industrial conditions and relations..... IV, 3173-3457
Stockyards employees, life and labor conditions of..... IV, 3459-3531
- Child-labor laws, administration..... II, 1801-1903; III, 2929-2982
- Cloak, suit, and waist industry..... II, 1025-1161
- Coal miners' strike, Colorado..... VII, 6345-6990;
VIII, 6991-7425, 7761-8013; IX, 8015-8480
- Collective bargaining..... I, 399-761
San Francisco..... VI, 5169-5401
- Colorado:
Coal miners' strike.. VII, 6345-6990; VIII, 6991-7425, 7761-8013; IX, 8015-8480
Rockefeller interests in..... IX, 8481-8948
- Commercial telegraph companies..... X, 9291-9541
- Compensation, industrial accident..... VI, 5403-5420
- Conditions of employment of waiters and cooks..... IV, 3533
- Conditions of labor on Pennsylvania Railroad..... XI, 10067-10449
- Construction camps, labor conditions in..... VI, 5087-5168
- Cooks, conditions of employment..... IV, 3533
- Cooperative plan of the Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co..... III, 2731-2816
- Department stores of New York City..... III, 2213-2410
- Dock workers of New York City..... III, 2051-2212
- Efficiency systems and labor..... I, 763-1024
- Employment offices and unemployment..... II, 1163-1440
- Final report of United States Commission on Industrial Relations (see special table of contents, pp. 7-8)..... I, 5-269
- Glass and pottery industries..... III, 2983-3032
- Gold-mining operations at Lead and Black Hills, S. Dak., industrial conditions and relations..... IV, 3537-3679
- Harriman Railroad system strike..... X, 9697-10066
- Industrial accident compensation..... VI, 5403-5420
- Industrial arbitration..... II, 1905-1961
- Industrial conditions and relations:
Butte, Mont..... IV, 3681-4095
Chicago..... IV, 3173-3457
Lead and Black Hills, S. Dak..... IV, 3537-3679
Paterson, N. J..... III, 2411-2645
Philadelphia..... III, 2647-2730
Portland, Oreg..... V, 4573-4770
San Francisco..... VI, 5421-5472
Seattle, Wash..... V, 4097-4571
- Industrial control, centralization of..... VIII, 7427-7759, 7761-8013; IX, 8015-8480
- Industrial education..... II, 1801-1903; III, 2929-2982

- Industrial Workers of the World, the American Federation of Labor, and the Socialist Party..... II, 1441-1579
- Labor and efficiency systems..... I, 763-1024
- Labor and the law..... XI, 10451-10928
- Labor conditions in construction camps..... VI, 5087-5168
- Labor problem in agriculture, seasonal..... V, 4911-5027
- Land question in the Southwest..... IX, 8949-9056; X, 9057-9290
- Law and labor..... XI, 10451-10928
- Lead, S. Dak., industrial conditions and relations in gold-mining operations at..... IV, 3537-3679
- Life and labor conditions of Chicago stockyards employees..... IV, 3459-3531
- Los Angeles, Cal., open and closed shop controversy..... VI, 5485-5999
- Mediation and arbitration of industrial disputes..... II, 1905-1961
- Men's garment trades of New York City..... II, 1963-2049
- Metal trades of Philadelphia..... III, 2817-2927
- Mining conditions and industrial relations at Butte, Mont..... IV, 3681-4095
- New York City:
- Building trades..... II, 1581-1799
 - Department stores..... III, 2213-2410
 - Dock workers..... III, 2051-2212
 - Men's garment trades..... II, 1963-2049
- Open and closed shop controversy:
- Los Angeles..... VI, 5485-5999
 - Stockton..... V, 4771-4909
- Painters' strike in San Francisco..... VI, 5473-5484
- Paterson, N. J., industrial conditions and relations..... III, 2411-2645
- Pennsylvania, State police..... XI, 10929-11025
- Pennsylvania Railroad, conditions of labor..... XI, 10067-10449
- Philadelphia, Pa.:
- General industrial relations and conditions..... III, 2647-2730
 - Metal trades..... III, 2817-2927
 - Textile industry..... IV, 3033-3090
 - Women's garment industry..... IV, 3091-3171
- Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co., cooperative plan..... III, 2731-2816
- Philanthropic foundations, operation of... VIII, 7427-7759, 7761-8013; IX, 8015-8480
- Portland, Oreg., general industrial conditions and relations..... V, 4573-4770
- Porto Rico, labor conditions..... XI, 11027-11224
- Pottery and glass industries..... III, 2983-3032
- Pullman Co., employees..... X, 9543-9695
- Report of United States Commission on Industrial Relations (see special table of contents, pp. 7-8)..... I, 5-269
- Rockefeller interests in Colorado..... IX, 8481-8948
- San Francisco, Cal.:
- Collective bargaining..... VI, 5169-5401
 - General industrial relations and conditions..... VI, 5421-5472
 - Painters' strike..... VI, 5473-5484
- Seasonal labor problem in agriculture..... V, 4911-5027
- Seattle, Wash., industrial relations and remedies..... V, 4097-4571
- Smuggling of Asiatics..... VII, 6001-6344
- Socialist Party, the Industrial Workers of the World, and the American Federation of Labor..... II, 1441-1579
- Southwest, land question in..... IX, 8949-9056; X, 9057-9290
- State mediation and arbitration of industrial disputes..... II, 1905-1961
- Stockton, Cal., open and closed shop controversy..... V, 4771-4909
- Suit, cloak, and waist industry..... II, 1025-1161
- Telegraph companies..... X, 9291-9541
- Textile industry in Philadelphia..... IV, 3033-3090
- Trade agreements in collective bargaining..... I, 399-761
- San Francisco..... VI, 5169-5401
- Unemployment and employment offices..... II, 1163-1440
- Unemployment in California..... V, 5029-5085
- Waist, cloak, and suit industry..... II, 1025-1161
- Waiters, conditions of employment..... IV, 3533
- Women's garment industry of Philadelphia..... IV, 3091-3171
- Workmen's compensation..... VI, 5403-5420

INDEX OF WITNESSES.

[The references in roman are to volume and those in arabic to page.]

A.

- Abbott, Miss Grace, director, Immigrants' Protective League..... IV, 3391, 3453
- Abelson, Paul, clerk, board of grievances for manufacturers, New York. II, 1073, 1157
- Adelphia College, Claude E. Stevens, formerly head of commercial department..... VII, 6193
- Ainsworth, Frank H., president, Federation of Federal Civil Service Employees, and inspector in charge, United States Immigration Service, San Francisco..... V, 5077, 5079; VII, 6291
- Alger, George W., lawyer, New York City..... XI, 10897
- Alifas, N. P., president, district No. 44, International Association of Machinists. I, 940
- Allen, Dr. William H., former director, Bureau of Municipal Research of New York..... VIII, 7895; IX, 8327, 8462
- Allentown Labor Herald, David Williams, editor and manager..... XI, 10942
- Alliance Employment Bureau, New York, Mrs. P. J. O'Connell..... II, 1323
- Alpine, John R., general president, United Association of Plumbers and Steam Fitters of the United States and Canada..... II, 1710, 1711
- Altman, B., & Co., Leslie Graff, executive position..... III, 2344, 2347, 2402
- Altoona, Pa., Samuel M. Hoyer, former mayor..... XI, 10199
- Alvord, Prof. Charles H., superintendent of farms, Coleman-Fulton Pasture Co., Portland, Tex., and formerly head of agricultural department, Texas Agricultural College..... X, 9214
- Amalgamated Association of Street Car Men:
- Fitzgerald, William B., member, general executive board..... III, 2793, 2796
- Kirrane, Thomas J., secretary, division 477..... III, 2757
- Pratt, C. O., former chairman, international executive board.... III, 2780, 2815
- Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workers of North America, Dennis Lane, general organizer..... IV, 3516
- Amdur, Max, business agent, Cloak and Skirtmakers' Union of Philadelphia..... IV, 3134, 3158
- American Anti-boycott Association:
- Davenport, Daniel, general counsel..... XI, 10645, 10704, 10711
- Merritt, Walter Gordon, associate counsel..... II, 1622
- American Association for Labor Legislation, John B. Andrews, secretary..... I, 319
- American Association of Free Public Employment Offices, F. C. Croxton, president..... I, 357, 392
- American Bar Association, Stephen S. Gregory, former president..... XI, 10534
- American Clothing Manufacturers' Association, New York, Max Friedman, president..... II, 1983, 1985
- American Federation of Labor:
- Berres, A. J., secretary-treasurer, metal-trades department..... I, 899
- Correspondence relating to situation in Porto Rico..... XI, 11164
- Dale, J. B., organizer..... V, 4835, 4972
- Frayne, Hugh, general organizer..... II, 1780
- Gompers, Samuel, president..... I, 718, 738; II, 1443, 1492, 1534, 1573; VIII, 7638, 7748; XI, 10852
- Iglesias, Santiago, organizer in Porto Rico..... XI, 11042, 11086, 11089, 11142, 11181-11215
- Spencer, W. J., building-trades department..... I, 659
- Wharton, A. O., president, railway employees' department... X, 9759, 9765, 9966
- Williams, Thomas J., president, building-trades department..... I, 675
- American Hawaiian Steamship Co., Thomas Petersen, foreman, American Hawaiian Steamship Co. pier..... III, 2171
- American Smelting & Refining Co., Daniel Guggenheim, director... VIII, 7559, 7746
- Ammons, Hon. Elias M., governor of Colorado..... VII, 6407; VIII, 7167, 7415

Anaconda Copper Mining Co.:

- Daly, William B., general superintendent of mines..... IV, 3796
 Evans, L. O., chief counsel..... IV, 3805, 3985, 3983
 Gillie, John, manager of mines..... IV, 3741, 3982
 Kelley, C. F., vice president and managing director. IV, 3683, 3711, 3859, 3867-3982
 Mathewson, E. P., manager, Washoe Reduction Works..... IV, 3790
 Murphy, Dennis, miner..... IV, 3736
 Anaconda Mill and Smeltermen's Union, J. B. Rankin, president..... IV, 3786
 Anchor Mill Exhibit..... II, 1900
 Andreani, F. M., in charge immigration office and legal bureau, Italian department of immigration, San Francisco..... VI, 5114, 5120, 5152
 Andrews, John B., secretary, American Association for Labor Legislation... I, 319
 Armour, J. Ogden, president, Armour & Co..... IV, 3486
Armour & Co.:
 Armour, J. Ogden, president..... IV, 3486
 O'Hern, John E., general superintendent, Armour plants... IV, 3498, 3513, 3525
 Arnold, R. H., member, Southern California Mill Owners' Association..... VI, 5863
 Arnona, Paul, business agent, United Brotherhood of Tailors, New York.... II, 2031
 Ash, William C., principal, Philadelphia Trade School..... III, 2942
 Associated Charities of Pottstown, Pa., Miss Mary Oakley Hay, general secretary..... III, 2138, 2146
 Associated Charities of San Francisco, Harry R. Bogart, financial secretary. V, 5066
 Atterbury, W. W., vice president, the Pennsylvania Railroad, Philadelphia..... XI, 10127, 10426
 Atwood, Mrs. S. J., proprietor, Atwood's Employment Agency, New York..... II, 1252, 1375
 Atwood's Employment Agency, New York, Mrs. S. J. Atwood, proprietor..... II, 1252, 1375
 Aubray, S. P., telegrapher, Chicago..... X, 9433
 Ault, E. B., editor and manager, Seattle Union Record..... V, 4185, 4190
 Austin, Prof. Charles B., division of public welfare, extension department, University of Texas..... X, 9077
 Auston, J. R. T., president, Order of Railroad Telegraphers, Dispatchers, Agents, and Signalmen, Philadelphia..... XI, 10252, 10434, 10435
 Averill, A. H., president, Chamber of Commerce, Portland, Oreg..... V, 4589, 4737

B.

- Babson, Roger W., economist and publicist, Wellesley Hills, Mass..... VIII, 7455
 Back, Seid, jr. See Gain, Seid.
 Baining, Henry C., truck builder, Chicago..... X, 9908
 Baker, Fred L., president and general manager, Baker Iron Works..... VI, 5566, 5571, 5782, 5934
 Baker, Dr. S. Josephine, director, division of child hygiene, New York Department of Health..... II, 1814
 Baker Iron Works, Fred L. Baker, president and general manager..... VI, 5566, 5571, 5782, 5934
Baldwin Locomotive Works:
 Johnson, Alba B., president..... III, 2819, 2862, 2870, 2923
 Sykes, John P., general superintendent..... III, 2869
 Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, Benjamin John Jones, chief, employment bureau..... II, 1264, 1389
 Banfield, M. C., vice president, Employers' Association of the Pacific Coast.. V, 4643
 Banigan, Leon F., reporter, Paterson Evening News..... III, 2626
 Banks, Miss Nora K., assistant, Presbyterian Chinese Home..... VII, 6330
 Bannard, Otto T., president, National Employment Exchange, New York.. II, 1272
 Barba, William P., manager, Midvale Steel Co..... III, 2850, 2871
 Barker, Tom, secretary, Los Angeles County Building Trades Council..... VI, 5589
 Barnes, Charles B., investigator, Commission on Industrial Relations..... III, 2196
 Barrett, Edward G., telegrapher, Downers Grove, Ill..... X, 9359
 Barth, Carl G., consulting engineer, Philadelphia..... I, 886
 Basford, George M., member, advisory board, School of Industrial Arts of Mount Vernon, N. Y..... II, 1852, 1895
 Beck, J. D., member, Wisconsin Industrial Commission..... I, 278
 Becks, Miss Gertrude, director, welfare department, National Civic Federation..... III, 2215
 Beirne, Edward, business agent, Plumbers' Union, Los Angeles..... VI, 5657

- Bell, George H., commissioner of licenses of city of New York..... II, 1198
 Bell, George L., attorney, California Commission of Immigration and Housing..... V, 4979, 4992
 Bell, R. W., former employee, Pullman Co..... X, 9599, 9601, 9694
 Bell, R. W., general superintendent of motive power, Illinois Central Railroad..... X, 9834, 10041
 Belmont, August, banker, New York City..... VIII, 7546
 Benedict, Mrs. Crystal Eastman, industrial investigator, writer, lawyer, New York City..... XI, 10780
 Bent, Edward T., member executive board, Illinois Coal Operators' Association..... IV, 3259, 3446, 3447
 Bentley, R. I., general manager, California Fruit Cannery Association, San Francisco..... V, 4913
 Berglund, Dr. Abraham, assistant professor of economics, University of Washington..... V, 4393, 4412
 Bernstein, Morris, manufacturer ladies' cloaks and suits..... IV, 3093
 Berres, A. J., secretary-treasurer, metal-trades department, American Federation of Labor..... I, 899
 Berry, George L., president, International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union..... I, 620
 Berwind, Edward J., president, Berwind-White Coal Co., and other coal companies, New York City..... VIII, 7579, 7587, 7747
 Berwind-White Coal Co., Edward J. Berwind, president..... VIII, 7579, 7587, 7747
 Bigelow, Charles A., carpet layer..... III, 2295
 Billings, George B., United States commissioner of immigration, Boston..... VII, 6020, 6039
 Bills, John C., jr., in charge of insular bureau of labor, San Juan, P. R..... XI, 11092
 Bird, C. G., president, Merchants, Manufacturers, and Employers' Association..... V, 4809
 Bisno, Abe, chairman, educational committee, and former general manager, Cloak Makers' Union, New York..... I, 579; II, 1135
 Blacksmiths and Helpers, International Brotherhood of:
 Kline, J. W., president..... X, 9879, 9954
 Tobin, John M., international vice president..... III, 2835
 Blankenburg, Rudolph, mayor of Philadelphia..... III, 2698, 2729
 Blatchly, Charles K., superintendent employment application bureau, New York..... II, 1165
 Blethen, Col. Alden J., president, Seattle Times..... V, 4224, 4409
 Blood, James H., director, Northern Coal & Coke Co., Denver..... VIII, 7219
 Bloomfield, Meyer, director, Vocational Bureau of Boston..... I, 390
 Bloomingdale, Hiram C., member of firm of Bloomingdale Bros..... III, 2263, 2407
 Bloomingdale Bros.:
 Bloomingdale, Hiram C., member of firm..... III, 2263, 2407
 Schwartz, S. Nicholas, former employee..... III, 2320
 Board of arbitration in the cloak, suit, and skirt industry, New York, Dr. Henry Moskowitz, clerk..... II, 1145
 Board of grievances in the cloak, suit, and skirt industry, New York:
 Abelson, Paul, clerk for manufacturers..... II, 1073, 1157
 Zucker, Henry, deputy clerk for garment workers..... II, 1070
 Bogart, Harry R., financial secretary, Associated Charities of San Francisco... V, 5066
 Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders, Brotherhood of, David Napier, business agent..... III, 2916
 Bonfilio, N., member, Southern California Laundry Club..... VI, 5673
 Bonham, Raphael P., inspector, United States Immigration Service, Portland, Oreg..... VII, 6140, 6146
 Bonheim, A., merchant and banker, Sacramento..... V, 5072
 Boot and Shoe Workers' Union, John F. Tobin, president..... I, 810
 Born, J. T., former machinist, Pennsylvania Railroad..... XI, 10262
 Boston Placement Bureau, Mrs. Helen W. Rodgers, director..... II, 1328
 Boston Vocational Bureau, Meyer Bloomfield, director..... I, 390
 Bottle and Vial Manufacturers, National Association of, George W. Yost, president..... III, 3027
 Boughton, Lieut. Col. Edward J., Colorado National Guard, Denver..... VII, 6360, 6387, 6835
 Bourke, John T., Chicago, former Pullman conductor..... X, 9633, 9681
 Bowers, L. M., member advisory staff of John D. Rockefeller, sr., Binghamton, N. Y..... IX, 8730, 8764

- Boyd, James H., ex-chairman, Employers' Liability Commission of Ohio... I, 370
- Brake, Edwin V., deputy labor commissioner of Colorado..... VIII, 7232, 7417
- Brandeis, Louis D., counselor at law, Boston..... I, 991; VIII, 7657
- Breen, John, grievance officer, Tapestry Carpet Workers of Philadelphia. IV, 3042, 3051
- Bressler, David N., general manager, Industrial Removal Office, New York City..... II, 1213, 1363
- Brewster, James H., acting professor of law, University of Colorado. VII, 6632, 6653, 6727
- Brewster, W. H., St. Louis, Pullman conductor..... X, 9655
- Bricklayers, Masons, and Plasterers' Union of America, Joseph P. Duffy, third vice president..... V, 4858
- Bricklayers' Union, No. 34, New York, Edward Dunn, financial secretary... II, 1767, 1769
- Bridge and Structural Ironworkers, International Association of, C. F. Massey, organizer..... II, 1703
- Briggs, O. P., ex-president, National Founders' Association..... I, 456, 550
- Brinton, Jasper Y., president, Pennsylvania Child Labor Association..... III, 2955
- Britton, John A., vice president and general manager, Pacific Gas & Electric Co..... VI, 5423
- Broadway Department Store, Los Angeles, Arthur Letts, proprietor. VI, 5698, 5702, 5955
- Brooks, Belvidere, vice president, Western Union Telegraph Co., New York..... X, 9332, 9512
- Brooks, Judge M. M., lawyer and farmer, Greenville, Tex..... X, 9205
- Brooks, W. E., coal miner, Hastings, Colo..... VIII, 7130
- Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers, International:
Kline, J. W., president..... X, 9879, 9954
Tobin, John M., international vice president..... III, 2835
- Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders, David Napier, business agent..... III, 2916
- Brotherhood of Federated Railway Employees:
Pierce, W. H., organizer..... XI, 10154, 10162, 10269, 10288
Smith, P. L., and others..... XI, 10287
- Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, William Park, general chairman... XI, 10274
- Brotherhood of Operating Potters, Frank H. Hutchins, first national vice president..... III, 2994
- Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paper Hangers, John J. Collins, president, New York District Council, No. 99..... II, 1741
- Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen:
Huber, H. B., general grievance committee..... XI, 10284
Lee, W. G., president..... XI, 10281
Liebau, Charles, member, Lodge No. 673, Harrisburg, Pa..... XI, 10288
Patrick, W. H., secretary, Keystone Lodge, No. 42, Harrisburg, Pa.... XI, 10283
Robinson, M. T., Pennsylvania State legislative board..... XI, 10283
Rowand, G. B., chairman, Pennsylvania State legislative board..... XI, 10283
Sheely, R. B., secretary, Lodge No. 673, Harrisburg, Pa..... XI, 10287
- Brotherhood of Railway Carmen, J. S. McCreery, general vice president. X, 9815, 9825
- Brown, Edward F., vice president, International Child Welfare League, New York..... II, 1883, 1897
- Brown, J. G., president, International Union of Timber Workers.. V, 4207, 4217, 4511
- Brown Knitting Co., W. Park Moore, manager and treasurer..... IV, 3060
- Bruce, J. L., general manager, Butte & Superior Mining Co..... IV, 3799
- Bryson, H. W., general manager, F. O. Engstrum Co..... VI, 5595
- Buckingham, W. J., Los Angeles, Cal..... VI, 5900
- Building Construction and Employers' Association, Chicago, E. M. Craig, secretary..... IV, 3356
- Building Trades Council, Chicago, Simon O'Donnell, chairman..... IV, 3347
- Building Trades Council, Portland, Oreg., Benjamin Osborne, president... V, 4712
- Building Trades Council, Stockton, Cal., J. T. Woods, president..... V, 4819
- Building Trades Council of California, P. H. McCarthy, president..... VI, 5189, 5483
- Building Trades Council of Los Angeles County, Tom Barker, secretary... VI, 5589
- Building Trades Employers' Association, New York:
Donnelly, Samuel B., secretary..... II, 1770
Eidlitz, Otto M., chairman..... II, 1583
Norman, C. G., former chairman board of governors..... II, 1672
- Building Trades Employers' Association, San Francisco, Grant Fee, president..... VI, 5171, 5310, 5322, 5375
- Burchard, T. H., president, Oregon State Federation of Labor and Central Labor Council of Portland..... V, 4623

Bureau of Municipal Research, New York:

- Allen, Dr. William H., former director..... VIII, 7895; IX, 8327, 8462
 Cleveland, Frederick A., director..... IX, 8310
 Cutting, R. Fulton, president..... VIII, 7934; IX, 8452
 Burton, R. W., business representative, Molders' Union, San Francisco.... VI, 5233
 Burton, Walter W., Chicago, former Pullman porter..... X, 9621
 Busch, Right Rev. Joseph F., Bishop of Lead, Rapid City..... IV, 3588
 Bush Terminal, Frederick William Hersey, manager of docks and cargoes,
 Pier 3..... III, 2090, 2182
 Butler, L. W., secretary-treasurer, the Central Labor Council, Los Angeles..... VI, 5665, 5955
 Butte, Mont.:
 Horst, Dr. C. H., Butte city health officer..... IV, 3845
 Smith, Clarence A., president of Butte city council..... IV, 3723
 Sullivan, Dan, superintendent of streets..... IV, 3761
 Butte & Superior Mining Co., J. L. Bruce, general manager..... IV, 3799 Buzzell, J. W., secretary and business agent, Metal Trades Council, Los Angeles..... VI, 5581
 Byrd, Rev. J. W., pastor, Grace Methodist Church South, Stockton, Cal.... V, 4892

C.

- Caldwell, Frank C., president, H. W. Caldwell & Son Co., engineers, founders, and machinists..... IV, 3437
 Caldwell, H. W., & Son Co., Frank C. Caldwell, president..... IV, 3437
 California:
 Bell, George L., attorney, California Commission of Immigration and Housing..... V, 4979, 4992
 Cross, Dr. Ira B., secretary, Industrial Accident Commission of California VI, 5412
 Edson, Mrs. Katherine Philips, special agent and commissioner, California Industrial Welfare Commission..... VI, 5682
 Lyon, H. H., assistant deputy labor commissioner and former State senator..... VI, 5833, 5839, 5973
 McLaughlin, John P., California State labor commissioner..... V, 5052, 5055
 Parker, Dr. Carleton H., executive secretary, California State Commission of Immigration and Housing..... V, 4932
 California Building Trades' Council, P. H. McCarthy, president..... VI, 5189, 5483
 California Fruit Cannery Association, R. I. Bentley, general manager..... V, 4913
 California Moline Plow Co., Franklin H. Kennedy, manager..... V, 4862
 California State Federation of Labor:
 Dale, J. B., organizer..... V, 4835
 Scharrenberg, Paul, secretary-treasurer..... V, 5040
 California University. See University of California.
 Cameron, W. H., secretary, National Council of Safety..... I, 307
 Campbell, John A., president, Trenton Potteries Co., Trenton, N. J. III, 2985
 Campbell, John George, storekeeper, Pier 60, White Star Line..... III, 2133
 Campbell, R. W., chairman, central safety committee, Illinois Steel Co.,
 Chicago..... I, 294
 Canada, W. L. Mackenzie King, former minister of labor..... I, 713, 732
 Carlin, W. H., attorney..... V, 4982
 Carlson, Hon. George A., governor-elect of Colorado..... VII, 6458, 6462
 Carlton, Newcomb, president, Western Union Telegraph Co., New York. X, 9293, 9471
 Carmen's Association of America, John H. Collins, president..... III, 2767
 Carnegie, Andrew, New York City..... IX, 8286
 Carnegie Peace Foundation, Dr. Charles W. Eliot, member..... VIII, 7964
 Carpenter, Edward W., former manager, National Employment Exchange,
 New York..... II, 1222
 Carpenter, Thomas E., with Barnard Gloekler & Co., kitchen and butchers' supplies, Pittsburgh, Pa..... II, 1737
 Carpenters and Joiners of America, United Brotherhood of:
 Johannsen, Anton, general organizer..... V, 4790, 4802; XI, 10667, 10686
 Rice, John, general organizer..... II, 1639, 1644
 Carpenters' District Council, Los Angeles, C. R. Gore, business agent. VI, 5631, 5640
 Carpenters' Union, Chicago, John A. Metz, president..... IV, 3359
 Carpenters' Union, New York, Alexander Kelso, business agent..... II, 1676, 1678
 Carpenters' Union, Portland, Oreg., B. W. Sleeman, business agent..... V, 4627

- Carroll, T. W., division traffic superintendent, Western Union Telegraph Co., Chicago..... X, 9396
- Carroll, Timothy, longshoreman..... III, 2102
- Central Council of Social Agencies, Seattle:
- Lane, Warren D., member, committee on unemployment..... V, 4374
- Strong, Dr. Sydney, president..... V, 4395, 4556, 4557
- Central Labor Council, Los Angeles:
- Butler, L. W., secretary-treasurer..... VI, 5665, 5955
- Timmons, J. E., president..... VI, 5624
- Central Labor Council, Portland, Oreg., T. H. Burchard, president..... V, 4623
- Chadney, William H., inspector, United States Immigration Service, Monterey, Cal..... VII, 6339
- Chamberlain, W. E., manager, Hamburger's Department Store..... VI, 5711, 5968
- Chase, Adj. Gen. John, Colorado National Guard..... VII, 6825, 6851; VIII, 7331
- Chase National Bank, New York City, A. Barton Hepburn, chairman, board of directors..... IX, 8245
- Chenery, C. T., investigator, United States Commission on Industrial Relations..... XI, 10274, 10437
- Chicago Building Trades Council, Simon O'Donnell, chairman..... IV, 3347
- Chicago Federation of Labor, John Fitzpatrick, president..... IV, 3280
- Chicago Tuberculosis Institute, Dr. Theodore B. Sachs, president..... IV, 3397, 3454
- Chicago University settlement, Chicago, Miss Mary E. McDowell, head resident..... IV, 3328
- Child Labor Committee, National:
- Lovejoy, Owen R., general secretary..... II, 1842
- McKelway, A. J., secretary for the Southern States..... XI, 10493, 10861, 10903
- Child Welfare League, International:
- Brown, Edward F., vice president..... II, 1883, 1897
- Watson, Miss Elizabeth C., special investigator..... II, 1887, 1899
- Children's Cloak and Reefer Makers' Association, New York, Morris G. Leader, manager..... II, 1056
- Chin Jack, Chinese interpreter, United States Immigration Service, San Francisco..... VII, 6335
- Chinese Six Companies:
- Fong, M. Q., secretary..... VII, 6321
- McNab, John L., counsel..... VII, 6312
- Church Temperance Society of the United States, Miss Hannah K. Graham, general secretary..... III, 2143, 2200
- Cigar Makers' International Union, George W. Perkins, president and secretary..... IV, 3440
- Civic Federation, National:
- Beeks, Miss Gertrude, director, welfare department..... III, 2215
- Hammond, John Hays, chairman, industrial economic department... VIII, 7987
- Civil Service Employees, Federal, Federation of, F. H. Ainsworth, president..... V, 5077, 5079
- Clark, David, editor, Southern Textile Bulletin, Charlotte, N. C..... XI, 10837, 10923-10928
- Clark, Mrs. Marion K., chief investigator, bureau of industries and immigration, New York..... II, 1191, 1193
- Clark, Judge Walter, chief justice, supreme court of North Carolina... XI, 10453, 10903
- Cleland, Alexander, secretary, joint committee on prison reform, New York... II, 1337
- Cleveland, Frederick A., director, Bureau of Municipal Research, New York City..... IX, 8310
- Cleveland Foundation, Frederick H. Goff, originator..... IX, 8104
- Cleveland Trust Co., Frederick H. Goff, president..... IX, 8104
- Cloak and Skirt Makers' Union, New York:
- Bisno, Abe, chairman educational committee and former general manager..... I, 579; II, 1135
- Hillman, Sidney, president..... I, 566
- Hourwich, Dr. Isaac A., chief clerk and counsel..... II, 1094, 1147
- Perlstein, Meyer, secretary, joint board..... II, 1053
- Cloak and Skirt Makers' Union, Philadelphia, Max Amdur, business agent..... IV, 3134, 3158
- Cloak Operators' Union, Local No. 1, New York, Perez Cotler, recording secretary..... II, 1047
- Cloak, suit, and skirt and the dress and waist industry, joint board of sanitary control, New York, Dr. George M. Price, director..... III, 2693

- Cloak, suit, and skirt industry board of arbitration, New York, Dr. Henry Moskowitz, clerk..... II, 1145
- Cloak, suit, and skirt industry board of grievances, New York:
 Abelson, Paul, clerk for manufacturers..... II, 1073, 1157
 Zucker, Henry, deputy clerk for garment workers..... II, 1070
- Cloak, Suit, and Skirt Manufacturers' Protective Association, New York:
 Cohen, Julius Henry, counsel..... I, 575, 587; II, 1112, 1124
 Rosenfeld, L. E., president..... II, 1079
- Clothing Trades' Bureau of Sanitation and Information, New York, Meyer Schoenfeld, advisor..... II, 2022
- Clough, Dr. F. E., first assistant surgeon, Homestake Mining Co. hospital. IV, 3614, 3669
- Coast Seamen's Journal, Paul Scharrenberg, editor..... V, 5040
- Coggins, J. P., manager, Postal Telegraph Co., San Francisco..... VII, 6230
- Cohen, Julius Henry, counsel, Cloak Manufacturers' Association and Dress and Waist Manufacturers' Association, New York..... I, 575, 587; II, 1112, 1124
- Coleman-Fulton Pasture Co., Prof. Charles H. Alvord, superintendent of farms..... X, 9214
- Colletti, Umberto M., general manager, Society for Italian Immigrants, New York..... II, 1244
- Collins, John H., president, Carmen's Association of America..... III, 2767
- Collins, John J., president, New York District Council, No. 99, Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paper Hangers..... II, 1741
- Colorado:
 Ammons, Hon. Elias M., governor..... VII, 6407; VIII, 7167, 7415
 Boughton, Lieut. Col. Edward J., Colorado National Guard.. VII, 6360, 6387, 6835
 Brake, Edwin V., deputy labor commissioner..... VIII, 7232, 7417
 Carlson, Hon. George A., governor-elect..... VII, 6458, 6462
 Chase, Adj. Gen. John, Colorado National Guard.... VII, 6825, 6851; VIII, 7331
 Dalrymple, James, State coal-mine inspector..... VII, 6462; VIII, 7241
 Danks, Maj. Wm. C., Colorado National Guard..... VII, 6823
 Farrar, Hon. Fred, attorney general..... VIII, 7171
 Garwood, Capt. Harold G., Colorado National Guard..... VII, 6803
 Linderfelt, Lieut. Karl E., Colorado National Guard.. VII, 6866, 6886; VIII, 7208
 Robinson, Senator Helen Ring, member Colorado State Senate from Denver..... VIII, 7209, 7218
 Van Cise, Capt. Philip S., Colorado National Guard.. VII, 6805; VIII, 7311, 7324
- Colorado & Southern Ry.:
 Farber, Harry C., agent, Ludlow, Colo..... VII, 6858
 Low, M. G., pump man, Ludlow, Colo..... VII, 6850, 6852
 McQuarrie, John, special agent..... VII, 6780
- Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.:
 Gaddis, Rev. Eugene S., former superintendent of welfare work..... IX, 8483, 8761, 8860, 8903
 Northcutt, Jesse G., attorney..... VIII, 7135, 7181, 7402
 Weitzel, E. H., manager, fuel department..... VII, 6727; VIII, 7252-7265
 Welborn, J. F., president..... VII, 6545, 6549, 6606, 6668; VIII, 7115, 7245, 7252
- Colorado University. See University of Colorado.
- Columbia Fishermen's Union, H. M. Lorntsen, secretary..... V, 4634, 4763
- Columbia River Protective Union, H. M. Lorntsen, secretary..... V, 4634, 4763
- Columbia University:
 Devine, Edward T..... I, 358
 Kirchwey, Dr. George W., formerly dean Columbia Law School..... IX, 8215
 Seager, Henry R., professor of political economy..... XI, 10558, 10563
- Comerford, Frank, attorney, Illinois Central system federation, Harriman Lines Federation, and railway employees' department, Chicago..... X, 9927, 9938, 9993-10041
- Commercial Telegraphers' Union of America:
 Konenkamp, Sylvester J., president..... X, 9308, 9384, 9472, 9486-9512
 Russell, Wesley, international secretary-treasurer.. X, 9458, 9468, 9481, 9539, 9540
 Shrimpton, B. F., secretary-treasurer, New York local..... X, 9422, 9530
- Commonwealth Edison Co., Samuel Insull, president..... IV, 3307
- Conlon, P. J., vice president, International Association of Machinists..... I, 873
- Constantine, Earl, manager, Employers' Association of Washington..... V, 4136, 4501, 4504, 4507
- Consumers' League, New York City, Miss Nellie Swartz, executive secretary..... III, 2370

- Contessa, Michel Angelo, business agent, Stonemasons' Labor Union, New York..... II, 1759
- Continental Commercial Bank, Chicago, George M. Reynolds, president.... IV, 3366
- Contra Costa County, Cal., A. B. McKenzie, district attorney..... V, 4994
- Cooke, James W., treasurer, John W. Ferguson Co., building construction.. III, 2607
- Cooke, Morris Llewellyn, director, department of public works, Philadelphia..... III, 2674, 2717, 2720, 2722
- Cooks' Union, Chicago, Fred Ebeling, financial and business secretary..... IV, 3535
- Cooney, Neil, manager, Grays Harbor Commercial Co..... V, 4271, 4288, 4513, 4514
- Cooper Union, New York, Dr. C. R. Richards, director..... II, 1803
- Corporation Schools, National Association of, Arthur Williams, president.... II, 1872
- Costigan, Edward P., counsel, United Mine Workers of America, Denver.. VIII, 7203; IX, 8113, 8126, 8128
- Cotler, Perez, recording secretary, Local No. 1, Garment Operators' Union, New York..... II, 1047
- Council of Jewish Women, Mrs. Mary Waxman, investigator and social worker..... III, 2275
- Cowell, Hervey S., principal, Cushing Academy, Ashburnham, Mass ... VII, 6003
- Craig, E. M., secretary, Building Construction and Employers' Association. IV, 3356
- Craig, John, shipbuilder, Long Beach, Cal..... VI, 5603
- Cramp Shipbuilding Co., Harry W. Hand, vice president and general manager..... III, 2884
- Crane, Edward A., architect, Philadelphia..... I, 681
- Crawford, Charles C., former employee of Gimbel Bros..... III, 2281
- Creighton, G. W., general superintendent, the Pennsylvania Railroad, Altoona XI, 10211, 10214, 10240, 10430, 10431, 10432
- Crenshaw, Thomas A., St. Louis, Pullman porter..... X, 9644
- Cross, Dr. Ira B., assistant professor of economics, University of California, and secretary, Industrial Accident Commission of California..... VI, 5412
- Croxton, F. C., president, American Association of Free Public Employment Offices..... I, 357, 392
- Cullen, Judge Edgar M., former chief judge, court of appeals, State of New York..... XI, 10465
- Cunard Line, R. G. Palfery, assistant superintendent, Cunard piers III, 2134
- Cunningham, J. E. B., special deputy attorney general, State of Pennsylvania..... XI, 10964, 11001
- Curtis, W. W., president, Rapson Coal Mining Co., Colorado Springs..... VII, 6533; VIII, 7243
- Cushing Academy, Hervey S. Cowell, principal VII, 6003
- Cut Stone Contractors' Association, National, Henry Struble, secretary..... I, 665
- Cutting, R. Fulton, president, New York Trades School; president, Bureau of Municipal Research, New York City..... VIII, 7934; IX, 8452
- Cyphers, Harry A., lawyer, South Bethlehem, Pa..... XI, 10612, 10917

D.

- Daggett, Floyd L., chairman, Industrial Insurance Commission, State of Washington..... V, 4349, 4405
- Dale, J. B., organizer, American Federation of Labor and California State Federation of Labor..... V, 4835, 4972
- D'Allessandro, Dominick, international president, Hod Carriers', Building and Common Laborers' Union II, 1755
- Dalrymple, James, State coal-mine inspector of Colorado..... VII, 6462; VIII, 7241
- Daly, George, former messenger, Western Union Telegraph Co., Chicago ... X, 9418
- Daly, William B., general superintendent of mines, Anaconda Copper Mining Co..... IV, 3796
- Daniels, F. B., representing the Pullman Co X, 9662
- Danks, Maj. Wm. C., Colorado National Guard..... VII, 6823
- Darrow, Clarence S., lawyer, Chicago..... XI, 10769, 10784
- Dauphin County, Pa., John P. Guyer, clerk for directors of the poor.. XI, 10260, 10276
- Davenport, Daniel, general counsel, American Antiboycott Association, Bridgeport, Conn..... XI, 10645, 10704, 10711
- Davis, John, lawyer, Dallas, Tex..... X, 9161
- Davis, William T., farmer, Coleman County, Tex..... X, 9119, 9244
- Davis-Daly Co., Dan Shovlin, miner..... IV, 3772

- De Bruler, Ellis, formerly United States commissioner of immigration, Seattle..... VII, 6167
 Deegan, Frank, secretary, Plumbers' Union, Local 480, New York..... II, 1728
 Deibler, F. S., associate professor of economics, Northwestern University... IV, 3333
 Delaney, Dennis, longshoreman..... III, 2164
 Dennett, H. W., member International Typographical Union..... VI, 5769
 Devine, Edward T., Columbia University..... I, 358
 Dickinson, E. C., grain dealer..... V, 4864
 Distler, Rudolph, formerly a lumber-camp laborer..... V, 4377, 4548
 Dodge, James M., chairman, Link Belt Co., Philadelphia..... I, 862
 Dodson, John & James (Inc.), Arthur Spencer, managing director..... IV, 3052
 Doherty, Henry, jr., silk manufacturer..... III, 2432
 Dominiske, Mrs. Margaret, coal miner's wife, Ludlow, Colo..... IX, 8183
 Donnelley, T. E., printing, publishing, binding and engraving... IV, 3418, 3422, 3457
 Donnelly, Samuel B., secretary, Building Trades Employers' Association of New York..... II, 1770
 Doyle, Edward L., district secretary-treasurer, United Mine Workers, Denver..... VII, 6925, 6961; VIII, 6993, 7217, 7334, 7343, 7344
 Drennan, Henry, coal miner and representative of the United Mine Workers of America..... IV, 3821
 Dress and Waist Manufacturers' Protective Association, New York, Julius Henry Cohen, counsel..... I, 575, 587; II, 1112, 1124
 Drew, Walter, counsel and executive officer, National Erectors' Association, New York..... XI, 10731, 10760, 10834, 10919, 10920
 Duffy, Joseph P., third vice president, Bricklayers, Masons, and Plasterers' Union of America..... V, 4858
 Duncan, James, president, Granite Cutters' International Association of America..... I, 965
 Dunn, Edward, financial secretary, Bricklayers' Union No. 34, New York.. II, 1767, 1769
 Dunn, Michael, prosecuting attorney of Passaic County, N. J..... III, 2544
 Dutcher, Miss Elizabeth, chairman, Committee on outdoor meeting, Retail Clerks' Union..... III, 2392, 2403, 2405
 Dyche, John A., general secretary-treasurer, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union..... II, 1038, 1045, 1121
 Dyers and Mercerizers' Union, Philadelphia, Arthur McDonnell, president..... IV, 3064, 3086

E.

- Ebeling, Fred, financial and business secretary, Cooks' Union..... IV, 3535
 Edinger, Fred S., first vice president and general manager, Shattuck-Edinger Co., San Francisco..... VI, 5146, 5161
 Edsell, Harry, assistant commissioner immigration service, San Francisco..... VII, 6278, 6344
 Edson, Mrs. Katherine Philips, special agent and commissioner, California Industrial Welfare Commission..... VI, 5682
 Egan, Martin, International Mercantile Marine Co..... IX, 8374
 Eidlitz, Otto M., general contractor and chairman of the Building Trades Employers' Association, New York..... I, 644; II, 1583
 Eisenberg, William, general tailor, New York..... II, 1994
 Eliot, Dr. Charles W., member, General Board of Education, Rockefeller Foundation, Carnegie Peace Foundation, Cambridge, Mass..... VIII, 7964
 Emerson, Clarence E., telegrapher, Chicago..... X, 9440
 Emerson, Harrington, standard of practice and efficiency engineer..... I, 822, 1021
 Emery, James A., counsel, National Association of Manufacturers..... I, 724, 745; XI, 10815, 10835
 Employers' Association of Chicago, Dudley Taylor, general counsel.... IV, 3224, 3227
 Employers' Association of Portland, W. C. Francis, manager..... V, 4726
 Employers' Association of the State of Washington:
 Constantine, Earl, manager..... V, 4136, 4501, 4504, 4507
 Skinner, George N., president..... V, 4157
 Employers' Associations of the Pacific Coast, Federation of:
 Banfield, M. O., vice president..... V, 4643
 Gibson, J. Bruce, president..... V, 4326, 4516
 Employers' strike committee, Stockton, Cal., Chris. Totten, chairman V, 4845, 4904
 Employment Agents' Protective Association, New York, Richard G. Wahrburg, president..... II, 1177

- Employment Agents' Protective Association, United, New York, Charles O'Connor Irwin, president..... II, 1183
- Employment application bureau, New York, Charles K. Blatchly, superintendent..... II, 1165
- Employment Exchange, National:
 Bannard, Otto T., president..... II, 1272
 Carpenter, Edward W., former manager..... II, 1222
- Engstrum, F. O., Co., H. W. Bryson, general manager..... VI, 5595
- Erectors' Association, National, Walter Drew, counsel and executive officer... XI, 10731, 10760, 10834, 10919, 10920
- Erie Railroad, James E. March, formerly employment agent..... II, 1342, 1387
- Ernst, A. B., member, Industrial Insurance Commission, State of Washington. V, 4369
- Ettor, Joseph J., national organizer, Industrial Workers of the World..... II, 1549
- Eva, Sam J., United Engineering Works..... VI, 5268
- Evans, L. O., chief counsel, Anaconda Copper Mining Co..... IV, 3805, 3985, 3988

F.

- Falzone, Mrs. Concentina, home worker, New York..... II, 2041
- Farber, Harry C., agent, Colorado & Southern Ry., Ludlow, Colo..... VII, 6858
- Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of Texas, W. D. Lewis, president..... X, 9228
- Farmers' Protective Association of Oklahoma, E. J. Giddings, general counsel..... X, 9095, 9254, 9255, 9259
- Farr, Jefferson B., sheriff, Huerfano County, Colo..... VII, 6790; VIII, 7303
- Farrar, Hon. Fred, attorney general of Colorado..... VIII, 7171
- Federal Civil Service Employees, Federation of, F. H. Ainsworth, president..... V, 5077, 5079
- Federated Railway Employees, Brotherhood of:
 Pierce, W. H., organizer..... XI, 10154, 10162, 10269, 10288
 Smith, P. L., and others..... XI, 10287
- Federation of Employers' Associations of the Pacific Coast:
 Banfield, M. C., vice president..... V, 4643
 Gibson, J. Bruce, president..... V, 4326, 4516
- Federation of Federal Civil Service Employees, F. H. Ainsworth, president..... V, 5077, 5079
- Fee, Grant, president, Building Trades Employers' Association, San Francisco..... VI, 5171, 5310, 5322, 5375
- Ferguson, Hon. James E., governor of Texas..... IX, 8956
- Ferguson, John W., engineering and building contractor..... III, 2578
- Ferguson, John W., Co., James W. Cooke, treasurer..... III, 2607
- Ferris, William T., president, Hosiery Workers' Local 696..... IV, 3078, 3088
- Field, Marshall, & Co., John G. Shedd, president..... IV, 3371
- Finlay, Albert W., chairman, executive committee, United Typothetæ of America..... I, 609
- Fitch, John A., industrial editor, "The Survey"..... I, 334
- Fitzgerald, William B., member general executive board, Amalgamated Association..... III, 2793, 2796
- Fitzpatrick, John, president, Chicago Federation of Labor..... IV, 3280
- Flores, Emelio, secretary, Mexican Protective Association, San Antonio, Tex. X, 9200
- Folwell Bro. & Co., Mitchell Stead..... IV, 3073, 3090
- Fong, M. Q., president, Republic Drug Co., San Francisco, and secretary, Chinese Six Companies..... VII, 6321
- Ford, Henry, president, Ford Motor Co., Detroit, Mich..... VIII, 7626
- Ford Motor Co., Henry Ford, president..... VIII, 7626
- Fortune, Murtha, gangway man..... III, 2155
- Founders and Employers' Association, Los Angeles, William B. Hoswell... VI, 5864
- Founders' Association, National, O. P. Briggs, ex-president..... I, 456, 550
- Fowler, Edward J., president, Pacific Foundry Co., San Francisco.... VI, 5410, 5419
- Francis, Charles, president, Printers' League of America..... I, 683
- Francis, J. H., superintendent of schools, Los Angeles, Cal..... VI, 5784
- Francis, W. C., manager, Employers' Association of Portland..... V, 4726
- Frank & Dugan, Moses H. Straus, manager..... III, 2488
- Franklin, Joseph B., organizer, International Longshoremen's Association.. III, 2176
- Franklin Printing Trades Association, J. D. Roantree, secretary..... VI, 5283
- Frayne, Hugh, general organizer American Federation of Labor, New York. II, 1780
- Frazee, John C., director, vocational education and guidance, Philadelphia.. III, 2968

Free Federation of Workingmen of Porto Rico:

- Iglesias, Santiago, president..... XI, 11042, 11086, 11089, 11142, 11181-11215
 Resolutions on economic conditions of Porto Rico..... XI, 11161
 Free Speech League, Theodore Schroeder, attorney..... XI, 10840, 10866
 Freudenthal, C., secretary, Steel and Masonry Construction Co., New York.. II, 1708
 Frey, John P., executive officer and editor, International Molders' Union... I, 524
 Friedman, Max, president, American Clothing Manufacturers' Association,
 New York..... II, 1983, 1985
 Fry, Charles W., business agent, machinists..... IV, 3413
 Fuller, C. E., superintendent of motive power, Union Pacific R. R.... X, 9913, 9986
 Furman, Paul N., secretary, Pennsylvania Child Labor Association..... III, 2935

G.Gaddis, Rev. Eugene S., former superintendent of welfare work, Colorado

- Fuel & Iron Co..... IX, 8483, 8761, 8860, 8903
 Gain, Seid, Chinese merchant and contractor..... VII, 6226
 Gallagher, Andrew J., president, San Francisco Labor Council..... VI, 5444
 Gantt, Henry Lawrence, consulting engineer, Montclair, N. J..... I, 955
Garment Workers of America, United:
 Gee, Mrs. Lizzie, member..... V, 4631
 Larger, Bernard A., secretary..... II, 2044
 Lavner, J. Harris, manager, District Council No. 1..... II, 1978
 Silverman, Samuel, business agent, Local 162, New York..... II, 1998, 2048
 Garwood, Capt. Harold G., Colorado National Guard..... VII, 6803
 Gee, Mrs. Lizzie, member, United Garment Workers..... V, 4631
 General Board of Education, Dr. Charles W. Eliot, member..... VIII, 7964
 General Electric Co., Dr. Charles P. Steinmetz, chief controlling engineer.. II, 1828
 Gernon, James L., chief mercantile inspector, department of labor, New York..... II, 1838; III, 2373
 Getzendaner, R. W., banker, Waxahachie, Tex..... IX, 8990
 Gibson, J. Bruce, president, Federation of Employers' Associations of the Pacific Coast..... V, 4326, 4516
 Giddings, E. J., general counsel, Farmers' Protective Association of Oklahoma..... X, 9095, 9254, 9255, 9259
 Gideon, Henry J., chief, bureau of compulsory education, Philadelphia..... III, 2931, 2982
 Giffen, Wylie, fruit grower..... V, 4969
 Gilbert, Edward, member committee on unemployment..... V, 4721
 Gill, Hiram C., mayor of Seattle..... V, 4099
 Gillie, John, manager of mines, Anaconda Copper Mining Co..... IV, 3741, 3982
 Gimbel, Jacob, of Gimbel Bros..... III, 2269, 2400
Gimbel Bros.:
 Crawford, Charles C., former employee..... III, 2281
 Gimbel, Jacob..... III, 2269, 2400
 Goodell, Mrs. Emily L., former employee..... III, 2279
 Gindele, Charles W., general building contractor..... IV, 3335
 Ginikis, Grigorio, coal miner, Valdez, Colo..... VIII, 7134, 7158
 Gitlow, Benjamin, president, Retail Clerks' Union..... III, 2334
Glass Bottle Blowers' Association of the United States and Canada, Denis A.
 Hayes, president..... III, 3006, 3018
 Gleason, Miss Caroline J., secretary, Industrial Welfare Commission.... V, 4687, 4692
 Glenn, John M., secretary, Illinois Manufacturers' Association..... IV, 3295
 Gloekler, Barnard, & Co., Thomas E. Carpenter, representative..... II, 1737
 Goff, Frederick H., president Cleveland Trust Co. and originator of the Cleveland Foundation, Cleveland, Ohio..... IX, 8104
 Going, Charles Buxton, editor, New York City..... IX, 8344
 Gold, Joseph, chairman board of directors, United Brotherhood of Tailors,
 New York..... II, 2008
 Golden, John, president, United Textile Workers of America..... I, 985, 1012
 Goldman, William, member executive committee, New York Clothing Trade Association..... II, 1972
 Gompers, Samuel, president, American Federation of Labor..... I, 718, 738;
 II, 1443, 1492, 1534, 1573; VIII, 7638, 7748; XI, 10852
 Goodell, Mrs. Emily L., former employee of Gimbel Bros..... III, 2279
 Goodman, Joseph, coat baster, New York..... II, 1991
 Goodnow, Frank Johnson, president, Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore. XI, 10599

- Goodwin, Thomas L., clerk, department store..... III, 2301
 Gordon, F. G. R., journalist, Haverhill, Mass..... II, 1565
 Gordon, George W., former secretary, Portland Master Builders' Association. V, 4724
 Gore, C. R., business agent, Carpenters' District Council, Los Angeles. VI, 5631, 5640
 Gove, F. E., attorney, Victor-American Fuel Co..... VIII, 7084, 7347-7362
 Grace, Samuel H., general organizer, International Association of Machinists, Omaha, Nebr..... X, 9863, 10045
 Graff, Leslie, executive position with B. Altman & Co..... III, 2344, 2347, 2402
 Graham, Miss Hannah K., general secretary, Episcopal Church Temperance Society of the United States..... III, 2143, 2200
 Graham, J. F., superintendent of motive power, Oregon-Washington Railroad & Navigation Co., Portland, Oreg..... X, 9902, 9978-9986
 Granbery, Prof. John C., professor of sociology and economics, Southwestern University, Georgetown, Tex..... X, 9127
 Granite Cutters' International Association of America, James Duncan, president..... I, 965
 Grays Harbor Commercial Co., Neil Cooney, manager..... V, 4271, 4288, 4513, 4514
 Green, C. L., inspector in charge, New York distribution branch, Division of Information, United States Department of Labor..... II, 1296
 Green, Joseph F., manager Taft ranch..... X, 9222, 9226, 9227, 9289
 Greene, Jerome D., secretary Rockefeller Foundation, New York City.... IX, 8137, 8148, 8173, 8453
 Gregory, Stephen S., former president, American Bar Association, Chicago. XI, 10534
 Grier, Thomas J., superintendent, Homestake Mining Co..... IV, 3539, 3570, 3647, 3659, 3664
 Grimm, Herbert L., State editor, the North American, Philadelphia..... XI, 10267
 Grimmer, John W., president, Master Painters' Association, New York..... II, 1752
 Groome, Maj. John C., superintendent, Pennsylvania State police. XI, 10965, 11002
 Grow, C. F., business agent, International Association of Machinists... VI, 5548, 5902
 Guggenheim, Daniel, director, American Smelting & Refining Co., New York City..... VIII, 7559, 7746
 Guidon Club, Mrs. John Jerome Rooney, president..... XI, 10897
 Guyer, John P., clerk for directors of the poor, Dauphin County, Pa. XI, 10260, 10276

H.

- Halbert, L. A., superintendent, Kansas City Board of Public Welfare..... I, 360, 364
 Haley, W. D., farmer, Bloomington, Tex..... X, 9237
 Hall, George A., secretary, New York Child's Labor Committee..... II, 1826, 1835
 Hall, Tobias, cloth and upholstery goods weaver..... IV, 3035
 Hallowell, W. S., Harrison Safety Boiler Co..... III, 2925
 Hamburger's Department Store, Los Angeles, W. E. Chamberlain, manager. VI, 5711, 5968
 Hammond, John Hays, chairman industrial economic department, National Civic Federation..... VIII, 7987
 Hampton, Wade, general auditor Standard Oil Co., New Jersey..... II, 1221
 Hand, Harry W., vice president and general manager Cramp Shipbuilding Co. III, 2884
 Haney, Prof. Lewis H., chairman, school of economics, University of Texas. X, 9149
 Hannon, William, general vice president, International Association of Machinists..... VI, 5274, 5398, 5400
 Harper, J. C., superintendent of police, the Pennsylvania Railroad. XI, 10249, 10432
 Harriman, Job, attorney for organized labor..... VI, 5796, 5806
 Harriman Lines Federation, Frank Comerford, attorney.... X, 9927, 9938, 9993-10041
 Harris, A. H., editor, the Oregon Labor Press..... V, 4615
 Harrisburg Patriot, article of December 1, 1913..... XI, 10286
 Harrison Safety Boiler Co., W. S. Hallowell..... III, 2925
 Hart, Schaffner & Marx:
 Howard, Earl Dean, manager, labor department..... I, 571, 592
 Schaffner, Joseph, secretary and treasurer..... I, 564, 574
 Haverty, Thomas, plumbing and heating contractor..... VI, 5649
 Hay, Miss Mary Oakley, general secretary, Associated Charities, Pottstown, Pa..... III, 2138, 2146
 Hayes, Denis A., president, Glass Bottle Blowers' Association of the United States and Canada, Philadelphia..... III, 3006, 3018
 Hayes, Frank J., international vice president, United Mine Workers of America..... I, 449; VIII, 7189
 Hayes, J. P., chief clerk Western Union Telegraph Co., San Francisco.. VII, 6230

- Hayes, Max S., organizer for the International Typographical Union, and national committeeman from Ohio for the Socialist Party..... II, 1557
- Haywood, William D., secretary-treasurer, Industrial Workers of the World, Denver..... XI, 10569, 10586
- Healy, Timothy, president, International Brotherhood of Stationary Firemen, New York..... II, 1942
- Hearst Mercantile Co., Thomas D. Murrin..... IV, 3578
- Hebbard, Robert W., secretary, New York State Board of Charities, Albany.. IX, 8326
- Hecke, George Henry, farm adviser, University of California..... V, 4952
- Hellman, I. W., jr., banker..... VI, 5475
- Hendricks, J. J., district attorney, third judicial district of Colorado..... VII, 6902; VIII, 7332
- Henley, Dr. L. C., former surgeon, Illinois Central R. R., Chicago..... X, 9857
- Henry Phipps Institute, Dr. Henry Robert Murray Landis, physician.. III, 2686, 2723
- Henry Street Settlement, New York, Miss Lillian B. Wald, superintendent.. II, 1965
- Hepburn, A. Barton, chairman, board of directors, Chase National Bank, New York City..... IX, 8245
- Herkner, Miss Anna, assistant chief of bureau of statistics and information of Maryland..... II, 1315, 1380, 1384
- Hersey, Frederick William, manager of docks and cargoes, Pier 3, Bush Terminal..... III, 2090, 2182
- Heydt, Charles O., private secretary, John D. Rockefeller, jr., Montclair, N. J..... IX, 8353
- Hiatt, James S., former secretary, Public Educational Association of Philadelphia..... III, 2973
- Hibbard, John B., commissioner, National Metal Trades Association.... IV, 3393, 3400
- Higday, Hamilton, assistant secretary, Seattle Port Commission..... V, 4397, 4559
- High School Teachers' Association, New York City, Eli W. Weaver, chairman, students' aid committee..... II, 1848
- Hillard, H. E., United States Coal Co., Cleveland, Ohio..... XI, 10863
- Hillman, Sidney, president, Cloak and Skirt Makers' Union, New York.... I, 566
- Hillquit, Morris, member of the Socialist Party, New York..... II, 1462, 1471, 1568, 1572; IX, 8262
- Hing, Moy J., Chinese medicine merchant, Ellensburg, Wash..... VII, 6212
- Hing, Mrs. Sarah E., former missionary, Ellensburg, Wash..... VII, 6207
- Hod Carriers', Building and Common Laborers' Union, International:
D'Allessandro, Dominick, international president..... II, 1755
Manzi, Antonio, business agent..... II, 1765
- Hogan, Stephen C., general secretary-treasurer International Association of Marble Workers..... II, 1746
- Hogan, T., & Sons, stevedores, Andrew Nelson, superintendent..... III, 2124
- Hogan, Thomas J., secretary, Stove Founders' National Defense Association.. I, 510
- Hollander, Prof. Jacob H., professor of political economy, Johns Hopkins University..... VIII, 7534, 7541
- Holman, Charles W., University of Texas and investigator United States Commission on Industrial Relations..... I, 333; IX, 8951
- Holmes, Dr. John Haynes, pastor, Church of the Messiah, New York City. VIII, 7916
- Holt, Pliny E., vice president and general manager, Holt Manufacturing Co..... V, 4860, 4906
- Holt, Walter B., organizer, International Longshoremen's Association.. III, 2190, 2203
- Holt Manufacturing Co., Pliny E. Holt, vice president and general manager. V, 4860, 4906
- Homans, Frank B., Mercantile Reference & Bond Association, Boston, Mass..... II, 1301, 1388
- Home Rule and Taxation League, Edward P. Troy, public utility expert VI, 5452, 5465
- Homestake Mining Co.:
Clough, Dr. F. E., first assistant surgeon of hospital..... IV, 3614, 3669
Grier, Thomas J., superintendent..... IV, 3539, 3570, 3647, 3659, 3664
Irwin, E. F., in charge employment office..... IV, 3608, 3668
Keller, Chambers, attorney..... IV, 3585, 3635, 3674, 3677
Neary, J. L., credit man..... IV, 3641
Northam, G. A., special agent..... IV, 3630, 3674
- Horizontal Warpers' Benevolent Association, Paterson, N. J., James Starr, corresponding secretary..... III, 2612
- Horowitz, Louis J., president, Thompson-Starrett Co., New York..... II, 1683
- Horst, Dr. C. H., Butte city health officer..... IV, 3845

- Horst, E. Clemens, president, E. Clemens Horst Co. V, 4922, 4950, 5027
 Hosiery Workers' Local 696, William T. Ferris, president. IV, 3078, 3088
 Hoswell, William B., secretary, Founders and Employers' Association, Los Angeles. VI, 5864
 Hough, James H., president, First National Bank, Stockton, Cal. VI, 5089
 Hourwich, Dr. Isaac A., chief clerk and counsel, Cloak Makers' Union of New York. II, 1094, 1147
 Houston, Tex., J. J. Pastoriza, tax and land commissioner. X, 9194
 Howard, Earl Dean, manager, labor department, Hart, Schaffner & Marx, Chicago. I, 571, 592
 Howard, H. L., mayor, Lead, S. Dak. IV, 3625, 3671
 Howe, Frederic C., director, People's Institute, New York. II, 1919
 Howell, George H., member Typographical Union. V, 4695
 Hoyer, Samuel M., former mayor, Altoona, Pa. XI, 10199
 Huber, H. B., general grievance committee, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Harrisburg, Pa. XI, 10284
 Hudson County Socialist, Charles Kiehn, editor. III, 2115
 Huerfano County, Colo.:
 Farr, Jefferson B., sheriff. VII, 6790; VIII, 7303
 McQuarrie, John, formerly undersheriff. VII, 6780
 Hughes, Michael S., employee, Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co. III, 2788
 Hungerford, L. S., general manager, Pullman Co., Chicago. X, 9545, 9689, 9693
 Hunt, E. B., superintendent, relief department, the Pennsylvania R. R. XI, 10188, 10190, 10426, 10428, 10430
 Hunter, L. D., secretary, Portland Typothetæ. V, 4654
 Hunter, R. M., Philadelphia. IX, 8343
 Hurley, Jeremiah J., assistant United States commissioner of immigration, Boston. VII, 6043
 Hutchins, Frank H., first national vice president, Brotherhood of Operating Potters, Trenton, N. J. III, 2994
 Hyde, George E., fruit grower and packer. V, 4960

I.

- Iglesias, Santiago, president, Free Federation of Workingmen of Porto Rico and organizer, American Federation of Labor in Porto Rico. XI, 11042, 11086, 11089, 11142, 11181-11215
 Illinois Central R. R.:
 Bell, R. W., general superintendent of motive power. X, 9834, 10041
 Henley, Dr. L. C., former surgeon. X, 9857
 Markham, Charles H., president. X, 9699, 9958, 9962, 9965
 Montgomery, Hugh, former car carpenter. X, 9852, 9855
 Illinois Central system federation:
 Comerford, Frank, attorney. X, 9927, 9938, 9993, 10041
 McCreery, J. S., president. X, 9815, 9825
 Illinois Coal Operators' Association, Edward T. Bent, member executive board. IV, 3259, 3446, 3447
 Illinois Manufacturers' Association, John M. Glenn, secretary. IV, 3295
 Illinois State Federation of Labor, John H. Walker, president. IV, 3196, 3202, 3445
 Illinois Steel Co., R. W. Campbell, chairman, central safety committee. I, 294
 Immigrants' Protective League, Chicago, Miss Grace Abbott, director. IV, 3391, 3453
 Industrial Congress of Texas, E. W. Kirkpatrick, president. IX, 8971
 Industrial Education, National Society for Promotion of, Miss Cleo Murtland, assistant secretary. II, 1862
 Industrial Removal Office, New York City, David N. Bressler, general manager. II, 1213, 1363
 Industrial Union of Textile Workers, National, Adolph Lessig, secretary. III, 2452
 Industrial Workers of the World:
 Ettor, Joseph J., national organizer. II, 1549
 Haywood, William D., secretary-treasurer. XI, 10569, 10586
 St. John, Vincent, general secretary and treasurer. II, 1445, 1571
 Speed, George H., former general organizer. V, 4936
 Thompson, James P., organizer. V, 4233
 Zuershner, Edward, secretary-treasurer, local union, Paterson, N. J. III, 2585, 2591
 Industrial Workers of the World of Detroit, Rudolph Katz, organizer. III, 2472, 2475, 2633, 2634, 2645

- Ingram, Frederick F., manufacturing pharmacist, Detroit, Mich., statement..... XI, 11178
- Insull, Samuel, president, Commonwealth Edison Co., Chicago..... IV, 3307
- International Association of Bridge and Structural Ironworkers, C. F. Massey, organizer..... II, 1703
- International Association of Machinists:
- Alifas, N. P., president, district No. 44..... I, 940
 - Conlon, P. J., vice president..... I, 873
 - Grace, Samuel H., general organizer..... X, 9863, 10045
 - Grow, C. F., business agent..... VI, 5548, 5902
 - Hannon, William, general vice president..... VI, 5274, 5398, 5400
 - Keenan, Edward, business agent..... III, 2877
 - Malloy, H. J., general organizer..... X, 9846
 - Meagher, James J., former president, Local No. 641, Clinton, Ill..... X, 9812
 - Taylor, J. A., agent, district 26..... V, 4336, 4343, 4520-4535
 - Taylor, John G., business agent, Southern Pacific system, Oakland, Cal..... X, 9874, 10048
- International Association of Marble Workers, Stephen C. Hogan, general secretary-treasurer..... II, 1746
- International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers:
- Kline, J. W., president..... X, 9879, 9954
 - Tobin, John M., international vice president..... III, 2835
- International Brotherhood of Stationary Firemen, Timothy Healy, president. II, 1942
- International Child Welfare League:
- Brown, Edward F., vice president..... II, 1883, 1897
 - Watson, Miss Elizabeth C., special investigator..... II, 1887, 1899
- International Harvester Co., George Walbridge Perkins, director.... VIII, 7598, 7610
- International Hod Carriers', Building and Common Laborers' Union:
- D'Allessandro, Dominick, president..... II, 1755
 - Manzi, Antonio, business agent..... II, 1765
- International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union:
- Dyche, John A., general secretary-treasurer..... II, 1038, 1045, 1121
 - Polakoff, S., first vice president..... II, 1160
 - Rosenberg, A., president..... II, 1028
- International Longshoremen's Association:
- Franklin, Joseph B., organizer..... III, 2176
 - Holt, Walter B., organizer..... III, 2190, 2203
 - Riley, John F., international organizer, International Longshoremen of New York..... III, 2053
- International Mercantile Marine Co.:
- Egan, Martin..... IX, 8374
 - Ridgway, F. W., manager, operating department..... III, 2081
 - Watson, John, assistant general superintendent..... III, 2068
- International Molders' Union:
- Frey, John P., executive officer and editor..... I, 524
 - Torpy, Charles B., business agent..... III, 2918, 2921
 - Valentine, Joseph F., president..... I, 481
- International Paper Co., John Lundrigan, general superintendent..... II, 1907, 1954
- International Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union, George L. Berry, president..... I, 620
- International Typographical Union:
- Dennett, H. W., member..... VI, 5769
 - Hayes, Max S., organizer..... II, 1557
 - Scott, Charles T., representative..... VI, 5536, 5541, 5899
- International Union of Timber Workers, J. G. Brown, president... V, 4207, 4217, 4511
- Irish, John P., jr., secretary, Stockton Chamber of Commerce..... V, 4773, 4833
- Irwin, Charles O'Connor, president, United Employment Agents' Protective Association, New York..... II, 1183
- Irwin, E. F., in charge employment office, Homestake Mining Co..... IV, 3608, 3668
- Italy, F. M. Andreani, in charge immigration office and legal bureau, Italian department of immigration, San Francisco..... VI, 5114, 5120, 5152
- Itinerant Workers' Union, Local 22, Henry Pauly, chairman..... V, 4242, 4405, 4561

J.

- Janss, Edwin, Janss Investment Co..... VI, 5826
- Janss Investment Co., Edwin Janss, member of firm..... VI, 5826
- Jewish Agricultural Aid Society, George W. Simon, agricultural expert..X, 9135, 9139

- Johannsen, Anton, general organizer, United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America..... V, 4790, 4802; XI, 10667, 10686
- Johns Hopkins University:
- Goodnow, Frank Johnson, president..... XI, 10599
- Hollander, Prof. Jacob H., professor of political economy..... VIII, 7534, 7541
- Johnson, Alba B., president, Baldwin Locomotive Works.. III, 2819, 2862, 2870, 2923
- Johnson, J. C., superintendent of telegraph, the Pennsylvania R. R..... XI, 10245
- Johnston, John W., president, Structural Ironworkers' Union, New York.... II, 1612
- Joint board of sanitary control in the cloak, suit, and skirt and the dress and waist industry, New York, Dr. George M. Price, director..... III, 2693
- Joint committee on prison reform, New York, Alexander Cleland, secretary. II, 1337
- Jolly, Mrs. Pearl, miner's wife, Ludlow, Colo..... VII, 6347
- Jones, Benjamin John, chief, employment bureau, Baltimore & Ohio R. R..... II, 1264, 1389
- Jones, Mrs. Mary ("Mother" Jones)..... XI, 10618, 10634, 10917
- Jorgensen, Niels, coal miner, Delagua, Colo..... VIII, 7114
- Judge, Patrick, secretary-treasurer, Plasterers Helpers' Protective Association, New York..... II, 1762, 1789, 1797

K.

- Kansas City, Mo., L. A. Halbert, superintendent, Kansas City Board of Public Welfare..... I, 360, 364
- Katz, Rudolph, organizer, Industrial Workers of the World, of Detroit..... III, 2472, 2475, 2633, 2634, 2645
- Keenan, Edward, business agent, International Association of Machinists.. III, 2877
- Keller, Chambers, attorney, Homestake Mining Co..... IV, 3585, 3635, 3674, 3677
- Kelley, C. F., vice president and managing director, Anaconda Copper Mining Co..... IV, 3683, 3711, 3859, 3867-3982
- Kellogg, Frederick W., publisher, San Francisco Call and Post..... VI, 5478
- Kelly, Miss Della, linotype operator..... VI, 5865
- Kelly, J. P. P., New York City..... IX, 8354
- Kelly, William A., secretary, Women's Garment Manufacturers' Association of Philadelphia..... IV, 3121, 3126
- Kelso, Alexander, business agent, Carpenters' Union, New York..... II, 1676, 1678
- Kennedy, Franklin H., manager, California Moline Plow Co..... V, 4862
- Kennedy, Prof. John C., secretary, Socialist Party of Illinois..... IV, 3461, 3519
- Kern, Howard L., attorney general of Porto Rico..... XI, 11157
- Kernaghan, Robert M., carman and employee of Plain Dealer, a local newspaper, Philadelphia..... III, 2774
- Kiehn, Charles, longshoreman and editor the Hudson County Socialist..... III, 2115
- Kincaid, Fred L., land speculator..... V, 4867
- King, Millard B., expert assistant of industrial education, Pennsylvania.... III, 2971
- King, W. L. Mackenzie, former minister of labor, Ottawa, Canada, and director industrial relations department, Rockefeller Foundation..... I, 713, 732; IX, 8783, 8799
- Kirchwey, Dr. George W., formerly dean of Columbia Law School, New York City..... IX, 8215
- Kirkpatrick, E. W., president, Industrial Congress of Texas, McKinney, Tex. IX, 8971
- Kirrane, Thomas J., secretary division 477, Amalgamated Association of Street Car Men..... III, 2757
- Kirwan, James, member, Western Federation of Miners..... IV, 3602
- Kline, J. W., president, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers..... X, 9879, 9954
- Kline, M. R., president, Beneficial Association, Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co..... III, 2801, 2816
- Knight, James P., master plumber, New York..... II, 1726
- Kobylak, Joseph, coal miner, Jefferson County, Ohio..... XI, 10513
- Kokinakas, James, coal miner, Frederick, Colo..... VIII, 7132
- Konenkamp, Sylvester J., president, Commercial Telegraphers' Union of America, Chicago..... X, 9308, 9384, 9472, 9486-9512
- Kroner, Ernest M., architect..... V, 4656, 4664
- Kruttschnitt, Julius, chairman, executive board, Southern Pacific Co., New York..... X, 9886, 9947, 9976
- Kuhrts, G. J., engineer, Los Angeles Ry. Co..... VI, 5736, 5972

L.

Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, International:

- Dyche, John A., general secretary-treasurer..... II, 1038, 1045, 1121
 Polakoff, S., first vice president..... II, 1160
 Rosenberg, A., president..... II, 1028
 Lake Carriers' Association, George A. Marr, secretary..... II, 1231, 1252, 1365
 Lake Seaman's Union, Victor A. Olander, secretary..... IV, 3319
 Land League of America, W. S. Noble, national secretary. IX, 9004; X, 9130, 9245-9254
 Landis, Dr. Henry Robert Murray, physician, with the Henry Phipps Institute..... III, 2686, 2723
 Lane, Dennis, general organizer, Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workers of North America..... IV, 3516
 Lane, Warren D., member, committee on unemployment, Central Council of Social Agencies, Seattle..... V, 4374
 Larger, Bernard A., secretary, United Garment Workers of America, New York..... II, 2044
 Larson, A. H., statistician, New York Milk Commission..... II, 1266
 Lavner, J. Harris, manager, District Council No. 1, United Garment Workers of America, New York..... II, 1978
 Lawson, John R., member, international executive board, United Mine Workers of America..... VIII, 7187, 8003; IX, 8017, 8126, 8128, 8198, 8208
 Lead, S. Dak., H. L. Howard, mayor..... IV, 3625, 3671
 Lead City Miners' Union, Thomas Ryan, secretary..... IV, 3619
 Leader, Morris G., manager, Children's Cloak and Reefer Makers' Association, New York..... II, 1056
 Lee, Ivy L., member of personal staff of John D. Rockefeller, sr..... VIII, 7897, 7911; IX, 8715, 8849, 8866
 Lee, J. W., jr., publicity agent, the Pennsylvania R. R..... XI, 10243
 Lee, W. G., president, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen..... XI, 10281
 Lee Song, general merchandise, San Francisco..... VII, 6333
 Lee Tin Yat, Chinese newspaper reporter, San Francisco..... VII, 6296
 Leiserson, William M., deputy, Industrial Commission of Wisconsin..... I, 344
 Lennon, James, business agent, Sheet Metal Workers, New York..... II, 1685
 Lenthall, Walter F., coal miner, Rockland, Colo..... VIII, 7161, 7403
 Leonard, Prof. William E., instructor, University of Texas..... IX, 9044
 Lessig, Adolph, secretary, National Industrial Union of Textile Workers... III, 2452
 Le Sueur, Arthur, dean law department, Peoples College, Fort Scott, Kans. IX, 8982
 Letts, Arthur, proprietor, Broadway Department Store..... VI, 5698, 5702, 5955
 Lewis, Austin, attorney..... V, 4999
 Lewis, Hon. David J., Member of Congress from Maryland..... VIII, 7506
 Lewis, W. D. president, Farmers' Educational and Cooperative Union of Texas..... X, 9228
 Lewis, Dr. William Draper, professor of law, University of Pennsylvania.. III, 2661
 Lewisohn, Adolph, president, Miami Copper Co., and philanthropist..... IX, 8355
 Liebau, Charles, member, Lodge No. 673, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Harrisburg, Pa..... XI, 10288
 Liebig Co., Antoni Wiater, laborer, fertilizer plant, Chrome, N. J.... IX, 8229, 8237
 Lilienthal, Jesse W., president, United Railroads, San Francisco..... V, 5031
 Lincoln, Robert T., chairman, board of directors, Pullman Co..... X, 9663, 9695
 Lindbergh, Hon. Charles A., Member of Congress from Minnesota..... IX, 8304
 Linderfelt, Lieut. Karl E., Colorado National Guard.... VII, 6866, 6886; VIII, 7208
 Lindsey, Judge Ben B., Denver..... VII, 6399; VIII, 7096, 7362-7400
 Link Belt Co.:
 Dodge, James M., chairman..... I, 862
 Piez, Charles, president..... IV, 3175
 Little, George, carpet cutter..... III, 2293
 Locomotive Engineers, Brotherhood of, William Park, general chairman... XI, 10274
 Long, S. C., general manager, Pennsylvania R. R. XI, 10169, 10272, 10281, 10562, 10964
 Longshoremen's Association, International:
 Franklin, Joseph B., organizer..... III, 2176
 Holt, Walter B., organizer..... III, 2190, 2203
 Riley, John F., international organizer, International Longshoremen of New York..... III, 2053
 Longshoremen's Union, Portland, Oreg., J. A. Madsen, secretary..... V, 4719
 Longshoremen's Union Protective Association, Daniel Sullivan, former secretary..... III, 2127

- Loom Fixers and Twisters' Association, Paterson, N. J., Thomas F. Morgan, secretary..... III, 2413
- Loomis, N. H., general solicitor, Union Pacific R. R. Co., Omaha..... X, 9955
- Lord & Taylor, Wilson Hatch Tucker, manager..... III, 2365
- Lorntsen, H. M., secretary, Columbia Fishermen's Union and Columbia River Protective Union..... V, 4634, 4763
- Los Angeles, Cal., J. H. Francis, superintendent of schools..... VI, 5784
- Los Angeles County, Cal., Walton J. Wood, public defender..... VI, 5818, 5972
- Los Angeles County Building Trades Council, Tom Barker, secretary..... VI, 5589
- Los Angeles Planing Mill Co., P. J. McDonald, president..... VI, 5616, 5875
- Los Angeles Ry. Co.:
 Kuhrt, G. J., engineer..... VI, 5736, 5972
 Merrihew, A. B., assistant superintendent..... VI, 5746
- Los Angeles Times, Gen. Harrison Gray Otis, publisher..... VI, 5487, 5518, 5881
- Lotte, Edward F. L., silk dyer..... III, 2444, 2447
- Lovejoy, Owen R., general secretary, National Child Labor Committee, New York..... II, 1842
- Low, Alvin H., attorney..... VI, 5867
- Low, M. G., pump man, Colorado & Southern Ry., Ludlow, Colo..... VII, 6850, 6852
- Lowman, Will A., president, Puget Sound Salmon Canneries Association..... V, 4365, 4547, 4548
- Luke, E. J., manager, Sperry Flour Co..... V, 4827
- Lumb, George F., deputy superintendent, Pennsylvania State police. XI, 10989, 11010
- Lundrigan, John, general superintendent, industrial department, International Paper Co., New York..... II, 1907, 1954
- Lusier, Victor A., cashier, Miners & Merchants Savings Bank, Lead, S. Dak.. IV, 3646
- Lynch, Henry, commercial telegrapher, Winnipeg, Canada..... X, 9350, 9514, 9515
- Lynch, James M., commissioner of labor, State of New York..... I, 594; II, 1949
- Lynch, Robert Newton, manager, San Francisco Chamber of Commerce... VI, 5431
- Lynn, Preston P., manager, John Wanamaker Co..... III, 2232, 2256, 2396, 2397, 2398
- Lyon, H. H., assistant deputy labor commissioner and former State senator.. VI, 5833, 5839, 5973
- Lysons, Fred, attorney for individual Chinese..... VII, 6198, 6205

M.

- McBride, Dr. Andrew F., former mayor of Paterson..... III, 2553
- McBride, Andrew J., captain of Paterson police..... III, 2558
- McCabe, John A., Chinese inspector, United States Immigration Service, New England district..... VII, 6058, 6066
- McCarthy, Charles, Legislative Reference Bureau of Wisconsin..... I, 377
- McCarthy, E. Avery, real estate..... VI, 5857
- McCarthy, P. H., president, California Building Trades' Council..... VI, 5189, 5483
- McCarver, Joseph M., merchant, Red River County, Tex..... X, 9183, 9236
- McClure, E. L..... VI, 5873
- McCord, Frank B., vice president, Post & McCord, contractors, New York.. II, 1608
- McCorkle, Dr. Daniel Spencer, minister, Presbyterian Church, Sunrise, Wyo..... IX, 8532, 8538, 8864
- McCreery, J. S., general vice president, Brotherhood of Railway Carmen, and president, Illinois Central system federation, Paducah, Ky..... X, 9815, 9825
- McCreery, James, & Co., Louis Stewart, president..... III, 2246, 2399, 2400
- McCusker, M., employee, United States Industrial Commission..... IV, 3835, 3844
- McDonald, Duncan, secretary-treasurer, United Mine Workers of Illinois... IV, 3271
- McDonald, Rev. James, pastor, Methodist Episcopal Church, Aguilar, Colo..... VII, 6767, 6776
- McDonald, P. J., president, Los Angeles Planing Mill Co..... VI, 5616, 5875
- McDonnell, Arthur, president, Dyers and Mercerizers' Union..... IV, 3064, 3086
- McDowell, Miss Mary E., head resident, University of Chicago settlement. IV, 3328
- McElreath, C. H., telegrapher, Detroit, Mich..... X, 9390, 9527
- McFarlane, Arthur E., magazine writer and settlement worker..... III, 2147
- McGill, Rev. Oscar H., social-service secretary, Methodist Church, Seattle..... V, 4381, 4552, 4553
- McGregor, John A., president, Union Iron Works, San Francisco..... VI, 5405, 5419
- McGrew, J. L., Assistant Chief, Division of Information, Bureau of Immigration, Department of Labor..... II, 1290

Machinists, International Association of:

- Alifas, N. P., president, district No. 44..... I, 940
 Conlon, P. J., vice president..... I, 873
 Grace, Samuel H., general organizer..... X, 9863, 10045
 Grow, C. F., business agent..... VI, 5548, 5902
 Hannon, William, general vice president..... VI, 5274, 5398, 5400
 Keenan, Edward, business agent..... III, 2877
 Malloy, H. J., general organizer..... X, 9846
 Meagher, James J., former president, Local No. 641, Clinton, Ill..... X, 9812
 Taylor, J. A., agent, district 28..... V, 4336, 4343, 4520-4535
 Taylor, John G., business agent, Southern Pacific system, Oakland, Cal..... X, 9874, 10048
- Mack, William B., manager, S. E. Slade Lumber Co., the Slade-Wells Logging Co., and the Hump-Tulips Logging Co..... V, 4292
 MacKaye, James, chemical engineer, Cambridge, Mass..... IX, 8052
 McKelway, A. J., secretary for the Southern States, National Child Labor Committee, Washington, D. C..... XI, 10493, 10861, 10903
 McKenzie, A. B., district attorney, Contra Costa County, Cal..... V, 4994
 Mackie, James, former employee of Wanamaker's..... III, 2317
 McLaughlin, John P., California State labor commissioner..... V, 5052, 5055
 McLennan, John, district president, United Mine Workers of America, Denver..... VII, 6509, 6523
 McMahon, Dr. Theresa S., teacher, political and social science department, University of Washington..... V, 4163, 4508, 4563
 McNab, John L., formerly United States district attorney and now counsel to Chinese Six Companies, San Francisco..... VII, 6312
 McQuarrie, John, special agent, Colorado & Southern Ry., formerly undersheriff of Huerfano County, Colo..... VII, 6780
 Macy, R. H., & Co., Percy S. Straus, partner..... III, 2377
 Madden, Dan, carpenter, president, Silverbow Trades and Labor Council... IV, 3830
 Madsen, J. A., secretary, Longshoremen's Union..... V, 4719
 Magnet, Louis, silk-ribbon weaver..... III, 2572
 Malloy, H. J., general organizer, International Association of Machinists.... X, 9846
 Maloney, Miss Elizabeth, financial secretary and business agent, Waitresses' Union..... IV, 3244, 3253
 Manley, Warren, in charge of information and statistical department, San Francisco Chamber of Commerce..... VI, 5435
 Manly, Basil M., director of research and investigation, United States Commission on Industrial Relations..... VIII, 7505
 Manufacturers' Association of Pennsylvania, John P. Wood, vice president.. III, 2948
 Manufacturers, National Association of, James A. Emery, counsel..... I, 724, 745; XI, 10815, 10835
 Manzi, Antonio, business agent, International Hod Carriers' Union, New York..... II, 1765
 Marble Industry Employers' Association, New York, Benjamin D. Traitel, president..... II, 1732
 Marble Workers, International Association of, Stephen C. Hogan, general secretary-treasurer..... II, 1746
 March, James E., formerly employment agent for the Erie R. R..... II, 1342, 1387
 Marelli, Henry, attorney at law, counsel for the strikers, Paterson, N. J..... III, 2529, 2540, 2627, 2631
 Markham, Charles H., president, Illinois Central R. R. and Yazoo & Mississippi Valley R. R., Chicago..... X, 9699, 9958, 9962, 9965
 Marr, George A., secretary, Lake Carriers' Association..... II, 1231, 1252, 1365
 Marsh, Benjamin C., taxation expert, New York City..... IX, 8375
 Marsh, E. P., president, Washington State Federation of Labor..... V, 4390
 Marshall, Edward R., laundry proprietor, Boston..... VII, 6115
 Martin, Irving, publisher the Record..... V, 4865, 4866, 4874
 Martin, Samuel, cutting department, cloak workers, New York..... II, 1067
 Martinez, P. Rivera, San Juan, Porto Rico..... XI, 11029
 Maryland, Miss Anna Herkner, assistant chief of bureau of statistics and information..... II, 1315, 1380, 1384
 Massachusetts, Walter Lincoln Sears, superintendent, State free employment office, Boston..... I, 1275, 1440
 Massey, C. F., organizer, International Association of Bridge and Structural Ironworkers, New York..... II, 1703

- Master Builders' Association, Portland, Oreg., George W. Gordon, former secretary..... V, 4724
- Master Carpenters' Association, New York, Edwin Outwater, president..... II, 1618
- Master Painters' Association, New York, John W. Grimmer, president..... II, 1752
- Master Steam Fitters' Association, New York, George H. Morris, chairman, board of arbitration..... II, 1723
- Mathewson, E. P., manager, Washoe Reduction Works, Anaconda Copper Mining Co..... IV, 3790
- Matthews, John L., editor, the Paterson Press..... III, 2583
- Maurer, James H., president, Pennsylvania Federation of Labor..III, 2957; XI, 10931
- Maury, Lowndes, attorney at law..... IV, 3801, 3988
- Maxwell, Dr. William H., superintendent of schools, New York City..... II, 1880
- Mayper, Joseph, general secretary, legislative committee, North American Civic League for Immigrants..... II, 1358
- Meagher, James J., former president, Local No. 641, International Association of Machinists, Clinton, Ill..... X, 9812
- Meat Cutters and Butcher Workers of North America, Amalgamated, Dennis Lane, general organizer..... IV, 3516
- Meitzen, Judge E. O., farmer and editor, Hallettsville, Tex..... X, 9142, 9260, 9288
- Mercantile Reference and Bond Association, Boston, Mass., Frank B. Homans..... II, 1301, 1388
- Merchants and Manufacturers' Association, Los Angeles, F. J. Zeehandelaar, secretary..... VI, 5493, 5514, 5839, 5891-5898
- Merchants, Manufacturers, and Employers' Association, Stockton, Cal., C. G. Bird, president..... V, 4809
- Merrihew, A. B., assistant superintendent, Los Angeles Railway Co..... VI, 5746
- Merritt, Walter Gordon, associate counsel, American Antiboycott Association, New York..... II, 1622
- Metal Manufacturers' Association, Philadelphia:
Morgan, Henry, secretary..... III, 2902, 2924
Schwacke, Justus William, president..... III, 2889
- Metal Trades Association, National:
Hibbard, John B., commissioner..... IV, 3393, 3400
Morton, C. E., manager of the employment bureau of the New York and New Jersey branch..... II, 1247, 1387
- Metal Trades Council, Los Angeles, J. W. Buzzell, secretary and business agent..... VI, 5581
- Metz, John A., president, Carpenters' Union..... IV, 3359
- Mexican Protective Association, Emelio Flores, secretary..... X, 9200
- Miami Copper Co., Adolph Lewisohn, president..... IX, 8355
- Midvale Steel Co., William P. Barba, manager..... III, 2850, 2871
- Miller, Miss Dorothy, former clerk in the Fourteenth Street Store, New York. III, 2258
- Miller, H. G., lumber business, Kalispell, Mont..... IV, 3813
- Miller, Rodney, organizing engineer, formerly employed by the National Silk Dyeing Co..... III, 2494, 2500
- Mills, James, fruit grower..... V, 4955, 4969
- Mine Workers of America, United:
Costigan, Edward P., counsel..... VIII, 7203; IX, 8113, 8126, 8128
Doyle, Edward L., district secretary-treasurer..... VII, 6925, 6961; VIII, 6993, 7217, 7334, 7343, 7344
Drennan, Henry, representative..... IV, 3821
Hayes, Frank J., international vice president..... I, 449; VIII, 7189
Lawson, John R., member, international executive board..... VIII, 7187, 8003; IX, 8017, 8126, 8128, 8198, 8208
McLennan, John, district president..... VII, 6509, 6523
Mitchell, John, former president..... I, 401; IX, 8059
Morgan, James, secretary-treasurer, district No. 22..... IX, 8361
- Mine Workers of Illinois, United, Duncan McDonald, secretary-treasurer.. IV, 3271
- Miners & Merchants Savings Bank, Lead, S. Dak., Victor A. Lusier, cashier.. IV, 3646
- Miners' Union, Lead City, Thomas Ryan, secretary..... IV, 3619
- Miners, Western Federation of:
Kirwan, James, member..... IV, 3602
Scoggan, Warren E., member..... IV, 3621
- Minora, Mrs. Mary, home worker, New York..... II, 2036
- Mitchell, John, member, New York State Workingmen's Compensation Commission, and former president, United Mine Workers of America.. I, 401- IX, 8059

- Mitten, Thomas E., chairman, executive committee, Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co..... III, 2733, 2809
- Mixter, Charles W., time-study man, Sentinel Automatic Gas Appliance Co., New Haven..... I, 835
- Molders' Union, San Francisco, R. W. Burton, business representative..... VI, 5233
- Molders' Union, International:
- Frey, John P., executive officer and editor..... I, 524
- Torpy, Charles B., business agent..... III, 2918, 2921
- Valentine, Joseph F., president..... I, 481
- Monroe, Henry A., inspector, United States Immigration Service, Seattle... VII, 6173, 6176
- Montana, Samuel V. Stewart, governor..... IV, 3748, 3984
- Montana State Tuberculosis Sanatorium, Dr. T. D. Tuttle, president..... IV, 3840
- Montgomery, Hugh, former car carpenter, Illinois Central R. R., McComb, Miss..... X, 9852, 9855
- Mooney, A. J., editor the Union Labor..... VI, 5643
- Moore, W. Park, manager and treasurer, Brown Knitting Co..... IV, 3060
- Morgan, Henry, secretary, Metal Manufacturers' Association..... III, 2902, 2924
- Morgan, James, secretary-treasurer, district No. 22, United Mine Workers of America, Cheyenne, Wyo..... IX, 8361
- Morgan, John Pierpont, director, United States Steel Corporation, Northern Pacific Ry., and other corporations..... IX, 8084
- Morgan, Thomas F., secretary, Loom Fixers and Twisters' Association..... III, 2413
- Morris, George H., chairman, board of arbitration, Master Steam Fitters' Association, New York..... II, 1723
- Morton, C. E., manager, New York and New Jersey branch of the National Metal Trades Association employment bureau..... II, 1247, 1387
- Moskowitz, Dr. Henry, clerk, Board of Arbitration, New York..... II, 1145
- Mount Vernon, N. Y., George M. Basford, member, advisory board, School of Industrial Arts of Mount Vernon, N. Y..... II, 1852, 1895
- Moy, Shere F., interpreter, office of commissioner of immigration, Boston... VII, 6086
- Mullenbach, James, superintendent, Oak Forest Institution..... IV, 3361
- Mundell, William A., owner, Mundell International Detective Agency..... V, 5011
- Mundell International Detective Agency, William A. Mundell, owner..... V, 5011
- Municipal Research Bureau, New York:
- Allen, Dr. William H., former director..... VIII, 7895; IX, 8327, 8462
- Cleveland, Frederick A., director..... IX, 8310
- Cutting, R. Fulton, president..... VIII, 7934; IX, 8452
- Murphy, Dennis, miner, Anaconda Copper Mining Co..... IV, 3736
- Murray, Dr. T. J., in charge of Murray Hospital..... IV, 3850
- Murrin, Thomas D., manager, Hearst Mercantile Co..... IV, 3578
- Murtland, Miss Cleo, assistant secretary, National Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education, New York..... II, 1862

N.

- Nagle, Patrick S., lawyer, Kingfisher, Okla..... X, 9059, 9242, 9243
- Namm, A. I., & Co., Benjamin H. Namm, member of firm..... III, 2327
- Namm, Benjamin H., member of firm of A. I. Namm & Co..... III, 2327
- Napier, David, business agent, Brotherhood of Boiler Makers and Iron Ship Builders' Union..... III, 2916
- National Association of Bottle and Vial Manufacturers, George W. Yost, president..... III, 3027
- National Association of Corporation Schools, Arthur Williams, president.... II, 1872
- National Association of Manufacturers, James A. Emery, counsel..... I, 724, 745; XI, 10815, 10835
- National Brotherhood of Operating Potters, Frank H. Hutchins, first national vice president..... III, 2994
- National Child Labor Committee:
- Lovejoy, Owen R., general secretary..... II, 1842
- McKelway, A. J., secretary for the Southern States..... XI, 10493, 10861, 10903
- National Civic Federation:
- Beeks, Miss Gertrude, director, welfare department..... III, 2215
- Hammond, John Hays, chairman, industrial economic department... VIII, 7987
- National Council of Safety, W. H. Cameron, secretary..... I, 307
- National Cut Stone Contractors' Association, Henry Struble, secretary..... I, 665

National Employment Exchange:

Bannard, Otto T., president..... II, 1272

Carpenter, Edward W., former manager..... II, 1222

National Erectors' Association, Walter Drew, counsel and executive officer. XI, 10731, 10760, 10834, 10919, 10920

National Founders' Association, O. P. Briggs, ex-president..... I, 456, 550

National Industrial Union of Textile Workers, Adolph Lessig, secretary.... III, 2452

National Metal Trades Association:

Hibbard, John B., commissioner..... IV, 3393, 3400

Morton, C. E., manager of the employment bureau of the New York and New Jersey branch..... II, 1247, 1387

National Silk Dyeing Co., Rodney Miller, organizing engineer..... III, 2494, 2500

National Society for the Promotion of Industrial Education, Miss Cleo Murtland, assistant secretary..... II, 1862National Women's Trade Union League:

Noel, Mrs. Frances N., chairman Los Angeles committee.... VI, 5717, 5730, 5969

Robins, Mrs. Raymond, president..... I, 309

Nearing, Dr. Scott, instructor in economics, University of Pennsylvania... III, 2649

Neary, J. L., credit man, Homestake Mining Co..... IV, 3641

Nelson, Andrew, superintendent of T. Hogan & Sons, stevedores..... III, 2124

Nelson, Charles, Co., James Tyson, president..... VI, 5247, 5390, 5394, 5396

Nelson, George, prisoner, held for smuggling Chinese..... VII, 6222

Nestor, Miss Agnes, president, Women's Trade Union League of Chicago... IV, 3377, 3450New York and New Jersey branch of the National Metal Trades Association,

C. E. Morton, manager, employment bureau..... II, 1247, 1387

New York Child's Labor Committee, George A. Hall, secretary..... II, 1826, 1835

New York City:

Baker, Dr. S. Josephine, director, division of child hygiene, New York

Department of Health..... II, 1814

Bell, George H., commissioner of licenses..... II, 1198

Maxwell, Dr. William H., superintendent of schools, New York City... II, 1880

Ragan, Adolphus, examiner of accounts..... II, 1210

Robinson, Herman, former commissioner of licenses..... II, 1206

Walsh, John H., assistant superintendent schools, board of education,
New York..... II, 1820

Wilcox, Mrs. Anna H., supervisor, continuation schools, New York City.. II, 1859

Woods, Arthur, police commissioner..... XI, 10550, 10917

New York City Bureau of Municipal Research:

Allen, Dr. William H., former director..... VIII, 7895; IX, 8327, 8462

Cleveland, Frederick A., director..... IX, 8310

Cutting, R. Fulton, president..... VIII, 7934; IX, 8452

New York City employment application bureau, Charles K. Blatchly, superintendent..... II, 1165New York City High School Teachers' Association, Eli W. Weaver, chairman, students' aid committee..... II, 1848New York City Industrial Removal Office, David N. Bressler, general manager..... II, 1213, 1363New York Clothing Trade Association, William Goldman, member, executive committee..... II, 1972

New York Milk Commission, A. H. Larson, statistician..... II, 1266

New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R., David Van Alstyne, assistant to president..... I, 883New York State:Clark, Mrs. Marion K., chief investigator, bureau of industries and immigration..... II, 1191, 1193

Cullen, Judge Edgar M., former chief judge, court of appeals..... XI, 10465

Gernon, James L., chief mercantile inspector, department of labor, New York..... II, 1838; III, 2373

Hebbard, Robert W., secretary, State Board of Charities..... IX, 8326

Lynch, James M., commissioner of labor..... I, 594; II, 1949

Mitchell, John, member, New York State Workingmen's Compensation Commission..... I, 401; IX, 8059Rogers, William C., chief mediator, department of labor, State of New York..... II, 1931

Wilson, Lewis A., State inspector of vocational schools..... II, 1865

- New York Trades School, R. Fulton Cutting, president..... VIII, 7934; IX, 8452
 Noble, W. S., national secretary, Land League of America..... IX, 9004;
 X, 9130, 9245-9254
 Noel, Mrs. Frances N., chairman, Los Angeles committee of National Women's Trade Union League..... VI, 5717, 5730, 5969
 Norman, C. G., former chairman, board of governors, Building Trades Employers' Association, New York..... II, 1672
 The North American, Philadelphia, Herbert L. Grimm, State editor..... XI, 10267
 North American Civic League for Immigrants, Joseph Mayper, general secretary, legislative committee..... II, 1358
 North Butte Mining Co., John D. Pope, general manager..... IV, 3743, 3983
 North Carolina, Judge Walter Clark, chief justice, supreme court.... XI, 10453, 10903
 Northam, G. A., special agent, Homestake Mining Co..... IV, 3630, 3674
 Northcutt, Jesse G., attorney, Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Victor-American
 Fuel Co., and the Rocky Mountain Fuel Co..... VIII, 7135, 7181, 7402
 Northern Coal & Coke Co., James H. Blood, director..... VIII, 7219
 Northern Pacific Ry., John Pierpont Morgan, director..... IX, 8084
 Northwestern Pacific R. R. Co., William S. Wollner, chief engineer of maintenance..... VI, 5095
 Northwestern University, F. S. Deibler, associate professor of economics.... IV, 3333

O.

- Oak Forest Institution, Oak Forest, Ill., James Mullenbach, superintendent. IV, 3361
 O'Brien, W. L., miner..... IV, 3778, 3985
 O'Connell, John A., secretary, San Francisco Labor Council..... VI, 5278
 O'Connell, Mrs. P. J., Alliance Employment Bureau, New York..... II, 1323
 O'Donnell, Simon, chairman, Chicago Building Trades Council..... IV, 3347 O'Hara, Rev. Father Edwin V., chairman, Industrial Welfare Commission of Oregon..... V, 4668
 O'Hern, John E., general superintendent, Armour plants..... IV, 3498, 3513, 3525
 Ohio:
 Boyd, James H., ex-chairman, Employers' Liability Commission of Ohio. I, 370
 Wanamaker, Judge R. M., justice, supreme court..... XI, 10864
 Olander, Victor A., secretary, Lake Seaman's Union..... IV, 3319
 Older, Fremont, managing editor the San Francisco Bulletin..... VI, 5437
 Oliver, Jacob, miner..... IV, 3780
 Olson, Edward W., Washington State labor commissioner.... V, 4112, 4414, 4441, 4484
 Operating Potters, National Brotherhood of, Frank H. Hutchins, first national vice president..... III, 2994
 Order of Railroad Telegraphers, H. B. Perham, president..... X, 9354;
 XI, 10069, 10095, 10106, 10152, 10290
 Order of Railroad Telegraphers, Dispatchers, Agents, and Signalmen, Philadelphia, J. R. T. Auston, president..... XI, 10252, 10434, 10435
 Oregon:
 Gleason, Miss Caroline J., secretary, Industrial Welfare Commission.. V, 4687, 4692
 O'Hara, Rev. Father Edwin V., chairman, Industrial Welfare Commission V, 4668
 Smith, Amadee M., member, Industrial Welfare Commission..... V, 4681
 Oregon Civil League, Isaac Swett, executive secretary..... V, 4595, 4603, 4743
 Oregon Labor Press, A. H. Harris, editor..... V, 4615
 Oregon State Federation of Labor:
 Burchard, T. H., president..... V, 4623
 Stack, E. J., secretary..... V, 4579
 Oregon University. See University of Oregon.
 Oregon-Washington Railroad & Navigation Co., J. F. Graham, superintendent of motive power..... X, 9902, 9978-9986
 Osborne, Benjamin, president, Building Trades Council and business agent,
 Structural Iron Workers' Union..... V, 4712
 Osgood, J. C., Victor-American Fuel Co., Denver..... VII, 6422; VIII, 7241
 Otis, Gen. Harrison Gray, publisher the Los Angeles Times..... VI, 5487, 5518, 5881
 Outwater, Edwin, president, Master Carpenters Association, New York..... II, 1618

P.

- Pacific Foundry Co., Edward J. Fowler, president..... VI, 5410, 5419
 Pacific Gas & Electric Co., John A. Britton, vice president and general manager..... VI, 5423
 Padgitt, J. Tom, landowner and ranchman, Coleman, Tex..... X, 9102, 9112

- Page, Paul E., president, Page Lumber Co..... V, 4249
 Page Lumber Co., Paul E. Page, president..... V, 4249
 Painters, Decorators, and Paper Hangers, Brotherhood of, John J. Collins, president, New York District Council, No. 99..... II, 1741
 Palfery, R. G., assistant superintendent, Cunard piers..... III, 2134
 Pankin, Jacob, attorney for United Brotherhood of Tailors, New York..... II, 2015 Park, Edward Leon, interpreter, United States Immigration Service, San Francisco..... VII, 6303
 Park, William, general chairman, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.. XI, 10274
 Parker, Adella M., president, lumber company..... V, 4401
 Parker, Dr. Carleton H., executive secretary, California State Commission of Immigration and Housing..... V, 4932
 Parker, Clarence Lyman..... VI, 5877
 Passaic County, N. J., Michael Dunn, prosecuting attorney..... III, 2544
 Pastoriza, J. J., tax and land commissioner, Houston, Tex..... X, 9194
 Paterson, J. V., president, Seattle Construction & Dry Dock Co..... V, 4311, 4318
 Paterson, N. J.:
 McBride, Dr. Andrew F., former mayor..... III, 2553
 McBride, Andrew J., captain of police..... III, 2558
 Paterson Evening News, Leon F. Banigan, reporter..... III, 2626
 Paterson Press, John L. Matthews, editor..... III, 2583
 Paterson Weekly Issue, Alexander Scott, former editor..... III, 2519, 2629
 Patrick, W. H., secretary, Keystone Lodge No. 42, Brotherhood of Railroad
 Trainmen, Harrisburg, Pa..... XI, 10283
 Pattern Makers' Association, Philadelphia, John Watt, business agent..... III, 2914
 Patterson, Joseph H., in charge of Tolter mine, Walsenburg, Colo..... VII, 6783;
 VIII, 7265, 7296
 Patterson, Hon. Thomas M., formerly United States Senator from Colorado.. VII, 6474
 Paulitsch, Frederick, local president, Sheet Metal Workers' Union, New York. II, 1739
 Pauly, Henry, chairman, Local 22, Itinerant Workers' Union..... V, 4242, 4405, 4561
 Peabody, Francis S., coal operator..... I, 428
 Pennsylvania:
 Cunningham, J. E. B., special deputy attorney general..... XI, 10964, 11001
 Groome, Maj. John C., superintendent, State police..... XI, 10965, 11002
 King, Millard B., expert assistant of industrial education..... III, 2971
 Lumb, George F., deputy superintendent, State police..... XI, 10989, 11010
 Pennsylvania Child Labor Association:
 Brinton, Jasper Y., president..... III, 2955
 Furman, Paul N., secretary..... III, 2935
 Pennsylvania Federation of Labor, James H. Maurer, president. III, 2957; XI, 10931
 Pennsylvania R. R.:
 Atterbury, W. W., vice president..... XI, 10127, 10426
 Born, J. T., former machinist..... XI, 10262
 Creighton, G. W., general superintendent..... XI, 10211,
 10214, 10240, 10430, 10431, 10432
 Harper, J. C., superintendent of police..... XI, 10249, 10432
 Hunt, E. B., superintendent relief department..... XI, 10188,
 10190, 10426, 10428, 10430
 Johnson, J. C., superintendent of telegraph..... XI, 10245
 Lee, J. W., jr., publicity agent..... XI, 10243
 Long, S. C., general manager..... XI, 10169, 10272, 10281, 10562, 10964
 Pennsylvania University. See University of Pennsylvania.
 Peoples College, Fort Scott, Kans., Arthur Le Sueur, dean law department. IX, 8982
 People's Institute, New York, Frederic C. Howe, director..... II, 1919
 Perham, H. B., president, Order of Railroad Telegraphers, St. Louis..... X, 9354;
 XI, 10069, 10095, 10106, 10152, 10290
 Perkins, George W., president and secretary, Cigar Makers' International Union..... IV, 3440
 Perkins, George Walbridge, director, United States Steel Corporation and International Harvester Co., New York City..... VIII, 7598, 7610
 Perlstein, Meyer, secretary, joint board, Cloak and Skirt Makers' Union,
 New York..... II, 1053
 Peters, Miss Louise Edgar, magazine writer and investigator of longshoremen in England..... III, 2188
 Petersen, Thomas, foreman, American Hawaiian Steamship Co. pier..... III, 2171
 Petrucci, Mrs. Mary, coal miner's wife, Ludlow, Colo..... IX, 8190

- Philadelphia, Pa.:
 Ash, William C., principal, Philadelphia Trade School..... III, 2942
 Blankenburg, Rudolph, mayor..... III, 2698, 2729
 Cooke, Morris Llewellyn, director, department of public works..... III, 2674,
 2717, 2720, 2722
 Frazee, John C., director, vocational education and guidance..... III, 2968
 Gideon, Henry J., chief, bureau of compulsory education..... III, 2931, 2982
 Philadelphia Public Educational Association, James S. Hiatt, former secretary..... III, 2973
 Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co.:
 Hughes, Michael S., employee..... III, 2788
 Kline, M. R., president, Beneficial Association..... III, 2801, 2816
 Mitten, Thomas E., chairman, executive committee..... III, 2733, 2809
 Tulley, Herbert G., superintendent of transportation..... III, 2753
 Philadelphia Typographical Union, John H. Phillips, chairman, organization committee..... III, 2977
 Phillips, John H., chairman, organization committee, Philadelphia Typographical Union..... III, 2977
 Phipps Institute. See Henry Phipps Institute.
 Pierce, W. H., organizer, Brotherhood of Federated Railway Employees,
 Harrisburg, Pa..... XI, 10154, 10162, 10269, 10288
 Piez, Charles, president, Link Belt Co..... IV, 3175
 Pinchot, Amos, lawyer, New York City..... IX, 8041, 8049
 Plain Dealer, Robert M. Kernaghan, employee..... III, 2774
 Plasterers Helpers' Protective Association, New York, Patrick Judge, secretary-treasurer..... II, 1762, 1789, 1797
 Platto, Frank C., timekeeper, White Star Line, Pier 60..... III, 2109
 Plumbers and Steam Fitters of the United States and Canada, United Association of, John R. Alpine, president..... II, 1710, 1711
 Plumbers' Union, Los Angeles, Edward Beirne, business agent..... VI, 5657
 Plumbers' Union, New York, Local 480, Frank Deegan, secretary..... II, 1728
 Polakoff, S., first vice president, International Ladies' Garment Workers'
 Union..... II, 1160
 Pope, John D., general manager, North Butte Mining Co..... IV, 3743, 3983
 Portland Building Trades Council, Portland, Oreg., Benjamin Osborne, president..... V, 4712
 Portland Central Labor Council, Portland, Oreg., T. H. Burchard, president. V, 4623
 Portland Chamber of Commerce, Portland, Oreg., A. H. Averill, president..... V, 4589, 4737
 Portland Master Builders' Association, Portland, Oreg., George W. Gordon, former secretary..... V, 4724
 Portland Typothetæ, Portland, Oreg., L. D. Hunter, secretary..... V, 4654
 Porto Rico:
 Bills, John C., jr., in charge of insular bureau of labor, San Juan..... XI, 11092
 Kern, Howard L., attorney general..... XI, 11157
 Travieso, Martin, jr., secretary, executive council.. XI, 11115, 11133, 11215-11224
 Yager, Hon. Arthur, governor..... XI, 11145
 Porto Rico Free Federation of Workingmen:
 Iglesias, Santiago, president..... XI, 11042, 11086, 11089, 11142, 11181-11215
 Resolutions on economic conditions of Porto Rico..... XI, 11161
 Post & McCord, Frank B. McCord, vice president..... II, 1608
 Postal Telegraph & Cable Co.:
 Coggins, J. P., manager, San Francisco..... VII, 6230
 Powers, Thomas N., manager of operating department, Chicago.... X, 9445, 9538
 Reynolds, Edward, vice president and general manager..... X, 9369
 Pottstown, Pa., Associated Charities, Miss Mary Oakley Hay, general secretary..... III, 2138, 2146
 Powderly, Terrence V., Chief, Division of Information, Bureau of Immigration, Department of Labor..... II, 1308
 Powers, Patrick, foreman longshoreman..... III, 2161
 Powers, Thomas N., manager of operating department, Postal Telegraph &
 Cable Co., Chicago..... X, 9445, 9538
 Pratt, C. O., former chairman, international executive board, Amalgamated Association..... III, 2780, 2815
 Presbyterian Chinese Home, San Francisco, Miss Nora K. Banks, assistant..... VII, 6330
 Price, C. W., assistant to the Industrial Commission of Wisconsin..... I, 285

- Price, Dr. George M., director, joint board of sanitary control, Garment Workers of New York..... III, 2693
- Price, Millard, Socialist..... VI, 5464
- Printers' League of America, Charles Francis, president..... I, 683
- Printing Pressmen and Assistants' Union, International, George L. Berry, president..... I, 620
- Public Educational Association of Philadelphia, James S. Hiatt, former secretary..... III, 2973
- Puget Sound Salmon Canneries Association, Will A. Lowman, president..... V, 4365, 4547, 4548
- Pullman Co.:
- Bell, R. W., former employee..... X, 9599, 9601, 9694
 - Bourke, John T., former conductor..... X, 9633, 9681
 - Brewster, W. H., conductor..... X, 9655
 - Burton, Walter W., former porter..... X, 9621
 - Conductors..... X, 9681
 - Conductors, Mr. Hungerford's reply to complaints of..... X, 9689
 - Crenshaw, Thomas A., porter..... X, 9644
 - Daniels, F. B., representing the Pullman Co..... X, 9662
 - Hungerford, L. S., general manager..... X, 9545, 9689, 9693
 - Lincoln, Robert T., chairman, board of directors..... X, 9663, 9695
 - Seawell, H. H., former conductor..... X, 9629
 - Sylvester, G. H., porter..... X, 9648

Q.

- Quick, Herbert, author and farmer..... I, 320

R.

- Ragan, Adolphus, examiner of accounts, New York City..... II, 1210
- Railroad Telegraphers, Dispatchers, Agents, and Signalmen, Order of, Philadelphia, J. R. T. Auston, president..... XI, 10252, 10434, 10435
- Railroad Telegraphers, Order of, H. B. Perham, president..... X, 9354, XI, 10069, 10095, 10106, 10152, 10290
- Railroad Trainmen, Brotherhood of:
- Huber, H. B., general grievance committee..... XI, 10284
 - Lee, W. G., president..... XI, 10281
 - Liebau, Charles, member, Lodge No. 673, Harrisburg, Pa..... XI, 10288
 - Patrick, W. H., secretary, Keystone Lodge No. 42, Harrisburg, Pa.... XI, 10283
 - Robinson, M. T., Pennsylvania State legislative board..... XI, 10283
 - Rowand, G. B., chairman, Pennsylvania State legislative board..... XI, 10283
 - Sheely, R. B., secretary, Lodge No. 673, Harrisburg, Pa..... XI, 10287
- Railway Carmen, Brotherhood of, J. S. McCreery, general vice president. X, 9815, 9825
- Rankin, J. B., president, Anaconda Mill and Smeltermen's Union..... IV, 3786
- Rapson Coal Mining Co., W. W. Curtis, president..... VII, 6533; VIII, 7243
- Ready, Ruben, labor agent, San Francisco..... VI, 5127
- Reed College, Portland, Oreg., Dr. A. E. Wood, instructor in social science.. V, 4605, 4745
- Reno, Conrad, Springfield, Mass..... IX, 8376
- Republic Drug Co., M. Q. Fong, president..... VII, 6321
- Retail Clerks' Union of New York:
- Dutcher, Miss Elizabeth, chairman, committee on outdoor meeting... III, 2392, 2403, 2405
 - Gitlow, Benjamin, president..... III, 2334
 - Svenson, Miss Hilda E., organizer..... III, 2306, 2316, 2400
- Reynolds, Edward, vice president and general manager, Postal Telegraph & Cable Co., New York..... X, 9369
- Reynolds, George M., president, Continental Commercial Bank, Chicago.... IV, 3366
- Rice, George, & Sons, Irwin H. Rice, president..... VI, 5758
- Rice, Irwin H., president, George Rice & Sons..... VI, 5758
- Rice, John, general organizer, United Brotherhood of Carpenters, New York. II, 1639, 1644
- Richards, Dr. C. R., director, Cooper Union, New York..... II, 1803
- Ridgway, F. W., manager, operating department, International Mercantile Marine Co..... III, 2081
- Riley, John F., international organizer. International Longshoremen of New York..... III, 2053

- Rives, C. A., real estate dealer, Hastings, Tex. X, 9113
 Roantree, J. D., secretary, Franklin Printing Trades Association..... VI, 5283
 Robbins, Jacob, organizer of boys' clubs, Chicago..... X, 9470
 Robins, Mrs. Raymond, president, National Women's Trade Union League.. I, 309
 Robinson, Senator Helen Ring, member of Colorado State Senate from Denver..... VIII, 7209, 7218
 Robinson, Herman, former commissioner of licenses of city of New York.... II, 1206
 Robinson, M. T., Pennsylvania State legislative board, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen..... XI, 10283
 Rockefeller, John D., New York City..... IX, 8297, 8462
 Rockefeller, John D., jr., New York City.... VIII, 7763, 7789, 7816, 7842, 7866, 7892;
 IX, 8378, 8411, 8449, 8452, 8592, 8604, 8672, 8702
 Rockefeller Foundation:
 Eliot, Dr. Charles W., member..... VIII, 7964
 Greene, Jerome D., secretary..... IX, 8137, 8148, 8173, 8453
 King, W. L. Mackenzie, director, industrial relations department. IX, 8783, 8799
 Rocky Mountain Fuel Co., Jesse G. Northcutt, attorney..... VIII, 7135, 7181, 7402
 Rodgers, Mrs. Helen W., director, Boston Placement Bureau..... II, 1328
 Roe, Gilbert E., lawyer, New York City..... XI, 10468
 Rogers, Duane F., telegrapher, Chicago..... X, 9443
 Rogers, William C., chief mediator, department of labor, State of New York. II, 1931
 Rooney, Mrs. John Jerome, New York, president, the Guidon Club, opposed to woman suffrage..... XI, 10897
 Rosenberg, A., president, International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union... II, 1028
 Rosenberg, Eli, former messenger, Western Union Telegraph Co., Chicago... X, 9420
 Rosenfeld, L. E., president, Garment Manufacturers' Association, New York. II, 1079
 Rosenheim, Ralph, secretary, Silk Association of Paterson..... III, 2620
 Rosenwasser, Charles A., clothing contractor, New York..... II, 2002
 Rowan, W. A., building contractor, with James Starrett & Co., New York... II, 1668
 Rowand, G. B., chairman, Pennsylvania State legislative board, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen..... XI, 10283
 Royce, Robert M., attorney..... V, 5010, 5019, 5022
 Rucker, W. J., lumberman, Rucker Bros. & Cavanaugh Timber Co..... V, 4304, 4515
 Rucker Bros. & Cavanaugh Timber Co., W. J. Rucker, lumberman.... V, 4304, 4515
 Russell, W. T., telegrapher, Chicago..... X, 9432
 Russell, Wesley, international secretary-treasurer, Commercial Telegraphers'
 Union of America..... X, 9458, 9468, 9481, 9539, 9540
 Ryan, Thomas, secretary, Miners' Union..... IV, 3619

S.

- Sachs, Dr. Theodore B., president, Chicago Tuberculosis Institute..... IV, 3397, 3454 Safety, National Council of, W. H. Cameron, secretary..... I, 307
 St. John, Vincent, general secretary and treasurer of the Industrial Workers of the World..... II, 1445, 1571
 Sanders, John, coal miner, Morley, Colo..... VIII, 7089
 San Francisco Associated Charities, Harry R. Bogart, financial secretary..... V, 5066
 San Francisco Bulletin, Fremont Older, managing editor..... VI, 5437
 San Francisco Call, Frederick W. Kellogg, publisher..... VI, 5478
 San Francisco Chamber of Commerce:
 Lynch, Robert Newton, manager..... VI, 5431
 Manley, Warren, in charge of information and statistical department.... VI, 5435
 San Francisco Labor Council:
 Gallagher, Andrew J., president..... VI, 5444
 O'Connell, John A., secretary..... VI, 5278
 Scanlan, A. M..... VI, 5877
 Schaffner, Joseph, secretary and treasurer, Hart, Schaffner & Marx, Chicago. I, 564, 574
 Scharrenberg, Paul, editor, Coast Seamen's Journal, and secretary-treasurer,
 California State Federation of Labor..... V, 5040
 Schiff, Jacob H., banker, New York City..... VIII, 7520
 Schlossberg, Joseph, secretary and treasurer, joint board of the United Brotherhood of Tailors..... II, 1969
 Schoenfeld, Meyer, advisor, Clothing Trades' Bureau of Sanitation and Information, New York..... II, 2022
 Schroeder, Theodore, attorney for Free Speech League, New York City... XI, 10840, 10866
 Schulman, Miss Sylvia, clerk, department store..... III, 2285

- Schwacke, Justus William, president, Metal Manufacturers' Association.... III, 2889
 Schwartz, S. Nicholas, former employee of Bloomingdale Bros..... III, 2320
 Scoggan, Warren E., member, miners' union..... IV, 3621
 Scott, Alexander, former editor, The Paterson Weekly Issue, official organ of the Socialist Party..... III, 2519, 2629
 Scott, Charles T., representative, International Typographical Union.... VI, 5536, 5541, 5899
 Scott, Rufus W., director and plant manager, Taubel Hosiery Mills..... IV, 3080
 Seager, Henry R., professor of political economy, Columbia University, New York..... XI, 10558, 10563
 Sears, Walter Lincoln, superintendent, State free employment office, Boston, Mass..... II, 1275, 1440
 Seattle, Wash.:
 Gill, Hiram C., mayor..... V, 4099
 Higday, Hamilton, assistant secretary, Seattle Port Commission... V, 4397, 4559
 Seattle Central Council of Social Agencies:
 Lane, Warren D., member, committee on unemployment..... V, 4374
 Strong, Dr. Sydney, president..... V, 4395, 4556, 4557
 Seattle Construction & Dry Dock Co., J. V. Paterson, president..... V, 4311, 4318
 Seattle Times, Col. Alden J. Blethen, president..... V, 4224, 4409
 Seattle Union Record, E. B. Ault, editor and manager..... V, 4185, 4190
 Seawell, H. H., Chicago, former Pullman conductor..... X, 9629
 Sebald, John G., cement worker and contractor, Erie, Pa..... XI, 10984
 Sentinel Automatic Gas Appliance Co., Charles W. Mixer, time-study man. I, 835
 Shannon, Joe, miner..... IV, 3852
 Shattuck-Edinger Co., Fred S. Edinger, first vice president and general manager..... VI, 5146, 5161
 Shedd, John G., president, Marshall Field & Co..... IV, 3371
 Sheely, R. B., secretary, Lodge No. 673, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, Harrisburg, Pa..... XI, 10287
 Sheet Metal Workers' Union, New York:
 Lennon, James, business agent..... II, 1685
 Paulitsch, Frederick, local president..... II, 1739
 Shovlin, Dan, miner, The Davis-Daly Co..... IV, 3772
 Shrimpton, B. F., secretary-treasurer, New York local, Commercial Telegraphers' Union..... X, 9422, 9530
 Siegel, Henry, & Rotherberg, Miss Dorothy Miller, former clerk in the Fourteenth Street store..... III, 2258
 Silberman, Morris, garment manufacturer, New York..... II, 1083
 Silk Association of Paterson, Ralph Rosenheim, secretary..... III, 2620
 Silverbow Trades and Labor Council, Dan Madden, president..... IV, 3830
 Silverman, Samuel, business agent, Local 162, United Garment Workers, New York..... II, 1998, 2048
 Simon, George W., agricultural expert, Jewish Agricultural Aid Society. X, 9135, 9139
 Skinner, George N., president, Employers' Association of Washington..... V, 4157
 Slade, S. E., Lumber Co., William B. Mack, manager..... V, 4292
 Sleeman, B. W., business agent, Portland Carpenters' Union..... V, 4627
 Sly, L. H., general builder..... VI, 5224
 Smith, Amadee M., member Industrial Welfare Commission..... V, 4681
 Smith, Clarence A., manager, Socialist Publishing Co., and president of Butte city council..... IV, 3723
 Smith, Dr. J. Allen, professor political and social science, University of Washington..... V, 4130
 Smith, Miss Jeannette, former employee of Wanamaker's..... III, 2261
 Smith, P. L., and others, Brotherhood of Federated Railway Employees.... XI, 10287
 Smith, S. R., mercantile business, Lead, S. Dak..... IV, 3643, 3679
 Snodgrass, B. W., coal-mine superintendent, Victor-American Fuel Co.... VIII, 7077
 Socialist Party:
 Hayes, Max S., national committeeman from Ohio..... II, 1557
 Hillquit, Morris, member..... II, 1462, 1471, 1568, 1572; IX, 8262
 Kennedy, Prof. John C., secretary, Socialist Party of Illinois..... IV, 3461, 3519
 Price, Millard, member..... VI, 5464
 Scott, Alexander, former editor, The Paterson Weekly Issue, official organ of the Socialist Party..... III, 2519, 2629
 Thurman, Dr. W. L., Socialist lecturer, Oklahoma..... X, 9158
 Socialist Publishing Co., Clarence A. Smith, manager..... IV, 3723
 Society for Italian Immigrants, Umberto M. Colletti, general manager... II, 1244

- Sommers, Fred, coal miner, Morley, Colo. VIII, 7093, 7400
- Southern California Laundry Club, N. Bonfilio, member. VI, 5673
- Southern California Mill Owners' Association, R. H. Arnold, member. VI, 5863
- Southern Pacific Co., Julius Kruttschnitt, chairman, executive board. X, 9886, 9947, 9976
- Southern Textile Bulletin, David Clark, editor. XI, 10837, 10923-10928
- Southwestern University, Georgetown, Tex., Prof. John C. Granbery, professor of sociology and economics. X, 9127
- Speed, George H., general organizer, Industrial Workers of the World. V, 4936
- Spelling, Thomas E., lawyer, New York City. XI, 10720
- Spencer, Arthur, managing director, John & James Dodson (Inc.). IV, 3052
- Spencer, W. J., building-trades department, American Federation of Labor. I, 659
- Sperry Flour Co., E. J. Luke, manager. V, 4827
- Spicer, John L., member, committee on unemployment. V, 4720
- Stack, E. J., secretary, Oregon State Federation of Labor. V, 4579
- Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, Wade Hampton, general auditor. II, 1221
- Stanwood, Edward B., district attorney, Yuba County, Cal. V, 5025
- Starr, James, corresponding secretary, Horizontal Warpers' Benevolent Association. III, 2612
- Starrett, James, & Co., W. A. Rowan, building contractor with. II, 1668
- Stationary Firemen, International Brotherhood of, Timothy Healy, president. II, 1942
- Stead, Mitchell, of Folwell Bro. & Co. IV, 3073, 3090
- Steam Shovel Men's Union, San Francisco, A. L. Wilde, secretary-treasurer. VI, 5139, 5160
- Steel & Masonry Construction Co., C. Freudenthal, secretary. II, 1708
- Steele, Mrs. Drusie E. VI, 5878
- Stein, Rev. Dr. Anthony H., rector of Our Lady of Lourdes Roman Catholic Church, Paterson. III, 2576
- Stein, Miss Becky, finisher, garment worker. IV, 3150
- Steinmetz, Dr. Charles P., chief controlling engineer, General Electric Co., Schenectady, N. Y. II, 1828
- Stevens, Claude E., formerly head of commercial department, Adelphia College, Seattle. VII, 6193
- Stewart, Mrs. Beulah, farmer's wife, Texas. IX, 9038
- Stewart, Claudeious Edward, master house painter. V, 4824
- Stewart, Levi Thomas, farmer, Texas. IX, 9006
- Stewart, Louis, president, James McCreery & Co. III, 2246, 2399, 2400
- Stewart, Samuel V., governor of Montana. IV, 3748, 3984
- Stieglitz, Adolph, coat presser, New York. II, 1988, 1992
- Stimpson, H. F., consulting engineer, New York. II, 1944
- Stockton Building Trades Council, J. T. Woods, president. V, 4819
- Stockton Chamber of Commerce, John P. Irish, jr., secretary. V, 4773, 4833
- Stockton Daily Evening Record, Irving Martin, publisher. V, 4865, 4866, 4874
- Stockton First National Bank, James H. Hough, president. VI, 5089
- Stonemasons' Labor Union, New York, Michel Angelo Contessa, business agent. II, 1759
- Stove Founders' National Defense Association, Thomas J. Hogan, secretary. I, 510
- Straus, Moses H., manager, Frank & Dugan silk-ribbon mills. III, 2488
- Straus, Percy S., partner, R. H. Macy & Co. III, 2377
- Street Car Men, Amalgamated Association of:
 Fitzgerald, William B., member, general executive board. III, 2793, 2796
 Kirrane, Thomas J., secretary, Division 477. III, 2757
 Pratt, C. O., former chairman, international executive board. III, 2780, 2815
- Strong, Dr. Sydney, president, Central Council of Social Agencies, Seattle. V, 4395, 4556, 4557
- Struble, Henry, secretary, National Cut Stone Contractors' Association. I, 665
- Structural Iron Workers' Union, New York, John W. Johnston, president. II, 1612
- Structural Iron Workers' Union, Portland, Oreg., Benjamin Osborne, business agent. V, 4712
- Stuart, W. H. VI, 5878
- Sullivan, Dan, former miner, superintendent of streets, Butte, Mont. IV, 3761
- Sullivan, Daniel, former secretary, Longshoremen's Union Protective Association. III, 2127
- Sullivan, E. Mark, formerly assistant United States attorney for district of Massachusetts. VII, 6096
- Sullivan, Thomas, steam fitter, New York. II, 1730

- The Survey, John A. Fitch, industrial editor..... I, 334
 Svenson, Miss Hilda E., organizer, Retail Clerks' Union of New York..... III, 2306, 2316, 2400
 Swartz, Miss Nellie, executive secretary, Consumers' League, New York
 City..... III, 2370
 Swett, Isaac, executive secretary, Oregon Civil League..... V, 4595, 4603, 4743
 Switzer, Joseph E., carpenter..... VI, 5854, 5993, 5998, 5999
 Sykes, John P., general superintendent, Baldwin Locomotive Works..... III, 2869
 Sylvester, G. H., New York, Pullman porter..... X, 9648

T.

- Taft ranch, Joseph F. Green, manager..... X, 9222, 9226, 9227, 9289
 Taggart, John T., business agent, Wood, Wire, and Metal Lathers' Local Union No. 46, New York..... II, 1692
 Tailors, United Brotherhood of:
 Arnona, Paul, business agent..... II, 2031
 Gold, Joseph, chairman, board of directors..... II, 2008
 Pankin, Jacob, attorney..... II, 2015
 Schlossberg, Joseph, secretary and treasurer, joint board..... II, 1969
 Tait, John, president and manager of Troy Laundry Co..... V, 4703, 4769
 Tape, Frank H., interpreter, United States Immigration Service, Seattle.. VII, 6121, 6154
 Tapestry Carpet Workers Union, Philadelphia, John Breen, grievance officer..... IV, 3042, 3051
 Tarbell, Miss Ida M., author, New York City..... VIII, 7476
 Taubel Hosiery Mills, Rufus W. Scott, director and plant manager..... IV, 3080
 Taylor, Dudley, general counsel, Employers' Association of Chicago.... IV, 3224, 3227
 Taylor, Frederick W., consulting engineer, Philadelphia..... I, 765, 795
 Taylor, J. A., agent, district 26, International Association of Machinists..... V, 4336, 4343, 4520-4535
 Taylor, John G., business agent, International Association of Machinists,
 Southern Pacific system, Oakland, Cal..... X, 9874, 10048
 Taylor, Richard H., inspector, United States Immigration Service..... VII, 6231
 Texas, Hon. James E. Ferguson, governor..... IX, 8956
 Texas Agricultural College, Prof. Charles H. Alvord, formerly head of agricultural department..... X, 9214
 Texas Agricultural Experiment Station, B. Youngblood, director..... X, 9185
 Texas University. See University of Texas.
 Textile Workers, National Industrial Union of, Adolph Lessig, secretary... III, 2452
 Textile Workers of America, United, John Golden, president..... I, 985, 1012
 Thomas, Cullen F., lawyer, Dallas, Tex..... X, 9190
 Thomas, Mrs. Mary Hannah, miner's wife, Ludlow, Colo..... VII, 6356
 Thomas, Percy, former telegrapher, Washington, D. C..... X, 9455
 Thompson, James P., organizer, Industrial Workers of the World..... V, 4233
 Thompson, Sanford E., consulting engineer, Boston..... I, 913, 928
 Thompson-Starrett Co., Louis J. Horowitz, president..... II, 1683
 Thurman, Dr. W. L., Socialist lecturer, Oklahoma..... X, 9158
 Timber Workers, International Union of, J. G. Brown, president.. V, 4207, 4217, 4511
 Timmons, J. E., president, Central Labor Council..... VI, 5624
 Tobin, John F., president, Boot and Shoe Workers' Union, Boston..... I, 810
 Tobin, John M., international vice president, International Brotherhood of Blacksmiths and Helpers..... III, 2835
 Tolter mine, Walsenburg, Colo., Joseph H. Patterson, in charge..... VII, 6783;
 VIII, 7265, 7296
 Tompkins, Roswell D., secretary, United Board Business Agents of the Building Trades, New York..... II, 1601, 1870
 Torpy, Charles B., business agent, molders' union..... III, 2918, 2921
 Totten, Chris., chairman, employers' strike committee, Stockton, Cal... V, 4845, 4904
 Traitel, Benjamin D., president, Marble Industry Employers' Association,
 New York..... II, 1732
 Travieso, Martin, jr., secretary, executive council of Porto Rico..... XI, 11115, 11133, 11215-11224
 Trenton Potteries Co., John A. Campbell, president..... III, 2985
 Troy, Edward P., public utility expert, Home Rule and Taxation League.. VI, 5452, 5465
 Troy Laundry Co., John Tait, president and manager..... V, 4703, 4769

- Tucker, Wilson Hatch, manager, Lord & Taylor s. III, 2365
 Tulley, Herbert G., superintendent of transportation, Philadelphia Rapid Transit Co. III, 2753
 Tuttle, Dr. T. D., president, Montana State Tuberculosis Sanatorium IV, 3840
 Tyler, John G., Utah Construction Co., San Francisco VI, 5106
 Typographical Local Union No. 16, Chicago, Edwin R. Wright, president... IV, 3433
 Typographical Union, Portland, Oreg., George H. Howell, member V, 4695
 Typographical Union, International:
 Dennett, H. W., member VI, 5769
 Hayes, Max S., organizer II, 1557
 Scott, Charles T., representative VI, 5536, 5541, 5899
 Typothetæ of America, United, Albert W. Finlay, chairman, executive committee I, 609
 Tyson, James, president, Charles Nelson Co. VI, 5247, 5390, 5394, 5396

U.

- Underwood Typewriter Co., Frank T. Widner, manager, employment department, Los Angeles, Cal. VI, 5879
 Union Iron Works, John A. McGregor, president VI, 5405, 5419
 Union Labor, A. J. Mooney, editor VI, 5643
 Union Pacific R. R.:
 Fuller, C. E., superintendent of motive power X, 9913, 9986
 Loomis, N. H., general solicitor X, 9955
 United Association of Plumbers and Steam Fitters of the United States and Canada, John R. Alpine, general president II, 1710, 1711
 United Board of Business Agents of the Building Trades, New York, Roswell D. Tompkins, secretary II, 1601, 1870
 United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America:
 Johannsen, Anton, general organizer V, 4790, 4802; XI, 10667, 10686
 Rice, John, general organizer II, 1639, 1644
 United Brotherhood of Tailors:
 Arnona, Paul, business agent II, 2031
 Gold, Joseph, chairman, board of directors II, 2008
 Pankin, Jacob, attorney II, 2015
 Schlossberg, Joseph, secretary and treasurer, joint board II, 1969
 United Employment Agents' Protective Association, New York, Charles O'Connor Irwin, president II, 1183
 United Engineering Works, Sam J. Eva VI, 5268
 United Garment Workers of America:
 Gee, Mrs. Lizzie, member V, 4631
 Larger, Bernard A., secretary II, 2044
 Lavner, J. Harris, manager, District Council No. 1 II, 1978
 Silverman, Samuel, business agent, Local 162, New York II, 1998, 2048
 United Mine Workers of America:
 Costigan, Edward P., counsel VIII, 7203; IX, 8113, 8126, 8128
 Doyle, Edward L., district secretary-treasurer VII, 6925, 6961; VIII, 6993, 7217, 7334, 7343, 7344
 Drennan, Henry, representative IV, 3821
 Hayes, Frank J., international vice president I, 449; VIII, 7189
 Lawson, John R., member, international executive board VIII, 7187, 8003; IX, 8017, 8126, 8128, 8198, 8208
 McLennan, John, district president VII, 6509, 6523
 Mitchell, John, former president I, 401; IX, 8059
 Morgan, James, secretary-treasurer, District No. 22 IX, 8361
 United Mine Workers of Illinois, Duncan McDonald, secretary-treasurer IV, 3271
 United Railroads, Jesse W. Lilienthal, president V, 5031
 United States Coal Co., H. E. Hillard XI, 10863
 United States Commission on Industrial Relations:
 Barnes, Charles B., investigator III, 2196
 Chenery, C. T., investigator XI, 10274, 10437
 Final report (see special table of contents, pp. 7-8) I, 5-269
 Holman, Charles W., investigator IX, 8951
 McCusker, M., employee IV, 3835, 3844
 Manly, Basil M., director of research and investigation VIII, 7505
 United States Department of Labor, Hon. W. B. Wilson, Secretary. XI, 10833, 10921

United States Immigration Service:

- Ainsworth, Frank H., inspector in charge, San Francisco..... VII, 6291
 Billings, George B., commissioner of immigration, Boston..... VII, 6020, 6039
 Bonham, Raphael P., inspector, Portland, Oreg..... VII, 6140, 6146
 Chadney, William H., inspector, Monterey, Cal..... VII, 6339
 Chin Jack, Chinese interpreter, San Francisco..... VII, 6335
 De Bruler, Ellis, formerly commissioner of immigration, Seattle..... VII, 6167
 Edsell, Harry, assistant commissioner, San Francisco..... VII, 6278, 6344
 Green, C. L., inspector in charge, New York distribution branch, Division of Information..... II, 1296
 Hurley, Jeremiah J., assistant commissioner of immigration, Boston..... VII, 6043
 McCabe, John A., Chinese inspector, New England district..... VII, 6058, 6066
 McGrew, J. L., Assistant Chief, Division of Information, Bureau of Immigration..... II, 1290
 Monroe, Henry A., inspector, Seattle..... VII, 6173, 6176
 Moy, Shere F., interpreter, office of commissioner of immigration, Boston..... VII, 6086
 Park, Edward Leon, interpreter, San Francisco..... VII, 6303
 Powderly, Terrence V., Chief, Division of Information, Bureau of Immigration..... II, 1308
 Tape, Frank H., interpreter, Seattle..... VII, 6121, 6154
 Taylor, Richard H., inspector..... VII, 6231
 White, Henry M., commissioner of immigration, Seattle..... VII, 6125, 6145
 United States Post Office Department, John Wanamaker, former Postmaster General..... III, 2669, 2707
 United States Steel Corporation:
 Perkins, George Walbridge, director..... VIII, 7598, 7610
 Morgan, John Pierpont, director..... IX, 8084
 United Textile Workers of America, John Golden, president..... I, 985, 1012
 United Typothetæ of America, Albert W. Finlay, chairman, executive committee..... I, 609
 University of California:
 Cross, Dr. Ira B., assistant professor of economics..... VI, 5412
 Hecke, George Henry, farm advisor..... V, 4952
 University of Chicago settlement, Chicago, Miss Mary E. McDowell, head resident..... IV, 3328
 University of Colorado, James H. Brewster, acting professor of law..... VII, 6632, 6653, 6727
 University of Oregon, Dr. F. G. Young, professor, economics and sociology.. V, 4575
 University of Pennsylvania:
 Lewis, Dr. William Draper, professor of law..... III, 2661
 Nearing, Dr. Scott, instructor in economics..... III, 2649
 University of Texas:
 Austin, Prof. Charles B., division of public welfare, extension department..... X, 9077
 Haney, Prof. Lewis H., chairman, school of economics..... X, 9149
 Holman, Charles W..... I, 333
 Leonard, Prof. William E., instructor..... IX, 9044
 University of Washington:
 Berglund, Dr. Abraham, assistant professor of economics..... V, 4393, 4412
 McMahon, Dr. Theresa S., teacher, political and social science department..... V, 4163, 4508, 4563
 Smith, Dr. J. Allen, professor, political and social science..... V, 4130
 Untermeyer, Samuel, lawyer, New York City..... VIII, 7429, 7682
 Utah Construction Co., John G. Tyler..... VI, 5106

V.

- Valentine, Joseph F., president, International Molders' Union..... I, 481
 Valentine, Robert G., industrial counselor..... I, 852
 Van Alstyne, David, assistant to president, New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R..... I, 883
 Van Cise, Capt. Philip S., Colorado National Guard..... VII, 6805; VIII, 7311, 7324
 Victor-American Fuel Co.:
 Gove, F. E., attorney..... VIII, 7084, 7347-7362
 Northcutt, Jesse G., attorney..... VIII, 7135, 7181, 7402
 Osgood, J. C..... VII, 6422; VIII, 7241
 Snodgrass, B. W., coal-mine superintendent..... VIII, 7077
 Vocational Bureau of Boston, Meyer Bloomfield, director..... I, 390

W.

- Wahrburg, Richard G., president, Employment Agents' Protective Association, New York..... II, 1177
 Waid, D. Everett, architect, New York..... II, 1657
 Waitresses' Union, Chicago, Miss Elizabeth Maloney, financial secretary and business agent..... IV, 3244, 3253
 Wald, Miss Lillian B., superintendent, Henry Street Settlement, New York... II, 1965
 Walker, Dale, cotton-gin owner, Gregory, Tex..... X, 9225, 9227
 Walker, John H., president, Illinois State Federation of Labor... IV, 3196, 3202, 3445
 Wallace, John H., hoisting engineer, former member, Washington State Industrial Insurance Commission..... V, 4358, 4535, 4538, 4547
 Walsh, John H., assistant superintendent schools, board of education, New York..... II, 1820
 Wanamaker, John, former Postmaster General..... III, 2669, 2707
 Wanamaker, John, Co.:
 Lynn, Preston P., manager..... III, 2232, 2256, 2396, 2397, 2398
 Mackie, James, former employee..... III, 2317
 Smith, Miss Jeannette, former employee..... III, 2261
 Wanamaker, Judge R. M., justice, Supreme Court of Ohio..... XI, 10864
 Warren, Rev. D. C., local elder, Methodist Church, Lead City..... IV, 3600
 Washington State:
 Daggett, Floyd L., chairman, Industrial Insurance Commission..... V, 4349, 4405
 Ernst, A. B., member, Industrial Insurance Commission..... V, 4369
 Olson, Edward W., labor commissioner..... V, 4112, 4414, 4441, 4484
 Wallace, John H., hoisting engineer, former member, Washington State Industrial Insurance Commission..... V, 4358, 4535, 4538, 4547
 Washington State Federation of Labor, E. P. Marsh, president..... V, 4390
 Washington State University. See University of Washington.
 Watson, Miss Elizabeth C., special investigator, International Child Welfare League, New York..... II, 1887, 1899
 Watson, John, assistant general superintendent, International Mercantile Marine Co..... III, 2068
 Watt, John, business agent, Pattern Makers' Association..... III, 2914
 Waxman, Mrs. Mary, investigator and social worker, Council of Jewish Women..... III, 2275
 Weaver, Eli W., chairman, students' aid committee, New York City High School Teachers' Association..... II, 1848
 Weed Lumber Co., G. H. Wendling, president..... VI, 5218, 5388
 Weitzel, E. H., manager, fuel department, Colorado Fuel & Iron Co..... VII, 6727; VIII, 7252-7265
 Welborn, J. F., president, Colorado Fuel & Iron Co..... VII, 6545, 6549, 6606, 6668; VIII, 7115, 7245, 7252
 Wendling, G. H., president, Weed Lumber Co..... VI, 5218, 5388
 Western Comrade, Frank E. Wolfe, editor..... VI, 5845, 5992
 Western Federation of Miners:
 Kirwan, James, member..... IV, 3602
 Scoggan, Warren E., member..... IV, 3621
 Western Union Telegraph Co.:
 Brooks, Belvidere, vice president..... X, 9332, 9512
 Carlton, Newcomb, president..... X, 9293, 9471
 Carroll, T. W., division traffic superintendent, Chicago..... X, 9396
 Daly, George, former messenger, Chicago..... X, 9418
 Hayes, J. P., chief clerk, San Francisco..... VII, 6230
 Rosenberg, Eli, former messenger, Chicago..... X, 9420
 Wharton, A. O., president, railway employees' department, American Federation of Labor..... X, 9759, 9765, 9966
 White, Henry M., United States commissioner of immigration, Seattle. VII, 6125, 6145
 White Star Line:
 Campbell, John George, storekeeper, Pier 60..... III, 2133
 Platto, Frank C., timekeeper, Pier 60..... III, 2109
 Wiater, Antoni, laborer, Liebig fertilizer plant, Chrome, N. J..... IX, 8229, 8237
 Widner, Frank T., manager, employment department, Underwood Typewriter Co..... VI, 5879
 Wilcox, Mrs. Anna H., supervisor, continuation schools, New York City.... II, 1859
 Wilde, A. L., secretary-treasurer, Steam Shovel Men's Union, San Francisco..... VI, 5139, 5160

- Williams, Arthur, president, National Association of Corporation Schools, New York..... II, 1872
- Williams, David, editor and manager, Allentown Labor Herald, Allentown, Pa..... XI, 10942
- Williams, J. E., mediator of labor disputes..... I, 697
- Williams, Thomas J., president, building trades department, American Federation of Labor..... I, 675
- Wilson, Lewis A., State inspector of vocational schools, Albany, N. Y..... II, 1865
- Wilson, Hon. W. B., Secretary of Labor..... XI, 10833, 10921
- Wing, Lew, merchant, San Francisco..... VII, 6220
- Winslow, Charles H., in charge of investigation with reference to wages and grievances..... II, 1059
- Wisconsin:
- Beck, J. D., member, Wisconsin Industrial Commission..... I, 278
- Leiserson, William M., deputy, Industrial Commission of Wisconsin... I, 344
- McCarthy, Charles, Legislative Reference Bureau of Wisconsin..... I, 377
- Price, C. W., assistant to the Industrial Commission of Wisconsin..... I, 285
- Wolfe, Frank E., editor, Western Comrade..... VI, 5845, 5992
- Wollner, William S., chief engineer of maintenance, Northwestern Pacific R. R. Co..... VI, 5095
- Women's Garment Manufacturers' Association of Philadelphia, William A. Kelly, secretary..... IV, 3121, 3126
- Women's Trade Union League, National:
- Noel, Mrs. Frances N., chairman Los Angeles committee.... VI, 5717, 5730, 5969
- Robins, Mrs. Raymond, president..... I, 309
- Women's Trade Union League of Chicago, Miss Agnes Nestor, president. IV, 3377, 3450
- Wong Tong, general merchandise, San Francisco..... VII, 6334
- Woo Gen, Chinese wholesale merchant, Seattle..... VII, 6203
- Wood, Dr. A. E., instructor in social science, Reed College, Portland... V, 4605, 4745
- Wood, C. E. S., lawyer..... V, 4676, 4768
- Wood, John P., vice president, Manufacturers' Association of Pennsylvania.. III, 2948
- Wood, Walton J., public defender of Los Angeles County..... VI, 5818, 5972
- Wood, Wire and Metal Lathers' Local Union No. 46, New York, John T. Taggart, business agent..... II, 1692
- Woods, Arthur, police commissioner, New York City..... XI, 10550, 10917
- Woods, J. T., president, Stockton Building Trades Council..... V, 4819
- Woodward, W. F., druggist..... V, 4684
- Wright, Edwin R., president, Typographical Local Union No. 16, Chicago... IV, 3433

Y.

- Yager, Hon. Arthur, governor of Porto Rico..... XI, 11145
- Yarrington, Thomas L., telegrapher, Chicago..... X, 9436
- Yazoo & Mississippi Valley R. R., Charles H. Markham, president..... X, 9699, 9958, 9962, 9965
- Yearsley, Miss May..... IV, 3085, 3089
- Yeary, W. B., farmer and banker, Farmersville, Tex..... X, 9163, 9168
- Yost, George W., president, National Association of Bottle and Vial Manufacturers, Bellaire, Ohio..... III, 3027
- Young, Dr. F. G., professor, economics and sociology, University of Oregon.. V, 4575
- Young, Robert, miner, Walsenburg, Colo..... VII, 6913
- Youngblood, B., director, Texas Agricultural Experiment Station..... X, 9185
- Yuba County, Cal., Edward B. Stanwood, district attorney..... V, 5025

Z.

- Zeehandelaar, F. J., secretary, Merchants and Manufacturers' Association.. VI, 5493, 5514, 5839, 5891-5898
- Zucker, Henry, deputy clerk, garment workers, New York..... II, 1070
- Zuersher, Edward, secretary-treasurer, local union, Industrial Workers of the World..... III, 2585, 2591

